Ranma looked at him, not having noticed Septon Sparrow before and now looked astonished to see the man here. A single man covering the distance between Fairmarket and Harroway over the past two weeks? Ranma wouldn't have given 50 to 1 odds that he would be able to get through. He was about to question that when he noticed what was around the older man's neck. Myrcella might not have recognized it, but Ranma did. He reached out with slow hand to tap the rosary set, which was made of finger bones. "And this is, father?"

"The bones of septas and septons who have died in this war your highness." Septon Sparrow said staring into Ranma size. "Martyrs every one of them."

"I see. I might not follow the Faith of the Seven Septon, but as my wife and I said in Fairmarket, we believe in the freedom of choice, and I'm not blind to the good work that the followers of the faith with the smallfolk both here and elsewhere. I could wish that your martyrs and those they died serving could have been saved, but..." Ranma shrugged. "I am many things, a miracle worker I am not."

"I was going to ask you how you got here Septon, but I think I'll simply shake your hand and wish you well if you're going to continue to travel the lands like this. I hope to start putting the Riverlands in order in another two months most, but until then I couldn't guarantee your safety except possibly from here to the Neck."

"Alas I am not moving in that direction at all." Sparrow said shrugging his shoulders. "I am a servant of the Seven your highness, and no one ever told me that it was an easy road to take. I am moving towards the Crownlands, much of it has not been despoiled yet, but there are rumors of Lord Stannis that coincidentally match which you told me about Shadow Warriors you said you fought on the ship. Most disturbing that Stannis Baratheon has seemingly taken up with Heathen Essosi scum."

"I wouldn't say that last bit when my wife is around." Ranma said laughing lightly but with his eyes serious. "In my opinion magic is just another tool. It is not inherently evil, but the deeds it can be put to make it so just like any weapon."

Septon Sparrow looked at him, as if thinking through his words very carefully then shrugged his shoulders responding in a neutral tone. "On that we will have to agree to disagree, Your Majesty."

"I'd also warn you if you run into any other kings and queens out there not to speak to them as you did my wife and I." Ranma said have seriously half in jest. "We're far more easy-going and certain of ourselves than most. Our power comes from who we are not the panoply of a crown, but others are much more aware of their dignity."

Sparrow laughed suddenly shaking his head. "I do not make a habit of rubbing elbows with the rich and powerful my lord, my work has always been with the faithful of the smallfolk, the folk of Hill and dale, of farm, village and town. They are the people who cook your food, who harvest your crops, who make your clothing and your weapons and steel. The true backbone of the nation, though few Lords would acknowledge it."

"I do." Ranma said simply laughing as well before going on more seriously. "Be careful out there old man, Westeros needs more people like you and they can ill afford the loss of even one." Reaching out he gripped the other older man's shoulder for a moment before turning and exiting the sept.

Septon Sparrow watched Ranma go, then turned to watch Myrcella, exchanging laughing words with a young girl whose arm she was setting while the mother looked on a faint smile on her face though she looked more bemused than anything. It was evident she recognized who Myrcella was and was astonished to see a Lannister princess here taking care of the smallfolk. It was like the old tale of Baelor the Blessed.

She was not the only one making that connection. Septon Sparrow's mind was hard at work even as he moved forward to help a man carrying in another man whose leg was bleeding heavily around a makeshift bandage.

For decades there had been a movement among the Faith of the Seven to reform the Church, but it had never really gained momentum. Even if you were part of that reform movement, the higher you went in the church's hierarchy, the more corrupt you were forced to become to keep your own power base let alone actually accomplish anything. The council of Most Devout were corrupt, everyone knew it, but doing something about it was much tougher. Because it wasn't just the Most Devout, or even the High Septon, it was practically every high ranking septon and septa in every city below the Neck. (The Faithful of House Manderly and White Harbor were a group apart, and had been for thousands of years) Without the septons of the cities and the greater religious orders beyond the Penitent Brothers on their side, the reform movement could never gain any traction.

In wartime however, that was no longer the case. The official organization of the church was gone. King's Landing was utterly cut off, while Petyr and the eunuch were able to get messages out, that was a skill that the Most Devout and the High Septon did not have. With them no longer at the top of the church's hierarchy that had allowed several of the other cities to step up. Lannisport could not, busy with internal issues. Oldtown could not, always at war as they were with the Tower. And none of the other cities were big enough or their septons and septa as experienced enough to do the job.

That had allowed the errant and country-based septons, the ones who were at the heart of the reformist movement to begin to step up their own game. And they had, but they ran into problems, beyond of course the purely physical of needing to deal with refugees, actual battles, and other dangers to their flocks. The main problem was, that none of the Kings seemed at first glance to be worth convincing their flocks to back.

At first glance the two Baratheon brothers should have been. Not only was Stannis a person who believed in the rule of law and precedent, he was also his brother's heir if Joffrey indeed was not legitimate. But this was more than countered by the fact that he was now a follower of a heathen religion, and the priestess of said religion was a magic user who seemed to loath the Seven.

Many of the faithful from the Reach thought at first that Renly should've been their chosen champion, that they should've begun to preach to their followers about him being the chosen King but that was argued against strongly by the septons who had actually met the man, led by the septon of Storm's End. While Renly was personable, intelligent and always careful to remain popular with the smallfolk, that wasn't the same as being a champion of the Faithful. His own morals were in question, not just the rumors about his relationship with Loras Tyrell which had begun to spread since the war began, aided by the agents of both Petyr and Varys.

The Lannister's chosen King Joffrey had been chosen by the Most Devout and the High Septon as their champion, despite the little bastard pressing a polygamy clause for the king into law. Needless to say, he was even less suitable as a king in the eyes of the reformist faithful than the two Baratheon brothers. That was despite the very thin reason that convinced the High Septon to go along with it, the idea of converting the North. The more intelligent among the faithful knew that would never happen. It hadn't for thousands of years, to assume it would suddenly change was the height of folly.

That left only the heathen of the North and his Dragon Queen, a woman who while having been anointed by the seven holy oils when she was younger certainly hadn't followed the Faith since. On the other hand I've actually met them and seen their deeds Septon Sparrow thought as he used firewine to wipe away at the wound on the man's leg, ignoring his screams. Others might preach kindness and attempt to gain popular support, but the two of them have actually gone out of their way and done it.

I know who I think should be king, and who the Faithful should begin to back. Now all that remains is to convince the rest of the reformist party of the same thing. Later that day, Septon Sparrow left Harroway, heading south and east to the ancient sept of Peasedale to meet with his fellows septons on that issue.

OOOOOO

Later that evening Daenerys sat at the front of the long table in the dining hall of the holdfast, flexing her hands wearily. Ranma smiled wanly at her, reaching over to knead her hands with both of his. "I've always felt there's something about wielding the sword for an execution that makes it weigh more than it does during a battle." Ranma could fight all day and had and not really feel tired at the end, but even a few hours of residing over trials and executions had exhausted him.

"Seeing as I haven't wielded a blade in battle that often I can't comment on that. I'm just happy most of the trials were so simple to officiate." Daenerys replied, twining her fingers with her husbands.

Splitting the work between them had allowed them to go through the entire remaining Westerlands garrison here in the town, and they had found only nine men that could not be indicted on counts of rape, arson, theft or outright murder. Those nine men had been stripped of their weapons, then placed in a prisoners cart to be taken up to the Ruby Ford to join their fellows there. They had been glad to go considering what had happened before Ranma and his men stormed into the town, as well as the executions that occurred after.

"It turns out that the spy did indeed tell the local garrison commander about the dragons," Domic was saying as Daenerys came back to the here and now. "He and his sub commanders, five knights apparently, all left with the spy ostensibly to meet with Sir Tywin and discussed future options, and amazingly the reality of the dragons didn't actually get out beyond rumors from further south until we arrived."

Alayaya nodded from where she sat next to him. "It isn't that the smallfolk here have pleasant memories of dragons or anything of that nature your highness, but the panic of the garrison simply allowed them the opportunity to strike out against their oppressors. I would recommend we keep the dragons out of the city entirely from now on. Despite Sunfyre saving that boy this afternoon many of the families here remember tales of dragonfire. The original Harroway town was burned down by a dragon apparently."

"Vhagar, last of the original three." Daenerys said nodding. "I remember that from my family history, it happened during the Dance of the Dragons. Her rider was the kinslayer Aemond. A boy that should never have been allowed to ride the dragon in the first place, the tales of him remind me all too much of my own brother."

"I know we need to stay here for a while to put the town in order, but are we going to let the troops have some time in the city?" asked Rickard.

"What do you think Domic?" Daenerys asked looking over at the man.

"I think that would be a very bad idea your grace." Domic replied swiftly. "These people have spent months under the lash of the Lannisters, and many of them see armed men of any sort as the enemy. Ranma and yourself scored a major coup with them when you held open trials of the men you captured and even more when you imprisoned Lord Roote, but the euphoria of that will pass quickly."

Alayaya nodded. "And let's face it, our army has fought and marched for weeks, and with your rules about not allowing camp followers the men haven't had any way to let out certain urges. Troops often get out of control and barracks, and I think that that would be the case here."

"Then let's move the army through the town and bivouac them on the other side. We'll let you and your men in place Wendel, as a visible police force." Ranma decided, nodding his head to the second son of Lord Manderly, who nodded back. "When we pull out we'll also leave a force of the pikemen from White Harbor here, they should get along better with the locals than most of our northern troops. We'll rotate some of the men through the town and let them get some beer in them and visit the brothels, but I'll want the unit commanders and all of you, my lords, telling the troops my rules about rape, arson and theft every day."

All of the lords and commanders there nodded, and Ranma nodded back before standing up, pulling Daenerys up with him. "Now if you'll excuse us my lords, it has been a long few weeks since my wife and I were able to have some privacy." That statement made most of the lords break out in laughter as Daenerys chuckled, but did not protest Ranma's lack of propriety, her own eyes glinting in eagerness.

OOOOOO

"And I tell you, the Arbor is gone, the fucking Ironborn took it!" Said one man to another standing on a quay in Pentos. "That means the wines in my hold will be worth far more than you're trying to pay me."

"Bah!" said the man he was talking to, significantly older looking and somewhat overweight as well. They'll never hold it, the Arbor is too large and too important to the rest of the Reach. We might face a few months of scarcity, but not enough to drive up the price of the Arbor's wine to what you're asking for it. There are other wine merchants in the town my friend, if you don't want to trade with me at the price we already agreed to, you're free to try any of them."

The first man scowled, and the two began to haggle back and forth until they finally agreed on a price. The price was nowhere near the amount the captain of a wine ship had initially asked for, but it was still somewhat larger than he could normally have demanded for his wine.

The captain was soon moving back through the docks towards his ship intent on giving the crew their pay before rustling up another cargo for his ship when a hand clamped on his shoulder. He turned to give the man who had accosted him an earful and paused as he stared into the one eye of the man who had done so. He was a tall man, with the look of warrior about him, with a cascade of black hair to his shoulders and a neatly trimmed beard. He wore an eyepatch over one eye.

There was something him off about the man's one-eyed gaze, something that froze the captain's heart.

"Excuse me friend, I couldn't help but overhear your interesting bit of news about the Arbor. I was wondering if you could tell me more about that?"

OOOOOO

The next day Ranma practically bounced as he left the room that he and Daenerys had commandeered for the night. He almost ran into Myrcella and one of the keep's maids, both of whom took one look at him and began to blush hotly. Behind them Fenris led the two dragons behind Merry, growling occasionally when Sunfyre or Rhaegon looked at the maid or passerby as if they were contemplating attacking them.

The two dragons were not quite violent to any non-Targaryen adult that came near them, but it was a near thing sometimes, and it was slowly getting worse. Luckily children were still safe around them. Rhaegon might not like them much, but he wouldn't attack them, and Sunfyre seemed to like the attention he got, so long as the children in question didn't smell too badly. Their respect for the direwolves however hadn't disappeared, which allowed Fenris to control them somewhat when Daenerys wasn't around.

The maid was carrying a tray of food, simple fare but plentiful, which began to shake as her arms did. "That looks good. Hello Myrcella, how are you doing this lovely morning?"

"Apparently not as good as you." she replied tartly, shoving his shoulder lightly with one of her hands. "And the food isn't for you, you big lummo. I've no doubt you wore Daenerys out again."

Ranma had the decency to flush a little pulling at his ponytail. "Might have..." he muttered looking away.

The maid kept blushing and staring at him. Ranma and Daenerys had been even louder than normal last night, and many of the servants had heard them, including when Daenerys began to verbally urge Ranma on in certain acts (and vice versa). The fact the noises had continued almost the entire night was somewhat astonishing to all of them, from the experienced to the inexperienced.

"There's some breakfast ready downstairs, you can go get your own. Shoo!" Myrcella replied firmly, flapping her hands at Ranma as if he were a duck. Ranma laughed and walked off, leaving Merry to open the door to his and Daenerys' room. As she had expected Daenerys was still asleep, splayed out naked on the bed, the sheets, which looked ruined to Merry's eyes, bunched up nearby.

Behind Myrcella, Sunfyre and Rhaegon entered the room quickly moving towards their mistress before snuffling and turning away from the bed to curl up nearby. Their sense of smell was nowhere near that of a direwolf, but there was something about the smell of human sex that threw them off a little. They would wait until their mistress was back to smelling pleasant before greeting her.

The almost comatose girl cracked one bleary eye open to stare up at Myrcella, then at the tray the servant was holding. She muttered something that could've been "lifesaver" Myrcella before waving a single finger at the table next to the bed.

Myrcella laughed, letting the servant put the tray down before ushering the girl out of the room and turning back to Daenerys. She sat down next to the young woman, absently patting her naked back. "I think you really need to teach Ranma the meaning of restraint."

"Wanted it." Daenerys muttered into her pillow. "Couldn't stop myself. Couldn't stop him. Too long since the last time."

Myrcella nodded, looking around at the state of the sheets the bed and a few patches on a tapestry on one wall which had been splashed with something and ripped as if by someone's nails halfway up its length. "I think you made up for lost time." she said dryly. "Either you need to work on your endurance, or he needs to work on his restraint, choose one. What if you had a meeting or something you couldn't put off, would you show up like this?"

There was a low, angry growl from the depths of the pillow, causing Merry to laugh. After a moment she reached over to the tray, picking up a small steaming mug of tea. "I have your Moon tea here, I think..." she said now looking and flushing hotly at this state of Daenerys's lower regions. "That you need it."

It was odd, Merry thought to herself, waiting for Daenerys to respond, how calm she was about this. Most women who had fallen for a man would have been jealous or possibly enraged at seeing another woman with him, or like in this instance, the aftereffects of said. But Merry didn't. She found it erotic as all get out, like those small, extremely expensive tomes from Dorne that a few of the ladies of the court had that she wasn't supposed to know about. But there wasn't jealousy in Merry, she couldn't be jealous, not after seeing how happy Daenerys made Ranma. Merry knew she still loved him, but she also knew that alone she would never have made him as happy as he was with Daenerys.

After realizing Daenerys was in danger of falling asleep, Merry moved one hand to help push Daenerys over onto her back, and the Targaryen woman looked at her blearily then slowly she nodded, a sudden look of fear flitting across her face as the memory of last night came back to her. She had been in no mood to let Ranma pull out last night, and he had come inside of her three or possibly even four times, she had lost count somewhere in there and they still couldn't afford for her to be with child yet.

Her little ones needed her around to control them, though if they won the Riverlands they could send for Bran or let Jon try his hand at warging with the dragons. Daenerys thought long and hard about that, and had decided that she had been foolish not see the opportunity of having someone else around that could control her dragons. It was a weakness, not just in their strategy flexibility, but in her as well. She could no longer afford to fear the loss of the power base her dragons gave her. No, her fears were much more personal than that.

With Myrcella's help she sat up, which set her breasts could jigging slightly. Merry glanced down, and Daenerys blinked a little at seeing a spark of something there for a moment before Merry directed her eyes upwards once more. With one arm around the older woman, Merry brought the moon tea up to her lips, allowing her to sip slowly, though at first Daenerys had tried to gulp the moon tea down before Merry pulled it away for a moment. Her face was thoughtful now as she looked at Daenerys quizzically. "What's wrong?"

Daenerys tried to shake her head, leaning forward to try and get at the moon tea again, but Merry removed it once again when she tried to gulp the hot liquid down again. "Easy Daenerys, it's not going anywhere. Honestly, what's wrong, you really look worried about something."

After a few moments of sipping at the tea, Daenerys hesitantly responded. "According to what I remember being told when I was younger, my mother had trouble with each of her pregnancies, and such things tend to be passed on. It, I am, I am not looking forward to tempting fate there."

Merry frowned, all too easily remembering how the town's septa had told her about the women who had died in childbirth here of late. "I can understand that. If you're worried about that kind of thing, I would suggest sending to the Citadel for an expert or perhaps to one of the Free Cities. I understand that they have several medical techniques that the Citadel derides for one reason or another. I'm afraid that's one area my own knowledge is sadly lacking in."

"That's not a bad idea, thank you." Daenerys said before going back to sipping her moon tea, leaning her head lightly against Merry's shoulder. The two continued to talk quietly for a time, simply enjoying having a moment to relax with no demands on their time before a knock on their door signaled the world had need of them once more.

OOOOOO

While Daenerys and Merry were talking, Ranma had headed downstairs to see what he could find for breakfast before getting to grips with the day's workload. While he was walking down the stairs however, he was hailed by one of the army's messenger boys. "Milord, the camp's guards have reported seeing a rider has arrived with a message for, um 'the Queen and her consort'. They um, they told me to pass on the words he used."

"Interesting wording." Ranma muttered laughing slightly. He remembered however that House Darry was one of the houses that remained loyal to the Targaryen cause during Robert's Rebellion. It makes sense they'd think that way I suppose. We'll disabuse them of that notion quickly, though. "Ask the guards to escort him to us please. Oh, and send a maid up to my wife please."

The messenger turned out to be a knight in full armor, an older man thin of face with white hair and beard. He bowed floridly to both of them, though he looked a bit askance at Ranma sitting next to Daenerys like an equal.

Merry and several of the maids had been able to get Daenerys to at least look normal so long as she didn't move much, despite her exhaustion and sore muscles. She had winced slightly when she sat down though, which nearly made Ranma laugh aloud as he remembered one of the positions they had tried out last night. Her answering glare did nothing to get rid of his smirk despite her best attempts.

"Your highness." he said bowing his head further to Daenerys. "We have long wished for the return of House Targaryen. When word of the dragons being seen in the sky reached us at Darry last night, we overthrew the small garrison that the Lannisters had forced upon us after which I rode here immediately. My Lord was injured in that battle, so could not come to see you personally, but I am here to pledge the House Darry and its lands to you."

"Tell me, didn't Darry also pledge themselves to the Lannisters?" Ranma said leaning forward coolly. "You and your Lord swore to follow them and the bastard, and I say the word with feeling, who currently sits on the Iron Throne. Why should we believe this sudden change of heart?"

For a moment the knight's eyes didn't move from Daenerys' face, but she simply stared back at him coldly. Ranma laughed darkly. "Don't keep looking at Daenerys as if she's going to override me on this, we're both equals in this relationship, and she agrees with me in asking that." Daenerys nodded firmly despite her weariness, her violet eyes narrowing.

The knight licked suddenly dry lips but gamely answered. "Well your majesties, I would say it is easy to bow your neck when you fear being forced to your knees. You act as if we had a choice. If we had not, we would've been destroyed."

"Or, you could have joined your men to those that fought at the Kneeling Man's Ford, and beaten the Lannisters there. With more men there Vypren might not have betrayed the defenders, and without that Tywin might not have won." Ranma said equably. "Or even have declared neutrality and held up in your castle, which I understand is small but well made. Instead your entire house bowed your heads to the house that is keeping your Lord Paramount's heir prisoner under contrived charges, and we've heard you sent men to help besiege Raventree Hall."

"To put it bluntly Ser Knight, we have no reason to trust you, and every reason not to. You're house seems to go where the wind blows, and now that it is blowing in our favor you seem to think you can simply change side as easily as I would pick up a hat." Daenerys said coldly. Behind her Sunfyre stirred, raising his head to look at the knight over his mistress's shoulder.

"Very well, you may join us, but only on our terms, and you will pay for first following the Lannisters. And know that we will be continuing to watch you my Lord." Ranma went on for his wife grimly.

He clapped his hands, and Cley appeared next to him, holding a small piece of parchment tied with a string and marked with the new royal seal, the faces of a dragon and wolf merged side by side. "These are the terms to give your Lord. My army will be continuing its march down the Kingsroad to the River Road soon enough, which will place us very near Darry. You have until we arrive to make your decision."

Despite the almost contemptible tones the knight had no recourse but to return to Darry with this new message, and his Lord flew into a rage. He had been expected to be rewarded, not vilified, which was rather shortsighted of him. After all, once a turncoat people began to assume you were simply a turncoat. Moreover, while Daenerys felt she could look to the Houses that backed her family during Robert's Rebellion for support, she wasn't willing to trust them, since their oaths were to their Lord Paramount and threw him to the crown.

However it was a proven fact that Darry could not stand against them. He didn't have enough men on hand, at best his house had only around 500 armsmen at the best of times, and half of them were at Raventree Hall with the besieging force there. And the dragons utterly terrified Lord Darry. Moreover the terms were not nearly as bad as they could've been and he knew it.

The terms allowed him to retain his armsmen and castle, as well as all the lands of his house to the South, Southeast and Southwest of his castle. He only lost the lands directly north towards Harroway, which were going to initially be ceded directly to the crown as another area of Crown lands. So in general terms, he was getting off very lightly. He also might gain more land south of his castle from here on, depending on how well he helped supply Ranma's army. Some people however were never satisfied, and Lord Darry was one of them, which was why he did not tell Daenerys that he was in contact with her brother.

OOOOOO

Victarion frowned thoughtfully looking through his Myrish glass. Not one for deep thoughts, he was however an excellent tactician, and could tell that the castle farther up the Mander was a much tougher proposition than the castles he had already taken since opening up the fat belly of the Reach. A few on the Shield Islands were tougher, but each of them had weaknesses that could be exploited, and hadn't been nearly as ready as their fleet for combat. This one, only the small size of it could be seen as a weakness, though the fact it looked to be threatening rain today could also be an advantage.

He stood on the prow of the Iron Victory, staring ahead thoughtfully for a moment then nodded. "Begin!"

When his first mate gave the signal, four longboats that had been anchored all around the Iron Victory pulled up their anchors. Then they began to move up river under oars and sails, the wind behind them for the moment.

Behind them the other fourteen longboats that Victarion had gathered for this assault waited, each of them resting easily at anchor. Here the Mander was deep with a silt covered floor which would've told any farmer the reason behind the fertility of the soil hereabouts. The Ironborn however cared not for that only that the river was deep enough to let them anchor here for a few moments with their numbers spread out further down the river. Only the Iron Victory and the four ships that had just moved past it should be within sight of the defenders right now.

Behind him Victarion heard a distant voice began to bellow commands, and he knew that the captains of the other longships were getting anxious. He turned, his helm on his head giving him an even more fearsome appearance than normal. Though his leg had yet to fully recover from the wound he had taken against Ser Talbert Serry he was still the most fearsome fighter among the Ironborn, evidenced by the fact that he continued to wear full plate mail when even Ironborn would only wore chain.

From within his helm he glared out at the two longships that had begun to lift their anchors and were beginning to move forward in line. The Mander was so wide that two or even three longships could move abreast if they were careful and not using their oars. Their captains saw him standing there glaring at them, and quickly, like unruly children, ordered their crews to stop.

Order once more restored Victarion turned back to view the battle nodding with satisfaction under his helm as he began to see splashes of water around the ships he had sent forward as the defenders' scorpion bolts slammed into the water. "Send in the second group."

OOOOOO

Margaery knew that she wasn't a warrior and she had only a basic understanding of combat. Ranma had insisted she get some training with a dagger, and she had spent a few hours exercising with him, Sansa and even young Merry (though quite reluctantly in that case). However that did not make her a master of weapons, or of battle and she knew it. She could however use a bow quite well, having hunted geese and other birds many a time when she was younger. Now she was standing at one of the arrow slits set into the wall of the keep facing the Mander when the longships began their attack.

The castellan of the keep had tried to get her to hide somewhere in the Lords Chambers, but Margaery had refused. "The idea of not seeing my end coming, of not being able to effect events, is anathema to me." She said quietly but very, very firmly. "I am no warrior, but I will still take part in the battle." Something in her gaze had stifled the man's protests and he had retreated into his own office rather than taking part in the battle.

Margaery sighted along the arrow set to her bow then fired quickly. Her first arrow missed her target, smacking into the wood of the longship's deck to one side. The next shot however took her target in the shoulder, punching through his very badly made ring mail armor there. He went down with a cry, and Margaery smiled thinly. "You will not find this rose so easy to pick you Ironborn dogs!"

That won her a cheer from the archers sharing this guard room with her.

Sighting along another arrow she frowned suddenly. Those ships weren't firing back. They were moving along the water directly in front of the keep but they weren't trying to get close enough to throw grapples, instead they were simply sailing on.

Even so, they were still taking heavy fire from the defenders. One ship suddenly listed, struck near the prow of the ship by a scorpion bolt. Another ship was struck by two scorpion bolts in quick succession. One bolt took out its mast high up sending the furling sails crashing down among the crew to their screams of pain. The other slammed into the deck at the far back of the ship where the steersman had been previously.

Despite this the longships began to move up river of Oldflowers. She gasped in astonishment. Are they going to ignore the bait? Her question was answered a second later when a shout from above reached her ears here on the third floor. "More longships coming up river!"

Leaving her place at her own murder hole Margaery raced across to another one that was on the corner of the keep facing down River. Four more longships had appeared on the horizon, coming on swiftly under the power of oars heading up river. They moved much faster than the first group, so fast it obviously took the defenders up top by surprise as evidenced by another shout. "Get scorpions one and two turned around again, Stranger damn you!"

Before the scorpions could turned around and begin to fire on their new targets the first of the new ships was within bow range, and they began to fire on the keep's rooftop. The angle was such that aimed fire was almost impossible, so they were trying to simply lay down a heavy enough barrage to keep the defender's heads down. Thanks to the well-made parapet and the height of the keep however this failed, and the archers on the top and all around Margaery began to fire back.

That first ship kept going, as two more ships came up behind it, both of which in turn also began to lay down a heavy fire. It occurred to Margaery then that these ships seemed to have more archers than she would've expected in an Ironborn crew. Archery wasn't something the islands were known for, Theon notwithstanding.

These two ships however were armed with fire arrows and began to fire up onto the keep, trying to set the scorpions there on fire. Judging by the shouts that Margaery heard, this tactic was proving successful. Tossing her bow to a nearby page who was assigned to bring new quivers to the archers she raced out shouting "A bucket chain, organize a bucket chain!"

She raced down grabbing every servant she could find organizing them into a line to bring up buckets of dirt and water from the well set into the floor of the kitchen. Once that was done Margaery raced up onto the roof with the first bucket in her hands. There she found that two of the scorpions had been set alight while the other two had already been doused with the buckets of water and dirt that had already been placed on the roof.

She raced forward towards the scorpion that looked like it had been hit with the least fire arrows, knowing that the other was a too far gone to save. She also shouted at the archers. "What you waiting for, give them some of their own medicine back!" Even as dozens of archers turned from their places on the wall to help out with the bucket chain, others hurriedly prepared their own fire arrows.

OOOOOO

Victarion nodded grimly satisfied and what he was seeing so far. One ship sunk with all hands since even with his Iron Price bought looking glass he didn't see anyone trying to swim for the riverbank. Another that seemed to have taken heavy losses. That was a small price to pay for the destruction of one possibly, two scorpions if his lookout was right about the amount of smoke he could see from the top of the keep.

He watched as the boats of the second group anchored directly in front of the keep's walls, becoming stable platforms for the archers on them. Those archers had been taken from every other crew that was part of this battle and placed on those ships for the duration. There had been some grumbling about that, but not a lot. If Victarion's plan succeeded, there would be more than enough plunder for everyone and if it didn't then it was going to be on Victarion's head, not the captains who allowed their crews to be broken up like that.

He frowned suddenly as fire arrows began to streak out from the keep towards the ships that had anchored. Almost immediately the fire from those ships lessened somewhat, as men quickly turned to put out their fires under the leadership of the captains. That would not stop the Ironborn, they were no strangers to fighting with fire but it would decrease their own arrow assault.

"Signal the crews that have already gone ashore to begin their attack." he said smiling grimly. "Let's split their attention further."

OOOOOO

Margaery wiped soot from her face as she let the bucket she had been holding fall to the stone of the keep's roof beneath her. They had managed to save one of the scorpion said been set on fire, but another had joined the first two. That one and the one that Margaery had written off before were both damaged beyond repair even if their fires on them had been put out.

Glancing quickly over the top of the roof she could see one longship had been set ablaze despite the best efforts of the crew.

That had more to do with the fact that a lucky arrow had found the captain of that ship than anything else. While Ironborn crews were more disciplined than most would imagine they could be given the Ironborn society, it was a very rickety sort of organization. Remove the captain, and the first mates position was very tenuous on most Ironborn crews and if he didn't have the coxswain or other crew members on his side before the captain's death, he would have a very hard time exerting his authority, especially in the battle.

Another ship had taken so many losses to their archers that it had fallen silent completely, simply drifting at anchor.

But the losses among the defenders were bad as well. A dozen men were down at least, and as Margaery watched another took an arrow in the eye pitching silently over the side of the parapet surrounding the keeps rooftop.

A lookout down on the wall of the keep that moved away from the riverbank suddenly shouted "Ironborn troops coming from the south!"

Nearby Igon Vyrwel cursed. "These Ironborn are tougher than I expected my lady," he said staring over at Margaery. When he had first seen her coming up onto the roof he had been appalled, but there had been no time mid-battle to spare men to take her back allow, and her organization abilities had proven worthwhile in any event. There was also, and this was a thought he would never say aloud, something to be said for a lady who was willing to get her hands dirty in an emergency.

"They've conquered the Shield Islands and the Harbor, and they did tremendous damage in their last rebellion." Margaery said sternly looking back at him. "If you have been underestimating these curs, stop doing so now!"

"It was not their toughness or battle prowess I was questioning, it was their ability at tactics." Igon Vyrwel said moving over to where he could stare over the wall at the incoming mass of infantry. Arrows from the keep's walls began to slash into the group almost as soon as they came within range, and they didn't seem to have nearly as many archers as the ships.

They did however have a few large makeshift wooden barricades which could protect them from arrows. "I want dozen of archers over here, ignore the ships for now," he ordered and several archers turned from where they had been firing at the ships in the river to take the army assaulting the walls under fire from a higher position than even the keeps wall could provide.

The makeshift palisades couldn't protect enough of the Ironborn from such angled fire and dozens began to fall. But the rest kept going, tossing up their grapples and beginning to try to pull themselves up the walls, spreading out to cover all of the landward walls of the castle.

OOOOOO

"Time for us to join the battle," said Victarion smiling thinly. His first mates and the rest of the Iron Victory's crew all shouted aloud gleefully and Victarion pointed downriver with his acts. "Forward! For the Drowned God!"

Above them the sky finally opened up and rain began to fall on the battlefield. This of course did not cool any ones ardor for combat, but it did put a damper on the fire arrows of both sides.

The Iron Victory led the way up river quickly with the remaining seven longships of this attack behind it, the others remaining behind at anchor, their crews having already been committed ashore. The Iron Victory and another ship slowed down and drifted to the sides of the river allowing their fellows forward while they began to fire their scorpions at keep. The bolts did nothing to the walls of the keep save possibly knocking out tiny chips of the stone. The wall was too well made and the Ironborn scorpions were not that powerful in any event. A catapult would've done more, and if it had been large enough might well have were burst through the walls, but such a weapon could not be put on any longship, not even one of the Iron Fleet.

Victarion cursed luridly at that, then shrugged his shoulders philosophically and ordered his ship forward. "I guess we'll have to do this the old-fashioned way!"

His crew all gave a roar of approval at that. Quickly the Iron Victory moved forward to join their fellows. The longships ground themselves all around the beleaguered Castle or got in close enough to the wall of the keep that was right on the edge of the shore to throw up grapples there while their fellows on the ships of the second group tried their best to keep the defenders heads down.

OOOOOOO

Ser Igon's face had become grimmer and grimmer as the battle continued and he turned to Margaery. "My lady, go below." He ordered, his tone grim and unyielding.

Margaery looked at his face then down at the battle all around the keep while the rain began to come down in ever increasing amounts. She nodded, fear and anger warring within her, but she knew that being on the keep's roof served no purpose now save to distract the defenders from their own worries. "Good luck captain." she said formally, holding out her hands to him. He bent over it, but she used it to grab one of his ears and pulled him upright kissing him lightly on the cheek. "Be safe." She ordered then was gone.

Igon Vyrwel of Highgarden stared after the young woman, who he had seen grow from a child up to the beautiful lady she was now, shaking his head in amusement for a moment. "May the Maiden and the Mother watch over you, milady."

He turned back to the battle grabbing up a bow of his own and firing down at the Ironborn ships that were trying to throw grapples up onto the wall of the keep and having no luck. "That's the way lads, beat these attacks off, then we can concentrate elsewhere! We'll show these Iron bastards, what true courage is all about!"

OOOOOOO

Upriver the first four ships had finished the laborious process of transferring crew from the stricken ship. That was not an easy process for any Ironborn longship. After all feuds among the Ironborn were taken seriously, and longships were more often than not family affairs. Several vendettas were cleared up in those moments before the Ironborn began to turn back.

They were supposed to land somewhere on the bank and have their men march overland back towards Oldflowers, but there was nothing here of interest to them. The two remaining captains had decided that heading back down the river until they were nearly with arrow range would be acceptable.

The last ship had turned itself around, a hard process but necessary if they wanted to steer at all, when a lookout shouted from above in the crow's nest. "Ships coming downriver, they look like barges!"

The Ironborn captains both looked at one another from across their decks and one of them, a captain from Pyke itself grinned evilly. "Some fat fucking merchie that didn't get the news? I think we've found our own prize!"

"It'll make a good warm-up."

"They're comin' on fast!" Said one of the lookouts now having saw the same things his fellow did.

By that point the ships were close enough for all of the Ironborn on the deck to see them despite the now pouring rain. The barges didn't stop when they were well within sight of the longships, instead coming on strong. The longships captains worst but so astonished at this that they couldn't do anything for a moment. It was like so many sheep trying to attack wolves.

That impression lasted right up until the groups of ships were close enough for grapples to go across. A roar was heard on the wind despite the sound of the rain pattering down "Growing strong!" The longships crews moved across the now tied together ships only to be met by a furious charge of their own and various shouts from armored Knight's and soldiers.

One roar in particular was heard on the wind despite the sound of the rain pattering down "Growing Strong!" Each barge was stuffed to the gunwales with warriors and though many of them lacked experience they were eager and very angry at the despoiling of their lands.

Garlan smiled grimly. He'd had no idea the Ironborn would be so stupid as to come this deep into the Mander but these ships didn't have the scorpions that could've made this confrontation a thing of horror to him and his men. Indeed, they didn't seem to have many archers either which meant this was a steel-to-steel battle. He said this allowed to a nearby knight, who he knew from his days in the marches then added "I'll take that any day against Ironborn scum!"

"I as well!" the knight laughed almost gaily, but with a grim undercurrent as their barge slammed side to side against him a longship. With a final nod to one another the two young men raced forwards joining the charge over their barges sides and onto the longship.

OOOOOO

If Victarion had known that Garlan and his men had arrived it was quite possible that he would have tried to pull back his men and prepare a more advantageous battle. It would've made good tactical sense after all, since he had no idea about the numbers or strength of these newcomers. This wouldn't have worked though, not even Victarion could get the Ironborn to retreat from a battle whatever sense it made.

As it was, Victarion didn't know. All he could feel was the battle turning against the defenders. Slowly the archers fallen silent up on top of the keep, and from the sound of steel clanging against steel over the sound of the rain he could tell that the other Ironborn had gotten up on to the wall at several places. The defenders just didn't have enough men to match the assault, and the rain had cut badly into their archer's ability. Bows were not as susceptible to water damage as the layman thought, but visibility dropped dramatically in any kind of rainstorm, making archers ability to pick out targets far worse than normal.

He was still losing dozen of men of course, and that was only on the river side of the battle. Thankfully however the keep's scorpions couldn't be depressed enough to fire on their ships any longer.

Victarion grounded the Iron Victory slightly north of the keep and went ashore with his entire crew. Between them they were carrying a battering ram, and they raced around the walls of the keep, losing several men to the archers on the wall despite the rain before they got into position in front of the keep's main gate.

With the defenders spread everywhere, more than 200 already dead from various means and with Ironborn already up on the wall in several places the defenders simply couldn't concentrate enough fire to take out the battering ram or its crew. The gate however was old and strong, and it withstood the blows of the battering ram with ease.

No, it was the attack on the wall that moved inland away from the keep that finally got through. The Ironborn got enough men onto that section of the wall to gain superiority there despite still losing men from the archers on top of the keep's roof. More men began to pull themselves up onto the wall as the defenders retreated quickly, archers always knowing that they didn't really stand a chance against swordsmen at close range.

Seeing this, someone up top of the keep blew a horn sharply five times in quick succession. At this signal the defenders on the other wall of the triangle retreated into the keep with that their surviving fellows from the southern wall, aided by a massive hail of arrows from overhead halting any close pursuit. They bolted and locked the two doors leading from the keep out onto the wall before any of the men could get there in time and from the sound of things were already barricading the inside of the doors.

Realizing this many of the Ironborn began to pelt down into the small courtyard, hurriedly. After a vicious fight in the gatehouse they opened the outer gates for their fellows. Victarion smiled grimly as he motioned his men to bring forward the battering ram against the keep's doors in turn, though arrow fire was still taking a toll on the Ironborn around him. He grabbed six of his men and shouted, "Head back to the Iron Victory and bring one of the scorpion bolts up here!"

As those six ran off he grabbed another man. "Head around the south of the Castle, their fire's weakest there now. Signal the archer's ships to bring their men ashore, we can put them up on the walls here!"

The runner raced off while Victarion himself moved to head up to the wall. He never noticed the messenger didn't get two steps before being nailed in the back of his unarmored head by someone from a murder hole set on the third floor of the keep. More archers joined the defenders fire from there, and despite the ongoing pounding of the rain the casualties among the Ironborn began to go up once more. Yet that first shot, unnoticed as it was then and unremarked upon later, was so good that, had anyone actually noticed, they might have thought it miraculous.

Soon the men Victarion had sent to get the scorpion bolt were back and he bellowed, "Get over here!" From where he was taking refuge from the defender's fire right next to the wall of the keep in the small recess of the doorway.

Two of them died while all around the Ironborn horde were trying to find cover wherever they could. The remaining men however brought the scorpion bolt up onto the castle's walls and over to where Victarion was taking shelter. He tapped it with one gauntleted fist. "Let's knock on their door!"

With that he moved to one side, helping to grab the scorpion bolt. They backed up then raced forward slamming the iron head of the bolt into the doorway splintering it. Another five runs shattered the door and pressed the few pieces of furniture that had been stacked against it backwards slightly. One of them died from an archer from inside firing through the hole in the doorway they had made, but the others pulled back quickly and ran forward again slamming the scorpion bolt once again into the door. This finally pushed enough of the barricade inside out of their way for the men to force their way into the keep.

"We Do Not Sow!" Victarion shouted wielding his axe hacking away not at men at the moment but at the furniture blocking the doorway deeper into the keep. The doorway itself was so small that only a few pieces of furniture had been able to be placed against the door, which proved to the defenders' undoing.

An arrow clanged off of Victarion's chest plate at an angle as he twisted to one side, and then he through his axe over hand at the lone archer trying to defend this position while behind him another had already raced off shouting the alarm. Dozens of armsmen came up, but by that point Victarion had already burst out of the destroyed furniture with dozens of Ironborn behind him, grabbing up his axe from the dead archer's chest. All of the Ironborn that had been trying to batter their way through the keep's door were now pouring in behind Victarion shouting their own houses war cries as well as the general "For the Drowned God!"

At the head of the assault Victarion found himself dueling with a few young knights who were trying to wield great swords of all things inside the confines of the corridor. They got in each other's way so much Victarion slew both of them with ease, then came to where another corridor intersected the one they had been attacking from. Ironborn quickly raced off in every direction while Victarion stood there thinking, trying to figure out the layout of the keep.

Just then if Victarion had ears to hear it he would've heard a shout of joy and sudden happiness go up from the men on the keep's roof. Because it was at that moment that Garlan and the barges under his command had come into sight, racing down the river as fast as they could move. They weren't very fast, and the Ironborn ships whose crews were still trying to throw grapnel's up onto the top of the keep there saw them coming.

All of those men had been angered and irritated by their inability to go through with their portion of the attack. At this sign of what they thought was new, softer targets every captain there upped-anchor and swiftly made their way up river towards the barges, whose shape they could barely see in the pounding rain, let alone what was on their decks. They discovered too late that the barges were packed full of armsmen knights and archers. One longship lost enough of its crew to begin to list badly in the water, getting in the way of two more.

Here however the general disorganization and callousness Ironborn had towards one another actually worked to their advantage. Rather than retreat or try and pull away which would've been disastrous in the close confines of the Mander the other five remaining longships kept going, skirting past their tangled fellows to crash into the barges at the front of Garlan's command.

This won them force superiority for a moment upon the first few barges. Moreover this was the kind of fight the Ironborn excelled that; on uneven surfaces in bad weather and in-close. Moreover the unlucky, stupid and inexperienced had been weeded out since the battle to take the Shield Islands began, leaving only the good, the lucky and the experienced which was something many of the men under Garlan could not say. The experience in this kind of fighting began to tell, and Garlan's men took severe casualties in those first few moments. The battle turned however when more barges pulled up alongside and greater numbers of knights and armsmen began to come in on their fellow's side.

While this was going on the last four barges of the convoy grounded themselves on the shoreline, and the men on them began to race towards the beleaguered seat of House Oldflowers.

Inside the keep of the castle Victarion had fought his way up onto the fourth floor of the keep, where he began to meet even stiffer resistance. These knights and arms men were much more experienced than the ones down below, armed with short swords, hatchets and here and there in the hands of an especially capable man longwords, weapons that were much easier to use inside rather than the greatswords those two young idiots Victarion had killed earlier had tried to use.

Numbers however were pushing them further and further back, and Victarion was at the head of his man all the way killing for his Drowned God, while internally noting they would have to feed the bodies into the river at some point in the future. Eventually they forced their way within arms-reach of a doorway that led into a room which must've served several of the murder holes facing the river. Victarion laughed coldly. "They're trying so hard to protect that place, I think we've found where the Rose of Tyrell is hiding boys!"

That idea seemed to spur his man to greater heights, and they charged forward at the remaining defenders. Victarion was at their head, and he tried to pick out his opposing number in the defenders, finding him after a moment. He was a knight, an elderly one standing at the back of the group extorting his fellows. "Hold, the Warrior blesses our arms, hold damn your eyes!"

Though his armor was of high standard, and his sword and armor both well cared for the face that showed through the visor opening of his helmet was overweight and old, matching the voice that Victarion heard, and the armor had obviously been tailored to allow room for a fat belly. Just like the Reach itself, strong seeming, but a fat and rich underbelly.

Despite this however the man was decent with his longsword and shield. As Victarion cut down his own opponent the knight did the same to an Ironborn warrior, blocking the Ironborn's mace with his shield and reposting quickly not at the opponents just but at his leg, cutting deep into his knee. The Ironborn screamed, flailing for a moment and the older man's sword came up in an economical backstroke cutting his throat open right below his helmet.

Another Ironborn charged the man and the older knight dueled with him sword to sword for a moment. Then the Ironborn overextended slightly allowing the older man to smack his sword to one side with his shield and skewer him through the middle punching through the Ironborn's chain mail with ease.

The old man only had a brief moment to pull his sword out of his former opponent before Victarion was on him. Victarion took a single moment to nod his head at the older man then charged. "We do not sow! For the Drowned God!"

"For my honor, for my oath, for my family and house Tyrell! Flying Free!" The older man bellowed, meeting him sword to axe. Though he was old, the man obviously had kept up at least some of his training, and was stronger than Victarion had anticipated. Not as strong as Victarion however, and their locked blades were quickly pushed back.

The old man disengaged, twirling to one side and using his shield to smash Victarion's axe to one side, his sword coming up as quickly as he could make it. But Victarion blocked it with his own shield, and the two exchanged several quick blows, the man refusing to lock weapons with Victarion again. He also refused to move from the doorway he was guarding, turning his body instead to face Victarion.

After another series of exchanges Victarion was able to get within the man's reach slightly, bowling into the man throwing him bodily backwards through the doorway. This allowed the Ironborn behind Victarion who had finally finished off the last of the armymen in the corridor to barrel into the room. By this point there were only eight Ironborn with Victarion, the others having spread out throughout the keep or having fallen in the fierce defense of this room outside in the corridor. But they would be more than enough to subdue the archers within and claim the prize.

Four of them fell to arrows from inside, and two more were engaged quickly by unarmored archers racing forward with long daggers. Five of those archers died in the next few mad moments, but they took two of the Ironborn with them. This left two more plus Victarion and the old man, and in one corner holding a bow and quickly putting another arrow to it the girl who could only be Margaery of House Tyrell.

The last two Ironborn pushed quickly past the knight and Victarion. One took the girl's arrow in the throat, the other danced back out of the door just in time to avoid a second.

He then tried to get behind the older man, as Victarion tried to turn him slightly their blades still locked up but he screamed as the girl, showing a remarkable ability, shot between her last defenders legs to catch the Ironborn warrior in the lower leg. He almost fell, but still made his way around the two combatants, hobbling forward.

By this time the old man was gasping, and his blows were nowhere near as strong or swift as they had been when the battle began. Victarion finally smashed his sword to one side, kicking out hard and catching the man in the chest before he could get his shield in position to block it. The man 'oofed' in agony as the breath exploded out of his lungs the kick doubling him over.

Victarion smashed his own shield against the man's as he tried feebly to raise it to guard his head. The man fell backward, stunned. The axe came around, its heavy cutting edge slamming into the armor of the man where his shoulder met his neck.

"No!" Margaery screamed another arrow on her bow, taking the other Ironborn reaver in the eye. Through her tears Margaery reached down quickly fitting another arrow to her bow. She tried to fire at the man who had just killed Igon Vyrwel, who she recognized from the stories about him as Victarion Greyjoy. The arrow caught him in the shoulder, but it didn't penetrate his plate armor hitting as it did on an angle, simply bouncing off as he turned towards her.

Victarion kicked the man's dead body off his axe, dropping his mangled shield. He turned to face the girl, wincing as his injured leg once more had to twist around, thankful the old man hadn't been mobile either, else the fight between them might have ended very differently. He marched towards the girl, looking around in frank astonishment mingled with respect. "Your guards put up a hell of a fight girl, that's to their credit, Greenlanders though they be. But did you really think this castle would be enough to stop the tide? We are Ironborn girl, we pay the Iron Price and we take what we want!"

By that time Victarion was in front of the girl, and she tried to use her bow like a stave striking at him but he disdainfully smacked it out of her hands with his gauntleted fist. His other fist clamped around her throat lifting her off the ground by several feet. Her feet kicked out ineffectually against his armor and he laughed coldly. "You are a pretty one, it's been a long time since I've taken a salt wife for myself and you would be a prize beyond compare. But tell me, why?"

"Why did you try this. You baited us girl, and I'll admit the defenders here put up one hell of a fight, but the outcome was never in doubt! You could've run, could've left the Mander behind and taken refuge elsewhere. Why? Why did you invite the tide upon yourself?"

"For..my... duty..." Margaery gurgled through his hold on her throat. "For my people! Couldn't defend Highgarden, had to stop you here."

"But you didn't stop me fool girl, you gave me the keys to that city, you! What will your family do when they see you trussed up on my bowsprit? What will the defenders of your precious city do?"

Victarion was not his brother Euron, who would have already raped the girl and carted her off to his ship naked, nor was he Balon, who would have raped her then killed her, sticking her head on his bowsprit. Victarion was not ruled by his passions like that, but neither was he compassionate. No, the girl was a means to an end and that end would be a prize greater than any Ironborn had ever taken: the city and castle of Highgarden, home of one of the two richest families in all Westeros.

Just then shouts from out in the corridor and further into the keep caught Victarion's attention. Unfamiliar war cries were being shouted, and he could hear a few familiar voices shouting in dismay and even fear in some cases. He turned towards the door, and that was when Margaery struck. Rather than beating on his hand ineffectually, one hand quickly moved to the back of her own neck where she had stowed the holdout dagger underneath her hair, tied there by a small piece of rope that was hidden underneath her dress.

She pulled it out quickly, raising it in one hand. Victarion turned back to her, and the dagger was thrust down straight into his eye and through it into his brain. Victarion Greyjoy died instantly, his body spasming as he fell to the ground.

No longer being held up off her feet Margaery fell too. She sprained her ankle as she fell awkwardly on it, but ignored the pain quickly pulling the dead man's grip off of her throat. She spent a moment massaging it before hobbling over to where the body of Igon Vyrwel lay, going to her knees next to it and gently closing the older man's eyes. "May the Warrior and the Father know you as their own, dear protector." She murmured. That was where Garlan found her as he and his men barreled through the keep looking for her.

The death toll was atrocious all around. Garlan had lost about 2000 men taking on the longships in the river but that was almost the totality of his own losses, he had only lost a hundred more men once his force was in Oldflowers attacking the Ironborn from behind. The Ironborn had never suspected that any other force was in the area and hadn't posted any watchers on the wall as they burst into the keep, so they were taken completely by surprise.

Moreover, by that point the defenders had reeked a horrific toll on the Ironborn. The Ironborn had started this battle with 19 longships, all of them having their own crews and as many more men besides as they could carry. That amounted to a little over 4000 men. The defenders had never had more than nine hundred, and had been stretched thinner and thinner as the battle went on, but even so had gutted the attacking force. They wouldn't have won without Garlan's sudden arrival, but there would have been few enough Ironborn left alive for Victarion at least to realize how dearly the battle had been won.

Those same defenders had paid the highest price that could be demanded of them. Only twelve men of the castle's entire complement were still alive when Garlan led his men into the keep from the same entrance that the Ironborn had used to gain access to the keeps interior. More than half of the survivors were injured, many crippled in some fashion.

Even so Castle Oldflowers still stood. Margaery was still alive, Garlan was alive and with his forces more than halfway down the Mander. Moreover the Ironborn fleet holding the Shield Islands had suddenly lost a little under half of its strength. It had also lost its commander, Victarion Greyjoy, an even worse blow in terms of the fleet's combat ability. Both of these losses would begin to tell in the months to come, not just for the fleet holding the Shield Islands, but all the Ironborn.

OOOOOOO

Despite how busy they had been since arriving in the town, the Northern army finally left Harroway four days after their arrival, leaving behind a force of 400 to guard the walls. From Harroway, Rickard was sent off, leading a force of a combined arms force of eight hundred, most of which came from his own House, heading towards Saltpans. His orders were to find out what was happening there, and if he decided it was not to the North and their allies' benefit, do something about it.

When he arrived in the Saltpans, Rickard would learn that Lord Ryger's prediction had been accurate in what was going on, though he was incorrect on which side the two houses that held Saltpans had chosen. The Knightly House, Cox, had chosen neutrality, favoring waiting to see more evidence, while House Hawick had decided to come in on the Lannister side in return for gaining full control of the town. They had received aid in the form of a hundred armsmen and they had moved to arrest House Cox. Ser Cox fought back, and the two sides had exhausted themselves fighting for a town which that very fighting had wrecked.

With no one ready for an exterior force arriving, neither side had posted watchmen on the walls. Rickard moved in quickly, subduing both sides with minimal loss of life to his own men but significant loss on both sides after they foolishly tried to attack his men. Within an hour, both Houses had been nearly wiped out, the remainder was under Lord Karstark's control, as was the town. Normality began to return, something the townsfolk, caught in the middle as always, were ecstatic about.

Another five men were sent to Maidenpool with a message from Daenerys to Lord Mooton, who Daenerys knew was one of the contacts her brother and Illyrio had been trying to cultivate. That message contained some information about her return and her dragons as well as calling that house to join their cause. Maidenpool was too far out of the way from the Westerlands march up to face the North so hadn't been touched yet. That would make it and the lands around it incredibly important in the days to come when Ranma and Daenerys began to try to heal the damage that the Westerlands incursion had caused, and after that when they marched into the Crownlands.

Daenerys hoped to bring Mooton in on her side rather than her brothers, but had only a faint hope it would work. Both Daenerys and Ranma were a little leery about it, knowing that Mooton would be in a position to push for concessions since they would desperately need the aid of his land and town. Moreover neither of them had a very good handle on his personality, and their advisors for once were unable to help them with this. Lord Mooton had never been seen in Riverrun, Brynden had never interacted with him, and Dmeric had never travelled to Maidenpool before leaving for Essos.

At the pace the army marched it only took them half a day to get to Darry, which allowed them to rest the Army for the rest of that day, which was raining again, before heading out the next. Ranma and Daenerys found that Darry had also been ready for them with the foodstuffs and other bits and pieces that they had demanded be ready for their arrival were indeed ready.

Lord Darry was a tall boisterous fellow, but his eyes were calculating, and when he greeted the two royals, he seemed to be watching them closely. He seemed to take their laying down of conditions for him in stride, though he somehow made both Daenerys and Ranma uneasy.

That night Ranma and Daenerys met with their senior commanders once more. "Who knows the lands around here best? Specifically, what are the lands like between here and Harrenhal?"

There was some muttering about that and Ser Blanetree frowned. "I served as Master-at-arms at Harrenhal before my father passed away and made me the head of our House, it's about a week's march for a normal army from here. But it's a tough nut to crack even as badly battered as it is and I don't think we've heard any rumors about it or the town around it facing much in the way of the depredations of the Westerlanders. I'd recommend ignoring it, if we can get between it and the rest of the Westerlands army, we can cut them off from any support House Whent might offer in the way of supplies. Which wouldn't be much frankly, lady Whent and her house aren't very powerful, and she isn't the best land manager either."

"Agreed," said Lord Jason frowning as he stared at the map laid out on the camp table between them. Ranma and Daenerys had decide against staying in Darry itself, saying it was because the castle couldn't house their entire army. The reality was both that, and the fact they didn't really trust Lord Darry, and didn't want to tempt him into doing something foolish.

Jason knew that and respected their decision, but concentrated on the current discussion. "I've met Lady Whent several times and she doesn't really have the stomach for battle. She bent the knee to the Lannister's right enough, but I doubt that she was very enthused about it one way or the other. So long as the garrison the Lannisters placed in her castle is too large enough for her own men to overcome however, she won't turn against them either. But neither will she take any offensive action."

"Hmmpf..." muttered Greatjon shaking his head. "I remember that castle, and if I was the Lannisters I'd put in a powerful enough force to hold that regardless of what the lady would want. But it's doubtful they've got enough men to sortie against us with or without Whent's cooperation. What exactly are you thinking of?"

"Considering that I don't intend to actually attack, at least not conventionally, the fortifications on the Kneeling Man's Ford, I don't think we need the entire Army with us. That means we might be able to use half the army to relieve Raventree Hall or move to siege Harrenhal. If the group there is no threat, then the first option sounds better. Whatever the case, we'll make for Sallydance first, then take the lay of the land and decided what to do next."

OOOOOO

Three days march down the River Road from Darry the army should've been in sight of a small village, called Sallydance, but what they found was horror. They had seen signs of the depredations of the Westerlanders before this of course. The trials in Harroway, the tales of the smallfolk passed on in Fairmarket, the empty and abandoned farms the abandoned village of Ramsford along with others, even a few empty towns here and there along the Kingsroad showed the disruption and in some cases horror of the war the army of Tywin Lannister had brought to the Riverlands.

But all of that paled to a town whose inhabitants hadn't, for whatever reason, been able to run in time. The town was utterly demolished. There were no fires now, this had either happened long enough ago that they had burned out, or the rains that had come and gone since the battle against Tywin's forces had put them out, there was no way to know which. But there were still bodies, and there was still a stench discernible by Fenris leagues before Ranma could even see the town: the smell of death and decay.

He looked over at Ser Blanetree, who was the local guide at the moment, then over at where Meera and her men were coming back swiftly down the road. The scout group had been much reduced in the fighting on the other side of the Red Fork and reduced further by the need to send a few of them with Brynden and a few again with Rickard as he went down to the Salt pans.

That left Meera with only six men skilled at scouting to move toward the army, which had forced Ranma to use Fenris as a scout around the army's flanks and back just in case. Meera had seconded a few of the levy units from House Roote since that house's dissolution as local experts though.

Meera's face was pale as if she was trying to hold in her bile, her jaw clenched. Before she could speak however Ranma held up a hand shaking his head. "Don't tell me, the village is gone, right?"

Meera stared up at him then glanced over at Fenris, who had come up to stand next to Ranma from where he had been scouting the southern flank of the army. "Yes, it's, it's not a pretty sight." she said gulping again at the memory. "We didn't get too close, but the outskirts of the town was bad enough. I'd recommend cutting off into the woods to go around it."

Ranma turned to Greatjon and his son along with Patrek and Jason. "We'll go far enough around so that Fenris can't smell that stench anymore then come back towards the road."

He turned back to Meera looking at her. "Were there any looters or anyone still around?"

"I don't think so, not with that smell in the air."

Ranma nodded, staring further down the road towards Sallydance while behind him the army began to leave the road. He actually wanted to go and look, to see the devastation firsthand, to see what the Westerlanders had done to the areas of the Riverlands they controlled. Yet he knew it would be dangerous to come any closer than this to an area with so many bodies that had been left unburied. That was a hive for flies and disease, and he wasn't about to chance that, even with his own life.

But in the end he didn't have to do so to get a further taste of the hell the Westerlanders had brought to the Riverlands. Sallydance had marked the intersection between a small road heading towards the House Blackwood's lands and further down the River Road, making it a small but decent hub of local trade. As such it had several smaller outlying farmsteads, and one of them was on the route that the army took to get away from the stench. There weren't nearly as many bodies, but those that were there were horrors.

The body of the man who had possibly been the patriarch of the family had been strung up on a nearby tree, his entrails hanging out from a cut that had opened him right below his stomach from one side to the other. His two sons had fared little better, one having had his head chopped off next to his body, the other having seemingly been pulled apart, possibly by horses or something.

But the worst was the younger daughter and mother. The mother had been placed on top of a stake which had been driven deep into her stomach, hopefully after she had already been dead but there was no way to tell. Her body was also naked showing that even if she had been alive when impaled, it might have been a release from the hell that had become her life in those final hours. The same had been done to her daughter a girl who looked only six or seven years old, including the stark evidence of rape.

Ranma couldn't take his eyes off those bodies, his face showing horror and a rising rage at the sight. Daenerys, when she came up with the rest of the army, also stood there, struck dumb by the sight. Merry was again sharing a horse with Daenerys. She took one look then buried her face in the older woman's hair, shuddering.

Greatjon and Jason were both veterans, and had seen such things particularly in the battles against the Ironborn when they came in after a raid. But the royal army hadn't exactly been gentle to the smallfolk either, nor had the Stormlanders or even the Northerners until Lord Stark had put his foot down and executed one out of every five rapists to stop such.

Smalljon and Patrek however, thanks to Ranma's rules about such things hadn't yet seen what an army could do to a village or town when the blood was up and the fires blazing. They joined their king and queen staring at the destruction though none of them dared come close enough to bury the bodies, it'd been so long since they had been placed there it was possible that disease had already set in.

"Get me some fire arrows." Ranma said softly. Though the voice was soft, there was something in it that made practically everyone in hearing him bolt back toward the supply horses.. Smalljon was the first to come back, carrying one of the spare bows and a fistful of fire arrows. Ranma wordlessly took them from him, and with unerring precision sent a single fire arrow into each of the bodies that they could see, then another into the remains of the farmhouse.

As they began to slowly burn Ranma shook his head. "And these people call themselves men? These people think themselves nobles and knights? These people call themselves human?" Daenerys had no answer for him, simply taking his hand in hers as they stared at the fires for a few more moments before turning away to rejoin the rest of the army.

Not even an hour later they intersected the road leading towards Blackwood land on one side and then back towards the village on the other. Here Ranma called for a halt, letting the Army have a quick lunch while he consulted with his commanders. "We've got the bit between our teeth now," he said rubbing Fenris up under the chin for a moment as the direwolf rumbled in pleasure, thankful as his human was to get away from the stench of decay. "I mean to keep it, and I am in no mood to allow the Riverlands Houses that have thus far supported the Westerlanders to have the opportunity to turn their coats."

"What do you plan to do?" Greatjon said gruffly. Jaded he might be, but even he had been shocked by the sight of that farm. Yet he was still able to keep his mind on business. "Remember we still don't know any clear or hard number of the men that Tywin was able to pull out of our trap. Less than half his army for certain, but that's not exactly a small number is it?"

"I have faith that Brynden has been pressing them hard, and with the distance to cover he'll have lost even more men, especially with Ser Wendel's assault on his camp during the battle. That Army won't have the morale for any kind of heroic assault, and we'll still have the pikes. My read on the land around the Kneeling Man's Ford is that it'll be open enough for us to form a pike square if we can." Ranma paused looking at the Riverlands lords who all looked at one another before shrugging or nodding.

With that sign of agreement Ranma went on. "We'll take one of the regiments of pike and half the archers along with the irregular infantry all of the light cavalry that we have and a small portion of the heavy cavalry up with us. We'll send another regiment of pike and the rest of the army with all the food they can carry down towards Raventree Hall."

"Why did you mention all the food then they can carry?" Patrek asked.

"Because I mean for that army to move even faster than we normally do. I want you to catch the force down by Raventree Hall before any word of the fall of Darry and Harroway can reach them. If we do that you can take them by surprise. The rest of the army will continue to move towards the Kneeling Man's Ford. Once we get back on the road how long d'you think it'll take us to get there Ser Blanetree?"

"As fast as were moving, another 2 and a half days," the older knight said promptly. "Even if we keep most of the supply horses with us, we're moving at a faster clip than most armies can manage, we might even beat Tywin back."

"If we can do that I mean to take those defenses at a run and be in position to hold the fort against him." Ranma said seriously. "With us on one side and Brynden on the other, he'll either surrender or die and frankly at this point I don't talking care which."

Gone from Ranma's mind were all his long-term needs to retain a portion of the invaders as a workforce, gone was his desire to not punish the levy forces so hard for the crimes of their masters. No, he wanted to slaughter everyone last one of the Westerlanders, and if he had to he would do it gleefully.

Daenerys frowned for a moment. "With the use of my dragons taking those defenses shouldn't be difficult, especially if the force there has somehow received word of the disaster that Tywin walked into. Even if Tywin beats as there, that army will be heavily demoralized, low on food and any other kind of provisions. It won't try for an open field battle, not unless they're desperate enough to try to charge our pike again. I would recommend that you go with the other army Ranma, while I retain command of the other portion and push up to the Kneeling Man's Ford."

Ranma frowned thoughtfully, then Daenerys leaned in, whispering so as to not be overheard. "We've proven that we can both mete out justice and can deal with matters of law and politics, but I still need to prove that I can lead battles for us to be seen as true equals."

Her husband continued to frown, then shook his head slowly, replying in a whisper as well. "No, you got a good point but I want to be on hand just in case. Tywin's a cunning old lion, and if he does something surprising or has somehow managed to keep his force under control after all this time I want to be there."

"Which could simply imply that I'm not your equal in this field. Send me along with Greatjon, Ser Barristan and Jason to advise me, and that will be enough." Daenerys insisted.

"Your Majesty." Jason began delicately, indicating the royal duo's conversation had carried despite their whispering. "I realize your point, and it's a good one, but I don't think this is the time." Everyone looked at him and he shrugged. "Tywin knows his options are becoming less and less, and that will make him both dangerous and unpredictable. For that we need our best military minds, and that is Lord Ranma, I'm sorry to say."

"Cley, get me my map of the Riverlands," Ranma said before Daenerys could say anything. The others were silent for several moments as Ranma went over the Riverlands, strangely enough not concentrating on the area near the Kneeling Man Ford, but down further south. After a moment he shook his head. "Sorry Daenerys, but I think I do need to be with that force. With Stone Hedge still in our hands, Tywin won't be able to even think of holding if he get there before us, which he might."

Ranma carefully did not look at Fenris, keeping his eyes locked on Daenerys whose eyes flickered that way once then nodded slowly, seeing his point. "If he retreats will Lannister try to get down towards Wayfarer's Rest and retreat to the Westerlands, or further south?"

"I think he'll retreat straight south." Ranma said promptly. He tapped the map for a moment on the Tumbler's Falls. House Harlton controls this land and they joined the Lannisters willingly so he can expect aid there, and if he's fast enough he might get there before us."

"And then take barges down the Blackwater Rush." Daenerys thought nodding your head. "That makes sense. If he knows Wayfarer's Rest is held against him, he certainly won't be able to go that way, you're right. Which would mean a long chase..." Daenerys nodded again. "I withdraw my suggestion." She winked at the others laughing as she took Ranma's arm. "Never let it be said that I am not open to the voice of sweet reason."

This caused everyone around them to laugh, even Ser Barristan, but after a moment Jason asked. "Who will you put in charge of the force to relieve the Blackwoods then?"

"You Lord Mallister, Ser Barristan and I believe, Smalljon. No offense Smalljon, but I think we'll need Patrek with the army still as supply officer and you'll be of better use helping to shatter what resistance there is outside of Raventree Hall." Patrek's arm had healed by this point, though he wasn't up to fighting with it just yet. He had however taken to the exercises Ranma had shown him easily. He would never be the match of one of the Wolfsworn, never be able to use ki like all of them could to power their weapons, but he would still become far better than most swordsman could be.

Smalljon nodded, his hands working on the hilt of his greatsword while his father thumped him on the back. At the same time Jason looked at his son proudly

"I think we should send Tristan and House Ryger's troops as well." Daenerys suggested. "A force of light cavalry like that will be good to chase down any survivors, and it'll still leave us with the majority of the light cavalry we have." Plus in a battle like that, Tristan will be able to win himself some glory, which he feels he needs to. Ranma might not have noticed his growing desire to prove himself, but I have.

Ranma nodded and clapped his hands sharply together. "It sounds like a plan Sers and ladies, let's get it done." Within an hour, the army, now fed its midday meal, was once more on the March in two different directions, the dragons once more flying over the portion led by Ranma and Daenerys.

OOOOOO

Tywin smiled grimly as a cheer went up all around him, the army at last seeing the friendly fortifications on Kneeling Man's Ford, and men on the other side began to see the army. The march these past few weeks had been hellish.

The weather of course played its part in that. Few among his men had warm clothing, let alone rain proof clothing. Their tents were proof against rain, but thanks to that spoiling raid by the Northerners, most of the army's tents were gone along with much of their other camp supplies. Because of that and the rains that came every third day or so, many of his men were sick with colds and fevers. This was made worse by the lack of bedrolls and food.

With the Northern barbarians on its heel, the army couldn't stop and forage, which made hunting impossible most of the time, and the food had slowly run out. Most of his men hadn't had more to eat than small chunks of stale bread. And the northerners themselves did their part, never able to catch up with his army, they still continually pressed him hard, ambushing his back riders several times, attacking his flank with small forces and generally causing carnage.

Tywin had tried several to reform his army and hold at locations he thought he could use to his advantage against the Northerner's dogging his heel. Each time he found them either already holding those positions, or attacking him in such a way the geography worked for them instead. And always their archers would go to work, either as a large body or ones and twos. Ten men here, a hundred here, four hundred lost here, the losses to the Northerners, desertions and deaths by other causes had added up, halving his army again, leaving him with slightly over five thousand men.

Nonetheless, I escaped your jaws young wolf, your outriders were never able to slow my army down enough to bring up your infantry. Now come, come and try to beard the lion in his den. We will see what those pikes of yours can do against a prepared position.

Unfortunately this slight uptick in his mood did not last Tywin very long. "What?" He said coldly as he looked at Lord Stackspear, who had remained in command of the fortress here.

"Stone Hedge and Wayfarer's Rest have both fallen my Lord." The man said shrugging his shoulders uncomfortably under his Lord Paramount's icy gaze, his own shock and worry at the losses the main Westerlands army had taken apparent, but he'd had enough to worry about the past few days. "We think the raiders got into Stone Hedge by impersonating the regular supply convoy, some of our scouts found their bodies hidden along the road to the castle. Wayfarer's Rest was taken in an assault, but as Stone Hedge was the closer issue, I felt it better to concentrate on that first."

"I sent the majority of my men down to try and reclaim it under Ser Greenfield and news of the castle's fall spread quickly to the force besieging Raventree Hall. Lord Bracken pulled his men out of the siege immediately and marched up to take part of the siege. Neither of them have reported any headway however, so it is anyone's guess if they will win through."

"And our supply situation?" Tywin knew all too well how much of the supplies gathered here at the ford he had taken to feed his army on the march, but hopefully those losses had been made good since they marched.

Lord Stackspear shrugged. "I don't have exact numbers for your army my lord, but the land around here has already been foraged out by my own men. I doubt we have enough supplies to feed both my men and yours for more than a few days, and there is no way the rest of our supplies can make do your losses."

In an uncharacteristic show of tiredness Tywin rubbed the bridge of his nose for a moment before asking "Do we even know who took Stone Hedge? Was it some Riverlands brigand or some group from one of the houses that swore for us?"

"The man who reported the castle's loss to me said that he saw the Stark banner my Lord." the camp commander replied. "But, but my lord there is more. A party arrived here from Harroway with a man from further north, one of your spies. He brings information, I, you need to hear it firsthand my lord, else you call me a liar."

Tywin looked at him then nodded. "Send for him then, but tell me, how many men did you send to take Stone Hedge back?"

"Around 3000 my Lord, nearly my full complement, I left a thousand men here under myself." Stackspear replied, while sending his servant out of the cabin. "I felt that the defenses here would've made up for numbers lost if we were attacked, and I could not bring myself to think that there was a second force strong enough to attack us here as well as take Stone Hedge. Information I've gained since making that decision have called that into question, but recalling those forces wouldn't have helped if that information is true."

Tywin quirked an eyebrow but underneath his habitual self-control he was getting a little worried at the fear he could see in Stackspear's face and body language.

At that point the servant returned with another man following him. Tywin took a moment to look at the man following Daven, trying to place where he had seen the face before. "You... would be the majordomo of house Wayn correct? Why are you here when you should be in place to pass on the movements of the Riverlands lords?"

Tywin's voice was mild, but violence glittered just underneath the surface. Without those lords deciding to break their neutrality the disastrous battle against the northern pike would never have happened, and Ranma would have been trapped there, unable to get around Tywin's army and escape once more.

"My Lord," Crenlock said going to one knee. "I traveled as quickly as I could, and as surreptitiously as I could as well which was not easy. I know I should have stayed in place my lord, but my normal means of passing on information were discovered, and I felt this information was important enough to risk bringing it in person." And of course his own life had been in danger too, even before the attempted assassination he had planned, which evidently had not worked. "A disaster has occurred my Lord, the return of the dragons!"

Tywin froze, that was the only word for it, his normally unexpressive features closed down entirely, his eyes growing colder than ice, and his hand which had been lightly tapping the hilt of his sword gripped it so hard his knuckles whitened. I had heard rumors to that effect, but none of my spies had passed on any real information, and Ser Addam didn't see any sign of it. How could the Northerners have kept that a secret, and why would they allow the dragons to return at all?

The Lord Paramount of the Westerlands didn't know anything about Alayaya and Domic, or their ability to ferret out spies. Nor had he ever given much credence to either the Faith of the Seven, or the smallfolk's resentment of his armies actions since arriving in the Riverlands. The smallfolk had long memories, and Septon Sparrow had decided that whatever side he was on was most certainly not the Lannister's. And when the smallfolk were asked by their septons not to pass on information to the invaders, most obeyed, some even under torture. Those that didn't were known to their neighbors, and began to have 'accidents' over the past few weeks.

"Start from the beginning." Tywin ordered.

The man did so, detailing the arrival of the northern host with Lord Brynden and Greatjon Umber, their inability to make any headway with local lords, and then the second arrival via the Blue Fork which included the Umber heir and Lord Mallister. "It was only when the two of them and their servant entered the inn which Lord Wayn and the others had taken for themselves that we learned who she really was."

Disaster upon disaster, Tywin thought Crenlock finally finished, having detailed how his fellow spies had been outed by Brendan and a few others, how he had organized an assassination attempt of Daenerys, which must have failed given the rumors that had almost outpaced his progress from Harroway to the Ford. Crenlock finished by saying. "I shared enough with the knight in command of the Harroway garrison to warn him about the dragons, but he refused to pull his men back, but came with me to the Ford."

Here Stackspear spoke up. "We've since received word that House Darry has switched sides and they would only do that if the Targaryen girl was still around and if the northern army had crossed the ford."

"They plan to attack us from the side then." Tywin thought, his mind and voice cold. Ranma planned for this, perhaps not the fall of Stone Hedge, but he wanted me here, right here in my defenses, surrounded by log cabins and wooden palisades and wooden siege weapons. Would he threaten me with the dragons while all the while my army starved perhaps, or would he have simply used them right away? And it hasn't rained for the past two days, if that continues... It matters not, I need to retreat before the northerners get here. We don't have the supplies to stay here, and our earthworks facing the east aren't nearly as good as those facing the Ford.

"Lord Stackspear, it is clear to me that we are caught in a cleft stick. As such, we need to make some hard decisions." Tywin said aloud, then began to detail his orders, noticing but not caring as Stackspear's face first fell, then congealed into stone. Tywin would do what he had to in order to survive and see his family did the same, if that meant sacrificing the majority of the men he had here, so be it.

OOOOOOO

It took barely a day and a half for the now only 5000 strong army under Ser Barristan and Jason to reach the Blackwood lands. They stopped at the outskirts of a small village, resting the army a full day before marching on rapidly, coming within sight of Raventree Hall early the next day.

Thanks to the months of rigorous marching and exercise the army was still in good fighting condition when they arrived, and immediately fell into battle ranks. Sir Barristan had watched the battle at the Ford with interest. He knew that the pikes use of close formations, and the depth of that formation along with their better armor had made the pike not just an anti-cavalry weapon but an anti-anything weapon, so made that the center of his combat formation as they marched into sight of the army surrounding Raventree Hall.

He left Tristan and his House's troops to one side and back as a mobile reserve but mostly, he confided to Tristan who commanded them, to make certain that they were not engaged in the actual fight until the enemy broke. The heavy cavalry under Smalljon was to his other side, directly in front of the wing of archers for the moment. He wanted to hide the archers numbers from the enemy as much as he could, which wouldn't be much if he was honest, but that also put the archers closest to the nearest copse of trees which could allow them to retreat their just in case.

Though Ranma hadn't commented on it, Jason and Ser Barristan between them had decided to make one attempt to call for the Riverlands forces attacking Raventree Hall to surrender. It was doubtful they would, considering that news of the turn in fortune Tywin had run into wouldn't have reached them, and with the speed of the Northern army it was doubtful that even the fall of Harroway or turning of Darry had.

Still the two of them moved forward, under flag of truce along with Smalljon to talk to the leaders of the defenders. Ser Wode, Lord Keath, and Lord Harlton rode out to meet them, their own army quickly forming into a defensive formation facing the newcomers at the back of the earthworks they had thrown up around the castle. Evidently they hadn't even had scouts out, and even from where they sat on their horses out of bow range the Northern delegation could hear cries of consternation and shock at the sudden arrival of an enemy army.

Jason knew Ser Wode as a honorable man, one who had often chafed under his House's allegiance to that of Whent of Harrenhal, but despite being the most experienced man here, his contingent of the army was no doubt the smallest so Jason doubted he would have much say in what was about to happen.

He was proven correct in this assumption when it was Lord Keath who spoke up. "How the hell are you here Mallister?" he growled. "The last we heard, you and your men had just reached Fairmarket."

Lord Lucas Keath was a swarthy man, large of waist and shoulder, with small deep-set but intelligent eyes. He had always wished to make his house stronger than it was, holding lands near the God's Eye and House Vance of Atranta. That ambition was no doubt why he had joined with the Lannisters, not any belief in the rightness of their cause or anything else.

"You're forgetting the rumors we heard of late from the men," said Ser Wode, staring hard at Smalljon for a moment then moving on to the others nodding cordially at Tristan, which the younger man returned begrudgingly, and then Jason. "Is it true Darry and Harroway have fallen, Jason?"

"Yes," Jason replied simply. "The Northerners as you can see from Smalljon here and the pike behind me, are on this side of the Trident. Another army is moving up to take the Kneeling Man's Ford away from Tywin and hopefully trap him there. Stone Hedge has also fallen but you already know that else I would see Jonos here. I presume he pulled his men out and raced up there already?"

"He did," said Keath, his belligerence now abating somewhat as the true magnitude of the reversal hit him. There were only about 700 Westerlands men with their army and if they had to be subdued that could be dealt with easily enough. The commander was Ser Tybolt Hetherspoon, and he had not impressed any of the Riverlands lords with his martial prowess up to this point.

Lord Harlton was an older man than Keath, but he too was just as ambitious, and it had been that greed, along with the urging of his wife, a Peckledon, that he had taken up the Lannister cause. He'd long desired to add the Stony Sept to his holdings, and Tywin had promised to see to that after the war was over. However, he was also a realist, and knew when to cut his losses. "What are the terms of our surrender?"

Jason winced. This part wasn't going to go over well, but he had to do it. He didn't know Keath or Harlton well, but he hoped they would see reason. Wode he was certain would if given the chance. The terms of your surrender that I am allowed to offer you in the name of King Ranma stark and Queen Daenerys Targrayen is as follows," he said, pausing as all three of his listeners jolted in astonishment. They had heard rumors about the dragons returning and even a few sightings connected with the fall of Harroway, but they hadn't heard that the two families had actually joined.

After a moment Jason went on. "Complete and total capitulation and surrender of your men and yourself, whereupon you and they will be placed on trial. If you or any of your men are found guilty of any crimes against the smallfolk of the Riverlands, you will be tried as anyone would be for such crimes in times of peace."

That part his listeners had no problem with. None of them had allowed their men to pillage Blackwood lands, though Jonos Bracken had not been as wary. Nor had they taken part in the rapine going on anywhere else, having only joined the Lannisters after they won the battle at the Kneeling Man's Ford. But it was the only part of the terms they wouldn't have a problem with.

"As houses that have agreed to aid the invaders of the Riverlands, an act of treason against your Lord Paramount, you will also face harsh penalties, not only you but your men as well. If found innocent of further crimes, your men will be forced to work for the crown on various public projects for five years or take the black. Any levy forces or smallfolk that you have added to your army will be forced to work a year on those self-same projects. Their food and shelter will be provided for them, but that is all."

At that Harlton and Keath began to mutter angrily, though Ser Wode seemed to perk up somewhat.

"You and your House will be facing severe monetary penalties to be decided after the Westerlands Army has either been destroyed or driven out of the Riverlands. However thereafter your house will no longer be able to raise more than fifty armstrongs at any given time, and you will be held to that by crown oversight." The angry glares sharpened at that, and Keath seemed about to interrupt but Jason went on bleakly. "And you yourselves will have to step down and either be exiled to Essos, join the Penitent Brothers on the Quiet Isle, or take the Black. None of this is negotiable. But if you do surrender, I'll put in a good word for you."

By that point Keath it had enough. He bellowed angrily, "Those aren't the terms you give to an equal, those are terms you give to a supplicant! You don't have nearly enough men to win this battle that one-sidedly if you win it all. You expect us to simply bow our heads like that? At least when they courted us the Lannisters offered concessions in the future. Your offering the return of the dragons, which I'll remind you our Lord Paramount fought against in Robert's Rebellion and hard words of treason with no mead to help the swallowing?"

Jason shrugged. "Those were the two are terms I'm allowed to offer you, and I would think that Ser Barristan's presence here as part of the Queen's personal guard would show how much honor there is in our cause."

Ser Barristan spoke up then. "The pulling whelp that sits on the throne isn't legitimate, he has not an ounce of Baratheon blood in him, and moreover is a beast even worse than the Mad King when he sat on the throne. The Lannister's promises to you are nothing, their honor is nothing."

"You say that like it matters!" Lord Harlton spoke up, just as angrily as his fellow lord. "The Lannisters have gold, real coin, and were willing to pay for our loyalty! You honestly think we'll go into exile just like that?!"

Smalljon spoke up then holding up a hand. "Those terms were decided on before we came across the Trident," he said coldly moving his horse forward to stand in front of the others of the Northern/Riverlands delegation. His voice was deep and cavernous in his large chest and when he spoke his voice had the bite of anger and contempt. "You didn't do as the houses that gathered at the Ruby Ford did, sitting on the sidelines and defending your lands, you willingly joined the Lannisters in the rape of their smallfolk and their war against your neighbors! Have you been down the road here, have you seen what they have done to the town of Sallydance? That sight is everywhere throughout the Riverlands because of the Lannisters, and those are the people you have aided."

Harlton and Keath glared at him, but Wode looked away, shaking his head sadly.

Smalljon went on his voice becoming even grimmer. "We were asked by the Queen Daenerys to give you the opportunity to surrender. Personally, I would've already ordered the attack and slaughtered you and yours without remorse. Which is precisely what we will do if you don't agree to the surrender terms. And my lords, I should add that that doesn't apply to just your men here but to your Houses. Your women will be forced into the silent sisters or into exile, your lands seized and your keeps, if the men you left behind are foolish enough to try to stand against, us will be pulled down. Your houses will never again be noble houses or even knightly ones, they will simply cease to be entirely, just like Haigh just like Vypren, just like Erenford and House Frey."

As the list of already wiped out houses went on his listeners paled, but still glared back defiantly. Ser Wode looked more contemplative, but didn't say anything. "If you think you can take us," said Ser Keath growling the words, "you come ahead and try." With that he turned along with Harlton. Wode took a moment to nod his head formally to Ser Barristan before turning his own horse around and trotting back to their army with the others which by this point had finished forming up into battle lines.

"A diplomat you are not Smalljon." said Ser Barristan laughing quietly. "Ser Wode at least listened, I don't doubt that he and his will split off soon enough."

"The others will run." Jason said as he led the way back to their own army. "I know their type, all bluster and fury on the surface but I think they've taken the measure of our army well enough to realize they really don't have a chance of fighting us, not given the fact that I know Tytos Blackwood and his men will sortie the moment battle is joined. They'll be caught between our two forces."

"I can't say I care one way or another." said Smalljon growling slightly under his breath. "They've made their bed, now they can fucking well sleep in it."

Jason called over Tristan as soon as they were back in with the rest of the army. "Keep your men separate, at least a few of those lords are going to run and I want your force ready to split off and head after them as soon as they do."

"Agreed." Tristan said, then he smirked. "I take it that the discussions didn't go well?"

"Never bring a walking talking giant to a political discussion." said Ser Barristan shrugging his shoulders. "Though given the terms her majesty authorized us to give them I doubt that a battle could've been avoided really. The king and queen showed their youth there."

"You think so?" Smalljon said turning to him with a smile that was somehow humorous and grim at the same time. "I think they've shown remarkable intelligence really. After all, Houses that turn their coats like this once might be tempted to again. And after the war is over, their lands can then be incorporated into other loyal Houses."

Sir Barristan paused then nodded thoughtfully not having thought of that.

Not ten minutes after the two groups of delegates had moved back to their opposing armies a horn bellowed from the northern side and the pike regiments began to move forward along with the archers, who shifted slowly behind the pike. The heavy cavalry moved slowly moved with them, still shielding the archer's flanks.

Archers on the other side also began to move forward, firing at the pike and their fellows, but plate armor and helmets the pikemen used was as heavy as most heavy cavalry could wear, and so at a distance Riverlands archers couldn't penetrate them, even having trouble penetrating the chain mail the pikes wore on their arms and legs. The northern longbows however began to tell on the opposing side, and soon the infantry on the other side broke into a trot racing towards the pike.

In response the pike regiment began to spread under Smalljon's firm control and horn commands, turning into a triangle shape. One flat end faced the enemy, with the archers now securely inside the triangle along with the heavy cavalry and majority of the light cavalry. The only exception was Tristan and his men, who had broken off from the army directly backwards, then to the side, entering the copse of trees on the left flank.

This was a move that Smalljon, Ranma and his unit commanders had discussed several times, though it would be the first time that it would be used in battle. Pikes were after all vulnerable on their flanks, the weapons were so long they couldn't be turned quickly. The battle against the Lannister army near the Ruby Ford had occurred in an area where the pike regiments couldn't be encircled. It had been deliberately planned that way in fact.

Here the land was flat, former farmland, good rich farmland that would hopefully yield another cropped after this battle was over. That meant the army might well be encircled. And Smalljon didn't have any of the irregular infantry with them. However the triangle formation protected the archers and the cavalry from taking any losses, while not allowing the pike to be flanked.

The two armies met with a resounding crash, and the pike once more proved effective against infantry as well as cavalry. The cavalry, what limited numbers there were, couldn't break through the front ranks of pike, the horses shying away from the solid wall of steel. The infantry crashed into it as well, though their losses weren't quite as high in the initial push as the cavalry's.

Quickly however the infantry realized they couldn't get through the wall of pike four lines of pikemen thrusting their pikes in a single direction. In response and seemingly without any orders from their commanders, they began to spread to both sides as Smalljon had predicted. For a moment the enemy infantry must have thought they had found the edge of the pike formation, only to run into more pike at the corners, then being frustrated by running into two more walls of pike stretching behind the northern formation.

Seating on his horse Ser Barristan was in the center of the formation, and saw all of this happening. The archers too began to tell, hundreds of men on the other side dying as the powerful longbows did their work even on heavy plate, which was not in much abundance over there anyway.

The moment the enemy force had come around both sides of the pike's front side there came a loud horn blast from the Castle. The portcullis came down, slamming into place as the gate behind it raised. "Our roots are strong!" shouted a voice, which Barristan could hear even over the clamor of battle. He watched with a faint smile on his face as House Blackwood forces poured out of their castle to attack the army that had besieged them for the past several months in the rear.

Lord Tytos Blackwood was a canny commander and ordered his archers to remain in place the moment they were within their own long-range, then ordered his cavalry in first to hammer the opposing army from behind, quickly bypassing the earthworks the besieging army had created around Raventree Hall. Those earthworks served to funnel his heavy cavalry into five smaller units, each led by him and his sons, but they still struck hard. This series of hammer blows shattered what little formation they had for his footmen to exploit, racing after them.

The former Kingsguard commander nodded over to one of the pike regiments troop commanders. Not having memorized the horn blows to command them Barristan had to rely on the other man to pass his orders along. "Signal the pikes to open at the back, let our own cavalry out to play." Then he waved a large Red Flag in the air. This was a signal for Tristan to begin his own attack from the flank.

"I suppose I need to get to work then." Jason chuckled, then nodded at Sir Barristan, before flicking his helmet's visor down moving to join the heavy cavalry.

It was only moments after the enemy army found themselves stuck between two opposing forces that the men of that army began to break. The first to do so were Lord Keath and Harton, who raced off with a force of 100 light cavalry to the south the moment Blackwood had slammed into the back of their army. Of course most of that army was already panicking, but that seems to be the final straw, and dozens, hundreds of men threw down their weapons and raise their hands in the air shouting parley, surrendered, or settings "King's Justice!"

This was the call men gave to throw themselves on the mercy of the crown. Hearing it now showed that the men had heard at least some of the terms their lords had so angrily turned down. But a year or even five years of hard labor were much better than death in battle, especially in a battle they had no chance of winning.

Those hundred were caught by the forces of House Ryger, and for some odd reason neither of the Lords survived that encounter.

Ser Wode did not run, surrendering with his men the moment the Blackwoods attacked the back of the army's formation. And having moved his men back from the forefront into the center of that formation he saved most of their lives, though his own future remained uncertain.

An hour later watching as the new prisoners were rounded up Jason nodded at the older man. "I'll put in a good word for you. I believe their Majesties will take into account that you surrendered willingly, and that you are merely following House Whent into your treason."

Ser Wode nodded. "I will willingly go into exile if it means my men's lives will be spared for now. I'll have you know that none of my lads had anything to do with any of the atrocities the Westerlanders committed elsewhere, or even here on Blackwood land. I executed two of them who did."

"Will they be willing to stand as witnesses to any that were?" Asked Jason. "Their majesties like to have witnesses to such before passing sentence."

Again Wode nodded wearily, impressed at how much justice and the rule of law seems to matter to these two new young royals. That speaks well of the future, even if I won't be here to see it.

At that moment Tytos rode up, pulling his helm off and laughing delightedly. "Jason, you old fox! By the old gods, what is happening elsewhere to let you have a force like this here so quickly!" He looked over at Smalljon who was walking up, cleaning the point of the pike he had borrowed for the battle. His greatsword was nice, but it didn't have the range to let him join the pike regiments without taking up one of their weapons.

"A lot my friend," Jason said reaching up and catching the other man's arm in a grip of firmness. "I don't suppose you and your house can feed my army can you? We've got some food, but we split off from the main force with only enough food to get us here with a little more as an emergency."

"I can do that and more." said Tytos, laughing again. "I pulled back my smallfolk and all of the foodstuffs they could gather into Raventree well before we were besieged, and I've always had more than enough supplies to last months on hand in any event. I think I can safely say that you and your men earned a few days provender on my accounts. Now," he said seriously leaning forward eagerly. "Tell me what's been going on, and what's the meaning behind that banner of yours?"

OOOOOO

Years later when the historians were finally able to take the time to write up the history of the War of Reformation they would call this the Battle of the Breadbasket. This was a humorous name for the battle that, in many ways, was the pivotal moment of the Stark/Lannister portion of the war. Historians argued about that, but those in the know said that if he still had the supplies that had been stored in Stone Hedge, Tywin would have either escaped entirely or forced Ranma and Daenerys to slaughter his army, which would have had major implications later. Of course it wasn't simply one battle, sieges weren't like that. It was instead a series of clashes, some of them light desultory exchanges of arrow fire. But some were very heavy indeed...

A man next to Arya went down with an arrow through the eye. She unhesitatingly reached down grabbing up his bow and began to fire back at the men stationed on top of the very rickety, very makeshift siege tower. It was little more than three stories tall, and thus wasn't actually very useful in sending men onto the wall. But it made for a very good forward fire position, allowing them to shoot up at the wall with much better accuracy than anyone among the defenders was happy with.

To make matters worse the hides protecting the siege towers, had been liberally dosed with water, making them all impossible to light on fire. Luckily the towers at each corner of the castle as well as the main gatehouse could still fire down into the archers on top of the tower, and she watched as more half a dozen men went down from fire from the nearest towers as well as one of the oxen that had pushed the tower into position. There wasn't enough hide to go around to make some kind of cover for the oxen, or for the men who were now desperately trying to move the tower back out of arrow range.

However the tower had still done its work. All around Arya siege ladders had slammed up against the wall that had been badly denuded of defenders, and she raced along pushing at the nearest one, trying to push it off the wall. A second later Arya ducked as several other archers from another siege tower began to fire on her.

Edd waved at her from further down the wall by the nearest tower, motioning her to stay down for a moment. Looking at him in confusion for a moment she then spotted why. In one hand he was whirling a length of rope whose end had been set on fire.

Whirling it side-along Eddy tossed it high into the air over the siege tower to land among the oxen behind it. The oxen bellowed and terrified began to pull hard at their leads. The entire rickety structure of the tower shook as they both bolted in different directions. Fire arrows from that same tower began to streak down, not at the men on top of the siege tower but at the oxen and the men trying to control them.

The fire finally did its work and with wrenching sound of tortured wood the oxen finally went out of control, pulling segments of the tower out with them. The entire structure was so rickety that it began to collapse to the screams of the men that had been on top.

By then more men had rushed out of the tower behind Roger, led by Dacey while she raced towards Arya. Arya took the opportunity to stand up again, turning rapidly and racing back down the way she came pushing more siege ladders off but several men had already made their way up onto the wall, killing four more archers that had defended it. They were being held up however by two Mormont men, both of whom had better armor than they did.

The two of them held their end of the wall while Dacey and Arya attacked the invaders from behind. Dacey's strength and sheer ferocity served her well on the parapet with its close confines, but even she had to shake her head at Arya.

Arya took to the air like a true master of Rannar's aerial style, leaping here and there, her feet and Fang flashing out with equal deadliness despite the fact it put her in danger from the enemy archers. At one point she actually twirled around in midair to dodge an arrow, allowing it to pass within a bare pinky length of her chest before she landed feet first into an enemy arm'sman's face. Fang flicked out, taking the only attacker who was armed like a knight in the visor, cutting deeply into his face.

She then flipped forward, her legs latching onto another man's head before he could raise his blade. Then Arya twisted her body so strongly she threw him off the parapet before landing on the stones herself, Fang blocking a strike from a short sword at the same time.

Eventually they won through, pushing the final siege ladder off the wall, once more, both sides having taken heavy losses. Elsewhere a shout went up from the front of the castle. "Battering ram coming up!"

Arya and Dacey looked at one another and Arya nodded. "Go, we've got this." Dacey nodded back then turned, racing along the wall.

The battering ram in question was a much more serious example of the breed than the one the Westerlanders had used in their initial attempt to storm the castle. It had a roof and that roof had even been covered by heavily watered down leather. It didn't have wheels, and it looked to be very cumbersome, but it gave the men carrying it some defense from the defender's fire.

Dacey stared down at it from the vantage point of one of the arrow slits in the gate tower, frowning heavily. "You think they'll be able to get through the portcullis with that?" Asked Roger, coming up beside her to stare out over her shoulder.

"Possibly," Dacey said shaking her head. "Eventually anyway. The outer portcullis will defend the actual gate well enough, but we'll need to do something to dissuade them."

"Burning pitch?" Roger gestured to a murder hole directly over the center of the gate, behind which a large cauldron stood. From the top of the cauldron came faint wisps of vapor. "I don't know how well that would work on the ram's sloped roof though, unless it's too small to either side to protect the men under it."

There was a loud "Boom!" as the battering ram slammed into the outer portcullis, causing Dacey to frown even more. "I don't think that will work, we need some way to attack the men on the ram, but that won't work?"

"Light it on fire." Edd stated, coming in from the door that led out onto the wall. In one hand he held a bow, in the other a fire arrow that hadn't yet been lit.

"You really missed your calling didn't you, my friend?" Roger asked almost whimsically, though his eyes were narrowed in thought. "You should've been a pyromancer. That could work though, not certain how well the fire would catch on the wet-leather covered roof though, and we need to be careful it doesn't spread to our own gates."

Below the battering ram boomed again, and Dacey frowned. "Let's wait on the fire idea, Roger's right it'd catch on our own gate."

Edd actually pouted slightly, then smirked at the other two. "In that case, we could hurl down caltrops. That'd force the ram's users to pull back. Then we could toss the cauldron out to land on it far enough away so the pitch couldn't spread to the gate, and then light it up."

Roger rolled his eyes, but nodded at that idea, to the backdrop of another boom from down below. "That actually sounds like it could work."

The two men by the cauldron were both Mallister men who had been seconded to Dacey's command because they could swim. Not as used to the strength every Wolfsworn could call upon they looked a little dubious at the idea.

"Roger and I will toss the cauldron, you toss out some of the caltrops and then get ready with that fire arrow of yours Edd." Dacey ordered.

The Karstark youth grinned in anticipation, moving over to a heated brazier for a moment. Dacey and Roger were easily able to heft the cauldron, shocking the two men there. The heat of it was highly uncomfortable, but it was bearable thanks to their gauntlets and armor.

A moment later the two of them were on top of the gatehouse's tower. "Ready, Edd?" Dacey shouted to be heard over the sound of the ongoing battle.

"Ready!" Came the shout from below.

The battering ram had indeed been forced to retreat for a moment, while a few of the men who had been carrying it howled, having not seen the small caltrops until they actually stepped on them. Now it had pulled back from the gate, allowing some other men to rush up under the cover of their shields to see if they could remove the small, jagged pieces of metal that the castle's blacksmith had prepared for the defenders.

Roger and Dacey looked at one another, then began to count down, backing up from the edge of the parapet. Then raced forward. "1,2,3, go!"

At the word "Go!" The cauldron flew out from the tower. Cauldrons of course were not very aerodynamic, and the cauldron only went about twenty feet before it started its downward descent.

Halfway there it turned over in the air, dumping its contents out onto the back and rightmost side of the battering ram. The stream of pitch hit, and an instant later Eddy's fire arrow 'thunked' down onto the leather covered wood that made up the top of the ram amongst the pitch. The pitch ignited instantly, and as it spread so too did the fire.

A few of the men who had been using the ram screamed as the pitch carried the fire underneath the protective roof of the ram, quickly retreating out the back of the ram towards the attacker's lines.

Dacey watched as the ram, not covered by the wet leather, caught fire. She smiled grimly as she saw the attackers elsewhere around the castle retreating in disorder. "It seems the fight has gone out of them today."

OOOOOO

Hathan sighed softly, shaking his head that evening as he stared at the other Wolfsworn around the table. "60 men dead today, another twenty four injured." With his injuries he had been relegated to the position of supply officer, and as with everything else he did he took it seriously. "We can't sustain that sort of loss very often. We're also running out of bandages and burn salves, though the rest of our supply situation is simply excellent."

"Don't think we'll have to. The army out there's beginning to have problems, you can tell." Dacey said shrugging her shoulders. "It's slightly too large to live off the land even here in Bracken territory, since that first Westerlands force scared off most of the smallfolk. They've only got a few more oxen after today's action, after that they'll have to resort to manpower."

"The storms haven't helped their position at all." said Arya with a smirk on her face. One storm had hit only a few days after the initial Westerlanders arrival, and another had hit three days ago. She'd loved watching the violent storm hit their camp, while she was safe and snug in the gate tower. "Their camp also is not as organized as Ranma's made all of ours while on the march. I don't doubt they'll start seeing diseases show up soon enough."

She smiled and nodded at Bess was serving them. Arya really was thinking of asking to take as a servant when it came time to leave Stone Hedge. Since she wasn't knight she couldn't really have a squire, but a page could work couldn't it? It wasn't only men that could have them right?

"Even with our losses today morale is still good." Hathan replied. "And you're right, I doubt they can say the same."

"Any news from the four-legged grape vine?" Roger asked.

Arya grinned evilly. "Ranma's across the Trident and is within two packs hunting territory of her, though he's moving up towards another packs territory or former packs territory actually, since they vacated the area by the river."

"He is attacking the fortifications at the Kneeling Man's Ford." Dacey said nodding her head. "Makes sense, he can always swing down from there to attack this army from behind he needs to."

"That's not all..." said Arya in a singsong voice, pulling the younger girl down next to her with a grin and rubbing her head affectionately. "The dragons are flying in front of the army every day." Bess gasped, not having heard any of the rumors about the dragons among the man before this.

"Then they're really going to use them..." Dacey said her eyes thoughtful. "That should send a very powerful message, though I'm not certain what kind of message really. Dragons were so feared during the reign of the Targaryens, we might be hitting a hornet's nest if we actually use them in battle."

Roger shrugged. "They were already used in battle a few times, remember? Ranma and Daenerys told us about them fighting against the Shadow Warriors and the smugglers out of Three Sisters. I take your point though, since the rumors of their use would spread a lot faster if they were used around here, but I think on the whole it would be more helpful to see them in action, especially if Ranma and Daenerys are not... frivolous I suppose, with their use. I'm also wondering where Tywin and his main army is."

"Can't help you there." Arya said, sipping at her mulled wine. "Wolves can't see colors, and patterns on cloth mean next to nothing to them, so they're not very good at telling one group of men from another."

At that moment Edd came in sitting down with them and sighing wearily. "They're going to try a night attack."

All of them stiffened. This wouldn't be the first night attack, but following up a heavy day's assault with a night attack was something new. "How do you know?" asked Roger.

"They're preparing fires out there, and I saw several of the oxen moving into position at the back of the army's fieldworks around the main gate. They have something back there I can't tell what, I thought initially it was initially another siege tower, but it looks like some kind of covering for the oxen. I think they're going to try to rope the outer portcullis and pull it out of its hinges.

Arya frowned, gazing over at Nymeria thoughtfully. "Are they still attacking?"

"We're only exchanging arrows for now. I think they're trying to lull us into a sense of complacency for the night attack, though I don't think even Lord Bracken is stupid enough to think that at work. "Sorry girl," he said, looking at the youngster. "But your father hasn't exactly impressed us since this battle began."

Bess shrugged unconcerned. Many noblemen really didn't have much to do with the rearing of their daughters, seeing them as simply pawns in the great game. While Lord Bracken wasn't quite that bad he didn't have much time for his youngest, who saw him as a stranger who sometimes patted her on the head in passing. That attitude had quite a bit to do with the fact that Lord Bracken and his wife hadn't had a son yet, and with every daughter he had become more and more irritated by that fact considering the number of sons Tytos Blackwood had produced. There were questions of manhood involved.

"They really are getting desperate lately." Dacey said grimly. "I wonder if it's just that the food issue, or if Lord Tywin is returning, or something else. Now we just need to think about combating it."

Arya laughed. "You know, Nymeria's been feeling left out of things lately. I wonder what the oxen would do if she suddenly howled as near as we could get her to the oxen they're going to be using for this attack of theirs."

"Excellent idea." Edd said snapping his fingers. "Wait until right before they try to hook the device they're trying to use up onto the portcullis, then have Nymeria howl out from right inside the gate tower. That close, it'll panic them."

"Hmm... that is a good idea." said Dacey nodding her head. "And here's another one, I want every archer we have ready for tonight. If they're trying to grind us under, I think we need to show that they aren't having any effect at all, that we're still here and still strong." All of the Wolfsworn agreed with that idea, and Arya went to the stables to find Nymeria.

In the deep of the night Arya and Nymeria stood him in the him gate areas directly above the gate, with Nymeria sniffing the air. Meat, meat-animal, four-legged, strong beast creature, slow, easy meat.

Arya shook herself, she had been trying not to warg with Nymeria ever since the siege began, except when hearing messages from her brothers, but sometimes she seemed to almost unconsciously slip into it like moments like that, when Nymeria had caught the scent of a prey animal. Direwolves after all were not kept beasts, they lived to hunt. Being inside Stone Hedge only being fed prepared meals had irritated Nymeria quite a bit. She understood or at least was willing to go along with things for now, but the irritation was getting to her.

Arya nodded over to where Dacey stood, looking out of the nearest arrow slit, the fires that normally burned here in the gate tower damped down for now. "They're coming."

At the same moment, the sounds of a battle began to be heard from the back of the castle. Several of the remaining makeshift siege towers had been moved into position to rake the wall there with arrows. However Roger was over there, along with half of their men. For a moment Arya wondered if the strength of that defense would convince Bracken to pull back for the night. After a moment however Nymeria once again nudged her in the side of her head whining very softly. The prey beasts were getting closer.

Forgetting her reluctance for a moment, Arya quickly linked to Nymeria. With the direwolf's enhanced eye vision night vision Arya could actually see the beasts coming, along with many two-legs, all of them covered by something which looked like a giant tent, but with leather sides.

Evidently they had simply removed the top of the battering ram from that afternoon and men were actually carrying it over the two oxen that were linked together to some kind of winch system the end of which was being held by other men. Those winches ended in four grapnels held by more men, and would no doubt be thrown to hook into the portcullis so that the oxen could be used to pull it out of the stone.

Arya didn't honestly think that two oxen would be enough for that, they were supposedly strong beasts, but that strong? But she didn't really have that much of a history with them not just because she was a lady and had never farmed in her life, but because the North didn't have any of the animals. Moose, elk and other hardier beasts were used as beasts of burden in the North. The Karstarks and the Umbers in particular made use of moose.

"All right," she said finally. "I think they're close enough." She broke the link between her and Nymeria patting the giant creature under for her job. "Do your thing." Nymeria seems to huff in amusement then leaned back on its haunches and began to howl. "AWOOOOOOO!"

The sound was loud, wild and unadulterated. This wasn't a howl intending to carry any specific bits of information, this was simply a howl to say "here I am!" in as bold and as loud away as possible. It told any creature that had any sense that here came the ultimate predator of the forest, of the field, of anywhere it damn well pleased, and you either better run or be able to climb a tree.

"GROOHHHOO..." The oxen outside certainly got the message. They squealed in panic, slamming against their leads and once again it didn't take long for them to shatter the contraption they were tied to, much like the oxen that Edd had scared the day before with fire. The men around them tried desperately to control them, while a few began to shout for the retreat, since it was obvious that their attempt at a sneak assault had failed miserably.

Dacey now added her own bit to the battle, nodding her head over Edd, waved his hands outside the tower. "Now!"

All around the wall men who had been hiding undercover of the parapets stood up, and began to fire down into the men clustered around the gatehouse. Other men suddenly pulled off the tarpaulins that had been covering the braziers in the gatehouse, lighting up their fire arrows and firing them out into the night quickly, not really aiming at first just giving the other archers light to see by. Not two minutes later, both of the oxen were dead on the road leading up to the gate, unable to get out of arrow range before they were felled, and the attackers had retreated in disarray to the army's camp.

The attack on the back of the Castle had also ended quite badly, where Roger had also made liberal use of fire arrows, not to light up the siege towers themselves, but to like the night enough to give the rest of his archers the ability to fire much more accurately than otherwise. Two of those siege towers had been emptied of their men, though they remained where they were, a potent threat until their hides dried enough to have them be set alight at any rate. And the other had collapsed, a lucky fire arrow had gone over the top of the tower to hit a bit of the tower not covered by the watered down hides, quickly lighting it on fire.

Roger watched all this from one of the towers, chuckling quietly. "It's not been a good day for the Brackens and their Westerlands allies has it?" The men all around him laughed then went back to fire more arrows at the stragglers of the assaults as they retreated back to the rest of the Army.

OOOOOOO

The next day Arya was sleeping in, as were Dacey and Roger, though Edd was once more on the wall. He had conked out the moment the assault last night had ended, while the others had stayed up just in case. And now he watched frowning thoughtfully as in the distance a loner messenger on a horse that most definitely looked as if it had seen better days arrived. He turned to one of his men and said "Go get Dacey and the others up, I think something's about to happen."

OOOOOOO

Lord Bracken stared aghast at Ser Greenfield. "You can't! If you pull your men back..."

"I'm not the only one being ordered to pull my men back Bracken." said Ser Greenfield irritably. "You are too. Lord Tywin is ordering a full retreat and that means your men as well."

"No, dammit!" Bracken said slamming his hands down on the small table that was set between them. "We have those Northern bastards on the ropes, we can't pull back now, that's my House's seat! By the Seven I will not..."

"We don't have them on the ropes and you damn well know it! If last night's debacle didn't show you that, you're stupider than I expected." Greenfield barked out. No great military genius himself, he knew that they had not been doing well since the siege began. Last night was indicative of the troubles they were running into.

They didn't have the tools to really build proper siege weapons, or to dig tunnels underneath the walls, and their makeshift siege towers, while a good idea, hadn't been enough. One of his men had been a remarkably bright fellow in the number of different makeshift siege weapons he came up with, and Greenfield was going to do his best to see that man survived, his mind might prove to be an asset in the future. But they just didn't have the tools or other supplies necessary to build the weapons they needed to get into Stone Hedge.

Personally Greenfield blamed Bracken for all this despite the fact that it had been Lord Tywin who had ordered Bracken to take most of his men down to besiege Raventree Hall, leaving only a small force behind to hold his Castle. It really should've been enough of a force, but apparently it had been taken by subterfuge something they had learned since the start of the siege from accounts of a few of the local smallfolk.

And of course those smallfolk aren't helping us any longer, even if their Lord is with us. Dammit, my men aren't saints, how can they be expected to act like eunuchs? Greenfield scowled angrily shaking his head and concentrating on the present conversation once more. "We've lost Bracken, we need to pull back. If Lord Tywin is in full retreat, then something major has happened elsewhere."

He turned to the messenger before Bracken could respond staring at him. "You have any idea what that is?"

The messenger nodded grimly. "Lord Lannister suffered a major defeat against the Northerners and was forced to retreat to the Ford, but the Starks have married the Targaryens and they've brought dragons! Lord Tywin ordered the Ford abandoned, we're pulling back now."

For a moment the mention of dragons struck both Bracken and Greenfield speechless. Not just the fact of their return, but that they were going to be used in war once more. After a moment, Greenfield shook his head asking, "What are our losses?"

"Horrible." The younger man bluntly. "We were down to barely half the army after the battle, and we lost a few thousand more as we retreated. Even with your men added to our force, I doubt we have more than six or at best seven thousand men. "

Greenfield's eyes widened then he gulped loudly at the enormity of the disaster that had befallen in the Westerland Army. No wonder Lord Lannister was retreating, if he lost any more men, he wouldn't be able to stand against even Stannis, let alone the forces of the Reach. "We're pulling out." said Greenfield, turning to a few of his own messengers. "I want us moving..."

"No!" said Bracken, pulling out his sword on the other man. "I'll not abandon my seat like this!"

Greenfield rounded on him as the men all around them reached for their own swords, the men behind Bracken also going for the weapons. The Westerland knight growled angrily. "If you want to stay here with your men and keep trying to hammer your way through a mountain, then you're welcome, I'm taking my men and retreating!" Inwardly he winced knowing that Lord Lannister would not like that, but it would be better than taking the losses trying to subdue Bracken would cause.

"Fine, flee you coward!" Bracken blustered angrily. His men had been at the forefront of the last few days fighting, and he was down to only about nine hundred effectives, and about six hundred wounded and sick. Arya and the Wolfsworn had been correct, disease had begun to move through the man a few days ago, such things always moved faster through encamped armies that didn't take care to organize themselves, especially with the weather helping things along.

Jonos Bracken knew he couldn't win this siege without the Westerlanders aid, which added another few thousand effectives to his force. Still, he had one more thing to try, and it was not in his nature to show weakness. "Go, flee, run back to your lord like the craven dog you are. The Lions of the West, hah! The Wolves have had your number from the fucking start, I just wish I'd be there to see the Stark pup take the old lion's head!"

"Lord Lannister will return, you'll see Bracken, winning a battle or even a campaign is not the same thing as winning a war! The North and their allies will learn that to their cost!" Greenfield barked back, slamming his half-drawn sword back into its sheath angrily before turning back to his messengers. "What are you fools waiting for!?"

At their commander's order the messengers raced out of the command tent quickly. Greenfield turned back to Bracken and the two men spent a few moments glaring at one another before Jonos snorted and turned away, leaving the tent with his men. By the time the sun was right overhead, the Westerlands portion of the besieging force was ready to go and soon enough they marched away, leaving only House Bracken's men behind to try and reclaim Stone Hedge.

OOOOOO

Ranma, Daenerys and their portion of the army arrived close enough to the need in of the Kneeling Man to send Meera and her few remaining scouts forward, but what those scouts reported was surprising.

"They're abandoning it!" Meera reported quickly. "I think Lord Tywin and his army arrived yesterday, and they're already pulling out retreating southwards, I saw a force leave in that direction."

"We need to get in there now," Ranma said sharply. "If they keep falling back they might be able to break contact. But if we can sweep them away we can bring Brynden across and use his men to keep the pressure on. We might even be able to encircle them if we hurry."

He looked over at Daenerys grimly. "I think it's time."

Daenerys nodded back just as grimly, then with Merry holding her in place in her saddle concentrated on her connection to her dragons. Both of them had spent that morning in the small carts that were their home whenever they were resting from flying, the only carts that remained with the army after Harroway in fact. She smiled at them both as they lifted themselves out of their cars in front of her then leaned forward scratching them under their chins before mentally ordering them into the air. With her guiding them Sunfyre and Rhaegon quickly flew ahead of the army towards the forward.

While Ranma was busy ordering the army to advance at a trot, Daenerys saw the defenses at the Kneeling Man ford from her dragon's eyes. Already panic could be seen men below as they spotted the dragons well out of bow or even scorpion range in the sky above them. Luckily the defenses didn't include any scorpions, but still there were too many archers down there for her comfort even if very few of them had more than a few arrows apiece.

My little ones have gotten very good at dodging, but this is going to be a very chancy affair she thought to herself, taking care not to send her worry across their leg, only assurance and pride. She watched as the army below finally realized they had an attacker on their flank, not just her dragons to fear, causing even more consternation. She even spotted Tywin for a moment, before he ducked into a tent which quickly came down, and then she couldn't spot him again.

The man must have exchanged his normal gold and red enameled armor for a normal armymen's armor in that tent! Smart of him, but if he thinks it is going to save him, he should think again.

Meera and her scout fell back as the army advanced, moving to cover its southern flank just in case Tywin had the idea of trying to send out a spoiling raid into the flank of his own attackers. The pike regiments formed up on the River Road in full view of the army that was still busy trying to decamp. Daenerys could also see dozens of men simply making a run for it, fearful of the dragons and too badly demoralized to try and stand against the Northern army.

Moments later the Northern and Riverlands army marched fully into site of the Kneeling Man forward the dragons still circling above it. Now Fenris sat on his haunches and began to howl. This added to the fear of the men inhabiting that camp. The army began to hear the shouts and screams of fear as well as the whinnies of a few horses, trying to bolt away from the sound of the alpha predator.

Psychological warfare at its finest, Ranma thought grimly. He looked over at Daenerys. "How large an army are we looking at?"

"Counting is hard through dragon eyes, beloved." she muttered gripping Merry's hands where they were around her waist tightly. "They have one, pack, herd, that's about it. I think, I think we're still looking at least a little over a third of the army that retreated from the battle back on the other side of the Red Fork. I thought I had Tywin himself in my sight, but he disappeared into one of the tents, and though my dragons can see in colors, they're not very good at patterns or pattern recognition yet. He must've changed his armor, I can't..."

"Daenerys, it's alright, really." Ranma said soothingly, reaching up to squeeze her leg lightly. "Do they look like they're going to try to fight?"

"They're already turning some of the catapults to face this direction." she growled, trying to split her attention between her two dragons and Ranma's questions which was extremely difficult. The human mind was not supposed to be able to see from two different angles! Added to that was the need to command her dragons and to have enough presence of mind to answer Ranma's questions.

"All right, in that case we should begin."

Daenerys nodded grimly, and raising her hands in an unconscious gesture then moved them down slowly. Sunfyre and Rhaegon both obeyed quickly, diving down towards the army's encampment. Arrows began to fly up at them, but by this point they had become very adept at dodging those, and their flames had, while not becoming any hotter, could last far longer. And instead of hovering in place to concentrate their fiery breath on one place like the two dragons didn't stop for even a second. Instead they strafed past the catapults and ballistae below.

Rhaegon was first to get in range of his target. He let loose a long tongue of flame, which impacted the top of the ballista, spreading quickly despite two men who had tried to throw up buckets of water onto the wood of their siege weapon. Rhaegon continued to blast out his flame, catching one man and then setting the next ballista in the line before pulling back up into the air. Adding insult to injury he did a little roll in the air to dodge a few arrows before he was out of range.

Sunfyre went for a ballista near the outskirts of the Westerlands earthworks, burning it to ash with a single tongue of flame. Holding his fire in for a moment he banked slightly to the left, then let loose a ball of fire that burst onto one of the small log barracks that had been constructed here. The logs of the barracks immediately caught fire and screams of burning men soon added their own horrific cadence to the chaos. Sunfyre then turned again moving away from the came out and away slightly while swerving this way and that to dodge the few arrows coming his way before ascending back into the sky.

Daenerys gasped opening her eyes as she saw something that hadn't been obvious before. "They're nearly out of arrows!"

"I told you supplies don't just mean food, they need fletching, they need good seasoned wood for arrows, and arrow points. Arrow points are important, no one seems to think about these things." Ranma chuckled evilly. He then nodded over to Greatjon. "The army will advance."

Greatjon guffawed and raising his hand to the men all around, shouting. "you heard the man, forward!"

Ranma turned back to Daenerys whose eyes had glazed over again. The exultation her dragons felt when using their flames was almost but not quite sexual in nature, and Daenerys was having trouble controlling the link now. "Destroy the other catapults, then call your dragons back." he said softly, reaching up to tap her arm gently to get her attention. "Okay?"

Daenerys nodded, smiling faintly at his concern. "Okay. It's not the first time I felt that, it was just a little more intense this time."

In response Ranma nodded, patted her on the shoulder again before nodding at the men all around her, men he had assigned as guards for this mission. Then he pulled Ice out of its sheath before pulling himself up onto Fenris' back. "Winter is Coming!" He bellowed, then shot forward with the army all around him.

"For the King and Queen of the North!" came the reply all around him. The heavy cavalry broke into a trot behind Ranma, the pikes forming up in dense, company size blocks as they too marched forward, the irregular infantry spreading out to let them through before taking up positions each company's flanks. It was a sign of the discipline and organization Ranma had instilled in them in the march down from Winterfell that this move was accomplished with only the initial orders coming from him. Even the heavy cavalry was disciplined, not charging every man for himself, but keeping to a line abreast.

At the sight of those disciplined companies advancing remorselessly on their gutted fortification men began to throw down their weapons and surrender in their hundreds. This was hastened by the very short arrow duel that occurred a moment later, with the Northerners winning it easily and wiping out several dozen men on the opposing side. With their catapults destroyed, no arrows, and having not fed very well at all in the past few weeks plus dealing with all the other little issues that crop up when an army is cut off from its supply line just didn't have the heart to fight.

Of course that didn't stop Ranma from ordering the army to encircle the camp, and they turned back several dozen men who had tried to make a break for it. Hundreds more broke out over the ford, only to be caught by Brynden's command and killed to a man.

Lord Spicer was in charge of the men left in the fortification, and after a moment he came forward to kneel formally to Ranma. "I surrender myself and my men, placing us in your hand and at your mercy." The older man said formally. "We have no food, we have no arrows, many of us have no weapons, and with those dragons overhead we have no hope."

"I only ask that you do not turn your dragons on us, Lord Stark, Lady Targaryen" he said looking over at Daenerys, who had just ridden up, still surrounded by her momentary guard. His eyes widened slightly seeing her and the princess sharing a horse and seemingly close to one another, but he quickly turned his attention back to the Young Wolf.

Ranma nodded then gave him the same terms he had spoken about to the Sparrow so long ago, while Greatjon led a search of the camp for Tywin Lannister. Spicer frowned, but given his men's current position had no choice but to agree. With that the Northerners moved in, the men they had captured throwing down what weapons they had, and were quickly tied up, chained or otherwise detained, before being moved away from their weapons. They would be sent in small lots up to Fairmarket and from there to Seagard, with Lord Mallister sending the majority of his men back to guard them.

During this process Greatjon's search came up empty of the old lion, though he did return with a younger Lannister. The youth looked a little older than Ranma and his attitude more resembled that of someone who had just had his world view demolished but he was still able to answer Ranma's questions.

His voice trembled and had a monotone quality to it, showing he really was suffering from shock. "Lord Lannister and the rest of us arrived back here yesterday, where he heard a report from one of his spies and then pushed on immediately with the best armed and fed among us. We were supposed to follow up quickly today in small groups."

Ranma nodded thinking hard then sent a messenger across the ford to find his uncle Brynden and his men. He turned to address Greatjon and Daenerys, but before he could Lord Spicer spoke up. "My lord, what kind of treatment can my men and I expect under your care?"

Suddenly Ranma saw the image of that ruined farmstead, the bodies of men and women they had seen here and there as they marched down the River Road. A terrible fury gripped him, and his hand clenched on Ice's hilt. Now Ranma hovered on the brink of striking Spicer, an unarmed prisoner, down in cold blood, then ordering the massacre of his men.

Thankfully for the prisoners and the future of Westeros Daenerys and Merry were both there. The two of them saw the flash of fury in Ranma's eyes and without any discussion the two girls moved to either side of him, linking their arms with his. Still Ranma stood still as a granite statue, his eyes burning with fury. Merry whispered into his ear from one side. "Don't Ranma, please, you're better than that, don't stoop to their level. Remember, you and Daenerys are supposed to stand for justice, not vengeance, no matter how tempting."

Daenerys shot the other girl a grateful look before leaning in to whisper in Ranma's other ear. "Remember that night when you found Sansa's message and we pledged to help one another with our darker urges my love? You helped me with mine then, now it is my turn to help you. The man I love might feel the rage I can see in you now, but he wouldn't act on it. My Ranma is a Stark, a man of honor who would not give in to fury and rage instead of justice. Do not do this."

For a moment it looked as if the two girls hadn't gotten through to Ranma but after a moment he closed his eyes shuddering in place as he fought back the fiery rage that had gripped him, condensing and controlling it until it was a thing of icy purpose rather than fiery passion. After another moment he opened his eyes, then released his grip on Ice's hilt. He nodded thanks to both girls, who smiled and moved back slightly.

Then Ranma turned back to face Spicer, his eyes, face and voice as cold as winter. "Your fate Lord Spicer will be much kinder than the actions of your Lord and your army deserve. If you personally took part in any of the atrocities here in the Riverlands, you will be executed, and any of your men as well. If not, you will be held as prisoner until the hostilities between the Westerlands and Riverlands have ended, whereupon your fate will be decided. If you and your men have not taken part in any of the atrocities here, then your family's power will be greatly reduced, but as you merely followed your Lord Paramount into the folly of backing his bastard-born grandson, you will retain your life and lordship."

The Lannister youth had recovered enough by this point to try to glare up at Ranma from where he was being forced to kneel by Greatjon. But one look at Ranma's cold dangerous eyes caused him to flinch and was quickly led away to be chained up well away from the other prisoners.

With that done, Ranma turned to Greatjon, and the others. "Let's get this lot organized and sent on their way, I want us after Tywin as quickly as possible." After that Ranma and the other commanders got to work of organizing the prisoner detachment and leaving enough guards on them as well as supplies for both. Once Brynden came across the Ford with his portion of the army, Ranma stripped the rest of the army of nearly all of its horses to give remounts to his men. Seeing the state of Brynden and most of his men he left them there, taking only the light and heavy cavalry that had been part of his own army and leaving Brynden there with Daenerys. Not an hour after Brynden's force crossed the ford Ranma stood at the head of the group he was taking, a little over two thousand men, light cavalry, heavy, and archers on horseback, made to move fast and strike hard. He looked up at Greatjon astride his horse and shared a nod with the older man before staring around at his troops. "The Lannister bastards are trying to get out of the noose! I'm not about to let that happen, how about all of you?" There was a roar from the mounted men. Ranma nodded grimly turned around and without another word raced off, with Fenris by his side.

Going by what Lord Stackspear had said, Tywin had barely beaten Ranma and his army to the ford by a single day, and Ranma found himself feeling a bit of admiration for the man for his quick reaction to the news his spy had reported about the dragons. Tywin knew he couldn't stand against us here, and he was ruthless enough to strip his entire army of everything he could use and then ran with a small enough group to last but a big enough one to be a training cadre later on. He really is smart, too smart to let him get away.

Left behind for the moment Daenerys, Ser Blantyre Patek and the others set to organizing the prisoners, bringing in more foodstuffs, and sending word up to Fairmarket to send her copies of the information they had gathered there on the depredations. The army, minus the Mallister men sent to guard the prisoners, would regroup at Raventree Hall.

For the next four days Ranma and his men pursued Tywin, coming close a few times but never quite catching up with them. The Lannisters were in far worse shape, but they had four remounts to Ranma's two and they were simply running away. Ranma was still wary of being lured into an ambush of some kind which slowed his forces progress, so even with Fenris ranging in front of the army they were moving much slower than they could have.

It was that wariness that allowed Fenris and the scouts with his army him to spot the force coming up from Stone Hedge to meet Tywin at the ruins of Acorn Hall. When his scouts reported that Ranma frowned thoughtfully scratching at the stubble on his face, making a mental note to shave it off as soon as he could. He hated the stuff and Daenerys had voiced her own opinions on facial hair months back. "If they're that close we're in danger of being caught between them. I wonder if it was planned that way."

"Doubt it," Greatjon scoffed spitting to one side. "Fog of war lad, sometimes works for you, sometimes works against you. What are we going to do?"

"This new force is fresher than the force we've been chasing." Ranma replied. "That makes it more dangerous. We'll turn and deal with them."

"We could take them both you know, try and trick Tywin into attacking rather than running and wipe out both forces." Greatjon said.

"No," Ranma said shaking his head. "We might be able to win that fight, in fact I'm pretty sure we would, but our losses would be heavier than I would like to see at this point. No, I think it's time for a little bit more subterfuge, coupled with a lot of force." Ranma tapped Fenris on the side and Greatjon's eyebrows quirked up right before he shrugged.

Ranma was able to choose the battlefield where he would meet this second Lannister force. He decided on a somewhat hilly area, covered with small knolls dotted with clumps of trees around what looked like shallow riverbeds.

The Westerlanders coming from Stone Hedge had no idea there was an enemy force nearby and weren't even sending scouts out, a horrible mistake here in what was barely friendly territory. They walked right into the ambush, losing 100 men before they even knew what was happening to the archers Ranma had set up on one of the small hills. Then Fenris howled, and once again the voice of the direwolf did its deadly work on spooking animals that hadn't been inured to it. That took out the cavalry of the enemy, while the horses in turn disrupted the Westerlander's lines.

With the archers dismounted and working from their hill, the rest of the cavalry came around that knoll in two waves. One wave was comprised of the light cavalry and led by Ranma on foot. A few months ago that might have caused some very odd looks from most of the army, but after so long around their King such a thing wasn't very surprising.

The other group was led by Greatjon and consisted of the pursuing force's heavy cavalry, a bare two hundred men.

Ranma hit first, Ice slashing through two men in one swing, cutting the first one cleanly in half at the waistline despite his leather armor and only gutting the second before he was in and among the infantry hacking away. All around him the light cavalry smashed into the Westerlands infantry at an oblique angle then wheeled away rather than get stuck in with them like Ranma had.

The Westerlanders tried to pursue, it was an automatic human reaction to being stung by something that was then running away. Then the heavy cavalry hit from the other side riding down the side of their formation and getting deeper as they went. In this manner they smashed almost entirely through the weakened Westerlands line on that side of their march, since they hadn't yet tried to create an actual line of battle.

Attacked from both sides and with arrows still falling among them, here and there men began to run away. After the past few weeks of making no headway against the force holding Stone Hedge and hearing what had befallen their comrades elsewhere, the troop's morale was in the cesspool. Most of them were not in the best of health for various reasons, and the shock and fear of the ambush did its work quickly.

Ser Greenfield had lost control of his horse when that damn direwolf had howled. Once he was back on his feet he tried desperately to rally his men, or barring that, leading at least a significant portion of them away back the way they came. But suddenly there was a wild, brown-haired, blue-eyed youth wielding a large greatsword, thrusting straight at him. Greenfield barely got his shield up in time, but the point of the sword smashed into and through his shield as if it was made of thin bark rather than iron.

Ser Greenfield screamed, his arm impaled on Ice's point. He tried to grab at his sword, which was still in its sheath, but never got the chance to draw it.

Ranma let go of Ice for a moment, jumping up quickly and bringing around his foot in a roundhouse kick that connected with the Westerlands knight's face throwing him backwards with a crunch of broken bones and releasing Ice from where it had been buried in the man's arm. Landing Ranma rolled under one man's desperate slash with a short sword, his elbow catching the man in the center of the chest and flinging him to the side before he picked up Ice again.

Then Ranma had to bring Ice around to block the blow from another great sword, throwing that man off-balance for an economical backswing that caught the man through the eye-slit of his helmet, blinding him. Ranma whirled again blocking another blow, kicking out at the same time in both directions smashing two other men aside like nine pins. Nearly surrounded, Ranma kicked, punched, hacked and cut, until at last people all around him began to surrender, throwing down their weapons. "King's Justice, King's Justice!"

Greatjon hacked one man who was still trying to fight down then rode up next to Ranma. "We broke them lad!" He roared gleefully. "I don't think more than a few hundred got away!" Then the older man sobered shaking his sword to clear it of viscera and blood. "Took too long though, and was probably too damn noisy. That tight-assed old lion will be long gone."

"He'll keep running." Ranma said coolly, cleaning Ice on a dead man's tabard. "Leave one of the unit commanders here with a hundred men or so to guard the prisoners." Looking around Ranma noted that that would actually be a bit of overkill unless the light cavalry brought back some more survivors from those that had tried to simply flee. He frowned momentarily, wondering how many of those men and gotten away, and knowing they would turn to banditry was a problem for another day however, and he turned back to Greatjon. "Reform the men as quickly as possible, I want us back on Tywin's heels before sundown."

That night the Army camped five leagues away from where that battle had begun, south and east of Acorn Hall, barely six leagues behind the Lannister force, which was pushing itself on through the night. It wouldn't help them, not with Ranma and Fenris on their heels.

Ranma also knew now where Tywin was going. Knowing that Wayfarer's Rest was held against him, he wasn't going to try to cross the Red Fork and try to get around the keep that way. He's going for the Tumbler's Falls, he can expect to find friends there. But only if he reaches it... Ranma thought to himself, watching the progress of the Lannister 'army' through Fenris' eyes as the wolf hid nearby.

That night Ranma out of his army's camp, sneaking past the very vigilant guards he had hand-picked to guard the camp at night. They were proud of being chosen for that duty knowing how Ranma was worried about Tywin trying some kind of ambush or sudden night assault. Of course, with Fenris out there watching the Lannisters it wasn't really necessary, but Ranma wanted to hide his ability to warg with Fenris and as many of the subtler abilities the direwolves had for as long as possible.

He needn't have bothered even with Fenris though. Tywin knew he had been beaten, and he knew that if he was captured or killed, the future of his house would be in dire straits. Tywin wasn't a coward, but he did fear for the future of his House if he passed. His brother was good as a second-in-command, but lacked the will to be the one originating the orders.

Ranma met up with Fenris about twelve leagues to the west of the direction the Lannister force was moving. Once again Ranma opened his in Fenris full connection, and after a moment Fenris began to howl.

OOOOOOO

Jonos pulled his men back from the castle for a time, sending most of his men out to gather up men from the smallfolk who were in the area, a much harder job than it should have been after the past few weeks, but eventually they had a sufficient force for Jonos's desperate plan. The workers began to dig a tunnel to undermine the outer walls of Stone Hedge, something that Greenfield had attempted, but failed at since Stone Hedge was situated mostly on a rocky outcropping.

The 'mostly' was a secret Jonos had wanted to keep, since if it got out, then the only real weakness of Stone Hedge would become known to others, something his family had kept secret since the castle was built. This had forced the besiegers to try other means, and they had paid for it, but up until the most recent attack Jonos had been able to force Greenfield to use his forces, husbanding his own Houses' men. That was no longer the case, but if he could get into the castle Jonos felt he still had enough force superiority to win the day.

The southeastern wall was not in fact built on the rocky outcropping of the rest of the castle and it was there Jonos sent the smallfolk to work. While his men kept up small hourly attacks on the gatehouse and the front of the castle pulling the defenders attention away the smallfolk worked day and night on creating a tunnel. The end result was a small, narrow tunnel leading up to the wall. Then it was supposed to move out to either direction under the wall but that never happened.

Before the tunnel was ready, the news began to spread that the Westerlanders were in full retreat, and there was a northern army moving to relieve Stone Hedge from the burned ruins of the fortifications at the Kneeling Man's Ford.

Jonos heard this in his tent, and he ranted and raved, but there was nothing he could do. His desire to keep his castle's one real weakness a secret had backfired badly. NO! No, I won't just sit here and let them take me. I'd rather die! With that thought in mind, Jonos ordered his men to form up for a pure assault. The Westerlanders had left their grappels and siege ladders behind, so there were hundreds of them ready to be used.

The archers were first moved around the walls, striking where they could all at once, forcing the defenders there to keep their heads down. A few men with ladders would then rush forward, trying to get up the wall. Despite the archers fire however, they could not win against the defenders, who had nearly every advantage in the book. Dozens of men were lost, but still Jonos urged the archers to continue to move around the castle, then, on the exact opposite side of the castle he send his entire remaining complement of battle-ready armsmen, leading them himself.

This surprising mad rush actually caught the defenders by surprise. Dacey had ordered half of her men to rest at all times, fearing that the Lannisters would return with reinforcements, Fenris not having sent news just yet to Nymeria, being too busy elsewhere at that time. And she had also not realized that the attackers still had so many grappels and siege ladders. So there were only about three hundred men on the walls, most of whom were archers concentrating on the archery duel, moving with the attackers along the wall.

However, Eddy and Arya were both on the wall with a dozen men of House Mormont and Mallister spread between them. They had been waiting, spread out between the towers when the alarm was raised from the other side of the castle.

By this point Jonos and more than three dozen men were already up on the parapet, racing along it to get to and hold the doors into the towers while more men kept pulling themselves up the ladders. Jonos himself led the way into the tower where Arya was.

The first two men through the door had died to Arya's blade before a lucky blow from a mace numbed her arm even when she moved with the blow, forcing Arya to back away from the door. The same mace wielder dueled with a Mormont man for a moment, pushing him back to allow his fellows access to the tower. Jonos barreled in with his men, scowling as the armsmen right in front of him died, his throat slit right where his helmet didn't quite meet his chain mail. Jonos' scowl worsened as he saw the man's killer. "You! The little wild bitch, I've seen you on the wall before this. Let's see how..."

Arya growled, leaping forward and interrupting Jonos with a furious assault, pushing him and the man next to him back, but the room was now so crowded she couldn't use the full aerial style. "This is a fucking fight, so fight traitor!"

In the next moment two of the Mormont men with her were down, leaving Arya and two others to try and hold back the Bracken men. Arya held the center of the line against Jonos and his fellows, while the two Mormont men concentrated on defending her back and each other.

The battle in the towers seesawed back and forth, but the defenders held long enough for Dacey, Roger and the others resting in the keep to be warned and move to reinforce their fellows. Nymeria, who had been getting a brushing down from Bess, bolted toward the tower where her mistress was fighting.

The wolf raced up the steps, smashing into and through the inner door of the tower's room, and into several men who had just been able to circle around the trio of Northerners. Those men went down to her fangs and claws with wails of agony, and Jonos and his fellows to a man stepped back in fear.

Arya smiled coldly, holding fang point first in one hand held above her head, her other hand empty and thrust forward. "Awww, are you big strong men afraid of the big, bad wolf?" Her smile disappeared and she charged into their middle with Nymeria at her heels. "Winter is Coming!"

The Bracken men weren't cowards, and they stood and fought desperately now, but the sheer strength and power of Nymeria turned the tide against them in that tower, while Dacey and Roger had already relieved Eddy. Together the three of them were pushing along the parapet, clearing it of attackers while behind them their men took up position, hacking at the ropes and siege ladders, spilling the men climbing them back onto their fellows below.

Again Arya and Jonos met sword to sword. The older man had a reach advantage, and was a decent warrior, able to use his hands and feet as well as most. But Arya was something else entirely. She moved constantly, here there and everywhere, and her martial skills were better than any opponent Jonos had ever faced before. It was only because his men kept on trying to interfere that allowed Jonos to survive for long against the young Stark girl.

But when the last of them fell to one of the Mormont armsmen, Jonos found himself all alone. Before he could try and run back out the door onto the wall, Arya locked blades with him, then kneed him in the corotch hard before wrenching his blade out of his hands then a brutal jab smashed into his armored head, sending his helmet skittering away over the bodies of the dead piled hear in this room.

Before he could do anything Jonos was on his back looking up blearily at Arya, whose blade was poised to plunge into his heart, chain mail and all. "Do it" Jonos ordered, his voice a croak due to the pain of the last few moments. "Do it! I'll not live with Blackwood lording his side's victory over me!"

For just a moment Arya raised her blade to thrust down, eager to end this threat to the pack, but just as quickly it was gone, and the flat of her Fang slammed into the side of Jonos' head, sending him into darkness. "No, No I won't kill you traitor, not like that. I'm a warrior, not a monster, not an animal. And I don't want to have to tell Bess I killed her father."

OOOOOO

Two days after the chase began it was raining again and Tywin was still barely ahead of Ranma's army, but they were closing fast. He knew his men were on their last legs, but they were only a bare day's journey from the head of the falls, where he would find House Keath and the barges he had ordered prepared via a messenger before he left the Kneeling Man's Ford. After learning how the Targaryen girl had arrived at the Ruby Ford, he had realized how badly he had overlooked the way river travel could aid his army, something he wanted to correct in the future.

At present those barges would let him get away from his pursuers using the power of the incredibly fast current of the Blackwater Rush. Using the river Tywin planned to head down towards the Golden Road or even King's Landing, though that was doubtful. He had a bare two thousand men left under his command, not enough men to do anything against the might of the Reach and Stormlands army under Renly, not even enough to face Stannis and the houses allied with him. Even if he could have met up with the nearly thousand men he had assigned to hold Harrenhal, he still would not have had enough men to take the field once more.

Tywin shook his head once more at the totality of the disaster that had befallen him and his army. The might of the Westerlands had marched into the Riverlands crushing all before it, forming into a massive fist that should have been enough to deal with the Starks in their allies before turning to face more dangerous foes. But instead he had been outmaneuvered and out fought at nearly every turn by a youth young enough to be his grandchild. The thought was galling, but Tywin shook it off quickly. My current strength can be used to form a training cadre for my next muster. And besides, there are other ways to wage war young Stark, you will find this out to your cost. You might have won a campaign, but...

Just then there was a howl of a wolf, nothing unusual these days, but his nephew's gasp alerted Tywin there might be something more to it. "What?" He barked angrily. "It's just the Stark's damn direwolf again trying to spook our horses." That had happened more than a few times eventually the beasts had become desensitized to it.

"I don't think so my lord." Daven said, loosening his sword in its sheath as he stared ahead grimly. "Not unless he somehow got in front of us."

Tywin didn't bother to gape at the youth or argue and try to say that was impossible instead he simply whirled to face his men. "To arms, 'ware front!"

A second later the arrows began to hit his men from the right flank and front where the howl had originated.

OOOOOO

While interesting things happened elsewhere, Jon Stark had been having it relatively easy the past few weeks since taking Wayfarer's Rest. There had been a point where he thought they might have been attacked when a few Westerlands scouts were spotted, but no attack appeared. Then came the news from Nymeria that Arya and Dacey had taken Stone Hedge, changing the makeup of the campaign beyond what Ranma and Jon had anticipated.

Then a bare five days ago came the call from Fenris, saying that the lion had retreated, and that the wolves were after them. The howl didn't really offer a lot of information, but it covered enough for Jon to know to lead a small force out to try to interject Tywin's advanced towards the falls.

It was a very small force, only twenty men with all the horses his company had taken from the defenders of wayfarers rest in the first place. But 15 were archers, while the other five were clansmen, directed to defend their fellows up close. In the rain that would be very important, though it hampered his archer's ability to aim. But with the Lannisters as packed on the trail as they were at present, that really didn't matter.

Nearby Ghost howled, a slightly lower timber than his larger brother's but still bowel loosening to all who heard it. He then joined Jon in charging out of the woods to slam into the front of the marching column with the force of a battering ram. At the same time all around them Jon's archers began their deadly work.

Tywin had responded quickly, sending out two-hundred men in the direction the arrows were coming from the forest in front of him while bringing up his few remaining archers to try to find the archers attacking from the flank. That those men would be a write-off as the rest of his force raced on their way was something he was willing to bear.

But Ranma and his force were quite a bit closer than Tywin had anticipated. Fenris had been at work all day, killing the scouts Tywin had covering his rear, allowing Ranma and his army to be practically on top of the Lannister column.

"King of the North!" came the bellow out of the rain, and suddenly the back of Tywin's column disintegrated as it was struck by mounted men in heavy armor, slamming into their fellows and the mounted infantry, while behind them the light cavalry spread out all around Tywin's army.

That was the final straw for many of the armsmen and even some of the knights. The hammer blows had never stopped coming since that battle on the other side of the Red Fork, not letting the Lannister army have any respite. The Westerlands armsmen were good, loyal men in the main who had given their oaths to their lords and would keep them. But there was only so much you could ask of any man and this was simply one too many shocks. Dozens broke, surrendering or scattering, making the Lannister's attempt to create a shield wall impossible.

Tywin barely had a few moments to rage internally at the sudden upheaval in his fortunes, to rage at Ranma Stark and wonder how the boy had been able to contrive this, before he was forced to defend himself from a northern heavy cavalryman riding up out of the pouring rain to attack him head on.

Tywin was old, and had never been the swordsman his firstborn son was, but he was a decent one, and his opponent was already wounded having taken a straight arrow somehow in the side. He blocked the first few blows, then wheeled his horse around to parry still another one before thrusting his sword forward to catch the man under his armpit. The northern barbarian gave a death rattle and fell out of his saddle and Tywin turned, his hands going for his reins and now only thinking of escape.

"RAARRHHH!" A huge monster of a direwolf suddenly leapt at him, bearing Tywin and his warhorse to earth. His horse went down with a whinny of fear then was silenced forever by a single blow to its throat which crushed its barding and neck.

At the same time Tywin found his arms gripped in a steel vice. He stared in horror at the sight of his arm being clenched in the direwolf's mouth. He tried to scramble for a weapon but the grip of those jaws increased, and he desisted.

Nearby Stafford had been unhorsed as well, and he raised his greatsword trying to charge to his Lord's aid but screamed as something bit into the back of one of his knees almost tearing his entire leg off. He went down still screaming only to be silenced by a blow that knocked him unconscious despite the agony by a young man racing up with the wolf. The two of them turned back to back, slaying several more Lannister armsmen before smashing another blond haired youth to the ground. Another lay nearby, an arrow through his jaw and another in his side.

Daven fared somewhat better than the rest of his family. He was a better swordsman than either his Lord Uncle or father, and slew two Northerners in quick succession, getting underneath their horses and hamstringing the beasts to spill their riders to the soggy ground after being unhorsed himself. Then he found himself facing a giant who stood at least two feet taller than Daven and twice as broad across the shoulders.

"Not bad." The giant said almost conversationally, before unleashing an overhead strike with a greatsword that Daven barely blocked. His arms tingled with the aftershocks of the blow but he tried desperately to riposte, flicking his longsword forward in a vicious lunge. But the giant's shield blocked it, smacking his sword aside. Daven hurriedly turned with the force of the blow while ducking, taking several steps away from the giant and bringing his sword up again to block the blow that he knew was coming from the great sword.

But he just couldn't get enough strength into it. His longsword was smashed out of his hands, and then a fist like that of a god slammed into the side of his helmeted head. It actually crumpled the metal there, and he fell to the ground while around him, the battle slowly died down.

Ranma patted Greatjon on his shoulder as he strode up, Ice nearly black with gore. He tapped Fenris' jaw lightly, getting him to release Tywin's arm unharmed. He smiled coldly down at the older man, before leaning down and hefting him up in one hand by a grip on his chest plate. "Lord Tywin Lannister, I've been looking forward to this for some time. You my lord and your family members here are my prisoners."

End Chapter

---

Okay, several scenes in this chapter were damn tough to write. Getting the tone of the Ironborn scenes was hard, and I'm not certain I did them as well as they could be. The need to keep everything straight in terms of a time frame was tough as well. The scene with Renly and Loras was very tough, very much out of my comfort bubble. I have no problem with people who write yaoi, but it simply holds no interest to me, and just yeah...

Initially I had thought that Tywin and a small cadre would be able to escape the Riverlands entirely to die/make trouble elsewhere, but decided given Ranma's warging ability to send information and the fact his portion of the Northern army hadn't faced real combat for weeks and was thus fresh it made no sense for Tywin to get away. Tywin's fate is still undecided, either to take the black or execution in the distant future, but until then, he is a hostage to the good conduct of his family. The Westerlands families are going to have a lot of their own issues to deal with given the debacle of their Riverlands campaign nor is Ranma and co. quite done with them just yet.

Those of you who might be worrying about Ranma curbing-stomping everyone else as a general, don't. Tywin as a general was severely overrated, as was mentioned in the last chapter. Ruthless yes, politically dangerous yes, but that doesn't equate to being a good general.

On the battlefield, Stannis is by far the most dangerous opponent among the humans. When they face one another it will be a far more even contest, made worse by other enemies making themselves known. And Remember, even after the War of Reformation ends, Ranma will have to face the Others and their forces.

Anyway, hope you all enjoyed this chapter as much as I did writing it and hope that at least some of the things that happened in it came as a surprise as well. As always read and review please.

*Chapter 15*: Chapter 15

Wild Wolf 15

I do not own ASolaF or Ranma, god damnit.

I'd like to give a shout out to Antony444 for his aid in editing this, though again we are still dealing with odd 'space missing' issues.

For those wondering I will have the next chapter of ATP out by the end of October, possibly along with the next chapter of this story but I don't want to make any promises there. Also, Xata? Not cool dude. RL is an irritant as always, but I will also be putting out a bit of a surprise at the same time, a sort of hint to what I'd like to do when WW is finished simply because a specific interest of mine has been fed rather well of late. As such, there won't be a small story chapter out two weeks from now, sorry. Though I have sort of decided where I'm going to go with those and the poll.

---

Chapter 15 The Players Change, the Game Goes On

While Ranma was pursuing Tywin events elsewhere events continued apace around Westeros and even beyond its shores.

"Be gone lest our arrows fly!"

Viserys continued to stare up the Dragonstone's walls angrily, shaking his head. "Then I will take back my family's ancestral home by force! And you will all be put to the flame, men, women and children! Not one traitor will be left alive!"

With that Viserys turned away, riding his horse back down to the small but extremely well-designed port, which he found practically empty, the poorer houses abandoned and the large, stone houses, almost small holdfasts, were shut tight. From the dock he was rowed out to the fleet resting at anchor all around the island of Dragonstone, well out of catapult range.

The fleet had lost one of their ships to a lucky catapult's stone before Viserys realized that simply showing up with the Targaryen flag wasn't going to convince the inhabitants of his family's ancestral home to relinquish their usurpation of it. He had responded quickly however, ordering the fleet out of catapult range before moving in under flag of parlay.

He was pulled up over the side of the large transport galleon that was his flagship, staring up into the sky for a moment to see where Balerion was circling, doing his daily exercises. If only he was larger still! He is a monster for his size, but he can only carry me for short amounts of time yet. He's responding well to verbal commands, but I can't trust him in a combat situation just yet. If I could, this battle would be much shorter than it's going to be.

Pausing he forced himself to nod to the Dornish sailors that had helped him aboard, before moving on brusquely to the captains quarters which doubled as his and his wife's quarters and their makeshift council room, shivering slightly. The turn of the weather had surprised him after the came around the Broken Arm, and worsened the further north they went. It wasn't an issue just yet, the army had enough warm clothing to get by for now since nights in the Dornish deserts could be quite cold, though they would have to create winter quarters at some point if it became even cooler.

Viserys stared around at his commanders, his wife, and the two Sand Snakes that had decided to accompany her. The two of them were named Elia and Nymeria, and they were as different from the one he had met previously, Obara, as night and day. For one thing, they were both attractive, if Elia was still a little too manly of form for Viserys. And they were both very intelligent.

Elia was a mistress of horses, and before they had left Dorne Viserys had been amused to watch her actually out-joust some of the Dornish knights. She had been an aid to Viserys when he began to train Balerion to carry first a saddle and then Viserys himself. Not with the dragon, since the 'black beast'; as all the sailors called Balerion, would not let anyone but Viserys near him. But she had given Viserys a lot of ideas on how to deal with that aspect of the dragon's training.

Her older sister Nymeria was almost as gorgeous as Arianne, with dark eyes, skin the same olive color as her cousin and long silky hair worn in a complicated braid bound by copper and bronze hoops. She was a master of daggers and diplomacy and had given Viserys a lot of good advice over how to approach House Velaryon, and indeed had been the one to convince him to do that before coming back to Dragonstone. She was also going to be the army's connection to Prince Doran's spy network once they landed.

After looking at them all coolly, Viserys imparted the news they all no doubt had seen coming. "Diplomatic talks have failed. Whoever Stannis left in charge is a firm believer in R'hllor. He and Stannis's wife, who he left here with his daughter, firmly believe that this R'hllor will protect them from a dragon's flames so long as they remain loyal to the 'Azor Ahai'." He sneered as he said the last two words.

"Stannis takes that seriously?" Arianne asked, astonished. "I thought that was a vague rumor, or at best that he was simply using that title and this Red Witch to his advantage without ever completely buying into whatever mysticism she was trying to sell him."

"He might be." Viserys said, calming down slightly but still vibrating with rage inside. "I can't tell you his inner thoughts. Regardless, right now it means that Dragonstone is held against us."

"Your Majesty, that poses a tremendous problem." Jorah Mormont murmured. "Dragonstone has many natural advantages that make it almost impossible to siege without incurring horrific losses."

"The Bear is right your Grace." Nymeria murmured from her place by Arianne, using the name she and her sisters all used for the Mormont Exile. "We of Dorne are made for light skirmishes, quick hit-and-run actions or at worst holding a defensive position of our own against attackers. We are not entirely unskilled at sieges, but besieging Dragonstone poses several problems that I don't think we can overcome easily."

The other Dornish lords that had come with the army with their men talked about it amongst themselves while Viserys strode over to stare at a map of Dragonstone that Doran had given him back in Sunspear, cursing all the while inside. "We need to take that castle." he said aloud, effectively ending the conversation behind him. "We've taken Driftmark without a fight, but Dragonstone is the key." The families on Driftmark had been Targaryen supporters for untold generations, long before even the conquest of Westeros, and with Nymeria's aid Viserys had easily talked them into supporting him once more.

"Does anyone have any suggestions?" He asked the room at large. Viserys was perfectly willing to order a full-scale assault on the castle, even knowing it would be bloody beyond belief, but he wanted the suggestion for such to come from someone else first, just in case it actually didn't succeed. If it succeeded he would be perfectly willing to take credit for it no matter how many people died, but he was well aware that the Dorne were wary about taking casualties.

The fact that Dorne had still not recovered from the losses they had taken in Robert's rebellion had honestly come as a shock to him. The army they had given him numbered around 10,000, and that plus the remaining 8000 that had been sent with the mercenaries and Oberyn was almost that totality of the Dornish military strength. A few castles on its front facing the Prince's Pass in the Boneyard still retained men, and the other Houses had of course retained enough men to defend their homes, but if he lost this army it would be generations before Dorne recovered, and all of his Dornish commanders knew it.

Even so, there were those willing to take a chance. "I have a suggestion my Lord" said Ulwyck Uller standing forward and boldly gesturing at the map of the island. "The problem with taking Dragonstone is threefold. One, the island's only real port is deeply inside the range of the castle's catapults. Two, the island itself has no natural woodlands to make siege weapons from. Three, the strength of the castle itself. That would force us to attempt a full on assault take the walls, and as Lady Nymeria already said, that does not play to my countrymen's natural strength."

"However, there is one advantage that we can make use of." Ulwyck Uller, brother of Lord Uller continued. "Many of us are master skirmishers, able to move over the harshest terrain without being spotted. My own houses men are trained to move across flat deserts without being spotted!"

He looked proud of that while more than one of his fellow lords discretely rolled their eyes. House Uller was deep in the Dornish desert, and many felt that the heat and sun had done something to their brains, making them wild and somewhat insane. That Ulwyck would be the one to come up with an idea to assault Dragonstone therefore surprised none of them.

Ulwyck didn't notice this and continued. "If we use some of the ships here as a diversion, we can land troops at the furthest point of the island and march overland from there, sneaking our way closer to the castle to begin to assault the walls."

Arianne and the two Sand Snakes exchanged a glance, and with a flick of one hand Arianne consigned of the current discussion to Elia, who was the one who knew most about moving silently. The youngest of the trio spoke up quickly, her voice showing no hesitation to take part in the discussion. "Even if we get close to the actual castle, those walls are tall and powerful, and grapples make noticeable noise when they hit. Even if we were able to get there, which is not, I hasten to add a certain thing, getting up the walls would be incredibly tough."

"Not if, say, around two thirds of the men with us lay down cover fire." Ulwyck replied triumphantly. "With that we will be able to scale the walls."

"Yet even if you can do that, winning from that point supposes that you have larger numbers than the defenders. I'm not certain why you think that could be a case."

"Surely a so-called King so strapped for people wouldn't have left a strong force behind, not when he has that pirate fleet guarding his back." Said another one of the younger lords, from House Jordayne.

"Stannis is many things," said Ser Valan Toland, a nephew of Lady Toland. "But incompetent is not one of them. The force he left will be strong enough to hold Dragonstone. Two hundred men in that castle could hold it against a full assault for weeks, more than six hundred could hold out against an entire army, even if we had brought along siege equipment. No, this is folly. Driftmark has resupplied us and added another six hundred men to our cause, we need to move on. We can't let ourselves be pinned here at Dragonstone by the pirate fleet."

"How long until the pirate fleet could get word about what has occurred here, and how many ships do you think they could send without breaking their blockade on King's Landing?" Viserys asked, joining the discussion once more as he turned from the porthole where he had been watching Balerion flying around.

Most of the more thoughtful lords frowned at that, slowly turning to Lord Gargalen of Salt Shore, who was the acknowledged seaman among them. When he was younger he had actually served on a merchant ship at one point, and that plus his House controlling a small port under their castle gave him insight into ship movement that most of them lacked. He frowned heavily, one hand fingering a thin scar set below one ear and running along his jaw line. "I think that the main problem from their perspective is the blockade and receiving orders my Lord."

"Elaborate please." Viserys said politely, his voice mild. He was always in a better humor after seeing Balerion fly around.

Lord Gargalen nodded and went on. "From what our spies recently reported about the ship numbers that Stannis has gathered to blockade King's Landing, he has around 72 war galleys, and another 34 pirate vessels. With the need to stay out of the range of the trebuchet we know were built in King's Landing, I would estimate that Saan would need at least a third of his available ships to blockade the city. In the autumn season it should take a fleet about a week for a ship to carry word of what happened here to them, then another week and a half, possibly two weeks to get to Dragonstone from King's Landing. But while the pirate vessels might be willing to act as they see fit, the war galleys won't be, they'll have to receive orders before leaving the blockade."

"That's true." Nymeria said reluctantly. It had been she who had gone ashore near Sharp Point to contact those spies, who had forwarded their messages to a signal spy living near that castle. "From my own read of Stannis, he isn't one to encourage independence among the majority of his commanders, certainly not on the captain's scale."

Viserys frowned thoughtfully then his eyes lit up as he realized what had grabbed his attention about what Lord Gargalen had said. He rushed over to his seat chest, with the conversation pausing around him as he hurriedly pulled out some of the notes on fine parchment that Doran's spy network had passed on before they left Planky Town. Finally he held up the note he was looking for and said triumphantly, "162! There are supposed to be 162 war galleys in the Royal Navy. We found and took what 25 or so from Driftmark?"

"27 actually." Arianne replied looking at Lord Gargalen thoughtfully then at Viserys. "What are you thinking of, My King?"

"If our numbers up on fleet blockading King's Landing is accurate, then Stannis had to have left the others war galleys somewhere. Which makes sense, since we know a large part of his army comes from the Royal Navy. How long would it take us to send a, what is it called, a cutting out expedition to Duskenale?"

"Four days or so to get there and another six to get back my winds would be against you for at least a portion of your journey coming further out of Blackwater Bay." Lord Gargalen replied quickly, his face shifting into a rather rakish smile. "That's an excellent idea though!"

"You will see to that then my Lord." Viserys said magnanimously. "How many ships do you think you should take?"

"15 should do the job my Lord, fully manned war galleys. I'll actually take 15 of the ones we've commandeered from Driftmark, that way if those ships are defended, the defenders won't notice anything different until we're within attacking range."

"Good thinking." Viserys said then turned back to Ulwyck. "As to your suggestion, would you and your house be willing to take on this dangerous task? If it succeeds of course the glory of taking Dragonstone and the riches it contains would be yours. All I want is the castle itself, in particular the Painted Table. That is a treasure of my house. Anything that the bastard Baratheons might have added since their occupation can be yours."

House Uller did not have much in the way of riches. They specialized as Ulwyck said in skirmishers, archers and saboteurs simply because they didn't have enough money to pay for decent enough armor for anything else. So Viserys was not surprised when the other young man's eyes looked up eagerly. "I'll take that castle for you my Lord, leave it to me!

To one side Arianne and the two Sand Snakes glanced at one another, shaking their heads. This was going to be a disaster but Viserys was so set on taking Dragonstone that even attempting to talk him out of it would probably mean their banishment from this counsel. Arianne couldn't afford to let that happen, who knew what Viserys would do without her around to handle him?

Arianne then glanced at Ulwyck, hoping the man succeeded. Viserys might have set him up to enrich himself if he won, but if he failed, Viserys would just as easily turn on him. And Arianne was not certain the man would survive that, given her husband's fury.

OOOOOO

The battle began that very evening. Several war galleys moved in close to the port, as if they were trying to land troops. Almost immediately they came under attack from the castle, its catapults having a much longer range than the scorpions the war galleys had. They retreated, but came back in again and again dodging rocks as they came out of the sky always changing courses whenever they could. It was harrowing for the men and women on those ships, since even one boulder could have spelled doom for a war galley if it was hit.

One of ship lost its rigging to a stone that arced directly over the ship almost, not catching it abeam but taking with it the war galley's rigging. Several men died from the splinters of the collision, and two more were pulled over the side by the falling rigging. Another ship, one of the Royal Navy vessels they had manned from Driftmark was hit directly on its nose. It's crew immediately piled into the rowboats as the ship began to sink.

The rowboats tried to make for the port, but there they came under fire from the scorpions up on Dragonstone, which were much more accurate than the catapults. One of the rowboats sank, taking with it all hands, but the second was able to disembark its first load onto the quay, where they ran into fierce resistance from a group of 100 heavily armed armsmen that had been stationed men had been ordered to attack any group smaller than themselves, but retreat in the face of any larger group. They ruthlessly cuts down the Dornish men, pushing their dead bodies back out into the water.

The rowboat returned to its doomed parent vessel, taking off two more loads and rushing them to the nearest vessel, but after that the ship had sunk before the ship could return for a third load. While the war galleys pulled back their rowboats went to work scouring the water for survivors.

Nonetheless from Viserys' point of view this assault was a success. The attention of the castle was entirely on the war galleys trying to make port, not on the trio of galleons that had moved around the island to the furthest portion of it from the castle and the port, slowly disembarking their troops throughout the night. By the time daylight gave anyone on the lookout from Dragonstone the ability to see that far, the ships had retreated back to the fleet, and House Uller's men, about 1,500 strong were ashore.

Ulwyck Uller grinned triumphantly, unaware of the losses the fleet had taken to get his men in position. "All right," he said looking at his knights, though the Dornish version were not knights as the rest of Westeros would see the term, they were simply slightly better armed and trained men who served as unit commanders. "Let's get a move on, I want us to be fully hidden before daylight comes."

The attack force was indeed able to succeed in hiding in small groups here and there scattered around the point of the island during the day. This area of the island was mostly uninhabited in any event, too rocky and too dreary even for the smallfolk of Dragonstone, so no one saw them there. The next night they began to make their way towards Dragonstone, reaching it just about as dawn began to creep over the sky. Moving over the rough, craggy and somewhat mountainous terrain of the island was difficult even for trained Dornishskirmishers.

But they ran into a problem as they neared Dragonstone. There was simply no place to hide beyond a single man here and there as they came closer to the castle. The area had been very carefully denuded of anything that could be used as cover for an attacking force, be it boulder, crag, or small brush.

Staring from a small crevasse he was hiding from, Uller grimaced. "I didn't realize there was so little cover, we won't be able to get any formed force near the walls. Still, we'll have to do what we can." He nodded two of his knights, the ones who were best at sneaking around. "Take a hundred men each, and lead them out there slowly."

"My Lord..." one of them said hesitantly looking up into the sky, "We're running out of night here."

"I know, trying to lay down covering fire on the wall won't be enough. Instead, we'll have to keep the attention of the attackers on us somewhere else. You lot head up the old abandoned volcano, then come down and assault the walls from 's got to be the weakest point of the castle, the walls there are shortest after all." Dragonstone was built on the side of the extinct volcano that had created the island in the first place, and dozens of tunnels led from the castle deep into the side of the volcano, allowing the castle to mine the dragonglass it was associated with.

The two men nodded somewhat dubiously, but moved off to relay their orders to the commands. Moving in groups of two and three they were able to scale the side of the volcano, moving slowly and hesitantly towards the castle that was now below them. They waited until they heard the sound of battle coming from below watching from a distance as arrows began to fly from both sides, and even some of the scorpions on the Castle got involved before they got moving again.

By that time however the sun was in the sky, a pale morning light shining on the dew all around. It made for very slippery going, with only lichen, moss, and a few hardy breeds of scrub brush here and there to soak it up. Moving even further towards the castle they had to stop several times waiting to see if they were noticed when one or the other lost his footing and crashed to the steep slope of the volcano. Even without having chain mail or anything else on them that could jangle, doing so still made a noticeable noise among the rocks of the volcano.

But with their black cloaks and black leggings the Dornish were able to blend into the background black of the volcanic rock all around them. Slowly they made their way towards the Castle, feeling very nervous as they entered bow range from its walls. They realized then that even here the walls were three stories tall, thick and forbidding.

Idly, one of the knights wondered if perhaps putting the archers up above the fort here would have been a better idea, but he realized it wouldn't have worked. For one thing, from what they had seen the towers at each corner of the wall were tall and well designed, which would negate any height advantage from being on the slope. Worse was the incline, which would have made it hard for archers to keep their footing and fire at the same time. Moreover there was no cover to be found on the mountainside, all of the archers would out in the open which would make their ability to shoot at the archers on the wall directly far less of an advantage.

And that doesn't even consider the number of siege weapons they have up there, the Dornish knight thought to himself, shaking his head as he heard the 'whump' of the catapults launching then a very distant splash. Evidently the ships had returned in an effort to take some of the attention of the defenders away from his assault.

By noon the two knights had safely reached the wall with some of their men then looked at one another as more and more of them came up. One hissed: "We wait until we have at least half our men against the wall, then we start throwing up the grapples."

His fellow commander nodded, fighting a sense of growing concern. Something wasn't right here. But as he couldn't put his finger on it, he didn't voice his worries, not wanting to seem like a coward in front of his fellows. Several moments later they nodded to the men who were holding grapples.

The grapples were tossed up, but almost immediately the castle above them, which had been silent so far responded teaching the two knights of valuable lesson: that just because defenders didn't respond to your approach didn't mean they didn't see you. It was a pity that neither man would have the chance to use that information. "Let them have it boys!"

From each of the towers on either side of the attack came dozens of arrows, and the men they had seen walking along the top of the wall went to work quickly on two closed top cauldrons, pulling off the heavy wooden tops to reveal slowly congealing pitch. But pitch was still flammable, and when it began to pour down over the men below the wall it was quickly ignited by a single fire arrow from one of the towers.

Both knights died screaming, and their men, both those near the wall and further away died. It was simply a matter of if they died from the pitch, or archer fire.

Elsewhere the battle was not going any better. With so little cover, Uller and his men were not doing at all well against the defenders, who were laying down a vicious aimed fire that had cut his men down to a third of his starting force. At last, hearing the screams from what had supposedly been a secret assault on the back of the castles Ullwyk ordered a retreat. The bedraggled and thoroughly beaten remnants retreated back the way they had come towards the tip of the island, under fire for quite a bit of its length by the scorpions that could clearly see them in the light of day, losing even more men.

OOOOOO

Viserys had watched all this through a spyglass that Doran had given him, his hands clenching so hard on the metal to of it that his knuckles were showing white. "That plan seems to have failed." He said his voice a snarl that roused Balerion from where the dragon was sleeping behind him, only settling back when Viserys scratched it under its chin with a heavy wire brush.

"We will have to think of something else. Oh, but don't feed Balerion his midday meal." He smiled grimly, yet his eyes showed a certain hidden delight that made Arianne and the others who noticed it shudder. "A message has to be shown to the army about the price of failure."

OOOOOO

"So you represent the Iron Bank? I can understand why you have come to see me my Lord," said Renly, moving from where a detailed map of the Crownlands was laid out on a field desk over to where several small cabinets of expensive wines sat in the corner of his tent. "May I trouble you to have a glass with me?"

One interrogative eyebrow rose as he looked at the man who his guards had allowed into the tent. He was the same Iron Bank representative that had talked to Cersei, though his head looked like it was in need of a shave, and his calm manner seemed somewhat in abeyance. His clothing was travel stained, but the iron and gold torque still hung from his neck down his chest.

"I understand you were sent from King's Landing to Duskenale in attempts to find my brother before coming back here to meet with me? That must've been a thirsty journey and a pointless one as well." Renly smiled thinly holding out a glass to the man who had not replied. "Though since my army had yet to arrive here I can at least understand the reasoning behind it."

That was truer than Renly knew. Not only was the Iron Bank representative unable to find Stannis at Duskenale, he couldn't find the older Baratheon brother's army in the field not having any contacts out in the countryside to enable him to find its trail. He had also been attacked by bandits once, losing two of his ten guards. "Thank you my Lord I believe I will." he murmured, reaching out for the wine and sipping appreciatively. It was good aged wine, with a hint of some kind of fruit to it that he couldn't quite place. "A magnificent vintage my Lord!"

"Thank you, I find the newest vintages coming from the Arbor to be quite exquisite, they've begun to import some kind of fruit from the Summer Island to add to it. It makes for a hint of a new taste to the wine. I hope that the Ironborn don't do too much damage to their vineyards before Garlan Tyrell can toss them out." Renly sighed, taking a last sip then set his glass down sharply on the field table, though calling it a field table was a misnomer. It was nothing like the tables used by Stannis or Ranma, simple folding affairs with leather for a top. This one was large and wooden, and could only be called a field table because it was slightly lighter than most normal desks. "But to business, I assume you are here to discuss the debt that my family incurred to you while my oldest brother was King, correct?"

That is promising the Iron Bank representative thought, nodding his head politely. "Indeed your Majesty," he said buttering the younger man up by using that title. "During his tenure as King, your brother Robert and his queen accumulated a debt to us of upwards of 1 and a 1/2 million crowns."

"Really?" said Renly leaning forward now slightly his eyes narrowing. "I had heard it given to a tune of 3 million at one point, before Lord Stark became Hand and began to work at offsetting it. Is that one and a half million crowns a solid number from your own books?"

"Yes your majesty. We have gone over our books exhaustively looking for any sign of falsified records and have found them to be clean."

Renly nodded thoughtfully, leaning back now. "Well, if that is indeed a solid number on your end, then all that remains is for the crown to make certain that it matches what we have on ours. Unfortunately," he smiled thinly waving his hand towards the tent flap and the city beyond. "I do not as a point of fact possess those books at the moment. The moment I do rest assured that one of the first tasks I will set myself to is going over them, and making certain that the totality of this debt can be proven. Needless to say if they cannot on our end, then I will see no need to pay you what you claim. If the Iron Throne actually did not receive the full monies that the Iron Bank agreed to lend, then it would fall upon whoever diverted those monies to pay off the debt."

"But surely you can see that no monetary fault could be accrued to the bank your Majesty." the man across from him exclaimed. "We can hardly be faulted for working with who we thought was a fully accredited representative of the Iron Throne."

"No of course not," Renly said calming him down slightly. "But neither would any debt accrued to the Iron Throne if the Iron Throne did not in point of fact ask for those monies. Instead it would be on the part of House Baelish to repay the debts."

The Iron Bank representative actually smiled thinly as Renly came out and said who they were talking about there. "And yet my Lord, is it not the place of the King and the Hand to know what their ministers are doing? That is the way it works in business after all, a manager can be called upon to right the wrongs or pay back the debts of his overseers."

"That would be true in the course of normal events of course." Renly said nodding his head solemnly. "However, let us be frank my Lord. My brother had no interest in actually ruling, he took the throne in the first place because he didn't want anyone else to have it and because Jon Arryn rather foolishly insisted he take it. And considering the fact that the man in question fooled you and your bank's local factors, how could someone without a head for business at all be expected to see through his lies?"

The Braavosi man scowled a little, unable to refute that. Indeed, the Iron Bank had carefully 'trimmed' some of its factors in King's Landing, hiding their deaths among the chaos of the siege since his last report. He had in fact set those deaths in motion before leaving the capital.

Around him some of the other Lords present frowned, in particular the Stormlands Lords. All of them had revered Robert to a certain degree, his ebullient personality, his sense of humor and above all his skill on the battlefield as a warrior and general was something that all of them looked up to. They looked at one another, wondering not for the first time if they had been correct in following the youngest Baratheon. Renly hadn't done anything yet to show he was worthy of the giant boots that Robert had left behind. Yet at the same time none of them could truly argue that the man hadn't really had a head for numbers, and not making an outright enemy of the Iron Bank or indebting them and their nation to said bank was a good thing.

"However." Renly said, magnanimous now as he knew that the man couldn't argue that point, at least not well. "If the Iron Throne's accounts meet our own I will agree on my name as Renly Baratheon to honor the payment plan that Lord Stark put in place before the start of hostilities. I'll go even further, and will say that we will pay off half of the debt immediately upon the surrender of the Lannisters from captured gold." That cheered up all the Lords around him immensely, as they dreamed of some of the same gold falling into their own pockets. "Will that suffice for you my Lord?"

The Iron Bank representative stared at him, then slowly nodded, thinking it might be the best offer they'd get. Stannis had still not been found, and he was loath to go in search of the man since he didn't think that Stannis would offer any better plan than Renly from the Iron Bank's point of view. He knew another agent had been sent to talk to the Stark youth and the dragon girl had found them, but not the outcome of that meeting. He was interested to see how that went and if he had met with Lord Tywin as he was supposed to do since the initial meeting between himself and the Queen and Joffrey had been unsatisfactory.

The two of them were due to meet up in Maidenpool. That town and its environs had not seen any combat as yet and it had a decent port which made it a good meeting place if they had to escape from Westeros quickly or had to meet with other representatives in person. It would also allow them to meet up with Viserys Targaryen, whose banner a factor had seen arrive in Dorne.

But there was still one way he could pressure Renly. "That will do nicely but the Iron Bank understands that accidents can happen in battle. Should a fire begin during your assault on the Red Keep or some other event occur that causes the destruction of the Iron Throne's ledgers, we will immediately call in the full debt we are owed by what our own books say."

Renly's was barely able to keep a scowl off his face at that, but nodded. "Of course."

"Would you be willing to put that in writing your Majesty? I am not disparaging your given word of course, but in these parlous times and given the problems that the former Master of Coin has caused for us, a written account with your seal and script on it would carry far more weight."

"Oh, of course." Renly said again, smiling thinly but allowing the man to have his little victory. Later he watched as the Iron Bank left the command tent frowning thoughtfully wondering how much of the Lannister gold he'd have to send to the Iron Bank rather than spend on his own projects. He had plans for that money, oh yes.

With a sigh he picked up his glass again turning back to the lords gathered around the map. "Staedmon, you had reports from your scouts to share?"

By your leave, your Majesty." The man said bowing his head and when Renly nodded, placing a few small stone markers down on the map. "My scouts have reported back and they say that if he continues at his present rate of march Stannis and his army will be in sight within five days rather than the two my last report indicated. Since he is marching overland rather than by road the rains have slowed him down but more importantly the army changed course slightly. They'll be coming down the northern embankment of the Blackwater rather than a somewhat straight route from Stokeworth."

"Interesting." Renly murmured, not seeing the point of that, nor did anyone else other than using the river to guard one of his flanks. That in itself was a good idea, but really not important enough to comment on.

"Your highness, I think we might have an opportunity here." Randyll Tarly spoke up. "We have already begun to consolidate some of our army once more from our siege positions around the capital. If we march out to meet Stannis we might be able to attack him on our own terms. We could encircle his army and use our numbers to pin him against the river."

Renly thought for a moment then shook his head. "No, I don't think so. For one thing, that would remove our best commanders from near enough to King's Landing to deal with any surprises from that direction. Furthermore, it would paint us as the aggressor, unless we stop to parlay, which would of course allow my brother more time to prepare. No, I am in no rush to be seen as a kinslayer, let the world see my brother attacking me, not the other way around."

Randyll scowled but nodded, not liking the idea of making a military decision based on propaganda and political needs. Though Renly had a good point on how marching out would remove him from being able to affect events around King's Landing.

"Very well my Lords." Renly said sighing deeply. "I would like us to go over our numbers once more and continue to reform the army here at the King's Gate." He sighed sadly shaking his head. "It is a sad day when brothers battle, but I will not allow Stannis to sit on the throne. He would ruin Westeros with his new religion and his cold, uncaring nature."

Around him the others all nodded, though most seemed to be rather ambivalent about the idea save for the uneasiness they all shared about Stannis' following this Red Witch. "My Lord Tarly," Renly went on, looking at him. "I believe you had some new ideas on how to pare down our cordon's numbers further?"

OOOOOO

Lord Rupert Serret leaned back at his desk, massaging his forehead wearily. Going by the rumors and the growing examples of violence in the city that Petyr and the Master of Whispers had passed on it was evident that the news of the plague hadn't quite spread throughout the city yet, but it was only a matter of time. He had prepared orders for the defenders of the walls in the event of a general uprising, but he knew it would not be enough.

We might protect some of the walls and the towers leading up to them, but we're going to lose everything else. Thank the Father we already moved most of the remaining foodstuffs and consolidated our men. I hope that the High Septon doesn't try to argue with my men I sent this morning to escort him to the Red Keep. If he does I'm more than willing to leave him and his oh so Devout out there to the smallfolk's tender mercies.

Rupert shuddered a little shaking his head sadly as he stared out into the cloudy sky outside the Hand's Tower. We always seem to forget the smallfolk, or not forget but simply not take account of them in our plans. But when they are roused like this, you truly understand how many of them there are! Thousands have died in the recent weeks in various outbreaks of violence and riots against our men here and there in the city, casualties that would've broken any army I've ever heard of. But there are still hundreds of thousands left, more than enough to tear us all down, more than enough to even stack their bodies up against the walls of the Red Keep and just keep on coming if they had the willpower for it. Thankfully they're not a formed force, and they certainly won't be looking to get into the Red Keep, just away from the plague. But even that will be a problem for the defenders on the outer wall. And for the besiegers I suppose, but that's somewhat more doubtful.

The Hand's thoughts were interrupted as the door to his office opened without preamble, and Varys stepped inside, bowing his head slightly. "I apologize for this sudden intrusion my Lord Hand, however something has come to my attention. Indeed it came to my attention several weeks ago, however I wished to make certain of my findings before coming to you."

Serret sighed, leaning back and staring at the bald, not so fast anymore eunuch with scant favor. "And what exactly is this bad news you wish to discuss?"

"Lord Edmure Tully is dead my Lord." Serret sat up abruptly, staring at him in shock and rising concern. The Master of Whispers held up his hand, and then went on calmly. "He did not die because of neglect or simple starvation. Those at least would have been somewhat understandable given the straits we are in even here in the Red Keep. However, he did not die in that manner instead he was tortured to death, tortured in such a way that I have never seen before outside of my agents reports on the Vile One, a connection I made almost immediately upon hearing the manner in which Edmure died."

As Rupert began to slump back into his chair, his face showing shock and loathing now the other man went on. "It took me the intervening weeks to discover who had access to him, and how they had gained that access." He sighed sadly shaking his head. "Everything I have discovered points to Petyr Baelish having done the deed."

"What!?" Rupert bellowed, jumping to his feet and slamming his hands down on the desk in front of him, glaring at Varys angrily. "In the name of the Seven, why! This can only weaken the Lannister position!" But, his mind rather treacherously thought, Petyr has never been counted upon as a loyal ally, only a useful one. "No, I can answer that question at least, but what possible motive could he do for going to that extreme?"

"That took some digging my Lord." Or rather fabrication Varys thought to himself smirking. The Lannister's own spies even in the Red Keep were now almost nonexistent, mostly concentrated on protecting their family from poisons and other dangers, and they would not be able to confirm or deny anything Varys passed on from his own 'agents'. "Apparently he has been in communication with House Martell of Dorne, and they wished Edmure to die to lay it at the Lannister feet. A prisoner such as Edmure dying in your care after all will be large mark against the Lannister name, and will certainly push Riverrun and House Tully into Stark's arms, further destabilizing Westeros."

"I doubt Petyr would have gone through with it would if he thought that his own position was made stronger staying allied with house Lannister. But the news out of the Riverlands about Tywin having been forced into retreat must have changed his mind."

"That still doesn't say why he went to such extremes as you have said he did." Rupert said quickly. "Killing him fine, I could even see that, but torture?"

"For that you would have to look into their personal histories my Lord. Did you know that Petyr was a ward at Riverrun when he was younger? And he apparently fought a duel with Brandon Stark?" Rupert shrugged, not having heard this story before, and the eunuch went on. "The duel was over Catelyn Tully's hand, apparently Petyr was quite enamored with her when he was younger."

That Rupert could well believe. He had seen Catelyn Tully time or two before Robert's Rebellion, and even now she was marked as a great beauty. Not quite up to Margaery or Cersei's level, but still a very beautiful woman.

"In any event Edmure had apparently threatened to geld Petyr if he ever even looked at his sister that way again, and might have said things along similar lines to Petyr and his men when they came to kill him. Beyond that, I have also found evidence that would link Petyr to the rumors of the Vile one. My agents have reported that at least six times when there was a Vile One attack found Petyr was not seen in his rooms or quarters the night prior."

"Not all of them?"

"My Lord, my agents are merely human." Varys said reproachfully. "And Petyr is a guileful and cunning opponent. That we were able to figure out that he was not where he was supposed to be six times is in itself a minor miracle."

"And one of your agents spotted him entering the prison?" Rupert asked skeptically.

"Yes, though unfortunately the man himself has left the keep, which was why it took me so long to connect all the dots. I had to organize a method of getting information to me that would not force me to leave the keep or allow him to reenter it."

That made sense Rupert thought to himself then nodded decisively. "If you have evidence and witnesses Varys, that's enough for me to at least act." With that he stood up striding around his table and towards the door. Opening it, he barked orders to the guard outside. "Timon, gather twenty men and tell them to meet me in the courtyard." With that taken care of he turned back. "Now, Varys, tell me more about this evidence, then I'm going to want to question two of your witnesses on Petyr's nighttime movements."

OOOOOO

Petyr actually had more eyes than even Varys knew about in the Red Keep. That was how he was able to find out within moments of the discussion starting that Varys was going to sell him out. The length of that discussion led to Petyr having a small head start, and he used it as best he could.

I suppose I could fight this, and possibly even win considering I have a lot of evidence to show that Varys has been screening what he tells the queen and the Hand, and with Joffrey's backing me I might win. Yet that backing is not as certain as I would like, I gained influence with the boy but no control over him, aiding his acts of sadism. And frankly if what my spies have said about the Northern host being seen in Harroway is accurate it was becoming time to leave the Lannister side of this war anyway.

With that in mind, Petyr turned to his personal bodyguard, Osmund Kettleblack, the oldest of three brothers of that family who owed their allegiance to him. "Gather your brothers, your father and Lothor, we're leaving."

Osmund looked at him askance. "You think the plague is going to be able to get over the walls?" He and the others had just found out about the plague a few days prior.

"I don't know and I don't care." Petyr replied bluntly. "My position here is no longer worth fighting over. It is time for us to head to greener pastures."

"I'm not interested in fighting an entire army." Said Osfrey Kettleblack, coming in from his position guarding the door at his brothers summons, looking at Petyr sternly. These were bought men, and they would follow him willingly, but taking on impossible odds like that wasn't in their nature.

"Don't worry." Petyr said smiling thinly. "I'll get us through the siege lines, you just get us there if we run into trouble."

Osmund nodded, and soon enough the six men left, none of the Kettleblacks caring overmuch about what happened to the armymen they were leaving behind. With Petyr leading they made their way through the holdfast down into the kitchen where Petyr opened a secret passage set behind a large cupboard, pushing at a small piece of filigree on the direct top of it to open the passage. The men had to crawl for a few moments, but soon they were out into the catacombs, the warren of secret tunnels and passages that Maegor the Cruel had designed just in case he needed to escape the keep that he had commissioned. Petyr had spend years exploring them, and felt he knew them better than nearly anyone else alive, save perhaps Varys, who had served as Master of Whispers for two kings.

They moved silently, pausing often to listen. Petyr switched off with Lothor Brune, his paid sellsword, who was the best at sneaking around unseen of his bought men. Following Petyr's whispered instructions he made his way down the indicated tunnel, leaving behind the torchlight Petyr and his servant the Kettleblack patriarch held.

Several moments later Lothor came back, nodding his head grimly as he came into the torchlight, holding up four fingers, then slowly running his thumb across his throat. Osmund and his two brothers nodded agreement, pulling out small knives, their blades darkened with soot as not to reflect light. Then they moved forward after Lothor.

Petyr and Oswell waited silently, and moments later heard a faint, choked off cry and two gurgles, followed by the sound of steel on steel and a cry of, "Over here, they're over he-gaah!" That cut off in a pained scream that ended quickly.

"Stranger take them!" Petyr groaned, hurrying forward with Oswell moving after the younger man as fast as he could. They found the man's three sons and Lothor standing over three bodies, armymen of House Stokeworth, and a servant that Petyr recognized as one of Varys' spies. Osney was nursing a deep cut on his forearm, his older brothers already beginning to bandage it.

"The young fool was assigned the servant which should have been the soft option, but he must have made some kind of noise that warned them about our approach." Lothor reported, staring at the youngest Kettleblack disdainfully. The only one of the brothers worth anything in his opinion was the oldest, the other two were not nearly as skilled.

"I did no such thing!" Osney retorted, wincing as his brothers finished bandaging his arm. "And you were the one who missed the fact he had a knife, this arm of mine is your damn fault Brune!"

"Enough! It matters not at all who allowed the alarm to be sounded, we need to move!" Petyr growled out. "If Varys knows enough of the escape route to post men here, he might have sent other men down here. We need to move, now, and quietly!"

With Petyr leading them unerringly through the catacombs the six men made their way through the tunnels, past piles of dragon bones thrown down here after the keep was taken by Robert in his war. Sometimes they had to crawl, sometimes they were able to run along, but finally they came to a small, carefully hidden door.

This opened out onto a small hidden trail that slopped along the cliff face that led along the seawall behind the Red Keep and down into the slums there. The trail was practically invisible from anyone above or outside it, leading down toward the slums. With Petyr still leading they all made their way down the cliff, then out into the ruined slums and beyond.

Moving through those slums, which were still intact for the most part though empty, they soon moved into the slums around the Iron Gate. The same slums that had been the sight of the wildfire started by Lord Harte. By the time they reached it night had long since fallen, which aided their speed, as did the full moon shining overhead.

Entering a small hovel at the outer edge of the slum which had survived the fire, they came upon 12 men wearing various Reach House colors. They were all levy armsmen, peasant archers and smallfolk who had probably been conscripted by their betters at the start of hostilities.

The Reach men stood up quickly, some of them drawing back arrows on bows as Petyr lead the others into the hovel. "Peace!" he hissed, one palm holding out a gold coin. "I'm Littlefinger, one of my men gave you some gold coin to let us through. And there is far more where that came from."

One of the men came forward, opening up a thieves lantern to shine its light into the faces of the five newcomers, while one of the others, a somewhat more clean-shaven and younger fellow than the others, followed, nodding slowly one after another. Finally the man with the lantern nodded "Yer don't seem to hav' the coughin' bloods, but don't any of you try to touch us e'en so! We'll be talkin' business now, before we' do anything. Yer man promised a 'undred gold dragons each for letting you through!"

"Twenty now, and the remaining eighty when we have passed through the your armies lines." Petyr said sharply. "That was the agreed upon price." The men grumbled, and Petyr sensing that they were bulking at the last moment wheedled "I can go as high as forty now and an extra hundred later to be split between you beyond the agreed hundred."

Lothor's fingers twitched as he fought not to reach for his longsword, the bows some of these fellows had might be pointing down, but they had also moved back away from the newcomers. He hoped that these men had more loyalty to one another, or at least more stupidity than most sellswords did. Sellswords would have realized Petyr was carrying the gold they had promised then realized that they both outnumbered his men, and that the fewer allies they had to share with, the greater their own cut of the prize. Though I suppose the plague might scare them too much to try and loot our bodies.

At Petyr's offer greed finally won out over caution, and the man in charge nodded his head. "We'll wait 'ere until our shifts done, that's another two moves o' the moon, then we'll head back to our lines. After that, it's up to you an' yers to get away."

Petyr nodded, and the two groups waited tensely, with Petyr and his men waiting outside the small hovel. A few hours later, the Reach men began to lead Petyr and his men out of the slums towards the encircling army's lines. That was the most nervous moment, when they might have been sighted from both the capital's wall and from the surrounding army, but nothing happened. Soon enough they were back among the forces guarding the road out from King's Landing towards Castle Rosby.

Petyr found to his surprise that they were able to pass through relatively unchallenged. This area was controlled by House Florent, and Alekyne wasn't the most energetic commander, an attitude that had spread to his men in the easy life of the siege forts. They were halted twice by guards who had seen them coming, but the man in charge of the group they had met in the slums had the proper passwords, and none of these men could count or had indeed noticed how large the group had been when they left earlier that evening.

Once they passed the guard posts they entered the small camp, and Petyr began to hand out the money. At the same time he whispered out of the corner of his mouth "Secure us some horses Lothor, we have a ways to go before I want to stop and we're running out of night."

As the money was passed over there was a moment where the Reach men looked as if they were ready to attack to see what else Petyr could give them, but with the Kettleblacks already standing with swords out they all decided against it. The leader simply nodded one last time at Petyr, then moved off through the tents followed by his men.

Soon enough Petyr and his men had horses, taken from Florent's own herd. They moved far enough back of the camp to no longer be heard, then mounted their horses and raced hell for leather away from King's Landing and the Reach/Stormlands army. "Where are we going milord?" Oswell asked.

"There is a small cove near Castle Rosby, I have a on retainer by the name of Mikon who should be there. And then from there." Petyr shrugged, thinking about some of the news that had recently come to his attention. "From there we'll see. Either the Vale or some other destination will avail itself." He chuckled slightly at his own turn of phrase, then rolled his eyes as none of the other men noticed, then fell silent spurring his horse on through the night.

OOOOOO

Willas ducked behind a chimney while an arrow flashed towards where he had previously been standing. "They have several good archers over there." he commented almost conversationally, staring over at the men he shared this particular roof with.

Most of them chuckled. One however didn't bother replying verbally at first, instead sticking his bow lengthways over the roof and firing an arrow back in return. "So do we, look my Lord." he said then as a scream resounded from the archers lined up behind the advancing Westerlands mercenaries.

After leaving Old Oak with his reinforcements Willas had done everything he could do to convince the raiders pursuing him that he had not been reinforced. For one thing, he sent the majority of his heavy cavalry southwest under Ser Graceford along with all of the archers that Lady Oakheart had given him, skirting around the areas that had already been despoiled by the raiders. Then Willas marched out with most of the rest of his men to meet them in the open field.

From the beginning he had decided to give up land for lives, retreating after a series of small skirmishes that seemingly cost him more than they did the enemy. This ruse was caused by Willas sending off very small forces of light cavalry north and west after each battle while he and his force continued to retreat southeast. Those forces were under the command of some of his better men chosen by himself and Toulev, and they would reform further up the Silver River. From there they would follow its course down to either interdict any further Westerlands reinforcements from coming across the river or simply march down its western bank to rejoin the battle at the town that Willas had designated his target when coming up with this campaign.

The town in question had been evacuated long since. Willas had chosen it because most of the buildings in it had been made of stone from a nearby quarry, the same quarry that supplied several of the castles nearby with their stone. It had stood there since the time of the Gardener Kings and had been designed to be defensible even after its outer wall had been torn down to make more room.

Cautiously sticking his head over the side of the rooftop Willas stared at where the raiding force was forming up to assault the town. There looked to be around 3000, maybe 3,500 or so if you added in the archers. Most of them looked like mercenaries of some kind, a single unit from what he could see, along with some forces from House Turnberry and surprisingly a few Prester men with a number of men from House Swyft of Cornfield. "Always did find that a asinine name for a castle, and as to their banner..." Willas shook his head falling silent. Because at that moment he noticed that the three black dogs on yellow of house Clegane was still visible on clumps of men here and there among the raiders.

Seeing that hated symbol Willas snarled and backed away from the small slope of the roof. He moved over to stare down into the streets all around, where his own infantry waited, formed into separate units ordered to guard the houses where their archers were stationed. "Men of House Tyrell, men of the Reach, I speak as heir to your Lord Paramount, and I say this: No quarter will be given this day, no quarter for the butchers, no quarter for the rapists that have despoiled our lands! In the name of the Father, slaughter them all!"

He was answered with a roar, and the infantrymen rushed out to take their places near the outer edge of the town, blocking the attackers from moving further into the town. One man standing with Willas waved a black flag in the air, and archers appeared all along the other roofs facing the attackers. A vicious archer duel began as the Westerlands infantry and cavalry charged into the town, where they slammed into the waiting shield walls with a clang.

Willas gripped his sword tightly, fighting a powerful urge to make his way down there and fight himself, but at this point doing so would be foolish. Those attackers were finished the moment they tried to invest the town, even if they didn't know it. Getting himself killed in the final battle of this campaign would be foolish in the extreme. That doesn't mean I can't take part at all however he thought to himself moving to pick up a bow and quiver. I might not be the shot my sister and brothers are, but I'm decent enough.

The battle continued for the next 15 minutes. The attackers tried to hammer their way into the town, while the archers kept their own archers at bay for now while also killing dozens of the infantry. Then, just as Willas was wondering if the runner he had sent to find Ser Graceford in the morning hadn't arrived, he began to see the glint of light on raised lances coming from beyond where the enemy archers had hunkered down outside of the town.

Their defenses were hay bales, a few overturned carts here and there, and the ruins of four farmsteads. Not enough to defend themselves from the light cavalry that roared them into the ground a moment later. Their shrieks and screams of fear caught the attention of their fellows who were trying to battle into the town, and most of the light cavalry and even some of the heavy cavalry that had been trying to make their way into the town turned, trying to race after the light cavalry that had just written down their own archers.

The entire attack on the town broke off as the mercenaries and Westeros land arms been retreated in small pockets and clumps to try and chase down the light cavalry.

But then from the southwest came the heavy cavalry that Willas had broken off at Old Oak, with the men of House Graceford in the lead. "Work Her Will!" They hit the disorganized clump of raiders that had fallen back from the town, shattering it further. All around Willas the archers were having a field day now not having to worry about their opposite numbers they were simply slaughtering the poorly armored infantry down there as well as the remains of their light cavalry.

Willas pulled back his own bow aiding his own arrows to the storm, bellowing "Press them Toulev!"

From down below came in answering roar. "Aye my Lord!" From the center of the town came the reserves, the other half of the heavy infantry that Willas had been husbanding for this battle. Moving out all around the town and racing forward to envelop the enemy while his levy forces, armed with long spears for the most part moved to help hold the lines leading into the town.

"The Reach and no quarter!" Was the warcry taken up by every throat out there as Willas' men began to pay back the raiders for all of their fell deeds since crossing the border. Knowing the battle was lost the man holding up the banner of the House Prester began to shout for quarter, only to be silenced as an arrow found his eye through his helmet. He and his banner fell from the saddle.

When the men around him saw this, what had been a battle became a rout as the raiders last vestige of discipline broke. By the end of the day not one of them was alive, rundown and sabered by the light cavalry. .

As the unit commanders saw to the execution of the enemy wounded and to the aid of their own, Willas met with his officers in the former mayor's office of the town. "We will rest here for a day no more." Willas said simply, gesturing at the map laid out on the table between them. "I'm going to send a messenger to Old Oak to tell Lady Oakheart that the battle has been won, and where to send supplies, particularly arrows."

The leader of the archers, a common born man who was ill at ease in the company of Lords nodded thankfully and Willas nodded back before going on. "Then we will march up to Red Lake, where will hopefully be able to pick up more men."

"Will we make for Crakehall or Clegane castle after that my Lord" said one of the knights. "The Crakehall land is richer, but we'll face sterner opposition as well."

Willas stabbed the map where it marked castle Clegane angrily. "No! The forces that ravaged the lands of Kidwell, Rowan, Inchfield and Redding came from House Clegane originally. I think it is high time that that pestilential place was burned to the ground. By this time next month my Lords, I want the three dogs on a yellow background to be only a dark memory. After that, we will do the same thing to House Swyft, and then move further if we can."

OOOOOO

Garlan looked up in shock as Margaery entered the office he had commandeered, moving around the desk quickly and enveloping her in a tight hug. "Margaery! Are you, are you well?" he asked pulling back to look into her face. He tried not to wince when he saw the bruise on her throat once more. It was an ugly black and blue thing, done apparently by the Victarion Greyjoy, who had been in charge of the attack here. Luckily it would heal, if slowly.

He was still shocked to have learned however that it had been Margaery's knife found in the man's eye. Say what you wanted about his morals or ability to think, but he had been a feared warrior. The fact that he had died to Margaery, a young woman with a little to no training was both astonishing and rather amusing. The tale of that had already spread to the bards among his men, and they were already trying to come up with a song about 'The Rose and the Kraken', and Margaery's standing with the smallfolk, which had been already incredibly high had risen to new heights.

But Margaery herself had fallen into a funk after the battle ended. The healer who had examined her said it wasn't anything physical, it was simply a mental shock. The healer seemed to think it was because she had killed someone, but Garlan was inclined to think it was because of that and Ser Igon Vyrwel's death.

Garlan understood that. He would miss the man as well, he had been a fixture in their lives when they were younger. It was also only Ser Igon's skill as a commander, something he had actually never proven before in his life, and as a swordsman that had allowed Margaery's gamble to succeed. And even then it was a damn close thing.

The Ironborn attacked in a much more organized manner than they've ever shown before, and from several directions at once. Something we won't have to worry about from now on with Victarion dead. Yet if I hadn't arrived when I did... Garlan shuddered to think of what would've happened to his sister and to Highgarden itself after.

"I am as well as could be expected, brother." Margaery replied in a soft breathy tone that showed that she was still having trouble speaking thanks to the wound to her throat. She turned in Garlan's arms looking around at the gathered lords and knights, all of whom had risen respectfully when she entered. "My Lords." They all murmured greetings, and there was more than one young Lord among them who looked at Margaery as if they had become newly smitten by her, and it wasn't just because of her looks any longer. The courage she had shown here had impacted them just as much as the smallfolk.

It was a Seven-sent miracle that we arrived when we did, Garlan thought not for the first time while he led his sister to a seat which one of the younger knights had already vacated hastily for her. That was actually a rumor among the men, that it really was a miracle. Many of them had even pointed to six instances along their route where they were aided by strange occurrences.

Garlan hadn't heard them all, but knew two of them. The Mander was deep and navigable for most of its route, but there were a few places where there should have been rocks or eddies that would've made their going much slower. They hadn't run into any, even in places where they should have been going by the map and the barge masters. Moreover, while the army was rained upon a few times, the wind was always with them, pushing them further down the Mander.

But the most bizarre moment came when they were forced to stop for supplies, and a local septon had enough supplies on hand to donate to the army to speed it on its way. The septon, who acted both as septon and mayor of that small village had reported that they had a truly bountiful harvest come in, one that allowed them to supply the army with enough bread and other foodstuffs to see them on their way easily. That despite rumors saying they had already taken in their last crop and had actually seeded the fields again only a week prior.

That was a miracle, the only one that Garlan could point to and say that it unexplainable through normal means. But weren't Seven-sent miracles supposed to come in sevens? Where were the others? Or, if you believed what the soldiers were saying the final miracle?

No one knew about the miraculous arrow that had slain the messenger Victarion had tried to send to his archer-laden galleys. If they had received that order, the archers would've transferred to the walls of Oldflowers. That would've made Garlan taking the castle back from the Ironborn far more costly, or possibly impossible given the lack of grapnels or siege equipment among Garlan's men.

Margaery captured Garlan's hand in both of hers as he made to pull away after seeing her, grasping it firmly and raising it to her forehead looking up at him. "It was your arrival that saved us, saved me and this castle." she said looking from him and then all around at the others. "I cannot remember much from the last few days, and I need to say this now in case I have not already. Thank you for your service, for your sacrifice and for the rescue."

"T'was our duty lady." said one of the knights from Hightower. He looked a little embarrassed at the emotion that Margaery was able to put in those words despite their low tones.

Margaery nodded then almost visibly changed gears, looking up at Garlan. "With the Shield Islands and the Arbor still in the Ironborn's possession, you can't leave many men here to guard Oldflowers and myself. So if you are thinking of doing so desist now."

Despite the fact she sounded like she was gargling rocks there was some of the old fire in Margaery's voice again, and Garland was not the only one to smile at hearing it. "I will leave you a force of 800 or so here sister, along with the wounded, which amounts to another 600. But the rest of my men are almost ready to go. We're just getting all our ducks in a row."

Margaery cocked her head quizzically and Gunthor Hightower spoke up. "We need to get to Oldtown to meet with the remaining Redwyne navy my lady, and first we have to decide if we're going to march overland down the Rose Road there, or continue to take the barges further down the Mander before marching overland to Brightwater Keep. From there we could take the Honeywine down to Oldtown."

"Has Lord Florent suddenly become an excellent organizer when I wasn't looking?" Margaery replied tartly, shaking her head. "Even at the best of times that man isn't the most capable, so unless you gave him quite a lot of time to prepare your new barges, I think you would be sorely disappointed. Surely you were not thinking of, what is the word for carrying your own barges overland? Portaging? That would slow you down tremendously, adding weeks to your journey, weeks which the Ironborn would continue to reave upon the Shield Islands and the Arbor. I shudder to think what is occurring there under Greyjoy dominion."

"You're not the only one my lady." said Lord Blackbar. Margaery remembered that before the war began he had been trying to organize a marriage between his young son and one of the Redwyne nieces.

Margaery nodded at him, then turned back to Garlan. "Moreover, you would be placing yourself into House Florent's hands. "Not a good idea considering the fact that Stannis Baratheon, who last time I checked is one of Renly's enemies, was married into that family."

"Surely you don't think they'd do anything my lady?" said in another one of the knights, a Bulwer she thought. "Lord Tyrell would never forgive such."

"I think that Alester Florent will strike out for the main chance, whatever will enrich him and his House personally. You do not sit at my grandmother's knees for as long as I have without learning politics and how an individual's desires can drive him, my lords. House Florent has long chafed under House Tyrell rule, much like others have under their major Houses." she said looking over at Gunthor who smiled equably not saying anything though both of them knew what she was talking about and specifically why Cuy and Mullendore had no knights or household members representing them here.

"So it's overland down the Rose Road," Garlan said, bring the conversation back to military matters, where he was much more comfortable. "That will take us probably a month alas, the road is in excellent condition, but the season is against us if we want to arrive with our men in any shape to continue the campaign." From there the men turned to the task of organizing where along the route the local lords should prepare supplies for them, while Margaery began to prepare notes that would be sent to those houses.

OOOOOO

Victarion Greyjoy's death and the decimation of his assault force were not the only bad news on the horizon for the Ironborn, though even that had yet to reach back to the Shield Islands. And even when they did learn of it, few would recognize it for the major loss it truly was. Even his brother Balon, when he learned of it, would not realize what Victarion's death really meant. The Ironborn did not take to discipline well, and did not really understand the need of it, so his death would not have much of an impact. To the northwest however another threat was looming which would not threaten the Ironborn fleets, but the islands they called home and with them, their very way of life.

The Lannister fleet, composed of thirty-four war galleys each of which was armed with four scorpions and fully manned, was leaving Lannisport. They also had six trade cogs with them, full of men but also with weapons and armor to supply even more, the output of every blacksmith in the city and within 20 leagues of it.

Kevan Lannister watched them go from the Rock, frowning thoughtfully as the ships began their journey. Personally, Kevan had wanted to split the fleet, leaving two-thirds here to guard their home waters and sending the rest with an invasion force to the Shield Islands. However when reports of the strength of the Ironborn Fleet in those islands had gotten back to him, he had decided to send an invasion force into the Iron Islands instead.

If he had known about Greyjoy's death of course that would have impacted his thinking. But while news could travel fast, it certainly couldn't travel that fast and news of his death hadn't even become common knowledge in the area beyond the Mander, yet let alone reached the ears of any of the other players in this war. Of course that wasn't the only news that had not reached Kevan Lannister, news of the disaster in the Riverlands hadn't reached even the Golden Tooth yet. The maester in charge of looking after the ravens for Tywin's army had died during Wendel's raid on his camp, and Tywin had no time or ability to send any messages when he got back to the Kneeling Man's Ford.

Putting Addam in charge of the invasion force was simple enough, though I am not so sanguine about Lord Prester being in charge of the fleet portion. I hope my idea of arming the thralls in the Iron Islands works. From what I can remember of the last campaign against the Ironborn it might, at least on most of the islands. That could be a major force multiplier to our invasion force, but we were only able to send 3000 men along with the fleet. And even that badly eroded our reserve here in the lands nearest Lannisport.

In fact that only left Kevan with about 700 men to guard the Rock, which would be more than enough given its natural defenses, and another thousand to guard the city alongside the city watch. That might not be enough if they were somehow attacked while the fleet was away. Still for now it seems as if my brother's idea of keeping everyone else on the defensive is working for us.

In the days to come, as winter closed in, Kevan would remember that thought and shake his head at how foolish he had been.

OOOOOO

Of course, some events had been put in motion long before the campaign in the Riverlands reached its zenith, only to culminate in decisions being made now.

"Stranger damn you all, we have to get the word out! The Black candles are burning again, every single one of them! We all know what that means! Whatever you think of magic, my fellow archmaesters, we have a duty to tell all of Westeros that magic has returned! And you all know that might not be the worst of it either! You've put a decision on this matter off long enough, now I demand a response, else I will see to our duty alone!" The man who spoke thus was short with, huge, powerful hands and a large beer belly, a nose that had been broken many times in the past, coupled with a thick neck and a strong jaw.

Yet for all that he looked like someone who spent most of his time moving from alehouse to back alley wrestling matches, he wore the multi-linked chain of a maester, along with the ring and the rod of a Archmaester, but unlike any other of that order, his were made of Valyrian steel, signifying that he studied and was seen as a master in magic. Considering how magic was looked down upon in the Citadel, that made this man very much an outsider among his fellows.

Something one of the other Archmaesters around him in the conclave was very quick to point out. "Yes, yes, we know the old stories Marwyn, but a candle burning is hardly proof that magic has returned." Archmaester Vaellyn was a master of astrology in the Citadel, rarely leaving it's environs and disparaging of anything that went against the logic and mathematics that were central to his philosophy.

"True, but even so our duty is clear." Said Perestan, the historian. He didn't look happy about the thought, simply grave. "As part of our ancient covenant we need to send messages to the Lords Paramount and King's Landing that magic has returned, and with it, with it...." He paused, unable to say the words.

"The Others, the White Walkers, the ancient creatures of Endless Winter!" Marwyn growled out. "Saying their names won't call them into being or make them stronger, that's not among their powers. What is known about those is bad enough! And from last report I saw, the Wall's strength is at its lowest ebb in history!"

"That's actually not true any longer." Another Archmaester whose name and face Marwyn didn't recognize offhand said in a thoughtful tone. A tone, moreover which hinted at a northern accent. "I received word several months ago that there were reports of a King Beyond the Wall rising, and that many of the Northern houses had sent meant to the wall. In fact, I think the Wall is stronger than it has been for centuries now."

The maesters did not actually have a real spy network in most of Westeros, relying instead on the maesters themselves, situated as they were as advisors and healers in practically every important castle or keep on the continent. They did have one in Essos, but it's penetration of that land varied widely from city to city. Few of those maesters of course knew about the politics of the masters of the order, but talking to one another and asking advice or generally keeping in touch allowed the maesters to gather a lot of information.

There were exceptions of course. Many maesters outside the Citadel played the game of politics for their family's sake rather than the Citadel's, and then there were those who simply didn't communicate with the Citadel, like Luwin in Winterfell. That particular lack was the most irritating at the moment, considering they had received news about the massive amounts of steel coming out of Winterfell, coupled with other changes to the status quo.

But the Archmaesters had something more important than new ways to transport goods or create steel on their minds at present. "Then we don't have to worry about these mystical 'Others' at all, now do we? We will still send the messages Marwyn, but frankly I don't think they'll be believed at this point, the Lords Paramount have more important things on their minds." Another Archmaester said dismissively. "But the return of magic means something else, those rumors of dragons are possibly more accurate than we would like to think."

There was a moment of silence there among the highest Archmaesters of the Citadel, yet despite no words being spoken there was a lot of information exchanged in those few moments. No one but the highest members of the order, which, amusingly enough did not include the Grand Maester sent to King's Landing, knew the secrets these men were privy to. Even Marwyn, who was a not well-thought-of addition to this council, didn't know everything.

He knew that the Citadel had been destroying or hiding away any knowledge of magic they could get their hands on for centuries. Magic struck at the very foundations of what most maesters believed in, that the world was understandable and that nothing existed that could not be explained through logic and observation.

That was bad enough. Destroying knowledge because you didn't like what it said struck at the very heart of what he felt the order of Maesters should be. Worse it left the majority of maesters woefully unprepared to analyze or combat it now that magic had returned. Marwyn had done his best, but he knew they were woefully ignorant of many of the powers that magic could bestow on its users.

What Marwyn did not know, and never would if most of this council had their way, was that the maesters had long since taken that a step further. They had... helped the dragons disappear starting 270 years ago, having connected their existence to magic long before that. They had been in a silent war with the various orders of magic in Essos for centuries, and had been winning that war with the decline of their various powers.

Now most of the Archmaesters around the room were wearily certain that they were going to face a reversal of their fortunes there. But they would be damned if magic once again gained a toehold in Westeros. "I think sending a maester as an overture to this Stark-Targaryen union we've heard about might be a good idea. As for the other dragon reported, we'll have to wait until this Viserys and his forces make landfall somewhere and make plans from there." Said one of them, his face hidden in the shadow of the council room.

With Marwyn and a few others there who were not aware of the anti-magic conspiracy's full remit that was all that could be said aloud. It made it sound as if the maester would be their liaison with the Stark-Targaryen alliance, rather than their agent, and possibly assassin if need be. None of them realized they had already said too much, and Marwyn's beady eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

The discussion continued, trying to decide what to do and what information they had to send to the Lords Paramount, though many there were doubtful any of them would care over much. There was a war on after all.

The next day a maester specializing in healing had been chosen to send to Maidenpool, from where he could make his way to the Stark-Targaryen army. It would take a solid month and a half of travel by sea in autumn, but even so it would be much faster, and possibly safer than traveling by him the maester took twenty men from the citadel's security force, a band of semi-mercenary men who served as guards for Citadel and for maesters when they went into dangerous territories. He also brought along a few students, mainly to make his life somewhat easier.

The master healer didn't realize that one of them, whose name was Alleras, had worked with Archmaester Marwyn a time or two. Or that he had been assigned punishment duty that placed him near the Archmaester's quarters the previous evening.

OOOOOO

Stannis had finally allowed Melisandre to sacrifice the old septon, though he had insisted that it be in a duplicitous way that could in no way be linked back to her. A little bit of slow acting poison in his food one evening saw to that. The few maesters with the army examined him the next day and declared that his heart had finally given out on him. No one saw Melisandre enter the septon's tent, which had been given to him out of respect despite his prisoner status, and no one saw her leave as well.

If anyone had, they might have noticed that she was holding one hand up to hold her cloak tight against her neck to keep the large ruby fit into her gold choker from showing. And if someone was standing close enough and had good enough eyes, they might have seen just a small flicker of light under her fingers.

That light had faded noticeably however by the time Melisandre got back to her own tent, and she swiftly divested herself of her clothing before moving to kneel in front of the living flame that was burning brightly in a small fire pit set into the middle of her tent. Even as she did so Melisandre cursed volubly. She was able to get a little bit of power from the old man's death, but not nearly as much as she had hoped, and it had begun to fade immediately after extraction.

Yet even so, it gave her a slight boost in her attempt to see through the skein of the present to what events were occurring elsewhere. After about 40 minutes Melisandre was able to see scenes what was going on elsewhere, battle and war everywhere she looked. Yet the images were so disjointed and the places so unfamiliar she wasn't really getting any prevalent information out of them. The old man's life essence was seeping away faster than she could hold on to it, and she was only able to stay in the meditative trance with difficulty, by the end of which she was despairing at getting any accurate information.

Then the images of battles gave way suddenly, to be replaced by a series of images that were obviously simply metaphors for events happening elsewhere. A lion gutted, his throat torn out by a wolf standing like a man. A series of small fish trying to nibble and bite at what looked like some kind of thorny rose hovering in the water, yet dying in the attempt. A fleet setting sail from a port, with nothing visible that Melisandre could use to see what port it was. A fleet led by men who were not normal, made out of iron and hollow bits and pieces where their souls should be, while men made of roses but with thorns of steel were preparing to attack them from the South. A snake slithering up a compass etched into the ground showing it coming from the south, the ground behind its passage becoming dead and black with poison. A dragon circling a tower she recognized having lived there for several months. It was black and fell to look upon, and as the eye of the vision drew closer Melisandre could see its eyes gleamed with madness. Though if the madness was its own, or its rider was something that Melisandre could not say with any certainty.

With that the images ended, and suddenly Melisandre was back in her own body, shaking her head and wincing occasionally at the burning at her throat. The gem at her throat was red hot to the touch, and it had burned her throat slightly but she knew she would heal, this wasn't the first time that had happened. After a few moments spent recovering and thinking, Melisandre pushed herself to her feet, to go in search of Stannis.

Leaving her tent she passed a few of her new acolytes who rose to their feet, looking at her adoringly. These were the women who she had saved in Stokeworth. Ever since taking them into her service, Melisandre had preached to them about the glory of R'hllor, and much like Selyse back on Dragonstone they had all fallen into her power, giving all of themselves to R'hllor, which was as it should be. She had plans for them in the near future, but not right now. She waved them back to their places, entering Stannis' tent.

"With the Blackwater on our right flank and with the rains we've been running into, we might have the opportunity to set a small trap for the Reach heavy cavalry that they love so much." Stannis was saying as Melisandre entered the tent, the guards outside not having bothered to announce her. Inside Stannis was going over some contingency plans for the upcoming battle if he could not convince his brother to give over. Personally Stannis didn't think that would ever happen, Renly was always a grasping boy and thanks to Robert's favoritism he had never been broken of the habit. But for the blood they shared Stannis was going to try anyway.

All of his commanders and lords were nodding grimly. They knew the upcoming battle would be hard, but they had been in several fights already, which had done wonders for the morale of the army. They might be outnumbered, though it was difficult to estimate what portions of the army Renly would be willing to pull off the cordon around King's Landing. However, they also respected and trusted Stannis, and fully anticipated that Melisandre would have some kind of magical aid to offer during the battle itself which, while they were not happy about, they were at least willing to accept.

"Acting in that kind of terrain will be difficult, but so long as we use only infantry for that first unit, we could get away with it my lord." said Lord Buckler frowning thoughtfully.

"Exactly. Most Reach lords look down on infantry and believe that heavy cavalry are the masters of the battlefield. I mean to show them that that is not always the case." Stannis smiled grimly. "And we have other arrows in our quiver as well, and not just on the battlefield. I've already sent diplomatic messages to specific lords. Though the men I sent with most of them haven't returned yet, given what is happening to the underbelly of the Reach I have no doubt that many Reach lords will be anxious to head home. That is an exploitable weakness."

After a few more moments discussion Stannis and his officers had planned as much as they could before they reached where Stannis estimated the battle would take place and broke up for the evening. As they did Stannis turned to Melisandre who had been watching quietly. He took a sip of camp water then set it aside on the small table looking at her coolly. "I trust the old man's death served your purpose?"

"It did, though barely." Melisandre said, not looking away from Stannis's hard judgmental gaze. "For more specific information, we will have to sacrifice someone to the flames but for now..." she shrugged. "Once again what information my god allowed me to see was mostly and images. One fact however was prevalent throughout every other scene I saw. War has spread everywhere."

"Of course," Stannis said shaking his head. "But specifics please."

"I have very little specifics to share as I said. However near the end of my meditation R'hllor saw fit to send me several images, many of which are easy enough to interpret while others are not so much."

She described the images as they came to her, the first and most vivid shocking Stannis to almost lose control of his facial expressions for a moment. "So the Stark youth has completely defeated the old lion? Amazing. Even after your last image about the two of them I had not anticipated the Starks would simply win outright like that. I would have thought the two of them would continue to war with one another shattering the Riverlands as they did. I will have to make certain not to underestimate Ranma Stark the general when we inevitably meet."

Stannis couldn't stop himself from glaring angrily at Melisandre at that, since without her demand that he assault the ship with the Dragon Queen on it he might have well been able to bring the Starks in on his own side. But not now. Not unless he could unite the rest of Westeros against them, and that wasn't going to happen.

The next few images could deal with the Ironborn, but the snake was a mystery to Stannis. Melisandre had been unable to tell them what type of snake, and there were several families who had snakes in their heraldry which didn't mention people with nicknames that dealt with snakes. "If I had to make a bet, I would say it would might be about the Viper, but his making his way from the south, doesn't tell me enough."

"And what of my last image my Lord, the black dragon circling over Dragonstone, or about the fleet leaving a port? R'hllor favored me greatly to send me that image at all considering they were about something occurring overwater. If Dragonstone is in danger..."

Stannis laughed harshly. "I do not tell you how to burn people woman, don't tell me about war. Dragonstone might not be Storm's End but unlike Storm's End when I had to hold it against that idiot Mace, I prepared Dragonstone for war long before this. And I left 700 of my best men there under Jate Blackberry, one of my best and most loyal men. If that image is about something occurring now, he'll break the dragon loving scum on the walls!

"As to the fleet, that is something else entirely. Can you tell me anything about what the ships looked like, or anything that could distinguish them?"

Melisandre thought for a time, and then shrugged. "I could sense they were coming from Essos, but other than that... Perhaps, perhaps a golden hue about them my lord? Other than that, there was nothing about them to tell me about... my lord?"

Stannis had gone still, his eyes narrowed and hard as he thought what that could mean, then shook his head. "That... that could be a lot of trouble done the line if my guess on that is right." He shook his head. "For now, we will continue to deal with my brother and King's Landing. Then we will send a message to Saan. Davos and his friend will deal with the dragon lovers for us. All the dragon lovers, if possible."

After waiting a moment to see if Stannis would share what he thought the fleet might be Melisandre cocking her head to one side asking. "And the wolves, what of them?"

"The wolves can wait for a time. Even if Stark won his campaign against Tywin decisively he'll have to consolidate his position. And as long as the Golden Tooth is in Lannister hands they'll need to worry about their flank too much to allow them to march deep into the Crownlands. No, if events here go as well as we can make them we will be in a far better position to face them, possibly near Harroway or Maidenpool somewhere. Are your plans for the women ready?" He asked somewhat distastefully.

"Yes Azor Ahai." Melisandre responded bowing her head obsequiously, yet somehow the gesture was more arrogant than any kingly gesture Stannis had ever seen. "The Army knows we will be sending the women and the other noncombatants back to that last village tomorrow night before marching on to face a Renly, guarded by myself and many of your fire guard for a time, and I have let it be known that we will be picking up several crates as well there." She smiled thinly, though it quickly turned into a frown. "I will remind you that winter and the Great Other are gathering strength. We will need to start for the Wall in the next few months, six at the most."

"You do not have to keep reminding me about the otherworldly threat you seem to see around every corner!" Stannis said growling angrily. He didn't believe in the Great Other or whatever threat she saw beyond the Wall but he wasn't about to discount it either. He simply wished to concentrate on more understandable threats first. "When the time comes we will march north, and this Great Others of yours will face the largest army Westeros can field, but I refuse to go to the Wall and leave enemies behind me!"

He looked up as the pattering of rain began on the tent's roof, then back at Melisandre. "If it rains like this when we deal with King's Landing will that affect your plans?"

"No mere drops of water will put out the flames of R'hllor!" Melisandre said, her eyes flashing angrily. "My flames will burn away everything, you will see."

OOOOOO

Closer to home at around the same time Ranma was about to close his final trap on Tywin, Daenerys and her portion of the Army had arrived at Stone Hedge, ostensibly to relieve the army there.

Inside the keep, Roger was taking a solitary meal while writing up notes of the siege for Domic. Back in Seagard Domic had asked all of the Wolfsworn to write their experiences down for him so that he could weave them into song after the war was over, and knowing that the battles here would be known as one of the turning points the battle against the Lannisters Roger was determined to put down everything that had happened in order to paint Dacey and Arya in the heroic light they deserved to be.

He paused in his writing when he felt someone behind him, but before he could turn, two feminine arms went around his shoulders tracing down his chest to his stomach. "What are you writing?" A breathy voiced asked his ear.

Roger rolled his eyes keeping a groan from escaping his lips with difficulty despite his father's training in etiquette. "May I ask why what I am writing would be any of your concern?" he asked, turning slightly to look over one shoulder at the young woman trying to drape herself over his back. "And I have asked you" he said reaching up gently with his own hands to remove her arms from around his shoulders, "to desist in these flirtations of yours."

"Your handwriting is very neat my Lord." said the girl, staring down at the messages he was writing, before backing away slightly yet still a little too close for Roger's comfort. "Would you like me to look it over for you?"

"I doubt the topic would in any way interest you my lady." Roger said taking the parchment from her quickly.

Barbara Bracken, the oldest daughter of the house smiled sweetly at him, letting none of the desperation she was feeling shown her face. But Roger knew it was there, her flirtations had become more and more physical in nature since Lord Bracken's capture and the defeat of the small force that he had led against the walls. Now with everyone of the Brackens under the North's thumb, she knew that they were truly at the mercy of the Northerners. Her mother had told her about Arya and what she thought would happen to them all, and Barbara wanted no part in that. She had been raised as a lady, and she would remain such even if she had to whore herself out to a northern barbarian.

She had picked Roger as her target because he was the most civilized looking one among the Wolfsworn. Edd was handsome enough, but not her type really, she preferred a more mature man. Hathan was injured of course, and his family wasn't one she had ever heard before. Roger had actually shared the story of the House of Shieldarm's creation, how Hathan had received Ranma's life and been awarded his own last name and holdfast in return. But that just meant he was not rich enough to interest her.

She did know however that Catelyn, her middle sister, had some designs on the northern knight. She had been the one to help him with his wounds, and the two had grown close. But how far that understanding would go, she didn't know. Which didn't even consider Bess and her relationship with Arya, the friendship that had sprung up between the two girls, almost an apprenticeship really.

Barbara moved forward, one hand reaching up to rub along Roger's cheek. Roger however pushed her away now shaking his head angrily. "I said desist lady, I am married, as I've told you before."

"Yes, to a wildling witch!" Barbara scoffed, shaking her head, her feminine dignity now raising its head. "Do they even acknowledge marriage like you or I would? Does she know how to read and write, to see to the running of a household, of politics or anything of real use? What could you see in such as one is her when you could have me?"

"I would choose Osha because she is strong enough to look after herself and survive winter when it comes." Roger replied coolly. "And while her people might view marriage as something only worthwhile so long as the man can prove you stronger than the woman, I take my vows seriously, especially since she has already given me a child."

The young woman scowled but before she could retort one of the guards burst in. "My Lord! An army approaches, bearing a banner I have never seen before, but the two dragons are flying overhead!"

OOOOOO

"You're telling me that we came here for nothing?" Daenerys asked, a wide smile on her face as she slipped out of the saddle after Myrcella. The two of them still routinely shared a horse, yet even so that horse was probably the envy of all the other warhorses in the army given how light the two of them were. She looked up, helping Merry from the saddle and taking a moment to hug the younger girl for a second, still amused by the joke Merry had been telling her as they rode under the portcullis.

"Blame Lord Bracken's moment of madness." said Dacey laughing lightly as she exchanged arm clasps with both younger women before looking at her and the others. "I take it the old lion is on the run?"

"Possibly not by this time." Daenerys said with a shrug. "He did not have that much of a head start, and I know that Ranma is going to push the pace as hard as possible to catch him."

Myrcella had moved over to greet Edd and Roger exchanging a hug with Arya before looking around quizzically. "Where's Hathan?" Myrcella like Hathan, he was quiet, but there was something solid about him, reminding her of Ser Oakheart in a way.

"He was injured taking the castle in the first place. His injuries are healing, but we would certainly like your opinion on them Myrcella." Edd responded.

Myrcella nodded, and Roger turned, gesturing her and her two bodyguards to follow him into the keep.

"We've kept Lord Bracken in the cells here along with the feel of his men that surrendered rather than simply fleeing. Did you run into any trouble with skirmishers on the way here?" Dacey asked.

"No, I doubt that after the drubbing you seem to have given them that they will have stomach for opposing a full army. I have no doubt they will have turned to banditry like so many." Daenerys frowned for a moment then shrugged. "I'd like to speak to Bracken now if you don't mind, make my own impression of him before we talk further. I want to know if he is like Vypren, simply striking out for personal gain, or if he has some small honorable justification for his actions."

Dacey nodded and led the way to the prison. In the end however, Jonos Bracken did not impress Daenerys. Even in prison the man was full of bluster, hotly defending his actions rather than admitting guilt. Daenerys decided then and there he would be exiled or executed.

After that, she interviewed his wife and daughters, and then turned her thoughts to the future, specifically, how best to deal with the Westerlands. It is time for politics to once more come into play, she thought as she sat down with Merry at the former Lord Bracken's desk, taking out parchment and quill. The two of them had a lively dinner with the Wolfsworn, Bess, Cley and a few of the pages outside net to the stables where her two dragons had been bedded down for the evening. But duty had pulled them away leaving Arya, Nymeria and the pages to keep the unwary away from her dragons.

The two girls rather amusingly could fit in the large chair Jonos had used, and did so now, laughing at the experience. Though for just a moment, as Merry leaned against her side, Daenerys had to fight the urge to lean down and kiss her, not on the cheek, but on the mouth. Thankfully Merry got up from the chair before that thought fully penetrated Daenerys' head, then sat across from the young queen.

With a jerk of her head Daenerys dismissed that sudden thought and turned to the matter at hand. "If we're going to think about using politics to either tame or bring the Westerlands under our control, I think that we should start out with what kind of carrots we can use to entice them. We've already shown them the stick after all."

"We should also limit our first round of ravens to those families still strong enough to be a threat, at least on their own ground." Merry replied, bringing one finger to her lips as she thought. "I don't think I saw any banners of House Lydden or House Serret, and very few for House Crakehall. Those and the, oh.... Darn it, the castle facing the Iron Islands... something dark." Merry scowled, unhappy at not remembering the name of the house in question after so many lessons from her mother of the noble Houses of the Westerlands.

"Those will do for a start, hmmm.... I seem to remember something about Lydden and Serret being wedded? Interesting..." Daenerys frowned, pulling out a map of Westeros, one of several copies of a general map Ranma had made back in Seagard. It wasn't very detailed, but it had some of the major castles marked out on it. After a moment she began to smile. "Hmmm... I think I have an idea. It might not be very popular with a few lords, but it might be with enough. Now, what carrots do you think we can offer..."

The two young women put their heads together over the map, talking into the wee hours of the morning as they made plans for the dissolution of the Westerlands as a united nation. And if one or the other would break off occasionally to stare at the other, there was no one there to notice these little moments.

OOOOOO

Tywin stared at the young man who had so thoroughly outmaneuvered him on the battlefield and finally captured him with something beyond fury, yet also more than a little fear. Using all of his formidable self-control not to show anger or fear, he nodded his head slightly. "Very well, I know when I am beaten, what are your terms for my surrender and the surrender of my house?"

"Terms?" Ranma actually laughed shaking his head in something like admiration for Tywin's pure gall. "No terms Lannister. Your House's military strength is smashed, the Westerlands as a whole don't have an army anymore, I doubt that the remaining houses could field more than 10,000 at most for the next few months, and that would only be if they stripped their seats almost entirely. After this debacle do you really think any of them will be willing to do that for you? They might have respected and feared you old lion, but enough to put their own heads on the chopping block? Especially after so many heads have been chopped off already?"

Tywin growled, his teeth gnashing together unwilling to admit that the boy had a point. His house's pockets were deep enough that given time they could field another army, but after this debacle he wasn't certain if any of his few remaining lords could best the young man in front of him on the battlefield.

"No, if I have my way and since my bannermen declared me King in the North I do have my way whenever I wish, you'll be executed soon enough for the depredations you and your army have committed upon the Riverlands. That doesn't even go into your daughter's treason against the crown and you backing said treason."

"We tend to take those things rather seriously in the North." Jon remarked, pulling off his helm as he moved to stand beside his brother throwing one arm over Ranma's shoulder.

"Greatjon!" Ranma yelled over to the taller man. "Take Lord Lannister here and place him with the other prisoners. Watch them closely, and if any try to escape, kill him. Any of them." He said turning back to stare at Tywin making certain that he got the hint there. "I'll willingly forgo the pleasure of a public execution for you if you test my patience Lannister."

Greatjon guffawed, then picked Tywin up as easily as if he was a small child and moved over to where the other prisoners. There were only twelve of them, including the other Lannisters they had captured, though Daven was still unconscious and looked to remain so. Tywin remained silent as some men of House Umber tied him up, looking around with keen eyes even now. He knew that while Ranma had bested him on the battlefield, there still might be ways for him to escape or turn the tide, and if he could, everything he learned about Ranma and his army could help later.

Watching the prisoners be placed on spare horses, Ranma was not unaware of Tywin's thoughts but he had other things on his mind. He turned slightly pulling Jon into a manly hug slapping him on the back several times before pulling away looking at him closely. "You look well, I take it taking Wayfarer's Rest wasn't that hard?"

"Not after the initial battle no." Jon said with a shrug, grinning at his brother. "We had trouble crossing the Tumblestone, but the big problem was there were more in the keep than we had anticipated. It turned out that we attacked the place while one of the supply convoys was there at with its guards. But we still won the day. Or rather night actually." Jon corrected himself smirking little, "since we attacked at night."

He went on much more seriously however, shaking his head. "But Wayfarer's Rest is even worse a defensive position than great-uncle Brynden told us. It's not close enough to the pass to the Westerlands to close it, a force there could interdict any army coming out, but it's not large enough to have many catapults stationed there, and the keep itself is pathetic. Some work was being done to create an outer wall, and we had the locals continued that as much as we could, but it will take months to complete, at best. With the weather turning as it is, it might take longer.

Ranma shrugged, moving over to where Fenris and Ghost were becoming reacquainted the way of wolves all over, by roughhousing like little puppies. The sight brought a smile to his face even while he turned to stare off further south. "I thought it might be. The men you left behind, are they up to stopping any stragglers from getting past them?"

"Yes." Jon replied definitively. "Remember I took mostly mountain clansmen, they're fantastic at scouting and skirmishing even in unknown terrain, and they've had time to get to know that area very well."

"Good, and your supplies?"

"Excellent, so good in fact we've been sharing with some of the smallfolk of the area." Jon shook his head sadly. "I don't know how they did it, but I would say one out of every five families was able to hide themselves while the Lannisters marched through." He went on much more softly. "I think at least two out of every remaining four were killed however. According to what the locals passed on, the area between Mummer's Ford and Acorn Hall is especially bad. One of the mercenary groups that Tywin used to start that skirmishing around the borders took Acorn Hall and then began to simply ravage the land all around it. There were rumors of the Lord of Acorn Hall being burned alive in his keep during the battle."

"I saw some of that as we passed through, the Lannisters have a lot to answer for." Ranma said with a nod. "Given how difficult it would be to try all of the prisoners we took one at a time, Daenerys and I decided to try them by their colors unless someone comes forward with specific names, though that hasn't happened yet despite Alayaya and Domic's best efforts. They could've changed since I left to chase down Tywin, but I doubt it."

"So you're thinking of simply using their banners and colors, if one Lord and his men were seen taking part in the rapine and looting?"

"Yes it's the best we can do," Ranma said with a sigh. "We'll try to dole out justice as much as possible, but in cases like this, that's the best we're going to get. How many men did you leave behind?"

"About a hundred and sixty archers and another hundred or so armsmen from House Grell, and something like five hundred mixed Wull and Liddle men. I left Muldan, one of the Wull men, in charge with orders to patrol the area aggressively already."

Ranma nodded. "All right, we'll send about four hundred more men down to help them from here, archers predominantly. We won't need all the men we've still got here to care for the prisoners or wounded." Jon nodded, and the two of them began to reorganize the army, burning the dead of both sides despite the weather and reorganizing the army around its losses, which were minimal after this battle. They had actually lost more men wiping out the Lannister force coming up from Stone Hedge near Acorn Hall.

Throughout this Tywin continued to watch, making note of things that his agents either hadn't seen or hadn't understood the importance of. For one thing, the weapons and armor of the Northerners were all of the same quality save the heavy cavalry which was somewhat better in most cases, which was to be expected. But it was a very rare Lord indeed who could armor his infantry as well as this. So it wasn't just the pike units that received such quality weapons. How did the Starks do this?

Usually the armor and weapons of the warriors called up to join a Lord Paramount's forces were supplied by those Houses, and so varied widely in quality. That was not the case here. I see tabards of several Houses here, so it must be uniform across the entire army. I've never even heard of anything like that. Even as Tywin watched small unit commanders were getting their men organized and assigning them places in the march to come. They also seem to be trained to respond and to act as units irrespective of their original allegiance. These men are not just armsmen serving in an army, they're something new, the closest example I can think of is the Unsullied, but how was such a thing achieved?

Over the next few days, Tywin began to realize how badly he had underestimated Ranma as a general, and a Lord as well. Yet it wasn't just him, the other one, Jon Stark (who must've been Jon Snow at one point though why anyone would legitimize a bastard was beyond Tywin) was just as interesting. The two of them were consummate warriors, they practiced every evening and after watching them once Tywin concluded both were as dangerous as his own son, possibly more so. They also discussed politics and the need for their army to get some rest, and some plans for the future of the Riverlands that sounded both interesting and like they would work.

Ranma and Jon were also thinking about the next phase of the war, though they did that far enough away from the prisoners so Tywin couldn't overhear those discussions. Over the next few days they discussed some ideas with Greatjon. "Taking the Golden Tooth won't be easy." Greatjon said shaking his head. "It's supposed to be one of the toughest keeps to take. Not quite as bad as the Rock, the Bloody Gate or the Moat, but bad. I like the idea of it taking it for a lot of reasons, but I'm just not certain that even if we can raid the gold mines that it'd be worth the blood we have to pay for it."

Golden Tooth was the seat of House Lefford, which guarded the mines around the Golden Tooth which were in turn the source of much of the Lannisters wealth, owned directly by House Lannister. House Lefford was one of the most loyal houses to House Lannister, but their land could not sustain a large population being so mountainous. So while they were an important house, the Lannisters had never allowed them to be a large one, their men were very well trained and very well outfitted, but it was the Golden Tooth itself that was the main source of their strength thanks to its strategic position.

"It's the only way to secure our flank from further incursion." Ranma said with a shrug. "We have to take it, besides..." he smirked a little. "Daenerys and I have been talking, and having the Golden Tooth in our control we'll add an exclamation to the messages we're going to be sending to various Westerlands lords in a few weeks. Besides, I'm not thinking of taking it in a conventional assault. You should know that I don't do that kind of thing, Greatjon."

"True enough!" Greatjon laughed, though he looked at the two younger men shrewdly. "But what do you have in mind?"

"A job for the Wolfsworn." Ranma replied, shrugging his shoulders. "We'll drop the old lion and the other prisoners off at Raventree Hall, reform the army there and then we'll lead a small force down to Wayfarer's Rest and from there down to the Golden Tooth. Though we might rest the army for a time first, I think we've pushed the men hard these past few months, and it's starting to show in their gear."

"We should also send a small holding force down to Harrenhal from there." Greatjon said nodding his shaggy head towards the west. "I doubt the Lannisters left a large force there, but if they get they could do some damage."

"Hopefully Smalljon's already taken care of that." Ranma's replied chuckling a little. "He and the others that went to relieve Raventree Hall were free to act how they wished, and I know Smalljon would think of that."

Jon nodded, and the discussion turned from there.

Over the next few days Tywin began to try and inveigle some of the guards to let him go, promising wealth beyond their imaginings. Most of the time they didn't even respond to him, other times they simply sneered. One of them however did report to his Lord, Greatjon. The next day as the prisoners were being lead into their single tent, the Lord of House Umber came over to stare down at Tywin. "My men say you've been trying to bribe them." He smirked, the expression visible despite his beard.

"I have." Tywin replied frankly. "And I would be willing to offer the same deal to you only more so. Join with me, and I will give you your weight in gold Lord Umber."

Greatjon stared at him for a moment then burst out laughing. "You, you think," he said between gasps of laughter "that I would betray House Stark?" Suddenly Greatjon became serious, and one huge hand reached out grasping Tywin by the throat and lifting him off his feet. "I am Lord Umber, I gave my oath, and I keep it! You think I will betray my honor, my King, and my gods for your shit-stained gold!? You think any of us would!?"

Tywin gasped as he felt his throat constrict under the grip of the Northerner. Then he was hurled back to join the other prisoners. "Don't try to bribe my men anymore." Greatjon growled. "You won't get anywhere."

As the angry Northern Lord marched off a man nearby who was wearing Mallister colors murmured, "Besides, even if we all turned on them, I doubt you'd get away. Not with Ranma, Jon and their wolves here. That's an army right there."

Tywin raised his tied up hands to massage his sore throat, staring at the man. But he didn't talk again, turning back to entering the prisoners tent.

That tent showed something else that Tywin had noticed, the organization of the small force that had come after him was incredible. Every man there was assigned to a tent, one tent for every four men. Moreover a different man carried the tent and their camping gear on his horse every day, while another was in charge of putting their tents up every night. That organization also showed in the way they set up camp, though Tywin wasn't quite able to understand all of what he was seeing.

One day the rain was too heavy for them to continue on, and army camped out on top of a small rise, using the trees there as cover from the rain. As they went about setting up camp many of the men commented on how the leaves of the trees had begun to fall. Autumn was truly upon the Riverlands, making more than one man wonder what was going on in the north.

On the outskirts of the camp where they could best use their direwolves senses Ranma and Jon were sharing a campfire, both the fire and the two brothers covered by a small tarp. They were laughing about the first time the two of them had been caught stealing food from the pantries when both of them looked up and turned to stare out into the rain. They looked at one another then Jon stood up and moved out from under the tarp cupping his hands around his mouth. "Ho there, be you friend or foe?"

There was a moment of silence then a voice shouted, "Be you Lord Stark?"

Ranma stood up as well moving as others in the camp began to notice something was going on. "I am. Who are you?"

"Do we be havin'yer word that none be harmin' us?"

"So long as you come in peace, friend." Ranma replied quickly looking at Jon who shrugged his shoulders. He leaned in slightly. "Did Ghost send you the same images as me? Some smallfolk carrying food?"

Jon nodded, and the both of them watched several figures come out of the scrub brush further down the small hill. Ranma moved forward, leaving Ice behind him while he moved to meet them. One of them was an elderly woman struggling under the load of what looked like a full basket of bread, covered by her cloak which should've rather been covering her. Ranma quickly took the basket from her arms, pulling off the cloaking quickly and throwing it over the woman. "We appreciate the food good mother, but we'd appreciate your not with getting sick on us even more." He quipped, winking at them all. "Come friends we have tents enough for you all to at least get warm and dry for the day."

The smallfolk looked at him in shock then in further shock when more men came out from the camp led by Jon. They quickly divested the smallfolk of their food and hurrying them under tarps here and there where fires were already burning. "Who speaks for you?" Ranma asked as he hurried the old lady up the hill, almost carrying her up but not quite.

The old lady looked to an equally elderly man, who looked as if he had been hewn out of rock at some point he was simply that solid, reminding Ranma strongly of Grimaldi from Harroway. The man nodded in turn, and joined Ranma and Jon underneath their tarp. Ranma stared at the man thoughtfully rubbing at his chin noting that he'd have to shave soon. "Exactly what did that food cost you and your followers, good man?"

"Rufus Smallcreek my Lord. Ah'm a farmer d'wn by house Keath and house Vance land. We been dealing wit' lots o' runners lately, but most of them be farmer folk anyway and more 'en willing to work for their meals. We done well s'ppose leastwise to da families that tried ta stay or weren't quick 'nough to run from the Lannisters." When he said the word 'Lannister' it came off with as much vitriol as a person could put into the words mother-fucking-bastard.

"I see." Ranma said with a nod before he gestured over to the prisoners. "As you can see, we've captured the old lion and some of his little cubs. They will stand trial for what they've done. I can't right all the wrongs that have occurred in this war, but I can make certain of that."

The man stared at him with all the weight of a man who had seen many promises from lords broken as politics or their own whims dictated. Yet when he stared into Ranma's blue eyes, all he saw was bleak determination and honesty staring back at him. Eventually he nodded. "If yer do that my Lord, then I'll truly un'erstand why da septons've begun to say we sh'ld aid ye as we may."

That made both young men sit up and take notice, though after a moment Ranma smiled. "That septon wouldn't be called Father Sparrow would it?"

"No my Lord," the man said looking quizzical replied, shaking his head. "I've heard tell of da one you speak of, but our village 'as a septon. He went off to some kind o' meetin' a week or so ago. When he come back he beg'n to tell us of da evils of the two Baratheon brothers, how one of 'em has given himself to a heathen religion, and the other's a man-lover. He said we sh'ld be aiding ye and yer queen as true champions of the Seven."

The man shrugged uncomfortably. "I cen't say that w're 'appy 'bout it, but given da choices a northern wolf who seems ta be keeping his army under control and doing something for da smallfolk rather than either ignoring us or livin' off our lands seems ta be the best bet."

"How bad is it really?" Jon asked softly. "I mean we've only seen portions of the lands where the Lannister army passed over. How bad is it elsewhere?"

The man shrugged. "Bad milord, Riverrun's overflowing wit' runnersand a few of da villages down by us, like Stony Sept, are too. Most of 'emarewillin' to work, but housings tough and foods scarce." He scowled a little as he stared down at the bread that one of the men had come to give Jon and Ranma.

Ranma stared at him then down at the bread before breaking it in three pieces waving away the rest the man was going to give him before passing one piece to Jon and the other across to Rufus. "You'll stay with us for the night." He ordered. "Tomorrow we'll load you down with a few deer or something to take with you on recompense.

"And when you get back home, tell your fellow villagers and the septon to pass it on that the Riverlands will have what aid they need to prepare for winter. But there won't be any handouts, so long as people are willing to work together they will be rewarded for it. But we really don't have the resources available to simply feed everyone unless they're willing to work for it."

"So's business as usual my lord." Rufus said with a shrug before biting into his portion of the loaf. The next day Rufus and his fellow smallfolk were astonished to find several dead deer, their throats torn out but otherwise undamaged, piled neatly near the camp. As Ranma and his men set off, they gleefully went to work on butchering them, preparing them for travel.

OOOOOO

That was not the only surprise visit Ranma and his force met with as they marched to Raventree Hall. Two days after leaving behind the smallfolk delegation, Ranma and Jon was once more warned by their direwolves that there was another group nearby. Ranma halted his march, turning to stare out into the woodlands around them south and west, while Jon did the same. "Are we going to have trouble friends?"

Out in the woods, Beric Dondarrion jolted from where he was hiding with several of his fellows. They all looked at one another and he whispered "how did he know we were here?"

"RRRRRRR..." A growl from behind them made him and his men turn, and Beric gulped staring at the gigantic white-furred direwolf that had somehow snuck through the woods upon them. Another joined him quickly, looming even larger than the first.

One of his men however was one of the Stark men and he looked at the two of them in surprise. "That really is Ranma and Jon out there." He said. "Those are their direwolves, I recognize them." He laughed sharply shaking his head. "Of course I doubt there are that many direwolves this side of the Wall in any event." He held up his head well away from his mace, then moved forward. "Take us to your masters."

Moments later the full complement of the Brothers Without Borders were in front of Ranma and Jon while the army paused for a moment, some of the men breaking out lunch for themselves. Ranma stared at the northern men, especially their leader. "Jaryd Waterman?"

"My Lord." Jaryd said bowing his head, while the four northern men with him all bowed as well. One of them, a man named Orlus who had been wickered with a flail, had died in one of the skirmishes they had fought in the past few months. "I'm humbled to see you remember me."

Ranma moved forward, clasping the other man's arm firmly, stopping him mid-bow. "Of course I remember you! I'm happy to see you survived the Lannister betrayal. Jon told me the smallfolk passed on rumors that you and the others were still doing what you could against the Westerlanders, thank you for that." He turned to the others, narrowing his eyes as he tried to bring their names to mind. "Beric Dondarrion and Eric Dayne, or Eldric, right?"

"It's Edric, Lord Stark." The young boy answered firmly, returning Ranma's handshake despite feeling more than a little awe at the man. He had seen Ranma tear apart Gregor Clegane firsthand, and knew how strong he was, and some of the tales of his campaign here in the Riverlands had already spread among the smallfolk.

"You call it a betrayal Lord Stark, and it was indeed, a most foul trap that would have succeeded in claiming us all if not for Thoros of Myr's sacrifice." Beric said, shaking his head while he watched some of the northerners hand out strips of jerky and hard tack to his men. He described the battle against the Bloody Mummies covering Lorch's betrayal, then Thoros's power and his final stand, which allowed Beric and many of his men to escape. "It was the single most magnificent thing I had ever seen. Since then we have been doing what we can to aid the smallfolk and strike at the Westerlanders, in particular any of the forces that were involved in that battle."

Ranma and Jon had listened intently to the tale, exchanging glances occasionally when Beric described the flaming sword that Thoros had used. It made them both uneasy, since he apparently followed the same god that the Red Witch did, but they couldn't fault his heroism. After a moment, Ranma nodded. "That's quite a tale Beric. So, what will you do now? Will you join with us, or turn to hunting down deserters now that the Westerlands army has been broken?"

Beric exchanged a glance with his squire and Davit Wendwater. It was obvious that the five remaining Northerners would opt to stay with their fellows, but both of them hoped to learn what was going on elsewhere before making a decision. He said so aloud than touched his squires shoulder lightly. "And I would also like to send a message to Starfall somehow. My betrothed and this ones aunt should hear we are alive as soon as we can manage to tell it."

"I'm afraid the odds of a messenger surviving the trip to Starfall from here is remote, and I've no idea if any castle in the Riverlands would have a raven trained to take messages to Starfall, but we can see." Ranma nodded, standing up and whistling sharply then raising an arm into the air. When the unit commanders were looking at him he made another motion, circling his hand in the air and pointing forward. "For now, let's get a move on."

That evening they stopped twelve leagues further toward Raventree Hall, and Beric and his men were almost falling out of the saddle in weariness. Eddric was a little better, being a young man of fourteen he recovered far more quickly. Ranma had been watching the young boy during the march, remembering his father's tales of Arthur Dayne, the Sword of Morning. While the rest of the army was making camp, he touched the boy on his shoulder, motioning toward a small clear area to one side. "Beric said you had seen action, and while I don't know him well, I've no doubt he has been training you as he should. Would you like some training from me as well?"

Eddric nodded eagerly, his eyes wide and Ranma nodded, grabbing up a fallen branch and holding it like a sword. "Come at me then." When Eddric looked at him askance, Ranma laughed. "Trust me Eddric, I'm at no disadvantage. There's a little trick I know, I might be able to teach it to you eventually."

Rather than putting him at his ease that made Eddric even more wary of attacking. He circled Ranma for a moment, his sword held in both hands slightly at an angle, ready to block or strike with equal speed. Ranma nodded at that, but still made a slight motion with the hand holding the branch. "Come on lad, we don't have all evening. Night comes quickly these days."

Spurred on Eddric stepped forward, swinging his longsword quickly, while Beric and a few of the others paused in their own work to ready their tents to watch. Ranma blocked the blow then blocked a kick that would have taken him in the knee with his own leg, smiling as Eddric moved in, trying to get in close and using his feet and hands as well as the sword. It wasn't the most 'noble' style but it was one that had been taught in battle, and it worked well enough for the youth.

But Ranma simply blocked or redirected every blow and punch, then began to shout out corrections. "Keep your weight centered at all times, don't overextend like that, if I wanted I could have gutted you just then. Protect your face and neck, not just your body, keep your sword up slightly more, good! We'll need to work on your footwork, you need to be faster at changing your position and angle of attack. Try to make each blow flow one into the other and aim for different parts of the body."

"Don't be so quick to lunge like that, no matter if you think you see an opening!" With that, Ranma dodged to one side, his branch flicking up and redirecting Eddric's sword into the ground then flashing to stop within a finger's width from his nose. "Like so. Control is what you need, the sword is an extension of the body, not just a weight, we'll need to work on that somewhat too, you were doing well, but your endurance needs a lot of work."

He stepped back, smiling and motioning the boy to attack again. Eddric did so, but it was obvious now that he was feeling the effect of the exercise. Ranma suddenly went on the attack, still calling out corrections, but a moment later Eddric found himself on his rear, his sword flashing up into the sunlight for a moment. Without even looking, Ranma reached out and caught it by the hilt, his arm not moving an inch when he caught it. "Not bad lad, not bad at all. We have a lot of work to do, but you're as good as could be expected at this point. Well done!"

Eddric looked up at him, flushing slightly at the praise and the exhaustion gripping him before Ranma reached down hauling him to his feet. "Now, I have some exercises I'd like you to do, then..."

OOOOOO

"I must say that I had not anticipated you so easily deciding to throw over Viserys as you did, Doran." Said Magister Illyrio, taking one of the dainties that the other man's servant had offered to them, munching contentedly. Viserys had decided to leave Illyrio behind as the fleet set out since in an actual war Illyrio would have nothing to contribute and he had been dealing with a fever at the time.

"I have ruled Dorne for a very long time." Doran replied, smiling thinly. "I have become an incredibly good judge of character if I say so myself, and certain aspect of Viserys' personality make me believe that he would not be the best king for Westeros in the future. Besides, what you are offering to add to our cause is too good to ignore. Though I have to wonder at the ease with which you yourself are planning to turn on Viserys."

"I have had months to get to know Viserys, and you are absolutely correct, as King he would be a nightmare, Maegor the Cruel and his mad father all rolled into one. I had feared that from stories I'd heard of him before meeting him in person, but by the time I knew my fears to be justified, I had already backed him against Daenerys too often for her to trust me."

"Yes...Daenerys... What are your plans to deal with her?" Doran continued to smile, but his eyes were sharp as he looked at the other man. "She is making quite a name for herself."

The prince's spies had passed on some news from further north, in particular the fact that Rannar and Daenerys were allied and that the Starks had dealt the Lannisters a severe blow. The news that the Westerlands army had been utterly annihilated hadn't reached him yet, nor had the fact that the dragons had been used to aid that destruction. Nor, strangely enough, had the news that Rannar and Daenerys were married spread very far. Most of the rumors about the two of them concentrated on their deeds, and were very positive, which, when they got back to Illyrio, made him curse for lost opportunities. The marriage aspect would begin to spread from their time in Harroway, but that was weeks in the future.

Illyrio was also dismayed to learn that several of the Riverlands Houses that had been informing on events there to him to pass, ostensibly to pass on to Viserys, though that was impossible with him at sea, had stopped. That indicated that they had decided to throw their lot in with Daenerys rather than her brother, and of course Illyrio himself.

"I have decided to send a message to the Houses that are still passing on information to me to do something about her at the nearest opportunity. That is the best I can do at this far removed. But once Daenerys is dead, her dragons will go out of control, and the Stark/Tully army will face the brunt of their fury. I believe that is a case of two birds slain with one stone, yes?"

"Possibly if it succeeds." Doran said coldly. "And if it does not? If she, Viserys and this Aegon that you have suddenly pulled out from whole cloth meet in battle? What then?"

"I have had a message from Grif, as he calls himself. He says that the boy has proven himself a true dragon, and since I sent him one of the four eggs I found, there is only one way for him to have done that." Illyrio said smiling serenely. "If that is the case, then it will be two dragons against two, and judging by how huge the black one was before the fleet left, we'll have the advantage there. And the Iron Bank's aid allowed us to finally bring in a military force whose quality none here in Westeros can match. With them, and the troops you committed to fight under Viserys' banner, they will be able to win the throne for the renewed Blackfyre line, after which, Viserys can be... dealt with."

"Only if Aegon and Viserys can work together until then, or if Viserys remains alive until this 'aid' can arrive." Doran replied still coolly. "I'm hopeful for both, but if they cannot work together or Aegon faces his aunt alone, this may end up at in a greater disaster for Dorne than backing Viserys alone. And you, you may well face the Iron Throne's wrath as well, if they do not get the return you promised them on their investment."

"Why do you think I'm staying right here." Illyrio said laughing, though there was no humor in the noise. "The game is of thrones might be rewarding, but it is one best played at thrice removed less you pay for playing in blood."

OOOOOO

The fleet was about 40 strong. There were 25 transport ships, huge caravels that were built along the same lines as the massive grain transports that were used to feed Lys and Tyrosh. Each of these ships carried a little under five hundred men, along with horses and fodder for both. The others were war galleys, patrolling around their larger charges.

On the lead war galley stood a young man with shockingly blue hair. He wore full plate mail, and was working a whetstone over his sword as he stared out into the distance. To one side an older man with red hair fading to white stood, staring in the same direction, a thin, grim smile on his weathered face. "Westeros, at last!"

The younger man nodded, reaching down to rub the head of a dragon, whose scales were almost crimson in places. If someone had been in position to compare them, this dragon would have fallen somewhere below the size of Sunfyre, the smallest of Daenerys' two, and far smaller than Balerion. The dragon was currently tied down with heavy chains to the deck, but seemed peaceful enough, its stomach distended from a large meal.

Behind the dragon stood other men, none of them wearing the same armor but all wearing a tabard showing several golden skulls held up on a spear. All of them were also looking in the direction the young man was, some eagerly, some apprehensively, while the fleet continued on its way toward Blackwater Bay and Westeros.

Elsewhere on the same ocean, a lone longship sailed in somewhat the same direction, making its own, eerily silent way home.

OOOOOO

Viserys stared at the map of Dragonstone, nearly vibrating with fury. Nearby Arianne stood, looking at him worryingly while Nymeria and Elia lounged on cushions beside her, yet they too were watching Viserys closely. Though they would not voice it aloud both had come to the conclusion that the man was somewhat insane.

Since that initial disaster, he and his fleet had not made any headway in taking Dragonstone. Even with the threat of Balerion forcing the scorpions to remain aiming up toward the sky, the defenders were more than numerous enough to beat back any assault. Worse the very land of the island is against us. The other two assaults he had ordered had fared no better than the first. The army had lost another eight hundred men, and it would have been much worse if the lord commanders hadn't decided to pull out when the plans were obviously not working rather than continuing to throw good gold after bad.

The fleet had also lost another four ships. Luckily all four had been originally commandeered from Driftmark, but that was scant comfort. Viserys could feel time closing in on them counting down to when the pirate fleet and the Royal navy would be on them, while Dragonstone, his family's ancestral home, remained stubbornly just out of reach. Even the news that Lord Gargalen had been seen returning with his assault fleet could do nothing for his black mood.

"My King we've tried our best, but the natural defenses of Dragonstone work just as badly against attackers now as they ever did in your family's time." said Arianne soothingly. "We have to leave here quickly, it won't be long before the pirate fleet at least arrives. We can't afford to be pinned here by them at sea, where every advantage would be theirs."

"No dammit, I want Dragonstone! If I have to pile bodies against the side of its walls, I'll do it!" Viserys bellowed, sounding like a awful mix of a petulant child and a bloodthirsty sadist. Behind Arianne, the two Sands Snakes shared a surreptitious glance, both of them shivering a little.

Arianne however replied calmly, having long since been used become used to her husband's bloodthirstiness. "My Lord, we know that the assault on Duskendale worked, we have hurt the Baratheons and more importantly the Royal Navy in a way that it will take years for them to recover from,. While holding Driftmark and Dragonstone against them would be nice, it isn't necessary. Dragonstone alone is a symbol, an important one true, but only a symbol. We should retreat and assault them elsewhere, on Massey's Hook perhaps, or somewhere on Crab Claw Point. The Houses there were loyal to your family, and were among the last to submit to Robert during the war."

Of course those families were among the poorest of the Crownlands, and they hadn't supplied the Royal Army with many men even then, but it would give them a hold on the mainland, and some of those castles would make excellent defensive positions for them in the future. Driftmark alone could not supply the fleet or the army for very much longer despite House Velaryon's willingness to do so.

"And my Lord, we can return to take Dragonstone when Balerion is large enough and strong enough to carry you. A single Dragon Rider could take Dragonstone, where an entire army could not. What could be more symbolic than you, Viserys the Bold, returning to take House Targaryen's ancestral home single-handedly when your army had failed you?"

Her calm, soothing and somewhat ingratiating tone worked causing Viserys to smile slightly. Just then a knock on the door interrupted them. The captain of the galley and stuck his head inside. "Your highness, the attackers from Duskendale have arrived."

"We knew that already," said Viserys dismissively glaring at the man. "Why have you specifically disturbed me now?"

The man gulped in fear at Viserys' silky, yet dangerous tone. He could all too easily remember Viserys ordering Balerion to eat Ulwyck Uller with a similar tone of voice. That was not a sight any man was likely to forget anytime soon. "M-my Lord, they say they come with a prisoner who wishes to speak to you. The Usurper's Master of Coin, Littlefinger."

Viserys' eyes widened in shock, then he and Arianne exchanged a glance wondering what was going on in King's Landing that one of the small council would have been in Duskenale. Had Stannis already won and sent Petyr there for some reason, only for him to be captured? If so, we might be seeing the Royal fleet within a few days rather than another week, which meant Arianne's point about running out of time is even more pointed than normal. "Bring them aboard." he ordered.

Petyr Baelish was soon led in, apparently no worse the wear for his time as a prisoner. He came in with Lord Gargalen, who bowed his head grandly to his king. "Your highness, the attack was a complete success! We fired dozens of ships as they sat empty at anchor in the port, and took two merchant vessels as well, seizing their goods for the crown. However afterwards we came upon a single vessel making its way slowly out of Blackwater Bay. We decided to close with it then found Petyr Baelish aboard. He had several men with him sworn to his service, and after making certain that none of the people inside it had the plague, we took them aboard as prisoners. He has quite a tale to tell my lord."

"I'm certain he does." Viserys said coldly. "But why should I listen to one who willingly served the Usurper?"

"I willingly served Robert Baratheon because he was the only game in town Your Majesty," Petyr said bowing his head. "My contacts in Essos are nonexistent, so I could not put myself in to your service even if I wished to. And at the time, I would not have. I am ambitious my Lord, and it is that ambition and a head for numbers that allowed me to become Master of Coin."

"Bluntly spoken." Viserys said with a nod, though his eyes remained hard on the older man's face. "So why have you then fled the side of the Lannisters?"

"Because they are done as a power." Petyr replied, shrugging his shoulders. "As Master of Coin, I have, shall we say, numerous contacts in practically every corner of Westeros. The Lannisters and the Starks have been fighting in the Riverlands for the past few months, and the Lannisters have been beaten, badly. I don't know any of the details, but the Westerlands army is broken, and I believe that Tywin himself has been captured, and with him out of the way the Lannisters lack a leader that can strike fear in their opponents."

Petyr had gotten more information about what had been going on in the Riverlands when he met up with his ship near Rosby. He had been appalled by it, and also fearful to hear of the dragons being used in such a manner. That had made up his mind to seek out Viserys, wishing to ally himself with a force that could call on a similar weapon. The way Stark had outmaneuvered the Lannisters however was surprising, even if Petyr didn't understand how it had been accomplished.

Seeing the shock on Viserys' face, along with a certain amount of glee at the Lannisters, the great betrayers, getting what they deserved, Petyr went on. "As you probably know the Baratheon brothers are busy fighting one another, and neither has proven to be much of a leader in the past. One lacks wartime experience and any kind of legitimate claim on the throne, the other would be a disaster as king for even more reasons. Even more so, I would prefer to align myself with a family that has a proven track record of being able to rule Westeros rather than one who seemingly has only had the ability to take them ruin it."

"That sounds pleasant." Viserys said slowly, still getting over his shock at his sister and the Starks apparently capturing the man who, just as much as Robert, he blamed for his family's fall from power. After I kill her for betraying me I'll have to make certain at least that at least that much of her deeds is remembered fondly.

Even so his joy at that news didn't stop Viserys from thinking. "But what can you actually give me? While that news is new to me, I already have access to an information network, or will once we move on to the mainland. I have no need of a few more swordsmen, and I certainly wouldn't be willing to trust you with any position near my own coin." Viserys smirked before going on in a scathing tone. "I know all about the debt that you helped create for the Iron Throne. In fact, I could make some points for myself with the Iron Bank by handing them to you, or perhaps just your head on a silver platter."

"Perhaps, but I would say I can aid you above and beyond my network of contacts, and I am worth far more than any aid the Iron Bank would be willing to give you in return for my head." Petyr had spent years playing politics at the highest level, no death threat was going to faze him. "I have supporters in the Vale, lords which can add their forces to your own, adding at least another 7000 swords. And if aid in the future does not suffice, right now I can give you Dragonstone." Petyr said, smiling thinly.

OOOOOO

That evening a pigeon alighted on a small murder whole in the outer walls of Dragonstone. There an armsmen and a servant looked at one another, pulling back from their embrace. They noticed the small message and small vial the pigeon carried and gulped nervously. But after a moment the woman got out of bed, unmindful of her nakedness, and moved toward the bird.

OOOOOOO

Throughout human history far more castles have fallen through treachery than through brute force or even starvation via sieges. So it was with Dragonstone. The servants that were Petyr's agents Dragonstone poisoned the food of the garrison one morning. Much like the poison that had been used on the Starks to get them away from Bran so that the hired footpad sent after him could finish the job, it did not hit its victims right away.

This allowed the servant to poison the entire garrison almost, minus the commander of the garrison, the lady of the House, her daughter and their personal guard, a band of twenty men. Those men were the only ones not puking their guts out when the fleet raced into the port, disgorging the Army

They tried desperately to get their fellows up on the walls to fight the attackers, but none of the men poisoned could even stand without dealing with dizzy spells that quickly ended in vomiting, The twenty men acquitted themselves magnificently killing four times their number in the battle, yet by midday the Castle was in the hands of the Targaryens once more. Even better in some ways Viserys had also captured both Selyse, Stannis' wife, and Shireen, his daughter.

Viserys smiled faintly as he sat in the seat signifying Dragonstone, examining the Painted Table, running his hands over it fondly. He had fond memories of this place, and this room in particular. His eyes narrowed however as he looked at the two women who had just been ushered in.

It was obvious that the younger one had suffered from Greyscale at some point, her pockmarked features showed that clearly. Her features were plain underneath even that, but her eyes and expression looked pleasant enough. Compared to Arianne she was nothing but dirt plain, but that could be said for most women. Selyse on the other hand looked like she had been fed sour lemons her entire life and her face was like that of a hatchet, ugly and unfeeling.

She spat defiance at him even though she was being held by some of the Dorne armsmen. "The Azor Ahai will claim you, you bastard of a misbegotten dynasty! Westeros needs none of you any longer, the future is in the flames of the one true god, not that of dragons!"

"Really?" Viserys said smiling unpleasantly as he stood abruptly, moving past the woman gesturing the woman and her guards to follow, while Shireen and her guards remained. He trooped his way up to the top of the Stone Drum, smiling as he heard the booms that had marked his childhood while here. Eventually they came out onto the top of the keep and he gestured the woman's guards to release her. Since the woman's hands were bound in back of her she was no threat.

He dragged her forward until they stood on the edge of the roof, where he let go of her to point down at the men who were even now removing the dead bodies of the defenders. Most of them had surrendered without putting up a fight, but his army had days of anger and quite a lot of their own men to avenge so Viserys couldn't have stopped the slaughter even if he wanted to.

And he didn't want to, those men had raised their swords against the true King of Westeros, they deserved whatever they received. "As you can see, I don't think your 'true god' has done much to defend you yet. You stood up my army for a week or so, that's true, but what does that matter in the end?"

"It is your victory here that does not matter." Selyse growled back, still defiant even as she stood by the side of the parapet, glaring coldly at the men, who had been too weak to defend her and her daughter, her eyes gleaming with the madness of the fanatic. "Azor Ahai, the fist of R'hllor will come, and he will kill you all! He is the future, the only future that matters, when the one true god's touch is felt from one end of Westeros to the other and we all stand against the Great Other!"

Viserys laughed coldly. "So you would overthrow the Faith of the Seven for R'hllor? Well that is your business, I've never been a deep believer of that crap anyway. But the future, the future is not in your 'true god', or your husband. No, I believe the future is with my house, returned in triumph and with Balerion, the symbol of our power! Perhaps a closer inspection would convince you of that too!"

Without any warning he turned, grabbing her shoulder once more and flinging her off the balcony. Leaning over he shouted a Valyrian command at Balerion, who he had ridden from the ship to land below. "Catch and eat!"

Balerion looked up roaring and flapping into the air for a moment, catching the screaming woman as she fell down towards him. Her screaming ended abruptly when Balerion's jaws clamped around her body, biting it in two. He gulped down her legs in one bite before ripping at her upper body, tearing it into smaller chunks while he circled around the towers of Dragonstone, dripping blood and viscera as he went.

There were groans of disgust and fear from the men nearby, and they all hurried about their business moving away from the flying dragon as best they while Viserys made his way back down into the Stone Drum. Soon he was back in the map room, where he found his wife, the Two Sand Snakes and Petyr, who had joined the trio of women during their inspection of the castle.

Viserys motioned the man closer, ignoring Shireen's horrified stare, or the strangely pale faces of the trio of Dornish women. Evidently they had heard or seen Selyse's demise, but that was all to the good in Viserys' mind. Better they should know their fate if they worked against him in the future.

When Petyr stood near Viserys chair he spoke. "With no love lost between her and Stannis, the Florent woman was no use to me." Viserys said, once more staring at the map of Westeros lovingly. His, all his by right, and soon by strength of arms. "The daughter, are you certain that Stannis is fond of her?"

"Somewhat, as much as such a man is fond of anyone." Petyr said, hiding his internal thoughts with the ease of a lifetime of training. Have I simply traded one sadist for another?

Viserys nodded. "Good, we'll transfer her to one of the ships immediately. I'll leave a strong force here to hold Dragonstone, as well as several dozen of our Navy ships, they'll try to launch a surprise assault on whatever force is sent to recapture Dragonstone. But the main transport ships, they and a small escort will leave in a few days. I believe however that you had suggestions on where else we could go?"

Viserys suddenly chuckled, like a little boy with a new toy he wanted to show off gesturing at the giant painted map all around him. "Where exactly would you advise that we go?"

OOOOOO

The day after Beric and his followers join the northerners Daven finally woke up from having been knocked senseless during the battle. "Ughh...What hit me?"

"That'd be my fist." said a gruff voice nearby.

Daven tried to raise one of his hands up to massage his face, only to hear faint clinking noises, and then felt both hands come up rather than one. Groggily opening his eyes Daven looked around then up at where Greatjon was riding a horse next to the prisoners on their own horses, though the prisoners were strapped to their saddles.

At the older man's grim smile Daven's memory of the battle came back to him and he shook his head with her a low moan, closing his eyes as pain flared in his head again. After a moment he looked up again, shaking his head very slightly so as not to dislodge anything permanent. "Next time use a hammer, it would be less painful!" He said tartly, but with a hint of his normal humor.

Greatjon guffawed, and several others nearby did as well with Rama and Jon coming up on the prisoners other side. "You've been out for a few days but having taken a giant's fist to the head that's understandable." Greatjon smirked unrepentantly, and Rama rolled his eyes before staring back at Daven. "Your father has been awake for some time, and gave us your name. I'll warn you the same way I did the others. You are alive right now at my sufferance, do not try to escape and he won't be killed until you can stand trial for your deeds."

"For 'my deeds'?" Daven asked sarcastically. "What exactly does that mean?"

"So long as you didn't take part in the rape and murder of any smallfolk here in the Riverlands you'll be allowed to live." Rama said bluntly, coldly staring into Daven's eyes. The slightly older man looked away after a moment and Rama continued. "I won't fault you or your father or the other Lannisters for your loyalty to Tywin, though I will say it has cost your family greatly. Whatever all else happens, the Lannister's time as Lord Paramount of the Westerlands is done."

Daven wasn't the only Lannister to wince at that, but it was his father who replied. "You say that as if you've won boy, you might have beaten us, yes, but that's not the same thing as beating our family! The Lannisters have deep pockets, we can raise an army three times the one you fought here quicker than you think, so long as Casterly Keep is ours we remain the strongest lords in the Westerlands, and no army has ever taken the Rock!"

Rama and Jon exchanged amused glance and Jon spoke up first. "Our army's done quite a few things that no one else has ever done before, and the Wolfsworn tend to do such things at least once every week." "Yes your family might have deep pockets, fat lot of good it would do them. What kind of army could you raise with it? An army of smallfolk levies, or armies of mercenaries from Essos? Please, you'd have to raise a truly monstrous army to be any real threat against ours."

"The Westerlands will be able to eventually make up the numbers they've lost if all your remaining lords work together to do it, but that would be months in the future and if your brother doesn't capitulate, I'll be sending raiding forces into the Westerlands to burn every keep they can find." Ranma said looking over at Tywin. "Of which I have no doubt there are several, considering how we just smashed the greater majority of the Westerlands ready military strength."

Ranma went on before any of the Lannisters could reply his eyes narrowing dangerously and if in not at all humorous smirk on his face. "As for The Rock, I wouldn't be trying to take it Stafford, I would try to raze it to the ground. I have no doubt your spies told you what happened to the Twins, your keep would actually be easier to destroy in some ways."

All of the Lannisters shivered at that, falling silent for a moment before Daven spoke up again. "What will our fate be if we are acquitted of any wrongdoing outside of battle?"

"I'll probably keep a few of you as prisoners to Kevan Lannister's good conduct." Ranma said with a shrug. "His sons for example." He rolled his eyes at the youngest Lannister there, who was glaring at him hatefully. "They might not be the brightest, but I assume he cares for them anyway. As for you others, I'll either keep you as well or send you up to take the black or join Tyrion Brightwall and his knightly order."

"Tyrion Brightwall?" Daven said, and it was not his only voice raised in surprise.

"Oh yes," Ranma laughed coldly, staring at Tywin, whose face was actually showing a real emotion now, that of astonishment. "You know your son was in the North when your daughter tried to move against my father and began this war? Yet since we captured you, you haven't asked us one question about him. I'd heard that you and Tyrion didn't have the best of relationships, and that he didn't seem to care one whit about you or most of your family, but even so."

Under Tywin's fulminating stare Ranma laughed. "We offered Tyrion a choice, immediate imprisonment until this war was over, to take the Black, or to be named Lord Commander of a new knightly order we commissioned, whose job will be to defend the Wall. He'd been doing excellent work up there on renovating and rebuilding the siege engines on the Wall and even had developed some method of communication to pass signals down its length from one end to the other, so we owed him that choice."

Jon nodded agreement, though he hadn't been part of that decision. His own thoughts turned to what could be happening up north like Ranma's had done several times since they left the Neck, while Tywin simply glared back at Ranma.

"Tyrion decided to take up our offer, and with that offer take up a new name." Ranma restrained himself from commenting on the fact that it was that decision that might allow Tyrion to become the sole main-line Lannister alive after this war was over. He was not a cruel man, though that thought came closer to the surface than it would normally have.

Talking to the smallfolk about the depredations they had been forced to endure since Tywin had led his army into the Riverlands had hardened his opinion of the man. He wasn't a monster by any means, he didn't enjoy raping or looting or pillaging, he just didn't care if those things happened while he was dealing with other problems. He was cold and unfeeling, uncaring of anyone besides his own family, a deadly combination to anyone who crossed him as had been proven time and time again since he had taken over from his father.

"So the dwarf shows he really doesn't have any honor." said Stafford laughing coldly. "The Wall is too good for him."

"So you'd choose death instead of the Black?" Jon asked sarcastically. "We said he was head of the knightly order, he'll hold land in the Gift and the New Gift after the war to come. If he survives it."

"What are you talking about? The King Beyond the Wall isn't that deadly a threat since you northerners reinforced the Wall. What other war are you talking about?" Daven said looking at the northern men, while Tywin stared off into the distance his face cold and grim unwilling to be drawn further on the subject of his son or their lack of a relationship, which apparently had driven him from the family entirely.

Ranma and Jon looked at one another then shook their heads in unison before Ranma replied. "You wouldn't believe us if we told you."

OOOOOO

While Ranma and Jon were making their way to Raventree Hall, the two Baratheon brothers and their armies were at last facing one another further south. The rains had been especially bad, slowing Stannis' army on its march somewhat, though this had simply allowed Melisandre to catch up to them, and now the two armies were facing one another across relatively open ground.

Renly had brought over two-thirds of his army together to face his brother, outnumbering Stannis' army by a large margin but no crushing one considering Stannis had brought several Stormlands lords under his sway, and Renly's need to retain forces around the city. The numbers were around 42,000 to 16,000 or so according to some of the scouts. This large a disparity in their numbers gave Renly and most of his allied lords a sense of superiority, though Randyll was quick to point out that Stannis was a cagy and dangerous foe regardless of the size of his army.

Renly had ordered a small pavilion set up well out of bow range from his own army towards the direction Stannis was coming from. Now he made his way forward along with Mace Tyrell, Randyll Tarly, Lord Fell and Lord Staedmon to the pavilion guarded by Loras and Ser Guyard Morrigen, the Lord Commander and the green of his Rainbow Guard.

Across from them Stannis made his own way forward under a flag of parlay. He was accompanied by Lord Errol, Lord Buckler, Justin Massey, Davos Seaworth, Melisandre and two of the Flame Guard who took up station across from their far more colorful fellows. The two Flame Guards openly sneered at the Rainbow Guard and their colored armor, while Loras and Guyard stared askance at the mark of the flaming heart on their shoulders, not recognizing it offhand.

Renly sat in his chair leaning back as if at ease, one leg on the table for a moment. He gestured his brother into a seat opposite him, then stared at the Lords with his brother. "Interesting brother, I recognize the colors of your commanders here, but not the men save Lord Buckler. I'd heard rumors how Lady Errol had died, in strangely unusual circumstances. How... convenient for you. And Lord Buckler. Tell me, did I ever do anything to anger you my Lord? Why have you risen in rebellion against your lawful Lord Paramount?"

Both Lords stiffened in anger though Stannis answered before either could. "These are men who need to be spoken as such by their lord, brother. If you were so wishful to act like a craven yet still retain some measure of dignity you should have retreated to the Stormlands instead of the Reach. You should have spoken to these Lords face to face rather than by raven as if they were so many minor nobles that you could simply call up upon command."

"You would know all about that wouldn't you brother, treating other people as lesser than you!" Renly replied sharply. "You've done that your entire life to everyone! Always thinking yourself so clever, so smart and so righteous, looking down your nose at everyone who isn't as stern or as cold as you. Tell me, did that extend to your wife as well? Did she find you as frigid in bed as you are in the rest of your dealings with other people?"

"Better to be too stern than too vainglorious. What have you accomplished in the last six months with this majestic army Renly? Nothing! Indeed what have you done your entire life Renly? What did you do as Master of Law? Nothing! And when it came to it, instead of supporting the Hand against the treason of the Lannisters you fled like a coward! Even now with a massive army behind you, you haven't accomplished anything! If you had marched faster you could have gotten here before the Lannisters were reinforced. If you had an ounce of courage, you could have taken the city by storm, and the plague infesting it would never have happened."

"And what have you accomplished in that same time? Despite your aspirations, you have only managed to convince a handful of Houses to follow you. Where does most of your manpower come from? The dregs of the fleet, foreign pirates and other foreign influences. And yes, I served as Master of Law, on a corrupt council where I could get nothing done, even after Eddard became Hand. What would you know of ruling, when you were given Dragonstone, a island as barren as your marriage?"

Stannis glared at him, while Mace and the Stormlands lords with him smirked a little. But Ser Seaworth spoke up before Stannis could again, standing forward and gesturing to both Baratheons with his hands, palms open in token of peace. "My lords, this is a peace parlay! I entreat you both to remember the blood you share and speak with such in mind."

"And who are you to speak to us so?" said Mace angrily from where he stood behind Renly's chair. "Some jumped up little man who was raised to be a knight because of a single act of courage?" Mace had always resented the Onion Knight, thinking that his act of running the blockade of his siege on Storm's End had allowed Stannis to survive until the Northern army arrived with news of what had happened in King's Landing.

"Of course you would know nothing of that!" Stannis growled at him in defense of his man. "Neither courage nor intelligence is something anyone has ever mentioned in conjunction with you Lord Tyrell. But Ser Seaworth is correct," he said pulling up a chair abruptly and sitting down across from his brother. "We are here to parlay. Given the fact that we both know Joffrey is illegitimate, as eldest I am Robert the First's heir, both by law and custom. Moreover I am the most experienced between us, I have commanded many a battle. I have also been Lord of Dragonstone and actually acted as such rather than leaving it to my castellan as you have Storm's End."

Stannis couldn't stop himself from getting that blow in, but it seemed to flow off Renly like water off a duck's back so he continued quickly. "I am willing to overlook the fact that you have risen against me, and will provide sworn amnesties for all that you and the lords allied with you have done since you did so if you agree to give up your false claim on the throne and stand aside so that I can deal with the plague in King's Landing."

"You have a plan to do that?" Lord Tarly asked quickly, before Renly could reply.

"I do. It is not pleasant, and it is harsh. But it will work and it will stop the plague from spreading. That is the most important thing." Stannis replied honestly.

Lord Randyll's eyes narrowed as he registered the fact that Stannis wasn't saying he would combat the plague, simply stop the spread of it. He didn't understand what he could have planned however, and stepped backwards once more, his eyes still narrowed thoughtfully.

His gaze flicked over to where Melisandre stood. She had been silent so far but she was staring at all of the lords arrayed with Renly in such a way that some of them were actually beginning to feel uncomfortable. For all that she was a woman something about those eyes told them all she was more than able and willing to kill them all if need be. It was very disconcerting, especially when added to the rumors about her powers.

For his part however Renly had concentrated on the rest of what Stannis had said. "Isn't that nice." he said smiling in a way that showed all of his teeth. "You would give out amnesties? That is droll brother when you have an army barely half the size of the forces I have here, let alone spread out elsewhere around the city!"

"The fact that you were only able to gain the support of so few lords should tell you something brother, or are you too thick to realize that? Robert was right to pass you over for Lord Paramount of the Stormlands, you would have ruined it with your self-righteous and stubborn ways! All the world knows that Robert declared me his heir as Lord Paramount, which means I am the heir to the throne as well."

"So you would throw over all precedent and law to declare yourself his heir?" Stannis asked coldly. "What will the world come to if second or third sons can contend for lordships? Pure anarchy would result, and it would devolve not to the one who has the best claim, but the most popularity, which does not equal being the best for the job! We want stability, not further chaos, and even if you were able to make your case because of Robert's favoring you so often, we would still descend into chaos when you don't produce an heir. I note you haven't even married the Tyrell girl, you were unable to even look at her with any favor?" As Randyll and Mace both growled angrily at that, Stannis went on. "Your daughter Tyrell will remain a maid her entire life if she is forced to wed Renly."

"Exactly, Robert favored me, all the realms know it, and he showed it by naming me Lord Paramount over you, which means I would be his heir by his choice, which overrides precedent." Renly replied coolly. "And I vowed to marry Margaery the moment I sat on the Iron Throne, not a moment before. It was a wrench, but I will keep my word in that. Unlike Robert, I prefer not to leave bastards all over. Besides, what have you produced in your marriage? Nothing but a single, rather ugly and sickly girl. How would you secure the line of succession with that?"

Renly went on after a moment, shaking his head. "Practically everyone who meets you knows that you are a good general, but a king needs more than skill on the battlefield. He needs an understanding of diplomacy, the ability to understand his fellow man's point of view, a certain amount of empathy in other words, something that you lack!" Renly smirked cocking his head. "If you had those qualities, perhaps you would've been able to rally the Starks to your cause, which you should have been able to do given the fact that Eddard would probably have backed you, but as it is, you stand alone."

"Not alone." Melisandre said suddenly, her gaze now locked on Renly as if they were scorpions lining up on a ship. "The Azor Ahai never stands alone."

"And now we come to the final, and perhaps creates mark against you, brother!" Renly said triumphantly, pointing at Melisandre. "Not only do you lack allies elsewhere, but you gave over your oaths as a follower of the Seven for this foreign whore? Was that the only way you were able to discover any warmth in your bedside brother, by bringing a flame worshiper into it?"

Stannis growled angrily, covering up his shock at his younger brother's accurate assault there. But Melisandre responded before he could. "Your brother is the Azor Ahai, the lord who will lead humanity against the Great Other gathering power in the north. Everything else is trivial in comparison! When winter comes and the Great Others forces march it will be the Azor Ahai who stands against them. Standing against him in turn means you are an enemy of all life."

The words were strange and disturbing, but Melisandre spoke them with such conviction and power that more than one listener actually shivered for a moment. It was as if they could feel the chill of winter already coming upon them for a moment.

For his part however Renly was immune. He shook his head, contempt written plain on his face. "I do not know how you pulled the wool over my brothers eyes Witch, but you will not do the same to me. This 'Great Other' is nothing to concern us here in the south. Magic has long been declining, this is merely a seasonal resurgence as it were. Winter will come, then it will go as it normally, does a year or two at best. Your words are nothing, simply a cover for your own ambitions."

The last winter had occurred during the Greyjoy Rebellion, fourteen years ago. Renly wasn't the only one there who could barely remember it, and that winter had been short, less than a year long, and the last winter before that hadn't even reached past the next for more than a few months in the Riverlands. The history of the Long Night had long been forgotten in the South. And his contempt for magic was equally understandable, since the Faith of the Seven had no place for it save as a force of evil.

With a final shake of his head, Renly turned back to Stannis. "I am Robert's chosen heir brother. Cease this folly, and I will forgive you and the lords who have followed you, giving you royal pardons, even the Witch. More, I will name you my Hand and place you in command of the army when we have to deal with the Ironborn and the Lannisters. That is the best offer you're going to get."

Stannis stood up abruptly. "This talk is going nowhere. As your older brother, I am giving you this one chance lay down your arms, surrender yourself and you and your followers will be given amnesty. But if you do not, you will die, and I will break your army."

"If you think you can brother then we will meet you on the battlefield." Renly growled, letting his self-control slip for a moment as he too stood up.

The two groups glared at one another, before Stannis turned without another word leaving the pavilion. Melisandre was last to go staring at Renly coldly. "That Azor Ahai has spoken, look to your soul Renly Baratheon." Renly sneered at her, and she turned, leaving with a flutter of her red dress heading out into the rain.

OOOOOO

Plague. The news had percolated into the collective mind of King's Landing barely a week ago. Bodies had begun to turn up not in ones and twos but in dozens, all of them with the same symptoms, a day or more of coughing followed by coughing up their lungs, blood on their mouths before their hearts and lungs simply gave up unable to keep the body going. And the smallfolk had panicked. Wildfire burned here and there in the city, huge conflagrations spreading everywhere and only burning out slowly when they ran out of fuel. Yet even that couldn't keep the rioters from spreading, and with them came the plague into new portions of the city. Soon enough even the wildfire of the alchemists ran out and with it the last measure of control the royal family had on the city.

Where there had been a few thousands here and there rioting, now the city was boiling, hundreds of thousands trying to get away trying to get out of the city or out off the port. Yet the ships of Saan's fleet had heard about the plague as well thanks to Varys and every ship out there was unwilling to let any other ship close to them. Dozens of ships were sunk and burned at the mouth of the Blackwater and not one of them escaped.

The men on the cities wall defended the towers that led up to the wall, but they quickly lost the trebuchets and every other portion of the city that they had previously controlled, losing hundreds of men to the rioters. Here and there along the wall a tower was lost, and the city's population quickly tried to escape over the wall many dozens falling to their deaths as their makeshift rope or ladders gave way under their weight. But the moment they landed the Stormlands/Reach army took them under bow fire, making certain to stay well away from the bodies. There was no escape from the city that way. Even the rubble around the seven gates had been pushed aside here and there, and it was all the men the guard towers could do to keep control of them.

King's Landing was now a hellhole beyond anything Lord Serret had ever imagined as thousands died every day. Rupert had known this might occur, and had pulled the High Septon in earlier, as well as over two thousand more guardsmen for the Red Keep and some more foodstuffs as well. They were still being forced to slaughter the food animals faster than he would've liked, but he had rather grimly retained several hundred horses in the stables of the keep.

So far there hadn't been any cases of plague inside the keep thanks to the actions he and the Queen had taken before the plague had spread very far. But Rupert knew it was just a matter of time, and he was busy thinking of ways out of the city for the Royal family, a token guard force and himself

The city is lost. That thought was a bitter one, but no less true for all of that. We did everything we could, both to defend the city and try to control the spread of the plague, but in the end we just didn't have enough men to pull it off! Now King's Landing is lost, not just to us, but to everyone. No one is going to be brave enough to step foot in this place until the plague has run its course. The largest city of Westeros, the home of its best artisans, its most magnificent works, the Red Keep and all of its history and knowledge. All of it, slowly turning into a mausoleum. But I might still be able to do my duty to my queen... oh and her brat too.

Joffrey had not impressed Rupert from the first, and his reaction to Petyr's betrayal and flight had solidified Rupert's low opinion of him. Joffrey refused to see why Edmure's torture and murder was a horrifying stain on House Lannister's honor, and refused to consider the proof that pointed to Baelish as the Vile one. If he could show some more of his mother's intelligence rather than looks he might amount to something but as it is... Rupert sighed. That didn't even consider the fact that he didn't have any outward reaction to seeing Edmure's mutilated body. That showed a disturbing lack of feeling, even for an enemy.

Just then, one of his guards rushed in. "My Lord, the watcher on the Hand's Tower says they've spotted another army coming up behind the besiegers. It's coming from the Northwest."

Lord Serret frowned thoughtfully then nodded his head, thanked the man calmly and sent them off to prepare the defenders. He then raced down the staircase himself, looking for the queen and her brother. I think this might just be the opportunity I was waiting for.

About twenty minutes after Rupert had been warned about the second army the remaining small council met in Cersei's drawing room. "We have an opportunity here." Rupert said earnestly after informing them of Stannis' arrival. My queen, it's still your opinion that the two Baratheon brothers will not reach an agreement?"

"Yes, as I've said all along" Cersei said definitively. "Stannis has no give in him at all, he does not care about other people's positions, he'll listen to others opinions, but rarely. And he has always looked down on Renly simply because he's untried in war, and is a bit of a fop. And he resented the way he was cast aside by Robert, who favored Renly in practically every way possible. Renly in turn looks down on Stannis because he is a cold fish and bases his claim on the throne on Robert's favoritism. It is a vicious circle, that Robert set in motion from the moment he took the throne."

Rupert nodded, willing to take Cersei's word on this. He had never met either Baratheon brother, so had no personal knowledge to base their actions on. "In that case, we definitely have a opportunity here. Renly weakened the cordon around the city, emptying some and drawing down the number of men he has in some of their small forts."

He gestured to one of his aides, who flattened out a makeshift map of the defenses set up around the city, the small forts built here and there along with markers denoting which house was in charge of which fort. "I think we definitely have a chance." he said motioning to a few of the symbols, signifying the forts north of the city, one on the road to Rosby and the other halfway between that one and another holding position on the Kingsroad. "Three minor houses hold this fort together: Hunt, Inchfield and Redding. Command by committee never works, they won't be a formed force, especially if they can see the battle going on elsewhere, or at the very least can hear it.

"Even better for our purposes, House Florent holds the fort on the road to Rosby. I doubt they're very enthusiastic supporters of Renly's cause, given how Stannis married into their family. And I doubt any of the men they could tap for command of their field army has any real experience."

Unlike the two Baratheons, Rupert had met Lord Alester Florent, and had a very low opinion about the man's competence. "It might be his son, who from what I remember is untried in anything but the joust. Once the two stags lock horns, we can use various means to get our men out of the city and into the slums along the bay, then sortie out against House Florent here.

"Where would we go after that?" Cersei asked. "Varys told us weeks ago that Stannis had destroyed Stokeworth, and Rosby was destroyed even before that."

That might have caused trouble with the men those Houses sent to aid King's Landing, nearly their full military might.

But Rupert had acted ruthlessly, rotating them down into the city to aid the Gold Cloaks in trying to keep order before the news became general. They were stuck there, caught between the riots of the smallfolk about food and the outer wall's keeps. It had cost the defenders badly, but their sacrifice (in the truest sense of the word) had also robbed many of the riots of their strength before they could reach the outer walls. When the survivors rejoined their fellows, they were a beaten force, leaderless and easily added to the command of other lords.

"We could make first for Sow's Horn. It might not be the best castle but it will do for an initial destination, then we can take the Kingsroad up into the Riverlands and hope to find your father and his army there."

"You mean the same army that is retreating with its tail between its legs?" Joffrey said contemptuously. "If grandfather was as good a general as everyone said he was, he would've smashed the Starks already and come to our rescue here! Then we wouldn't have to run like craven cowards! I can't believe we're even talking about this! I am King, I will not retreat from my own capital!"

Rupert's jaw clenched and he was about to respond hotly when Cersei did it for him. "Enough of that." she said sharply looking at her son, who looked startled at her actually talking back to him like that. "Your grandfather is doing his best, and even the best of generals is beaten at times. Besides, he might have underestimated Ranma at first, but now that he has a true measure of Ranma's abilities, he will take them into account. And we are not so much running away from our physical opponents as we are fleeing the plague. The plague will not care if you are King my son, the plague will kill us all eventually."

Over the weeks since the plague had begun Cersei had become increasingly paranoid about becoming sick. She took baths every few hours, stayed away from practically everyone but her family, and ordered two servants tossed out of the keep after she had seen them coughing. And the lack of good food was finally having a detrimental effect on her health. Where before she had simply slimmed down, losing the weight she had put on in drink and rich foods over the years, now she looked gaunt and wan.

From where he was sitting next to Cersei as the Lord commander of the Kingsguard, Jaime looked at his sister worriedly. The two of them had several nights together before the siege began, but ever since Cersei had thrown herself into anything she could to keep the Red Keep going and watching over her son. And truth be told Jaime had lost the stomach for such activities as well. Now though, he was becoming more concerned about her health with every passing day.

Joffrey scowled, but knew he couldn't argue with his mother's logic. Like Cersei, he truly was frightened of the plague, which was why he had forcibly controlled his baser urges lately. Even so, four of the servants had disappeared in the days after he had finished with Edmure. But since Petyr had been blamed for the so-called depredations of the Vile One, and noting the outrage and loathing in his mother and the Hand, he had been forced to stop. Joffrey really didn't understand why anyone cared one way or another about his toys, they were all smallfolk after all and smallfolk were like weeds: they always cropped up again.

By this point Rupert had calmed down a little and nodded. "The Queen Regent is correct, and though we have all done our best to keep the Red Keep free from plague, it is only a matter of time. It would only take one rat who had bitten into a dead body to be missed by the cats, and suddenly we'll be dealing with the outbreak in here. Even setting aside the pandemic, our supply situation is getting grim. If we will decide to make a run for it, we need to do so now, before we're forced to start butchering our horses for food."

"Very well, I suppose that retreating to join grandfather in the field makes some sense given the outbreak. It's galling, but I can deal with it. "

For his part Varys simply smiled thinly. While he would be perfectly willing to go with the rest of the small council in this escape from the city wishing to get away from the outbreak as much as anyone would, he knew that their plan to find Tywin and his army would fail. He had gotten two disjointed reports about the dragons being sighted on the southern side of the Red Fork, and of Harroway falling before another message came in which said Tywin's army had been utterly demolished, though it didn't go into much detail.

No, the Lannister cause is finished, I've done my part as well as I may here. The question then becomes, should I offer my services to Renly, to the Starks, or try to make my way to Dragonstone, where my lone remaining agent on Driftmark reports a dragon circling? Or make my way elsewhere to await the arrival of mine and Illyrio's true scorpion bolt? Regardless, leaving the city at this point is an excellent idea. I certainly don't want to remain anywhere near Stannis' reach.

Of course no one else knew anything about Varys' inner thoughts, and Joffrey continued to speak. "Yet what is your full plan Lord Hand? I doubt we can get our entire defensive force out of the city without the smallfolk immediately trying to break out in droves behind us. And even if we could, many of them might be contaminated by the plague?"

He looked over at Pyrcelle who nodded his head wearily. Of them all, he had been the one who had been most involved with attempting to combat the spread of the plague, and that, coupled with his age, had made the siege conditions hit him all the harder. "Yes. It's been difficult for me to get accurate numbers with the Red Keep now in total lockdown, but my servant's are still able to get occasional messenger pigeons to me. Their best estimate is at least half of the wall garrison is showing signs of the plague. I think we could take a chance on a third of them, the men of House Harte and Edgerton men for the most part, situated on the wall facing the Lion's Gate at present."

"Hmm... we might be able to do something there, if we can move them along the wall and switch them with the men now holding the northern area of the wall. Can we do that without risking them becoming sick?"

Pyrcelle frowned. "From what I was able to find out before being locked in the Red Keep, the disease spreads through one person coughing on another, direct physical contact, exchange of fluids and perhaps can linger in things like bedding and clothes. If we do that and then immediately send them over the wall after ordering them to not touch anything in the barracks there, and not to let any of the men touch them in turn, we might be able to. But I don't think we should chance it for the entire group. A smaller number of men might be able to get away with it."

"We will have to chance it with the Edgerton men, not the Harte men then." Rupert mused aloud. Before Joffrey could say anything about leaving one of his favorite lords behind, Rupert went on answering his questions. "Harte's seat is northwest of the city, and isn't a good enough defensive position to let us hold up there if the winner between the battling stags comes after us there. Edgerton on the other hand has a castle near the Riverlands border, and we might be able to stop there before moving on. Now, here is what I propose..."

OOOOOO

That evening Renly and many of his lords began to celebrate as if they had already won the battle. All of them were confident that their numerical superiority, coupled with the forts that backed their current position, plus the ones built across the Blackwater that protected their left flank, would see them through to victory. Mace and several of his friends were there, as well as every young Lord or heir, though Randyll was not, nor were a few other of the more experienced lords.

But those weren't the only lords missing. If anyone had bothered to look around they would have seen that Lord Dunn, Lord Norcross, Uffering and several others were missing. And if someone thought about it, they would have realized that the missing lords and knights were all those who had lands on the Mander or near it. But seeing as most of those lords were not among the young men that Renly had made friends with, or the most influential, no one did.

Many of the Rainbow Guard were present ostensibly on guard but not really, simply taking part in the festivities. Loras was there as their commander, though he alone amongst those present was not in a festive mood. He stood quietly in one corner of the massive tent getting quietly drunk. Loras was used to being the center of attention, or at least standing to one side of said center of attention. Since his injuries he had found himself on the outside looking in, and he did not like the experience.

I have to confront him tonight, he thought to himself sadly. There's a battle going on tomorrow, we could both die and I will not go into that battle with this looming over my head! Loras and Renly had not slept together since Loras is the initial confrontation of him. He's always coming up with excuses to get away, but not this time! He watched Renly from his corner of the tent, noticing suddenly how he and Emmon Cuy seemed to be friendlier than he had noticed in the past. Could it be...?

An interminable time later, Renly stood up from his chair, weaving in place for a moment as if falling down drunk before making his excuses to the partygoers. Mace and the others all ribbed him good-naturedly but didn't stop Renly as he left the tent. He was followed by Emmon ostensibly in his role as the Rainbow Guard on duty at present, while the other man who should have been on duty, Bryce Caron, was waved back to where he was speaking to his bastard brother, Rolland Storm.

Loras watched them go with narrowed eyes then waited several moments before following them out, unnoticed by any of the others, even his father who was looking quite tipsy himself by that point. He followed them towards Renly's tent, which was set up about fifty feet away from the command tent so that people could come and go from the command tent without waking Renly up. But rather than barge in, Loras decided to go towards the back of the tent and wait there for a time to see if he could find out if his new worries were justified. They were.

"You know we shouldn't be doing this." Murmured Emmon's voice, slightly deeper and less musical than Renly's. "If word gets out, house Tyrell and all of my fellow Reach lords will turn on us both. You're supposed to be marrying Margaery after all.

"And I will do my duty with her when the time comes," said Renly, then there was a sound that might have been kissing for a moment and Loras began to see red. A moment the sound stopped and Renly's voice went on, slightly deeper than normal. "Until then, I can take joy in own personal preferences. Are you complaining?"

By that point Loras had heard enough. Swiftly making his way around the tent he got barged in growling angrily. "So this is what your 'love' is worth?"

Emmon and Renly had been in the middle of the tent, their arms around one another though Emmon was still wearing his armor. His sword however was leaning against one of the tent's outer poles, which Emmon now suddenly regretted. The two of them sprang apart as Loras entered. Renly sputtered for a moment, caught red-handed. "Loras, I, wait, it's not what you..."

"It's precisely what I think!" Loras replied the volume of his voice rising with each word. He stalked forward one hand thrusting out hard to put Emmon on his rear for a moment when he tried to step between Loras and Renly. Then Loras was facing Renly from barely a foot away, staring into that handsome, once-loved face angrily. "Is this why you haven't made time for me, you were making time for someone else!? Did you use the same words you did with me when I was your squire to lure Emmon into your bed, or were you honest with him, saying you would cast him aside the moment he wasn't pretty enough for you any longer!?"

"Keep your voice down Seven damnit!" Renly said, motioning with his hands for Loras to calm down. "I know this looks bad, but both of us were drunk, you can't hold..."

"I can certainly hold it against you!" Loras interrupted him hotly, one hand on his sword hilt as he continue to glare at Renly.

To one side Emmon got to his feet slowly, backing away from the confrontation and making for his own sword just in case.

Loras noticed this and stepped backwards slightly to keep both of them in his line of sight, though he was still glaring angrily at Renly. "I have half a mind to go to my father right now and tell him precisely what your marriage agreement with our family is worth! Perhaps Stannis was right to suggest you wouldn't be able to perform with my sister, or would you simply turn her around, cover her head with a pillow and pretend she was a boy, you fucking bastard?!"

"No! Loras I was drunk! This was the first time, with the battle looming I was, I just needed to..." Renly stuttered, trying to think of words that would calm Loras down, but knowing that this really did look very bad.

However Renly was saved just then by something completely unexpected. With the sound of tearing silk the back flap of the tent was suddenly cut asunder, and a creature of shadow stepped in. Thinner and taller than a normal man, it still looked noticeably human-like, it even had facial features though none of the young men present could recognize them. In one hand it held a blade of deepest shadow, yet it was still a sword for all of that. It's eyes glowed slightly, and they seemed to lock on Renly.

All three of the young men broke off from their confrontation staring at the creature arrange astonishment. Loras drew his blade from its sheath, holding the sword at the ready while Emmon did same as Renly staggered back towards his own, set beside his cot. "What, what is it?"

"Those rumors of the Red Witch's powers might have been more accurate than we thought." Loras said tightly, stepping forward to meet the creature. "Seven Banish you!" He shouted, bringing his sword up and about in a quick, flashing arc.

The shadow thing blocked his blade, reaching out with a clawed hand that nearly caught Loras in the face, forcing him to dodge back. To one side Emmon raced forward, his sword flashing out. The blade impacted the shadow creature on his shoulder.

For a moment there seemed to be some resistance there. The limb fell to the creature's side, not responding from the shoulder down as a human's would struck in the same manner. But in response the creature's foot flashed out, catching Emmon in the chest with a kick that doubled him over, cracking his armor and the ribs underneath.

Emmon let go of his sword for a moment in agony and it fell to the ground, falling completely through the shadow monster. With that impediment gone its arm seemed to work once more. Still blocking Loras' continued assault with its own blade it pushed him back. The shadow creature then stopped directly next to the downed Emmon, and punched down with its offhand. There was a sound of tearing metal, and Emmon Cuy died as a thing punched through his back plate and deep into his back, severing his spine before finding his heart and crushing it. "GAHHHHhhhh....."

By this time Renly had found his own sword and pulled it out, leaping forward to join Loras in battling the creature. "To arms, Seven damn it!"

Loras didn't even spare him a glance simply yelling out. "Be careful, this things much stronger than it looks, don't try to block it unless you absolutely have to, just redirect or dodge!"

Despite their recent estrangement the two of them had practiced together for years and worked well together. Yet their blades simply couldn't do any damage to the creature, every time one of them got through its defenses, their blades would impact its body, thrusting or slashing. Yet nothing seems to do any permanent damage. The moment their blades left his body it would regain full function.

The noise of combat however had spread, and more of the Rainbow Guard came running from the party still going on, even Randyll and the others who had retired for the night were riled by the ongoing clamor. Robar was the first to arrive, having just left the command tent himself as the noise began. He raced towards Renly's tent, pausing outside the tent for a moment to stare down at his sword in astonishment. The blade had been a gift from his father, one of several ancestral longswords that their family-owned. But since Bronze Yohn favored greatswords, he didn't really have much use for the others in their collection. But this sword and many of the others the family-owned had some of the same runes that were cut into Yohn's armor, which supposedly kept him from injury.

Robar had long been skeptical about that claim, partly because it reeked of magic. While his father followed the old gods, he followed the faith of the seven, which had no place for magic. Moreover, none of those runes on his father's armor had ever showed actual signs of magic, which Robar had long since decided meant they were simple the runes set into the hilt and blade of his sword had just begun to glow a pale yellow color. But Robar shook off his shot at that, continuing to race toward his king's tent.

As he burst into the tent he was confronted with a thing of magic that made his sword pale in comparison, halting Robar in his tracks. The shadow creature was slowly gaining ground against the two warriors inside. He hesitated a moment, watching Loras rather desperately dodge a clawed hand that would have caught him in the neck, twisting his body around to block the sword that was even then seeking Renly's side, where he had overextended for a moment.

The sight of his king almost being impaled shook Robar out of his stunned state, and he raced forward, his blade lashing out. "Have at you, creature!"

The creature turned, almost negligently throwing Loras off its blade to lock swords with Robar, but this gave Loras and Renly enough time to set themselves once again and attack. Their blades impaled the thing's side and armor and Loras howled in fury as they once again did nothing to the creature. "Father judge you, what does it take to kill you monster!"

The shadow beast of course didn't reply, simply flinging Robar back before turning its blade back to the other two. Renly ignored Loras' earlier advice for a moment, blocking the incoming blows since he couldn't dodge without losing his balance. Even so he was flung to the floor, his blade actually warped by the force of the blow. The creature lifted a foot to stop on himit's sword once more occupied with Loras then screamed in such a high pitch that it was more felt than heard. "SCREEEEEEEE!"

Robar had rolled from where he had hit after the creature had flung him back then, his sword held in both hands he lunged forward, at the creature's back. His blade stabbed into the creature point first then the runes which had heretofore simply been glowing dully, flared to life. A hard bright yellow color blossomed out, nearly blinding all three of the young man in the tent and even a few outside who had been racing towards it from the command tent. The shadow creature was destroyed by whatever magic was on the blade, turning into nothing but quickly dissipating smoke.

For a moment all was silent in the tent, then the other people who had heard the sound of battle burst in, staring around in consternation. Robar ignored themall however, simply staring down at his blade, where the runes had gone back to glowing a dull yellow, though somewhat brighter than they had been before he stabbed it into the shadow monster. "I think, that I owe my father an apology." He said softly.

"What happened here?" Mace growled angrily, pushing his way to the front. He gasped as he saw Emmon's dead body, then his son's exhausted frame leaning against the main tent pole while Renly simply pulled himself to his knees on the floor before wearily pushing himself to his feet. The two of them had been forced to push themselves incredibly fast to keep up with the pace of the shadow being's movements even for the few moments it had taken Robar to arrive, and now their bodies demanding payment.

Renly thought quickly. "I was about to take off my armor, I had to take care of a call of nature first. By that time Loras had joined Emmon outside guarding me, we spent a few moments talking, I hate to say it, I tried to actually convince the two of them that I didn't need the both of them guarding me, but I'm glad I didn't! During our discussion that thing cut its way through the back of my tent and attacked us!" He sighed sadly. "Emmon died in the first few moments, nothing we could do seemed to hurt it."

"We were in dire straits ourselves until Robar arrived. Why did your blade work when ours didn't Robar?" Renly asked. He moved over to stare down at the sword that Robar was still holding out in front of him, staring at it in both awe and suspicion.

"The glowing symbols on it are supposedly runes of the First Men Your Majesty, though I'd never believed they had any actual power before this. You know my father's reputation about wearing bronze armor with these scribbles marked out on it but I'd never seen anything from them either. Magic really is coming back into the world..."

"For better or for worse." Renly growled out shaking his head angrily. "I thank you for your timely intervention my knight, and you Loras for your defense of me." He stared at his former lover, willing the man to keep silent about what had really occurred tonight.

The man somehow seemed to get the message, turning away from Renly but remaining silent. Loras had not forgotten his anger at Renly, but seeing that shadow beast had reminded him that there was more going on here than just his own issues. He still wasn't certain if he was willing to go to war for Renly now, not after what he had seen before the shadow creature arrived and the realization that Renly had never really loved him.

Breathing a mental sigh of relief Renly turned back to Mace, and the just arrived Randyll, who had Heartsbane, a Valyrian greatsword, in his ready grip. "This needs to be answered promptly! My lords, ready the army for combat, we attack tonight!"

Randyll made to speak out, but at Renly's angry glare he silenced himself, especially since all of the other Reach lords were also muttering angrily and nodding their heads ferociously. He instead merely nodded his head, and left the tent quickly.

OOOOOO

Melisandre came out of her semi-trance shaking her head. R'hllor's recently heightened favor had several amazing advantages, but one disadvantage was that Shadow Assassins were not nearly as hard to see as they had been before. They were also much more solid. Where before a Shadow Assassin could have floated into the false King's tent this new, more powerful version had to cut its way in, giving Renly and those inside warning.

She idly wondered why she got the impression of the beast fighting three people then two then three again, but her control over Shadow Assassins was tenuous, even compared to her control over Shadow Warriors. The Warriors she could direct and somewhat control their actions, giving them broad orders they would obey unless they went against the creature's very nature. With Shadow Assassins Melisandre could only give them their target, a few orders along the lines of how best to avoid being seen, and then after they left her physical presence could only ride their minds in a very vague manner rather than influence it.

She cursed however, knowing her assassin's failure meant that they would have to go with Stannis' second plan. In some ways she was happy to do so, but her own role in it was quite distasteful. I loathe the fact that we have to act like this, curse the devil Seven and the strange dictates of honor they have impressed upon their dupes! Still, the Azor Ahai has a point, the spread of the one true god amongst our own men is slow, and we need to separate Stannis from this assassination attempt in his lords minds. He cannot seem to be connected to such, not when the target is his own brother anyway. If only it had succeeded without anyone seeing anything, curse it!

With that in mind, Melisandre stood up, waving her acolytes back down before moving out of the tent and into the tent next door, which was Stannis's. He was awake as she had known he would be, ostensibly going over plans for tomorrow's action but in reality simply pacing inside waiting for news. He turned to her one eyebrow raised as she entered the tent.

Melisandre quickly crossed to him, bowing her head formally. "The attempt has failed my Lord. Somehow the Shadow Assassin was dissipated. I would assume it was because of a Valyrian blade."

Stannis frowned for a moment, thinking of which houses he knew had Valyrian blades. Tarly has one I know, but which others? I suppose it doesn't matter right now. He looked at Melisandre closely. "You know what that means don't you? Are you ready to do your part?"

"I am, though this will be unpleasant."

"So long as you act your roll out well, the outcome will be the same." Stannis replied coldly. He had never been in favor of simply assassinating Renly. If Renly had been assassinated with no witnesses that would have been one thing, and the upshot of such was worth the attempt, but if there were witnesses they could pin it on Melisandre. The rumors of Melisandre's abilities had spread too far for anything else at this point, and while the Stormlanders would possibly switch their allegiance to him, the Reach lords would not be willing to serve Stannis in that event. Assassination was against the knightly code after all, and that pile of excrement was believed in the Reach far more than in any other realm of Westeros save the North.

None of them would understand that it was simply politics taken to the next level, they would take it as a personal affront and might well attack Stannis' forces even if they didn't have a candidate for kingship with them. Or worse, they could retreat then sent overtures to the dragon girl and the Starks. The Reach had after all been loyal to the Targaryens to the end. The thought of the Starks, Riverlanders and Reach armies joining together was a daunting one.

No, to combat that potential disaster Stannis needed a victory. He needed to show his skill as a general in no uncertain terms, have Renly die in open combat and possibly wear way the Reach forces somewhat just in case. So he had been ready for the assassination to fail, and indeed had a little surprise prepared in the area directly in front of his army's lines. The rain has been especially helpful there, and knowing my brother he will push for a night battle, where Melisandre's Shadow Warriors will do their jobs very well indeed.

"I am prepared to do my part to deceive the followers of the devil Seven, Azor Ahai." Melisandre said, bowing her head once more.

Stannis nodded, then without further ado lashed out with one fist, his blow smacking into the side of Melisandre's face and sending her flying as he roared. "You stupid bitch! I never gave that order! I'll have no truck with such acts! The next time you do something like this, I'll kill you myself!"

With that he turned and strode out of the tent, passing the five Flame Guard who had been about to enter the tent their faces so showing shock and concern. "You five, watch her." He ordered in a loud voice, noting out of the corner of his eyes as his Lord commanders' came out of their tent at a rush. "She is to be kept separated from the rest of the Army, is that understood?"

"As the other lords and his commanders ran up to Stannis, he turned to Melisandre. "I'll have you flogged for this!" He hissed in an angry voice. "R'hllor might be the one true God, but such acts like that will never be allowed in Westeros!"

He turned to his commanders and waved a hand at the woman who was slowly getting to her feet, a bruise already forming on her cheek and jaw from his blow. "This fool of a woman has sent an assassin against my brother." he said without preamble. "She wished to keep the two armies from fighting, stating that we would need all the men we could get to combat the Great Other that she sees coming with the onset of winter.

"Fool woman thought I would be pleased with it!" He snarled the words then shook his head and went on. "The attempt failed, and we need to deal with the fallout. My brother will respond to this affront quickly, we need to be ready for combat now! We'll be sending her Warriors to do their part, but we need to be ready here as well."

Melisandre allowed herself to be pulled away, her head bowed submissively even as her eyes glanced at the lords, and she exalted inside at what she saw. None of them had even flinched at the mention of her warriors, who they had been told about the day before, though they were looking at her askance for the assassination attempt. That meant that both Stannis's words were being believed and that the reality of her magic was slowly wearing away their belief in the Seven. Soon they too will convert, and with them many of their men!

Only Davos was still looking at her distrustfully. But in his case, the fact that Stannis was obviously doing what he could to control her seemed to calm him down. He would need to be dealt with in time, but for now, the response from the other lords was good enough for now.

Brilliant Melisandre thought to herself as she was brought back to her own tent, her acolytes forced to leave her there for now. The act itself was rather irritating, but the outcome is all I could hope for. Now when the Azor Ahai wins this battle we will be well on our way to forming an army capable of standing against the hordes of the Great Other.

OOOOOOO

Renly's response to the attempted assassination was to organize a night assault, but not a normal night assault, a fully heavy cavalry charge in the middle of the night. With the full moon above them and a few torches Renly felt the knights would have enough light to see by, if barely. Within an hour fully 8,000 heavy cavalry road out, while the rest of the army was still preparing to move forward to engage Stannis's forces. The command had been given to Lord Phineas Cordwayner and his sons who accepted it eagerly.

However Stannis's army had already begun to move, not forward, but back during the Lord Phineas and his troops rode through the area where Stannis's army had supposedly been, all they found was their tents left behind. "Where the hell did they go?" He growled angrily, unwilling to give up the chance of glory that would occur if he was able to get in the first blow against Stannis.

One of his men rode up, bowing from the saddle. "Milord, our scouts report that Stannis's army has retreated back and to the south along the Blackwater, they have taken a position there. "Their torches are visible all around, they seem to have prepared positions there." Actually the army had retreated back there the moment night came, while the fake camp remained behind.

"Good! Reform the men for another charge, this time well march until we can see who they, are then charge. That will hopefully give the sun enough time to rise."

The men around Phineas nodded, grim faced. None of one of them had liked charging through the night. It had been highly unpleasant, even carrying torches as they were and with the moon above them. Luckily the sun was rising in the west, and soon enough they would have more light to see by despite the fact it would be an overcast day. Frankly Stannis' retreat worked in their favor really, allowing the Cordwayners to reform their men.

Lord Phineas reformed his force while behind them the rest of Renly's army began to coalesce, moving forward in divisions under its respective Lords. As the Sun finally rose high enough in the sky to give them light, Phineas and his men set off once more, still leading the Stormlands-Reach army along the Blackwater.

OOOOOOO

Lord Godrick Pommingham sighed sadly as he stared out at the Reach army, which was rousing itself to the south of the fort he had been given command of. He had been given command of this fort because his men were excellent shots with the catapult set near the small fort in a small, wooden-walled enclosure, and his family had supplied more archers than heavy cavalry. As such, Renly and the Tyrells had overlooked him when they were choosing commanders for the portion of the Stormlands/Reach army that would be used against Stannis.

He, the Norridge, Roxton and a few of the smaller Stormlands Houses, Wensington and Wylde had all been sidelined for this battle, defending the forts directly behind and to the right flank of the reformed portion of the army. Ostensibly they were there in case Stannis was able to send a column around Renly's force to attack them from the flank, but Godrick knew the truth. There was simply not enough glory to go around, and the King had been forced to play favorites.

Renly had originally split his reformed army into three different camps for hygiene reasons and for strategic ones. This way, if one portion of the army was attacked by Stannis, the other portions could come in and surround him from his flanks. One portion, Renly's, was directly in front of the forts held by Wensington and Roxton, with Wylde and Pommingham's own protecting its back and left flank.

The other two portions were smaller than that one, in comparison to Renly's 20,000 men, with a large portion of the army's cavalry represented in Renly's command and Lord Tyrell's, which was situated behind and to the north of Renly's, the two camps separated by Pommingham and Wylde's forts and about five leagues. The other force, under lord Staedmon, was to the south and west of Renly's. A reserve was also on the other side of the Blackwater, numbering only about five thousand.

I wonder what happened to make Renly organize a night assault like that. Godrick thought idly. He saw no reason why a heavy cavalry charge wouldn't work at night, so that didn't bother him so much as Renly's desire to send such an attack at all. Still, it doesn't matter to us here. We're well out of it.

"Wha-gahh!"

""Ware monster!To arms, to arghhh!"

Godrick turned from viewing Renly's cavalry marching out to stare in shock at several creatures seemingly made of shadow and smoke had apparently climbed up the wall of his fort, cutting into his men with ease. As he watched one of them cut a man in half, his bow raised so desperately in defense not even slowing the thing's dark blade.

For a moment the sight robbed Godrick of the ability to think, his feet rooted to where he stood. By the time he turned to run, four of the creatures were on his fort's roof, and dozens of his men were dead. One of them bounded after Godrick, catching him before he could get to the makeshift stairs leading down into the fort. It tore off his leg with one arm, causing Godrick to scream aloud.

The other three quickly moved around Godrick, heading down into his fort where, Godrick suddenly realized, they would slaughter his men unless they ran. He hoped they would, but that hope was in vain. Another Shadow warrior had entered the fort from its gate, and would hold it so long as the night lasted.

Godrick himself stared up at the distorted features of his killer, mumbling a prayer before the thing's blade speared him through the chest. "Seven defend the Faith...!"

OOOOOO

As dawn broke wet and warm Phineas took in the defenses that Stannis had thrown up at a glance. There weren't too many of them, but he seemed to want use large wooden barricades set deep into the earth to funnel the heavy cavalry charge into various segments. But Phineas could see where there were several areas that they hadn't been set yet, especially close by the Blackwater. Behind them, men stood, some with polearms, but mostly archers and swordsmen.

For ten minutes Phineas organized his men, giving his two sons command of some of them, and keeping the majority of the men under his own command as they raced forward, using their banners to direct the men. About 2000 men under his sons went for one of the other breaks in the barricades further north along Stannis' lines, while Phineas led about 6,000 heavy cavalry in a charge that was much deeper than it was long at the break along the Blackwater's edge.

Arrows began to fly from Stannis' army, and Phineas laughed as several of them hit his armor only to bounce off. "Hah, craven bastards, arrows do nothing against true knights!" Arrows truly weren't very good against heavy plate armor at range, and Phineas had always looked down on archers because of that.

Halfway across the distance between his starting point and the opposing army's lines Phineas couched his lance and urged his horse into a gallop. He shouted aloud "For the Reach!"

About a hundred yards before they would hit the break in the barricades and begin to flank Stannis's army equine screams began to render the morning air. Horses in the front rows went down screaming, their hooves pierced by caltrops that had been thrown out all around the and there men rode into their downed fellows trampling them under their feet, but even that wasn't the main problem to continuing the charge.

Phineas had not been able to tell that the ground all around the front of Stannis' lines was muddy and very wet. The Blackwater occasionally flooded its banks here, which Stannis had known and taken advantage of. The ground was not quite a quagmire, but it was certainly enough to slow down horses with full loads. The front few ranks had churned it nicely for the others, and now all of them were getting bogged down, their horses unable to move very in the mud slowing down dramatically. Indeed the entire charge was becoming bogged down, horses unable to move forward because of the mud or their exhausted fellows all around.

"Now!" shouted a voice from the enemy army's lines, and while arrows continued to fly into the bogged down heavy cavalry thousands of infantry raced out, their lighter armor allowing them to move much more easily in the muddy conditions. Half of them were armed with long makeshift spears, while the others were armed with maces and short swords, weapons that could be used to deadly effect if they could get in under their opponent's reach.

Bogged down as they were the heavy cavalry lost its most important advantage, momentum. No heavy cavalryman could defend himself from every direction, and that was what you had to do when you had several infantrymen trying to get around you, cut your horse's stomach out and then get you when you were hurled to the ground.

Phineas watched in horror as that very thing began to happen all around him, but he handled the sudden turn of fortune much better than Godrick. He recovered quickly, thrusting his lance down towards one man impaling him through the shoulder. At the same time another man's spear thrust up at Phineas. Phineas blocked with his shield desperately, letting go of the lance to pull out his sword. But by the time he did, another man was gutting his horse. The animal whinnied, bucking up to try and get away from the knife that was now sticking out of its stomach, and Phineas was hurled from the saddle.

He landed heavily but the mud actually helped him for a moment, allowing him to absorb the shock of the landing. He tried to get to his feet, a hard task given the full plate armor he was wearing, only to receive a blow from a mace, smashing him comatose. The man who did it grinned, pulling the man in very expensive looking armor up out of the mud with some of his fellows before retreating with their captive. All around other knights and armsmen were dying, unless they too looked like they came from families that could pay a ransom.

Elsewhere Phineas' son's charges also bogged down, though they faced more archers than men on foot. And those archers were not aiming at the men on horses, they were aiming at the horses themselves. Stannis knew that killing all of the men currently bogged down in front of his army would take too long but unhorsing them might be just as good for now.

Watching this from a small rise behind his army Stannis nodded turning away to look at Lord Bolling. "You'll have two thousand of the levee forces and another five hundred archers. Keep up the attack on that cavalry force, I want as many captives as possible, but gut that force too." Those levee forces were impressed smallfolk from Duskenale and the lands the army had travelled through, poor troops for the most part but good enough for this purpose, and they had given him a few more thousand men to bolster his numbers.

Bolling nodded, but by that time Stannis was already gone, moving to his horse. He paused as he was about to lift himself into the saddle staring hard at Melisandre, who was in chains at present. "Your creations have already done their bit?"

Melisandre nodded. "We lost a few strangely and several others have died since daybreak began, but the nearest forts are emptied of men my Lord."

"Good." Stannis nodded. With that he pulled himself into the saddle and waved his hand in the air ordering the men all around him to advance. But they didn't advance into the quagmire that was initially their front lines. Stannis didn't want to simply wipe out a portion of Renly's army, he wanted to crush the entire thing before Renly, or more accurately Randyll, could realize all that was going on.

While news of that first cavalry charges disaster was slowly filtering back to Renly, Stannis was on the move, flanking in his position from the North. Before Renly and his men could realize it Stannis and his army were already in a new position slightly north of their previous position and attacking once again, moving directly under the range of the former Pommingham's fort.

Despite this, the army under Renly was able to see them coming and quickly turned to face them. Randyll had also ordered several units of Lord Staedmon's force to join the main army, reinforcing their numbers. The two armies clashed, cavalry and infantry smashing into one another while the archers on both sides went to work.

OOOOOO

Well back from the front lines Renly stared as the two armies clashed, shaking his head in shock. "Well that was a surprise." He said without much feeling, "but we still have the numbers advantage. Tell Lord Tyrell to swing north of them. No matter how they took out Pommingham's fort, they haven't moved men into it. If we can circle Stannis's army we can destroy it entirely. Send a signal to Lord Staedmon, I'll want his men able to push forward at a moment's notice, and send a message across the Blackwater to Lord Dunn as well, I'll want the reserves ready to go just in case."

Next to him Randyll frowned thoughtfully, not liking how deeply Stannis and his men were forging into their army, as well as moving towards the east towards the forts that they should've avoided. "I'd recommend that we continue to fall back towards the Blackwater my Lord. The Stormlands infantry is better than most of ours, let us bring up the rest of our own before we start to hold the ground against him." Half of the Stormlands infantry was serving under Staedmon, with only around four thousand men under lord Hasty assigned to Renly's force.

Renly nodded affably. "Do so." Then he pulled his sword and nodded at his Rainbow Guard and Randyll. "I believe however, it is now time for us to do our part." he pointed theatrically forward at where the infantry were clashing. "Charge!"

OOOOOO

A messenger was sent to Lord Mace and his portion of the Army was situated slightly behind and to the north of Renly's portion behind the forts. This second mobile force consisted predominantly of heavy and light cavalry with a smattering of infantry and archers. House Tyrell, the Red-apple Fossoways, House Ashford and House Rowan supplied the men to this force. They numbered a little over fourteen thousand.

Mace stared at the messenger, then over at his son. Loras had been sent to him ostensibly as a liaison, which Mace understood. The real reason of course was that Renly didn't want Loras around just now, not until he had come up with a way to appease him. "Are you ready?"

Loras nodded, gripping his sword's grimly. For the life of him he had been unable to get his mind off of Renly's betrayal, his mind kept on going back to that moment where he barged into the tent to find him and Emmon in an embrace like a tooth to a sore. Right now he wanted very badly to hit someone, and Renly unfortunately was not available. "Yes, father."

The older man nodded and then waved his hand grandly. "Forward to victory!" His army began to advance, leaving behind their camp and moving quickly to attack Stannis in the flank. However those units that past close by the forts began to come under fire from them. From his position at the center of his army Mace saw this and stared incredulously. "What? Betrayal!"

The Shadow Warriors who had attacked the force commanded by House Wylde had moved on to reinforce those that were attacking the fort directly behind Renly's army, allowing some of Stannis' forces to move in and claim it. They now held it against the people who had built it, trying desperately to ignore the bodies all around them, many of which had been hacked to pieces as they died.

Mace halted the charge at this sudden assault, staring at the fort in consternation as he wondered if he should continue to attack along this line of advance. Then suddenly from the west another force, this one smaller than Stannis's main army began to attack his flank. Light cavalry in the colors of Massey and Bar Emmon began to hit Lord Ashford and his men, who had control of that flank. He hastily ordered their men forward to chase after the light cavalry instead of continuing the attack on Stannis's forces, breaking away from Tyrell's main force.

"Damn it!" Mace growled, then shuddered as he saw the catapult from the fort fire off, the large stone slamming into the front of his force.

"We should swing out wide in both directions!" Shouted Lord Fossoway. "Half should swing round to reinforce Renly from behind, the other should chase down that force that just attacked us, then split off to attack Stannis from behind!"

"Do it!" Mace ordered, glad that someone had come up with a plan. He turned to Loras. "Loras, you'll command the force moving to aide Ashford, I'll command the other with Lord Fossoway and move to reinforce Renly!"

Loras nodded and turned his horse away while Mace began to bellow orders to his horn-man.

OOOOOO

In King's Landing Rupert had watched the beginning of the fight as well as he could with the spyglass, which wasn't very well given the distances involved, but thanks to the Hand's Tower he had still been able to see enough to know when the battle was truly joined. But even before that, Rupert had gone ahead with his plan for the escape from the capital. Several dozen of his most trusted men under the command of Jaime had begun to lead the horses horded here in the Red Keep through the catacombs several dozen at a time. They were led in turn by Varys with Jaime by his side at all times, ostensibly to defend him just in case, but everyone knew the real reason. This had gone on throughout the night, and now every horse in the Red Keep had been brought out. Then Varys and Jaime had returned, leaving Balon Swann in charge of the men with the horses.

Then, when he was certain Stannis and Renly were fully concentrated on one another, Rupert first ordered every Lannister and Baratheon flag in the Keep up onto the walls of the Keep. With that done, Rupert gathered the two royals and the small council. "if we are going to do this, the time is now your Grace, your Highness."

Cersei, Joffrey and Pycelle all nodded, though the old Grand Maester looked hesitant for some reason. As the others left, Rupert laid a hand on the old man's shoulder. The two of them had become friends over the past few weeks, and Rupert had come to value Pycelle's knowledge and insight. "Pycelle?"

"You know, I'd known for decades I would die here. The plague or through wounds taken in battle or assassination would not have been my choices, but even old age would have claimed me eventually, and I would still be here. For all its smell, for all the machinations of the small council and the horrors I've seen here under the Mad King and after, this has been my home for longer than the queen has been alive. Part of me wants to simply stay here, and meet the end however it comes."

"None of that my friend, the Lannisters still need your service, and I still need your advice." Rupert said, looking at the older man worriedly. Dealing with the plague had affected him greatly, but this was the first time Serret had heard the man sound so fatalistic.

Pycelle took one last look around the queen's council room, then nodded resolutely and turned toward the door. He didn't look back again, even while they were led into the catacombs. With Varys once more leading them the royal household and the force Serret had gathered in the Red Keep prior to the outbreak moved down into the catacombs.

After what seemed like hours the eunuch finally led them out of the catacombs the same way that Petyr had escaped weeks ago. Rupert stepped outside, blinking in even the overcast light of the day after the last few hours. He took a moment to stare out over the landscape towards distant forts and lines facing this direction. Jaime stopped beside him doing the same thing. "I would've liked to do this at night," the Kingslayer said shaking his head. "There's got to be enough men over there to make a fight of it, right, even with your diversion?"

"If we were trying to create a hole rather than simply punch our own way through possibly." the older man replied caustically. But Alester Florent is not exactly the best commander, nor the most intelligent or even courageous man. So long as he's not been reinforced, we'll be able to break through."

The force of around 3,700 men began to make their way down the cliff face and soon enough they were down in among the slums, where the horses had been hidden. While the men mounted quickly, Rupert looked at Ser Swann, nodding his head gravely. "You are in charge of the Kingsguard for the moment, Jaime, you're with me."

Ser Blount looked angry at his seniority being passed over like that, but subsided as Jaime looked his way. With Blount suitably chastised, Jaime joined Rupert as they moved through the slums set on the small stretch of land between the Blackwater and the city's outer wall. They halted where the wall turned, staring out into the distance past the few remaining hovels left standing. Then they began to hear shouts and yells in the distance, and both men smiled grimly.

When he came up with his desperate gamble the Lord Hand had decided to add as much chaos to their escape as he could. He couldn't assume that the lords of the nearest forts were as cowardly or slow as he felt Alester was, so they had to be occupied in such a way to stop them from coming to the Florent's aid. And if the men on the wall had seen the royal force leaving, they might have panicked and tried to abandon the city as best they could. So Rupert had decided to use their desire to leave the city in a controlled way. He had relayed an order to Lord Harte and the other surviving lords who had gathered in King's Landing to prepare their men to go over the wall and attempt to escape in force.

Of course this also meant that the smallfolk might notice the sudden absence of the wall's defenders and try to escape the outbreak themselves. But even that could be borne since they probably wouldn't try to come the same way that Rupert's force was taking, moving through the slums where the wildfire had burned out most of the houses.

Now several thousand men began to rappel down the outer wall of the capital. They formed up into a force around four thousand strong in slums there before marching out along the Kingsroad as fast as they could.

OOOOOO

Loras' force had run off the skirmishers who had pulled Ashford's men off their initial line of attack, only to run into some survivors of the Shadow Warrior's assault on the forts behind Renly's army. They were immediately ushered into Loras' presence, and he and his commanders stared first at the scared, broken men then at the fort. "Are you saying that creature much like the monster I fought last night are in those forts?"

"Y-yes my lord, they, they slaughtered us! L-lord Wensington had a Valyrian knife, it worked on them but nothing else we did hurt them at all! It, it was horrible!"

Thinking quickly Loras said aloud "But none of them have been seen in daylight yet, so we need to assume that they can't exist in the light. So they won't be able to come out to attack us if we pass them. We should be able to get past them to reinforce Renly." He had to bite his tongue slightly to keep from cursing the man as he deserved.

"What's going on over there?" Ser Luthor Norridge, a knight from a very minor house loyal to House Tyrell said from next to Loras, pointing toward the city.

Loras looked in that direction, then frowned suddenly. "That looks like someone is trying to escape the city!" He scowled angrily. "Who's in command on that side of the city?"

"House Cafferren and House Meadows control the forts and the line from the Kingsroad to the west. To the east of the Kingsroad and towards the road to Rosby... the Florents and a few of the smaller houses I think." Said Talbert Yelshire, the lord of another minor house beholden to the Tyrells.

Every man around Loras groaned aloud at that. Alekyne had not done anything to impress any of the other young knights with his courage or intelligence, setting aside the fact his family's loyalty to Renly was seen as somewhat compromised. If the capital's garrison is trying to break out along the Kingsroad, they might be trying to break out elsewhere as well, and Alester and his cluster of imbeciles are definitely the weak point in our cordon.

"We need to get over there then." Loras said, turning his horse almost entirely around. "We can't let any of the Lannister get away, especially if they might be carrying the plague!"

"What about His Majesty my lord, we might be needed here?" Lord Ashford asked hesitantly.

"If Renly can't beat his brother with a more than two to one advantage in numbers, then our five thousand certainly isn't going to make any difference!" Loras retorted hotly, allowing his anger at Renly out for a moment. "Whereas we might be the difference between life and death for thousands if those men trying to break out are sick! Turn the army around and let's get over there!"

OOOOOO

The clash between the two main forces had bogged down, becoming a case of shield wall against shield wall. The Stormlanders much better trained infantry fared well against the very poorly trained and outfitted troops of the Reach. The cavalry was no longer able to come to grips with them with enough momentum to turn the tide. In several places the Reach cavalry now couldn't even get to the front lines through the ranks of their own infantry. Hundreds tried to flank out west, only to get strung along by Stannis' reserves until they became bogged down in the same quagmire that had caught the nighttime charge.

While Renly and forged his way forward, hacking at Stormlands men below him it became clear that the training that Stannis had given his men in the intervening weeks was paying off now. While the men from the Royal Navy didn't work very well as units, they wielded their spears expertly, keeping what cavalry could get to the front lines from crunching into the better armored and armed Stormlands infantry, which were making short work of the Reach levy forces. Panic was setting in, and even Renly was beginning to feel it now, seeing the strange men with the mark of a fire on their shoulders at the front of a charge.

The charge crunched into a point near the front of the battle where the Royal Navy forces had fallen back. They smashed into the rush of men trying to fold up Stannis' line to either side, killing or riding down most of them, then cutting deep into Renly's own line which had bulged out there to try and take advantage of their fellow's sudden weakness.

Renly grimaced, pulling his sword out of one man and looking around "Where are Mace and Staedmon?!"

"Bogged down your Highness!" Shouted Ser Morigen his normally green enameled armor splashed with red. "Somehow your brother was able to get forces inside some of the forts last night, and Lord Tyrell decided to split the army. Loras is still coming up behind Stannis, but Lord Tyrell fell back and around to join Lord Staedmon." Word of the second force under Lord Bar Emmon had not reached the main army. "Lord Tarly sent word though that Staedmon is on the move! They are trying to circle south so they can join the battle sooner!"

"Damn it!" Renly muttered, bringing up his blade to hack the shaft of a spear that was thrusting for his face. The shaft shattered and Renly kicked out, catching another man who was trying to get underneath his horse to hamstring it before bringing his sword over, braining the fellow with his pommel. "Then we need to hold until Alesander and Mace gets here!"

OOOOOO

Elsewhere Lord Dunn was looking through a very expensive Myrish glass he had recently won in a game of cards from one of his fellow lords. Then he turned and looked at Lord Norcross and the other nobles that made up the reserve forces of the Reach stationed to the south over the Blackwater. "Are we agreed my lords?"

Lord Norcross nodded grimly. "If Renly won't let us go reclaim our lands Stannis will, his messages said so." He had lands to the south of House Oldflowers, perched directly on the Mander. So did their fellows, Lords Rhyssling, Offering,

Orme and Graves. None of them had their full compliment with them on this side of the Blackwater, but they were all agreed to follow Dunn in this bit of revolution. Lord Lybber, a house that was on the cusp of knightly and noble class, who was situated almost on the Mander nodded as well. "In that case, I think we need to send a sign don't we?" At his fellows nods he smiled grimly and moved to where several catapults were set up on the southern shore of the Blackwater, the largest ones the army had made. Originally they had faced toward the capital, but now they were slowly turned around.

OOOOOO

Mace's portion of the army had met up with Lord Staedmon's by that point, and the two of them had, as Robar reported, decided to swing slightly south of the main battle. This way they would be able to move around the main snarl of combat where Stannis' forces had smashed into the center of Renly's. This way they'd be able to actually come to grips with the attackers much faster.

They were moving quickly, the heavy cavalry and the light racing ahead of the Stormlands infantry. This force had none of the barely trained levy forces from the Reach, containing the remaining Stormlands infantry allied to Renly. The two groups, cavalry and infantry, were slowly separating when they came under attack from an unexpected direction.

The first Mace knew of it was when a large boulder fell out of the sky smashing into his formation, puling several men and then rolling, crushing several more. "Ware above, from behind!" Came the belated call, and practically every man in the army turned to stare in that direction for a moment.

It took another boulder appearing out of the sky dropping toward them to make the men scatter, pushing and shoving at one another to get out of the way. Even so, the 13,000 or so strong force had not spread out over much when the next boulder landed, crushing a few cavalry men this time, and severely injuring a few others even while they desperately tried to get out of the way.

Then it became worse. The first two boulders were the sort used to try and batter down the city's walls. The next several catapult loads were loaded with several dozen smaller rocks of various sizes roped together, the ropes coming apart under the strain of the flight, creating the medieval equivalent of buckshot. Useless against fortifications, this type of catapult ammunition was far more deadly against formed troops.

Hundreds of men died in those next few moments as Mace and Lord Staedmon tried to figure out where the catapult fire was coming from while also trying to get their men to spread out yet remain under control. This was a daunting task under the sudden assault from enemies well out of their own range.

This was made all the harder when someone shouted aloud, "My lords, the fire's coming from our own forts on the other side of the Blackwater!"

Staedmon had found Mace amidst the tumult and the two of them scowled angrily as they realized what that meant. Either Stannis had somehow sent men across the river and overcome the reserve force or they had just been betrayed. "Who's in charge over there?" Mace growled angrily, looking at one of his aides.

"Lord Norcross and Lord Dunn. I think they were much angrier about Renly not cutting them loose to march home then we believed." Staedmon replied, scowling angrily. He couldn't blame them for that anger, but to turn on the rest of the army like this?

"Despicable traitors!" Mace growled, waving his sword in the air. "Let's turn the army around, and get after them!"

Staedmon didn't look at him, staring down towards the Blackwater frowning heavily. He wasn't the most experienced commander, but he had a good education in tactics, and knew that if the traitor Houses held the bridges, they would be able to beat off any assault. "They can easily hold the bridges we made against us, or simply burn them. No, the main battle is out of their catapult's range, let's pick up the pace and we can leave this behind." He grimaced as more stones fell out of the sky, killing and scattering the army's formation further.

"No!" Mace growled, angered beyond belief at the treachery from houses that owed him their loyalty. "You do what you want with your force, I'm going to go back there, and make damn certain that those traitors get what's coming to them!"

Staedmon glared after him as he and his accompanying knights began to blow their bugles, gathering their men to them. "What should we do my lord?" Asked one of his own men, a knight from House Tudbury.

"Get the banners and the buglers north of here out of the range of the spread shots from the catapults over there. Don't use the bugles to rally the men, with that buffoon and his fellow idiots blaring so much we'll just confuse the issue. Hopefully the men will see us moving and rally to us anyway. Once that fool has gathered his men and moved off... we'll see how the main battle is doing before deciding what to do."

"My lord?" The knight asked, his voice showing his surprise.

Staedmon shrugged, not wishing to voice the thought that maybe this battle had already been lost. Renly still had more men than Stannis but it seemed that in every other way Stannis was proving the superior. And Staedmon's House hadn't suffered many losses yet, so maybe it was time to look to his own first.

While Alesander Staedmon was thinking long term, Mace was thinking here and now. Even Mace however wasn't so much of an idiot to charge the bridges controlled by Norcross and the other traitors. Instead he retreated to the west and south, moving toward the city and the bridge the army had built near the port in the Blackwater. The forts around there were controlled by his family and House Ambrose, a firm ally of House Tyrell, he'd be able to cross the bridges there and take the traitors from the side. That this removed him from the main battle against Stannis really didn't register in Mace's mind, he was so angry at the traitors.

OOOOOOO

At the front of the battle Renly had made the same mistake numerous young commanders have made throughout history: he had become too involved in the front lines to control the flow of battle. Randyll however had not gotten involved personally yet. Standing back from the main conflict he was able to slowly reorganize the main army's forces and pull them back to the south and east, skirting around the forts that had been emptied of men last night through whatever sorcerous means the Red Witch had called up. He ordered every archer in the army up to guard his flank in defense against whatever was inside them, while pulling together the main army.

But the army well knew they should have received reinforcements by now. The fact they had not, and the drubbing they had taken so far, was impacting the troop's morale. The morale of the Reach's levy forces was never very high at the best of times, now they had been mauled, thrown into a battle they couldn't win. Here and there they broke despite the best Randyll could do to put some steel in their spine. Those men now began to fight to get away from the battle, further hampering the remainder's ability to keep their lines intact.

Despite that, Randyll still had command of the center of the Stormlands-Reach Army, and they were pulling south and east under control. Now the Stormlands infantry on both sides matched up in the center of the battle, bolstered by the infantry of the few Reach houses who had spent any money on their infantry and were present, a small number indeed. House Buckler met House Fell, House Grandison met House Errol along with others and House Baratheon fought on both sides in the center of the ferocious melee. But the men under Stannis held their lines better, and then reinforcements arrived on Stannis' right flank.

These were men of House Massey and Bar Emmon. They had been involved in the skirmish against Loras and Lord Ashford but had not, as Loras thought, been broken by their riposte, retreating in good order. Now they joined the main battle, joining the Royal Navy men that had been holding that flank. Slowly they began to turn the Reach cavalry and levy forces holding there, and then their light cavalry and the small number of heavy cavalry Stannis had under his command began to hammer the enemy's line, threatening to break it, and with it the army's morale.

Noticing this Randyll cursed then gestured around to the men of his own house. "Time for us to hit them lads!" As his men roared and they began to charge forward, Randyll was still thinking hard. Turn that around, and their panic may spread. The battle could still be won, but the lack of reinforcements was beginning to loom large, and he wondered where the hell Mace and Alesander had gotten to. Fucking idiot must not have gotten someone to read his fucking map for him!

OOOOOOO

Rupert and Jaime had continued to wait, hoping that a general outbreak would quickly follow. Yet the smallfolk had learned their lesson from the times they had taken control of the walls here and there in the days before this. They knew even if they got out of the city, the surrounding army would not let them go, and there was little to no cover and nothing to eat between the outer wall and the surrounding army. There were still a few who tried to put to sea by the Blackwater, and more who tried to get over the wall into Fishmonger's street and from there over the river, but they fared no better than they had the other times they had tried this.

That didn't mean however that the various Crownlands forces trying to break out weren't doing their job however. Jaime and Rupert took turns looking through the Hand's Myrish glass at the forts set up on and to the west of the Kingsroad. Finally both men smiled as the forces there sortied out against Lord Harte and the others. "Now, let's return to the others and get on!"

It would take them a bare few minutes by horse to reach the Florent lines. Returning to the others Serret barked out orders, no longer giving even lip service to Joffrey being the king, simply ordering him around like he did the others. Joffrey took this poorly, but a stern glance from the queen and Pycelle's hand clamping down on his shoulder kept him from interrupting Rupert's flow as he finished giving out orders. "Jaime, you'll be in charge of the first ranks, break through and then circle back until the King and Queen Regent are clear, after that, make certain they get away whatever else is going on!"

Jaime nodded, glancing at his sister who nodded as well, her eyes showing both her concern for them all and her trust in him. Joffrey made to move forward, but at a gesture from his mother Ser Swann moved his horse to block the King's path. "You should not be fighting what amounts to a skirmish my son." Cersei said simply shaking her head. "Kings lead grand charges into massive battles, they don't fight in every skirmish where arrows and position mean more than skill and numbers."

"I suppose that makes sense." Joffrey conceded with a scowl. Though inside he was eager to hurt someone again, it had been too long since he had sated any of his... desires.

Jaime stretched in his armor, grinning evilly. It had been far too long since he'd had a proper fight, the last time was against Eddard in the battle of Two Truths and he was eager to get it stuck in. "Let's go." he said simply, and led the way trotting out of the slums and out into the open area between the slums and the besieging army's line.

Almost immediately another shout went up, but only a few desultory arrows were shot in their direction before Jaime and the men with him were within charging range. "Hear me roar!" Shouted Jaime at the top of his lungs, pointing forward with his blade before spurring his horse into the charge.

A moment later his sword flashed out, catching one man high in the shoulder as he passed by before coming back in a underhand swing to catch another man's axe, pushing it away before coming back and slicing him open along the neck. The man hadn't even put on his helmet yet.

Jaime's men hammered into the defender's lines, coming up and over the ditches and slamming into the men manning them with all the force of a cavalry charge at its best. It was ironic that the Reach for all its vaunted desire and love of cavalry had not been able to use their cavalry to good effect in this entire war yet, whereas the Westerlanders in this one charge had been able to.

A small unit of heavy cavalry tried to join the battle coming out of the Florent fort, but couldn't get up enough momentum to make much difference, instead becoming snarled up in the melee. Wheeling his horse around Jaime hacked to the left and right, clearing the area around him quickly then making for the one banner man he could see.

The man saw him coming, and urged his force forward with more courage than sense. The two exchanged four blows before Jaime reposted too fast for the other man to block, smashing his blade tip into and through his opponent's plate armor. The man fell, and the heavy cavalry all around them began to pull back toward the fort.

"Keep going!" Yelled Rupert, pulling his own horse around and coming back hacking at a man wearing Florent colors with his axe. "Bring the torches forward, then someone run off or take their horses!"

A moment later several unmounted men came forward with torches, hurling them up onto the Ford before pulling themselves into horses held by their fellows. There were too many men up there and the wood was too wet for the fire to catch hold, but it took even more attention away while Ser Swann led Cersei and her party forward at a gallop, racing through the hole Jaime and Rupert had made in the defender's line.

The next few moments were harrowing, and more than a dozen men went down with arrows in their horses or their own back, but at last the Westerlanders galloped out of arrow range, racing on down the road to Rosby, meeting up with lord Edgerton and his few surviving men, all of whom had simply run through the battle occurring along the Kingsroad, allowing Harte and the rest of their men to die to cover their escape, though they didn't know it. Soon enough they would cut off overland and head towards the Sow's Horn, but Lord Serret wanted to put more distance between them and any pursuers.

OOOOOO

At the same time the Lannisters and their allies were breaking out of the cordon, Mace had gotten across the Blackwater and had moved up its southern edge to attack the traitors on that side. He had gathered another several thousand men, and had massively overwhelmingly numbers as he attacked as well as surprise. Lord Dunn and his fellows hadn't sent out any scouts on their own flanks, assuming that any attack would come right over the bridges in front of their forts. A few of their watchers had noticed Mace's force pulling back, but they hadn't followed them, intent on hammering Staedmon's men before they could get out of catapult range.

Even so, the battle almost teetered on the brink for a moment. Mace thought himself a fine warrior and general, when in reality he was rather poor at both. He led the fist charge against the traitor's lines, smashing into their barely formed defenses and through, only to become bogged down almost immediately as more men came up, circling his horse. It was only the timely intervention of some of his household's men that kept Mace from death then.

Even so, Lord Dunn and his fellows were able to retreat into the fort and the better defenses set up around it, holding out with their archers and bogging down Mace and his portion of the army. Until Lord Staedmon led his men across the now undefended bridges, falling on the beleaguered defenders from behind and more importantly bringing enough infantry to storm their lines and the fort. Men began to surrender then, throwing down their weapons and getting on their knees where they stood, but the men in the actual fort kept fighting.

As this was going on, Staedmon found Mace in the back of his formation. Mace's shoulder plate was badly dented, and his helmet was missing. Blood caked one side of his face, and he appeared a little dazed, but his guards, all men chosen by Willas and Loras back in Highgarden, had command of the battle and were doing well.

Staedmon had decided to aid Mace in crushing the rebels instead of reinforcing Renly's frontline. Randyll had sent a runner to him, ordering him to fall back over the bridges. Randyll felt that the first day of the battle was lost, momentum was totally on Stannis' side. But if the Reach/Stormlands army could fall back in good enough order, they could come back after rebuilding their morale and pin Stannis against the still manned forts. Staedmon had agreed with the idea, it made sense and allowed him to not commit his forces just yet.

"Lord Tyrell!" Alesander shouted to be heard over the ongoing tumult of battle. "We need to guard the bridge! Get your archers over there, I'll leave some of my infantry and... my lord, are you listening!?" Mace had been staring at him, his eyes uncomprehending.

"Mace took a blow to the head Lord Staedmon, he hasn't been able to concentrate for a few minutes." Lord Fossoway said from where he had pushed up his faceplate huffing heavily at the exertion of the battle thus far.

"Damn it, fine, then you tell someone to get the archers over there, if Renly and his force are forced to retreat, Stannis will be right behind him!" Staedmon barked, turning away. "Leave someone to watch the idiot, I'll send House Caron's forces to aid you finishing off the men around the fort, but after that move your men over to the bridge!"

OOOOOO

Loras was wiping his sword off on the tabard of a Lannister supporter from one of the Crownlands houses, he didn't recognize it offhand. His heavily enameled armor had been badly dented, and one of his shoulders felt a little stiff as he moved it under his armor. But like Loras himself, once you removed the enamel covering it, you found the steel waiting underneath. He had personally killed at least ten men today, and more than one had been a passably decent swordsman, but none had been up to his level.

Cleaning his blade was just something for his hands to do while he stared incredulously at the knight he had sent to speak to Alekyne. "Are you telling me that buffoon saw Cersei and her bastard, along with the Kingslayer escape past his lines and didn't pursue them?!"

"Alekyne Florent lost several dozen mounted men my lord, and the remaining horses were run off during the battle or stolen. He couldn't pursue them."

"Damn convenient for the coward." Lord Ashford scoffed. "He could have chased after them on foot, but I doubt the yellowbelly wants any part of the Kingslayer."

"I on the other hand do." Loras replied, staring northward. "Let's get after them. If we don't catch them up before the sun starts to set, we'll rest then, and send word back to the rest of the army. But I want us on the Lannisters heels right now!"

"My lord, what about the battle against Stannis? We have over five thousand men here my lord, surely we should just send a small force to trail the Lannisters and then turn to aid His Majesty against his brother?" Ashford asked hesitantly.

He had noticed throughout the day that something seemed to have happened between Renly and Loras. Many of the Reach lords had noticed that their friendship had waned. They had come up with myriad reasons for the sudden change, ranging from the idea that Renly felt guilty about his friends disfigurement to some reasons based on some of them believing the Lannister propaganda about Renly's preferences. Whatever it was, it seemed to have come to a head last night, and it was effecting Loras' thinking.

Loras frowned, looking back over his shoulder toward where the main battle was occurring, just beyond his line of vision. then back to the north. If they attacked from here they would be able to strike at Stannis' rear, but Cersei and her family would get away cleanly. For a moment, just a moment the future of all Westeros tilted in the balance.

Then the moment passed and Loras shook his head. "No, we have a chance to finish off the Lannisters right now. My father and the others will be able to handle Stannis, but we can't finish him off to simply let Cersei and her bastard get meet up with Tywin in the Riverlands. If they do that, they can fall back into the Westerlands, and this war might continue for years even if we're able to ally with the Starks. Strategically, the Lannisters are a much larger threat than Stannis."

Personally Loras felt that just wasn't going to happen until Renly admitted his cowardice in fleeing from King's Landing. That just wasn't going to happen, it would be political suicide, but that wouldn't matter to the Starks, whose patriarch had nearly died in a battle that they might well have won if Renly had stayed to aid them.

"Besides," Loras went on. "Given what I saw last night, the 'marriage' between Renly and Margaery might never have been consummated." That was hinting at something a little too close to home, but frankly Loras no longer cared about keeping Renly's secrets.

Lord Ashford frowned, wondering what by the Seven that could mean, but still nodded to Loras' other points. Tywin had strode Westeros like a giant for so long, the fear of him was something to conjure with, even now when he had evidently suffered a major military defeat. Letting him and the royals join up was no doubt a very bad idea. "I suppose that makes sense my lord."

Loras nodded, then turned to his bugler and began to pass on orders to his men, forming them up for a march. Not twenty minutes later, they were gone, leaving the forts they had aided behind them as they moved north along the Kingsroad.

OOOOOO

The main battle had seesawed wildly, with both sides able to break their opponents shield walls here and there to claim momentary advantage, but neither able to really deliver a crippling blow, but Stannis' troops had gradually pushed Renly's men back and further back, blunted only by the fact they didn't have enough cavalry to envelop Renly, but the archers on both sides had dueled for hours, with hundreds on both sides dying. The army was close to breaking, but the news that the traitors on the southern side of the Blackwater had been crushed and that the Tyrell/Staedmon force was waiting for them there kept most of the men from losing that last bit of morale that kept them going. But it was becoming close, every unit commander could feel it.

The final straw came suddenly as it always did. Randyll was once again at the front of the battle, rallying the western edge of the army's line, where Stannis had committed his last few units of cavalry along with two-thirds of his reserve to try and shatter that flank permanently. Randyll and his men had just beaten off the assault when an arrow came out of nowhere and caught him directly in the eye-slit of his helmet. It caught Randyll in the eye and continued on, piercing his brain and killing him instantly.

Heartsbane fell out of his lifeless hands to the ground below as Randyll Tarly slowly collapsed sideways out of his saddle. The Valyrian blade was quickly picked up by one of his bannermen, who quickly shouted orders to his fellows while another man began to wave the Tarly banner in the air. "Our Lord is slain. Our duty is to our house, not Renly, let's get out of here!"

The Tarly armymen were very well trained and had previously been well led. Moreover they were a unified force. Under the command of Terrence Hunt they backed away from what forces Stannis still had on the eastern flank, making towards the city before cutting back south, making for the same bridge Mace had previously used to flank the traitors.

With Randyll dead, the full weight of command fell on Renly's unprepared shoulders. But not only did Renly not realize he had to, still embroiled with the battle at the front lines, he'd already proven that he wasn't it up to the task by the night assault debacle. Here and there lords from both the Reach and the Stormlands slowly began to pull their own men back, or simply surrender where they were. Worse, when news of Randyll's fall began to spread panic set in, the remaining levy force broke entirely, throwing down their arms and running away here and there or simply surrendering, getting in the way of their fellows who were still up for the battle.

At that point Renly finally realized what had happened, the shout of 'Lord Tarly is slain, all is lost!' moving through the army. Pulling back slightly from the front lines, Renly looked around him wildly, noticing men everywhere he looked throwing their weapons down or simply turning and fleeing the battle. Waving his sword in the air Renly gathered his remaining Rainbow Guard shouting aloud. "We need to rally the men!"

Robar spoke up from where he stood on his own feet by the side of Renly's horse. He had been unhorsed early on in the battle but had acquitted himself well, his rune marked longsword red to the hilt with blood. "My Lord this battle is lost! We should retreat across the rush like we had been planning! "

"Retreat where?" said Ser Mullendore, shaking his head looking this way and that, his eyes wide behind his full helmet. Real battle had not been anything like the stories or the tournaments he had been used to. He wasn't alone in thinking that, many of the 'summer knights', the men who had not seen battle before this from the Reach or the Stormlands, had broken or were in the process of breaking now, and Mullendore was on that ragged edge.

"Nowhere," said Bryce Caron, grimly flicking down his visor again, exchanging a last shoulder thump with his bastard brother Rolland before readying himself. "Here they come!"

Around them the last line of Stormlands infantry between the Rainbow Guard and Stannis' advancing troops had finally broken, killed where they stood or fleeing for their lives. Through the panicking armsmen came a few men of the Flame Guard, advancing purposefully at the head of several dozen infantrymen, ignoring the fleeing enemies to race towards the Rainbow Guard quickly. At their head Stannis was moving forward purposefully, Lightbringer burning in one hand, sizzling and crackling from the blood of its latest victim. "Surrender, Renly!" Stannis bellowed.

Renly scowled. For once in his life he felt the hot rage that his family was known for, burning away his sense of self-preservation at the worst possible moment. Pulling down his visor he waved his blade in the air once more. "Ours is the fury!" And with that he spurred to meet his brother.

No one would ever know whether or not Stannis would really have killed his brother in person because Renly's charge was interrupted by a few of the Fire Guard who had dismounted during the battle, bringing up spears that they had grabbed from their own infantrymen. One spear caught Renly's horse in the throat, punching through its armor and killing it instantly, throwing Renly out of the saddle. He rose, his sword whistling to cut deep into one man's side and then his sword shield bashing out catching another man in the knee sending him to the ground screaming in agony.

While his remaining Rainbow Guard tried to get to him a mace found Renly's head slamming into it with punishing force. Renly lost his helmet, knocked off his head from that blow but still was able to bring his sword up into the man's guts. Then a spear found his back. Renly Baratheon staggered, arching his back in agony as he screamed. Even spitted like he was however Renly was able to reach around behind him and yank the spear out the while the man on the other side was hacked down by Robar. Nearby Bryce and Rolland stood back to back hacking at any of the Fire Guard who came near them, unable to reach Renly. Ser Mullendore had run, flogging his horse into a lather to escape the Fire Guard.

Renly turned, bringing up his sword to block another blow that would have caught him in the shoulder, his shield flashing out to catch the man in the crotch, shattering his balls. Then Renly's strength failed him as the agony from the wound in his back hit him, and he went to one knee. Someone with a short sword stabbed him through the shoulder and Renly tried to raise his blade to attack the man only to have it knocked out of his hands. An axe then found his side.

Renly Baratheon, would-be King of Westeros fell on that blood-soaked plane. Not to a champion from his brothers forces, not to a Lord or even a knight. He fell to several dozen common born armsmen, not one of whom even realized in the heat of battle who he was, Renly having lost his crown long since.

Stannis stared around at the men who had slain his brother. Two of the men who had been protecting Renly had surrendered immediately seeing his death, shouting "A ransom, A ransom!" which was better than any other shout they could have tried to the armsmen around them. The last of the Rainbow Guard Robar Royce died instead of surrendering, spitted on Lightbringer.

Looking at the body of his younger brother grief filled Stannis, not grief for the death of the man that Renly had become but of the younger boy who he had once known, who had looked up to his older brother during the siege of Storm's End, who had followed him and Robert around and played at being a knight. The reality of war is rather different than what your imagination created, isn't it brother? Still, he thought to himself, his thoughts rather morbid and slow at the moment, at least I won't have to execute him myself. Then more important matters once more interceded, and Stannis raised Lightbringer up, the flames of it catching the eyes of thousands all around as he shouted, "Renly the pretender is dead, lay down your arms or die as traitors!"

OOOOOO

The battle soon petered out after that, with the Reach and Stormlands men on this side of the Blackwater no longer having reason to fight or the will to do so, really. The Stormlands men in particular were eager to switch sides now. Stannis had proven his strength on the battlefield, and was now the only Baratheon remaining unless they wanted to follow the blonde bastard. Those units of the Reach that were still under control however fell back quickly moving south join Lord Tyrell and Lord Staedmon on the other side of the bridge. Together with the men already there they numbered about sixteen thousand men, but their morale was shot to hell, and Mace and Lord Staedmon were not a united front by any means. Even after Mace regained his senses, he was unwilling to simply submit to Stannis as Lord Staedmon was. This caused a rift in their forces, with Staedmon and his men, along with the men of the Stormlands lords under his command, moving down the Blackwater to camp between the forts controlled by Mace and his ally. Mace did however immediately send a messenger over to open peace talks.

The levy forces of the Reach had been massacred. Unable to get away, unable to surrender, and as poorly armed and led as they were they had never had a chance. Several lords had died, along with much of their forces, and dozens of lords had been captured from both the Reach and the Stormlands. Even so, Stannis knew he had taken casualties too, and many of the forts and siege lines around King's Landing were still manned. Magnanimous in his victory however, he allowed the Reach Lords across the Blackwater to send messages to their fellows while he saw to his brother's burial.

Later, while Lord Buckler and Lord Bolling took over reorganizing the army and preparing their camp, plus of course setting ransoms for the knights and lords captured, Stannis reluctantly met with Mace. The two of them met well out of bow range from both their armies but in full sight of them, accompanied by no one else.

Mace was still stiff from his injuries, but he stared defiantly at Stannis, blustering as always. "The Reach will never surrender to you!"

"Why would I seek war with the Reach now when Renly is dead?" Stannis replied simply. "All I want is for much of the Reach forces to head home, to retake their lands and to destroy the Ironborn invasion. I'll keep some of their forces here, but not many."

"They'll do that anyway." Mace replied rather bitterly. With Renly dead, many of the Reach lords had lost their will to fight for the Iron throne when their homes were in danger. Dunn and his allies were gone, executed after the battle or killed during it, but their desires were shared by many of the remaining Reach lords and all their remaining men, a decent chunk of the Reach's remaining strength. If Mace didn't send at least some of them back to aid Garlan in his campaign, he might face mass desertions or even another uprising like Dunn and Norcross.

"True, but the lords I've captured and in particular the Lords who are still in command of the forces around King's Landing would not. They may still follow you." Stannis smiled grimly. "Unlike my men, I would rather have the loyalty of those lords rather than the money returning them to their families would bring. That doesn't even consider the men under your son that were spotted heading north for some reason. To that end, I think we need to talk."

"Why?" Mace asked suspiciously. "You're not known for your ability to use diplomacy Stannis. And that's not even considering the Shadow monsters you've made use of in this battle or the one you sent after your brother last night."

"Several reasons." Stannis replied not taking umbrage at the other man's tone or words. "One, winter is coming, that Stark motto is true now. All the signs point to it being a long one, and the Reach is well known as the bread basket of all Westeros. I will need the Reach and it's agriculture working as best it can, which means I can't afford to let it fall into chaos with your death or the death of your forces here. Willas may be able to take over for you easily enough, but I understand he is deep in an invasion of the Westerlands right now. And Garlan is a soldier, not an organizer or land manager."

Of course Stannis wasn't certain if he could even deal with either of those though the chances would go down after their father's death obviously. And he knew that with the return of the dragons the other roses might be inclined to go with that ally rather than him. "Second, trying to subjugate the Reach would take time, and men I can ill afford to lose. Those men on the other side of the Blackwater aren't exactly on my side, they were just no longer willing to remain here and be on Renly's side. Moreover some of the Lords manning the fort around the city have refused to give in. I could take them each in turn of course, but doing so would cost my men lives, and their own, plus time. I need those lives."

"And fourth." Stannis said, leaning forward. "It has recently been confirmed that my wife is barren, my daughter will most likely suffer from the same affliction. As such, I need a wife, a queen. I don't suppose you know where I can find one. Do you?"

OOOOOO

Ranma and his party reached Raventree Hall four days after their meeting with the Brothers without Borders. As soon as they were within sight of the castle horns began to bellow a joyful tune, and there was much shouting and jubilation coming from the walls. "I think word of our success has gone before us!" Greatjon laughed reaching over to slap Ranma and Jon on the shoulder in turn.

"News of victory tends to do that!" Jon laughed, and the party continued on its way, speeding up now as men on horseback rode out to meet them, most of them in Blackwood colors. At their head was Tytos himself. "Lord Stark," he said bowing his head from the saddle, trying not to show any awe at the massive direwolf the Stark youth was riding as easily as a horse. He had gotten used to Nymeria somewhat in the past few days, but even so... "I am Tytos Blackwood, your wife has told me much about your campaign thus far in the Riverlands, as well as the real reasons behind this war. My Hall is yours."

Ranma nodded, reaching across to exchange hand clasps with the man. "Tytos, your loyalty to house Tully does both you and your house credit. I'm sorry we couldn't get down here sooner, and I hope that your lands haven't been too badly despoiled."

"Not overmuch no. Bracken wanted to take our lands over and so they were careful not to do any permanent harm such as poisoning wells or salting the farmlands." Tytos suddenly stopped speaking, taking in the sight of the prisoners with wide eyes. "We'd heard rumors that you had captured the old lion, but I honestly didn't believe it. Killed possibly, but actually captured?"

"In the end, that old lion is more of a politician than a general." Ranma smirked, before turning more grim. "I fully expect that Stannis is going to give us a much harder battle."

"And you're sure that it will come to battle between you two?" Tytos said as he pulled his horse around, swinging into the column to ride between Ranma and Greatjon exchanging nods with the northern Lord who had met during the Greyjoy Rebellion.

"Seeing as he has already sent magical creatures to attack me and mine I would hesitate to say that peace is possible between us." Ranma said now smirking quite a bit more. "Besides, I've heard too much about his new religion to want to have any part of it. That doesn't even mention the fact that my wife is a threat to his position."

By that time they had reached the gate into Raventree Hall, and Ranma rode through the gate to resounding cheers and shouts from all around, shouts of 'King of the North', 'Stark!', and general hurrahs. But Ranma had no attention for any of these, his eyes were locked on his friends and Daenerys, all of whom were standing together in front of the gate into the keep. Quickly Ranma swung off Fenris, letting him bound over to his sister along with Ghost, and moved forward.

Daenerys was just bowing and saying "I take it your mission was a success my husband," but before she could get more than "I take it" out of her mouth, Ranma had picked her up by the waist, twirling her around in midair before leaning up into a kiss that took her breath away. All around the shouts redoubled, joined by whistles and cheers as even the Wolfsworn laughed and shook their heads at Ranma's disdain for propriety. Daenerys however didn't notice anything, simply leaning into the kiss her arms going around Ranma's shoulders.

Eventually however reality reasserted itself and Ranma pulled away letting Daenerys down to the ground reluctantly. He murmured into her silver hair in ancient Valyrian "Avyjorraelan, Daenerys Targaryen."

"Avyjorraelan, Ranma Stark." Daenerys replied in the same language nestling into his shoulder and neck for a moment before turning away, moving back to stand beside Myrcella who had watched the exchange with joy in her eyes.

Arya came forward, grinning up at her brother. "Did you catch them? Daenerys told us you were chasing down the old lion."

Ranma laughed, reaching out to ruffle her hair affectionately, knowing she wasn't one for hugging most of the time.

"Caught Tywin and more besides." Ranma gestured with his other hand to the prisoners who were now being led inside. "Another one of his brother's nephews, another nephew of some kind and an uncle." He looked back to Daenerys who was scowling angrily at the site of the Lannisters. "Enough to both see that justice is done and retain enough hostages to make certain the Lannisters will no longer wish to fight us."

"Good." Daenerys replied simply, not taking her eyes off where Tywin was being led down to the keep's dungeons, which were set in a small separate building leading down to a basement beside the central keep of Raventree Hall. "Very good indeed..."

He looked at Myrcella who was staring at the prisoners with a cold face. Thinking he knew what she was thinking he moved over to her next, pulling her into a gentle hug and whispering in her ear. "Don't worry Merry, I can't pass judgment on them for their actions here in the Riverlands, but you won't have to be present for that. I'm sorry, but that's all I can do. Justice needs to be served."

Merry sighed, putting her arms around his waist in a brief but heartfelt hug before letting them fall back to hang by her side, though Ranma hadn't pulled back from the hug just yet. "I know, Daenerys explained matters well enough before this, and really I've never gotten to know most of my family. We spent most of our time in King's Landing, and only occasionally went to the Westerlands. I might know one or two of their names from seeing them at tournaments or the few times we went to Casterly Rock, or when they came to pass messages on to my mother, but that's all."

"Besides..." She went on much more grimly. "Remember I've been dealing with the injured and wounded of not just the army but the smallfolk when I have the time. I've heard all the tales of the horrors the Westerlands army committed here, and seen more than a few examples of it too."

"I know, Ranma said, turning his attention back to Arya and the young girl who was trying to hide behind her while staring up at him through wide eyes. "And who's this?"

"This is Bess Bracken." Arya said somewhat hesitant way. "I was hoping, to, um to keep her with us as a sort of servant for myself? But not quite?"

"A page sort of thing." Ranma said bending down now to stare into the girls eyes. "And is this something you want too, milady?"

"Yes, your Majesty." the girl said and Ranma laughed.

"Ack, you don't have to call me by my title if I'm not sitting in judgment or giving out orders lass." he said kindly, reaching over to rub her hair just as he did Arya's. "So long as Arya is willing to look out for you, I suppose that's fine. Though obviously given your age you won't be allowed to roam the army's camps when we stop, and you have to stick with Arya for most of the time in any event."

"That's fine." Bess said quickly, staring at Ranma with something approaching hero worship. She was astonished that Ranma didn't seem to care about her last name in all, and indeed Ranma didn't. His policy had been set back with the Twins. The children of traitors would not be physically harmed in his retaliation against their house unless they were part of the treason.

Arya however had turned to stare at the young boy and the other strangers that had arrived with the army. The youth wore a longsword on his back and moved like a trained warrior, with that bit of added lightness to his feet that Arya recognized as one of the first signs of Ranma's training. A small, heretofore unknown part of her mind also noted he was rather cute. She ignored that however, simply wondering who he and the others were, and why Ranma had saw fit to train him.

Ranma stood up, looking around at the Wolfsworn and in particular Dacey. "I think we all have some tales to share, let me see to the men and then I would love to hear how you and the others took Stone Hedge, and everything else. Though I note that there don't seem to be nearly as many men around as there should be, and Lord Mallister isn't here either."

"That would be my doing." Daenerys replied, taking one of his arms in hers. "I didn't want us to overburden House Blackwood land, I thought that would be a ill turn to deal to an ally. So when we arrived I split the army up into smaller commands once more. I sent the most rested of our troops, mostly the ones that had relieved Raventree Hall, down with Lord Mallister to camp outside Harrentown, then the most weary back to Harroway under Timot Hammerhand. Is that really his last name by the way?"

"No, Timot got that name from a kind of joke from his youth." Ranma said talking about an older Stark man who had served his family as long as Ranma had been alive and quite a bit longer besides. "He was known as a boxer in his youth, one of the few northern men willing to go toe to toe with Greatjon. He never won obviously, but it still made a name for him."

Despite that however he knew Timot to be an intelligent and thoughtful man, and a very good organizer. Timot had served as Jon and Patrek as their second in command when they had been handling the army's logistics. Not the sort Ranma would put in charge of a battle by any means, but on a march from one place to another and the refit of the army, certainly.

"I told him that once Lord Karstark arrived back from the Salt Pans he should turn over command to him unless something else came up. We captured a lot of supplies from Stone Hedge, enough to feed the Army for weeks, but I thought we should only keep half of those and turn the other half over to helping with the refugees that have already begun to trickle back to their lands. I left a small contingent at Stone Hedge to hold it under a knight that Sir Wendel recommended, he'll be in charge of feeding the refugees as they move back to their lands around there." Daenerys went on.

By that point Ranma, Daenerys and the people following them had entered the keep and were now being escorted through the keep by a servant to a small sitting room on the fourth floor. Instead of taking up the position of the Lord, a single chair in front of a small low-slung table, Ranma took a small sofa, pulling Daenerys down next to him and throwing an arm around her shoulders smiling contentedly, grinning at Merry who automatically moved to sit on a small footstool to his other side. She giggled a little, then winked at Daenerys who smirked back. Ranma closed his eyes contentedly, while the others filed in, then opened his eyes and looked over at Dacey. "I think we all need to get caught up on what we've all been doing, Dacey you start."

That process took several hours, by which time food had arrived. It was an extremely convivial affair, with everyone laughing as Arya interjected her bit about the eldest Bracken daughter trying to flirt with Roger. The battles fought to retain control of Stone Hedge were much more interesting though especially Lord Bracken's capture which was a surprise to Ranma and those who had chased Tywin down.

Another surprise was his great uncle Brynden's tale. "So both Lord Broom and Lord Vypren are dead? That's a shock. I had thought that Tywin would try to keep his remaining Lords alive." Ranma and his men had made a note of the lords his in-battle assassination idea had killed in the battle by the Ruby Ford of course.

"It certainly surprised me to at the time." Brynden said smirking a little. His clothing was the most travel stained and worn of them all, and even now the better part of a week after his part of the campaign had ended he still looked weary. "It was simply a literal example of the fog of war. You see..."

Flashback:

Brynden wiped his face free of rain for a brief moment staring around him. Behind him the six men of the small scout force he had been personally leading were also looking around. After a moment Brynden shrugged his shoulders and whispered "If any of you see any landmarks you recognize tell me, because I am completely lost in this rain."

This wasn't just rain thought. This was a torrential downpour, the rain and fog was so heavy you could barely see five feet in front of you. The same rains that had fallen on Ranma's army lightly a few days after they left the Ruby Ford had simply sat in the area Brynden was chasing the Westerlands through and dumped everything it had on them.

"Look on the bright side milord." Said one of his men with false joviality. "If we Riverlanders are having trouble moving through this, the bloody Westerlanders must be bogged down something fierce."

"True." Brynden replied. "Which is why I want to find some Seven-damned landmarks! If we're where I think we are, we can possibly get ahead of them and prepare another ambush."

A moment later however that thought was driven out of Brynden's head when several men on horseback rode through the small muddy riverbank that Brynden had occupied of their second before. Luckily the sounds of their hooves had alerted him and his men, and they had hidden themselves quickly.

One of the men nearby put an arrow to his string quickly, and even through the rain was able to get off a single shot which took one of the horsemen in the thigh. The other six cavalymen tried to turn, but the rain was hampering their vision just as much as the Riverlander. Several of Brynden's men were able to fade back into the scrubland, and Brynden threw himself down into a small muddy ditch.

One of the horses actually paused directly over him and he heard voices about. "Lord Vypren, we can't chase after them in this rain, we be chasing our own tails!"

"I know." Said a voice directly above Brynden, the voice dark and angry. "But I want to hurt the Northerners at least a little as recompense for the destruction of my seat and the capture of my family. Thanks to that old toothless lion I haven't been able to even join in the battles yet! If I had..." the voice turned rather boastful. "We might have won that battle at the Ruby Ford."

Another voice muttered as if to itself, though the voice carried through the rain slightly. "And pigs could fly."

Brynden was inclined to agree with this second voice, but he also wasn't about to let a gift like this pass by. Slowly he reached above him and began to saw through the bottom buckle holding the saddle onto the horse directly above him. He was very careful about it, yet even so one of the horses hooves nearly caught him, but he finished and then laid back down in the ditch, lying prone and letting the rain wipe off some of the mud on him while the Westerlanders continued their discussion above him.

"I don't know why Tywin is even trying to push this through this rain, it's obvious that even the Northerners won't be able to follow us closely in this, in fact I bet they've already stopped for the day. Trying to continue in this is foolish in the extreme, it's only chance and luck that will let any of our scouts find the main army again."

"True enough, but Tywin is still afraid of the wolves catching up with him with those pike in the open."

"He's not the only one." Another voice muttered, sounding scared. "I've faced pike before, but nothing like that. Those men acted like one person, there wasn't a way you could get between them, no way to get at them and those pikes kept on pushing and..."

There was a moment of silence above Brynden, and then Vypren shook his head. "Enough, we're not getting anything done sitting here wool-gathering. Let's move on."

The men all kneed their horses into motion and Vypren did the same a second later. Only when he did, it his saddle began to slip back off his horse almost immediately. "What the..." Before he could shout for help his horse kept on going into the rain, spilling Vypren out of the saddle.

Brynden began to pull himself out of the dish to move towards Vypren where he sprawled on the ground, trying to push himself to his feet hampered by the full plate armor he wore. In comparison Brynden only had light chain mail on. Even so, Vypren had already been pulling out his sword the moment he felt his saddle began to shift, and he was up on one knee lashing out blindly with his blade before Brynden could pull himself out of the muddy ditch.

The mud clung to him as he moved forward, engaging the downed man sword to sword. "Alarm!" Vypren began to shout then paused as he stared hard at the man facing them. "Brynden Tully!" he exclaimed, then pushed hard against Brynden's blade, before coming up with a sweep that he had hoped to catch Brynden in the shoulder with.

But Brynden moved aside at the last moment, letting Vypren's blade whistle past before stabbing forward with his own blade only for Vypren to turn slightly to allow it to skitter across his armor rather than penetrate. Vypren's fist caught Brynden in the chin, throwing him back slightly. "I wanted to hurt the Northerners, I think losing one of their best generals will settle accounts nicely!"

Not speaking, Brynden locked blades with the Vypren, then forced both blade to one side before smashing his shoulder into the other man's chest, taking him off his feet and down to the ground. But one of Vypren's hands left his sword hilt, grabbing Brynden's arm and pulling him down as well. The two of them rolled around in the muck and mire, the blades lost when they hit the ground punching and kicking as they could.

Vypren lost his helmet, but eventually gained the upper hand thanks to his slightly greater strength and weight, pinning Brynden underneath them. But Brynden reached out with one hand grabbing up a rock and slamming it into the Vypren's face. Blood flew and Vypren began to scream, as his eye was caught by that blow, popped like a grape. Both of his hands moving from where they had been holding Brynden down to touch his ravaged face as he tried to push himself to his feet to get away from his opponent.

But Brynden whipped out his belt buckle's knife then thrust upwards, catching Vypren directly underneath his chest plate pushing it deep into the man's guts. He moved to his knees, pushing the dying man's body off him while he reached out with his other hand, putting it over Vypren's mouth so his screams could not be heard through the rain.

However the sound of their battle had been heard, and Brynden could already hear the jingle of harness as the other Westerlanders came back to see what was going on. Throwing the dead body into the same ditch that he had been hiding in before, Brynden moved off silently through the woods, chuckling quietly at yet another traitor getting his just desserts.

End Flashback

"Lord Broom's death was much less..." Brynden paused then shrugged "Muddy." As his listeners laughed, Brynden went on. "There was nothing glorious it, it was planned simply chance. Chance played a part in Lord Broom's death as well. We had found a small ridge line where we could prepare our archers and rake their army as they marched along. We waited for the central portion of the army to pass before he opened fire. Broom was simply one of the casualties.

Silas nodded, looking at Brynden with respect. "Brynden planned a masterful chase my Lords, I doubt Tywin had even an inkling of what was happening or that the entire northern army wasn't behind him. We cost them hundreds, possibly thousands of men. He shook his head. "The only problem is, they also began to have a major desertion problem. We'll have to put together a bandit hunting expedition to winkle them all out."

"Not just there, Ranma and Daenerys said together, " then looked at one another as everyone else laughed. Daenerys shrugged and went on. "I would bet they were also having an issue with deserters before that, and with looters that never returned." He looked over at Ser Blantree. "Ser Blantree, would you be willing to lead such an expedition?"

"So long as I can receive local guides my lady, I have no issue with that. I would prefer to start around here and work our way out, in particular towards Acorn Hall and then down to Wayfarer's Rest before making my way back up. That area is the most ravaged by the Westerlanders, and I think, despite what Silas says, will have a larger percentage of looters and other dishonorable folk acting in it."

"That will do for now, how about you tell us how this siege went Lord Blackwood? Ranma asked. "As well as events before that and the battle at the Kneeling man's Ford."

Tytos nodded assent and told them everything he knew about the initial few months of the campaign against the Westerlanders. He told them how he had tried to convince the Vance brothers to continue their skirmishing campaign against the Lannisters rather than a standup fight, how he had retreated and how the siege had not been so onerous thanks to his having time enough to prepare forward. "But," he concluded. "It would have become much worse if your relief force hadn't arrived. The besiegers were just starting to tunnel, and even though my castle sits mostly on granite they could've found a weak point. Tunnel fighting like that is a horrendously bloody affair."

Ranma nodded. "I know I said it before, but it bears repeating," he said as he looked at Tytos and his two oldest sons who had joined him for this conference, bowing his head. "Thank you. Your loyalty to my grandfather will not be forgotten."

"We did as honor dictated." Tytos replied waving his hand airily, though his eyes glimmered appreciatively at Ranma's thanks.

"I understand you have a godswood here?" Ranma asked.

"Yes, but our weirwood tree is dead." Tytos scowled angrily. "It was the poisoning of our tree that set my house against House Bracken."

"Nonetheless even without a weirwood tree being in a godswood would be a touch of home after so long away." Ranma said shaking his head. "And I'll send word to Winterfell to see if we can find a sapling to send to you."

Tytos nodded gratefully, never having considered that idea before. The weirwood tree had been dead for so long that replacing it had never occurred to him or any of his ancestors.

Ranma moved on to other matters. "I agree wholeheartedly with the splitting of the Army, though I've no idea how likely it is the Lannisters in Harrenhal will try to make trouble. Keeping them penned up there is simply good sense. Other than that, I want to give the army at least a week to recuperate. We've been pushing them hard for months now. Every aspect of the army save the bandit hunting group."

He looked over at Ser Blantree his eyes grim. "Ser Blantree, as my grandfather's representative I formally give you leave to try and execute bandits as you find them. These men will be desperate, they will be hard and dangerous men, not like those who surrendered to us. They willingly decided to run and try their luck living off the land and their fellow man's work. As such, they deserve no mercy and will get none unless you deem it so. Do you agree to perform this duty?"

Ser Blantree stood then bowed formally. "I shall perform my duty to the best of my abilities my lord."

Ranma nodded, running one hand through his hair down to his ponytail and pulling on it thoughtfully. "Have we got any messages from Domic and Alayaya?" The two of them had stayed behind in Harroway, thinking that it was the best place to gather rumors and news from the rest of Westeros.

"No." Daenerys replied, leaning away slightly from him to lean against the other arm of the sofa allowing her to better look him in the eyes. We received word that Lord Karstark had sent word up from Saltpan however." She detailed what happened in that beleaguered town, causing most of the Riverlanders around her to scowl though Lord Ryger seemed more irritated that his guess had been so far off than anything else.

"Domic also sent a message that he is waiting for some news to reach him from further south, but he didn't tell explain what." Daenerys's was rather irritated by that frankly. She trusted Domic not to keep things from her, he just tended to want to make certain of his sources and information before sharing them. That was a good thing she supposed, but it did slow down the flow of information to her and Ranma.

"Damn. I'd like to know more information and possibly even get back a reply from the Vale before we start planning our next move. We'll need to start gathering the captured Lords and their men for trials. I'll send out messages to that effect tomorrow. Until the trials begin, no one is to speak to any of the Lannisters. Tywin is well known to have a silver tongue and very deep gold lined pocket. I trust most of our men, but there's no need to let temptation rear its ugly head. Other than that my Lords, I think that we can afford to have a few days break." With that he stood up, looking over at Daenerys who nodded in turn. She too stood up, bowing slightly and exited the room.

Several hours later Daenerys sighed, stretching luxuriantly in the small tub while her body tingled in post-coital bliss. The two had begun their lovemaking after Daenerys had helped Ranma shave, then bathe, though she somewhat regretted the soggy, torn mess that had been her chemise.

Ranma nuzzled into her rest, resting his body lightly over hers. His back was once more crisscross of slashes from her at nails, but they had already begun to heal. "Have I mentioned how much I love this?" she said sighing tiredly.

"Not the only one Dae." Ranma said kissing her porcelain colored breast before moving up lately to nuzzle into her neck. When he spoke next however his voice was serious. "You realize that we were lucky in this campaign right? Tywin underestimated me personally, and he didn't know anything about you or your dragons."

"I know." Daenerys replied nodding her head. " And even if I wasn't aware of it before, Brynden brought that up a few days ago. I'm honestly surprised we haven't heard any news about my brother arriving somewhere in Westeros, either with the Dornish aid or not, and our campaign against the Westerlanders isn't done quite yet, is it?"

"No, it will only be done when we take the Golden Tooth at the very least. We might have to send a small invasion force into the Westerlands, at least until we deal with Joffrey the bastard and his mother, but I hope not to." Ranma grimaced, not looking forward to that. He had respected Cersei, possibly even liked her or at least liked her more than he liked the King. But there was no doubting the fact that she had committed treason defending her son from being outed as a bastard along with the initial act, whoever his father had been. He would deal with her as he needed to regardless of his sister's request in that regard.

"The Wolfsworn and I can deal with the Golden Tooth, one way or the other. Once we have that, the Westerlands won't be able to invade the Riverlands, our back and west will be secure which will be necessary when we march into the Crownlands. I want to fight the next campaign in the Crownlands, the Riverlands have suffered too much already. It will be all they can do to compare for winter."

"I agree wholeheartedly." She had seen far too many burned-out farms and even one village between Stone Hedge and Raventree Hall to doubt that. "And we might be able to at least bring some of the Westerlands under our auspices in the future. Merry and I came up with some ideas there, I think you'll find them interesting." Daenerys said with a fond smile. She changed the subject slightly then. "Do you think the Faith is serious about getting the smallfolk to aid us as they can?"

"I think that Septon Sparrow saw we were truly doing our best not to prey upon the smallfolk, and we haven't gone out of our way to piss off the Seven's Faith. In the short term, that makes us the best candidates he and the rest of the Faith can back. In the long term that might change, but for right now and into winter that's more than enough for me. What help they might be beyond supplies and passing on information though, that I don't know."

"True." Daenerys murmured, slowly becoming uncomfortable as the water in the tub, which had been delivered by several maids earlier, began to cool around their bodies. She pushed Ranma off her gently, taking his hand when he offered to help her up and out of the tub. She flushed in delight at the look of desire on her husband's face as she stepped out of the tub, but her mind remained on more important things. "In the future I think we should place a septon, possibly even the High Septon himself or his representative, on our small council. Or whatever we decide to call our council in the future. Though not for preference the current one High septon, I've heard too many tails about how corrupt he is."

Ranma nodded, then trailed one finger down Daenerys' back while he towed her off. One hand circled her waist, moving up to gently tickle her nipples for a moment while he looking at her with one eyebrow raised. Even though Daenerys could feel her body responding to his gentle touch she shook her head regretfully, moving out of his warm embrace to a bathrobe one of the servants had left. She was a little too sore for more fun right now. Dacey had taken to training her since they had met up at Stone Hedge, and some of the exercises she had her doing made her thighs and legs burn. Now that she was coming out of her post-coital high the pain had returned redoubled. It was all Daenerys could do to keep from wincing.

Instead of being upset or concerned Ranma simply shrugged, patting her rear gently while he moved to his clothing. As he searched for his breeches he called back over his shoulder "I want to check out the godswood here, then talk to Merry."

Daenerys paused in searching around for heard nightshirt, staring over at Ranma enjoying the sight of him being bent over and his magnificent back towards her. Watching the muscles in it move and flex even as he did something so simple as pulling on a shirt was a very sensual sight. "About what?"

"I want to make certain that she really is okay with what's going to happen to at least Tywin, and maybe some of the other Lannister prisoners. I know she said she wasn't close with any of them, but not close with any of them and understanding that some of her family will be executed in the near future is two different things."

Daenerys nodded, smiling fondly at his concern for the other girl, even while she made another mental note to talk to Alayaya about Merry, her and Ranma. She had not forgotten that moment where she had to stop herself from kissing the younger girl in Stone Hedge, nor had that been the last such moment. "She and I have talked about that, and I think her responses will surprise you."

She reached out, taking Ranma's hand. "She cares Ranma, she cares deeply about people not just the people she meets, but the smallfolk she helps and then never sees again, even those she will never see. It's part and parcel of her personality as a healer. And as Merry said earlier, she's seen what the Lannisters have allowed to occur here in the Westerlands up close and personal."

Ranma looked over at Daenerys. What do you think about that Bess girl? I have to say I'm not happy about the idea of another young girl being with the army, especially one who can't defend herself like Arya and Meera. Alayaya was one thing, and she was always accompanied by one of the wolfsworn or Domic, but Bess is much too young, and not trained in any way."

"I think Arya enjoys having another tomboy around, her own age, and she loves to encourage that. I also think Cley has quite a bit of a crush on the girl, though whether to encourage or discourage that is something I haven't decided on just yet." Daenerys replied dryly. Ranma and the others who had them had left their pages and squires with the rest of the army before they began to chase Tywin from the Kneeling Man Ford. They had been a major aid a time or two with her dragons, and Cley had taken to be her personal messenger and aide easily enough. "Are you going to execute her father?"

"That depends on how house Bracken's men acted. If they are simply traitors, then the Lord Bracken will be sent to the Silent Brothers, and their remaining men indentured for five years. But the daughters, I'm still confused on what to do with them."

"Lady Bracken was fully in agreement with her husband's actions." Daenerys replied firmly, laying down on the bed for a few moments. "She should either be sent to the Silent Sisters or exiled to Essos. The older daughters Barbara and Barbara are useless piece of fluff, and they should be sent to the Silent Sisters as well, I wouldn't even keep her as a servant someplace, they are too concerned for their own status to trust not to make trouble. The middle sister Catelyn however might have the beginnings of a decent healer, she and Merry have been talking almost every night since they first met, and she apparently helped nurse Hathan back into health."

She shrugged when Ranma raised an eyebrow in silent query. "There might be something there but Hathan is a very difficult man to read." Ranma chuckled at that, and Daenerys went on seriously. "As for Bess, I think she's a lovely girl, who could become, well, whatever she wishes in the future. There is a somewhat bright mind in that head of hers, and she has a magnificent way with animals."

Ranma tried to remember whether or not the Bracken's came from First Men lines, he knew the Blackwoods did, but couldn't remember about the Brackens. The Blackwoods still kept to the Old Gods, but the Bracken had followed the Faith of the Seven for their entire history, so far as Ranma remembered. He shrugged. The Bess issue was really a small one in the great scheme of things, and not one he was going to spend much time on. "All right." He leaned over the bed now fully dressed, kissing his wife ardently on the lips for a moment before pulling back reluctantly. "I'll be back in a few hours."

"I might be recovered enough by that time to have some more fun." Daenerys replied with a laugh shaking her head. "But if I'm asleep please don't wake me."

Ranma laughed again, kissed her lightly on the forehead and exited the room. He quickly made his way out of the keep and into the small godswood growing to one side of the main keep. It was really very small, nowhere near as large as Winterfell's but just as wild and the smell of it once Ranma was within the trees was like a breath of home, even disguised as it was under the smell of recent rain.

Walking quietly through the trees he found Fenris and the other wolves padding along nearby, and was astonished to find the two dragons also there, curled up in the small clearing that had remained inviolate around the dead weirwood tree. Ranma could tell that it was dead, the normally white bark of the tree was brown and black in places, the face on it had distended into an ugly caricature of a death mask, and its leaves were long since gone. He had no idea how long this tree had been dead, and knew that the odds of the old gods being able to hear him this far south and moreover not in the presence of a living weirwood tree was small.

Still, Ranma sat down on the ground in front of the tree, bowing his head as he began to send his thoughts out to the old gods who had first brought him here. He thanked them once again for the chance to find a family, to find love and a purpose beyond anything his old life had ever held. He sent them thanks for all of this, and hopes for his family back North and for the future.

The tree was dead, as Ranma had seen there was no doubt about that, but this place had still been... not sanctified, that word had no meaning in the old god religion. But it had held the power of the old gods at one point, and that power was such that even with its local font no longer there some power still lingered. It wasn't a vision, the power simply wasn't strong enough for that, just a scent on the wind, a suggestion of an expanse of fresh water. The smell of it hit Ranma through his senses as if he was linked to Fenris, then the vision of an island, and the sense this was a place he had to go in the near future.

Ranma came out of his trance after a few moments. He stood up, looking out into the distance to the southeast from the castle. He felt a slight nudge as if someone was telling him that yes, that was the direction the place he had to be was in and then he came out of it.

Standing up Ranma nodded. "I understand, though it might be a while before I can find wherever you wanted to go." He looked around at the wood and then back at the stricken weirwood tree, shaking his head. "Definitely need to find a sapling to send down here, the Blackwoods deserve no less."

With that Ranma left, heading back to the keep. He found Merry precisely where he knew she would be, working on a few of the wounded from the force that he had let to hunt down Tywin. Several of them had taken wounds though none serious, that final battle against Tywin's forces had been rather anti-climactic. He had to bury several men after the battle against the forces from up from Stone Hedge, but he had only lost two men in that final battle. Merry moved quickly around the room, redoing tourniquets and bandages here and there, making sure that their wounds were healing properly and above all that no one was infected.

Ranma greeted her by his customary one armed hug, pulling the younger girl into his body for a moment between beds. "Hey Merry, can I talk to for second?"

Merry blushed in his arm then looked up at him and nodded. "I'm almost done, only one more person to check okay?"

Nodding equably Ranma moved on over to a nearby wall leaning against it as he watched Merry work. Master Martyn might not have been the nicest person, and a misogynist, but he had been a decent enough teacher, and Merry's skill in healing showed that.

Soon enough she was finished, and the last man trooped out of the makeshift nursery. She joined Ranma by the door, smiling at Ranma and asking "So what do you want to talk about Ranma?"

Ranma smiled back then frowned slowly. "I know you said so earlier Merry, but I wanted to make sure that that you really were okay with what is going to probably happen to Tywin and the others. He is your grandfather after all."

Merry shrugged. "I've only met the man about three or possibly five times in my life. He might have sent nameday gifts occasionally, and a fair few stern rebukes on what books I should be reading just like he did for Joffrey and Tommen, but that's not what I would call being a grandfather." She blushed a little looking away. "If anything, I think your father acted more like a grandfather to me and to Tommy than Lord Lannister ever has."

She looked up at Ranma thoughtfully. "I don't think you ever really realized how you and your families warm, family atmosphere shocked Tommen and I. We'd never had to deal with that kind of thing before, we thought it was normal for us to be treated as if we were set on a pedestal, like our older brother. We had gotten used to having a father that treated us as if we were strangers, and a mother who cared for us in a suffocating sort of way. You, your father and Fenris just by being yourselves, you made it an impression on us."

She shrugged. "I realize that as a Lannister I probably should care, but I really don't. My sense of right and wrong and of family above everything else has been affected by you and what I've seen in your company since we left King's Landing. I know justice must be done, and while I'm not happy that it has to cost my mother's side of the family a few members, as I said earlier, I've seen what they've allowed to occur far too closely to have any doubt about the justice of it."

She looked into Ranma's eyes her own green eyes fierce and for a moment despite her Lannister features Myrcella was all Baratheon. "If I had to, I might well do it myself, not just for what they've let happen here in the Riverlands, but because of my mother and Joffrey's actions in King's Landing. I haven't forgotten that monster killed Tommy, or that my mother started this war to keep him on the throne. I still love her, she's still my mother, but if you have to in the future deal out justice to her as well..."

Merry paused shaking her head. "I won't like it, I won't watch it, but I won't stop you." I won't stop loving you she thought to herself, as Ranma's arms went around her once again in a tight hug.

"You're a very strong young lady you know that Merry?" Ranma asked smiling gently, trying to ignore the part of his mind that was whispering comments about Merry indeed being a young lady rather than a girl anymore as he felt her body against his. "And I'm proud to know you."

Merry blushed hotly, then moved away slightly pushing at Ranma's chest for a moment as Ranma, rather reluctantly despite himself, let her loose. "Anything else you wanted to ask?"

Ranma nodded ruffling her hair affectionately. "Nope, it's a little too late for any other questions. Go find your quarters, Merry, I know I'm eager to sleep in a real bed again."

"Yes but does that mean you're actually going to be sleeping in it or..." Merry trialed off, then laughed as Ranma blushed slightly. Seeing his fingers twitching towards her sides Merry backed away and left the room quickly, still giggling.

Ranma stayed there for a moment looking after her then smiled faintly, then headed back to bed.

Over the next few days Ranma and his men rested, while Ranma personally got to know the Blackwoods. He found each and every one of them down-to-earth, honest and intelligent for the most part, though Lucas, one of the sons wasn't that bright, he was also their best blade. Ranma found that out because he was busy training up Patrek, Cley and young Edric as well as he could, and training with Ser Barristan. The old knight was too old to benefit from most of Ranma's training, but training against Ranma and the other Wolfsworn was still excellent for him.

House Blackwood also had around three thousand men that they were willing to add to Ranma's forces, and Ranma turned them over to Jon for further training. Jon and Roger began endurance training on them all so that they would be able to keep up with the rest of the army on the march and began to train them in unit tactics picking out unit commanders with the help of Lucas Blackwood while Tytos himself spent time with Ranma, Daenerys and putting his lands back into order.

The day after Ranma's arrival Ser Blanetree led the most rested and recuperated men out to start hunting down bandit groups, while the rest of the army stayed behind. Between bouts of training the men did those things army men always had to do, fixing torn equipment, finding lost equipment, putting edges to their weapons, all those sorts of things.

Of course, there were also a few funny moments during those relaxing days. One of which Ranma would always remember, the first time Arya formally met Eddic.

Arya had spent most of her days with Bess and helping Jon train Blackwood's troops, but she was able to find some time to see to her own training one day in the early morning. She was surprised, and rather irritated to find that young boy, Eric or Alric or something that had arrived with the Brother's Without Borders, already there going through some strength and speed exercises she recognized. "Hmhf, I thought Ranma's training was something he reserved for those who had already proven themselves, I guess that's not true."

Eddic turned and saw the girl who had spoken so despairingly was the young Stark girl, the one the Northerners called the She-Wolf. They hadn't been formally introduced, Ranma and Beric overlooking that as Beric tried to compose a message to his betrothed, Allyria (though he still had no way to send it) and Ranma got to know the Blackwoods. Setting aside the fact she was sister to Ranma Stark, whose people had raised him as King of the North, she was still the daughter of a Lord Paramount, however she acted, thus Eddic should have replied politely.

But the derogatory tone the girl had spoken in made his hackles rise, so instead he responded in like coin. "I impressed Lord Stark by the training my lord Beric has given me over the past few years. Several months of which, I would add, which I spent living off the land and fighting as one of the Brothers against the Westerlands forces. Very rarely was I safe, and I certainly didn't have an entire army around me like you must have, miss."

Arya growled, her teeth bared in a pure challenge response. "I've fought in the front of over a dozen battles and not once was I kept back and protected like some damn southern flower!"

"I suppose that makes sense." Eddic replied, which would have defused things if he didn't go on, smirking. "After all, you look more like a weed than a flower." That wasn't quite true any longer. Arya would never have a very womanly figure, but she still had begun to develop some curves that showed her gender, much to her dismay.

Arya growled again, crouching as if to leap forward, but paused, smirking slightly. Calming down, she straightened up, a challenge gleaming in her eyes. "I don't suppose you'd like to see how well your training with the Brothers stands up against a northern wolf would you? Or are you too scared to cross swords with this weed?"

"I would like nothing better miss." Eddic replied, smirking as the miss seemed to irritate the girl.

Not responding verbally, Arya moved over to the nearby rack where training blades were kept, placing Fang there and taking up the training blade she had received with it before moving back to stand across from Eddic. "Any rules to this massac-I mean bout?"

"Rules? Combat has rules? Since when?" Eddic replied sarcastically, then ducked his head as Arya's blade immediately sought his face.

"Good." Arya grinned wolfishly then pressed in hard. Eddic backpedaled at first, but he retained his balance, moving around so that Arya was nearer to the side of the training circle.

Then he kicked out, landing a blow on Arya's thigh that knocked her off balance enough for her training blade to get caught against one of the training grounds posts. His own blade struck forward aiming for Arya's chest, but Arya leaped into the air rising above the blade.

"WHa-ack!" His startled explanation was interrupted by Arya's boot smacking into his face sending him flying, but luckily not breaking his nose. He would have a shiner for days though.

Still Eddic rolled with the kick, and when Arya pressed in her blade flashing in a series of blows he was able to redirect them, if barely each time. Arya laughed, having fun with this and not really trying her hardest, since kicking this boy's butt like this was too fun to end quickly.

That ended when Eddic suddenly kicked up a bit of mud from the ground into Arya's eyes. She gasped, pulling back and reaching up to her face to wipe the mud away and Eddic struck, knocking Arya's blade out of her hand. Before he could capitalize on this however he found his arm gripped in a vice.

"YipE!" With a whoop of displaced air Eddic found himself on his back once again. But he still didn't give up, kicking out and bringing Arya down on top of him. The two of them rolled around on the ground, Arya's blade forgotten behind them. Eddic had the upper hand at first being larger and heavier than Arya, but Arya was much stronger. Eventually they ended with Arya sitting on Eddic's chest, her hands pinning his easily above his head.

But Arya's hands were so small she needed to use both of her hands to keep his arms there. Even so when Eddic bucked under her trying to throw her off Arya kept her position easily, grinning down at the slightly older boy.

Eventually Edric realized he was caught and stopped fighting, and Arya released her hold on his wrists.

One hand pushed down on his chest while the other rose to wipe the remains of the mud from her face along with pushing back a few errant hairs. Her hair had grown longer the past few weeks, though Arya was thinking of cutting it back down. "What's your name again, mud-boy?"

"Edric, Edric Dayne, She-Wolf. And yours?" Edric asked, staring up at her in a strange mix of wounded pride and good humor. He might not have won, but that had been a lot of fun. That, and Arya's stormy gray eyes were rather compelling.

"Arya, Arya Stark." Arya laughed, pushing herself to her feet. "We should do this again some time, but right now, I think I want a bath." With that she strode over, picking up her training blade as Edric remained where he was, watching her interestedly.

Nearby Beric and Ranma lurked, having watched the 'friendly' bout from beginning to end. Beric turned to Ranma and asked, somewhat bemused, "Why do I get the impression that that was your sister's version of flirting?"

"Yeah, it might've been, probably. Let's just say that Arya's... unique, and leave it at that." Ranma murmured, laughing hysterically on the inside.

OOOOOO

Upon arriving at Raventree Hall with his brother Jon had spent a few days simply resting, then talking to the rest of the Wolfsworn in particular Arya, hearing their adventures. The second day however when he was getting up to head out to hunt with Ghost he was interrupted by a knock on the door. "Come in?"

Daenerys entered, dressed as she normally was in leggings and a good solid shirt. "Jon, would you mind accompanying me? I would ask Ranma, but he's going over maps with the cartographers, and I don't want to disturb him for a personal matter like this."

"A personal matter?" Jon asked, getting to his feet quickly. "What kind of personal matter?"

"I wish to ask Tywin a question, one that has haunted much of my life." She smiled thinly.

Moments later the two of them walked down into the dungeons, accompanied by Ser Barristan, who was once more connected to Daenerys's hip as her bodyguard. Raventree Hall did not have enough suites for both its guests and its prisoners, so even the Lannisters had been placed in the normal cells in the dungeons, though Tywin was separated by the others by several empty cells, and there were several guards routinely patrolling the corridor. All of them had been personally chosen by Ranma and Tytos but Tywin continued to try to bribe someone to free him. It hadn't worked yet.

Tywin stood up as he heard a female voice down the corridor, wondering if this might be his granddaughter come to see him. That the girl had not as yet was strange, as was the glare she had sent him when he arrived. However as the voices closed Tywin realized that it was not his granddaughter, but the Targaryen girl. He watched her as she stood on the other side of his cells door, staring at him. "Tywin Lannister, you used to be one of my childhood bogeymen, yet in reality you're not nearly as terrifying as I thought. Of course the Starks were as well, and I have learned long since that reality very rarely matches nightmare."

"You would be the Stormborn girl," Tywin replied coolly, staring hard at her. He absently noticed that Ser Barristan was standing behind her, a fact that shocked and dismayed him somewhat but which was not important at the moment. "You seem to have made a masterful return to the game, especially with those dragons of yours though I am wondering where your older brother is? He would be the true heir of your family after all. Did he send you ahead? Or were you the price he had to pay for gaining Stark aid in reclaiming his throne?"

"My brother and I have very different views about honor and what we are willing to do, something you would learn to your cost if you ever came within arms-reach of him. But I have not come here to banter words with you, I'm here to ask you a very simple question. I have grown up hearing stories about how my nieces and nephews were murdered, how my aunt was raped while their bodies were still cooling in the same room. But there was one question no one could really answer. Did you plan it? Did you plan my nieces and nephews murders, and Elia Martell's?"

Tywin stared at her for a moment then nodded sharply. "Of course," he said simply. "So long as they lived they were a threat, Robert had that part correct at least. I was not willing to let those threats in place. "

He watched as the girl's eyes narrowed, her hands clenching as Ser Barristan also showed visible signs of anger. Jon

Stark however, standing to one side of Barristan simply looked at him, his eyes took every bit of Daenerys' willpower not summon Sunfyre to come there right that moment and burn Tywin to ashes. But she didn't, she wouldn't give the man the satisfaction of driving her to murder.

Tywin went on unhurriedly. "However the method of their death and their mother's dishonor was the acts of the Mountain that Rode. I would not have ordered that, simply holding a pillow over the children's heads would've sufficed. I am not a monster, simply practical."

"Would you say the same to the widows and orphans your army has caused, or the thousands of dead and raped?" Daenerys replied coolly, despite the anger still coursing through her. "You might not be a monster in the mold of Gregor Clegane, but that does not make you any less of a monster." She stepped forward lightly, staring hard at the man. "And monsters, 'Lord' Lannister, have to be put down. But it will be done in the name of justice and honor, not vengeance though I will of course take some pleasure in watching your end. Look forward to it. I know I will."

Before Tywin could reply she turned striding off leaving Tywin to stare after her in impotent anger.

OOOOOO

A day before Ranma was ready to lead the portion of the army here down to Harrenhal to deal with that pocket of Lannister resistance he was called from the exercise area to the great Hall of the keep. He found Tytos and the others already present, as well as a man who looked as if he had ridden himself hard to get here. He looked even worse than Brynden had when Ranma first arrived. He was a youngish man, obviously a page of some sort, and was accompanied by five other armsmen who were now standing near the doorway at attention.

Ranma moved forward to join his wife, taking her hand lately one of the cell as he looked at the messenger. "Yes?"

"Lord Stark?"

"I am."

"Your grandfather Lord Tully asks for your to speak to you personally at Riverrun, as well as all the lords who can gather there and who have proved their loyalty."

Ranma's eyes widened then narrowed, coming up with several good and several bad reasons why Hoster would be making that request. He looked around, knowing that all of the lords present were also doing that, and then nodded firmly. "In that case, I suggest we best get going." That was sooner said than done however, but with Ranma having organized the army already for the march the move was actually done much faster than Tytos had expected. Even his own men were ready and able to go within an hour.

Almost as soon as they were out from Raventree Hall Daenerys leaned close to Ranma whispering. "Is it just me, or are you getting a very bad feeling about this?"

"Not just you," Ranma said grimly. "Trust me it's not just you."

OOOOOO

Asha laughed quietly, staring at the ruins of the Crag, though calling it a castle at this point was really misleading. It was a ruin basically that had been designed initially to defend this portion of the coast of the Westerlands. She had ordered it taken by a few of the most restless captains, while Black Wind stayed off shore, watching the action. It would settle them down, while the rest of the fleet continued patrolling the area around Fair Isle.

She turned when one of her spotters shouted, "Sail ho, coming in from south, southwest."

Asha frowned then, racing up the rigging to perch on the topmast herself to stare out into the distance. "Get us under way!" she bellowed to her crew below. "I want us to meet that ship quickly."

A few hours later she did, and found it was one of the Blacktyde ships, with one of the captains that young Baelor Blacktyde had recommended as a scout. As soon as they were within shouting distance the man cupped his hands around his mouth and shouted "Sails seen rounding Feastfires, heading north!"

"All right!" Asha bellowed. "I'll get the idiots off the shore, and then we'll be heading back to Faircastle."

Inwardly however Asha's mind was already racing. A fleet to fleet action could go either way, she hoped that her little surprise would work, but if that didn't, if the Lannisters instead decided to go around Fair Isle westward rather than put in at Faircastle for food and provisions, then it would become a stern chase first of all, and then an open ocean battle. If those war galleys were as heavily armed as others such she had seen, that battle could turn into a bloodbath on both sides.

Please let them act true to form, she thought to herself, please.

OOOOOO

It took several days for Mace and Stannis to reorganize their disparate forces, during which thousands of people tried to escape from King's Landing only to run into the re-strengthened cordon around the city. In return for arranging a marriage to his daughter with Stannis, Mace and the Reach lords joined the Stormlands lords in bowing to the last surviving Baratheon. The only ones who did not were House Tarly's men, who had not stopped in their march south to take Heartsbane home. Stannis had already composed a message of condolence to Randyll's widow, and an official notice that her son would have to appear in front of him on his fourteenth name-day to be recognized as lord of the house.

During that time Stannis sent Davos Seaworth to Sea to liaise with the Lysenni pirate. With Davos commanding the Royal Navy, a portion of the fleet blockading King's Landing quickly made their way east to relieve Dragonstone.

The two leaders also found out that the Lannisters had fled, breaking out of the city. "They weren't even involved the battle!" Mace bellowed, shaking his head as he turned from the man he had sent to speak to Alekyne Florent and discover what had happened. "We put them in charge over because..." He trailed off looking at Stannis.

Stannis smiled grimly. "You and my brother put them in charge over there to keep them away from the battle, which might have been a good move. I am uncertain if they would have joined me in that battle, but they might have. However, they failed to hold that line when Lord Serret led a force of mounted men out somehow from the slums of King's Landing. I have no idea how they got horses out of the city, but they did. At least we know now why your son Loras was moving north, he's obviously going after them."

Unfortunately Loras had both mounted men and infantry, and both man and horse had been in a skirmish and a full scale battle against the Crownlands forces Serret had sent out from the wall as a diversion. Worse they had not taken along much supplies, slowing them down further with their need to forage. Loras had no intention of returning until he had the Lannisters in chains, but his chance to actually catch them before they reached Sow's Horn was slim.

Mace smiled, proud of his son's quick thinking, though he wondered why Loras hadn't joined the main battle. If he had attacked Stannis' army from behind, they might have been able to turn the tide despite everything. Stannis was thinking much the same thing, knowing how close his own army was to exhaustion when Renly's army finally broke. "Nonetheless, Alekyne needs to pay for his incompetence. I will be executing him on the morrow. The other Florent men will be rolled into House Baratheon, and from now on they will form the front of any battle, to mitigate their failure."

Even Mace could understand the unsaid reason for doing that, so he said it aloud. "And further weaken the Florents as a House so when you set aside your current wife they won't be able to cause trouble." Stannis nodded grimly, and Mace broached a subject he and many of his lords had been wondering about. "But I have to wonder what you intend to do about the epidemic in King's Landing. Even with the healers you have added to our own we don't have nearly enough to handle the sick of the city."

"The city is doomed." Stannis replied, shaking his head slowly. "Practically the entire city has been infected by this point, and those that aren't showing signs of the disease are still carrying it. No, the plague cannot be cured, but it can be... excised."

Mace stared at him in dawning horror, then actually thought about it for a moment, before nodding convulsively, looking away. He thought to protest, but what could he say? He had no real solution to the epidemic either, all they could do was keep it contained or... With a shudder Mace left that topic and the discussion continued.

Eventually Stannis decided to send Rolland Storm and Bryce Caron down with the forces from more than half the remaining Reach houses to aid in reclaiming their lands from the Ironborn, numbering about nine thousand, since most of those houses had taken losses already. Both men had impressed him as warriors, if not leaders, but he had heard good things about them in that area as well. The troops assigned to this force left one house at a time, allowing Stannis' men to move into their camps and forts around the city.

Stannis was left with an army of around 27,000. It wasn't the giant hammer that Renly's army had been, but it was still quite a large army, and its quality was actually slightly better. None of the levy forces from the Reach had survived the battle in any shape to continue fighting, and the weaker houses of the Stormlands had been wiped out, which removed some of the less trained infantry and allowed Stannis to apportion their lands out to his followers while Staedmon and those like him added their infantry strength to his. And despite the mauling they had taken, the Reach portion of his army still gave him a large heavy cavalry force.

He was however hurting for archers and scouts. The scout force of both armies had taken a beating on the outskirts of the battle. The archers too had mauled one another throughout the day, leaving a bare two thousand trained archers in the entire army. Stannis retained all of them regardless of House affiliation, but it was still a meager number, and a possible weakness.

With his army and the new addition organized to his satisfaction. Stannis ordered the Reach and Stormlands army forwards towards the city until they were just out of bow range. With less than a thousand defenders holed up here or there in towers around the wall, there was no one to attack them. There were thousands of smallfolk scattered around the wall, but they had learned not to try to escape the city. All of them were hopeful that this new lord meant that the outbreak would soon be brought under control somehow. That hope was in vain.

Some of the Fire Guard moved forward with a dozen mules toward each of the seven gates to pile up large piles of bracken and wood in front of them. Then seven of Melisandre's acolytes came forward. Like the women who had given birth to the Shadow Warriors, they were fully under the sway of R'hllor, ready and willing to sacrifice themselves. They walked up onto the piles of bracken, sitting there as they stared up into the sky, beginning to chant a prayer to R'hllor while the Fire Guard tied them down, 'lest weakness suddenly come upon them'.

Melisandre stood in front of the Gods Gate, her gaze contemptuous as she stared at the images graven thereon. She waited until one of her acolytes then nodded at her, then with a single gesture the pile several meters in front of her ignited. She then gestured to both sides, and the piles of wood underneath the sacrifices in front of each of the seven gates leading into King's Landing burst into pillars of fire.

The flames roared into the sky, brighter and stronger than they should've been just coming from mere wood and human flesh. In the center of those flames the women screamed, not in fear but ecstasy as they gave themselves to R'hllor's sacred flame. Melisandre nodded soberly at their sacrifice, then her eyes closed as her hands rose more. The gem on her choker began to glow cherry red as her will reached out grasping the power of the willing sacrifices of the women to manipulate the flames. The flames grew and grew and grew, then suddenly she gestured forward, and those flames blew through each of the gates melting the portcullis and igniting the wood so fast it almost turned to ash immediately, blasting the rock and rubble set against the inner gates out of the way like the world's largest battering ram.

The flames then spread, heading towards the center of King's Landing as well as around its circumference. The smallfolk in the city, who were barely eking out their lives now, trying desperately to get away from the plague or stay away from the walls fights everywhere, looked up as the sound of fire reached them wherever they were in the city. The flames moved quickly, burning everything in front of them, burning almost hotter than wildfire. Metal, wood, even certain types of stone, it didn't matter, if it was in the way of the flames it burned. People barely lasted long enough to scream, which some might have called a blessing. The flames even buried deep into the Alchemist Guild and elsewhere in the city. There it was stymied by the sand, and dirt. But the heat of the flames spread through those mediums, eventually reaching large caches of wildfire that, unbeknownst to any but perhaps Varys, had remained buried under the city.

These caches had been made in a plot by Mad King Aerys. He had decided that if he lost the war against Robert, he wanted to take King's Landing with him. Learning of this plot was the reason Jaime had broken his vows and taken the king's life, along with his Hand Rossart, Grand Master of the Alchemists Guild. Jaime had then gone on to kill many of the other Wisdoms, accidentally killing anyone who knew where all the wildfire caches were.

Some were later discovered, especially before and after the siege began, but not all of them. Some had been exploded in the out of control fires that had raged here and there in the city before this thanks to attempts to control the riots or the spread of the plague, but others had been buried too deep for those fire's heat to ignite them. Not so now. Every remaining cache ignited as Melisandre's flames raced through the city.

Melisandre screamed suddenly, falling back as loud booming sounds echoed from the city. "W-Wildfire!" she gasped shaking her head. "There were catches of wildfire hidden under the city, randomly I think..."Melisandre pushed herself away from Stannis who had caught her reflexively. "The, the wildfire will change the nature of my flames my lord. It will do its work my Lord, faster than we even expected..."

Underneath the pain of her spell of control being broken like that Melisandre was furious. She had hoped to gather in the power from the thousands of lives her flames snuffed out in the city, much like she did formal sacrifices. She wouldn't have been able to grab as much power as from a real sacrifice, but the total number of lives would have meant she would have taken in enough energy to power any spell she could think of. Instead she was left with only a small pittance from the original willing sacrifices, the rest having broken free from her grasp under the shock of the wildfire changing the nature of her fire. Melisandre almost reached out in an attempt to regain that connection, but stopped herself quickly. No one could control wildfire once it had ignited.

Stannis knew nothing about her thoughts however. He simply stared at the ongoing death of King's Landing, his eyes bleak. "I hated that city you know." he said almost conversationally. "I loathed it with every fiber of my being. Every person in that court was there for their personal aggrandizement, every person there thought he or she was more important than everyone else. There was so much backstabbing, so much plotting, so much disgusting greed, graft and dark ambitions. And the smallfolk, from the merchants to the squatters in Fleas Bottom had that much in common, making war with words in one area and knives in the dark in the other. Everyone above preyed on everyone below. Yet even so, I wouldn't have wished this on it. I wouldn't wish this fate on anyone. Chance and fortune are truly fickle bitches."

After a moment he took a deep breath then resolutely turned his gaze away from King's Landing, grateful that the screams from the dying couldn't reach the army where it was encircling the city. Even the sight alone was enough to cause shouts and even screams of dismay and shock from the men however. "How long do you think?"

"I do not know my Lord." Melisandre replied quietly, her gaze staring at the flames which were now tinged with green. "The wildfire was not in my calculations. I will say that I am glad that the pirates moved their blockade further away however, and we should be ready to move just in case." Stannis nodded, and the two of them continued to stare at the pyre that was burning King's Landing, the greatest or at least largest city of Westeros to the ground.

End chapter

---

This was seriously not the chapter I thought I'd be putting out. The battle between Stannis and Renly became much larger, and there were so many other little loose needs to talk about, that I just couldn't write them up and polish the sections dealing with Ranma's faction. I have a lot of that part written, so I might, as said above, be able to get the next chapter of this story out along with my surprise and the next chapter of ATP by the end of October. We'll see. I will say at least a third of the chapter will show what has been going on up North. Oh, and maybe Margaery's reaction to the news that her father has just agreed to marry her off to Stannis. Hint, her response would appear as a lot of asterisks.

Hope you all enjoyed, and hope that at least some of what happened surprised you.

As always please review. They are the pizza to the writer's soul.

*Chapter 16*: Chapter 16

I don't own Ranma 1/2 or A Song of Ice and Fire, mores the pity. I would have a lot of fun in either universe.

I would like to thank Antony444 for once again going over this for me and being my sounding board on all things Westeros. Again though, we might still have odd missing space issues, so if anyone sees any, PM me please.

Wild Wolf 16 Justice Given, Warnings Heard

---

While the events around King's Landing were coming to an end, down in the Stormlands Oberynd had continued his campaign of terror. The lands of Trant, Peasebury and Wensington had felt the Viper's touch, and were burning or otherwise despoiled behind him. That had brought him onto the lands of one of the more powerful Stormlands Houses, House Grandison, which he again began to despoil, but here it was somewhat more costly. And the young fool standing in front of him in his tent, cocksure and arrogant despite the remains of the storm dripping from his cloak and armor, was part and parcel of the reason.

"Perhaps my instructions were unclear." Oberynd said his voice a low thoughtful tone. But there was a hint of hiss in it that would've sent any man who knew him to flinching, or perhaps running. The young fool in front of him did not flinch, but his smile disappeared as well. "I believe I ordered your force to fall back if you ran into the slightest bit of resistance heading towards Grandview, is this in point of fact not the case?"

"You did, but I thought to see if I could go around it." Ser Gerold Dayne, the head of House Dayne of High Hermitage, answered. He was a young man with an aquiline nose, high cheekbones and a strong jaw, visible thanks to his tendency to keep his face clean-shaven. His thick silver hair, divided by a streak of midnight black, showed that he had some Valyrian blood in his ancestry, as did his dark purple eyes. "After all, our orders are to harry and harass the Stormlands is much as possible, how can we do that if we are afraid of getting too close to their castles?"

"By despoiling every bit of arable land they have, sowing it with salt, and poisoning the wells as we have been doing since exiting the Boneway you stupid young fool." Oberynd replied his tone now even more like that of a viper's, biting and poisonous. "Not by leading good Dornishmen into costly ambush after costly ambush! I get enough of that from the idiots who lead the mercenary groups! I don't want to see good Dornish soldiers wasted by their own commanders!"

"You're speaking as if it wasn't a total victory!" The man some called Darkstar said incredulously. "We killed all of the ambushers!" He had too, even those who had surrendered. That this wasted a valuable local resource and broke every law of war in Westeros didn't seem to occur to him.

"But only after their archer's had slain more than half your own men because you foolishly led them into the woods after them!" The area in question was not flat, it was hilly and overgrown with rocks and trees haphazardly thrown around the landscape, which made the use of horses impossible. That had negated the one true Dornish advantage when it came to war: horse archers. Dorne was famed for them and their use in quick, slashing hit and run attacks, and they were truly deadly in the desert.

However horse-bows didn't have the range of even Stormlands bows. Worse the locals knew the lay of the land intimately, and were able to fade in and out hitting Gerold's forces again and again before he was able to pin them in place and wipe them out. There had only been 100 men involved in that series of ambushes, but they had slaughtered at least 400 of Oberynd's precious Dornish forces.

Oberynd had been going out of his way since this campaign began to husband the forces actually from Dorne, using the mercenaries whenever it looked as if he would be taking losses. The mercenaries of course were fine with this, since if they did the lion's share of the fighting, they got the lion's share of the booty.

And so far the booty had actually been surprisingly good. Oberynd could do without the camp followers, which were really just women taken from smallfolk families here and there along their route of march. But the mercenaries' bags were bulging with wine, food and even some trinkets here and there. Most of those were taken in the sack of the holdfast of House Trant, and several small merchant groups that the army had intercepted here and there. But taking on Grandview, which was a small town and castle in one, was not something Oberynd was going to do.

"Men can be easily replaced." Darkstar said calmly, a faint sneer on his oh-so-pretty face. "Especially if you give me the order to go back to the main branch of House Dayne and order them to send you their men like they should have!"

House Dayne of Starfall, one of the more powerful Dornish houses, had not joined the muster. In fact Lady Allyria Dayne had protested the muster most vociferously via raven several times, and had refused to even provender the army.

If not for the fact that the reasons for this was well known, that her cousin and heir the lord who she was acting as regent for was lost somewhere in the Riverlands or dead along with her fiancé who she doted on, Oberyn would have called her out for treason. But not only would that have forced him to possibly besiege Starfall, which would not have been easy if it was possible at all, but none of his Dornish forces would've agreed to it.

House Dayne of High Hermitage, a Knightly House offshoot of the Main branch, had fielded all of its forces under its lead knight, the idiot in front of him. That amounted to around 800 men: 200 relatively decent infantry, 100 lancers, and 400 horse archers with the remainder made up of levy infantry. There was something going on between Gerold and the main branch, but Oberyn didn't know what it was and didn't particularly care.

"No." he said coldly. "If you were one of my mercenary captains, I would be executing you right now for incompetence. The only reason I am not is because you are young yet, and might, just might be able to learn from your mistakes. And you will need to learn from your mistakes. Remember you are not from the main House of Dayne, you are from High Hermitage, a House which is unimportant in the grand scheme of things, as are you. Make another error of judgment, or interpret my orders so loosely again, and I will not hesitate to kill you."

He watched in amusement as the youngster scowled angrily. He was almost hoping the boy would draw on him. Oberyn had a small crossbow ready hidden underneath the small folding table he used as a bench, and his spear was lying to one side of him. Please give me an excuse! 'Darkstar' thinks himself so dangerous and for an untried sword I suppose he is, but in comparison to those like me, he's nothing!

However the young fool seemed to have some sense, or perhaps he felt the hidden crossbow because he removed his hand from his sword and gritted his teeth angrily for a moment getting him up self under control. "Very well, I apologize, I made a mistake in judgment. It will not happen again." Gerold stood there for a moment, then bowed abruptly and left the tent.

"Young fool." Oberyn said scoffing and removing his hand from the small crossbow. With that bit of discipline taken care of Oberyn turned his attention back to the map. I have more important things to think about young sadistic idiots.

House Grandison was fighting him in exactly the style it should, using small bands of hit-and-run skirmishers who would fade out as quickly as they came, killing a few men here and there. The losses were negligible, but they were having an effect on the morale of his men. Actually, Darkstar's victory in wiping out the large group he'd run into had bolstered that morale, though not nearly enough in Oberyn's mind to make up for the losses.

Yet even that wasn't a major issue, since Oberyn doubted that House Grandison's forces would continue to harass his army once he left their lands. No, he had a much tougher enemy, autumn in the Stormlands. It seemed as if every other day the army was hammered by a new storm, and they were growing stronger and longer. It was raining, it was becoming colder with every passing week, and his men were simply not prepared for it. Thanks to the pace they were moving, disease hadn't quite yet set in among the army, but it would quickly. "Whose idea was it to invade the Stormlands in the autumn anyway?"

"I think that was Uncle Doran's and Visery's my Lord, and I seem to recall that you thought it a grand scheme too." A voice said from behind Oberyn.

He scowled a little but he couldn't put any real menace into the expression. "Quiet daughter, that was rhetorical."

Obara moved out from a patch of darkness at the back of the tent, looking at him quizzically. "What are we going to do? We can't keep up the campaign in the Stormlands for very much longer without falling to disease and other issues. And once we do, the mercenaries won't be willing to stick around, they'll break."

"Of course they will, they have a strong sense of personal self-preservation." Oberyn quipped, but shook his head. "I wanted to stick near to the coast or near to the rivers at any rate so we could make for the coast, but with the storm season upon us, that's not going to happen. Instead we'll go the opposite direction."

He moved his finger over the map marking out the new route. They were a little past Grandview now, though still on Grandison land. "The lands get easier if we keep going for another day in a northerly direction, then split off east. We'll have to pass through this patch of the Kingswood which will be hard going, but after that, we'll be onto the other side which will be in the Reach. After that, we'll march on Grassy Vale. That family is a weak one, and send most of its forces to bolster Renly. After a hard march an easy sack should bring up the troop's morale. After that, we'll follow the Blue Bryn, sacking what castles we can as we make our way deeper into the Reach."

Obara shook her head, wincing. She had not enjoyed the march, oh the fighting was fun when there were actual fights, but most of it had been burning, pillaging and raping their way across the Stormlands. The mercenaries and the Dorne troops were fine with that, she wasn't for many reasons, not least of which was her gender. Knowing what armies did on the march to the smallfolk whose land they marched through was one thing, witnessing it was quite another.

Yet she replied gamely. Obara was a Sand Snake. Poison ran in her veins not blood and she would not allow herself to be swayed by soft feelings when they were striking at those who willingly served they who had wronged their family. "That, that sounds like a good idea but I'm concerned that the Reach has so much more manpower than our Army does."

"True, but recall how much of that army has already been mustered and sent to King's Landing or down to deal with the Ironborn reavers." Up until they left House Wyl's land behind them Oberyne had been getting relatively quick reports from his brother's spy ring. Since then, messengers had been few and far between, until he finally stopped trying to send men back along their route, knowing that they were being ambushed somewhere along the line. That meant that by this point he was a little over three weeks out of date from any news, but he didn't think that would really matter.

"And better, I seem to recall my brother saying that he had a contact at Longtable, a lady willing to pass on information for anyone willing to pay her price. Once we're passed Grassy Vale I'll send a messenger ahead under disguise to talk to her, to get the lay of the land. That should allow us to make further plans to stay ahead of any response force that the Reach can still muster."

"In that case," Obara said sighing faintly. "We should get the army up and moving again."

OOOOOO

Asha gazed through her glass from the crow's nest of Black Wind, frowning heavily. At the moment her ship was making good time skirting along shoreline of the Straits, closer than any deep bottomed galley would be willing to go. Strung out behind her or even closer to the shoreline to her east the majority of her fleet waited, drifting slightly for a moment, their sails furled.

From here she could barely make out the sails of the Lannister fleet as they made their way slowly but with a certain ponderous majesty through the Straits. They weren't spread out unfortunately, each ship was sailing much closer to one another than any Ironborn fleet would've been willing to do. Of course when Ironborn ships sailed together, they were careful to keep distances from one another, lest old feuds suddenly flare up when someone spotted an ancient enemy on another ship, though of course if the captains themselves were feuding, the very idea of sailing together would have never ever occurred to them.

I wish I could say they're sailing that close because they're scared of sailing alone, but I doubt it. She didn't think the Greenlanders would be able to match her crew's skills as ship handlers, or even in a fight across the gunwales, but they really didn't have to be. With the number of scorpions those things carry, they could sink my entire fleet before we close if I do this wrong.

Her fleet consisted of forty-two longships, most of them fully manned with 150 crew members. She had been reinforced by a fourteen more ships from House Harlaw, but had lost seven ships that she had originally commanded including several that she had lead since coming down from the north. They had been left behind because she had mistakenly thought they had learned the need for strategy and tactics. They hadn't, and when a Blacktyde ship came by sharing the news of the Lannister's fleet being spotted, they all chased out after the first war galley that entered the Straits. According to the one longship that returned, that war galley had retreated, and they'd been jumped by the rest of the Lannister fleet in the open waters out past Fair Isle.

A few other ships had even come from the Iron Islands. House Farwynd of Lonely Light and House Volmark had apparently held some ships back from the Rise of the Kraken. Their captains said this was because they had deep reservations about Balon's grandiose scheme. That was well and good, though she was surprised that her father hadn't seen through their attempt.

Still she was happy to have them, even if she wouldn't have enough time to instill any kind of discipline into them or the second force out of Harlaw. Worse she didn't have time to make certain that they'd follow her orders in battle, which could be disastrous.

Thankfully she didn't have any concerns there about the Blacktyde or the first group out of Harlaw. Hopefully their examples would be enough to hold back the newcomers rather than vice versa.

"Keep us out of sight down of the horizon." she ordered shouting down to her crew. "I want us to be able follow them, but I don't want them to be able to see us! They're almost at Faircastle, now we'll see if my first little trap works."

Her crew responded quickly, trimming the sail even further and slowing the ship, signaling the other ships quickly while she continued to watch the enemy fleet. She watched as it came abreast of where they should've started to turn slightly westward to make for the bay of Fair Isle, holding her breath for a moment.

If they could catch that fleet in the narrower confines of the cove, they would be able to close far easier, and bring the fleet to battle on their terms. No matter how many scorpions they have, if I can get to grips with their fleet when they are hemmed in the bay, if I can board their ships, I'll back my man against any amount of greenlanders.

Yet it wasn't to be. Instead of turning westward, the Lannister fleet kept on going, only a few ships peeling off to head toward the bay. Those were quickly out of sight, while the rest of the ships kept on going further north and east, simply heading straight through the Straits towards the Iron Islands.

"Damn it." She muttered. Those few ships would be able to retake the harbor easily, since she had only left a single longship there. The Sea Foam had been damaged in the fighting for the harbor, and hadn't been able to put to sail before the deadline came for her fleet to remove itself from the harbor to bait this little trap. Luckily most of their spoils had already been transported back to the Iron Islands, and both the Castle and the small holdfast within the port had been burned. The castle still stood somewhat, but the holdfast had collapsed in on itself.

Still, that means that the greenlanders will have a somewhat closer supply point to call on. For a moment Asha pondered the idea of pulling back to the Iron Islands, letting the Greenlanders get to them and then raiding their supply lines until they were forced to retreat. But after a moment she shook her head. No, they've got too many war galleys, I'd have to keep most of my strength raiding their convoys to get through, and thanks to my father most of the islands don't have enough men to defend themselves and keep the thralls beaten down.

There were of course thousands of thralls, making up more than fifty percent of the population of the Islands. Most of those were from families of those taken in raids for generations, but many were not, since the Ironborn tended to work their thralls to death in the mines or at other tasks if need be. So many Houses had to keep at least some of their men at home to keep the thralls under control, especially on Great Wyk and Pyke itself.

If they get to shore, they'll be able to force a beachhead quickly enough just like in my father's first rebellion, and whatever their lack of wealth our islands are still able to supply us with food. No, I'll have to meet them at sea. But that doesn't mean I have to be stupid about it.

The Ironborn fleet stayed out of sight towards the inside of the Straits for several days following the Greenlander ships just out of sight while they made their slow way through the Straits. Asha had wondered initially why they were going so slow, but then one of her other captains had spotted several merchant ships sailing with them, indicating that they were bringing along their own supplies. Asha was curious about that, but decided it didn't really matter to her plans.

After a few days of this many of her captains began to get restless, saying they should strike now but Asha refused, wanting to wait for the right time. Despite Asha's string of victories she was forced to call a conference however, where she reiterated her position. When she gave them their reasoning, most of the captains grudgingly accepted, save for a few troublemakers here and there, but with House Harlaw still backing her as a whole, they subsided.

Asha knew she would only get one real chance at this. If it went badly, her control over her fleet would disappear like salt in the wind, and the Lannisters were keeping too good a tight formation for any kind of hit-and-run attacks to work. No, it was best to wait until the weather and the ocean itself could be their ally.

Several days after that meeting, the Ironborn had their chance: a massive storm, almost but not quite a monsoon, a deluge of water, lightning, thunder and above all, wind. It struck at just the wrong time for the Lannister fleet, where the Straits became treacherous all along their course forward, with several hidden shoals and reefs.

One ship was hit amidships by one such reef, and another lost its rudder. Worse, visibility because of the storm was almost nonexistent, cutting down the ability to see for a few leagues around to practically one or two at best. And so their formation had begun to break up.

And then Asha and her fleet came out of the storm from behind them. The first the Lannister's knew of it was arrows beginning to fall on the back-most ship in their formation. While it's nearby fellows tried to make tight turns in the pitching roaring waters to bring their scorpions to bear that ship was rammed by three longships, and the crews of those longships boarded with a roar.

Those war galleys had responded quicker than Asha had expected, but still not fast enough, and even so, they proved how green they were when it came to seas such as this. All four of them floundered badly in the pitching sea when they tried to move against the waves, and one almost was pushed over entirely.

One of them got off a single shot with its scorpions, most of which were facing ahead of the ship and to the sides covering a 145° angle in front of the ship but only one scorpion was directly facing aft of it. That scorpion took out one of the attacking longship's rigging, slicing through the sale with a thump, but it and the others were helpless to stop the longships from closing with them.

Asha and the rest of her fleet raced on. But behind them, the captain of a war galley had enough courage to actually set fire to his own rigging to hopefully warn his fellows.

The rest of the fleet had already begun to turn by the time Asha and the rest of her longships came into range. Most of them hadn't been able to turn entirely, but enough took her ships under fire to cost Asha six or seven more longships, sinking them or destroying enough of their rigging and oars to slow their advance. And any ship that went down in waters like this was doomed, along with every man aboard.

But the rest of the Ironborn fleet closed. Arrows flew from both sides and men began to die, falling to the rain drenched decks below while lightning zoomed across the heavily overcast sky and thundered bellowed. Fire arrows were practically useless in this downpour, which took out one of the most dangerous weapons of any fleet at sea, leaving the battle to be determined by steel, numbers and courage.

Five more Lannister war galleys were boarded in the next few moments, then Asha's Black Wind scraped alongside a sixth, and she had no more time or inclination to spend looking at the overall battle. "Up and at them!"

With Qarl leading the way her crew charged across the gunwales onto the larger ship, hacking and slashing at the crew who were barely in place to defend themselves. Asha charged with them, attacking one Lannister man with so much fury that she knocked him sideways overboard to die in the wild to tumult that had become the ocean. In the next second she was engaged heavily with several men, one of whom snarled at her. "Fucking barbarians, they even send their women to sea?"

Asha laughed wildly, crossing blades with the man and then kicking out hard catching him in the chest, sending him gasping to his knees, where her forearm caught him in the face. The other two men came in as one, trying to box her in, but she flung her hatchet at one, forcing him to dodge backwards, allowing her to engage the other sword to sword. Here he showed his inexperience, simply hacking away rather than with any form. She was easily able to knock his sword off guard, then grabbed her knife from her belt and thrust it into the man's unarmored chest.

"Lester!" shouted the man who Asha had thrown her hatchet towards then he was on her, hacking and slashing at her with rage but no skill. "You killed him, you killed my brother!"

Asha dodged to one side running the man through. Kicking his dead body off her sword before raising her blade and going after another man, hacking into his back as he tried to duel with one of her crewmen. Then she had enough time to reach down to grab up her hatchet before cursing luridly, seeing another war galley through the storm visible on Black Wind's other side.

Rather than taking her ship under fire with its scorpions however, the ship pulled in alongside hurling across grapnels and crashing into her ship, side to side. Then it's crew, which were much better armored and armed than the crew of the initial war galley she had attacked, charged across. Their warcries were so loud Asha could even hear them over the storm and the clangor of battle. "Burning bright!"

With a snarl Asha bellowed "'ware back! They're tryin' to take the Black Wind boys!"

That was enough for many of her crewmen to break off his engagement with the first war galley's crew, turning to this new group. But before they could re-board their ship, the newcomers had already slain practically every man that had been left on the deck of Black Wind, and several of them were even now breaking down the hatches to head further into the ship.

"By the Drowned God, you'll not take my ship!" Asha howled in anger, leading the charge back onto her longship alongside Qarl.

These newcomers however were much better trained as well as better armored, wearing chain mail as few greenlanders would at sea, and they worked in teams of four, each man looking out for one another in the midst of the melee. Even as she and Qarl struck down one such group others were wreaking a bloody toll on her crew.

Then four more longships crashed into them, sending many men to the slick deck beneath them with the impetus of the blow. Seconds later more Ironborn raced across the intervening space, shouting "For the Drowned God! That which is dead can never truly die!"

A part of Asha's mind heard that cry and knew these were the reinforcements that had come from Pyke, but she didn't care. All she cared about was that now the men from the second war galley were being pressed hard. Their armor was still allowing them to take the Ironborn on much more evenly, but the numbers were beginning to tell in the Ironborn's favor.

Not that Asha had any time to waste on that. She found herself engaged along with Qarl against a swordsman who was easily the best she had yet seen. He engaged her first mate's sword to short axes, smashing both of his axe's to the side, steering one down to the deck as his hand flashed up to smash into Qarl's chin, sending his head rocketing back under the blow.

Asha jumped forward engaging the man before he could capitalize. But she found herself handled almost with negligent ease, and was forced to duck under a blow that would've caved in her head, then roll to avoid a follow-on ripost that came so fast she had no chance of taking advantage of the man having seemingly been off-balance.

Desperately she brought up her hatchet to block a third below. She watched in shock when the man changed his sword's trajectory just slightly mid-blow, so that instead of impacting the hatchet's blade it cut into the wood of the hatchet's shaft right above her fingers. The man's sword cut straight through,, sending the hatchet's head flying through the rain.

It was only Qarl's intervention that kept her from dying in the man's next attack, and she fell back, grabbing up some of the fallen rigging. Heavy with rain and knotted at one end it made a decent enough weapon. She charged back, swinging both it and her sword at the man while all around her the battle continued.

The man ducked, allowing her attack with the rope to go over his head as he reached up as swiftly as a snake strike to grab her outstretched arm pulling Asha towards him, back first. His voice sounded surprisingly loud given the tumult of battle and the howling fury of the storm. "A rope, really?" Then Asha felt his boot hitting her backside and she was flung forward, almost impacting Qarl in the stomach but he leaped to one side, keeping his footing on the heaving, wet deck with the ease of years at sea.

Qarl began to attack the man again. Having lost one of his axes somewhere now he was wielding one with both hands, but the man matched him blow for blow, forcing him back until his back was against one of the masts.

Nearby Asha gutted a man who had attempted to take advantage of her downed status, thrusting her sword up between his legs and deeper into his body before pulling it out listening to the man's curdling scream. "GYAAHHHHhhhhh.....!" She stabbed another man in the back before he could finish off a downed Ironborn, racing to aid Qarl.

But the battle had shifted, and she could no longer get to them. She never saw Qarl go down, his knee ruined by a blow, or saw him take another man's spear to the back.

Indeed it was all Asha could do for a few moments to defend herself, but she slew two of her five attackers, and suddenly other Ironborn were there, bursting through the rest of the melee. She leaned against the bulwark at the back of Black Wind getting her breath back before pushing herself up and thrusting her way back into the battle.

Ahead of her she could see the man that she had recently been dueling with hacking Ironborn down, his movements fluid and fast, showing a skill she had never seen before. But she refused to be cowed. Instead she reached down, grabbing up a dead man's fallen hatchet and raced to meet him. The man smiled at seeing her come through the melee and the rain, turning his body slightly to give her a smaller target before bringing his sword around in a blow that she was forced to block with her new hatchet, almost losing it at the first pass.

"Your crew fight well for Ironborn." The man said conversationally, causing Asha to scowl. "And you picked the proper time to attack us I have to say."

"Shut up and fight greenlander!" Asha growled, her pride piqued at the fact that he could talk in so blasé a manner while engaging her. As if she didn't matter!

The man sighed, and his blows redoubled forcing Asha back, smashing her off-balance enough for him to spend a brief second to hack another Ironborn down as the man tried to come to her aid. "May I know at least the name of the young woman I'm about to kill? Oh, forgive me, my name is Ser Addam Marbrand. I've been told it's polite to give my name first."

Desperately, Asha lunged, but she was off-balance and couldn't get up enough speed to surprise her opponent. Instead he simply stood aside allowing her blow to pass, and she threw herself sideways in an even more frantic contortion to one side gritting her teeth as his sword cut through her chain mail along her side. But thanks to her last second evasion it wasn't a killing blow, but she could still feel her side start to bleed copiously.

Asha pushed herself to her feet, watching as another Ironborn tried to engage the man, only to die as the man moved through a series of blows that first forced the Ironborn warrior onto the defensive then off-balance and finally to the deck, missing both of his hands as they had been chopped off.

More Ironborn came between them separating them again, for which Asha was thankful. She wearily raised her sword and moved to rejoin the melee which had moved almost entirely on to the deck of another Ironborn ship while other Ironborn began to move up to her side, as well as behind her.

Some sixth sense warned her and she shifted her weight, turning to look behind her just as a dagger went in her back, piercing her chain mail and thrusting deep into her previously unwounded side. But again thanks to her last-second dodge, it simply skittered across her side rather than finding her kidney.

"What!" she exclaimed, staring in horror at the Ironborn all around her, one of whom was grinning maliciously.

"Euron sends his regards." Said one of them, knocking her sword out of her hand while another man grabbed her by the shoulder pulling her around for what she knew would be a death blow. "The Drowned God calls you, personally!"

From somewhere within her somewhere Asha found the strength to charge forward, her hatchet smashing the sword of the Ironborn who had spoken up to one side as she bodily rammed into him, taking them to the gunwales behind him. They teetered there for a brief second and then both of them went over the side of the ship and into the dark waters below.

Through the tumult of the battle Addam had seen that beat of betrayal, and frowned heavily. The woman might not have had much skill, but she had courage, and to die like that to a traitor struck him as wrong. Still he had more important things to worry about. He began to bellow orders to his men, restoring some sense of order in the chaos of the melee, while the larger battle continued.

Asha had planned her attack almost perfectly, but there was one thing she had forgotten in her calculations: the Ironborn signaled to one another through use of signal flags, usually brightly colored flags tied from their masts. But in this tempest visibility was so poor that they couldn't signal one another. So several dozen war galleys were heavily engaged, while many more were not engaged at all, or only engaged one-on-one.

Soon that began to tell, and more and more longships were sunk where they had grappled with their victims. Perhaps Asha could have figured out a way to rally her longships, or perhaps not. Once battle was actually joined, Ironborn were incredibly hard to control, and any attempt at doing so might have seen her labeled a coward and ignored even by the longships of House Harlaw. Yet without Asha, there was no coordination any longer, and even with the storm the war galleys were at least able to see friend from foe.

Hours later as the storm finally began to clear the death toll was bad on both sides. Of the forty-two longships on the Ironborn's side, 20 had been sunk outright. Fourteen more had taken massive losses to their crew, including Baelor Blacktyde and his forces but scattered enough for the ships to survive, for now. House Harlaw and its allies fared a little better, retreating out of the straits back to the Iron Islands, but even they had taken severe losses to their crews, and they lost four more ships sinking due to the damage they had taken on the way back to the Islands.

Ironically, among those ships lost with all hands were the ships whose captains had decided to betray Asha. Addam and his armymen had wiped them out to a man before setting fires in their holds before their ship pulled away from the gaggle of ships that had been tied together during that portion of the battle.

Of the thirty-four war galleys of the Lannister fleet eleven had been lost outright, and six others had sustained damage that would force them to put in at Banefort for repairs. Seven more were complete write-offs, having lost their rudders or been gutted on the rocks which actually did as much damage to the ships themselves as the Ironborn. Of the men on those ships, most of their crews had been lost, but the remainder made up the losses that the rest of the fleet had sustained.

The ten undamaged ships and five merchant galleys, which had not been engaged, continued on their way defending their wounded fellows as they made for Banefort. After they were repaired however, the invasion of the Iron Islands would begin.

OOOOOO

Thanks to the size of their army and the fact that the Blackwood portion of it wasn't used to the pace that Ranma set, the march to Riverrun took them a week and a half from the Raventree Hall. This was hampered by the need to once again go around the village of Sallydance, and the number of refugees on the River Road heading back to their various holdings along the Red Fork.

While many of the Riverlords were happy to see this, Ranma was actually rather ambivalent about it because he knew that when winter came most of those farmsteads would have to be abandoned in any event. They simply wouldn't be warm enough to get their owners through the winter nights. Worse, many of the smaller holdfasts out in the countryside had been destroyed by the Lannisters, simple one-story stone keeps torn down so they couldn't be used as rallying points. Thank the old gods that half of the Riverlands are still untouched, and that the Lannisters didn't have enough time to really ruin the land between the Blue and Red Forks. We might be forced to abandon some areas south of the Red Fork, but that just means we'll have more manpower to throw at other problems elsewhere.

When they came into view of Riverrun Ranma paused in surprise. "What?" Daenerys asked looking at him from where she and Merry were as usual sharing a horse. The two dragons were flying overhead, glorying as always in flight, but with orders to remain above the army for now.

"Given what we learned from the smallfolk, I'd expected there to be a shantytown of some kind built up by the refugees outside the walls." Ranma replied with a shrug. "I can't see any sign of one though."

"They wouldn't be on this side of the river." Tytos replied from where he rode on Daenerys' other side turning from a conversation he had been having with Rickard, who had caught up with the army along with Domeric and Alayaya, Jason and a few of his men a bare day ago, with Rickard reporting what he had heard of the Salt Pans. "There might be some on the other side though, the Whispering Wood is only a day's walk from where the Tumblestone goes around Riverrun on the other side, which would be a fine source of material and put the towns on the opposite side of any attack coming from the Lannisters."

"Make sense." Ranma said with a nod. Riverrun was built on a small island set between where the Tumblestone merged with the Red Fork before continuing down to the Trident. It had decently high walls that came out of the river there, and a moat between the castle and the city that took up the rest of the island that could be opened to the river to cut the castle off entirely. Ranma had plans for that waterpower, and hoped that Vincent Ryger had been hard at work on his designs.

As they neared Ranma could see banners on the walls and was surprised to note that House Grell and House Paegre were in attendance. Next to them were some of the neutral Houses, including Piper and even House Vance of Atranta next to one he didn't recognize, a red fish on a white background surrounded by a yellow stripe. "It looks as if were not the only ones that received a call from my grandfather." He said, pointing them out. "What's that third one there?"

"I believe that is House Mooton, Ranma." Tytos stared at the banners, then out across the army sighing faintly.

"What is it Tytos?" Daenerys asked.

"I'm feeling rather maudlin your grace just thinking of how many Houses have been destroyed in this war. In that way, I think at this war might actually be the most horrible war on record."

Ranma bit back a sharp retort, that it was about time that the Houses of the nobility who went to war began to pay the lion's share of the price for doing so, but restrained himself for with difficulty. He remained silent as the army moved on, smiling faintly as he began to hear the blare of trumpets singing out from the walls.

"Speaking of which." Tytos said, trying to move off that depressing subject slightly to something somewhat more amusing. "You had time to get to know lady Ravella and her daughter, correct?"

"Somewhat." Ranma replied with a shrug, while Daenerys nodded. Both ladies were very much in the mold of southern flowers, so his dealings with them were severely limited.

"I spent some time with them, though they seemed to be a little leery of me for some reason." Daenerys replied with small smirk on her face. "I found them..." she paused looking for the proper words. "To be properly reared ladies, who no doubt would make fine wives for someone." Implied in her statement was that their knowledge was sorely lacking in areas that she found interesting, or perhaps vital for a queen. "Do you wish to discuss a suit for their hands my Lord?" Since no surviving male members of the family remained it was up to Ranma to discuss matters of marriage as the representative of the Lord Paramount.

"Yes actually, but for the Lady Ravella rather than her daughter." Tytos shrugged a small but very wry smile on his face. "My second oldest boy Lucas has always had a penchant for older women, and she is still of childbearing age. Moreover..." he leaned forward a little conspiratorially. "She seems to have returned the affections whereas her daughter hasn't replied to any interest shown her."

Ranma laughed. "He's not the only one I know who has a liking for older ladies. I doubt you've ever met her, but the lady Donella Hornwood is a good looking woman, and my brother Jon had a huge crush on her when he was younger."

"Are we going to exchange embarrassing stories now Ranma?" Jon asked defensively, a bright flush on his cheeks. "If so I have quite a bit to return fire with."

Daenerys laughed and Myrcella did as well. "I have one of those stories too." Myrcella replied, looking over at Ranma with a smirk. "Has he told you about how he and Fenris began to get Fenris used to carrying him?"

Now it was Ranma's turn to blush, while around them the Lords chuckled and the march continued. An hour later they were at the bridge over the Red Fork into Riverrun, passing under a heavy portcullis and through the gates at the far end of the gate tunnel to a tumultuous cheering from the crowds of smallfolk that were everywhere in the city.

At a glance you could tell that the city was crowded but not nearly as bad as King's Landing, nor as uncomfortably dirty. The common smallfolk here looked much cleaner than back in King's Landing, and the crowd wasn't as large as it would have been in that city.

Ranma and Daenerys would later learn that this was because Lord Tully had prepared Riverrun for the refugees the moment news of Wayfarer's Rest fall reached him. Instead of a shantytown on the other side of the Red Fork there were dozens of very decent wooden longhouses, each of which could billet three families in relative comfort. The families could then use the wood from the Whispering Wood to build their own huts slowly. A dozen families had even decided that they wouldn't be going back to their former farmsteads even after the war was over. That plus the severe edicts that the city guard kept on things such as freshwater and refuse had kept the city relatively clean and prosperous even with the massive influx of refugees.

There were gasps of awe and surprise when the crowd realized that Ranma, Jon and Arya were riding direwolves, but that was nothing in comparison to the gasp of surprise that the sight of two dragons flying over the city caused. There were some screams here and there at that sight, but not many. Evidently word of how well-trained the two dragons were had spread to Riverrun which was a very good thing in Daenerys's opinion. Her appearance too caused some shouts of surprise, but more shouts of welcome. While their Lord might have rebelled against the Mad King, the smallfolk still held a certain amount of awe in the Targaryen family.

Soon enough however, the army had trooped through the city and into the castle itself, where they were met by scores of servants moving forward to take their horses, looking in awe at the direwolves. While their mounts were quickly led away and men began to lead the army off into the barracks (and the prisoners to their temporary dwellings) Ranma and his lords were ushered into the keep and then into the dining hall.

There they found Lord Darry, Ser Grell, Ser Paege, Ser Blanetree and four unknowns. One was a young man wearing the tower and green dragon of house Vance. One wore the maiden of House Piper, another wore the red fish on white of House Mooton, and the last wore a tabard wearing a shield with wavy white, yellow and green lines. A young woman of fifteen or so stood next to the man from Mooton, wearing a dress of her houses colors. She was a pretty enough girl, but there was something about her eyes when she stared around her that set warning bells off in Daenerys' mind, or perhaps it was just when she looked at her father...

All of them rose as the Ranma, his wife and their allies entered. The young man went so far as to go to his knees for a moment to Daenerys and Ranma, while the others merely bowed their heads.

It took Tytos whispering in their ear to tell Ranma and Daenerys who the unknown man was. "Lord Butterwell, his House sat out Robert's Rebellion since they are still recovering from a massive loss of influence during the Blackfyre Rebellion. Even now they are barely a Knightly House in size. I would look to him to follow Mooton's lead, for better or worse, though I don't know either very well. Lord Piper is a habitual fence sitter, rumors say that he was tempted to disown his son for the idiocy that got him captured by the Lannisters. His House is still strong, but not well led in the field."

Ranma nodded his head slightly. "My lords, I see we were not the only ones ordered to appear here. I am certain we all have fears about why that might be, but first, what's your name lad?"

"Er, Kirth, your, my Lord." The man said, trying and failing to cover the fact he was rather bemused about Ranma and obviously smitten by Daenerys. Ranma and Daenerys exchanged an amused look which thankfully for his ego the youth missed. He might be Ranma's age or at best a little younger but he was really a babe in arms in comparison. "Um, I, I was sent as my House's representative, because my father is blind and going lame my lords."

"I see, my condolences." Ranma replied. "For that and for your losses. Your House did the best it could against the Lannisters, I just wish we could've gotten down soon enough to save your men and your brothers."

The man nodded, and Tytos stepped forward. "Ranma and Daenerys Stark-Targaryen, be known to Lord Piper, Lord Mooton, and Lord Butterwell."

Lord Mooton bowed floridly while the others merely nodded their heads. He was a middle-aged man with a fat, overfed appearance, and small beady eyes that reminded Ranma of a mouse, with all the skittering timidity of the breed. "Your Grace, long has my house and others waited for the Targaryen's return, congratulations on that and on your victories to date."

Before Daenerys could reply, an elderly man came through the doorway. "My lords, I am Utherydes Wayn, steward of Riverrun. Please, follow me." Without another word he turned and moved out of the room to the staircase, expecting them to follow. Ranma looked at Daenerys, who shrugged, and then they and all the other lords followed the man out.

As they walked up the steps, Utherydes spoke up again. "My Lord Hoster doesn't have long Sers, and he must speak to you all immediately. News has reached us of a certain offense, and we need to take it into account going forward. Then I think he'd like some time with his family." He looked back at Ranma shaking his head sadly. "It's a pity you did not bring your mother along my Lord, I think he would have liked to have seen her or even Lysa, but such is not to be."

Ranma closed his eyes tightly for a moment then shook his head before opening them. "I knew he was failing quickly, but I had hoped..." he shook his head. "I guess it doesn't matter now."

Behind him Jon and Arya both looked sad as well. Despite having never met the man Hoster was still family and the passage of family was always to be mourned. Even Jon who technically wasn't related to House Tully felt that way.

To one side of the Starks, Brynden's expression was much more conflicted. He and his brother hadn't really gotten along for most of their lives, which was further exacerbated by Hoster's heavy-handed attempt to get Brynden to marry someone who would strengthen the political ties of the family.

As they were led up from the second floor to the third a voice coming from one of the guest rooms on this level interrupted their passage. "Roger, there you are! I was told you'd probably be arriving with the rest of this lot, but if you hadn't arrived soon I was all set to head out to search for you."

Roger and the others turned at the sound of the voice and Roger gaped in shock at seeing his wife. "O-Osha, what are you doing here?" He gasped, shaking his head then smiling waving his hands in the air placatingly as the former spearwife's eyes narrowed. "I'm not unhappy you're here, I'm just wondering how and why. And who is looking after our son, Robbett?"

"The boys being looked after by yer family and the milk-girl well enough." Osha replied brusquely moving toward the group, her Common heavily accented. "Did you honestly think I'da wait at home for ya to return when yer out havin' adventures?" She smirked then shaking her head. "Mind you, I had a few of my own. Hah, there be a bit fewer people out there who'da try ta take advantage of a poor, lonely woman out on 'er own."

"I can't imagine my father actually letting you go out alone." Roger replied.

"As if I gave him da choice. 'Sides, 'e wanted someone to deliver this to you." She said holding out a sword in its sheath to Roger. "I volunteered, and when he turned me down I caught up wit' the group he sent with it, stole this from them during the night, left a message and then moved on." She shook her head sadly. "The men he chose tw'eren't 'xactly the best at keeping night watch."

Ranma laughed shaking his head, while Jon and the others were all smirking. "Why don't we just leave you two to get reacquainted Roger, you probably have a lot of catching up to do."

With that the rest of them left Roger and Osha heading further up the keep. Soon enough they were being led into the family suites, then into the bedroom that Hoster had occupied for over a year now.

Hoster was sitting up in bed with the aid of half a dozen pillows. His eyes were open, but rheumy with age. His hands and arms that were visible was palsied, and his breathing was labored, audible even from the doorway.

Ranma, his family and the Lords of the Riverlands trooped in with Ranma moving forward to touch the old man's hand gently. "Grandfather? I'm Ranma, your daughter Catelyn's oldest? I wish we could've met before this, but better late than never, right?" He asked with false cheerfulness.

The old man turned rheumy eyes on him, smiling faintly. "My eyesight hasn't gone yet, nor my mind. Heh you look exactly like the descriptions your mother sent me of you." He turned slightly to face, Jon nodded politely at him then moved on to look at Arya. "And you must be the runaway Arya. The last few messages from your mother have told me how you ran away to join your brothers' army. I can't say I approve, but I suppose that kind of strength is necessary in these days. Welcome child."

"Hello, grandfather." Arya said, nodding her head politely. If she was Sansa she might've moved forward to give the old man a kiss, but frankly Arya was a little disturbed at present by the smell of the room. Even so staring at the old man she could see the family resemblance between him and her mother. The cheekbones, despite being sunken with age were pretty obviously the same shape as her mother and a few of her brothers, Bran in particular. And the chin too, that looked a bit like what Arya herself had, as did the shape of the eyes.

Hesitantly she moved forward to take his other hand. "I..." she paused then went on, smiling slightly. "I don't suppose you have any embarrassing stories about my mother do you? That seems to be the best way of bonding with family, sharing weird stories."

Hoster laughed wetly, shaking his head and gripping both their hands with what little strength he had left. "We'll get to those eventually child, I will say that if your mother ever gave you any grief about your wayward ways, she was being hypocritical. There was many a time when she was young that she wished to gallivant off into the woods or go climbing."

He turned away from Arya with a sigh. "Unfortunately there are other things we need to speak of first." He looked over at Daenerys where she had respectfully remained by the doorway. "Welcome milady. While I may have rebelled against her family, it was never anything personal for me as it was for Robert or even Eddard. I simply felt that your father was becoming madder with every passing month, and he had to be removed for the good of all Westeros. I would never have been a party to the murder of children, nor of Elia Martell."

Daenerys's eyes narrowed but she replied calm enough. "I understand my Lord, and I have learned about my father's madness. His actions were unconscionable for any sane individual, king or no." She smiled faintly looking at Ranma and Arya. "If I do not hold the actions of the Starks against them in that war, I must extend the same to you."

Hoster nodded, then turned to the others then without further ado turned to the topic that was the reason he'd requested all of the loyal Riverlords come to Riverrun. "The Master of Whisperers has spies everywhere, but I have known some of his agents here in Riverrun for quite some time. I did not know until recently however that he knew that I knew."

A faint wintry smile crossed the old man's face for moment before he shook it off. "He used the spy, a unit commander in my city watch, to pass on a message to me." The old man closed his eyes, his hands moving as if to clench together, but he didn't have the energy to do so. "My son is dead."

That simple sentence sent a bolt of lightning through the gathered Riverlords and their heirs, and Tristan Ryger in particular looked shocked and appalled. Ranma and Arya were also shocked and Ranma sighed sadly wishing he had met the man before this. Still, I suppose after Tywin's defeat it makes sense they'd execute their hostage to send a message, really I should've expected this.

Before any of them could do more than shout and exclaim to one another Hoster went on his soft voice cutting through the bedlam easily. "He was not killed in retaliation for some of you turning against the Lannister's army, he was not executed for that which could, in the realm of politics have been understood. Edmure was not simply killed. Not to send a message, not to do anything!"

"Varys' message actually says that the Queen and the Hand were not even aware he was executed. They might have eventually decided to threaten him in that manner, but King's Landing was under siege when that message was sent to me by the forces of the Reach and Stormlands under Renly Baratheon. They had no time to spare for thought of what was going on here in the Riverlands."

Ranma's eyes narrowed at that, while he pulled thoughtfully at his ponytail. They had figured that King's Landing would be under siege, but they hadn't heard any confirmation of that before this, though Alayaya and Domicer might have since he'd last talked to them. How long has it been going on? King's Landing can't survive an actual siege, it'd stand well enough against any physical assault, or as well as any city could. But against a siege, where you simply stop supplies from getting in? It's got way too many people!

Not knowing Ranma's thoughts had gone off on a tangent Hoster continued. "No, instead my son and heir was butchered! Tortured before he finally died in the torturing. And this was done not by the Queen, not by the Hand's order, but by Joffrey the Bastard King himself!"

That caused a new round of exclamations of shock and surprise, but Hoster continued, his voice now an alloy of remembered grief and rage. "Apparently the boy is a sadist of the first order. Before my son's death..." here again Hoster had to stop to get his voice under control. "Before my son's death, Joffrey apparently went out into the streets to pick up random smallfolk and abuse them before depositing the bodies everywhere he wished. He is a monster beyond anything I've ever heard of before, earning the name the Vile One among the smallfolk."

Ranma growled angrily, as did the other Starks in the room while the Riverlords all were still looking very angry at Edmure's death rather than how he died. Hoster however had moved on and he gripped Ranma's hand feebly. "I have had my time to grieve for Edmure's death, and now need to deal with the results of it. With my son's death, you become my heir Ranma. All I ask would be for Riverrun to have a local lord chosen from your family to rule it in your stead. Other than that I concede the Riverlands to you. May all my loyal lords follow you as they would do me from this point forward."

His eyes swept the crowd, nailing Lord Darry, Lord Mooton, and Lord Butterwell in place, staring at them so hard Mooton actually quailed. After a moment he closed his eyes squeezing Arya's hand. "Now if you'll excuse us, I think I would like some time with my family. Including you, brother. I, I would not pass on with this enmity still existing between us."

Brynden looked at him from where he had stood by the doorway, then nodded slowly and moved forward, pulling up a chair next to the bed.

Still somewhat in shock at the horrible news they had just been given the Riverlords all trooped out, following Lord Wayn's brother into one of the nearest rooms. Behind them Ranma and his siblings remained by the bedside, talking quietly to Hoster.

Utherydes shook his head looking at them all. "That news arrived here about two and half, three weeks ago, and it nearly killed him. It was all maester Vyman and I could do to keep him alive after the heart attack hit. I don't think Hoster has even a few more days frankly. His body's just giving out on him." The old man smiled wryly. "Something I am beginning to feel myself frankly."

Lord Piper coughed slightly looking at his fellow Lords speculatively, in particular Lord Ryger and Lord Mooton. "Is no one going to comment about how fortuitous this is for Lord Stark? After all, now that the invasion of Westerlands has been halted, how many of us here would be willing to back him in the battle against the Baratheon brothers further south?"

"I would." Tytos said coolly echoed by Ser Blanetree and several others.

This of course included Lord Jason Mallister, who was looking at the man with scant favor. "And if you're trying to imply that Ranma had something to do with Edmure's death, I will tell you now not bring that idea up in conversation where he could hear it. Ranma would personally challenge you to a duel and then most probably rip you in half like he did Gregor Clegane. If you spend any time at all around the Starks, you will learn that family is incredibly important to them."

He held up a hand to stop the man from talking. "Not their family's personal power, but their actual well-being. They care about family, and even if Ranma never met Edmure, he was family to Ranma. In fact, Ranma was more than willing to discuss exchanging some of the Lannister prisoners for him in the future." The two of them had talked about that along with Tytos during the days Ranma had spent as Tytos' guest at Raventree hall.

"Indeed." Daenerys said from where she had been following the Riverlords, unnoticed by most of them. Now they all turned to her and she shrugged her shoulders slightly. "One of the things I most admire in Ranma is that he is a caring individual. Ranma would never torture anyone, and the very thought of harming or even planning to harm anyone like that is anathema to him."

Lord Piper would have said that she was a biased source, except looking around he noticed that the only three that were even listening to them at all were Lord Butterwell, Darry and Mooton, and none of them were speaking up in defense of the idea. "Very well," he said backing away verbally from the topic. "As you all know him better than I do, I will take your word for his thoughts on actions such as that."

"For your own sake my Lord, I would listen to lord Jason and never mention that concept again." Daenerys replied coolly. "Ranma isn't the only one who would challenge and kill you for it, regardless of the political problems it would cause later. Arya and Jon are both capable of doing the same thing, and even some of the Stark men might do it if they heard you insulting their King so."

She looked around at the others. "I am going to go talk to Patrek and the other Wolfsworn as well as the about housing for the prisoners. After that my lord steward, I will need to talk to you about organizing a space for several dozen trials. Regardless of this new tragedy we will need to see to the disposition of our prisoners before we turn our attentions elsewhere." With that she left him there, and the Riverlords turned to one another talking quietly.

It turned out that Utheryde's estimation of Hoster's life was off by two days. He had only been holding on through sheer willpower in a desire to talk to his grandchildren. Later that very evening, Hoster Tully passed away quietly with a smile on his face while Arya and Ranma were telling him about one of Arya's misadventures.

An hour or so later Ranma walked down the stairs into the castles dining hall, where all the gathered lords and many of their heirs were eating together, sharing the news that Hoster had told them with their northern fellows. Daenerys too was there, talking to Myrcella about the city's organization and a few of the city watch commanders.

They all quieted instantly as Ranma entered, followed by Arya and Brynden. Behind the trio maester Wyman walked, carrying a single candle. He set the candle down in front of the Lord's seat at the front of the hall, then Ranma and the older man, his eyes red with unshed tears, draped a long black cloak over the seat, signifying Hoster's passing. It was only every really used when a lord died of old age or in peace time, but it still had to be done. After a few moments silence, the maester formally put the candle out ending the ceremony.

Having sat nearby Arya surprised herself somewhat by actually feeling tears in her eyes. Those few hours she spent with her grandfather had been interesting and fun, but she couldn't say that she had really seen him as family, not really. Yet even so his passing hurt her somehow.

A second later she was surprised to feel Bess and Edric, who sat on both sides of her, each grab a hand where they lay on her lap under the table and squeeze. She looked at them and smiled nodding her head before she wiped away the tears.

Ranma stood next to the seat staring out across the gathered Lords and heirs, finding a few here and there to stare at harder than the others but mostly just letting his eyes roam over their faces. "My grandfather has passed." He said softly yet even so every man and woman there heard him, speaking much more formally than was his normal mode. "He passed peacefully, despite his son's horrible death. He was a great man, and a good, just ruler. I regret not having had the chance to get to know him better, but age is the one enemy that will eventually come for us all."

"By right of blood and by his own words, I was his heir and I am now Lord Paramount of both the North and the Riverlands. I have no doubt that my northern Lords have shared the fact that they have named my wife and I King and Queen of the North. I ask you all formerly now, will you weld the Riverlands to the North? Will you follow me?"

The Lords of the Riverlands all looked at one another then Jason Mallister stood, followed a millisecond later by his son. "I have stood with you thus far, and I will continue to do so. My sword was yours when you were only acting as your grandfather's voice, I see no reason to change it now when you have become my liege."

He made to kneel formerly, but Ranma held up a hand. "No! I ask no man to kneel to me. You said it yourself Jason, you've already stood with us in battle. That is all I ask. Will you stand with me? Will you stand alongside us as we face the threats to come?"

Knowing her cue even though they hadn't actually discussed it Daenerys moved forward at that point. She took his hand and joining him in staring out at the Riverlords. "Will you follow us, will you follow our new House, House Stargaryen?"

"When the Lannister's came despoiling, burning and raping across our lands, the Baratheons did not answer." Said Tytos getting to his feet. "You did, you came to not just the aid of your family but of the entire Riverlands, and of my family in particular. I will stand with you, my King."

Silas was next, simply standing with a firm nod alongside Ser Blantree. Tristan and Vincent quickly rose to stand with them, prompting their uncle to reluctantly stand as well. "Long live Ranma Stark, King of the North and the Trident!" The two brothers shouted together.

Lord Charlton also stood, bowing his head slightly. But saying nothing as was his want. Kirth Vance stood next, his voice no longer showing any hint of wavering. "You avenged my brother's deaths, you've proven yourself an able general, and from what I've heard an able Lord as well. I also agree that you alone seemed to care about us. May you and your lovely Queen rule long and fairly, Your Highness."

Lord Mooton was surprisingly the next one to stand and speak, his voice smooth and polished, yet somehow ringing false in Ranma and Daenerys' ears. "Long has my family wanted a return of law and order, of precedent and lineage, rather than brute force." He smiled suddenly. "You seem to have both on your side now. Long may the Wolf King and the Dragon Queen reign!"

All the other lords and knights stood and shouted their approval, the Northerners reaffirming their loyalty with roars of sound and the Riverlanders formally acceding to Ranma and Daenerys's rule as king and Queen for the first time. Even Lord Piper, for all his concerns about their youth and about the nature of how Ranma became his grandfather's heir, was swept up in the moment. Where Ranma could have demanded their loyalties, he'd instead won them, where he could have demanded they kneel, he only asked them to stand. In that moment he had not just one then their loyalty, but their admiration as well.

The tales of Ranma had already begun with his masterful campaign against the Lannisters, but this solidified it. It also the first time someone penned the name that would remain with him throughout his reign. Daenerys too, would earn her own name in days to come. When she took the lead on the trials of the Lords they had captured and then organizing the laws of Westeros and streamlining the legal process. When she began to give rights to the smallfolk that had never formally been theirs before and making the laws so much easier to understand, Daenerys would earn her own name: the name of Daenerys the Just.

But for his deeds, both politically and on the battlefield, Ranma would be called something else, a name pinned that night by Domic the bard from where he watched, his eyes gleaming as he watched the future of Westeros change for all time. For his deeds, Ranma would become Ranma the Great.

OOOOOO

That evening Ranma and Daenerys met with their most trusted counselors. Tytos and Silas were also there, as representatives of the Riverlands along with Jason. That Tytos was there despite not having fought with the army was a mark of Ranma's trust in the man, who he had come to like almost as much as Jason.

The group however did not include Brynden, who was off getting quietly but competently drunk at the moment grieving in his own way for his brother's passing. The two of them had been able to come to terms with one another in the last moments of his life, but that only made Hoster's passing hurt all the more.

Ranma leaned back wearily rubbing at his forehead for a moment waving one hand at Daenerys to start. Daenerys nodded, rubbing at one of his shoulders commiserating. She didn't really have any family, but she knew that caring for his was one of the main tenants of Ranma's personality, even one who he didn't know at all like his grandfather.

She turned to the others nodding her head at Alayaya and Domic. "Let's start with you too, since you joined us so late in the march. Before we get to any of your news elsewhere, have you been able to get a feeling for the morale of the smallfolk in Riverrun?"

"They are joyful and ebullient my lady." Domic said smiling faintly. "That's what happens when someone learns that their side won the war. However, there is also a lot of underlying anger against the Lannisters. I don't know if you all heard it when you were marching through, but there are a lot of people in those crowds out there that want to tear the Westerlanders apart."

"I've already talked to a few of my former sisters in the business." Alayaya said delicately. "Several of them have long-term clients and one or two of them are worrying. They definitely have connections to the Westerlands, business-related ones for the most part, and I'd say at least one of them is a Lannister agent. He's a wealthy merchant, with several dozen armsmen to his name apparently."

"Is he a threat?" Tytos asked skeptically.

"Not alone my Lord, but..." Alayaya shrugged. "We haven't even been here a full day, yet there is already a rumor that Tywin will pay his own weight in gold to whoever aids in freeing him. I don't know who among our forces is letting that message out, but I think we need to take it seriously."

She smiled thinly when Domicer looked at her in surprise before leaning back and crossing her arms under her chest theatrically, bringing attention to her assets with the ease of long practice laughing internally as the eye of practically every lord in the room followed the gesture. "I have certain advantages in getting men to talk to me that you don't Domicer." She replied to his unanswered question in a dry tone.

Ranma came out of his funk somewhat to laugh at that, winking at the former whore who winked back with a giggle. After a moment however he addressed the matter more seriously. "I would prefer to put off Tywin's trial and execution until after we dealt with all of his men but those trials are going to take at least what, two, three full days? In your opinion Domicer, Alayaya, would putting his trial for that long be tempting fate? "

"Yes." both spymasters talked at once, then looked at one another shrugging. "Frankly my Lord, his swift execution would send a very strong message, putting it off to the end might make it more dramatic but in this case I don't think it's necessary." Domicer replied for them both Daenerys nodded. "In that case, we will start with him the day after the mourning period is over." She closed her eyes in thought. "The Lord's dining hall here will do as a court room. We'll want about a hundred or so witnesses from among the smallfolk, as well as all the lords currently in attendance and a neutral scribe to take notes during the trials. Or rather several scribes. One for our own records, one for House Tully's, and one to be sent to the Lannisters. We might wish to check with Lord Piper and Lord Mooton on that, I think they are the most neutral Lords towards us at this point."

Tytos shrugged. "It's nothing personal my lady, as I said, Piper's a fence sitter, he's always been one to couch his bets. He's a cagey man, but you can at least trust him to do what is best not only for his family but for the smallfolk who look to them for protection."

"That's fine my Lord, but that doesn't mean I necessarily want him or his men serving with the main army. And speaking of which, it won't be all the Lords here. I think that the majority of the army with us should turn around and head to the camp outside Harroway. Greatjon, Rickard, you'll be in charge of that. I believe that most of the Riverlords should be here for the trials, is that correct?" Ranma asked.

Tytos and Jason both nodded firmly. "They'll want to see justice done, and the ones who haven't dealt with you in the past will want to get a better feel for the both of you Ranma." Jason said. "And after the trials are done, there will be other issues to deal with, specifically what will happen to the lands of the traitor Houses and the ones that have been wiped out by this war."

"Those are things with my wife and I have already been thinking about my Lord." Ranma said squeezing Daenerys' hand for a moment as she actually flushed at the memory. Ranma had only a few thoughts along those lines. But Daenerys, and she was quick to point out Merry, had a lot of ideas on that score, not just about what to do with the Westerlands after the Golden Tooth was taken. The make-out session the two of them had after she shared their brainstorming had been intense.

"We won't talk about that topic until after the trials however. For now, let's concentrate on the military and logistics. Domicer, Alayaya do you have any idea what's been going on further south?"

Domicer and Alayaya looked at one another wondering how Ranma would take their news. Alayaya hadn't taken it well when she first heard of it, fearing for her mother's safety but not able to do anything about it. So Domicer spoke up again for both of them. "The two Baratheon brothers are apparently going to do battle in the near future according to rumor, or at least that was the case when we left Harroway, which means the battle might have already occurred, we might be able to get confirmation of that here in Riverrun, though that's doubtful. That fights going to happen near King's Landing, where a plague has apparently begun to reave through the people."

Everyone in the room gasped in shock and not a little fear. Plague was the one enemy that everyone feared equally.

No sword or ax or strategy could work against a disease, and an outbreak could kill more people than the most horrible war. "How bad is it?" Daenerys asked her face paler than usual.

"Horrible." Domic said bluntly. "The only reason we know about it at all is because Renly's army isn't trying to attack the city any longer, they haven't been trying for weeks. Rather they've been interdicting it, making certain that no one can leave. With the number of people in King's Landing there is almost nothing anyone could do to stop a plague from ravaging the city. There simply wouldn't be enough troops to control the smallfolk, and they would panic and riot and..." He shuddered a little cursing his bard's soul for once as it forced him to once more imagine the horror that King's Landing had probably become.

Ranma looked over at Myrcella who had paled visibly, even further than Daenerys, and her hands were clenched together almost hard enough for her nails to draw blood. He reached over, pulling her into a hug wordlessly offering what support he could. Whatever else had happened Merry still cared for her mother and even her uncle Jaime, both of whom were stuck in King's Landing apparently, along with servants and teachers and even a few acquaintances that she had known most of her life.

"Did you hear any hint about this Vile One that Joffrey is supposed to have become?" Myrcella asked after a moment. "I think it fits his personality, but not his skill. He'd need someone's help to get in and out of the Red Keep without mother finding out, especially during a siege. She must be keeping him even closer than normal now."

"I'm afraid not your Highness." Alayaya replied sadly reaching over to take the younger girl's hand in one of her own smirking internally as she noticed that Ranma haven't relinquished his one armed hug on the over the girls shoulder and that Daenerys seemed perfectly content with the sign of affection. Interesting.

"What are you are you thinking about Myrcella?" Ranma asked looking down at the girl.

"Remember how I told you that Joffrey and Petyr seemed to be coming close before my brother's death? I'm wondering if Petyr decided to back Joffrey for some reason. I am struggling however with what he would get out of it."

"Actually, I think that would be the easiest part of it." Daenerys said with a shrug. "In times of war a Master of Coin isn't exactly the most powerful position after all, especially for someone who doesn't have any other powerbase. But the King? He could add to Petyr's powerbase quite a bit even if he's a useless young monster like Joffrey. Do we know who the Hand of the King is?"

Domic and Alayaya shook their heads. "That's kind of thing is a little too detailed and a little too high level for rumor among the smallfolk to pass it on this far away my lady." Domic replied.

"Then is there anything else you can tell us about events happening elsewhere?" Daenerys asked.

"The Ironborn have taken the Arbor and the Shield Islands." Alayaya replied bluntly, grateful for the change in topic. "Wine merchants have heard all about it. Apparently, they used some kind of fire ships to cause a lot of chaos before their own fleet arrived, though how they took the Shield Islands no one seems to know. Since then, they've sent reaving parties up the Mander, no one knows how deep they've gotten."

"Joy." Ranma muttered shaking his head angrily. Frowning thoughtfully he tried to conjure up a map of Westeros in his mind then shook his head. "If Renly isn't a complete idiot he'll have already split his army and sent at least a third of his men back into the Reach to deal with the Ironborn. The Ironborn simply don't have the numbers to hold the Shield Islands and the Arbor, even given their skill at sea. But that will leave him facing his brother with what a four to one advantage or something? Do we have any idea how strong a force Stannis has been able to put together?"

"Other than the fact that he took Duskendale and seems to have at least four or five Houses from the Stormlands on his side, no. My best guess would be around 20,000 or so." Domic said with a shrug. "Merchants that travel to Duskendale with their goods brought that news back to Harroway, but exact numbers? Why would they care about that? Um..."

The bard looked between Ranma and Daenerys for a moment then went on delicately. "On the subject of the Reach my lords, we received a messenger from the Lady Margaery to you Ranma. Note, I, I said the lady Margaery, not House Tyrell. I convinced the man to wait until we learned what your grandfather had summoned you to Riverrun for before asking for an audience with you, but he has no idea what the message is."

"Huh." Ranma shook his head, surprised, while Daenerys merely cocked her head thoughtfully. "Well, I'll speak to him first thing tomorrow I suppose. That bit of business will be allowed during the mourning period won't it?"

Daenerys nodded at that, seeing no issue with it. She and Ranma had talked several times about Margaery, and Daenerys knew the girl was no threat to her position by his side or in his heart. Though does she know the same thing?

"You can meet with him and read his message for certain, but nothing to do with laws or the running of the city should occur during the time of mourning." Jason replied.

"Anything else we need to go over tonight?" Ranma asked.

"There are countless rumors of this or that area in the Riverlands being plagued by bandits, but there aren't actually as many as I had feared. The rumors that you will actually try and execute the Lords mostly responsible for the atrocities have spread to the smallfolk, and the general response is a wait-and-see attitude. Smallfolk have been promised a lot in the past, they're waiting to see if you actually follow through." Alayaya replied.

"Oh we will do that. We surely will." Ranma replied grimly.

OOOOOO

Early the next day the majority of the army turned around, heading back towards Harroway under Greatjon and Rickard's joint command. They left behind 7000 men but had gained around 1,500 from House Tully consisting mostly of archers, light cavalry and scouts to join Meera's growing command. But that was not House Tully's only contribution. Not only would Riverrun now become the center of the army's supply lines, but Hoster had also raised a pike regiment in the style that Jon and he had introduced in the North. They weren't as well trained as the Northerners from House Stark or House Cerwyn, but they were quite good and that final bit of training could be added on the march.

He had already turned that task over to a few of the unit commanders from the Northern Regiment, and was confident they would be whipped into shape by the time they were needed. The remaining Army however was there to guard the prisoners, not just the Lords but all of the Westerners soldiers that had been captured and gathered in Riverrun for the present time. House Tully retained around 900 heavy horse, around 500 archers and another 1000 heavy infantry.

Ranma also had plans for some of them, but that was for later. Right now, he had a letter from a friend to see to. He called for the Reach messenger to be brought to him in the dining hall while Daenerys remained in their rooms, having sent for Alayaya for something.

The knight from the Reach was a man of slightly below middle age with the kind of build that Ranma had often seen in heavy cavalymen, heavy shoulders matched with bow legs. He also radiated a sort of solidness, which Ranma found familiar, having searched out men such as that for his small unit commanders all along. "Ser Knight," Ranma said as the man about his head slightly. He smiled, knowing that the brevity of that bow wasn't an insult, simply a statement that Ranma wasn't his king, or even Lord Paramount. "I'm told that you have a message for me from Lady Margaery?"

"Ser Willem Wythers, my lord. The Lady Margaery wrote it about a month and a half ago, so what is in it might not be all that accurate anymore. But it was my duty to deliver it to you in any event."

"I understand the fog of war Willem, believe me, I've even used it on occasion. May I have the message please?"

The knight nodded, and moved forward handing it over. Ranma leaned back slitting open the parchment, noting absently that it was sealed with both House Tyrell's and Margaery's own seal. The seal of House Tyrell was a large flower as seen from above with five petals and five thorns between them. Margaery's was a rose laid on it's side. Wondering why she used both Ranma unrolled the parchment, and began to read. 'Ranma, I hope this message reaches you. In some ways, I know it won't reach you in time, but in others I hope you take it to heart.'

From there it recounted in concise sentences what had occurred since Renly had left with his army, before reiterating the fact that she had not been in favor of the marriage. She made a point of noting that Willas had been sent northwest to deal with the Lannister despoilers sent into the Reach, before stating:

'Now the Reach lies practically defenseless, and the Ironborn have taken advantage of it. My father is a buffoon, my brother Loras is love-struck, Garlan has been roped into service to the buffoon, and Willas is dealing with one of the two threats already. Hopefully Garlan will have returned by this time and will be dealing with the Ironborn threats, but even if we beat off the Ironborn, the Reach will have been ravaged badly. What is worse in a way is how we came to this impasse and it is this matter that I wish to speak to you about.'

'I have heard that you have married Daenerys Stormborn, and I cannot honestly fault you or declaim you an oathbreaker, since my family broke off the engagement first. But I would ask you and her to look favorably upon my House regardless of my father's actions. While I am in no position as yet to decry those actions, he is with the army, and I am still here in Highgarden, the seat of our power. Think on that for a moment.'

Ranma did, smiling slightly as he went over what else Dmeric had shared with them last night. Seriously have to get some up to date news or at least the best we can get here about what's going on down there. After thinking about it for a moment Ranma went back to reading:

'As the only Tyrell within Highgarden at the moment, I have certain powers of regency. As such, I am formally recognizing the primacy of House Stark-Targaryen, and not only pledging Highgarden to you as king of the realms but I offer myself to you and your Queen as surfeit of House Tyrell's loyalty. I pray that this will be enough to offset whatever anger is incurred by my father's actions, and that you will look favorably upon your loyal servants. Signed, Margaery of House Tyrell.'

Staring at the last bit of writing Ranma brought his hand p to pull at his ponytail then began to laugh. Well played lady, well played indeed. Shaking his head he looked down at the Willem who was looking at him with his head cocked to one side wondering how Ranma had taken the message. "I doubt that you'll be able to head back to Highgarden with a message anytime soon Ser Willem, and I have to talk about the contents of this letter with my wife in any event. However, I can tell you that I personally am looking favorably upon what she says in this message, and what it could mean for the Reach in general."

OOOOOO

Elsewhere in the castle Alayaya stared across the small table at Daenerys, then chuckled a little, her full, sensual lips quirking into a small smile. Though she had wondered, she hadn't really expected something like this. "I am going to look at this from two perspectives. One of them is from the perspective of your friend. From that perspective, I would simply ask you two questions. One, would you be comfortable with sharing Ranma with another woman, and I mean really comfortable with it? This isn't you trying to force yourself to bring her in because you think it would make him happier is it?"

"No, nothing like that." Daenerys shook her head. "I haven't even broached the subject with him. But I can see how he and Merry interact, and I can tell even if he can't that he loves her. Not as much as he loves me, or possibly not in the same manner yet, but there will come a time when he realizes she's blossomed into a woman, and his love will change."

"As to your question, if you had asked me four or even three months ago if I would be comfortable with the idea of sharing my husband, my answer would've been no, and I might've slapped you for even suggesting it. But since then I've come to care for Merry myself. Indeed I've spent so much time around Merry, it would feel wrong not to have her nearby."

Alayaya smiled thinking about another aspect of what was going on here. She knew many sisters of her former profession that enjoyed the touch of women just as much as men or even more so. Most of them had horrible experiences with men in the past, but some were simply born with that lack of preference.

While the first was obviously not the case here, there was an easy way to check if the second held true. "And you find yourself looking at her as well don't you? When you're talking to her and when Merry's laughing, you smile. When you're sharing a horse, when your arms are around her and your head on her shoulders, you think how good she feels in your arms, how nice she smells. Have you caught yourself thinking it would be so easy to lean in for a kiss?"

Daenerys flushed hotly, looking away then back at Alayaya. "W, Where did that come from!?"

"Is it true?" Alayaya pressed.

"I..." Daenerys paused. "I don't...possibly." She looked away again. "Possibly. I don't find her as attractive as I find Ranma, but there have been times where... where I've had thoughts like that."

"So this wouldn't just be about Ranma and Merry and then Ranma and you, it would be a true three-way if she feels the same way toward you." Alayaya said nodding her head. "That's good, the only way a three-person relationship can really survive is if they are as equal as possible behind closed doors, so to speak. That you all love and care for one another is incredibly important."

"On that note, I think that approaching the matter with Ranma after you've made certain that Myrcella feels the same way towards you might be a good idea. I've seen the way the two of them interact too, and you're right it's only a matter of time before Ranma wises up and realizes that Merry isn't his little sister no matter how often he tries to convince himself of that. But if she isn't attracted to you Daenerys, I think you should pull back and then find some way to send Merry off somewhere. Having her nearby would be a wrench on all of you in different ways."

Daenerys looked miserable at the very idea, having missed Merry almost as deeply as Ranma when she was with him and his portion of the army baiting the lion on the other side of the Red Fork. Still she nodded, knowing that having Merry around and not having her in the relationship might cause issues later on.

"If it makes you feel better, I think she is attracted to you in some way, but that's for the three of you to find out." Alayaya sighed, then her face firmed as she went on brusquely. "Now we come to my response to this issue as one of your spymasters."

"I doubt I have to point out the political downsides of this idea to you, but what about the social ones? The Seven teach that polyamorous relationships are a sin, and I'm afraid you already have too much sin built into you from their perspective for you to get away with adding more. The smallfolk have already been a major help thanks to the septons deciding to back you and Ranma. My information network has grown in leaps and bounds because of that, and I know that the Army is getting its supplies even faster than would otherwise be the case. Jeopardizing that asset is a very bad idea."

"And politically it would be a very bad idea as well done." Daenerys replied nodding her head. "You don't have to tell me. And yet, I can't shake the feeling that the three of us would be happy together."

"Politics and happiness rarely go together your Majesty." Alayaya said sadly. "Unless you can think of some way of keeping the knowledge of your relationship from getting out, and there really isn't any way to stop that from happening eventually, I would recommend that you wait until we are forced to acknowledge she is a Waters rather than a true-born Baratheon princess. I doubt there will come a time when we would be in a position to place her as heir or lady of the Lannisters, so the connection to the Baratheon line is the more important aspect."

"So long as she is known as a baseborn, you'll have more leeway in what you can get away with in terms of keeping her by your side as a handmaiden or confidant rather than needing to think of arranging a marriage to secure her line. Until then, I beg you not to act on your feelings. With what Viserys has recently tried and added to your own dubious background it would cause a social shit storm like you would not believe!"

Daenerys nodded rueful agreement, and the discussion turned to other things. Though she was still worrying about the problem the back of her mind even as she walked out of Alayaya's room several hours later wondering if it would be worth it even so.

OOOOOO

Later that evening Ranma and Daenerys sat taking a meal together alone for once in the suite that Ranma had taken over here in Riverrun. It was not the lords apartments, those Ranma refused to live in. Not only did they still smell faintly of his grandfather, but Hoster had lived there for so long his stamp was everywhere. They were in fact Edmure's former quarters, but they had been cleaned and personal effects removed long before Ranma had arrived.

"Interesting." Daenerys said thoughtfully laying down the message. "I wonder what she means when she says that she offers herself in service."

"I think we couldn't do very much better in terms of a representative on our counsel for the Reach in the future." Ranma said after swallowing his piece of bread quickly. "For right now, I think we need to wait until Domic and Alayaya have time to hunt up some of the latest rumors from the Reach if they can."

"You realize if we agree to take her at her word, we might be forced to back Margaery against her father don't you? We will be setting a very strange precedent. If her father doesn't swear loyalty to us at any rate."

"Reading between the lines of the message, I think that she believes that Mace is too far in with Renly to back out now." Ranma paused thinking about what he knew of the man which unfortunately wasn't very much, and all of it built from secondhand sources. Mind you some of those secondhand sources were very good indeed as the man's own daughter was one of them. "I think that Mace will continue to fight for whoever offers his family the best chance of becoming tied to the royal line and I mean immediately tied."

"Which means Margaery is the tool of choice for him?" Daenerys asked scowling at the very idea. She knew that marriages between Houses were important, and she knew that women were a commodity in that market, but it seemed callous to her particularly when the man might not even be able to do his husbandly duty as in the case of Renly. "If she rebels against him then, will she be able to make it stick?"

"Again that's a question we can't answer just yet. Even so, it could certainly sow some discord among any Reach forces we meet."

"But if we agree to take her at her word it also forces us to send troops." Daenerys said critically. "What kind of forces could we send them, and would they even arrive in time to do any good?"

"The force to send would be easy enough. House Keath didn't send a representative here, which means we'll be forced to deal with that family's keep. They're situated at the mouth of the Blackwater, which we could use to transport a force much quicker down to the Reach than on foot. After we take the Golden Tooth, I'll send Jon and a force down that way, the composition of which I'll think about after we get some hard data both from the Reach and from what's going on in King's Landing."

"What do you think is going on?" Daenerys asked looking at him thoughtfully.

"I think that Stannis is going to massacre Renly." Ranma said flatly. "Renly never struck me as very intelligent and certainly has no experience at war. Stannis has both, and they might be closer in numbers than Renly would like."

"Stannis will be our more most dangerous opponent then. At least until my brother somehow shows up somewhere." Daenerys mused.

"From what you told about me your brother he didn't sound like he'd make a very good general, and frankly I think Oberyn is a little overrated as a warrior let alone a general, which I don't think he has any experience in even if he was a mercenary over in Essos for a time." Ranma shrugged. "With you, Sunfyre and Rhaegon able to take Viserys and the dragon you're certain he has out of the equation, we could beat any army he fields like a drum."

He watched Daenerys wince remembering that egg, but reached across grasping her hand tightly. "Daenerys," he said softly. "I know you still feel bad about leaving that egg behind, but you made the right choice at the time given what you knew about me. And even if you had confided in me, remember I couldn't fight an entire city up in arms, and if they had closed the port against us we would've been stuck."

"But there is something else you need to know." He went on earnestly, moving around the table still holding her hand and going to one knee in front of her to stare into her eyes. "That Dragon, whatever he could have become under you and your gentle touch, there's no way he's become that under your brother. Can you honestly say your brother would have been training him the same way you'd have yours, even without me telling you how to warg with them?"

Daenerys stared into his blue eyes for a moment then slowly shook her head sighing sadly. "No. No, I have no doubt that my brother has created a monster. It doesn't make it any easier, but up if it comes to that, I will I will do my duty there. I will even be, be a kinslayer if I must."

"I hope it won't come to that, and I'll try my damndest to make certain it doesn't, but the dragon, you might have to deal with." Ranma said honestly squeezing her hands. Ranma could do it, if he tried, but only if none of his own men were around and even then he might have to get a bit closer than he could in a full battle situation.

Daenerys reached forward with her free hand, gently stroking Ranma's hair for a moment then cupping his chin and pulling him gently to his feet. "Kings shouldn't bow or kneel to anyone, not even their queens." She said with a laugh. Then she went on more seriously looking up at him thoughtfully. "We need to talk about something else soon. We need to talk about Merry after the trials."

"Merry, what about her?" Ranma asked trying to keep up with changing conversation and failing miserably.

"After the trials." Daenerys said firmly. "We'll discuss it then." After I make a decision about my own feelings. "Until then I want both of us on task."

"Oh really?" Ranma said with a laugh, leaning down to kiss her. She tried to pull back, but his arms went around her lifting her out of the chair as easily as if she were a babe. Holding her against his body while still kissing her ardently, he moved them over to the bed. "Well, right now." He said pulling back slightly. "I wish to focus on a different task."

Daenerys laughed, then began to help him untie her clothing.

OOOOOO

Loras had been on the road after the false king and the other Lannisters for about five days now, but had been unable to catch them up just yet, while in turn a messenger from his father had been able to catch up with him and his force. He stared down the Kingsroad in that direction then back down at the message from his father. Then he looked across at Lord Ashford. "I have no wish to serve Stannis," he said simply. "I am a believer in the Seven, and his new religion is anathema to me. Then there are the rumors that we've already begun to hear from the smallfolk about some great burning going on further south. Whatever that is, I cannot imagine it was anything good."

The older man looked back at him, his own thoughts a jumble. For one thing, he somehow knew that if this force had thrown its lot into the battle back at King's Landin, they would have certainly changed its outcome, especially if they had attacked from the back or flank of Stannis's forces. And somehow he also knew that Loras knew that, and wasn't displeased or pleased about it. Whatever had happened between him and Renly had obviously been far more important than Lord Ashford had thought.

With that in mind he blurted out, "What happened between you and Renly my lord?" He held up a hand as Loras opened his mouth. "Please my Lord, I need to know. Did you throw that battle purposefully?"

"No." Loras said after a moment, thinking up a lie on the spot. "I did not. As to what happened between myself and my brother, I learned that he had decided to repudiate his agreement with my family, and to send overtures to the Dragon Queen to coerce Harroway from the Starks. He feared her dragons you see, and had felt that they and she would give his claim to the throne even more legitimacy."

"But then that Shadow Assassin attacked, and killed Emmon, who was the only other witness. Renly was going to send him as a messenger. After that, it would've been my own world against his, and even my own father would not have believed me under those circumstances, not since everyone knew the two of us had been estranged since my injury." He raised a hand to touch the burn scars on his face, scowling angrily as he remembered the pain of them.

That actually made a lot of sense, though it still was a little cold-blooded not to care overmuch about Renly after being his friend for so long. And Ashford could also tell Loras was still holding something back. Yet I too have my doubts about this new religion, and the rumors from further south have redoubled them.

There was also something else bothering him. "Lord Mace has changed sides so quickly and too readily for my liking," he said aloud. "Flip-flopping like that shows a lack of spine and mental ability. Worse, he is intending to marry your sister off to Stannis just as he did Renly? The idea of Stannis's setting his wife aside does not speak well with me."

Loras nodded but remained silent watching the man closely. After a moment Ashford smiled. "My family is loyal to House Tyrell my Lord, we have been for centuries, we will continue to be for centuries more Seven willing. But our loyalty to House Tyrell does not mean we have to be loyal to Mace. What do you wish us to do from now on?"

At that circumspect declaration Loras smiled, reaching across between their horses to slap the other man on his shoulder. "I think we should continue on, my father even commands us to do so we're not going to be forcing an issue there just yet. If we catch up to the Brat King and her party, if we capture them we'll have our own bargaining chip. And from there we can head up into the Riverlands easily."

Lord Ashford's eyes widened, but then he nodded quickly. All of the Reach had been loyal to house Targaryen, not just House Tyrell, and the idea of taking them such powerful tokens of their loyalty as Cersei and her brat would mean Daenerys and the Starks would look favorably upon them. "Catching up to them won't be easy my Lord." He cautioned. "All of them are pushing their horses hard, and we've got infantry."

"Yes, but we can live off the lay of the land just as easily as they, and no doubt Stannis has already sent out orders to all the remaining Crownlands Houses he can reach with ravens. They won't find any help at Sow's Horn. When they break off to head there, we'll send some scouts after them, but keep our main force heading up the Kingsroad, and then split off further north of their position. The Kingsroad will allow us to get ahead of them heading north, and we can then move east and cut them off from House Edgerton. At worst, we'll force them back towards the Riverlands."

Ashford nodded, going over a mental map of the Crownlands that wasn't very good if he was honest with himself. Still, that made some sense to him. "And we can stand a messenger up the Kingsroad towards Harroway my Lord, if the Starks have any forces there, they might send them south to aid us."

"Excellent notion my Lord." Loras said with a laugh. "But for now, let us continue the march."

OOOOOO

The next day started with Hoster Tully being sent out into the Red Fork on a bier set alight by seven fire arrows on the first of two days of mourning Ranma had ordered for his grandfather, where businesses were closed and nothing formal could happen. Normally it would have lasted seven days, but in times of war the normal mourning period could be cut down. Having any time before the trials began was going against his spymaster's advice, but Ranma was adamant in wanting to honor the man, and his other advisors were right in how it would have looked to the city-folk if they felt Ranma was not grieving his grandfather's death appropriately.

Of course Ranma still used this time to train and to talk to Daenerys about some ideas he had going forward to deal with the fall out of the war so far in the Riverlands. The most important thing was the meeting they had with a merchant who had ties to Myr. They were able to negotiate a deal between them for enough glass to build a glass garden to match Vincent's design.

It would be very work intensive, and take a lot of coal to keep the waters running through it warm, since Riverrun lacked the underground hot-springs that had allowed the original to be built there. But it would work, using a portion of the area between the actual castle and the rest of the island to water the plants, while fires set into clay cisterns below it would heat the water which would create steam above, and keep the temperature in the glass garden regulated.

The startup cost was enormous, larger than the army's wages thus far by an order of magnitude. Even if the glass was on hand that would have been the case, but the fact it had to be transported from Myr over the ocean to Harroway and then up the river, multiplied the cost by three times. Indeed, it was only the fact that Ranma planned to take the Golden Tooth that allowed them to negotiate the deal at all.

The rest of the Wolfsworn did various things. Roger spent time with his wife of course, while Eddy and Hathan trained to get Hathan back up to speed. Smalljon, Dacey and Arya explored the city with Patrek, Vincent and Tristan as their guides. Daryn arrived a few days after the army with the bulk of the prisoners they had taken in the battle at the Ruby Ford, along with Wendel and the prisoners from the Kneeling Man ford.

The arrival of the prisoners caused a wave of anger through the refugees everywhere in the city, since they all were still wearing their tabards. The city watch however was up to the task of keeping a lid on things for now, aided by the rumor that the prisoners had been brought there to be formally tried and sentenced. That actually won Daenerys and Ranma some goodwill, since it showed yet again that they believed in justice and the rule of law.

No, it wasn't those prisoners who were the issue.

Ranma had placed Jon in charge of the prisoners along with Domic. The two of them watched all of the servants who entered the prisoner's tower like hawks, and the two of them were able to intercept a message for Tywin at one point, and foil an attempt to get a knife to one of the other prisoners. Both times the servants were caught and questioned, leaving two different merchants who had ties to House Lannister. Those merchants were seized in turn, questioned, then executed as spies in wartime, their liquid assets added to the Stark-Targaryen war chest and their business given over to the Castle and to run in House Stark's name.

This was however only the prelude to the real attempt to break Tywin out.

The fourth night of the mourning period Jon was once more on guard, patrolling the corridor of the tower that was housing the noble prisoners. Ghost was around the place somewhere, but Jon hadn't been able to figure out a way to both be aware of what Ghost was doing, and watch his own surroundings. So he didn't have any idea where Ghost was in the tower at the moment.

Jon moved silently, having learned that at least from his bonded, and he didn't carry a torch either, trusting to his merely human eyesight. He moved through the dark of the corridors like just another shadow, pausing occasionally to listen before moving on.

It was his hearing allowed Jon to spot the strange discord, an almost inaudible scrape of steel on steel where there shouldn't have been anything. At that point he had just exited the intermittently lit stairwell onto the third floor of the tower to check on the rooms that had been given over to Stafford and Daven. At the sound however he turned back quickly, moving into one of the shadows by the doorway as he stared up the stairwell which wound on until it finally ended at the door to the room Tywin occupied.

Jon took a moment to get in touch with Ghost, who was currently on the first floor patrolling near the entrance. The direwolf had sensed something, a scent that shouldn't have been there, and was tracking it when Jon reached out to his mind, so Jon let him be. Jon then slowly pulled out one of his short swords, careful to make no noise as he did so. He waited a brief moment then moved up the stairwell on silent feet, pausing occasionally to listen. He stopped in the shadows directly before the last floor of the tower, staring upwards.

There was a man standing there on guard while a second man behind him was working on the lock to Tywin's room. It was the sound of one of his tools against the metal of the lock that had alerted Jon. Both of them were illuminated by a torch outside Tywin's cell, while Jon was practically invisible in the darkness of the stairwell below them.

Briefly Jon wondered if he should take one of them prisoner, then decided that yes that would be a good idea since if Ghost ran into any he doubted his bonded would be able to think of that. As such, Jon turned his blade slightly in his grip so that he would be striking with the flat rather than the edge before bounding up into the light of the torch.

His sudden and silent appearance took the two men completely by surprise. The one on guard had a brief second to gasp "wha-?" before Jon's blade smacked with punishing force into the side of his head, knocking the man out before he even hit the floor.

Though not on the level of a Faceless Man or a Sorrowful Man, the would-be liberator working on the lock was a thorough-going professional of the sort Tywin had seeded in many of Westeros' cities, and he reacted with all the speed he could. Turning he whipped out a small soot-darkened dirk lunging at Jon.

Anyone but another wolfsworn might have been surprised at the man's speed, but Jon negligently smacked the dirk to one side with his gauntleted hand, kicking out at the same time to catch the man in his midriff. The man flew backwards slamming into the door to Tywin's room with a booming sound, and when he tried to rise, another kick to the head knocked him out to join his fellow.

Jon moved to the door leading into Tywin's cell, looking inside to see Tywin standing near the doorway glaring at it and then at him when he showed his face. "Nice try, but not quite enough." Jon said, smirking just a bit to irritate the older man. Then he turned, grabbing the two prisoners and hauling them to their feet before placing them over his shoulders and heading back down the stairs. Behind him Tywin stared after the Stark bastard, biting his lip so hard it nearly bled.

Down below Ghost had found a group of invaders that had possibly been a diversion of some sort, five men moving around the first floor of the tower trying to release the Westerlands noblemen imprisoned there. Before they could open the first door however Ghost was on them like a wraith out of the night.

"GAHHH!" The first the men knew of his presence was when one of them screamed shrilly as Ghost chomped down on one of his legs, ripping his entire leg off with an ease that made the act all the more terrifying. With his first victim's leg still clamped in his jaws Ghost barreled forward, his head smashing into one man while he dropped the leg he had been holding.

Leaping to the side he dodged a man who had been about to thrust his sword into Ghost's side. One paw flashed out to catch the man in the shoulder and neck, breaking both upon impact while the man's body was sent careening down the corridor.

"Damn it's just a fucking animal, kill it already!" Two men tried to strike at him with their short swords, only for Ghost to dodge backwards, his forepaws flashing out catching one man. Then he smacked the other man's sword aside, lunging forward to almost rip him in half with his jaws.

"M-monster!" The last man tried to turn and run, but Ghost bore him to the ground with a single leap, then his bloody maw reached down, ripping the man's head off.

Ghost stood there for a moment as cries of alarm, shock and horror began to be uttered by the prisoners all around him. He looked down at himself rumbling mournfully before resolutely turning away as the noblemen in their cells all began to shout out questions trying to figure out what had happened. Ghost didn't care about them, he cared about finding someplace to bath for a moment to get rid of the blood on his fur.

OOOOOO

The next day Brynden and Domico questioned the prisoners, finding out the name of the man who had hired them. A promise of sending them to the Wall rather than executing them saw to that. Ranma allowed Domico to lead the raid on the man's house, while Ranma himself had decided to go out into the city. He had Domico and Alayaya's reports of course, but he wanted his own read on what the townspeople thought about his grandfather.

He'd first thought to spend time in the godswood, here in Riverrun, but when he did, he still got the sense that he had to travel to the Isle of Faces, only much more clearly than he had in Raventree Hall. Ranma figured that it was a matter of distance, the old gods couldn't project enough of their presence this far south, not without a major local focus. A single weirwood tree wasn't enough to pass on whatever message the old gods were trying to send him.

Ranma was able to get a sense of slowly growing urgency, but that was all, and Ranma had decided to turn his attention to other things for now.

In his normal clothing with a hood covering his face Ranma looked enough like any other off-duty northern soldier to blend into the city with ease. Moving from one bar or market stall to another Ranma was able to get the impression he wished, and found that Domic and Alayaya had the feelings of the city-folk spot on. There was a great deal of grief at Hoster's passing, despite the smallfolk having had so long to get used to the idea that he would eventually pass.

There was a sense that while Hoster had his faults as Lord Paramount, he had been a masterful city administrator. The signs of that was everywhere. Even with the massive influx of refugees, the streets were decently clean and very well patrolled. The city was crowded, but it wasn't a messy sort of crowding. The city watch also looked well trained, and Ranma could tell that their unit commanders were old armymen, who had served House Tully in the field before being allowed to semi-retire to the city watch. Even when he headed down into the poorer areas of the city that was the case, and there was no sign of the sort of slums he had feared.

Around midday Ranma headed back to the castle, hoping to find Daenerys in their quarters. Halfway there however he was halted by a servant. "Your Majesty" said the servant bowing his head. "A tailor has arrived and is waiting for you in your room to fit you for some formal apparel. Her Highness has asked me to inform you that the trials will be a 'command performance'?"

Ranma groaned a little but nodded his head. "Ugh, very well, but where might I find the queen?"

"She and the Lady Myrcella have taken over the suite of rooms that Lady Catelyn used when she was in residence." the older man replied, smiling faintly at some bygone memory. "I feel certain however, that they would prefer you to be fitted before going to see them." he said returning to the here and now.

"Too true," Ranma replied, shaking his head. Sighing he made his way to his rooms, where he did indeed find the tailors. For the next hour Ranma bore up with their poking and prodding him stoically, but when they began to talk about hose and leggings he put his foot down hard. He thought those things had been a horrible affectation of the court in King's Landing, and he would never wear the damn things. This caused some consternation among the tailors, as did his insistence on austerity. "I'm a Stark," he said sternly. "We are not known for ostentatious display, and I refuse to allow such now."

Eventually he was fitted with good simple black trousers, a black doublet with an image of a direwolf worked into the sleeves, and a cloak of wolf's fur. Fenris, who had been watching all this with amusement, sniffed audibly at that, but didn't make any other sign of irritation. The tailors on the other hand were morose, the design was so simple and barbaric, but it was one that Ranma could live with.

Ranma then left his rooms, smirking a little while he listened to the complaints of the tailors who were apparently not used to being told no, before he decided to try and find Daenerys. He wanted to go over the rules of the court with her one more time, because he knew that the trials to come would prove the basis of a new judicial system in the future. That was Daenerys' main area of interest, as the military was Ranma's (both of them could take politics or leave them at this point).

Eventually he found Ser Barristan guarding a hallway with the thousand league stare of a man sent away while women discussed fashion. A moment later he passed by some maids who were carrying several elaborate dresses each. Guessing that meant he was nearing his destination, he stepped to one side, allowing them to enter a room he had been accidentally blocking then moved on. Hearing voices coming from one of the rooms Ranma opened its door and stepped inside only to stop poleaxed at the sight before him.

OOOOOO

While Ranma went out that morning to explore the city, Daenerys and Myrcella got a early start on choosing the dresses they would wear for the coming trials. Myrcella however was still having some misgivings about it. "I still don't understand why you and Ranma both think I need to be involved in the trials. I'm flattered of course, I'm just not certain that it makes much sense."

Looking at Daenerys she giggled a little, seeing the expression on her face. Merry had long since learned how to tell when Daenerys or Ranma were warging with their animals mentally in some fashion. The slack face and the thousand mile stare was a major hint. "How are Rhaegon and Sunfyre finding the woodlands hereabouts?"

"Rhaegon just killed his first bear, the creature actually tried to fight back, amazing. Sunfyre is eating a dear of some kind, thinking it isn't as tasty as crab." Daenerys replied absent-mindedly, sending feelings of love and amusement down her link to both animals, along with orders to come back to the castle of Riverrun when it became dark out.

That done, she blinked a little coming back to her own body quickly. "I'm sorry what did you say?" After Merry had repeated what she had said, Daenerys smiled, continuing down the corridor beside the young woman towards the rooms she had designated as the outfitting area.

Lady Catelyn had left several dresses here after she married Eddard either because they no longer fit or were simply not practical in the North. While the leaves had begun to fall and rains had begun to hammer the Riverlands one out of every four days it hadn't become noticeably colder yet, so that wasn't a problem. The problem of the dresses fitting could be solved with enough seamstresses working on the issue.

"Actually it is almost entirely a political maneuver my dear. Remember our position: officially, you are a princess, heir to House Baratheon. You might have removed yourself from the line of succession for the throne, but that doesn't equate to removing yourself from House Baratheon." Daenerys said, putting her arm over the other girl's shoulder so that they could whisper together more easily. She absently noted that the younger girl actually smelled rather pleasant, but not of the normal lilac and honeysuckle smell, she had added a rose or some other scent to her perfume.

"You know that's not true Daenerys, I've told you before." Myrcella replied softly, her own arm going around Daenerys's waist, smiling up at the slightly taller woman who had become her best friend and confidant over the months they had known one another. "Look at me, I don't have a single hint about me that I'm a Baratheon."

"True, but until we receive notice from the Citadel that daughters from marriages between Lannister and Baratheon also take after the Baratheon line we will continue to treat you as such. And besides, even without that, and leaving aside our current difficulties with House Lannister, you would be in the line of succession to that house as well through your mother. As such, you would still be high-ranking enough to put on the quorum."

"I suppose..." Myrcella replied shaking her head. "And I know this is rather silly of me, but I'd rather not be associated with the Lannisters at all after this war."

"Unless Kevan decides to remain at war with us and somehow forces us to invade the Westerlands, the Lannisters will still be a powerful family, Merry. Their control of Lannisport and the Rock would see to that." The silver-haired young queen smiled thinly. "If all goes according to plan they won't have access to the mines around the Golden Tooth soon enough, but they'll still have very deep pockets and a very strong logistical base."

Ranma was the one who had put it that way, but Daenerys understood what he was saying easily enough. "And if the city of Lannisport is as loyal to them as Riverrun appears to be to House Tully, taking it will be a nightmare."

"And of course the Rock would be incredibly hard to take at the best of times." Myrcella mused, nodding her head. Memories of the two trips the royal family had taken to the Rock went through her mind, and she quailed a little inside at what taking it would cost in time and blood.

Daenerys wasn't certain she agreed with that, she had seen what Ranma had done to the Twins. With that skill Ranma might be able to do the same to the spire of rock that Casterly Keep sat on, bringing the entire thing down. But that wasn't germane to the subject at hand. "True enough, but again you would only be the Lannister heir if we were forced to remove Kevan and all his children per force from positions of power. Frankly, we just can't afford to be bogged down in the Westerlands. Once Ranma takes the Golden Tooth we will have secured the Riverlands borders, and we will need to turn our attention elsewhere."

Myrcella nodded, leaving the subject of her being part of the quorum to the side for now as she looked at Daenerys. "Are you more worried about the fact we haven't heard anything about your brother, or the otherworldly powers that the Red Witch that Stannis employs can call upon?"

"Both." Daenerys replied, squeezing the other girl around the shoulders in thanks to the worry she saw in her face. "I'm worried that my brother has allied with Dorne, and I'm worried about what they might do. The Dornish are a strange people, full of strange, often violent passions."

She scowled, once more remembering the egg she had been forced to leave behind, and the princess that Ranma had been forced to leave behind. They couldn't have fought off an entire city, but still that decision to run was going back to come back to haunt them soon, Daenerys just knew it. "The fact we haven't heard from my brother yet in some fashion makes me very nervous."

"There's nothing we can do about that, so let's turn to more pleasant matters for now." Myrcella replied, squeezing the other girl around the waist as they came to the rooms where they would begin changing. "I'm thinking that you should wear something in violet, or at least with a violet hint, it'll bring out your complexion and those eyes of yours. They are rather striking, you know."

"I've been told that before." Daenerys replied in a similar tone, "but those green eyes of yours are just as good-looking you know."

From there the conversation segued into types of fabric, cloth, cut, the time it would take to change some of Catelyn's old clothing to fit the two women, and of course what colors went with their skin tones as well as what makeup they would use. The maids and the seamstress took part in most of the discussion, with the seamstress having several good ideas about style of cut once Daenerys made the position out of what she wanted the dresses for clear. "It has to be stern of manner and cut, if we can get away without hinting at any kind of sensuality, all the better."

That threw the head seamstress for a moment. She was not used to dresses that were not made to at least emphasize a woman's body if not put it subtly on display. But she still rose to the challenge.

By around midday the two of them had picked out their dresses, simple affairs for the most part, with little in the way of ostentation or sexuality, though they still showed the bodies of the two young women off to good effect, nothing could change that. The maids and the seamstress went off to their workstation in the next room over, where several more seamstresses were waiting to aid them to speed up the process, leaving Daenerys and Myrcella in their underthings for a moment.

Staring at the older woman Myrcella sighed sadly. "I wish I had your curves Daenerys, you're so gorgeous! And your skin looks like a marble." Merry said, reaching out to stroke a finger down Daenerys' side.

Daenerys shivered a little under the other woman's touch, shaking her head as feelings of more than affection once more arose in her. Curse you Alayaya! "Your young yet Merry, you'll grow your own curves. Trust me, I can see the process already beginning. You've grown from being smaller than a handful to filling out quite nicely in the time I've known you." She said, reaching over to emphasize the point by lifting up the other young woman's breast with one of her hands before pulling her hand away quickly. "And, and your hair is magnificent. You can do so many things with it, I'm especially jealous of the fact you can curl it like that. All I can do with mine is keep it straight."

One of the maids had tried to curl Daenerys' hair earlier, but it refused to stay curled and Daenerys refused to try to use some oils to keep it such. "And while you think my skin may look like marble, your complexion actually allows you to wear more colors than me. I look like a ghost in far too many colors for my liking."

At that point the door opened, causing both women to turn wondering if one of the maids was returning for something.

OOOOOO

Ranma stared for a moment, unable to look away from the site before him. Daenerys and Myrcella were standing side-by-side on small footstools, dressed in nothing but their underthings, and as hard as he tried Ranma could not concentrate only on his wife. Myrcella at fourteen had become a young woman at some point without him noticing, her breasts blossoming from the small promise they had been, and she had gained curves to her hips as well. Her face had lost the last traces of baby fat, becoming as beautiful as her mother's had been, with none of the cold hauteur or the lines of fury that had marred Cersei's.

On the other hand Daenerys was simply magnificent, a very definition of beauty. Her body, which he had explored every chance he could, called to him on a deep level. The breasts lovingly worshipped were pressed up slightly by the brassiere she was currently wearing. Her legs, so long, so pristine and strong captivated him despite her simply standing still there. And her face, with its high cheekbones and small but pouty lips under her violet eyes, drew his attention like a lodestone.

Realizing he was staring at the two pictures of beauty Ranma turned around rapidly, slamming his head into the side of the door as it tried to shut behind him. "OW, um, I'm sorry you two, I, er I didn't realize you were still changing, I'll just, I'll just wait outside."

The two girls looked at one another while Ranma quickly made his way out of the door, rubbing his forehead for a moment. Then they began to laugh gaily.

It was a sudden thing. It caught Daenerys like a up-swell, carrying her along in a purely spontaneous action. As Merry and Daenerys leaned forward, laughing so hard their stomachs hurt, Daenerys suddenly stopped laughing. Instead she leaned forward, kissing Myrcella on the lips.

Merry gasped a little, but didn't pull back, instead leaning forward a tiny, miniscule amount before Daenerys regained control of herself and pulled back quickly. Both girls stared at one another then jerked back as the maids came back in, one of them laughing about having seen Ranma walking down the corridor still rubbing his forehead.

This allowed the two young women to set aside what had occurred just now, at least on the surface. They continued to take full part in the womanly pleasure of dresses and makeup, laughing and joking with the maids and one another while inside both of them were wondering where that had come from, and, more importantly, what it could mean in the future.

OOOOOO

The next day however, no one was feeling in the mood to laugh.

Tywin was not certain what he had expected, but being led into Riverrun's main hall before noon two days after the attempt to free him with the room full of smallfolk and Lords was not it. If Tywin was honest, he had expected to simply be marched up to a gallows and hung or executed, he couldn't remember offhand how the Northerners did their executions, but it looked as if they were going to perform some kind of farce of a trial.

As if the Stark boy can really call me out on treason, he scoffed internally staring hard at Daenerys Targaryen, sitting next to Ranma at the head of five lords sitting in judgement. Ranma and Daenerys were sitting in the center, with Jason Mallister to one side of Ranma, possibly as a Riverlord whose land had not felt the ravages of his army and could thus be called somewhat neutral.

The last two judges however surprised him. One wore the colors of a forked streak of lightning, and could only be Beric Dondarrion. Tywin had thought Beric dead, though the rumors of the Brothers without Borders and their attacks on his supply convoys had told Tywin that some survivors from that initial ambush were still around. Yet putting that minor mystery aside the last judge, the last could only be his granddaughter Myrcella.

The sight of her sitting there was shocking, as was the fact that she wore the colors of House Baratheon, without even a hint of Lannister colors about her person. Part of him wanted to nod approval at that, pleased that the girl had learned how to cozy up to the winning side. But the rest of him realized after a moment that there was nothing about politics in her alliance with the Starks. The fact she was glaring hatefully at him was enough for that.

Foolish girl, he thought coldly amused. No doubt she is some kind of bleeding heart, angry at me for starting a war, pathetic. Still, at least if Stark wins this war some portion of my direct line will survive.

He was marched to the front of the hall, where he stood with his guards behind him facing Ranma. For a moment the court was silent everyone, smallfolk and Lord alike staring at the Lion of the Rock brought low.

After a moment Ranma spoke shattering the silence. "Lord Tywin Lannister, you stand accused of treason against the former crown, inciting murder and banditry on the border of a peaceful land, and bringing war upon innocent smallfolk of the Riverlands. Do you have anything to say before the evidence against you is presented?"

Tywin's responded, voice cold as always and not hinting at the bit of fear he felt when Ranma's ice blue eyes locked onto him. "I find it amusing that you accuse me of treason to House Baratheon's rule when you sit there next to a Targaryen. Or are you talking treason against the Old, Mad King Aerys? If so, you would still be a hypocrite after all despite all the provocations, your House rose in rebellion against him as well."

"Actually my Lord," Ranma replied, "Only a portion of the inciting murder charge has to do with the events that occurred during Robert's Rebellion. No, the treason charge is defending your daughter and Joffrey Waters, the bastard on the throne. While his father is still unknown, the fact remains that there has never been a single son born between the Lannister and Baratheon that did not have at least some sign of the Baratheon side of the parentage. Moreover Joffrey himself is a murderer, apparently several times over, not as King but as an individual."

"Your evidence of my daughter's infidelity is circumstantial and would not hold up in any true neutral court." Tywin replied dismissively.

"That is true as far as it goes." Myrcella spoke up from where she was sitting at the far end of the judges table staring at her grandfather. "However, Joffrey is a kinslayer, Lord Lannister. He admitted that he planned the murder of my younger brother, and if you can come up with a good reason for that beyond his knowing that he was illegitimate and that Tommy was not, I am all ears."

While the smallfolk murmured in shock horror at the very idea of Kinslaying let alone the fact that someone who claimed to be king was guilty of it, Tywin stared at her in shock. Kinslaying was one of very few things that Tywin wouldn't do. Put someone from his extended family in a position to be killed possibly, but actually plan the murder of close family? No, he hadn't even done that to Tyrion, who Tywin hated for murdering his wife with his birth.

"Yet that is not the only allegation against you my Lord, and you have not said anything to combat the other accusations against you." Daenerys said. "As such, I believe we can move on to the presentation of proofs. You'll have the ability to argue against them as witnesses are called my Lord, we want no one to accuse us of arbitrary justice here."

There was a murmur of approval from the watching crowd at that, and Ranma nodded firmly. "Call in the first witness."

The first few witnesses were from the Brothers without Borders, the men who had been sent out well before war had actually broken out between the Lannisters and the Starks to deal with the banditry going on around the borders between the Westerlands in the Riverlands. They told of how they had been betrayed by the Westerlands forces led by Ser Lorch, who was well known as a man Tywin used for dark deeds since the end of the Rebellion, almost as well as the Mountain that Rode, though nowhere near as feared. The brothers had even captured one of the Westerlands armsmen later on and he had admitted that their orders to betray the king-mandated expedition had come from Lord Lannister himself, passed on by Ser Lorch.

Tywin tried to call that into doubt, saying that Lorch was a mad dog, whose actions could not in any way be said to be his own fault.

Beric however responded that after the Mountain that Rode's execution, Lorch should have been too afraid to act out, and if he did, then why would he have acted in that manner? "Furthermore, the mercenary band the Bloody Mummer's acted to aid your army later by taking Acorn Hall before your invasion of the Riverlands began. Those mercenaries were the same that you yourself had begun to act as bandits on the Westerlands side of the borders. Therefore your argument is spurious at best."

Tywin frowned angrily as he realized that what he had seen as simply the next level up of the political backroom dealing that always went on in King's Landing looked very badly indeed to these men and women. Don't they understand what politics is? "I set that in motion to combat the growing power of the Starks," he said aloud now admitting it. "If any of you were a Lord Paramount you would've done the same thing."

"No." Ranma replied coolly we wouldn't have. "What you saw as a power grab my Lord was simply our family acting in honor due to our friendship and duty to the throne."

"And I say again." Tywin replied now actually angrily pointing at Daenerys. "That you cannot talk about treason when you sit there with a Targaryen by your side."

"It was Petyr and Varys who convinced Robert to send me to Essos my Lord." Ranma replied coolly. "And it was the death of Tommen that convinced my father to act against the Queen and Joffrey. If Tommy hadn't died, my wife and I would have been perfectly content to stay in the North." He smirked at his wife for a moment, allowing humor to show for the first time since this trial had begun. "For many different reasons."

Daenerys actually blushed, slapping his hand lightly mouthing the word 'behave' at him. This caused a ripple of laughter to go out around the smallfolk and Lords when they realized what Ranma had implied there.

Only Tywin was immune to it and he sneered at Ranma coldly. "Forgive me for not believing you, Stark."

"I will forgive you for that, there are more than enough other charges against you my Lord for that forgiveness to matter not at all." Ranma replied, smirking now as he watched Tywin twitch at his tone, but his eyes were bleaker than winter.

"We are not trying you as Lord Paramount, or as the mythic Tywin Lannister my Lord, and this is not personal, no matter how you try to twist it." Daenerys said shaking her head as she too became serious. "We are trying you as a man and as a Lord. This is about justice and the rule of law, which we hope to instill in all our realms after this war is over."

The trial continued from there, with smallfolk coming forward, having been found by Domic and Alayaya, actual witnesses who had survived the march of the Lannisters through the Riverlands. They angrily denounced what the Westerlands army had done to them, though only rarely was one called forward able to say that he had seen the Lannister colors on the ravagers. Nonetheless, the fact that those men were allowed to act out in that manner spoke harshly against Tywin as their general.

Tywin tried to reply that such things happened with men at war, that it was human nature. Myrcella however spoke up before anyone else could, sharply reprimanding him on that pointing to the Stark-led army and its actions during the war so far, as well as the fact that such events had even happened on land of Houses that were neutral, Houses that had not had the time to declare one side of the other, and even allied Houses such as Bracken. There was a murmur of surprise from the smallfolk, watching the young Baratheon Princess take her grandfather to task, but the tales of Myrcella the Maiden of Healing had already spread, so it wasn't that big a shock.

After that Brynden came forward with his tale of the assassins sent after Eddard while he was in King's Landing, but here the evidence wasn't quite up to par. Eventually the witnesses were finished, and the judges removed themselves for a moment to a separate room before coming back quickly.

Ranma spoke for them all as was his right as king, staring down at Tywin from the small dais. "Tywin Lannister, this court has reached its decision. On the charge of treason against the crown, we find you guilty for knowingly trying to cover up your daughter's act of treason and acting against the duly appointed Hand of the king even before that began. On bringing war and rapine onto the lands of the Rivers, we find you guilty. On inciting murder, specifically the murder of my father Edward Stark, we find you not guilty."

That startled Tywin, he had assumed that the court would simply find him guilty of all charges, not that it really mattered. The other charges were easily proven, and his attempt to argue against them or try to wave them aside as simply how the game was played had not worked as he knew they wouldn't.

The effect of the trial however on the smallfolk and many of the lords that had watched it however was something he hadn't calculated. They're destroying my reputation, he thought with something approaching admiration. They're destroying not only any chance of making me a martyr in the future, but also the reputation of my House. Before this, terror and fear would've kept people from talking out against us, but now, with the military victories Stark's won and this trial that will no longer be the case.

We might still have gold, and we might still inspire fear, but it won't be a respected kind of fear, simple loathing rather than dread. Character assassination at its finest all couched in a trial that allows them to showcase their own sense of justice. Well played. Even now faced with his death Tywin was unable to truly change his thought processes.

Actually, the destruction of his reputation was really a secondary benefit to his opponents. Ranma and Daenerys primary goal was to show the smallfolk that their family would hold justice and honor over personal wealth, that even the highest of Lords would be called to account for their actions.

"There can only be one penalty for treason, only one penalty for starting a war as you have: execution, to be carried out immediately. Do you have anything to say before sentence is carried out?"

Tywin stared coldly at Ranma who have stood up and taken up Ice from where it had been laying on the table in front of the judges. He toyed with the idea of calling upon a champion to fight for himself, but knew it would be useless. Stark would of course stand as his own champion, and without Jaime here there was no one Tywin could call upon that would have a chance against him. "In the Game of Thrones you either win or you die, Stark. Whatever reason you are doing this, that is a truth that I have known my entire life."

Ranma at looked at the man then nodded respectfully, respecting the fact Tywin did not beg or plead for his life. He gestured, and Tywin's guards turned him around ushering him out of the room while Ranma made to follow. Daenerys stood as well as did the other judges even Myrcella following the group outside to the executioner's block.

Outside the keep the castle's grounds were somewhat crowded, but a cordon had been kept clear by armed soldiers from the door of the keep to the execution block, which stood on a raised wooden platform. As the crowd saw Tywin being pushed in that direction there was a murmur rising into a shout of triumph and many an insult and curse was thrown at him. Tywin ignored it all regally, staring straight ahead. With the attempt two nights ago, he knew his agents here in Riverrun were gone, without them no one would stand in his defense.

Tywin was forced to kneel, placing his head on the butcher's block as Ranma stared out at the crowd. Behind him Daenerys reached down, grabbing Myrcella's hand and squeezing it tightly. Merry squeezed back reassuringly, her eyes bleak as she stared at her grandfather, a man who had loomed so large in Westeros for so long, brought down at last.

"Tywin Lannister!" Ranma bellowed in a voice that quieted the crowd. "Was found guilty of treason against the crown and of inciting war and banditry in the Riverlands. The penalty for these crimes is execution. In the North, the man who passes the sentence wields the sword. I passed the sentence, I Ranma Stark wield the sword." With that Ranma raised Ice in the air and without further preamble brought it down. With a swing of the Stark family blade Tywin Lannister, the Lion of the Rock died, one of many steps that would cripple the Lannisters and their ability to wield power in the affairs of Westeros as a whole.

There was a moment of silence, then the crowds broke out into a loud roar. The Rains of Castamere would never again be played in the Riverlands or anywhere else. Instead it would be the March of the Wolf King.

After a moment staring down at the body Ranma wiped Ice off on a cloth set nearby then motioned to the guards to carry the body away before turning to his fellow judges. "There'll be a five-minute recess before the next trial. I could use some water after this, or something stronger to wipe the taste of this out of my mouth, I hate executions..."

The other judges all nodded, but when they left Ranma caught up with Myrcella, putting his arm on around her shoulder. "Are you sure you're all right?"

"I'm fine." Myrcella said, her eyes staring into the distance for a moment before she shook herself coming back to the here and now. "He, he was such, this... She paused again trying to gather her words. "His presence was always there. He was like a mountain looming over my mother over my uncle, over the court, myself and my siblings. He was held up as an example to us, as someone we should emulate, and yet he acted so cruelly here in the Riverlands. It's a relief to have him gone, but watching him die like that... I don't think I'll follow you out for the other executions Ranma, if that's all right."

"That's fine by me Merry." Ranma replied while Daenerys took his place hugging the younger girl to her.

"Fine with both of us," his wife said. "The Lords, Ranma will have to execute personally, but the others can be done by lesser executioners, otherwise we'd be here all year." She smiled grimly.

The trials continued from there. Surprisingly, many of the Lannister armymen were acquitted of charges against the smallfolk, and thus were added to the growing workforce that had been put under Vincent and the other engineers. They and all of the other prisoners thus acquitted would be sent up under guard to join the former Frey men already at work on the canal that would connect the Green Fork to the sea by Seagard. That work had proceeded apace since they left that city, and the canal was now fully planned with work well along near Seagard. It would still take a few months, but the canal would be done before winter hit.

The remaining captured Lannisters themselves were a mixed bag. Stafford Lannister had been seen looting House Deddings keep by a few of the survivors among the servants of that House who had escaped its final sack after its military force had been destroyed. But he had not been seen taking part in the rape or murder going on, so the judges could not decide on the death penalty for him. Beric and Ranma both wanted it, but Daenerys, Myrcella and Jason did not. As such, Stafford would be sent north to the Wall to take the black.

The three younger Lannisters however were acquitted of most of the charges against them. As such, they would remain as prisoners, hostages against their family's good conduct. When the war ended, and the monetary reparations demanded from the Lannisters arrived they would be allowed to return to the Rock. Actually, Ranma had plans for Daven. He'd impressed Ranma somewhat since his capture, and since he had been cleared of all charges (indeed no witness had seen him even leading troops that had taken part in anything outside of actual combat) he was the cleanest of the three.

For the next four days, the trials continued. Four more Lords, Hamell, Kenning, Moreland and Garner were executed and their men with them for their parts in the willful rapine of the Riverlands. Two of them, Garner and Hamell, were dragged to their execution still screaming at their captors that such things occurred in wartime. Lord Kenning however was made of sterner stuff, and actually demanded a trial by combat. He stood as his own champion, and Ranma executed him on the spot with a single blow from Ice. His men were executed along with the others. Moreland simply went to his death with as much dignity as he could muster.

Several of the surviving lords could not be found guilty of crimes that would have called for the murder penalty. Lord Spicer came through the war with as clean a record as any of the Westerlanders, though his men had already paid a high price in fighting it. There were only a handful of them alive, but they and Spicer would be added to the workforce on the various projects here, though separated of course. Spicer would stay here and a few other lords and prisoners from earlier in the campaign to enlarge the housing on the west of the river.

Lord Stackspear being acquitted was a surprise, but he personally had not led his men on attacks on the smallfolk. His son however had, and four women from Bracken land came forward telling of how he raped them, the women having been found by Dacey after the siege was lifted. When he verbally attacked them in court, calling the women sluts who had enjoyed it, the court found him guilty immediately and Ranma took some pleasure in executing him. Even the man's father looked appalled at his son's attitude, and did not speak up for him as he was led outside.

Eventually the court ran through both the men and the Lords. It wasn't perfect, as Ranma knew all too well. They no doubt missed a few murderers and rapists here and executed a few here and there that hadn't. All they could do however was go by the evidence they had which centered around the colors the troopers wore to signify their allegiance to one Lord or the other. It was the best they could do, and that would have to be enough.

After that, Ranma and Daenerys turned their attention to politics. Proportioning the lands of the Riverlands houses that had been wiped out took a full day, but eventually everyone was, if not totally pleased with the outcomes at least happy with them.

Lord Mallister received some of the lands of the now defunct House Nayland that had controlled Hags Mire, and halfway up to the Green Fork, along with a promise of royal aid in building a new wall to protect the town of Seagard once it became too large for its current environs, as it would no doubt do, fueled by the trade of the new route.

From there up to the former Twins then down to the new canal junction was declared Crown Lands. A town was planned where the new canal joined with the Green Fork, but that would be in the future.

House Blackwood, as the only house south of the Red Fork to continue to fight the invader, was given more than half of House Bracken's land. They were also given even more territory to the southeast, which had been former Whent land, though that declining house hadn't exerted control over the area in years.

However Stone Hedge itself and the lands west of it would be kept for now by the crown, to be given as a reward to a knight who proved himself in the campaign to come. Lucas Blackwood and Ravella Smallwood would be wed here in Riverrun and would take over the ruins of Acorn Hall.

Shawney for his service would be given the former Vypren lands, giving him a goodly chunk of the land between the Red and Blue Fork. House Ryger would control most of the lands around the Ruby Ford down to the Trident, with Blanetree owning their land and a portion at the Trident itself, including a portion of the taxes from Harroway.

House Paegge was risen from the Knightly to the Noble status, and given half of House Lolliston's former land. Further, they had been given a crown charter to allow Fairmarket to grow into a city. House Grell was given the other half of Lolliston's land.

House Piper would retain their lands, but would receive no recompense or aid in rebuilding the town of Mummer's Ford. They did not help the invaders, but nor did their lord fight them, so they wouldn't gain or lose anything. Lord Piper didn't argue it, since he might have a chance to win more lands going on from the defunct House Harlton, which had been abutting his southeast borders before this.

House Wayn would gain the former House Haigh's land, but that was all, though their men would now join the army at Harroway and take part in the war from now on. Utherydes and his son both vowed to that effect, and Ranma would hold them to it.

Kirth Vance's House would gain quite a bit more land to the west of their castle and port town which was former Deedings land. That land was rich farmland and unspoiled thus far, though the keep there had been put to the torch. They also received a royal charter to enlarge their town, which sat on the massive inland lake called the God's Eye, into a city provided they meet the new taxation laws that Ranma and Daenerys would put in place after the war.

Because of their aid in defending the Cape of Eagles against Ironborn raids, House Charlton was raised to noble status, and given the land of the Cape as fief. Many had expected Lord Mallister to object to this, but while he had looked to that land as his to defend, it had actually never been his houses to control, and given the riches that was going to flow into his coffers from the trade of the new canal he was more than recompensed for the lost.

Charlton also received two royal commissions to begin mining copper, nickel and tin there, where deposits of those precious metals had been discovered a few years back. Daenerys and Ranma would fund the start of those mines, then the crown would receive half the mines output into perpetuity afterwards.

Of the Houses that had fought for the Lannisters, only House Wode was not removed from the roll of nobility. Ser Wode and his men would serve in the army without pay for five years as punishment for following the noble house they were sworn to, Whent in this case, into treason. House Whent, whether it still served the Westerlanders manning Harrenhal willingly or no, would also be destroyed.

Darry, Mooton and Butterwell would not receive anything at this time, but might later on from House Whent's lands. Whent was still allied, willing or no, with Westerlands forces, so would be annexed after Harrenhal fell. Keath had been sent a messenger according to Utherydes, and they had also been told about their lord's death along with his forces. But they had not sent a representative to Riverrun. Therefore, Keath would also be dissolved. That left several chunks of land that could be handed to worthy men, who could be raised to knighthood.

Then Ranma and Daenerys outlined their plans for the Westerlands. That there would be no invasion even though Ranma explicitly stated he would be attacking the Golden Tooth and the mines around it was a surprise to the Riverlords. Ranma however waved their astonishment off. "My Lords, we cannot invade the Westerlands and do onto to them as they did to you without seeming the hypocrites that Lord Tywin called us in his trial. Furthermore, Domic and I have been going over the numbers of both the Lords and the Army we've faced here in the Riverlands. Domic?"

Domic nodded, smiling slightly. "Essentially my Lords, nearly all of the Houses of the Westerlands mustered their forces for this army. That army is now not just beaten, but annihilated. There hasn't been a victory this lopsided in centuries. The only areas that might have enough men to challenge us is the area around Deep Den down towards Silverhill, Banefort and Crakehall."

"House Lannister may have a few thousand more men to their name, as does Marbrand but that's not enough to form an offensive force. They just don't have enough manpower to face us in the open field any longer. It would take them at least a year of summer to train up another army. And without Tywin, many of the other Houses will probably rebel if called up again after this disaster. Kevan is a good organizer and administrator, but he doesn't command the respect and fear that Tywin did. If we take the Golden Tooth, we will show that we have the ability to strike at them, and be dealing with all of the Houses in the Westerlands from a position of strength."

"Taking the Golden Tooth won't be easy," Lord Piper said, stapling his fingers and looking at Ranma quizzically. "You seem to almost be glossing over that in your planning. It isn't the largest castle, and it doesn't have as formidable a reputation as some other fortresses, but its defensive position is one of the best. Taking it will require either a full siege or months of work and lots of lives to try and crack the walls somehow."

Ranma and Jon exchange an amused look. "That will be a task for the Wolfsworn my Lord. You haven't had enough time to really understand what we are." Jon replied for his brother. "We're not just the best warriors, we're something else entirely. Specialists at sneaking around and taking castles like that being one of those things."

"My wife will stay here to further see to the administration of the Riverlands and lead the army at Harroway, while I lead five hundred Tully men and the wolfsworn down to take the Golden Tooth." Ranma added.

Piper was not the only lord who looked astonished at that, but those who had known Ranma for longer all simply nodded, and Tytos and the other southern Riverlords subsided. However after a moment Jason spoke up. "One area we haven't talked about is the former Tully lands my lord." he said apologetically. "Will Brynden be taking his place as Lord Tully?"

"I think that Brynden would react rather violently to the very idea." Ranma replied laughing while Brynden scowled. He didn't want to enrich himself right his brother's death like that, even if both law and custom dictated that he was now Lord Tully. "Besides," Ranma went on, "I have something else in mind for him. When we take the Golden Tooth we'll need a commander to place in charge of it and the assaults on the nearby mines. And after this war is over, that position will be one of the most important in the Riverlands."

Brynden looked at him in surprise then nodded his head, formally agreeing to the idea.

"In that case who will hold Riverrun?" Alayaya asked. "I have to say that the people here are much more loyal to House Tully than they ever were to House Baratheon in King's Landing. I would highly recommend someone at least connected somehow to the family or else you may have issues here later on. You have a connection with them Ranma thanks to your mother, will you hold it as Crown lands?"

"No." Ranma said shaking his head. "I think there should always be a Tully holding lordship here, just like a Stark in Winterfell. And I have the one in mind too. Tell me my Lord," he asked looking at its Tytos for a moment. "Which of your sons would you say is the best administrator?"

"That would be Edmund, or Ben as we call him, my fourth son. He's not the best blade, but he's a good administrator and a very decent mind. he's out with his brothers at the moment in the godswood." Tytos replied promptly, looking at Ranma in speculation.

"As I said, I think there should be a Tully in charge here Riverrun, and I can think of no one better to take over than my sister Sansa." Ranma smirked as shouts of surprise abounded around the room, though most of the reactions were positive ones. "Therefore, I will be sending Ben Blackwood and Edd Karstark up with a small party to escort her down from Winterfell. When she arrives, she will be formally inducted as Lady Tully, leaving the Stark name behind."

Tytos and Rickard both got it at once then smiled thinly at one another. It wasn't very subtle, but the trip down from Winterfell would not just be a trip. It would be a courtship, with their sons vying with one another for Sansa's affection.

Watching the two lords Ranma smirked. He had known about Edd's crush on Sansa for years now, but he honestly doubted that when the two spent time around one another anything would come of it. Ben however, was something different. From Ranma's interactions with him, he knew the man was a romantic, as good with a lute as with a pen, though he was also solid, and had a very decent sense of humor that Ranma felt Sansa would enjoy.

Tytos however had some concerns. "My Lord, if that journey goes the way it might, my son Edmund would not be a very strong sword for your lady sister. That could cause issues in the future."

"No it won't," Ranma said, laughing while gesturing at Jon and Arya who nodded. "She is our sister my Lord, she will have our swords on call regardless of the future. She needs no other. And let me be clear on this, she will know from the beginning that Edd and Ben are there for more than protecting her, and it will be her decision who she marries. There will be no pressures either on her or on Edd and Ben." He stared hard at Rickard and Tytos until both men nodded.

With that Ranma went on. "House Tully will continue to control Riverrun and the area between the Red Fork and Tumblestone towards Golden Tooth." There was some muttering about that, after all there had been three other Houses in that area.

Kirth in particular looked angry, considering it would mean that no attempts to produce another cadet branch of his own House to hold Wayfarer's would be heard. But given the way they had all been enriched in terms of land and other things none of them could honestly complain.

The meeting broke up shortly after that, with the Riverlords leaving then the northern Lords and the wolfsworn, leaving Ranma and Daenerys alone once more. "Are you as certain as you make out that you can take the Golden Tooth so easily?"

Ranma laughed quietly kissing her briefly on the lips before pulling back. "I'll give you a hint if it's bothering you. What is the one direction that humans never look to for danger?"

"Directly below them." Daenerys replied promptly.

Ranma twitched. "Okay fine, the second direction."

"Above them I suppose." Daenerys replied frowning thoughtfully then smirked at Ranma. "Your little joke failed. Remember I am a Targaryen and I was weaned off stories of dragons fighting one another. In that kind of combat, you always look above you for danger. Though I still don't understand what your allusion could mean in this case. Now," she said dragging him to his feet. "I think we can find something far better to do with our time tonight than exchange bad jokes."

Ranma laughed getting to his feet and easily picked Daenerys up in his arms, her legs locking around his waist. "I think we can too."

OOOOOO

"What?" growled Cersei, glaring angrily at the man before them, a messenger from out of Sow's Horn.

He was a youngish man, thin and weak looking, but he stood there resolutely even if he didn't quite meet her eyes. "My Lord Hogg has decided not to give you shelter your grace," he said again. "Ravens have been sent to practically every castle in the Crownlands, informing us of your son's illegitimacy." He backed away quickly as Cersei made to strike him. Thankfully Joffrey wasn't there, having been directed to where the forage parties were already making up some food.

All around them Lord Serret's men were quickly and efficiently moving supplies off the mules and carts the young man and his party had brought with them, adding it to their own very meager stores or cooking it up on the spot. Foraging had slowed them down badly, and their back trail scouts had started clashing with their fellows among the Reach force that was pursuing them yesterday.

After a moment he went on. "Lord Stannis has declared himself King of the Crownlands and Stormlands."

"He declared himself that before he actually marched." Said Cersei still glaring. "What exactly changed to make you and possibly others in the Crownlands believe him now?"

"He has emerged victorious from the battle down in King's Landing against his brother, and now commands the largest army in Westeros. Perhaps the Riverlands and the Northerners could match him, yet my Lord feels that the Targaryen has had its time." Actually Lord Hogg didn't, he just felt that Stannis was going to defeat the Stark youth in battle, regardless of whatever trickery he had used against the Westerlanders.

But the young man Hogg had sent as messenger wasn't about to share that bit of news with Cersei, not with her standing in front of him looking like she wanted to rip his throat out like the lion on her family's crest. He'd never been in her presence before, and it was overwhelming.

She wasn't quite as beautiful as the tales told when she was glaring at you like that, and she was certainly thinner than most stories made out in face and body, but that didn't take away from her intense glare which seemed to be drilling into him even when he wasn't looking into her eyes. Unfortunately for the messenger, his men didn't have quite his grasp of how to keep silent.

"Mother!" Joffrey's whiny shouted from somewhere else in the small camp. Cersei turned to see her son and two of his Kingsguard came forward, the two Kingsguard dragging a third man who was looking frightened, and had been around the face a bit already. "Mother, you'll never believe what lies this fool is saying! He's saying that grandfather lost entirely, that he was captured, and the Westerlands army crushed! I wished to whip him for telling lies, but Ser Swann stopped me. "

Cersei turned angrily to the messenger. "Is that true?"

The young man gulped twitching worse than ever now when the Kingslayer moved up to stand beside his sister glaring angrily at him. He looked around, now realizing that he was so entirely surrounded by Lannister men. "I, um, I am..."

"Speak the truth boy." Said a deep voice, and Lord Serret pushed through the throng of Lannister armsmen. "Is it true? No harm will come to you so long as you tell the truth." He glared at Cersei and Joffrey making certain they knew he was serious.

Cersei simply nodded sharply, understanding that news was more important than punishing the messenger while Joffrey simply scoffed and looked away. Rupert glared at him for a moment, he had becoming more and more wary of the boy throughout this trip. There was just something about him, something about his eagerness to go on the hunt with the foragers, and the way that his eyes gleamed now when he mentioned whipping the man who had apparently been overheard discussing rumors.

After a moment the House Hogg messenger replied. "I, yes my lords, Your Highness, it's true. We don't know any of the details, but rumors have spread from the Riverlands quickly, the Westerlands army is literally no more. All that remains of it is small groups of bandits here and there. We have no idea how it happened, but the rumors say that Lord Tywin himself was captured and is already in Riverrun awaiting trial and execution."

By this time Tywin had already been executed, and Ranma was well on his way down to the Golden Tooth and Daenerys back to Harroway. But rumors had to spread both ways, from the source of the rumors on back to them here in Sow's Horn territory.

Cersei and Jaime exchanged a shocked glance. While there had been scant love between them, their father had dominated the largest part of their lives and the affairs of Westeros. To hear he was brought low was simply impossible to consider, no matter how much Cersei in particular had wished to see the man get some sort of comeuppance.

Joffrey on the other hand raised a hand angrily. "You lie! How could he be beaten by those Northern barbarians!"

"Remember Stark might have two dragons on his side, Your Majesty." said Rupert, stepping forward slightly to be close enough to stand between the whining brat and the man from Sow's Horn just in case.

Joffrey scowled at him then turned away angrily. He was serving the legitimate crown, how dare he lose! I'll have his head for this, all their heads for this! Stannis, Ranma, my sister, grandfather, his men! My enemies will die, and those who failed in their service to the crown will join them! I am King and I will make all of Westeros realize that!

Behind Joffrey, Rupert stared after the youngster then nodded at Ser Swann and Ser Buckwell who he had come to respect as an able sword and honorable man. When the men came forward to stand close by he whispered. "Watch him and his cronies among your brothers. I don't like how much control he has over them, or how close he is to Lord Edgerton."

Those two have been as thick as thieves since Edgerton rejoined the column. Though thankfully Edgerton's own power base within the column had been smashed during the feint that got them out of the cordon around King's Landing. He only had a few men to his name now, but all of them were close to Joffrey for some reason.

Buckwell nodded, shrugging his shoulders in his white enameled plate armor. "I understand, and I'm not exactly happy about being brothers to most of those men milord. One or two of them might have the skills of a Kingsguard but for the rest..." He shrugged again. Bowing quickly to Cersei and to his commander, the man left, while Ser Swann stayed a moment to bow himself before following.

With that done Rupert waved the messenger away with his thanks, then moved close to Cersei and Jaime. "I had never really intended to stay overlong at Sow's Horn anyway. Maybe leave a few hundred men there to help defend it and make it look as if we were still in residence but Sow's Horn isn't a large castle, it could barely accommodate us all, and from what I can remember it's a rather weak one as well, is that not so?"

Cersei seemed to be staring off into the distance for a moment but she shook herself and replied while Jaime continued to stare out across the Crownlands around them, frowning angrily at the news of his Septon. "Yes that is so, but where do we go from here?"

"We'll make for House Edgerton on a straight route as possible Your Highness." Rupert replied. "As I said that was the way I would have been going anyway."

Though honestly I'm a little more leery about it now. I'm not certain I want to put myself in to Edgerton's power like that. Although, how many men can he still have left? I wish I knew more about the power of the Crownlands houses, I know they were smashed in Robert's Rebellion, but how has Edgerton recovered? They had a lot of men in King's Landing, but was that their full complement? For some reason he didn't want to ask Varys or Lord Edgerton himself those questions, because he was almost certain he wouldn't get a straight answer.

He was still thinking about that as around him the column began to reform, moving away from the carts and mules from Sow's Horn quickly marching off down a side road from the small track they had been following. Eventually it would lead them to House Edgerton, but not quickly. Thankfully the Crownlands here were rolling plains, the soil not quite good enough for farming in comparison to other areas nearby, but they would be passing through a few hamlets on their way up to Edgerton land. That would allow them to resupply at least.

Rupert was roused the next morning by a growing clamor outside his small tent, one of the very few that they had been able to bring with them. He pushed himself to his feet quickly grabbing up his axe before hurrying out brandishing it in both hands. "What is it? Have the Reach forces caught us up somehow!" He roared.

One of his guards shook his head. "No my Lord, something seems to have roused the Lannisters over in the Royal section of the camp."

Rupert carefully didn't mention the man's contempt when he said the 'Lannisters' or the 'Royal section'. It was a small area of the camp where the Lannister men had cordoned off an area for Cersei and her family, but that wasn't what drew the contempt. That was Joffrey, who every man who was beholden to House Serret had begun to look down upon in private.

Cersei still commanded their esteem, since she had put up with the hardships of the journey without complaint, and carried herself in such a way that demanded that respect. And Jaime the Kingslayer was too deadly with a blade for anyone to not respect. Joffrey's constant whining complaints about the trip, coupled with the vicious way he'd tended to his horses before he was stopped coupled with the fact that he hadn't taken part in the battle to break them out of the cordon had eroded what little respect remained for his crown in their eyes.

Nodding at his guard Rupert hurried in that direction, coming upon Jaime coming out of the Royal area looking around angrily. "My Lord hand." Jaime said crisply. "The eunuch seems to have disappeared."

A quick check of the entire camp turned up no trace of the Master of Whisperers or anyone who had seen Varys the evening before. He was simply gone along with two of the horses. Rupert had to stop Joffrey from having the guards on the horses flogged for that, as well as the guards on the royal portion of the camp, but Cersei came to his aid, her mind on other things.

After Joffrey had been brought to heel, Cersei turned to Rupert. "Has he fled us entirely do you think, or do you think he'll be coming back at some point with news?" Her tone made it clear which response she considered most likely.

"I think we both know what the eunuch is up to your grace." Rupert said with a sigh. A rat leaving a sinking ship, why am I not surprised?

"Traitor!" growled Joffrey, his hand moving to his sword, which Rupert knew the boy had never actually drawn in battle, and very rarely even in practice. "We should send a party to hunt them down, even with two horses he can't have gone far, could he? An example needs to be set for what happens when someone betrays the crown!"

"We don't have the men to spare, and I doubt that Varys would be brought to heel so easily." Cersei said shaking her head. "Before he was Master of Whisperers he was both a merchant and a spy in his younger years. If he meets up with any smallfolk, he'll blend in easily, and we'll have sent men off on a wild goose chase."

Joffrey glared angrily at his mother before stomping off. Cersei looked after him in shock at his bad manners, but Rupert was staring after the boy once again thoughtfully.

OOOOOO

Having left only a small force to pursue fleeing royals from behind Loras and his main force had followed the Kingsroad north quickly, before cutting east overland to get in front of the Lannisters making for Edgerton castle. It had been hard going with the infantry, but Loras and Androw Ashford had hit upon a solution, allowing the infantrymen to rest occasionally by riding some of the spare horses in groups. It sped them up somewhat, and their better ability to forage given the number of scouts they had allowed them to get in position in front of the Lannisters.

"They are just out of sight my Lord, and they don't have any scouts out in front" said one of those scouts, a common-born man named Alec. "They must be using all of their scouts on their back trail against our fellows."

The land here around the Reach force was almost flat, with a few rolling hills here and there. Currently Loras and his men were currently in one of the dips between two such hills, out of sight slightly but even so Alec was quick to point out that the Lannisters would see them coming the moment they crested the hill line.

Loras nodded. "Alec's right, and Lord Serret is a wily bastard, remember how he tricked us near the Blackwater. Don't assume anything, but let's get ready to meet. From all around him the knights of the Reach nodded their heads, moving their horses into a line, while behind them the infantry readied themselves to follow up.

The young Tyrell knight turned to Lord Ashford. "I want to smash them if we can, but I don't know if we'll be able to do it in one battle. We should probably concentrate on causing as casualties to them as we can, so we'll try to envelop them. If the chance comes to capture one of the royals, I want us to take it." He sneered a little. "No doubt the queen and her brat will be somewhere in the back of the column once we begin our charge, but the Kingslayer will be at the front."

Ashford nodded, though internally he had no wish to cross swords with Jaime Lannister. The man's skill with the sword was superlative and Ashford knew his own skills well enough to not want to test him.

Soon enough the other army was in sight., and Loras nodded his head grimly, waving high the Tyrell banner he was carrying o signal the canter before handing it off to his standard bearer.

Across from the advancing Reach force Rupert scowled angrily. "They got ahead of us somehow." he growled to Jaime, who was riding at the head of the column with him.

"I think I see a bit of rose-enameled armor over there." Jaime said with a laugh. "I didn't realize that we were being chased by the Rose Knight himself!" He pretended to feel faint, holding up one hand to his forehead. "Oh no, whatever shall we do?"

Then he let his hand fall back to his sword hilt, his smile becoming more like a shark than a human's. "I don't suppose you'd mind me just going forward to deal with him would you? Loras thinks himself my equal just because he's pretty with a lance and blade in tourneys. I would dearly love a chance to disabuse him of that notion."

Serret burst out laughing, but shook his head quickly. "No, I'll want you with your sister and her brat." With battle coming, Rupert wasn't about to waste time hiding his opinion of the royal idiot. "Keep the Kingsguard all around you, and follow the rest of the column, but give all your banners to some of my men first. I have a plan..."

While the Reach force continued to canter towards them, waiting until they got within their horses charging distance Rupert quickly reformed the column. He put his arms men who knew their way about on horses and the few remaining knights backing them up with the Kingsguard on the rightmost portion of his line. He also made the line thicker there as well, though somewhat at a distance, almost creating a second, far smaller line of battle. He also ordered his archers to drop from their horses and began to fire on the Reach forces. Rupert doubted they'd do anything, but riding them down would take some of the Reach forces away from pursuing the rest of his men.

Lord Edgerton anchored the right side of the battleline, while Serret himself was near the center, his bannermen all around him. His personal banner was high in the air, while the Lannister and House Baratheon of King's Landing banner was on the right behind the Edgerton portion of the line.

By the time he was done the Reach forces had reached charging distance, and their lances came down. There was a bellow of war cries, but most of all there was "Growing strong", and "For the Reach!"

Lord Serret flipped his visor down, couching behind his shield grimly in the saddle. He nodded at his banner bearer, who dipped his banner slightly. "Charge!"

That first charge was somewhat disastrous for Lord Serret's forces. Only a few of his knights had lances or even makeshift spears, and the lance was the weapon of choice for horsemen for a reason, it gave much more range than anything else could in the saddle. The Lannister forces must've lost at least six or seven hundred men in that first few moments of the charge.

But Loras, in his attempt to encompass Serret's forces, hadn't been able to create as much depth in the charge as he should have and had put all of his own men with lances in the first line. After that it became a much more even contest.

For a moment all was a snarl of combat, and Rupert hacked left and right with his axe, using one hand as often as he could so as to let his shield be of use in blocking return blows. One man fell from the saddle his armor ripped open by Rupert's axe, then another man fell, his horse going down under him from Serret burying a back swing in the animal's neck. "I have no rival!"

Behind the Lannister's initial line of battle, Jaime and the rest of the smaller, reserve line had quickly raced from the right side to the left at Rupert's signal, leaving behind their banners and even leaving the archers unprotected. There they joined the battle, swiftly smashing into the snarl of combat on that side, but not as a line abreast, but a column.

Jaime had ignored Rupert's orders, moving toward the front of the initial battleline quickly. He was one of the few men there who was able to slay one of his counterparts among the Reach in that first line, ducking under the man's lance and smacking it upwards with his shield while he leaned far out of the saddle before righting himself and bringing his longsword around with all of his weight behind it as they passed each other. That man's horse continued on his way, while his rider slowly fell out of the saddle, head nearly chopped clean off. "HEAR ME ROAR!"

Jaime then forced his horse around rather than continuing the charge through the enemy line laying out about him with his longsword, seeing that Buckwell was down, unhorsed, his helm and shield missing and shield arm hanging loose at his side, but his sword was flashing out, cutting one man down then hacking at another's horse. Jaime slew four more knights of the Reach trying to defend his sworn brother before he fell, then Jaime turned angrily, hastening away to catch up with the royal party which was just now blasting its way through the back of the enemy line.

Elsewhere the battle wasn't going nearly so well for the royal forces. While their leftmost flank was cutting through Loras' lines, the rightmost flank had become bogged down quickly, and now the infantry among the Reach forces was getting involved, racing forward everywhere.

What they should've done though was to try to move around the battle to encompass it from all sides, but Loras didn't have a man among the infantry as good at their job as his brother Willas did. The unit commanders simply charged forward with the rest, getting bogged down quickly. But the weight of their numbers further slowed the charge of Lord Serret's forces, which would've been enough to win the battle, if Lord Serret had intended to try to win it in the first place.

No, Rupert knew that he couldn't win this fight not with the numbers against him like this, and with most of his own men trained infantry rather than cavalry simply placed in the saddle. Rupert himself had continued moving, his men following grimly, ignoring their downed fellows. Eventually they broke through onto the infantry, cutting several of them down in turn but losing two more men, before breaking through the infantry line as well.

You didn't leave enough gaps boys, Rupert thought grimly. That allowed us to punch through, some of us at least.

With that he raced on, rejoining the rest of the royal house and two men around it which had burst through the line with Jaime at their lead, his sword and armor stained with blood.

Behind them the battle continued. Half of Serret's forces were pinned in place and were slowly being wiped out. But local control was utterly lost, with Loras and Lord Ashford involved at the front of the battle. "Away!" Rupert bellowed, pointing westward. "Away! Before they realize it!" Around him about 1,400 of his remaining men raced on, along with the royal family.

Loras had been unhorsed at one point, a lucky blow impacting his shield with enough impetus to carry him out of the saddle. He'd gotten his revenge however, cutting the other man's own horse's legs out from under him before going the man with his sword. Now he dueled with four unmounted men in Edgerton colors, cutting one man down swiftly before backing away from the others bringing his shield up into play to block a blow.

Ducking under another sword thrust he thrust a boot forward tripping that man up, then rolled heavily down upon him. Not to kill him, but simply dodging more blows from his fellow before coming up quickly. His sword flashed again, cutting into one man's thigh almost cutting his entire leg off before he brought his shield around to block another blow. The downed man groaned, but before he could get up Loras' shield drove down side first into the back of his neck where his helmet had fallen askew, breaking it.

That left only one man facing Loras, and he died quickly from a lance from behind him. Lord Ashford pushed up his visor, scowling angrily. "We've been tricked!"

Loras looked at him uncomprehending for a moment. "What?"

"The royals were never on this side of the charge, and Cersei was definitely not among the archers and the others left behind!"

Comprehension dawned on Loras and he growled angrily searching for his horse, one of Willas' best, which had moved beside up him, waiting faithfully. He patted its nose affectionately for a moment before pulling himself up into the saddle as he looked around them. Everywhere they looked the battle was dying down, men either surrendering or dying where they stood while in the distance a small band of cavalry was chasing the remains of the archers who had fled the battle the moment they could without being cut down by their own fellows.

Dammit, he thought to himself. I knew Lord Serret was wily opponent, why didn't I think he'd try some trick! "Which way did they go you think?"

"I don't know, our scouts were involved in the battle as well of course. We'll have to get them out and searching quickly." Ashford shrugged. "With the forces he lost today anyway, I doubt Serret will try to match us in an open battle again."

Loras nodded. "Get the men to go through the wounded, I want to know what our own losses were, and I think we deserve to take the rest of the day off from this chase. Except the scouts of course."

He moved his man well enough away from the smell of the battlefield before setting up camp, and every man there was effusive in the victory, jubilant for the most part though their own losses had been quite a bit higher than Loras had hoped. He had lost somewhere between 900 and 1,200 men, though they killed and turned about 3000. That first charge with lances against mostly swords and axes had been decisive, but not decisive enough.

Elsewhere Lord Rupert rode to one side of where Cersei was once more trying to keep her son under control, his anger at 'fleeing the battlefield' in his words a palpable force in the air. "I didn't want to go to Edgerton anyway." He said aloud bringing Joffrey's screaming remonstrance to a halt as he, Cersei and Jaime all looked at him. "Remember it's not that good a castle just like Sow's Horn. I would have been more in favor of heading towards the Riverlands anyway."

"But if the rumors are true we won't find any aid there!" Cersei said sharply. "Why would we head that way?"

"We might not have found much in the way of aid from House Edgerton." Rupert replied with a shrug. "But I know at least one castle that our forces are almost certainly still holding."

"Harrenhal." Jaime murmured thoughtfully. "Yes, Father would never have allowed Whent to remain neutral, and would certainly have invested it with at least..." he paused for a moment. "Maybe 800 men, no, at least two times again the forces of House Whent. He wouldn't want them to be able to do some kind of double-cross, and lady Whent isn't exactly the bravest sort either."

"Exactly." Rupert smiled thinly. "With the forces already there, and our own men, we can hold that castle till doomsday. At the moment, that's probably the best we're going to be able to do."

OOOOOO

The evening before his departure, Ranma and Daenerys spent most of their time going over the messages that he would send into the Westerlands from the Golden Tooth, as well as a few more they would be sending from Riverrun. Those would not go to Westerlands houses, but rather to other castles in Westeros, to practically every non-Riverlands castle the maester here had ravens trained to.

One of them was sent to Dragonstone. Ever since Jon had told him about it, Ranma had long been concerned about needing to use dragonglass against the others, and had decided that whatever the differences between him and Stannis were, he wanted the men Stannis had left behind to know that he would pay good silver for all the dragonglass arrows and knives they could hack out of the stone for him. They wouldn't be in a position to actually take possession of any such shipment for a while, but it would be good to get the work on that started now.

Another message was penned for Highgarden, which included his reply to Margaery's letter. It would lay the groundwork for the position of the men he was going to send down there under Jon, but it was important that those in Highgarden understood his and Daenerys's position. Thus that letter was sealed both his own and Daenerys's personal seals as well as the seal of their new house. That was a dragon and direwolf moving around one another tail to snout in what Ranma considered a yin-yang symbol, though no one save the Wolfsworn and his wife, who he had explained it to, would recognize the term.

Daenerys read it aloud before affixing her own seal. "We, the royal house of Stargaryen look favorably upon the measures that Lady Margaery Tyrell has taken in ensuring the safety of the realm. In regards to her offer of loyalty, it is accepted, and further aid will be coming to defend Lady Margaery from any threats, both foreign and those within her own house should the need arise.

"We are sad to hear that the former Head of House has become so disdainful of all honor and duty as to continue with his current course rather than seeing to the smallfolk and the lands that are his charge. As such we remove him from his position as Lord Paramount, and formally acknowledge House Tyrell under its eldest son Willas as Lord Paramount of the Reach. We are glad to know that Lord Willas and his own forces have battled so valiantly to protect the men and women under their care from the depredations of the Westerlanders. Further rewards for this show of duty and loyalty will be forthcoming both for House Tyrell and those who stood with Willas upon our formal meeting in the future."

"Signed Ranma and Daenerys Stargaryen, King and Queen of Westeros."

She smiled faintly after stopping her recitation. "I know you're not exactly happy with the wording Ranma, and I'll admit it does go against your northern sensibilities to claim something like that when you actually haven't won it just yet on the battlefield, but we need to start acting the part now. Especially considering how much trouble this might make for the Reach forces down the line."

"Not so much in their army I don't think. I doubt word of this will get to them in time for it to do anything, though if it does that would be nice." Ranma said with a laugh. "But you're right it's kinda hard for me to talk like that."

"Yes you're such a down to earth fellow." Denny replied laughing as she sent the letter down. She moved around the table, standing behind him and beginning to knead his shoulders. "Are you nearly done your letter to your family?"

"Almost." Ranma said raising one hand to take one of her hands in his kissing it gently before turning back to his message. "Have to convince my mother somehow to let Sansa out a for sight again so she can come down here, but I think that the fact we're sending Ben and Edd up will be the selling point. She'll see what that could mean right away. And she shouldn't have any fear of her safety with one of the Wolfsworn with her."

Daenerys nodded, continuing to knead his shoulders and neck while Ranma went back to writing his message. As he finished however she stopped. "We need to talk about Merry."

"You mentioned that before, but I don't know what you mean. Is there something wrong with her? Or are you worried about taking her back out into the field?"

"No, none of that, in fact I wouldn't like leaving her behind all, and that is sort of part of why I want to speak to you about her." She moved away from him, gesturing him over to the bed where she sat down. Ranma moved over to her, standing in front of her looking at her quizzically. Daenerys looked up at him with a faint smile on her face. "She's not a little girl you know." She smiled wider. "In fact I know you've noticed that. When you walked in on us your face was quite a picture, and it wasn't just me you were reacting to."

Ranma flushed and looked away, his mind going over that day before he could stop it. "I did apologize y'know."

"That's not what this is about." Daenerys sighed faintly reaching forward to take his hands in hers. "You are a good man Ranma Stark, too good for your own good at times. That little crush of her's, or what you thought was a crush, it isn't. She really loves you. And that that poses a problem, because I can see it in you sometimes, that you love her as well. And I don't think it's just as a little sister any longer is it?"

Ranma looks down at her, then away quickly. "You know I would never..."

"I know that." She said firmly interrupting him and pulling at his hands to get Ranma to look back at her. "And that wasn't my question. My question was do you realize that you have also fallen in love with her?"

Ranma stared in him into her eyes, then sighed with a nod. "I do." He said honestly. "But again you know I'd never act on it, and frankly the change, it, it just sort of sort of came at me from behind you know, creeping up on me. Part of me still sees her as that little girl who just needed a big brother around, and the rest see the..."

He paused and Daenerys spoke up before he could go on. "And the other half sees the magnificent young woman she's grown into since this war really began. And she is magnificent, inside and out. Myrcella is the sort of person that is very easy to fall in love with. In fact, if she wasn't we wouldn't be having this conversation. If she and I..."

Daenerys paused in turn before going on. "If I hadn't..." she looked away then back again taking a deep breath. "If I hadn't realized that I was falling in love with Merry and vice versa we would not be having this conversation."

"What are you saying?" Ranma asked frowning.

"I'm saying that I think I think that I would be happy to have her join us in our bed and in our lives going forward. It doesn't erase the problems that having her do so will cause. Our official stance is still that she is the heir to house Baratheon, let alone House Lannister, and that isn't considering the social issues it would cause if it became known. Polygamous marriages were one of the two main reasons why the seven was so often at odds with my family."

Ranma went down on one knee in front of her where she sat on the bed staring into Daenerys's eyes. "Are you sure about this Dae? The problems you mentioned with this are big ones, but they can be overcome, or covered over or whatever you want to call it. But...but are you really sure about this?"

Daenerys smiled, one finger touching her lips as she remembered the kiss that she and Merry had shared after Ranma had walked in on them like that. The two of them hadn't spoken about it in the past few days, both because they were so busy, and because neither of them really understood what to do next.

But now, Daenerys was sure of what she wanted to do next. "I think I am more than sure, I am happy." She smirked then reaching for to twist one of his ears playfully. "But Merry is the only one, you understand me? I don't care how good-looking this Margaery woman is, or how close the two of you had become as friends before you were sent to bring my brother and I back. I'll share our bed with Merry, but no more."

"Wasn't even dreaming of it." Ranma laughed, leaning forward to kiss her on the lips pushing her back onto the bed as he began to work at her laces.

OOOOOO

Myrcella chuckled, smacking Fenris lightly on his nose when it began to quest upwards towards the basket that she was holding. "No, that's for your master and our mistress. You already ate today anyway and I know it, you greedy little wolf."

Fenris huffed turning his head away, though whether or not it had been to be called little or greedy was something Merry couldn't tell. She shook her head still chuckling though not at Fenris. Wait until I tell Daenerys what's going on in the servant's quarters right now. Her face flushed a little as she thought of Daenerys and the kiss the two of them had shared. It had been brief but sweet, yet since then the two of them just haven't had any time to spend just the two of them.

What little free time Myrcella had she spent with maester Vyman and the local septons, going over what she had learned about healing while on the road so they could copy it all down. Ranma had been true to his word about wanting to start a Healer's Hall, and had already put out notices within Riverrun of the fact that the maester and septon would be willing to test individuals on their healing knowledge in order to start taking classes. She would not be here to see that continue, but it was at least a start on something that Myrcella felt was long overdue.

Maybe someday medical aid will be available for everyone, regardless of the rank of their birth she thought to herself as she him to walk down the corridor. That day's far in the future, but it has to start somewhere.

She passed by Ser Barristan, who insisted on being on guard at least occasionally for Daenerys, even though Ranma was with her. She passed the man with a curtsy and a smile which he returned with a nod of his head even as he had to squeeze against the wall of the hallway to let Fenris and her past. Frankly, Myrcella thought the idea of his needing to stand guard like this was ludicrous. To get at Daenerys while Ranma was around you'd have to bring an army, and the only army in the vicinity was theirs.

Fenris huffed again and suddenly sat down, turning away and laying down across the corridor, a large, and furry wall blocking all passage. Myrcella looked down at him and he wrinkled his nose. "That's right, sorry Fenris." She said smiling a little trying to keep a giggle out of her voice. She knew that the smell of human sex bothered the direwolves sometimes.

She knocked on the door and after hearing Ranma's "come in" opened it walking inside, though she was surprised to see Ranma was still partially undressed. Not unhappy, since it allowed her to stare for a second at his bare chest and wide shoulders, just surprised since the army was due to leave soon. For all that he was now 20 or so, he still didn't seem to have any hair on his body, a possible holdover from his past life he said, but Myrcella couldn't care less. She wasn't one for hair anyway, and this way she could watch all of his muscles move under his skin so powerfully.

Daenerys on the other hand was almost entirely dressed, and she moved forward to take the basket for Myrcella. "Thank you Myrcella, I'm starving."

Myrcella tore her eyes away from where Ranma was going through some kind of stretch to wake himself up and turned to Daenerys. "The army is almost ready to go, both of them. Oh, and young Eddric wanted to talk to you before you all set off, Ranma." Eddric wasn't actually that young in comparison to Myrcella, barely a year younger if that but that didn't seem to cross her mind.

"I wonder what he wants." Ranma mused, coming over to lay a gentle kiss on Daenerys's forehead then reaching over to pull Myrcella into a hug. Myrcella missed the look he shot Daenerys, or the smiling, happy nod he got in return. One moment she was blushing hotly against his chest, the next she felt his hand gently her chin and Ranma was leaning down and...

The world faded for a moment, as Myrcella suddenly realized this was all a dream. She couldn't possibly be really feeling Ranma's lips against hers, feeling his arms tightening around her waist, her dress clad chest pressing into his bare on. It was only when she heard Daenerys laugh, and say "let Merry breathe you brute!" that she realized it wasn't a dream.

Myrcella opened her eyes wide, standing back rapidly her face flushed as she stared at the two of them. "What!" She gasped "What..."

"Do you remember that kiss we shared Myrcella?" Daenerys asked softly, coming from forward from the table to take the younger girl's hand in hers and slowly bringing her over to sit down. "Do you remember how it felt? I enjoyed it, and I think you did too."

Myrcella flushed but nodded her head shyly. "It was, it was lovely..." she said chancing a glance towards Ranma, who had followed them to the table and was smiling down at her. "But, but I don't..."

"That was..." Daenerys paused, frowning slightly. "It was a sort of a test I suppose, both of you and myself. I've long known that your crush on Ranma wasn't really a crush Merry, in fact I think I knew that long before we originally had our talk by the Blue Fork. I just didn't want to admit it. But since then I have come to love you as well, and I think you have come to love me. Is that not so?"

In response Myrcella nodded her head rapidly, squeezing the other girl's hands back. Then, feeling greatly daring. She leaning forward quickly to press her lips against Daenerys in a sweet but very brief kiss before she pulled back flushing. "Yes," she said gasping a little. "I I love you, and I love you Ranma! But this, where, we..."

"This is about you joining us Myrcella, joining our relationship. I don't think I'll ever be able to marry you or even kiss you or stuff like that in public, and I won't lie this is going to cause trouble if it ever gets out. But I think that it will be worth it to make all of us happy, or happier in my case and Dae's. Are you willing to face those challenges with us for this chance?" Ranma asked touching her cheek gently.

Under that gentle touch Myrcella shivered again, but nodded fervently. "Whatever we face, if, if we're together we can, I can face it with you!" She stammered, not quite making sense but getting the gist of what she wanted to say across.

She watched wide-eyed as Ranma leaned in and kissing his wife ardently on the lips, so passionately that when they broke their lips apart their tongues were still dueling between their mouths for a few seconds while she watched, hyperventilating a little. It was easily one of the most erotic sights she had seen in her life, right up there with seeing Daenerys the morning after she and Ranma had spent a full night of fun together.

It got better however when Ranma turned to her and kissed her. Myrcella squeaked as she felt herself rising a little in her chair, with Ranma's hands gently gliding down her back, not touching her rear just yet but pulling her up by gentle pressure on the small of her back into the kiss which Merry returned as passionately as she could. She was still surprised though when Ranma's mouth opened slightly, and his tongue came out gently tapping at her lips. She gasped, opening her mouth slightly and his tongue entered her mouth, questing for her own.

Myrcella felt her body responding, arcing into Ranma's chest, as she began to perspire down below. Their tongues twirled around one another in her mouth, and she felt as if she was in heaven for a few moments.

Eventually however she had to pull back, her own smaller and much less rough tongue licking at the underside of his for a moment as she fell back into her chair her eyes wide and gasping. Myrcella looked over at Daenerys whose face was also flushed from watching, and leaned forward towards her, meeting the other girl midway and sharing and equally eager kiss with her. "I love you too..." she said after pulling back.

"Then I think that's all that matters between us." Ranma said with a smile as he moved off to find his shirt. "Unfortunately, we need ta deal with the real world for a bit before we can continue this."

Myrcella pouted, looking away. "Damned teases, the both of you."

Ranma and Daenerys laughed, but Daenerys put her arms around the other girl. "You and I will still be together Myrcella sharing a horse as usual."

At that, Myrcella clicked her fingers together. "That's right, I forgot to say this before, um," She flushed and looked at them both. "You two drove it out of my mind but the servants downstairs, they're frantically trying to prepare a carriage for you!"

While Ranma laughed, Daenerys looked at her blankly. "What?"

A few moments later the three of them had finished eating, though that was not to say the meal had not been interspersed by kisses, caresses and various cuddling. Now with Myrcella and Daenerys clasping arms together and with Ranma walking beside Fenris they moved through the keep and out into Riverrun's courtyard where the last portions of the army were preparing to go along with the Wolfsworn. And yes, a carriage.

The majordomo of the castle hurried up, bowing grandly to Daenerys and Myrcella. "Your highnesses, we have the carriage prepared, but we would have preferred to have some more time to choose out servants to go with you." Despite his bow his words came out sort of crossly. If you had told us that the two of you were leaving before we heard it from the soldiery, we would've..."

He stopped as Daenerys held up a hand looking at him quizzically. "I did not tell you to prepare any servants because I do not have servants while I'm on the march good ser."

"Y-your highness?" he asked hesitantly gesturing at two maids who looked much more worried about the upcoming trip than anything else. "But servants, your highness you are a queen, you need..."

"I need nothing on the march that my men cannot provide, or that I cannot carry myself." she replied sternly. "Myrcella and occasionally Alayaya see to what little aid I need, and vice versa. The march is no place for fripperies." Actually on this march there would be Bess as well, but that wasn't important right now.

She exchanged a smile and a nod with Grege, one of Myrcella's guards, who had come up just then with their horse. Daenerys let go of Myrcella's arm allowing the man to hoist the younger woman up into the saddle. "I hope good ser, that you made certain that nothing else was added to our baggage?"

"Aye lady, the servants tried to add some more dresses and all a few hours ago too, and there apparently was some kind of row between them and Patrek and a few of his supply men. It might have come to blows but I'm not certain, you'd have to get the full tale from him." The man replied in that soft tenor and tone that sounded so odd coming from a face like his.

To one side Myrcella's Eric Proudthenn smirked evilly, an easy thing to do with his face. "The moment they hear the word 'queen' it seems to go to these southron's brains your Majesty. As if a carriage'd make any time in this weather even on the Kingsroad!"

"Truly!" Ranma laughed then stepped forward to help his wife into the saddle. He easily lifted Daenerys into the saddle, showing off a strength that few possessed before he turned away. "Now, I understand that Eddric wanted to talk to me?"

"I did your highness." Eddric said from behind Ranma, having moved through the crowd while Daenerys was dealing with the servants.

"We did." Arya said, standing beside her friend. "Eddric's coming with us."

Ranma looked at them quizzically then turned to Eddric. "Yes, that was the plan." he said slowly. "Eddric's in charge of the rest of the force coming down with us to Wayfarer's Rest." From there it would be easier to head east towards House Keath, the land wouldn't be as bad and there was an actual road for half the journey which would carry them to the Stony Sept. From there they could make for House Keath's keep at the mouth of the Blackwater easily enough.

"He and Lord Piper's son. Are you ready as well?" Ranma asked looking over at the Lord Piper, who nodded his head grimly.

His father had not been happy that his House wouldn't gain anything from their fellow's downfall, but nor could he argue against it. He couldn't even complain about being sidelined from the main action, since that was in fact what Lord Piper wanted. Eddric on the other hand, wanted a chance to earn himself some glory to offset his ignominious defeat at the Lannisters hands.

"No what I mean is he's coming with us, with the Wolfsworn." Arya said, clutching Eddric's hand tightly.

Ranma looked at the boy sharply, not commenting on the fact that his little sister was holding the other youngster's hand so tightly. "Are you sure you can keep up with us? We're going to move damn fast, and I think you should talk to Eddric and Eddric to understand what that means."

Or to Eddric's wife, who had insisted on following him into battle, though Arya had winced when she learned that Ranma was going to push the pace. Arya had experienced something of that when Ranma was racing home to Winterfell from Hornwood.

"I do my Lord, and I want to try at the very least. If I fall out, you are of course free to leave me behind." Eddric said seriously. "But I still want to be with you when you take the Golden Tooth. I, I have an need to prove myself worthy my lord, not just to my lord Eddric, but to the memory of my kinsman and the training you have already given me."

Ranma looked over at his wife who shrugged, then over to Eddric who also shrugged his shoulders. "Very well, but we will leave you behind if you start to fall out of the march." Eddric nodded again and walked over to his horse while Arya made her way over to stand beside it with Nymeria next to her.

After that Ranma and Daenerys, on her horse, moved over to where Jon was waiting with the rest of the Wolfsworn smiling slightly at the sight their younger sister and her friend. "I think those two might feel something a little more than friendship for one another" he said before Ranma could open his mouth. "I don't know if they've got to the 'practice kissing' stage yet, but I wouldn't be surprised if it happened sometime soon."

"Arya's leaving Bess here right?" Ranma asked looking around for the young bracken girl. "She didn't try to dress her up and hide her among Eddric's men?"

"Yes, Bess knows she's marching with the rest of the army. She and Cley seem to be close to an understanding of their own despite how young they are." Jon shrugged his shoulders. "I don't know if it's serious, or simply the fact that they're both the same age and somewhat friendly with Arya, but we'll see. Everything is ready for our departure."

"Well I suppose that will sort itself out without us needing to poke our noses in, though given the fact House Bracken's been broken, Cley's mother might not wish to pursue it." Ranma said then looked up at his wife and Arya, sighing sadly. "Which means it's time for us to depart, love."

Daenerys nodded and leaned down when Rannar leaned up kissing one another their while the rest of the Army watched on. After a moment Daenerys pulled back and stared down at his her husband. "I will see you in Harroway."

"I'll be there. I'll see you." He said his eyes flicking over to Myrcella where she sat in front of Daenerys making sure that the younger woman knew his words were meant for both of them. "I promise."

With that he turned away, moving over to the other Wolfsworn quickly. Edd and Arya had joined them, and he nodded at them all. "Let's run brothers." He said simply. With that he turned and raced off out of the courtyard out of Riverrun and out into the city beyond, where Jon and the trio of wolves along with Arya caught him up one after another, and from there out onto the River Road heading Southwest. Behind him the rest of the Wolfsworn save Edd who had departed days ago for Winterfell, either raced on, or put spurs to horses in his wake.

OOOOOO

After being given the command to retake Dragonstone, Davos had decided to take it slowly at first, not knowing what he might run into. With his ships well out to sea he went ashore on Driftmark, where under a simple disguise he began to mingle with the sailors and smallfolk of the port.

He returned to his fleet with news shaking his head. "Driftmark and House Velaryon joined the Targaryen whelp willingly. The port's all a flutter wit' news that Dragonstone has fallen" He sneered slightly. "Apparently they're trying to bait a trap for us, and the castle will still be flying this Baratheon banner, but let's not be fools all right?"

His captains and his pirate friend laughed, then Salladhor gestured at the extremely detailed map of Blackwater Bay and the waters around it. "So what do you suggest we do? What force do you think they've left there?" the gesture was flamboyant as all of Salladhor's movements were, and indeed that word seemed to encompass the pirate prince of Myr rather well.

Salladhor Sahn was an elderly gentleman about fifteen years Davos' senior, with a sleek build and a ready smile. He always wore extremely good clothes, mostly silk in silver and white, with a green cap decorated with peacock feathers. He could have been a bard or a musician or even an Essosi actor, but he was also one of the most renowned pirates of the last thirty years.

"I'll take my ships around the southern side of The Gullet, stayin' well out of sight of Dragonstone before coming back in and landing on the island's seaward tip. From there we'll march overland, I know several ways into the castle that I doubt the defenders will've had time to find." Davos replied.

One such way was a secret passage straight from the port and into the Castle itself. So long as they took the other end he could funnel men through it and into the castle itself, bypassing the walls entirely.

"Salladhor." He said nodding at his friend. "Can I trust you to deal with any ships that might be waiting in the waters around Dragonstone?"

"Show me the range of the Dragonstone's defenses." Salladhor said gesturing at the map again. Nodding his head Davos did so, marking out of rough circle around the site of the Castle itself on the map with copper coins.

Salladhor nodded his head. "Excellent, I'll keep well out of that range but I'll make it look like I'm trying to push whatever ships we see into the range of Dragonstone, as if I believe it's still in friendly hands, while we'll also try to stay out of its catapult's range."

"Good thinking." Davos nodded.

Several days later Davos led his men across the island, ironically tracing much of the same route that Ulwyck Uller had, until he broke off a straight march towards Dragonstone to make for the port. There his men disguised themselves with cloaks and entered the port swiftly. In the port they found the smallfolk going about their business guarded by several Dornish armsmen.

With his crew stationed all around the road out of the port up to the castle, Davos decided to chance taking one of the Dornishmen captive.

Two such were patrolling around a brothel set near the wharfs when both of them were suddenly surrounded. Before either could raise the alarm, they fell unconscious to sharp raps upside the head.

One of them woke up later that night with a splitting headache, only to find himself tied to a chair, his hands splayed out on a desk in front of him and tied thereby rope. At the moment his mouth was also covered, but as he shook himself and tried to pull himself free someone removed it.

"Now, my friend," said a voice from behind him. "We're going to play a game. You're going to tell me what I want to know, and you get to keep all of your fingers. Every time you try to lie, you lose one. Then I'll start cutting off other things."

In this manner Davos learned that Viserys had left 500 men behind, all of them infantry and archers, as well as a few dozen men from the war galleys who knew what they were doing with the siege equipment. All of which were still in good condition, then sent having deliberately made certain that it was kept that way.

For his part Davos had upwards of 1,200 men to call on from the Royal Fleet. Every ship of the Royal fleet that had been sailing with Salladhor's pirate fleet had been sent with him on this, though he had only brought four ships crews ashore with him. Most of them were now hiding elsewhere on the island.

Davos decided to tell them to wait until they saw the gates being opened before advancing, since he knew they were safe where they were. He and his own crew, bolstered somewhat further, would be enough to open the gate from the inside. Besides, any more men being seen in the port might arouse the defender's curiosity and put the castle on alert that their ruse had failed.

With that in mind Davos made his way through the darkness of the port, stopping outside a small stone building, which had actually been the foundations of a large lighthouse at one point. Looking around he made certain the no one was watching him then ducked inside. Inside the roof had caved in, several of the beams crashing down onto the ground, making what looked like a large pile of rubble that almost filled the small hovel.

Davos moved over the pile very carefully and as he did what he was here to seek became visible. You could only see it if you stood on top of the rubble, but there was a small open area directly between it and the outer wall. The floor there was wooden, like the floor of the rest of the building and he moved down the pile, tapping at it thoughtfully. "Now, where... ah, there it is." Quickly he pulled at the small bit of loose wood in the floor, removing it entirely and placing it to one side. With that done he fit his fingers into it, pulling up on the floor rapidly. The piece of floor came loose, and he set it to one side, revealing an iron ladder leading down into the darkness of a tunnel of some sort.

Night passed quickly while his men joined him in threes and fours, heading down into the tunnel with torches until finally he had a force of around 400. With that Davos entered, pulling the lid back into place behind him while dawn was breaking. After climbing down what seemed a single story's worth of handles, Davos found himself standing in a long tunnel, which wasn't very wide, being barely wide enough for one man across.

Moving through his men to the front of the column was incredibly difficult, and cursing abounded in the tunnel as he made his way through them. Eventually however Davos was at the front of his men, and began to lead the way down the tunnel.

An interminable amount of time later they came upon a doorway, and Davos laid his head against the doorway for a moment listening hard. He couldn't hear anyone from the other side, but given what was on the other side that might wasn't definite.

With a shrug Davos reached into a pocket pulling out a small key and fitting it into a lock before slowly turning it. Luckily there was no noise of rust or grating steel. Instead there was a light click at the end, and when he pushed the door gave way easily. Davos moved forward quickly, drawing his sword while behind him his men began to pile through, all of them thankful to be out of the claustrophobic confines of the tunnel.

This side of the tunnel was the wine cellar for the Castle, but thankfully there was no one here. As more and more men began to come through Davos ordered them up into the rest of the Castle. "The servants can't all be on their side, but best ta order 'em to keep silent as you go. But no killing of the servants unless they try'n rouse the Dornishmen."

After that the battle was rather anti-climactic. The defenders had almost to a man been up on the castle's balustrades, readying the siege equipment while out to sea Salladhor went to work on the five ships that Viserys had left behind either to date or close his trapped one of the others. They looked up in shock as they heard the noise of the castles gate being opened, but by then Davos and his men were in firm control of the gatehouse and the hallways leading to it. There were a few moments of intense combat there, but after that the rest of his men stormed into the keep, and the Dornishmen were quickly overwhelmed.

Out to sea it was even easier. Salladhor was a consummate professional at his craft and came in too fast from too many different directions for the crews of the five war galleys, all of whom were captured Royal Navy vessels, to compensate for. He cut off any attempt that the Dornish ships could use to escape, forcing them back into the range of the catapults on the castle. When those catapults went to work firing on them in earnest and sinking one of the captured ships outright the remaining four quickly surrendered. The men on them would be sent with four ships of Sahn's fleet to Essos and sold there as slaves. That would give Salladhor and his men some recompense for his work thus far.

That was a point he was quick to bring up with Davos later that evening. "I like you Davos, truly I do, and I never truly liked the Targaryen or the Lannisters, but I am a businessman, and I need to be paid."

"I know." Davos said looking at him and then down at the map in the map room, not making any mention of the fact he knew the pirate captains had run a very profitable black market while around King's Landing before the plague hit. "Why are you bringin' that up now? Ya know that Stannis promised ta pay you at the end of the campaign."

"Ahh, that was before news of what went on in King's Landing reached me. Without the booty from that city, I'm far less inclined to believe him."

"What news?" Davos asked, going cold inside for some reason.

"You mean you didn't know?" Salladhor actually looked surprised, and reached across to grasp his old friend's shoulders. "You didn't know? You really didn't?"

Davos looked at him irritably then shook his hands off. "No I didn't, what happened?"

"A conflagration of green and red fire was seen bursting up into the sky around Kings Landing. Fishermen from further into Blackwater Bay are reporting it was seen for dozens of leagues around! The city is gone, possibly entirely, and if there's any gold or jewels to be had amidst its ruins, getting at them will be quite a bit of work, work my pirates and I are not suited for."

Davos slumped into a chair, not the Lord's chair just another chair in the room around the map table staring at his friend. "Are you certain?" he whispered. "Are you really certain?"

"My friend, you can question some of the fishermen yourself." Salladhor somewhat wearily. "There are dozens of them out in the waters these days. They're desperate to bring in food before winter gets here. Apparently there are hints the oldsters can see in the weather and that the maesters have passed on that this one will be a longer one than normal."

He shrugged. Salladhor Saan was from Essos, and winter very rarely if ever touched that land save around Ibben or Braavos. But since he was from Lys he had never seen winter. Oh, he'd been cold of course, he'd even sailed to the port of Ibben at one point, but winter?"

"I, I think I'd like that my friend." I know Melisandre had influence on My Lord, but I thought he was fighting it! In the name of the Seven, why! All those people! Davos had been born in King's Landing, in Flea Bottom in fact, and the idea of all those little alleyways, those taverns, those brothels, being turned to ash was distressing.

"As for how you'll be paid..." Davos paused, thinking hard. "Let me think on that as well."

There was a cough from the doorway, and both men turned. Maester Pylos stood there, bowing his head somewhat obsequiously. The Citadel had sent him before Cressen's death to eventually replace the ailing Cressen, whose legs had begun to give out on him, preventing him from performing all of his duties. Pylos was a quiet sort, loyal to his birds and to his duties as maester rather than to any one individual lord, which might've been why you can left on after the sack of the keep.

The man had even been blunt about it when Davos questioned him earlier, saying, "I bowed my head and surrendered, bowing to follow the Lord of the keep. That is my duty as maester, to the keep itself, to Dragonstone and whoever holds it at the time. If that changes hands, what is that to me?"

"Yes Pylos what is it?" Davos asked, smiling slightly at the younger man. He liked Pylos, who seemed to have a very pragmatic sort of honor, and had never made even a hint of being interested in religion one way or another.

"A message from Riverrun has arrived this past hour Ser Davos. I looked it up in the books, and Riverrun has only twice before sent messages here, during the War of the Usurper in fact. As such, I thought to share it with you. That, and its contents are rather disturbing in their implications."

Salladhor raise an eyebrow and looked at Davos. "Riverrun, that would be the Starks and their Targaryen ally correct, the Stormborn? At least so the rumors say."

"It's signed Rannar and Daenerys of House Stargaryen, King and Queen of Westeros, Lord Paramount of the North and the Riverlands."

"Hubris." Said Davos shaking his head. "Everyone seems to be declaring themselves kings these days." Even so Davos took the message from the maester, reading through it quickly. "It says winter is coming, and with it a force out of legend from the north, we need weapons to fight it, and as such we need dragonglass knives and arrow points..." his voice trailed off. "We, we will pay good silver for it to be delivered up to White Harbor."

"Silver for dragonglass!" Salladhor scoffed. "Why would they do that? Oh, the rock's pretty enough, and I've seen some work from the Basilisk Islands that are just incredible, but using it to make weapons? It's too breakable for that."

The maester coughed a little. "There's been a rumor my lord carried to me on ravens wings, that the black candles of the Citadel have been lit, that the lights which are not candles have begun to glow again. Those are signs that magic has returned. And the black candles in particular are supposed to be lit only when, well it's just ancient history of course but..."

"Spit out man." Salladhor growled, looking at the man angrily. "Don't beat about the bush."

"The, the Others my White Walkers. The ones the Wall was originally built to keep out. It wasn't built so monstrously tall and imbued with fell magics just to keep out the wildlings. As many as there are, a normal wall would've done the trick with them. But, but the Others, the Others haven't been seen since the Age of Heroes! Thousands of years!"

"And how long has it been since the black candles were last able to be lit?" Davos asked, still staring at the message.

"Four hundred years at minimum my lord, during the Doom of Valyria."

"The Northerners..." Davos went on slowly. "The Northerners mobilized their forces long before hostilities began here in the South. They sent half of their total strength up to the Wall, ostensibly to deal with some King uniting the wildlings for a push south. But what if they had evidence that was good enough for them of these White Walkers, but not enough to share with Robert or anyone else?"

Almost against his will Salladhor nodded. "I've never met any of the Starks, but I've had dealings with the men of White Harbor. They're shrewd fellows in the main, and their Lord is the shrewdest of all for all he tries to hide it. If he's willing to part with good silver, then they have strong evidence of these Others. What exactly are we dealing with here?" he asked looking at the maester. "Supernatural forces aye, but what kind?"

"I know not my Lord, I didn't make a study of ancient legends. They were, they were ancient! Past and done! All I know is that they had some kind of power over death. But this is simply preposterous! There can't be any..."

"You Maesters have long said that magic's time had passed in this world, but I think we've seen enough evidence that you were wrong there." Davos said grimly, thinking of all the things Melisandre had been able to do. "How many of the servants are still here? I want messages sent out, we need men to start mining dragonglass, as much is possible."

"What about chasing after the Pauper Prince?" said Salladhor looking at him quizzically and using the Essosi nickname for Viserys. "Or sending for more orders from your King?"

"Well you said you wanted to be paid. You can take tremendous amounts of dragonglass on your ships, and be paid in silver apparently in White Harbor." said Davos actually smiling a little now.

"Sailing that far north in this season isn't going to be easy." Salladhor shook his head. "I'd like a guarantee of that before I set sail."

"I know we have ravens trained to Winterfell, how long would sending a message there take?" Davos asked the maester.

"It would take about two weeks now given the weather. Even ravens are affected by wind and rain."

"Will the Starks word on it be good enough for you, my friend?"

"That'll do." said Salladhor nodding his head and now smiling. Silver for dragonglass, that would be an excellent trade in his opinion, especially if he could drive the price up higher given the demand for it. "And what about you and your fleet?"

"I'm going to hunt down Viserys. According to the servants he was let in here by Petyr Baelish, that means they'll be making for Gulltown or Maidenpool. Maidenpool if Viserys want to get to grips with the Starks and his sister, Gulltown if he's trying to whistle up more support. Whichever, I'll be able to pin him in the Bay of Crabs. I know those waters almost as good as I know Blackwater Bay, and whatever his dragon can do, it won't be able to make up for the numbers or my men's skill at sea."

Salladhor nodded. He then poured them both a glass of wine and the two men drank deeply while Davos' mind continued to go over what had happened to King's Landing, and what that meant about Stannis. And, perhaps most importantly, what it meant in terms of Davos and his family's loyalty to the man.

OOOOOO

It had taken a week after the destruction of King's Landing for Stannis to reassert his control of his army. The Lords and the common armsmen's reaction to the sight of the capital burning as it did had been beyond what he had expected, but eventually Stannis had convinced the Lords that it had been the only way to defeat the plague, and they in turn had convinced their men. That wasn't to save the army was happy with that decision, they never would be, but Stannis didn't care one way another about that happiness, so long as they were willing to follow his orders.

After all, I'm not happy about it, and they all know it. Stannis thought to himself moodily, staring through the rain towards the remains of the city from well within bow shot of the remains of the walls.

It might have been that which allowed him to regain control of his army afterwards. The fact that Stannis showed genuine remorse for the act, that his grim self-control seemed to break when he viewed the remains of the city, might have done more than anything else to convince the men that it really had been a necessary evil.

He continued to watch the remains of the city watching a few men come out of its ruins, all of them wearing heavy leathers soaked in water, more than the rain could provide. Even now a week after the fires had died out the land of King's Landing was still incredibly hot, even steaming in the rain. As the men neared him Stannis barked "Well?"

One of the men was Lord Bolling, and he pulled off a heavy damp hood to stare at his king, shaking his head. "Nothing my Lord, you can tell where the Red Keep is, you can even tell where the Hand's tower and Maegor's holdfast were. But all the stone walls have melted! It would take weeks of heavy labor to break through to see if the corridors inside are still there, let alone get through to where the royal court is.

"I see." said Stannis softly, still staring at the ruins of King's Landing for a few moments. Then he resolutely turned his back, facing north not at all incidentally. A king could not keep thinking about the past, he had to think about the Future. "Get some rest my Lord, we have a meeting this evening, for wish I require your attendance."

"As you will, Your Majesty." said Lord Bolling smiling at his distant kinsman's back. The way Stannis had regained control of the army these past few days had been masterful, and truly showed that Bolling had made the correct decision in which Baratheon to follow.

That evening Bolling joined with the other senior (most powerful) lords in the army to listen while Stannis began to discuss the next campaign. "Thanks to information from sources still loyal to me there, we know that Dragonstone has fallen due to treachery. However we can leave retaking it in the hands of Ser Seaworth."

Mace was not the only Reach Lord to grumble at that, for more than one reason. For one thing, without Dragonstone and with Storm's End so far away and still not knowing of the change in House Baratheon's leadership, Stannis no longer had a real powerbase to call his own. For another, Mace wasn't the only one who resented the fact that Seaworth, a common born sailor had been raised to the ranks of the nobility. Added to these was the identity of the individual that had taken Dragonstone in the first place. If Viserys Targaryen had really come back along with a dragon, then there were more than one Lord there who might be willing to bend the knee to House Targaryen once again.

Stannis glared at them all angrily, quieting their mutters. "Ser Seaworth has the keys to several secret passages into Dragonstone, which will allow him to reclaim the castle in much the same way it was taken in the first place. Moreover, if the Dragon boy attempts to fight him at sea, Davos and Saan are well up to smashing his fleet to flinders."

Still seeing their ambivalent nature to the loss and to what he was saying Stannis smirked internally knowing exactly how to turn them completely against the newly arrived Viserys. "I hope that Viserys dies at sea, it's a horrible way to die, but not so horrible as the one, that according to my sources, he used to execute my wife." Those sources were Melisandre's visions but no one here needed to know that.

Mace sat up abruptly at that. Despite the fact that Stannis had agreed to set Selyse aside it would have been socially awkward at best. Politically possible certainly, the precedent of setting a barren wife aside was there, but it had so very rarely happened in the past that there was still a stigma attached to it. Especially if the House in question stood to enrich itself so much by its new arrangement, as was the case here. Mace still considered himself a kingmaker, despite the massive losses the Reach Army had taken, but even so he wouldn't have wished to face his Lords ire if Stannis had done so.

But the other Lords were simply looking at Stannis quizzically. Stannis replied to their expressions by elaborating quickly. "Apparently after Viserys took the castle through connections that Littlefinger had gained there somehow, he executed my wife by throwing her to his dragon."

There were oaths to the Seven and shouts of disgust at that, and more than one man's spine stiffened, the idea of possibly opening up clandestine negotiations with the Targaryen heir banishing from their mind. If this new Dragon Prince was so lost to honor as to do that to a noblewoman, regardless of whether or not his House stood against hers, they wanted nothing to do with him.

From there Stannis went on, changing the subject to the main point of this meeting. "Replies from the ravens we have sent from most of the Crownlands houses remaining are supportive." Stannis had taken the ravens found in Duskenale, Stokeworth and Rosby, which combined had allowed him to send ravens to nearly every surviving Crownlands house, as well as retaining several more to send into the Reach and elsewhere, including the Vale. It was an eclectic sorting, but it allowed him to put things in motion elsewhere at the very least.

One of them went to House Crane, the nearest Reach house to where Willas was leading a campaign into the Westerlands. That campaign was apparently going well going by Melisandre's visions, but those men could be of better use elsewhere in the Reach, let alone moving up to join his army, though he wasn't about to wait here for them.

"The Crownlands will supply us with foodstuffs and anything else we need on the march north. They will also supply a force to meet us on the Kingsroad near the God's Eye on the Kingsroad, which should be around approximately 2,000 men."

More than one of the Reach lord's sneered, but Stannis didn't join them. Given his losses here, and the fact he'd been forced to send so large a force down into the Reach to reclaim the Mander from the Ironborn, he might have barely force parity with the Riverlands and Northern army. Though he hoped that the raven he sent into the Vale would offset that. It was high time that nation got off the sidelines and chose a side in this war.

"Speaking of going North my Lord," said Lord Staedmon delicately. "There is a messenger here from House Grandison." The men House Grandison had sent to serve under Renly had taken severe losses in the fighting, along with several other houses. Selmy, Cafferren, Fell, Estermont, Gower, Hasty, Herston, practically every Stormlands house that had sided with Renly had taken losses, from middling to horrendous or utterly wiped out, like house Swygert.

Most of their lords, those who survived had of course been allowed to swear allegiance to Stannis, much like Lord Staedmon. House Morigen and House Rogers were particularly important, because most of their forces remained intact.

House Cafferren however had not. They had defied Robert during the previous war, and had defied Stannis here, so the lord of the House had been executed after the battle. Their lands would go to reward some knight or other after the war, though Stannis had not sent any message to Fawnton to tell them of their change in status just yet.

The same was true of Estermont and Fell, much to the barely hidden delight of Lord Buckler. With Fell's death, his house and lands were ceded to Buckler after the battle ended, though it would be some time before they could take control of it.

Other lords, Hasty and Gower in particular, who had been captured during the battle, were quietly taken away and 'executed' during the chaotic days after the battle. Stannis knew those men, pious fools both of them, and knew neither would willingly follow him so long as he had Melisandre by his side. That this allowed their men, some three thousand all told, to be added to his own House's forces, making up much of the losses sustained under Renly, was merely a bonus.

On Stannis' side, Errol, Buckler, Massey and Stannis' own house troops had taken casualties, but they were still powerful, since most of the losses he had sustained had been among the former armymen taken from the Royal navy. Bolling's armymen hadn't taken many casualties at all, given they had been in charge of gathering up Cordwayner and that disastrous initial charge.

Stannis knew though it was worse among the Reach Lords. Several lords had died while their forces remained intact, or both lords and their men had been wiped out. This of course included the group that tried to betray their fellows, among others. Kidwell, Inchfield, Redding, Oldflowers, Woodwright, Pommingham, and several minor houses had been wiped out.

A few of the larger houses however still retained much of their military strength, like Ambrose, Appleton, Tyrell, and others. Many others had their lords captured, all of whom had been forced to swear fealty to Stannis. This included Lord Cordwayner, who had been enraged at both Renly and Mace after waking up a prisoner, and had sworn fealty eagerly to Stannis. Bolling had taken more than half that initial force and every lord involved captive, giving Stannis a major boost to the cavalry he could call upon.

After reading the message Stannis shook his head. "The Viper's march is a feint for this Dragon Prince," he said scornfully. "I have no idea what madness has taken Oberyn to use such measures against the smallfolk, but I cannot allow his diversion to work in pulling us away from marching north to deal with the Starks and the Stormborn before dealing with the Dragon Prince himself."

Before House Grandison's messenger or the other Stormlords present could protest Lord Boling cutting quickly. "Where do you think the Dragon Prince will try to land my Lord?"

"If Petyr was not in cahoots with him, I would assume they would look to land at Duskendale which they've already attacked, or Maidenpool. As it is, they might land in Gulltown in the Vale though I doubt Petyr will find aid there."

Stannis really wasn't worried about the Dragon Prince, despite his fury at having Dragonstone taken while he was away. No, he was more worried about the Stark boy and the other group that was soon to be arriving, the Golden Company.

The Golden Company was such a highly trained and organized force it could have an impact well beyond its 10,000 man size, and Melisandre had been unable to tell him where that force might land. Not that she couldn't tell, having taken power from sacrifices in the past few days secretly she had the power to see decently well through the course of the present. But the decision where they would land had yet to be made. She gave him several choices, all of which made sense, but Stannis couldn't fortify all of them, or indeed any of them given the distances involved before the Targaryen's new fang arrived.

As for the Stark boy, Melisandre's visions and his own learning that Edmure had died while in Lannister captivity meant that Rannar could call upon the Riverlands not just those Houses who he had already aided, but the entirety of that country. Those Houses that had been leery of joining him or had been forced to stay neutral to the Lannisters would join him now as their true Lord Paramount's heir, if Hoster was even still alive. That meant that he would be able to field an army of around 20,000, giving Stannis only a bare 4 or maybe 5000 at best advantage over him.

Stannis was still certain that he could beat the Stark Youth as a general, and he had Melisandre and her acolytes working overtime to birth more Shadow Warriors to take north with them, to match Stark as a warrior as well as his so-called Wolfsworn. Tales of their abilities had already begun to spread to the smallfolk in song and story. But even so, there was no doubt that the Stark lad was his most dangerous remaining opponent. I won't underestimate you like Tywin did, boy Stannis thought coldly. I regret the fact that we are enemies but I will smash you all the same.

"We'll be moving north in echelons with each in turn combining forces from both the Reach and the Stormlands. Without the Reach's levy forces, I expect the Reach heavy cavalry to be able to perform much better in the future." Stannis went on aloud, stroking the Reach Lord's egos in a way that made his insides crawl but which was necessary. He knew that portion of the army that was the least happy with him, and he did not wish to deal with any internal dissensions now, not ever.

"I will command the first group. Lord Mace, Lord Ambrose, you will have command of the second echelon, which will comprise a somewhat larger than normal portion of the heavy cavalry. The second portion will be in a good position to react to attacks either on the first or third echelons."

Mace nodded, puffed up with self-importance in such a way that Stannis actually had to look away for a moment so as to not say something to burst his bubble. He exchanged a glance with Lord Ambrose, who nodded his head slightly understanding the message in Stannis' gaze. He would be the one really in charge of that echelon, no matter how much he had to sugarcoat it for Mace down the line.

"Lord Staedmon will serve as my second-in-command in the first echelon. Lord Buckler, you will command the third echelon, along with Lord Rowan as your second in command."

"My Lord, what about the Viper?" said Lord Peasebury anxiously. His lands were close to where the Viper was apparently attacking.

Stannis looked at the man, coldly at first but after a moment nodding his head in respect for the man's courage in speaking up. "If the Viper was going to stay in the Stormlands my Lord, I would send you and a force of our Stormlands infantry back to aid in dealing with them. However, remember the season."

It took only a second for every Stormlord there to get it, and all of them began to grin viciously. Lord Morrigen put it into words. "It's autumn now, no general wants to fight in the Stormlands in autumn!"

"Indeed. As much as I loathe what the man is doing, there is no doubt that the Viper's intelligent. Once faced with the reality of moving through the Stormlands in autumn, he'll either retreat back into the Boneway or make for the Reach. Which means that Lord Caron and his force might meet up with them somewhere. I'll write out a message to that effect and send it both by Raven and by messenger to House Caswell. I will also send a raven to the Houses in the Marches, both sides Storm and Reach, what few I have ravens for. I realize that House Dondarrion won't march nor will House Tarly, but the other Marcher Houses in both the Stormlands and the Reach will. I'll order them to organize themselves in such a way that they'll be able to meet with Lord Caron's command. Between then they'll have more than enough men to crush this Viper underfoot.

There were many nods of approval at that, though one or two of the minor Stormlords looked worried. Peasebury and Musgood in particular were looking concerned, since their lands had been named as areas that had already felt the sting of the Viper or might soon. But that simply would make them more determined to win glory in the coming campaign. If they could, Stannis would reward them, and they would make good any losses they'd suffered at home.

Shortly after that the meeting broke up, though Stannis ordered Mace to stay for a moment. "My condolences on the passing of your wife my Lord." Mace said before Stannis could speak.

"Yes." Stannis said coldly. "There was no love lost between us, and as I said she was barren yet there will be an appropriate mourning period."

"Of course." Mace said, smiling in what he thought was a crafty manner, but which made his face which hadn't recovered just yet from the blows it had took taken in the battle, to look even more idiotic. "But after that..."

"After that, yes. Did you send a message to Highgarden?"

"Indeed. I don't think that she will catch us up anytime soon especially if we are going to start marching north, but my daughter should arrive after we deal with the Starks and their allies. It will be a grand occasion, worthy of both our Houses."

Stannis nodded, not showing any of his thoughts about the buffoon in front of him on his face. After that he offered the man a drink wine, and the two of them toasted one another. Though again Mace didn't notice that Stannis's teeth were gritted throughout the pleasantries.

OOOOOO

"You have to admit that Stannis won back the army's admiration in the past few days." Said Lord Fossoway to Lord Cockshaw.

"Not the total Army, or else you and I would not be meeting here." said Cockshaw tartly. "Lord Peake, Ser Shermer, and Ser Varner are all with us here, as is Lord Lonmouth."

The other Lords all nodded, looking around them carefully. None of them understood the Red Witch's powers, but knew enough to fear being overheard by anyone, not just Stannis's Fire Guard, the reputation of which had grown tremendously after the battle. They were meeting in a tent well off the beaten path of the main camp of the army, which was broken into several smaller camps.

Like his brother, Stannis had taken a brute force approach to making certain that disease and other health issues did not hinder his army, bringing as many maesters and septons who understood what they were doing along his march. He had also added every single one of them that Renly had commandeered. But he still had been forced to split his command into several different camps to make certain that overcrowding did not become an issue.

"We don't have enough forces to survive if we strike out on our own," said Ser Shermer, shaking his head angrily. His forces had been in the front of the main battle and had taken heavy losses before he was captured and his remaining men forced to surrender. Stannis had given him his parole, but the man felt that after learning more about the Red Witch and what Stannis had allowed her to do with the Shadow Warriors, let alone her own attempted assassination on Renly, that his oath to the Seven and the Faith was more important.

He was at a loss however as to what to do about it though, as he had just pointed out. "Stannis won't hesitate to crush us, even if that would weaken his own army."

"No, but it isn't just Stannis that we're dealing with here. It's Mace." said Lord Fossoway, his voice biting and angry. "He's acting like a fucking sellsword, or a common pimp using his daughter like that!" The bard's songs of the 'Rose of Oldflowers' had begun to reach the army, and as a minor noble he was more in tune with what his men were talking about than most.

Fossoway knew how Margaery was looked at by the smallfolk, and that the forces have been left behind in the Reach would also be looking askance at the idea of simply exchanging one Baratheon for another. Especially considering the fact that when the plan was first discussed, Stannis had yet to set aside his wife. The reasons for that were understandable, but the timing was not.

"That doesn't really matter." said Ser Varner, sounding morose. "We just don't have the forces to do anything."

"Not alone." Said Lord Cockshaw. "But, we are marching north to face the Starks and their army. And if the tales are true, Stannis may find himself overmatched, whatever he thinks."

"You're talking about turning coat during the battle," said the knight representing House Peake at the meeting flatly. "It's possible, but I don't know if it'll be as easy as you think."

"Perhaps not, but if we remain in the third echelon of the army, it is still possible. Lord Cockshaw smiled thinly yet there was no humor in it, it more resembled that of an animal caught in a trap. "And perhaps, perhaps we can send a message to the Stark youth at least informing him of our intentions."

"Do you think the Starks will care?" said another knight bluntly. "He's a Stark, they're all about honor and keeping your word. And last I checked, we all were forced to give our oaths to the Fire-Sanctified king. That word came out like a curse in his mouth, and he spat to one side making a sign of the Seven Star for a moment.

"I don't think it could hurt anything to look into it." Cockshaw shrugged his shoulders. "Frankly, we're running out of options here. Either we throw aside our oaths to him, or follow a man that all of us believe to be a greater threat than the return of the dragons to Westeros." He let the silence of that statement linger for a moment before speaking again. "And with that my Lords I think we should break up before anyone notices us missing."

As they all did, he smiled thinly. Varys would be happy with that, and anything that weakened any of the players as the Targaryens at last showed itself once again was all to the good. Pawns after all didn't need to know the real reasons they were being moved around the board.

OOOOOO

Ranma had set a truly blistering pace out from Riverrun, not stopping for more than brief moments to eat or rest regardless of the weather or time of day, continuing to run through the night with the Wolfsworn. The Wolfsworn were able to take it, even Roger and Hathan, who had not trained to march on their own two feet could match the pace on their horses, changing horse every four hours. Though their horses were badly flagging by the time they reached Wayfarer's Rest, three days after they had left Riverrun.

That was a truly incredible pace, even for as small a group as theirs, since that same journey should have taken them a week at best in the autumn weather. Yet the wolfsworn had done it. As for Edric...

Several times during the journey Edric thought his rear and back were going to break, or he was just going to collapse out of the saddle. But he was determined enough to tie himself into the saddle, only undoing it when it came to switch mounts. Often he flagged, but then Arya would come back and slap his leg, and he would find it in himself to keep pushing.

And when they stopped at Wayfarer's Rest for the night, he saw something in the Wolfsworn's eyes that made all his pain worth it: respect. He collapsed into his bed that evening with a wide smile on his face, though when he was woken up early the next day, his body was quick to point out that he was still not quite as tough as he could hope.

That morning the holding force Jon had left behind here began to organize itself for the march into the pass. Mostly mountain men and a force of Hornwood and Grell archers they weren't going to be ready quickly, but that was alright, since the Wolfsworn would soon be heading up into the mountains, where their pace would slow considerably.

Ranma and the others met up with a local guide, who showed them a small trail that led from the main pass up into the mountains. He was a local man who had aided the Brother's Without Borders in the same way. It was obvious he had felt the sting of the sellswords depredations in some way, but Ranma and the others didn't push him for details.

The man explained the nature of the mountains to them as they went. "Ya can get small forces through the mountain passes milord, that's why da damn mercs were able to keep ahead of us, and why's bandits settin' up here worried the nobles so much. But, yer can't get no large force through 'em. Horses'll have trouble on most o' these trails, and that'll have been made worst by da rains."

"Most of the trails'll be unusable by now, but there're a few that c'n get us close ta da Golden Tooth. Though, I'sstill don't know what ye're going to do melord."

It had rained on the group once since leaving Riverrun, but that rain had lasted for a day and a half, and Arya and Eddric in particular looked like wet rats after it had passed. Now however Ranma merely shrugged. "You'll see."

Even with a local guide it took six long, slogging days for them to find away through the mountains that led above the Golden Tooth, and from there it took another day before Ranma found what he wanted: an outcropping of rock that jutted out from the mountain directly over the Golden Tooth, far below them. From here they could make out men here and there marching around on top of the keep's parapet, but they looked about a quarter of their real size.

Ranma had no idea what they had heard by now, but he hoped that the news of the disaster that had befallen the Westerlands army hadn't reached here. If it hadn't, surprise would do the rest. If it had, this fight would become much more difficult.

"So what is our plan?" Smalljon asked, while next to him Jon looked on askance as Ranma pulled off a large and very heavy pack he had been carrying since they left Riverrun. "I agree with the local, it won't be possible to get a large force around the Golden Tooth at this time of year, not before they learn we're coming anyway. And from what we can see, that wouldn't really help us much. We'd still have to besiege the place."

The Golden Tooth was not a large castle, in fact it wasn't technically a castle at all, the definition of that being an inner keep surrounded by an outer wall with the keep either integrated into the wall or separate from and surrounded by it. Instead the Golden Tooth was a keep, designed simply as a wall built across the pass between the Riverlands and the Westerlands at this point, which was one of the narrowest points in the pass.

This spot had been chosen because it was also close to the nearby gold mines which were the key to both to the Lannisters and Leffords power. Without those mines House Lannister would never have had the deep pockets it did, and the Leffords would not be as important a family as they were.

The walls of the castle were incredibly thick on every side, about twice the width of most castles, and the keep's main gates continued straight through the entire keep, but only had a single entrance to the rest of the keep. The tunnel had dozens of murder holes, and several dozen portcullises that could drop into place all along its length. The solid keep's roof had heavy parapets, along with five catapults and four scorpions that they could see from where they were. Taking it would be incredibly costly in any normal fashion.

"You're still thinking like a regular general Smalljon, not a Wolfsworn. Always try to think outside the normal methods of attack, if you can see what I mean." Ranma pulled out long lengths of rope and held them up. "We can't afford to simply wait them out, so we're going to attack them from a direction they aren't expecting, above."

Jon looked at the ropes then down to the distant Golden Tooth then up at Ranma again. "You must be joking." When Ranma didn't smile, Jon groaned aloud, while Eddric and Arya both looked over the sides of the cliff face then at the other Wolfsworn. Only Arya looked anything but incredulous, while above them the sky opened up and it began to pour.

It was pushing past midnight when Ranma began his dissent along the rope, yet it was still raining. He went down hand over hand silently as he stared down below through the heavy downpour, making certain that none of the few watchers still moving around the keep's top could see him. They hadn't made the mistake of having too many braziers around that would ruin their night vision, but none of them looked up either thanks to the rain. That was probably the best he was going to get.

He took a moment to stare down the pass towards the Riverlands, knowing that the mountain clan warriors from Wayfarer's Rest were waiting nearby, just out of sight of the Tooth. Fenris and Nymeria had hunted through the passes, making certain that the Leffords didn't have any watchers out, and finding surprisingly none. Complacency is the downfall of many a castle. Ranma thought now, rather coldly amused.

Alongside him Arya also rappelled down easily, grinning widely through the rain at her brother. This plan was so Ranma it wasn't even funny, so crazy and out there no one else would ever have thought of it, and she loved it!

Soon enough the two Starks were about fifteen feet above the heads of the watchers down below. Technically Ranma could've jumped even from the starting point, but none of the other Wolfsworn could have, and he wanted to show them that it was possible rather than simply showcase another impossible skill of his own.

Ranma looked at Arya, holding up one hand barely visible in the night and rain. In fact if lightning hadn't chosen that moment to light up the sky, Arya wouldn't have seen it. More lightning began to strike as the storm around them picked up, but Arya didn't have any concentration to waste on that, instead watching her brother's hands. When that hand ran out of fingers, Ranma let go of the rope with his other hand and legs, dropping the rest of the distance. Arya's eyes widened, then she hurriedly followed suit, restraining the urge to howl with difficulty.

He landed lightly on the stone below, directly behind one of the guards. Reaching out quickly Ranma grabbed the man around the neck with one of his arms, twisting and snapping his neck silently before turning and racing towards another man who had turned gaping at the dark apparition that had suddenly fallen on them. That man opened his mouth to scream and alarm, only for Ranma to throw a knife that caught him directly in the throat ending his scream forever. Another knife found another man in the back of the neck before he could to could turn.

The last two guards fell to Arya, who dropped directly on one, taking him to the ground loudly while Fang flipped out, catching the other man across the stomach. Stabbing downwards she ended the man below her and looked over at Ranma nodding her head. Ranma nodded back, then took one of the braziers, waving it in the air like it was a torch for a moment before setting it down lightly.

Above them Jon groaned, covering his face with both hands. "This will not be fun." he said aloud.

Daryn chuckled looking nervous. "Where's your sense of adventure Jon?"

"Down there on the flat, solid, ground." Jon replied growling angrily.

"Then I think we should go look for it, shouldn't we?" Roger quipped, tying the rope around himself before leaning out over the edge and quickly rappelling down, a silent Hathan beside him. They had to drop the last few feet, but that was easy enough. Hathan also took the trip down easily enough, showing he was closer to fully healed than his nurse had feared.

"I don't want to do this..." Jon groaned, tying the rope around Edric, after watching the fire below move again. He turned, staring into Ghost's eyes, who after a moment turned racing down the trails to get the mountain clans moving.

Dacey shrugged from where she was standing beside him. "I don't particularly want to do is either, but you know they'll need us in there."

"True." Smalljon grumbled, tying the rope around him. He looked over the side blanching a little then shook his head. "If Ranma ever thinks of something like this again I think I'm going to have to try to kill him." With that he and Edric turned then began to rappel downwards, the strongest of the wolfsworn aiding the young boy who had come so far with them.

Twice he had to help Edric when his grip on the rope slipped, and he hung there in midair for a few moments, but with Smalljon's aid he was eventually brought down to the top of the keep. There Arya greeted him, pulling his somewhat taller body against her own as she worked to release him from the rope around his waist. "Have a nice trip?"

Feeling greatly daring after the last few terrifying moments Edric replied by leaning in to kiss Arya on the cheek. "The end of the journey was much better than the rest of it."

Though no one could see in the dark Arya flushed brightly before pushing him away, huffing irritably. Nearby Ranma shook his head with a faint smile as he once again picked up the brazier and waved it through the wind and rain.

Above them, Dacey and Jon looked at one another then sighed and followed.

Jon actually closed his eyes as he began to rappel down the rope, not opening them again until he felt the rope around his waist go taut. Then he opened them, reaching down to untie himself with a very firm grip on the rope before staring down at the two feet he had to drop to the roof of the keep. With relief he fell to the ground below, kneeling quickly and kissing the stone of the roof, before glaring at his sister siblings. "If either of you think of something like that again, I swear to the old gods I will kill you in your sleep."

"Harsh." Ranma muttered, shrugging his shoulders. "Shall we go my friends?"

With a heavy mace in one hand and a long dirk in the other Ranma led the way over to the steps leading down into the keep. They passed the first two floors down without incident, though but they ran into problems when the door on the third floor opened, and several dozen guards stepped out turning to head up the stairs. They took one look at the approaching Wolfsworn and began to shout "Alarm, alarm! Invaders inside the keep!"

Ranma raced forward, his mace flashing out to catch one man in the center of the chest and flinging his body backwards with a shattered chest plate and ribs before his dirk took another man in the shoulder. his kick brought that man down with a shattered kneecap, allowing Ranma to turn quickly bringing the mace around to smash into his head with bone splattering force.

The last guard however had turned and run, closing the door behind him. Ranma slammed that door the door open with a single blow from his mace, shaking his head angrily as he began to hear the noises of men shouting and women screaming deeper into the keep. "That's torn it! Jon, take Dacey, Daryn and Hathan down, open the gates! Roger, Hathan, Smalljon, Arya and Edric with me."

With Arya by his side Ranma made his way down the corridor on this floor, running into several dozen more guards as they barreled out of their rooms. Ranma had guessed this might be the barracks level since some of the men had been heading up to the roof from this level and that seemed to be correct considering the armymen coming out of nearly every door.

Most of the men facing them weren't armored, having been roused from sleep instantly grabbing up weapons. Many of them hesitated at the sight of the well-armed and very well armored men (and girl) moving towards them.

Arya jumped up, flipping herself in the air to kick off the ceiling of the corridor to land in amongst the men who had gaped up at her in shock only one of them able to raise his blade. Fang batted that blade aside and her free hand chopped out, catching that man across the nose shattering it before she used his head as a springboard, flipping herself around and lashing out with leg, foot and Fang to all sides.

Ranma also leapt forward, crossing the distance between him and the men facing them before they could turn to engage Arya, smashing into them with his mace and Dirk both flashing out slaying where they had. Edric howled behind him the motto of his family, "Thunder in the dark!" Then he raced forward, cutting and hacking at the men in the corridor to guard Arya's back, showing a skill and strength that even Beric would have been surprised by.

Behind them acting Roger and Hathan checked the doorways as they went. This guarded the three attacker's back, and the two of them knocked out or killed several guards who had apparently been given separate quarters. The female maids screaming their heads off gave the clue as to why. Hathan shook his head, "Don't worry!" he shouted trying to reassure them over the clangor of battle. "No harm shall come to you." He was not believed.

Hathán had Roger exchanged a glance after the first one, conveying the fact that they might well have just killed someone's husband, which was always a possibility of course, but hadn't yet been so bluntly shown to them before this. Yet there was nothing they could do about it now.

Arya and Ranma however had found the two barracks rooms on this level and were now each standing in the doorway holding them against the men inside. More than one man saw Ranma standing there in the doorways and quailed, not picking up their weapons instead layingback on their bunks with their hands visible on their chests.

However Arya did not get that response and several men came at her quickly, misjudging her dangerousness because of her size and apparent age. Those men died, and the ease with which Arya dispatched them convinced some of the others not to fight. By which time Edric had joined her in the doorway, the two of them able to fit in it easily.

Despite half of them choosing self-preservation however, the rest of the men in the barracks charged the people who had somehow made it to their barracks. For a few moments it was all Ranma, Arya, and Edric could do to hold the doors until Roger and Hathan could come up and help them. With the Five of them holding the two doorways on either side of the corridor the many inside couldn't get out and couldn't use their numbers to good effect.

Down below Jon and his group ran into their own difficulties. Thankfully since it was the middle of the night most of the servants were still in bed, and like servants everywhere when they heard the sound of battle they stayed put rather than running around until they figured out what was going on.

But they ran into problem the first floor. Here, forty-five men were stationed to guard the gate room. Worse, these men had had time to pull on armor before Jon and his group hit them. They tried to barricade the doors, but that failed when Dacey and Smalljon began to hack at it with their greatswords.

Dacey hissed as her shoulder took a hit from someone thrusting a spear through a rip in the door she had just made. The spear point smashed into her shoulder, then another hit caught her in the helmet, making her head ring for a moment. But the two of them had done their job, hacking the doorway into pieces, and now she fell back, letting the others go past her.

Jon raced in howling "Winter is coming!" His twin swords flashed, blocking five swords from finding his chest and head, then he pushing back at their owners, clearing the doorway for the others behind him. One leg lashed out, catching a man in the calf sending him falling to the ground with a scream of pain, while his blades flashed, battering and blocking.

Smalljon and Daryn hastened in after him, engaging the man all around Jon quickly. This allowed him to concentrate on three of them, hacking two down quickly before dueling with the final one as dozens more of them came up from behind, pushing in but mostly getting in one another's way thanks to the close confines of the gate room.

Dacey dropped her great sword, pulling out a small dirk and raced in after the others. The fighting in the gatehouse was close and heavy, where Jon's short swords proved deadly to the men facing them with longswords or worse spears. And the training, speed and toughness of the Wolfsworn saw them through.

The final man went down, and Jon gestured at Smalljon to the portcullis' wheel. "Get that open." he ordered. With that he opened the small door that was the only entrance to the actual keep from the pass between the two massive doors that led through the passage.

OOOOOO

Brynden and Beric had pushed their men hard to catch up with the Wolfsworn, leaving several dozen men behind who couldn't keep up with the pace even on horseback. Their horses had been added to the rest, allowing more remounts and allowing them to keep up a decent pace though they never came close to catching up with Ranma and the others.

At Wayfarer's Rest, the force split. Beric was left there with the majority of the men, while Brynden marched on with seven hundred men of House Tully, archers and infantry. Several days later, they met up with the mountain clansmen just out of sight of the Golden Tooth.

Being told what was being planned by the mountain clan's leader, who Ranma had told his plans too, Brynden shook his head amused. "Audacity has a new name, and it is Stark." He quipped. "Who would have ever thought that?"

Muldan laughed. "The Starks always fall on their enemies, this one just be going about it differently."

The mountain clansmen had sent forward several scouts to keep an eye on the keep in the dark, hidden it only as they could be from anyone looking for invaders from the wall. It was several hours past midnight when one of them came back to report. "The guards be gone, I think we best be moving."

By the time the doors were actually opened, Brynden and the rest of the attackers were almost to the doorway, and feeling very nervous about things. When it opened Brynden breathed a sigh of relief, and led the charge inside.

OOOOOO

Ranma stared out over the battlements, his hands methodically cleaning the dirk he had used in this battle, while next to him Fenris lay, irritated that he and his sibling had not taken part in the battle. The Golden Tooth was theirs, and the Riverlands were at last secure from further incursion from the Westerlands.

Fenris moved next to him then huffed as Nymeria lay her head down on his flank. Ranma turned to look at Arya, Brynden and Eddric, who were leading a somewhat richly dressed youngish woman towards where he sat on the edge of the parapets. She was a striking rather than beautiful woman, with sharp black eyes that spoke of intelligence, a nose that looked somewhat like Jason or Patrek's, long black hair hanging loosely down her back, and a frown on her face.

"Lady Alysanne." Ranma said, nodding her head. Alysanne Lefford was the only child of Lord Lefford, who had died in the campaign in the Riverlands. She had ordered her men to surrender the moment she realized that her keep's gateway had fallen, saving a lot of bloodshed. "I suppose it's obvious by this point, but I'm afraid you are now our prisoner. And regardless of anything else, your keep will be held in House Tully hands from here on, joining the Riverlands rather than remaining part of the Westerlands.

"Since you not only took my castle but apparently killed my old man I have no issue with that." Alysanne replied bluntly. She sneered a little at the mention of her father. "Let's just say he and I did not get along, and considering how disastrous being loyal to House Lannister has apparently proven, I have no issue with my House joining that of the Riverlands."

"There's a story there. Care to share it?" Ranma said cocking his head to one side, not commenting on her assumption that her house would remain intact. Her clear thinking had saved dozens of lives on both sides, and she obviously hadn't agreed with her father's decision to back House Lannister in this war. That could mean she might just be too good an asset to simply set aside.

"Well, I've always fancied knives for one thing, and horseback riding, never was really a proper lady as he saw it. He also was holding back my hand in marriage until Daven Lannister suddenly realized he needed a wife." She scowled angrily. "Several young men have come seeking my hand, and even a few I would have been happy to marry, but none of them matched my father's standards."

But she wasn't looking at Ranma, instead she was looking at Arya. No, not Arya, Brynden. Ranma noticed that Brynden was looking at the young lady with some interest, and the girl was actually responding looking at him equally interestedly, and Ranma suddenly had to hide a smile as a thought occurred to him. It might not be a love match, he thought to himself, but I don't think either of them are going to be unhappy with that idea.

Over the next few days Ranma and the others consolidated their control of the Golden Tooth, as well as emptying the keep of half its coffers. Several dozen pack mules worth of gold were taken, and began to make their way back to the Riverlands under guard.

While it was quicker than he would have liked, Ranma ordered Brynden and the lady to marry within a few days of the conquest of the keep. This served two major needs, tying the Golden Tooth and the House to the Riverlands in as certain a way as possible. And it settled down the locals' fears that the Riverlanders would force them all out and install another family in House Lefford's place. Despite what anyone had thought, House Lefford was looked on favorably by the locals, and doing so would have had major repercussions.

The septon of the keep at first refused to marry them, saying that marrying a woman under duress like that was wrong. However the lady herself took the man aside, and after a few minutes had convinced him that she was not exactly against this marriage. In fact over the past few days she and Brynden had been seen walking the keep together, laughing quietly to one another.

This had an effect on the armsmen they had taken prisoner, and every one of them had given their parole and was released. After that they began to head out with parties of House Tully. The workers of the local gold mines, the mines that had made House Lannister the danger it was, saw this and actually aided the patrols in bringing up even more gold, which was quickly shipped off back to the Golden Tooth. There it would be smelted into coins before sent under heavy guard back to Riverrun.

When Ranma asked if he was in love with Alysanne, Brynden shrugged. "Not yet, but I can see it happening easily enough. She's quite intelligent, well read, and outgoing, all of the things I like in a woman. She actually reminds me somewhat of Tyene Sand, though much more innocent in matters of the flesh. One of those that have quite a lot of anecdotal information but no actual experience." He smirked a little. "I look forward to correcting that disparity."

Ranma laughed, and left it at that.

Leaving Brynden the mountain clan forces along with the men of House Tully that had made the journey to the Golden Tooth, Ranma and the rest of the Wolfsworn left the Golden Tooth after lunch the next day. This was caused by Ranma needing to send the messages out via raven, and the rest needing a break. Thankfully thanks to its strategic position, House Lefford had ravens trained to all the houses he and Daenerys wanted to send messages to, not just Casterly Rock.

Ranma hoped that the diplomatic moves he and Daenerys had thought up would keep that land from attempting to make war against them again. In the long term the Lannisters might have to be dealt with further, but for now Ranma could turn his attention to the two Baratheon brothers, or whoever won the contest between them at any rate.

With the messages sent winging their way out through the Westerlands Ranma led the Wolfsworn back down the pass to Wayfarer's Rest, where they met up with Beric and his men. From there the combined force moved down to the Mummer's Ford, crossing it quickly. Though not as quickly as they had been moving which was Edric, Hathan and Roger were extremely thankful for.

Beric and his forces numbered around 2,000 men made up from Houses Tully, Grell and Paege added to the Brothers Without Borders, and they picked up another seven hundred from House Piper. Their force would grow further when they joined up with the force that had marched overland from Raventree Hall to interdict House Keath, another 580 man.

This, and the anti-bandit force under Ser Blanetree still left Ranma the better part of 20,000 men, with a force of 6000 stationed around Harrentown and the rest up by Harroway. As he moved along at the front of the column Ranma chuckled evilly as he contemplated the numbers especially in relation to the force the North had started with.

Disease thanks to Merry and his own knowledge had not been an issue at all, something which would have amazed any other army in the history of this planet. And in battle, the northern forces had taken around 4,800 losses in the campaign against the Westerners.

The additions they had since gained since destroying the Westerlands army more than made up for it before House Tully, Wayn, Dary and the others joined (or were forced to join) them. Even better the pike regiments were almost entirely intact, their losses made good by the pikemen of House Manderly.

However such thoughts couldn't stay in his mind. Now marching through the Riverlands with nothing to really concentrate on Ranma's mind went back to the warning he had gotten back first in Raventree Hall, then again in the godwood in Riverrun. That the Old Gods needed to speak to him, but couldn't use a single weirwood tree to do it was worrisome. It meant they had something big they wanted to impart to them, and he badly needed to make time to head to the Isle of Faces to hear it. Need to make time to do that on my run up to Harroway I suppose, or after.

Five days of hard marching from Mummer's Ford brought them close enough to House Keath land that they began to see scouts from the force sent down here from Raventree Hall. They were quickly informed that the force that kept out of sight of House Keath, not wanting to warn the holdfast that it would be under attack soon.

"Excellent Job!" Ranma said clapping hands with the man that Lord Blackwood had sent down here, a knight sworn to his house by the name of Franklin. He was an older man, but still hale and hearty, and though he was missing one hand having lost it in the Rebellion, there was nothing wrong with his mind. "What is the holdfast like?"

"Small my Lord, decently made but small. It lies almost directly on the head of the Blackwater, you can hear the sound of the falls before you can see the actual keep. It's defenders appear to be very cautious, my men've been forced to dodge several patrols they sent out." He smirked. "Somehow I don't think they'll be anticipating the amount of trouble they're going to get."

"Too true." Jon said shaking his head sadly. "By the old gods why didn't they just bend the knee? With the death of their Lord in battle, and destruction of their forces at Raventree Hall we would have left them alone if they had just sent a representative."

Coming up behind them, Beric shrugged. "There's been a rumor for years that House Keath had economic ties to House Baratheon of King's Landing, and I know that they kept an apartment in the city, Jon. Perhaps their ties to House Lannister went beyond that or what came out in this war already."

"Doesn't matter," Ranma said with a sigh, then looking at the Blackwood knight keenly. "Franklin, did you see what else I hoped might be here?"

"Yes my Lord, they'd built several barges, in fact work is still going on them for some reason."

"Excellent, that will make your trip shorter Jon."

Jon frowned. They had talked about this several times already, but he still didn't like the idea of being sent further south. Still, he had to admit it somewhat made sense. "If I have to deal with the Viper, will there be any limitations on what I do? I don't want politics to decide what I can and can't do to him."

"No torture but other than that you'll have leave to do with him and his army as you see fit." Ranma said with a nod. "I think that the Dornish have shown themselves to have no understanding of honor or decency in this war. Hell if you can, I want his army wiped out, not just defeated, but utterly destroyed. If it comes to it, I'll be doing the same to Viserys and any force they sent with him. With those losses, Dorne will have lost any ability to influence the rest of Westeros. And we'll be able to deal with them later whenever we wish."

He leaned forward, whispering his next words. "We can't do anything permanent about Dorne, it would take too long and you and I both know we've got other enemies we'll need to deal with. Something is telling me that we need to hurry this campaign up and head north again as soon as possible Jon. Whatever you do, do it fast and do it well."

Jon nodded "I will. Now, what about House Keath?"

Ranma smirked. "If they don't know we're here yet, I think we need to take advantage of that."

Later that same night Jon, Ranma, Aria and their direwolves slunk afford, moving across the open ground around House Keath's keep. The forest had been sharply cut back in recent times, allowing the archers on top of the keep a far better line of sight, and there was no natural cover anywhere.

Yet even so they moved as silently and as quickly as possible across the open land, pausing occasionally when they saw one of the silhouettes on top of the keep turning in their direction. There were a few braziers up there, set behind the palisade on the roof of the keep, so as to not take away any of the watchers night visions. But there weren't enough of them to cover all of the area around the keep constantly.

Soon the trio of humans were close by the outer gate of the keep, which was a heavy iron portcullis backed by another heavy gate of wood. At night of course both were closed, but that didn't matter to their current mission.

While her brothers went to work below Arya climbed up the gate, tying several large wineskins to it, though only a few of them actually contained wine. Most of them contained flour, very recently shaken flour dust. Following Ranma's instructions Arya shook several of them as she was hanging them. Ranma had simply said that they were more important than the wineskins to their plan, but she didn't understand why.

Jon and Ranma did the same, tying their own wineskins into place then moving along the wall quickly while Arya jumped down from below landing silently in the grass. She moved up to her older brother whispering. "Are you sure this is going to work? Why flour?"

"Not flour." Ranma said smiling thinly. "Flower dust in the air of the wineskins."

With that he pulled a short bow he had grabbed from one of his men off his back, motioning to Jon who handed him a fire arrow. The three of them waited until the sounds of the guards on duty above them seems to reseed, then Arya lit the arrow from a piece of flint and tender that she had kept with her. She and Jon leaned against the wall as Ranma raced forward a little bit away from it.

Someone up on the top of the keep was awake, and shouted "Light there!"

But it was too late. Ranma pulled back his bow, letting fly at one of the wineskins that he could see hanging from the portcullis.

"KRAKOOM!" There was a tremendous boom as the fire arrow penetrated the wineskins he had aimed for, which was one of the ones with powdered flour dust in it. The explosion was massive, and it was an explosion not just a sudden conflagration. It ripped the wooden gate into pieces, sending those pieces further into the keep while it smashed the metal of the portcullis as well, though it didn't actually knock it out of its runs entirely.

While screams and cries abounded Ranma saw that and cursed, nodding to Jon. "Grapnels, now!"

Jon raced forward with Ranma and the two of them stood in front of the gate while the keep guards were roused rushing to their stations. Arrows began to land around them but Arya stood in front of them, blocking the ones she could see in the night with a shield while her two brothers through grapnels into the portcullis. Waiting until they clanged into place the two of them then began to heave.

Elsewhere Smalljon, Roger and Hathan all looked at one another. "I think that was the signal don't you?" Roger quipped.

Hathan grunted in response, couching his lands and moving forward, shouting his new war cry. He hadn't yet decided what the words of his new family should be just yet. "Shieldarm, Shieldarm for the king!"

All around them there was the bellow of the rest of the army units around here. "For the king!" Then the men of the North and the Riverlands charged towards house Keath through the night breaking out into the open area around the keep quickly.

Jon and Ranma heard them coming and redoubled their efforts, Ranma gripping the rope and heaved so hard that the portcullis came screeching out of its runs in the stone of the gate, skittering across the ground towards them. The rushing Northern and Riverlands men raced past them, slamming into the keep.

An hour later the battle was over. The Lord of the House, a sallow faced youth who reminded Ranma strongly of Joffrey in everything but looks, had died in the battle. His mother was captured, while most of remaining armymen of the house killed in the battle were executed after.

Ranma was grim as he ordered that staring hard into the woman's eyes. "You had a choice, you could've bent to the knee to me, and I would not have asked anything of your House given its losses already. Instead you didn't send a single messenger when called to Riverrun, defying not only me but my grandfather, who was your Lord Paramount at the time. That's treason lady, and your house will answer for it."

That very evening the lady of the House was sent to the Stony Sept, which had a small septa of the Silent Sisters, who would take her in. The House would be turned over to Franklin for now, which might be made permanent in the future. "After all," Ranma said the next day to Franklin, who was staring at him in astonishment. "There's a nearby town, and I think that a knight holding that in the name of the crown and another holding this keep would be a good idea.

There was no rest for the army however. The next morning the portion of the army that was heading south began to pack the barges. The barges that had been prepared for the Westerlands Army's arrival was barely enough to contain the men being sent to the South, but it was enough.

Ranma left that aspect in Jon and Beric's hand, while he personally questioned some of the servants, as well as a few of the smallfolk in the area as to rumors about what was going on further south in particular along the Westerlands border, and at King's Landing.

In this manner he learned that Stannis had won the battle at King's Landing and that something had happened in King's Landing, though the locals didn't know what. The last servant was walking away from where Ranma was standing by the Blackwater's edge when Arya walked up to them. "I'm going south too." She said bluntly.

Ranma looked at her in shock. "Um, what? I'd thought you'd want to stay with us and see what you could do against some of the Shadow Warriors we're bound to face. What brought this on?"

Arya blushed, looking away from him for a moment and Ranma followed her gaze. Nearby Eddard was helping some of the horses onto a few of the barges while bellowing orders to a few of the other men in a voice that a young boy of his age should never been able to use. Ranma had to admit that the boy's experiences meant he was no boy really, even if in comparison to the Wolfsworn he still had a long way to go.

"I see." He laughed. "You're going along to, what, protect your investment? Should I send a raven to our mother?"

Arya smacked him on the arm blushing hotly but not actually saying anything.

"I suppose you can go along, so long as you promise not to make me an uncle anytime soon." Ranma laughed again, enfolding Arya in a brief hug before moving out of punching range quickly.

Seeing his sister's expression he raced off, with her chasing him angrily, Nymeria joining in the chase quickly while the army looked on a bit bemused at the play of the royal house. "I'll, I'll uncle you, you, you cowardly wolf, you lizard lover, you rarrg!"

Nonetheless later that same day while the sky once again opened up above them Beric, Jon, Arya Eddard and their men began to move down the Blackwater. Ranma stared after them for a moment, before turning to the remaining Wolfsworn and smiled thinly. "Let us run my brothers." He said, deliberately using the same words he'd used back at Riverrun.

They all groaned aloud but even Hathan and Roger simply nodded, turning their horses and leading their re-mounts through the rain while Ranma sped off with Fenris beside him.

OOOOOO

At the same time that Ranma was leading the assault on the Golden Tooth, Daenerys was leading the remainder of the army east along the River Road back towards Harroway to join the rest of it. It was an uneventful journey, despite the fact that every evening as the army set up camp Daenerys began to train her two dragons in carrying her. It was a slow process, but both of them were taking to it as well as could be expected though in very different ways.

Rhaegon could easily bear her weight for longer than Sunfyre, and the one day she decided to test his endurance he had been able to fly the entire day following the army with Daenerys on his back. But he wasn't quick to pick up the verbal commands, or what her shifting her body could mean. Sunfyre didn't have his brother's size and endurance, but picked up everything else far quicker.

"It's a tossup." Daenerys said to Myrcella one evening as the two of them lay in the cot they shared in their tent. With Ranna not there, neither woman felt comfortable with doing anything other than sharing a few occasional kisses. Myrcella wanted her first time going further than that to be with Ranna even if Daenerys was there watching or participating which Daenerys fully understood.

Cuddling however was something both girls enjoyed. "I think that Rhaegon would be ready to carry me into battle faster, but I don't know if I would trust him in battle as much as I would Sunfyre. Whereas Sunfyre will take longer to actually build up the endurance to carry me for long periods of time, but I think the two of us would work better in battle."

"I think that Rhaegon can look after himself with only a few mental commands." Myrcella said thoughtfully so used to the warging ability of the Northerners and Queen that she didn't even bat an eyebrow at it these days. "Sunfyre doesn't seem to have as much as an aggressive streak however."

"True." Daenerys replied with a nod. "Still I want them both trained to the saddle and to a rider. The best mental commands can't really substitute for a rider in the saddle. As fast as I can think, I can't react to something I see on the ground as fast as I would if I saw it from the saddle, you see."

Myrcella nodded, but didn't have any other advice to give.

Later the next day they came within sight of Harroway, or rather the army camp that was built around the town in various clumps. Their arrival was greeted by several horn blows and Greatjon and Rickard coming forward to meet her. "Your Majesty." Rickard bowed formally, while Greatjon moved over to envelop the short girl in a hug, purposefully getting both her and Myrcella in his arms where then sat in their saddle.

"My Lords." Daenerys were replied as Greatjon released them, smirking up into his face for moment and pushing him back slightly. "Anything to report?"

"A lot actually." Rickard said smiling thinly. "First, Lord Mooton and Lord Butterwell have passed through, heading back to their town and castle saying they'll meet us here after they raise the rest of their men." He sneered, showing his contempt for both men. "Frankly I think that's the last we'll see of them until after the war is over. There also seems to be a small force or two small forces moving down in the Crownlands near the border. We sent scouts that way to see what was going on but they haven't reported back yet."

"Jason sent word that he arrived at Harrenhal, and the portion of the army there is ready for battle." Greatjon said, moving his horse alongside the queen's on the other side from Rickard as they moved through the camp towards the town. He frowned then, shaking his head and pulling at his beard. There is some news from further south that have all the merchants in the town in a twitter, Domic's trying to verify it along with Alayaya right now. It just arrived with the latest merchants from further south, so I don't know what it is yet."

"That doesn't sound good." Daenerys thought to herself shaking her head. "Still, we should know what's going on regardless of whether it's good news or not."

"There's also a group of Seven worshipers here to see you, your Majesty." Rickard said scowling a little. He had no truck with the soft southern religion, finding it too easy to corrupt, and frankly too limited for his tastes. The Old Gods, for all the harshness of the North, seemed more compassionate than the Seven, yet also harsher and harder when he came to things like oaths. If the Seven worshippers believed in oaths and honor as much as the Northerners, none of them would've had to come south in the first place.

"Are they led by an old man who looks as if he was hewn out of a tree?" Daenerys asked thoughtfully.

"Aye," said Greatjon nodding his head. "I'll tell you plain, I don't like much of the Seven, all that stupidity of worshipping in a man-made place, and the idea of the Seven itself always makes me laugh. Yet that man, he's hard. He could've come from the North hard as he is."

From Greatjon that was a great complement, Daenerys thought amused. "I'll meet with them in Harroway's keep. Before that though, give Jaryd Waterman enough horses and men to see him to Crackclaw Point. Ranma and I have a message that he is going to deliver to the houses there for us."

"You expect them to offer any aid?" said Rickard doubtfully. "Those houses aren't very strong, are they?"

"No, but supplies, food, weapons and arrows would be a help. Besides, in comparison to the rest of the Crownlands, those houses weren't as badly hammered in the Rebellion despite being loyal to my house to the last. Their combined strength might add around 3000 man to our forces which is nothing to be sneezed at."

"Speaking of supplies," Rickard said changing the subject. "Supplies have arrived from further north, more weapons, carts pieces for repairing armor, and something from Seagard as well: three shipments of those odd spears that Ranma ordered from the smiths there. I tried a few, and it took me a while to figure out what he intended with them." He smirked evilly. "Those are going to come as a big surprise to any infantry or cavalry force that runs into them."

"I'll take your word for it my Lord, since off the top of my head I can't remember anything about them." Daenerys replied with a shrug. "Tell me about the other supplies here, will the army be ready to march, and how is morale? Oh, and before I forget have the local fishermen prepare enough crabs for my little ones. Both of them have been looking forward to those ever since they realized we were coming back here."

OOOOOO

Later that day, Ser Barristan frowned heavily as he stared at the seven septons in front of him. One of them was carrying what was undoubtedly a sword under some kind of cloth. "Your highness stay back." he said coldly, moving forward and loosening his sword in its sheath.

"My knight, I doubt that this is an assassination attempt." Daenerys smiled, affectionately laying a hand on his shoulder. "Nor do I think that the Faithful have any reason to do so to me. Is not that correct Septon Sparrow?"

Septon Sparrow smiled slightly, bowing at his head deeply to Queen. "That is indeed correct your Majesty. It has been decided through debate among the septons of the Seven that given some of the signs and portents that we have seen your own actions and the actions of your husband the King, it is the duty of every right thinking Faithful to proclaim you and Ranma King and Queen of Westeros."

The words were simple the impact behind them was not. Even the Northerners behind Daenerys gaped at that, while Lord Ryger and the other Seven worshipers among the Riverlords gaped in astonishment. Such an endorsement at such a time as this was a massive boon for the legitimacy of Ranma and Daenerys's campaign further on.

It wouldn't matter so much to the military side of things. But after they won those battles they would have a much easier time convincing the smallfolk and the various lords who had not taken part in the war of their legitimacy.

"These brothers with me all represent different orders among the Faithful my lady, and we have come to bow to you. You may consider us the new Council of the Most Devout. For all intents and purposes King's Landing it is no longer a part of the equation, and the High Septon is not as well."

Daenerys leaned back in the chair she was sitting in, tapping her fingers together thoughtfully for a moment in her lap. "And who might I ask will be elected to be the new High Septon?"

Now the seven men in front of her exchanged glances. "We do not know as yet your Majesty." Said one of them stepping forward and bowing deeper than Septon Sparrow had. "To be perfectly blunt, the position of High Septon seems to carry with it an odor of corruption regardless of the purity of the man's faith who takes the office. We are in the process of trying to come up with another method of internal organization. Various signs have pointed to the need of this of late."

"Signs? You mean miracles don't you? There are certain rumors about the 'Stand of the Rose at Oldflowers' that piqued my interest." Daenerys asked.

The seven men in front of her looked at one another then nodded as one and Sparrow spoke again. "Such as that, yes. Miracles are occurring in groups of seven to aid the Faithful down in the Reach, not just the Lady Margaery but elsewhere. Though we only have confirmed a few such miracles. Other signs are more worrisome. Some of our brothers have fallen ill, ranting and raving about winter, winter not as a season, but as something stalking the land, rising in the far... north..."

He trailed off as Daenerys swiftly turned to the Northerners and Tytos the only Riverlords there who had been informed of what might be occurring beyond the Wall. Jason had learned of it long since, but he wasn't there. They all looked back at her in but it was Greatjon who spoke up. "If the Seven have begun to warn their worshippers about it my lady, we should take it seriously."

"My husband had already declared that he wouldn't want to spend more than four more months dealing with our human enemies my Lord." Daenerys replied gravely. "Even so, we will discuss this when he arrives." She turned back to the seven worshippers who were looking at the Northerners in shocked speculation. "Is there anything else you can tell us?"

"Not tell you my lady, but there is one thing we wish to give you." Said Sparrow gesturing to the man who held a covered blade in his hands. "This is brother Maccabee, leader of the Silent Brothers. He has something of your family that was left in his order's keeping during the Dance of the Dragons."

Daenerys's breath caught in her throat and she leaned forward eagerly as the man stepped forward under Ser Barristan's still watchful gaze, slowly peeling away the cloth covering the sword he held. The blade thus shown was of Valyrian steel, anyone could have told that by the wavy lines in it, but it was the hilt and the shape of the blade that told Daenerys what it was. "Dark Sister!" she said reaching forward and taking the hilt.

The man backed away as she did, and Daenerys stood up, gesturing with her free hand for Ser Barristan to give her some space. Though she hadn't trained with them often, she had trained with the Wolfsworn on and off throughout this war and she was no stranger to a sword. She moved into one of the exercises that Ranma had taught her, the blade whistling in the air as her eyes lit up in delight.

It was several moments before she came back to herself, to the murmured appreciation of the watchers who had never seen her train before this. "A magnificent gift gentle Sers, one I will treasure."

It was also yet another sign of the legitimacy of her own personal claim over her brother's. Two dragons, Dark Sister, a marriage to a powerful house, the Seven's backing and the Riverlands along with the North behind me. Maybe just maybe with all of that I'll be able to talk my brother out of any stupidity. Or at least his Dornish backers.

She looked at Sparrow speculatively. "My husband and I have talked about the Grand Council that we wish to put together after the war ends. We want a permanent resident of the Seven on it. Would you recommend someone to fulfill that role Septon Sparrow, and to stay with the army now?" Given the large number of Riverlands men we've recently added, I feel certain that the addition of a septon to our ranks will not go amiss."

Sparrow nodded his head gravely. "We will discuss this a little together your Majesty and one of us will indeed join you. Thank you, having a voice on the actual council of the King will be a major step in the correct direction."

Just then Domic burst in, causing Ser Barristan to whirl towards the doorway, his sword out and ready before Domic got two steps in. "Your highness," he said gasping in air. Then he looked around, only now noticing Daenerys wasn't alone or the blade Barristan held ready in his hand. "Your pardon Lords and ladies, but some news has reached my ears, and I have just confirmed it. Things that we need to know now and things that will affect all of Westeros in the future."

"Began with what we need to know now Domic." said Daenerys calmly, gesturing towards Rickard who was sitting nearest a table set with wine. He quickly poured the bard a glass, and watched as he gulped it down quickly. "What is so important that you rush in like this?" With one hand she gestured the septons out of the room, though making a signal for one of them to stay just in case.

The seven older men all looked at one another. Then in some kind of communication Daenerys couldn't follow six of them moved towards the door, leaving one man who hadn't spoken up yet, a thin, middle-aged fellow who looks more like a hunter than a septon, behind.

Domic finished his drink and put the cup down, his hands visibly shaking. "First, I was finally able to find one of our scouts who had spotted the banners of one of the forces moving around down near the Crownlands border. Serret, and House Lannister banners are flying above one of them. For some reason the Serret banner is larger than the one Lannister banner that the scout saw, I don't have any idea why that is, but it doesn't matter really. That force is now making directly towards Harrenhal I think judging by the direction the scout reported them going."

"How many men did the scout report?" Greatjon asked leaned forward intently.

"I don't know my lord, the man can't count, though he says perhaps the size of the men from House Wayn, so a little above or below two thousand."

Daenerys frowned. "Send one of the pike regiments down to join the forces already gathered at Harrentown. With them as aid, that small force won't be able to break through the cordon around the castle, even if those in Harrenhal try to sortie."

"An excellent idea." Rickard said, showing approval for the queen's quick decision in a nod. "I'd send the Regiment from Cerwyn, but who should command it?"

"Timot." Daenerys replied quickly. "He did an excellent job here before Patrek arrived, and with Patrek here his presence is no longer necessary to continue with the Army's resupply. He will serve Jason well down there."

There was a murmur of approval from that from the Northerners, though Lord Ryger looked irritated at his and his sons not having been considered.

"There is something else about the force my lady, the scout I talked to got close enough to see what they were wearing. He saw several men in white enameled armor, and several people who could only have been Lannisters. I think coupled with what else I have to report, that these men are all that remains of the Lannister force from King's Landing. I don't know how they broke out, but I think they made a run for it from the plague and from the cordon."

"Then it makes it all the more important my lords that we set out down south as soon as possible. Send for some messengers, I'll want the army ready to march tomorrow morning early."

Ser Barristan moved towards the door, opening it and bellowing outside for pages to be gathered. Doing so he nearly deafened young Cley who was waiting by the doorway for just that order. He clapped the younger man apologetically on the shoulder, turning back inside as Domicer continued.

The Bard gulped a little, seeming ill at ease with what he was about to say. "My lords and ladies, the other bits and pieces of news that has so agitated the merchants here has also, I have to say been confirmed. Too many mouths are saying the same thing for it to be a lie. Though I desperately wish it was so."

"Just tell us my friend." Daenerys said reaching out and taking one of his hands in hers, squeezing it hard.

Domicer nodded squeezing back. "Your brother has arrived, my lady." Daenerys sat up abruptly, gripping his hand so hard he winced but went on quickly. "House Targaryen banners were seen flying from war galleys that sacked and burned several dozen royal galleys that Stannis had left there crewless. There were also reports that he took Dragonstone, though those are unconfirmed. He hasn't landed yet, but there is no doubt he will within the next month or so."

No one spoke after Domicer finished speaking, everyone else watching Daenerys for her response. She closed her eyes briefly, sighing long and loud before opening them, pinning the bard in place. "That is not all you have to share with us Domicer, spit it out."

Domicer gulped, licking his lips for a moment, not in fear at anyone's response, but perhaps fear of what he had to say. "Your Majesty, King's Landing is, is gone. The Red Witch that Stannis employed, she did something, created this massive fire that could be seen for dozens of leagues around! King's Landing is just, just gone, along with everyone who was still alive within its walls."

For a moment it simply didn't sink in, then Daenerys was on her feet shouting angrily along with all of the others clamoring saying it couldn't be so. Such a disaster in particular deliberately caused was impossible to contemplate!

Yet eventually the shouts ended, and Domicer went on. "All of the merchants who deal with Duskenale are saying it, smallfolk have been flooding into the city from further along the coast claiming to have seen the fire for leagues, green and red soaring high up into the sky. I don't know what the damage to the actual city might've been, but no one could have survived such a conflagration."

He sighed sadly. "That's why Alayaya isn't here. She's sobbing in her quarters, her mother and friends and everyone else she knew are gone."

To one side where she had been standing silently Myrcella began to cry softly. While she wouldn't have minded if Joffrey had died in such a manner, and she was happy to hear that her mother at least might have escaped, she doubted that the tutors she had known, the few friends among the children of courtiers, had been brought along in the breakout. That meant that they were all surely dead, and that hurt.

"Why!?" said Tristan his hands clenching and unclenching. "Why would anyone do that?"

Daenerys shook her head. "Plague. Remember my lords, we were told that there was plague in King's Landing. Stannis must not have wanted to devote the time and men to keep it boxed in, and so hit upon this solution. It's disgusting and abhorrent, but it does make a ruthless kind of sense."

She stood up, her grip on Dark Sister's hilt making her knuckles go white. "But it is not an honorable one! If he had kept forces in place, we would not have attacked them, we would in fact have supplied them with food if need be, or aid in defending the cordon! To do this, to do this not because it was the only solution, but because it was the most expedient one! It is yet another affront to all that is good and honorable to lay at Stannis's feet my lords, and his time of recompense is coming!"

OOOOOO

The day after she received Dark Sister, Daenerys and the army began to march south, while messengers went out before them down towards the portion of the army under Jason that was sitting outside Harrenhal. Even with the new forces from the Riverlands with them the army made good enough time that they were encamped around Darry once more that evening.

Of course, Lord Darry offered Daenerys and her lords rooms in his castle. Daenerys told him she would not be accepting that offer since the men of the army outside could not be housed in his castle, and she refused to sleep in a bed when her men could not. He had however asked that she come in and join him for dinner. To that, Daenerys could not say no without giving offense, and so she found herself, with her lords, Merry, and various others.

From his place a seat down from her at the head of the table (a place had been left open signifying her husband's place) Lord Darry looked askance at Dark Sister. It was strapped to Daenerys' side, and had yet to leave her presence since she had taken possession of it. Still he smiled equably, while Domic began to play one of his own ballads in the background from his position near the windows. "Might I ask what has caused the rush South Your Highness? Not bad news I hope?"

"Nothing of that nature my Lord." Daenerys replied smiling thinly at the man while Myrcella reached in quickly and took a bite from her plate grinning at her playfully though there was a serious reason for her antics.

This was after all one of the men who Ranma and she had talked about as not fully trusting. Indeed if Daenerys had been able to she would not have entered his Castle, but the offer of guest rights, and of breaking bread in particular, was something she could not turn down without showing that she distrusted him, which was an insult no lord could stand.

Myrcella had come up with a solution however, volunteering as taster for Daenerys during this meal. The new septon, Etric, was a middle-aged man, who had a surprising amount of knowledge about healing, which might have been why he had been chosen. With his aid and her own growing knowledge, Myrcella had dosed herself with several cure-all's against most poisons, so even if there was something in the meal Myrcella might be fine.

Subtly Myrcella nodded her head, indicating the meal was wasn't poisoned. In response Daenerys tried hard to keep a sigh of relief from passing her lips. Myrcella's courage had made Daenerys love her all the more, because she knew whether Myrcella did or not that sometimes the cure-all's didn't block everything. Even so, watching Merry take on that danger without making any overt sign had been one of the most nerve-wracking things she had ever done.

With that Daenerys began to eat, telling Lord Darry what they had learned, and their hopes for the upcoming battle.

Through it all he nodded his head, and as the meal went on he acted the perfect host with one subtle exception. He seemed a little irritated that none of his guests touched the wine. Even Greatjon, known as a heavy drinker, was staying away from the wine, having brought his own keg of ale to share with Tytos and Rickard, while Daenerys, Myrcella and the others were drinking from prepared camp water, following Daenerys stern injunction about not getting drunk this evening.

Whatever the reason for his irritation, Darry's face and body language was so controlled that only Myrcella, who had been trained by a mistress of the subtle art of social discourse, could see it. After several moments watching him from out of the corner of her eye she caught the flick of his own eyes toward Daenerys' untouched wine cup.

Reaching forward picked up her own wine glass and brought it up to her to sniff as she had seen her mother and father do so often. Then she made as if she was drinking, while staring at the color in the light of the torches set into the wall behind her for a moment. She couldn't tell anything from looking at it, but something in the man's eyes...

Deciding to act on her misgivings Merry subtly tapped Daenerys side, then when the queen's eyes flickered to her for a second, tapped the wine glass still in her hand, crossing two fingers to make a brief X. While Daenerys tapped her thigh back making a circle there to indicate she understood, Eddard too had caught it. The septon sipped his wine briefly, then pushed it away.

As the evening went on, Darry kept on glancing at their wine cups, untouched thus far. His eyes flickered, growing cold when they latched onto Cley who stood behind his queen with a pitcher of camp water, almost empty now, then to Bess, who stood further down the table with another pitcher standing behind Tristan. Whatever was going on, his guest's use of camp water and their penchant for ale rather than wine had stymied it. Still, Merry and Daenerys were becoming more uneasy as the meal went on.

Finally the meal was finished, and Daenerys was about to make her excuses and leave when Lord Darry stood up. "May I propose a toast then? To your success your highness! May our enemies feel your fire!"

Daenerys actually winced a little which was not unnoticed by anyone. She was not her dragons, outside of their mental link, she got no pleasure from burning people, and indeed was scared of what she would feel the first time she had to use for dragons to their full effect against an army. "I will drink to my success my Lord, though I hope the method does not match the rest of your statement." she said, reaching for her water glass.

"It is customary to drink a toast with wine my lady, or is there something wrong with my cellars that you would shame me so?" Said Lord Darry coldly.

"There might not be aught wrong with your cellars, but there is something wrong with the wine." said the septon coldly getting up as well. "Do you take us for fools?"

At his tone Ser Barristan moved from his place by the doorway, his sword singing out of its sheath while next to him Gregor did the same. Rickard and Greatjon, who had been sitting together at the far end of the table rose to their feet, their own hands going to their weapons. Lord Darry had not been happy when Daenerys insisted that they could all carry weapons to this meal, saying it showed a sign of distrust, but she had reiterated her point: she had already dealt with one assassination attempt on her life in the Riverlands she was not going to tempt fate again.

"That is a serious accusation." said Lord Darry. "One even you should answer for!" The man blustered, but there was more than anger in his eyes. He rang a bell quickly, and suddenly a dozen men burst through the doorway.

"I wanted to do this the easy way." He said now in a conversational tone as Ser Barristan was forced to turn to engage the men by the door along with Rickard and Greatjon, the Rygers, Tytos and the other loyal lords. Behind the man his own servants moved forward, revealing along with daggers hidden under their robes as he also grabbed up his sword from where it had been hidden under the table. "But I am fully prepared to do it the hard way as well."

Cley dropped the jar of camp water, causing a crash against the stones as he pulled out his sword, while Bess reached forward quickly grabbing up a knife from the table. With that done she hurried to take up position behind him.

Domeric moved forward from where he had been playing beside one wall, his harp dropping to the floor as he wrenched out his sword, moving to stand with his queen as she drew Dark Sister with a surprising, at least to Lord Darry, amount of skill. Behind her Myrcella and Eddard moved back, knowing they didn't have much skill and war craft.

"Why?" said Daenerys coolly, pointing her blade at Lord Darry as more of his men burst in through the doorway, forcing the defenders there back, though paying for it with six dead men in as many moments. "Why? We asked nothing of you, only that you remain loyal and you couldn't do even that? Who bought you my Lord?"

"Your brother. My house is one of many that have long served the true rulers of Westeros, and while you may be a Targaryen, you are a traitor to its true heir! An heir who has promised me rulership of all of my family's original lands including Harroway and deep into House Whent lands as well! Whereas you promised me nothing, and only gave me stern and cold words? Foolish girl! Any Lord will follow the ones who promises him more profit."

"Only lords without honor do that." said Domeric coldly then moved to engage him sword to sword while the servants moved forward, showing themselves not to be servants at all but armymen in the disguise of servants. Yet even so they only had long knives that they had been able to hide under their coats, whereas Cley and Daenerys at least were armed with swords.

Daenerys smashed one knife to splinters with Dark Sister, her back sweep taking another man in the side before she dodged under a blow from another man, bringing Dark Sister up to thrust forward into the man's chest ending his life. At the same time Cley guarded her back killing two others and wounding a third. His skill with the blade wasn't up to Wolfsworn standards, but it was a little bit better than Eddard's when he first met Rhaegar.

It served him in good stead now, though he froze when he looked down at the men he had slain. It was only Bess darting forward to threaten another man with her purloined knife that saved his life in that moment of indecision.

"Cley snap out AHHH!" She went down with a cry, cradling a broken arm from the flat of the man's sword.

"Old gods damn you!" Cley roared, charging forward to engage that man, slaying him in two strokes before pulling Bess behind him again, while all around them the other's continued to cut down the armsmen of Darry.

Daenerys however knew that the numbers were against him no matter how good they were as individuals. Trading blows with four servants she reached inward, shouting down her link to her dragons. Aid, danger, help! While her two dragons, which had been hunting several leagues away, turned as one and flew towards the castle, she shouted aloud, "The window, someone hold something outside the window!"

The window in question was actually a murder hole cut into the outer wall of the keep which abutted the back of Darry, but Myrcella understood what she meant. Grabbing the tablecloth she pulled it out causing clanging and ringing sounds to abound as tableware was sent crashing to the floor. "Get me to the window." she ordered Cley.

Cley nodded, cutting another man down who had broken past the battle going on by the door. The man died looking astonished at the boy who had just slain him so quickly.

With the rest of the servants concentrating on Dmeric, Tristan and Daenerys Merry was able to rush to the murder hole. There she stuffed the blanket through and began to shake it while shouting out through it. "A rescue, a rescue!"

Outside the castle a few men whose tents were set up right against the outer wall of the castle looked up at the barely heard shout and saw the fluttering tablecloth. One of them was quite a bit faster on the uptake than most, and he nodded urgently. "Go get Lord Patrek, I think something's going on in there."

Patrek's own tent was situated directly in front of the gate into the castle. The gate itself was open, but Patrek was watching it closely even before someone had run up and told him about your tablecloth in the window. He looked up quickly at the top of the castle, and saw more guards up there than there should be. "Grab as many men as possible, get in there now!" he barked.

With that he grabbed up his own sword and raced out, followed by Eric Proudthenn and seven men nearby who'd heard his shout. Eric had been turned away from the dinner, his face and manners not up to even being a guard for such. The two men raced through the gate at the head of the men and into the gatehouse just as Darry armsmen there were beginning to bring the portcullis down. It fell, but Patrek took command of the gatehouse and soon it had risen again under the power of several of his men.

Outside archers along the wall began to fire out into the army frantically, and dozens of men began to attack Patrek's position in the gatehouse, trying to force their way through the doorway. Yet they could only come at Patrek one at a time there, and Patrek was easily able to best them under those circumstances.

Not a minute after Patrek barked his orders out hundreds of men from the army poured in, and if most of them were unarmored having taken off their armor for the evening, they were all armed, and greatly outnumbered the defenders. And they were utterly furious at this betrayal. "The Queen, the Queen! Save the Queen!"

Six more men joined Patrek in the gatehouse and he nodded at them grimly. "Hold the door, I need to see to the Queen's safety."

Inside the battle had begun to turn against Daenerys and her people. Lord Ryger was down, as was Ser Wode, both men dead. Ser Grell was holding a broken arm, and Tristan had taken a knife thrust to his side which had opened up a nasty gash there. The fact that the Riverlords hadn't come armored was now beginning to tell, and even Silas was forced to fall back leaving only Rickard, Barristan and Greatjon to continue to hold the doorway. All three of them were armored, and it served the men in good stead, though they all had wounds by this point.

Daenerys was wounded as well, a long gash on her forearm that was bleeding badly, but otherwise not slowing her down. She was still dueling with some of the servants, while more and more men were getting around the trio by the doorway.

Bess screamed out "Lord Dmeric, no!"

At those words Daenerys whipped her head around in time to see a guardsmen run Dmeric through his side. As Dmeric turned, his own sword lashing out and catching that man in the leg, Lord Darry brought his own sword around hacking into her friend's chest, sending him falling to the ground.

"No!" she shouted angrily, breaking off her assault on an arms man, kicking the man it hard in the leg putting them off balance enough for a head butt to come crashing into his nose breaking it and sending him backwards in a welter of blood.

Cley pounced on him then Daenerys froze, feeling her dragons arriving outside. With no further orders from her, Rhaegon began to rake the outer wall with fire, slaying dozens of men in his fiery fury, aiming for the men firing at the army which served his queen. He even showed a remarkable understanding of when to stop, pulling back and rising up to aim for the towers and top of the keep when other men began to force their way up onto the wall.

Sunfyre however was circling the keep trying to decide where to attack, and she reached out to his mind. The fluttering thing, flame through it!

She felt his response, felt him begin to actually cling to the outside of the keep, heard his intake of breath...
"Everyone down!"

Her words came out with such a tone of command that even the men locked in combat by the doorway obeyed, dropping to their stomachs where they had stood. It was as well they had, because the door into the dining hall was directly across from the murder hole where Merry had pushed the tablecloth through.

A spear of bright fire roared out of the murder hole, searing across the dining hall and immolating a few servants who hadn't been fast enough on the uptake to obey Daenerys's command, along with more than a dozen men by the doorway. Here and there her own men grimaced in pain from the searing heat of the blast, but none of them had been caught in the flames.

Daenerys had remained standing, the flame of the fires not hurting her or Dark Sister where she stood in the center of it, blade having locked with another servant, who died screaming. Her clothes did not survive the flames, but she didn't care. Sending a thanks to Sunfyre and ordering him to start circling the castle took a bare second, while the men out in the corridor began to get their courage back from the sudden fiery assault. Those men knew they had only one chance to live through this, and that was to take the Dragon Queen hostage.

But she ignored that too, racing forward naked to engage Raymun Darry, where he had been out of the flame's range. He had been staring in horror at the mangled, burning wreckage that had been his men, including his son and cousin, but then turned, his eyes lighting up murderously as he saw Daenerys coming for him, racing across the bloody stones of the dining hall.

He met her charge just as furiously, but found himself overmatched in speed if not strength or skill, and Dark Sister flickered here there, everywhere, forcing him back. Raymun then found his back pressed against the wall. He desperately dodged to one side as Daenerys blade sought his face.

Dark Sister made sparks where it clanged against the wall, but Daenerys turned quickly, bringing up a foot kicking Raymun in the stomach before he could bring his sword around. He groaned in agony, losing his grip on the blade, then tried to scramble on the ground for it as Daenerys turned bringing Dark Sister around. "AGHH!" The sword bit deep into his back severing his spine and he screamed like a stuck pig before she wrenched it out then thrust down hard, impaling his head.

Before Daenerys could shout to order the remaining attackers to surrender, there was a sound behind her, a soft "Oh!" of shock.

She whirled, only to stare in horror as Myrcella fell to the ground her hands clutching a knife low down in her side. The man who had killed had been one of very few of the servants in the hall that had headed Daenerys order, and he had begun to sneak up on Daenerys from behind while she went for Raymun and his fellows began to fight with Cley and the others once more.

But Myrcella had seen him, and had thrown herself between the two. She hadn't spent nearly as much time training as even Daenerys had however, and her attempt to defend herself hadn't worked it all. She had lasted for a bare few seconds, allowing Daenerys time to finish Lord Darry off, before the man had run her through.

The man only had a brief second himself to look up as Dark Sister whirled in the air and Daenerys voice rose in a howl of anguish. "No!"

The man's head flew off like a shuttlecock, but Dark Sister clanged to the ground out of Daenerys's nervous grip while she instantly went to her knees beside her friend frantically trying to staunch the flow of blood. "Hang on Merry, just hang on, please!"

Suddenly Ehric was there, smacking her hands aside and ripping off a bit of his own robe, tying it in place as a tourniquet while he examined the wound. "Tis bad, sore bad. I'll need needle, thread, clean wine, anything I can get my hands on!"

Daenerys stared down at Myrcella, her hands moving forward again to try and help to staunch the blood flowing out of Myrcella's stomach, weeping as she saw blood began to appear on those lips she had so loved kissing. "My lady!" said Ehric sharply, reaching forward to slap her cheek gently bringing her out of it. Get me everything get me the maester of the Castle, he'll have what I need!"

For a moment Daenerys looked at him, then, unmindful of her nakedness, she moved forward toward the doorway, where Patrek's voice and others had begun to be heard as the royal army surged through the traitor's castle.

OOOOOO

The death toll of Lord Darry's betrayal was heavy. Tristan would survive, but may never regain the use of one of his arms. The new Lord Wayn had a concussion, but thankfully would survive. Lord Ryger was dead, making Tristan Lord of House Ryger. Tytos was unwounded, but his heir Brynden had taken a blow to the side and would be laid up for weeks, and Lucas had a gash on his face that ruined his good looks. All the other lords had various nicks and wounds, and Greatjon had lost one of his ears. Grege, Merry's gentle giant of a guard, had lost his arm from the shoulder down, but would live.

Domeric was dead, and Myrcella was still being seen to by the maester of the Hall later that night. Daenerys waited outside his door, slumped against the wall of the corridor while Greatjon, at her orders, saw to the death or capture of the rest of the armymen in the castle. If they attempted to continue to fight they were slain instantly. If not, they would be sent to the Wall to take the black in recompense for their aiding their lord in this bit of treason. Darry had already lost his sons and nephew, his only family, because of his treason.

"My lady," said a soft voice and she stared up at Alayaya. Alayaya had not been invited to dinner, which she had been amused about at the time, saying she could've gone as one of the men's lady for the evening, but Daenerys had decided against it. But Alayaya was now staring down at Daenerys worriedly, noting that her queen hadn't dressed again, simply covering herself with a cloak so great was her worry for Merry. "Are you well?"

She went to one knee beside her friend, and then Daenerys flung her arms around the other woman. She began to sob brokenly, not just for the wounds Merry had taken, but for Domeric's death. He had meant so much to her, been the one who truly helped Daenerys gain her freedom, had helped teach her and guide her. They had been planning to name him Lord of Stone Hedge after the war or anything else he wanted. Now he was gone, and the world was suddenly a darker place.

Several hours later Daenerys had regained control herself, but had not moved from that position. With Ser Barristan looming like a grim shadow in blood streaked white armor nearby she stood up when the door to the healing room opened. The maester of the Castle stepped out shaking his head. "It's bad, sore bad. If not for the septon getting there so quickly, we would've already lost her."

"Will she pull through?" Daenerys asked sharply.

The maester hesitated. "I don't know my lady, were doing all he can but..."

Daenerys held up a hand interrupting the man. "Let me make one thing perfectly clear here maester." She said coldly. "Your Lord tried to betray me, your queen. Even if you don't wish to acknowledge that, I am the wife of the new Lord Paramount of the Riverlands. This was treason however you cut it, and he had poison in his wine! Where do you think he would come up with that?"

She watched as the maester paled. "Now, my friend will live. If she does not, you will not. I will have you executed as a traitor do you understand me?"

The maester nodded his head then turned and entered the room again. Daenerys slumped against the wall, then turned to Ser Barristan and Alayaya. "Come, I need to see to my little ones, I imagine they are quite anxious."

They certainly were. Indeed none of the men of the army was willing to get near them where they had landed in the castle's courtyard. Only Alayaya's words stopped her from stepping out of the keep still with only a cloak covering her. While the Summer Island girl dressed her, Daenerys concentrated on sending feelings of wellbeing and happiness to her dragons. It worked, and by the time Daenerys actually stood before them, both dragons had calmed down significantly.

Yet even while she tended to them, touching them and scratching their scales to reassure them of her survival her mind was elsewhere. Inside Daenerys prayed, prayed in a way she had never done before not even when times were hardest for her, prayed as deeply and as powerfully as she could to any god that was listening for her friend's survival.

OOOOOO

Ranma and the Wolfsworn had met up with Meera and her scouts several leagues distant from the Army further south, hearing the news from them. Not all the news, since news of Lord Darry's betrayal hadn't spread that far, but the fact that the army was on the march down south to capture the Lannisters. As such Ranma left the rest of the Wolfsworn there, racing ahead with Fenris beside him, moving far faster than any of the others could go on horseback. He wanted time to talk to his wife before that battle, and maybe to spend time with her and Myrcella.

Those thoughts left his mind as he ran into outriders of the army the next day. The army had not moved from Darry just yet, and they informed him of what had occurred. They watched in awe as their king raced on even faster with his direwolf matching his speed, leaving their galloping horses to flounder in his wake.

The sun had barely moved in the sky above him before Ranma arrived at Darry, racing through it with Fenris a moving wall of fur behind. Inside Daenerys was once again sitting vigil outside the maester's room. She stood up quickly as she saw Ranma, and then was in his arms being held and nuzzling into his shoulder as he kissed her cheek and neck murmuring her name for a moment as the two hugged, simply reveling in the fact she was alive.

His euphoria at that however dampened quickly and he pulled back. "Myrcella?"

"They've been in there ever since she was injured. I didn't even let them look at Tristan or the others, I sent them out to the army's healers."

"Don't worry about that my lady." said Ser Barristan shaking his head behind the Queen. "Merry's helpers did a magnificent job, and all of our wounded will pull through easily, even Grege and Tristan. Myrcella was the worst hurt."

Ranma nodded, and leaned against the wall beside his wife holding her in his arms while they both stared at the doorway into the maester's room.

They were still there several hours later when the door opens to reveal the septon and the maester. Both of them looked incredibly weary, but jubilant. "She's alive, she'll pull through! She will wake up for a few days more I think, but she'll pull through now." Ehcric was personally ecstatic, having come to like Myrcella in the few days he had known her.

The maester however was much more cautious. "There was a problem however. While she will pull through, and do so entirely, the sword it, the wound it..."

"Spit it out man." Ranma barked.

The maester gulped. "My Lord, the sword tip sliced into her womb, and did irreparable damage. The princess will never be able to have children..."

OOOOOO

Later Ranma and Daenerys stood over Myrcella's sleeping body. "I need to get the army moving if we're going to pin the Lannisters between us and Jason's forces." he said, sighing faintly. "I don't want them to be able to escape. I'll leave half the army here, all of the pike regiments for certain and the Riverlands portions that are still being rearmed, along with Patrek and Greatjon to help you command that portion of the army."

Daenerys nodded. "We'll still be here. If she wakes up, and if the Maesters say we can start moving her, we'll meet you outside Harrentown."

"Good, there's something else I'll need to do down there anyway." He kissed his wife and leaned down and kissed Myrcella's sleeping lips gently. Then he moved to her ear whispering. "Get better Myrcella, I love you."

Beside him Fenris moved forward, laying out alongside the bed, staring up at Ranma. Fenris had come to care for 'she who smells like lilies and honey' and knew she was sorely wounded. Often in the wild, predators would go after the weakest in a pack, but if they tried that here, Fenris would be there to protect her.

Ranma stared down at his bonded, and nodded his head. With that he moved over to his wife kissing her much more thoroughly, then with a final squeeze of her shoulder, left to go back to war.

OOOOOO

Ranma decided to leave the pike regiments along with the portions of the army from House Blackwood and the other Riverlands houses that had joined them since crossing the Trident since they were still being refitted with new armor and in many cases better weaponry. Instead he only took the Northerners in residence, though he also took all of the Riverlands houses horses with them, giving him enough horses to let his infantrymen to rest in shifts while also allowing him to push the pace even harder.

So three days later the army joined up with the scouts and the Wolfsworn who had stayed with the scouts just on this side of the border with the Crownlands. By then news of what had occurred in dairy had spread to the scouts and then from there to the Wolfsworn so the first word out of Dacey's mouth was "Myrcella?"

"She'll live." Ranma replied though his face became grim as he remembered how she had looked there on the bed, so small and frail, but not weak, never weak. "Daenerys is all right, though her arm will bear a scar for the rest of her life." He grit his teeth angrily at the betrayal that had come so close to claiming both his loves' lives despite the fact that they all feared something similar might be coming.

But who would've thought that Darry would ignore guest rights? Or strike so blatantly when an army was camped around his castle! Hearing he had intended to capture Daenerys and the others rather than kill made it a little more believable, and if he had, it might have even succeeded. "In other news, do we know anything more about who is moving down south?"

Meera, who had been standing silently nearby, nodded her head. She had been ordered by Jason to move out from Harrentown to take control of the scouts to the southeast, and had done so with alacrity. While she couldn't move quite as fast as the Wolfsworn could, she could still cover a lot of ground quickly, and was as much at home scouting here as she had been back in the neck. "We do. The two forces down there, they're coming close to where they'll intersect the Kingsroad before moving on towards Harrentown.

"Can you tell us anything more about them, Meera?"

In response she began to describe the banners she had seen before shrugging her shoulders. "The only one of those I recognize is House Lannister. "

"House Tyrell and Ashford in the second force." Ranma mused. "And House Serret and House Lannister in the first one. Whoever decided to put a peacock on a banner has almost as much to answer for as the man who thought a blue rooster was a good idea on one."

"The second one is also being led by a man, um..." Meera coughed a little. "It looks as if he's got a garden enameled on his armor. He's very handsome, but a little too Southern-soft for my tastes." Her flush gave her the lie, but none of the Wolfsworn were in the mood to call her on it.

"How far away are they?" asked Daryn thoughtfully.

"From our current position, about two day's hard march for the army I'd say. From each other, I just don't know. The second group is pushing themselves hard, too hard frankly. She gestured to six horses which were nibbling at the grass behind her. "I've used my remounts this to keep in touch with the scouts trailing them, and our horses are flagging, so both group's horses should be close to exhaustion."

Ranma nodded his head grimly. "Good. I think we'll rest here then, let them come to us a bit more."

There were firm nods all around and Ranma went on. "I'll want to enclose both forces with our own. But if the second force is chasing the first, it's to be treated as an ally until they prove differently."

Loras and Lord Ashford had indeed sent a messenger up the Kingsroad. But he and his party of four men had been ambushed by bandits, all former Westerlands men, and been slain. The bandits in turn had tried to jump Meera and some of her scouts a week or so ago, and been slain. Worse, the message had only been oral rather than written down.

So no one in the Stargaryen army knew anything about the incoming Reach forces. Because they were chasing the Lannisters, Ranma was willing to give them the benefit of the doubt mostly thanks to Margaery's message, but that was all.

OOOOOO

Loras really didn't want to get out of the saddle, because he knew he'd just have to get back into it in a few hours, and right now that was more than his heart could bear. His horse and his remount were two of only about 20 animals in his entire force that looked as if they were more than a few steps away from dropping in exhaustion, but Loras himself was ready to collapse.

Once Loras and Lord Ashford had figured out where the Lannisters must be heading they had pushed the pace as hard as they could to try and catch up to the Lannisters and their allies. Unfortunately, the Lannisters had been doing the same thing, and the chase had become a long-drawn out thing, with both forces pushing themselves to exhaustion.

Before this, Loras had considered himself hardy, tough and durable as befitting a knight. Now after interminable days and nights in the saddle, all he wanted to do was curl up somewhere, preferably on his stomach to give his abused ass some rest. And Loras wasn't the only one. Every man in his army was feeling the same, and they were beginning to look it too.

Lord Ashford shook his head from where he was leaning against his own horse's flank, whose head was drooping wearily. "We can't keep this up. Our horses are close to being worn out, they'll be of no use in a charge! And our knights and infantry aren't much better."

Actually the infantry, who by and large did not wear plate armor were actually in far better condition than the knights. Thanks to the pace they had been forced to set the knights had been riding and even sleeping in their armor for the past week since chase began after the battle that had slain Lord Edgerton.

"Agreed." Loras said with a nod. He pulled out his map, which was not a very detailed one in this segment of Westeros admittedly, but it still had marks painted on it on the other side of the Kingsroad moving towards Harrentown indicating a forest. Not a large forest, but reportedly a decently overgrown one. "Here's what we'll do instead. We'll rest here, and we'll send another message further north instead and one around the Lannister army as well. No doubt the Starks have a holding force encamped around Harrentown, so if we can warn them, they can pincer this group from that side while we ride up their back."

"I'm worried we haven't heard from the last group we sent that way." Said Lord Ashford. "That's not good."

"We don't know what happened." Loras said with a shrug. "He might never have gotten there, we did only send four men remember, and I have no doubt that there are bandits roving the lands around here, former Westerlander armymen if nothing else." They had gotten some news from various smallfolk their scouts had run into about what it happened to the Westerlands army, which had both shocked and impressed both men.

"True enough." Ashford nodded. Then he pushed himself away from his horse wincing as his buttocks shifted as he moved. "I'll get the men caring for their horses, then we'll bed down for the evening."

Loras nodded, and turned to see to his horses.

OOOOOO

"Now we turn on them," said Lord Serret looking at Jaime who smiled coldly. Cersei and Joffrey looked at Rupert askance for a moment and he shrugged. "Your Majesty, I've been pushing the pace only almost as hard as we could, given the number of horses we have for the number of soldiers. Moreover, I've firmly fixed in the minds of the men be back there that we're running away. They won't even be able to think that we can turn on them, and once we wipe them out we can move on to Harrentown with impunity."

Cersei was not nearly as confident of that as Lord Serret was, as if she had been the Riverlanders, she would have assaulted Harrenhal already, wiping out the last of the invaders of her kingdom. That it would become a bloodbath wouldn't have mattered to her overmuch, in light of the atrocities that were being laid at the Westerlands army's feet.

Still she nodded her head. They were at least another four days travel out from the woods alongside the God's Eye, which would slow their progress even further before they made it to Harrenhal, even if they weren't crossing the full expanse of them. That would allow them to take a break from the hard pace of the march, and allow her personally some rest as well.

"I want to come too." said Joffrey angrily. He hadn't been able to find anyone to vent his frustrations on, and had taken to beating his horse again until he was stopped by a few of his Kingsguard. Horses were too precious at this point to allow the boy to waste his spleen on them like that.

Cersei shook her head quickly. "No. You are the king, you cannot be risked in a small skirmish like this. Kings fight only in important battles my son, I've said it before. This will not be a vital battle, in truth it will be barely a ambush. You should husband your strength until you need it most."

Joffrey sneered at her, which caused Cersei to actually recoil a little in shock. He had never looked at her like that before! "I need to show that I am a warrior as good as my father, and I have to show it now! Our plans from now on entail us forting up and not fighting much any longer after this. I have to do it now, to show our men that I am my father's son! Don't think I haven't heard those whispers!"

Despite their desperate flight the army's scouts had met up with smallfolk who had passed on rumors. One of them was that Ranma and Daenerys had formally declared that Joffrey was illegitimate while Myrcella was legitimate in their eyes along with the dead Tommen.

Worse in Joffrey's opinion was that according to what the scouts relayed the smallfolk practically worshiped the ground Myrcella walked on these days, even more than they did Margaery Tyrell down in the Reach. The Maiden of Healing they called her, and venerated Myrcella for her work in bringing medical attention among the smallfolk to the same level that the nobility could call upon.

Why, why are my siblings so intent on stealing the attention of the people that should rightly be mine! I am king! And here I am, running like a rat, while my sister spreads her legs for our enemies and is heralded as a saint among the ignorant masses! I need to show them I'm strong, I need to show them that I am the real King here in Westeros!

"The smallfolk all think that Myrcella seems to, to almost walk on water, but they know nothing of me, simply believing the lies our enemies spout! Until I do something, something to show I am my father's son, those rumors will spread!" He said aloud, his voice a thing of petulant wrath and darker emotions when he said his sister's name.

While Cersei tried to form words, still shocked by the way Joffrey glared at her Lord Serret frowned, staring at the youth. Despite his age, Rupert simply could not bring himself to call Joffrey a young man. Then he looked at Jaime who shrugged his shoulders, not wanting to get involved. That was all too often Jaime's issue, Serret thought. If he had done his duty as an uncle maybe this brat would've amounted to something.

Finally he sighed, and just as Cersei opened her mouth to reprimand her son for glaring at her so Rupert held up a hand. "I think his Majesty actually does have a point. There comes a time when a King must show that he can wield the sword. As such, all accede to that, you can be in part of the second charge."

While Joffrey puffed himself up importantly, Serret shook his head slightly at Cersei who subsided. The second charge would in fact be the reserves, which if Serret had gauged his opponent's exhaustion well enough would not be used at all.

He looked at the Kingsguard, gesturing to the men who seemed to cater more than they should to Joffrey's whims, Ser Edgerton, Ser Blount, Ser Gaunt, and Ser all nodded, understanding what he was set telling them, and Blount actually looked relieved for an excuse not to join the battle.

"Ser Swann, I leave you to guard the queen." Serret went on. "I'll leave about 15 men with you, but I don't think I can afford to leave any other men behind." Not when I'll have to leave at least 200 with the brat to keep him happy.

Ser Swann nodded his head, bowing from the waist to the queen. Cersei responded with a single nod of her head, then went back to staring at Joffrey, still shocked by the way he was acting so independently now. That and the way he looked at her, as if she was some kind of obstacle in his way. And there had been something in his voice when he spoke of Myrcella, not anger something deeper, darker, which her conscious mind refused to grasp.

Turning away and leaving Cersei to her thoughts, Serret began to organize the attack.

They rested themselves through the night before marching back down there trail for of time until his scouts, carefully husbanded up to this point, reported they had seen campfires in the distance. One of them smirked evilly. "Milord, they don't even have scouts out! A few guards here and there, mainly around der horses, and about, two hands wort still awake repairing their bridles or someat, but that's all!"

Serret smiled grimly. "You see." he said looking at where Joffrey had moved up to stand beside him and Jaime. "They have the fact that we were running from them so thorough firmly fixed in their minds, they're not even thinking of any other option."

"When do we attack?" asked Joffrey eagerly.

"At dawn." Serret replied. "That'll allow us to rest our men some more, and we'll have daylight to tell friend from foe. In any battle like this that's a necessity." Joffrey scowled at needing to wait but nodded his head understandingly. "In that case, let's get some sleep."

None of them saw a young woman perched in the top of a pine tree nearby, listening avidly.

OOOOOOO

"It was tough to get away." Meera reported several hours later. "But I think that Lord Serret's forces are almost as exhausted as his pursuers. He might've waited a little too long frankly, those men are drooping with weariness. I mean most of them just fell down where they stood rather than getting out there bed rolls, if they had any, and none of them even bothered to check their weapons or gear."

Ranma shook his head. "Once they know they're winning the fight they'll gain more strength I think, humans are kind of like that at times. Will we be in position to attack them at dawn?"

"At dawn or a little after." Meera, replied trotting hard to keep up with the moving column. Now so close she hadn't needed any horses, which was why she had been up a tree enough in the first place, which had allowed her to sneak away far more easily than otherwise.

"You did good Meera." Ranma said, reaching out and ruffling her hair for a moment before turning to look up at where Ser Wendel Manderly was mounted on his horse nearby like a large armor-clad boulder. "Wendel, I believe you'll be going in first, try to flank them from the south if you can. The infantry will come in straight from the north and west." He looked over at the Wolfsworn. "We'll rest for about 20 minutes when Meera tells us we're near at enough, then we'll charge." He turned to Meera. "That means that our stopping is on you, if we get to the battle and our men or horses are too exhausted from charging to fight, it could be a disaster."

Meera gulped but nodded. "I know just the place, there's a large rock near where the Westerlanders camped today. That'll do for a landmark."

OOOOOOO

Dawn was just beginning to break when war cries suddenly shouted around the Reach encampment, wakening those within from deep slumber. "We have no rivals! Hear me roar!"

Loras pushed himself up off the ground, he had been too exhausted to actually unroll his sleep roll last night, and had simply been using it as a pillow as he bedded down beside his horse. Yet a single night's uninterrupted sleep wasn't enough to overcome his body's exhaustion, and he was groggy for a moment.

Nor was he alone in that. All around him his men were taken completely by surprise, the almost equally exhausted Westerlands men pressing in from the north and west. Dozens of men died in those first few moments before the Reach warriors truly realized what was going on and fumbled for their weapons.

Here the infantry responded much better than the knights, not being as exhausted as them. Here and there clumps of them formed actual lines of battle, or at least groups working together to defend themselves from their attackers. They held long enough for the knights to grab up their weapons and move to their aid, but hundreds of men died in the next few moments, though on both sides considering the attackers were nearly as exhausted as the defenders.

Loras found himself at the front of the battle, his mind engaged and sharp now with the scent of blood in the air and the cries of the dead and dying in his ears. He swung his sword left right and back again, blocking two men from attacking both him and a wounded infantryman next to him, before riposting quickly, thrusting his sword blade through the chain mail of one man while kicking out at the legs of the other, sending him crashing to the ground. The wounded infantryman finished him off, and Loras moved on, killing as he went.

He slew five more attackers before he found himself face-to-face with someone he had dearly wanted to cross swords with since this war began. "Jaime Kingslayer. A pleasure."

"Rose Knight, trust me the pleasure is all mine." Jaime grinned, not even wearing a helmet for the battle, his green eyes glinting with dark amusement.

The pleasantries over with, the two men moved together, their swords flashing as one seeking one another's bodies.

Loras was fast, constantly mobile, and thanks to Ranma having sparred with him a few times knew to use the rest of his body as a weapon just like his sword, though he wasn't nearly as skilled with feet or hand. Even so he landed a few hard punches and kicks to Jaime before the Kingslayer could compensate for his shift in style.

Where Loras jumped around and moved from side to side, Jaime moved with an economy of movement, each shift of his body calculated in a way that no one else but a true swordsman would've recognized, happening as it was on an instinctual level. Jaime was precise, controlled, in a battle like this he lost all of his normal flamboyant nature, concentrating his entire being on the conflict. He also had a shield, which he used to great effect until it began to fall apart under the repeated blows.

Jaime lost one of his Kingsguard white enameled pauldron from his shoulder. Loras' sword had sliced into his armor there at just the right point to pull out the rivet that was holding it in place when he had knocked Jaime's blade just off center. But Jaime had dodged at the same time, and Loras' blade didn't penetrate his armor beyond that.

In response Jaime had lashed out with a forearm that caught the Rose Knight in the temple, jarring loose several teeth and throwing him backwards. Jaime moved his shoulder for a moment lashing out with his blade into the side of Reach man who had been trying to charge at him with a spear. "I'd say sorry for ruining your pretty boy features, but someone already did that. Or is Stannis not the only Baratheon brother with a fetish for fire?"

He laughed, and that laugh was like a brand applied to Loras' still sore buttocks. He growled, charging forward angrily, his blows flashing with even greater speed and strength than before, but lacking any of his style or control.

Jaime laughed again, though internally this time watching the fool fall prey to his own passions. The two of them exchanged blows again, and Jaime took another slash, which opened up his armor along his side and produced a small cut there, but nothing fatal. His face also took a slash from just above his mouth to right below his right eye.

In response Loras was almost crippled when Jaime's blade caught him low in his leg, just missing his knee and biting slightly into the side of his thigh. That caused him to fall off balance just a little.

Jaime was on it in an instant, ducking underneath Loras' desperate defensive blow, and running the younger man through his chest. The Kingslayer's blade caught Loras point first right below his heart smashing through his plate armor and punching deep into his intestines, going so deep as to almost break out of his back. Blood began to immediately flow from the wound, as well as his mouth and when Jaime wrenched his sword back out that flow became a flood.

"Good fight." Jaime said conversationally while Loras went to his knees, none of the other Reach men near enough to be a threat to him just now. "You almost had me a time or two there."

Loras stared up at him from his knees, then both the dying man and Jaime turned their heads when suddenly a howl erupted beyond the melee. Not from a single throat, but from thousands. "The king, the Wolf King! Winter is coming!"

Jaime gaped in astonishment at the noise. Loras however smiled even as he fell forward, his eyes clouding over with death.

OOOOOO

About a league distant from the battle, the Queen and her guards had suddenly found themselves surrounded by men wearing northern colors. Ser Swann and his men try to fight back, but were slain or knocked unconscious quickly.

Ser Swann was the only one who really put up much of a fight. He slew one of the attackers and knocked another unconscious before a giant was upon him. Smalljon's greatsword slashed forward, smashing at the somewhat older man with both strength and skill that Swann could not match. Within a minute of exchanging blows he found his sword being forced down to the ground then Smalljon's fist came up under his chin. Smalljon laid him out with that one blow, the power of it lifting Balon off his feet and flinging him twenty feet into the air to land heavily several yards behind where he had stood.

Cersei had at first attempted to escape, only to find her path barred by a young wild looking woman, as well as another older looking woman that if anything looked even wilder. "Ah don't think so soft one." Said Osha, her sword pointed easily at Cersei. "You try to run, you die."

"Queen Cersei Lannister, you are under arrest." said Meera coldly. "The charge is treason with others to be added later."

OOOOOO

Ranma led the charge from the north and west while Wendel had encircled the battle, coming up from the south with his cavalry. They slammed into the battle with all the force their charge could convey, spilling what few men were in the saddle at this point, killing even more of the Lannisters in those brief moments than they had slaughtered among the Reach men. Every unit commander began to bellow the same thing, "Lay down your arms and surrender or die!"

Ranma let them to it, carving his way through the battle knocking out those who were surrendering or weren't in any position to fight back as he forged his way towards the yellow head that could only be Jaime. Breaking through the melee he saw Jaime standing over the body of Loras and scowled angrily. Whatever his problems with Loras and Renly, he had been friends with the man once. With a roar he charged Ice in both of his hands. "Winter is Coming, Lannister!"

Jaime turned, his green eyes becoming vicious as he moved to engage Ranma. He knew if he could kill the Stark then the fight might go out of these northerners. He parried Ranma's first wild slash, but then had to block another blow as Ranma reversed his blade's course as easily as if the Valyrian blade was a Braavosi rapier rather than a greatsword. Jaime was barely able to get his own sword in between his body and Ice before he was flung to the side with the impetus of the blow.

Even so Jaime rolled with it, coming up and thrusting hard with all of his body's weight behind the blow hoping to catch Ranma with his sword out of position to defend. But Ranma leaped into the air, dodging the blow easily while bringing Ice around in a wide arc. Jaime ducked in turn and by the time he stood back up Ranma was back on the ground, Ice swinging again.

After blocking two more blows, Jaime tried to move inside Ranma's reach with the greatsword, his own longsword much more nimble in close quarters, but then had to fall back his head ringing from a blow from one of Ranma's fists that had nearly caved in the side of his face. Only the fact that he had moved with the blow and rolled away had saved him. But he was forced to sacrifice the remains of his shield to defend his body from Ranma's next blow.

In fact Jaime was quickly coming to realize that he was entirely overmatched for the first time since he had been ten or so. "Damn you Stark!" he shouted, rage and humiliation coloring his normally controlled voice. "How much were you holding back!?"

"I wanted you to underestimate me." Ranma said breaking his silence, his voice calm and measured. It was only then that Jaime realized the boy wasn't even breathing hard! "I want to humiliate you now. There's a big difference."

Jaime growled, attacking his opponent even more savagely while Ranma simply absorbed his blows waiting. When Jaime lunged again, he dodged one side, bringing Ice down so quickly Jaime couldn't pull his sword back or do anything. But instead of aiming for Jaime's body, Ranma aimed for his outstretched hand where it was clenched around his blade. Ice sheared through Jaime's dominant hand right below the elbow, cutting it off in a welter of blood.

For a moment Jaime stared down at his stump, not even registering what it happened. Then he screamed, loud and long like someone who had just lost everything in life, and indeed in Jaime's case that was true. He had defined himself his entire life as a swordsman. To lose his dominant hand like that was a blow to his world view beyond anything he had ever endured before.

It was almost a mercy when Ranma brought Ice around again the flat of it smashing into the side of Jaime's head with carefully calculated force. Jaime was unconscious before he hit the ground. With that done Ranma knelt, and began to put a tourniquet on the Kingslayer's hand.

OOOOOO

Considering that Lord Ashford had also been shouting for them to do so, most of the Reach forces that had survived until Ranma and his army arrived had surrendered quickly. The Westerlands portion had also started to surrender rapidly, though that had more to do with their fear and exhaustion than any shouted orders from their leaders.

Now Ashford stood in front of Ranma, explaining what had happened during the long chase from King's Landing. Ranma shook his head. "We never received any message, I assure you we'd have been here much sooner if we had. Still, that's disturbing news about Mace wishing to sell his daughter off again. I doubt Margaery is gonna stand for that." He smiled thinly. "In fact I know she won't."

He looked around as Daryn moved through the prisoners and the Reach men who were gradually being given their blades back, pushing the bound and gagged Joffrey before him. The Hornwood heir grinned viciously. "He had four Kingsguards with him, all of them are dead now. Dacey and I took them apart, almost literally, including a man you mentioned, Ser Blount? Dacey near sliced him in half."

From another direction came Roger, pushing Lord Serret in front of him. Roger had a cut on his arm, and was clenching and unclench one of his fists as if it pained him. "Ranma Stark, be known to Lord Rupert Serret, Hand of the little bastard boy that is trying to shout imprecations over there. He uses an axe rather well, though not quite up to my standard."

The older man rolled his eyes. "You're younger stronger and faster, what do you expect from me?" He nodded his head at Ranma. "My Lord Stark."

"Lord Serret." Ranma replied, smiling at the older man's poise. "You're remarkably cheerful for someone who's a prisoner."

Serret shrugged his shoulders. "I did my duty as per my oath to the Lannisters my Lord, no more no less and I have not done a single thing that I am ashamed of. Kill me now or later, that will remain the same and I will meet the Father with my head held high."

"Well said." Hathan replied while the other Wolfsworn simply nodded respecting the man's position.

"If that is the case, and if it is proven to be that case my Lord, then you'll only face either exile to the Silent Brothers or working hard labor for five years." The older man was hale and hearty, he'd be able to survive that where someone like Joffrey wouldn't have.

"I regret to inform you however that by my authority as King, by right of conquest of the Golden Tooth, the destruction of the Westerlands army and the execution of Lord Tywin Lannister, House Lannister is no longer the Lord Paramount of the Westerlands. Indeed, there might be no Westerlands any longer soon."

Rupert looked at him in astonishment. "What do you mean by that?"

"My wife had some interesting ideas, and it will be fascinating to see how the different families we've sent those ideas to take them, but I think you can say that the anger at how horribly the Westerlands were led in this war would have forced a change in power anyway."

Serret nodded thoughtfully, wondering what Ranma and his wife had outlined to the Westerlands. But Ranma wasn't about to tell him. "If you could take your place with the other prisoners my Lord, we should be on our way."

He turned to Ser Wendel and Hathan. "Stay behind with some of the light cavalry and burn the bodies." He ordered. Both men nodded soberly, not looking forward to the duty but understanding the necessity. With that Ranma began to reorganize his men for the march to Harrentown.

From her position near the front of the forming column Cersei glared at him angrily, then at the two men guarding her son who was still trying to shout through his gag. A sudden thought occurred to her and she looked around. "Where is my daughter Stark! You promised to protect her!"

There were some angry mutterings at the sheer effrontery of a prisoner and moreover an enemy queen shouting that at her captor, but Ranma merely smiled grimly. "She is with my wife at the moment. She's safe, though I won't say that she hasn't come through this war completely unscathed."

"What do you mean?" Cersei said her face now pinched with anxiety.

"Not my story to tell." Ranma replied with a shrug. "You'll see her soon enough. She'll be with the Army around Harrentown."

OOOOOO

That was the last time Ranma spoke for the next three days in Cersei's presence. He honestly wasn't certain how he felt about her. Ranma had liked her more than Robert, and there had been respect between them if not much trust. Then there was his relationship with Myrcella to consider and the fact this was her mother, balanced out by how the woman had treated her three children, and the fact that Joffrey had slain Tommen. He wondered who the brat's father was, but really it didn't matter and the least he could do for the woman was not to force her to air her dirty laundry in public.

Deep down Ranma didn't know if he could bring himself to execute Cersei as her treason to the crown deserved. This is one execution I might have to hand over to someone else he thought sadly. If it happens at all. I hope it doesn't, I don't want to think what it would do to Myrcella knowing that she's in love with the man who executed or even ordered her mother's execution, and I really don't want her to come to resent me for it.

Jaime on the other hand was a much easier case. He had put family loyalty above his oath to the king, but other than that and the fact it had forced him into treason against Robert, were the only two charges that they had any proof of. Therefore he would be stripped of his status as a Kingsguard, which should've happened after he killed Mad King Aerys. After that, Ranma would send him up north under guard to join his brother on the Wall. Some would say he deserved death, but Ranma had gotten his revenge on the man for his nearly killing Ranma's father when he took his sword hand.

Lord Serret too was a pretty cut and dried case. His House' territory of the Westerlands was the strongest in many ways now, since neither Lydden nor Serret had sent their full force to war, and indeed Lydden hadn't sent even a fifth of their forces. There were also two other minor Houses in the area that hadn't sent men, or at best a token force to war, since their job was to aid House Lydden in protecting the Golden Road. That road was actually a slightly better road for the invasion of the Westerlands than the River Road, and so they had been excused from the muster.

So Ranma couldn't politically afford to kill the man, which would mean he would be added to the growing penal forces and forced to work for five years.

And as for Joffrey... Ranma stared over at the youth who was glaring around at him angrily, his hands twitching occasionally on the pommel of the saddle that he had been roped to. He was also still gagged. Even when he was allowed to eat Joffrey had shouted imprecations with every other word. As for Joffrey, his execution is long overdue.

Soon after they ran into scouts in the woods near Harrentown Ranma and his men were escorted into Jason's camp where they met Jason himself quickly. "Your Majesty!" he said clasping Ranma's arm firmly and smiling at the younger man. "I see you bring prisoners."

"Jason." Ranma replied with a smile and nod of his own. "Is Harrenhal still holding out?"

"No, they surrendered when the queen and her dragons showed up. Many of those men were descended from people who remembered the last time dragons sacked Harrenhal, and they opened the doors despite the Westerlanders best efforts. It was a pure slaughter in there apparently, but the Whent men got control of the castle's gates long enough for me to ram an assault column in on it."

He grimaced angrily spitting to one side. "But it was no better than either side of that clash deserved. When they learned of my army's imminent arrival, they put Harrentown to the torch and I think they slaughtered several hundred of the smallfolk. Your lady wife heard of that, and ordered the execution of Lady Whent and the Westerlands leaders on the spot. With them dead we only took about 400 or so prisoners from both sides."

"Didn't lady Whent or her forces try protest the burning of their own damn town!?" Smalljon asked, aghast.

Around him the rest of the Wolfsworn also muttered angrily, while Ranma simply closed his eyes gritting his teeth as he tried to get control of himself. That kind of thing, that kind of gross defilement of what it meant to truly be a noble in his eyes, bypassed all of his self-control and smashed the button marked pure rage in his mind.

"A few, and those few that survived the infighting in the Castle were given clemency on the surviving townsfolk's words. Your lady wife heard the statements of the smallfolk who we ran into. A few of them were let off with only three years like the levy forces, the rest five years with no chance of parole."

"And where are Daenerys and Myrcella?" Ranma asked.

"In their tents Ranma, I'll show you."

Halfway there Ranma found himself engulfed by a hug that was fit to break a weaker man's ribs. He smiled happily lifting his wife into the air for a moment and kissing her thoroughly while all around him the army cheered and laughed or whistled as their personalities dictated.

He slowly pulled away, asking softly "Myrcella?"

"Standing up and walking around. She's recovered remarkably quickly. And..." Daenerys went on in a whisper against Ranma's ear. "Merry's remarkably upbeat about her inability to have children any longer. Said she didn't want any anyway. I'm not certain I believe her, but I don't want to push her on it just yet."

By that point Fenris had reached them, moving slowly because Myrcella was next to him, stroking his fur occasionally. She had initially needed Fenris's aide in simply walking, the giant direwolf standing in for a cane rather easily.

Ranma swooped down on her, lifting her into the air for a gentle kiss on the cheek and a hug, which under other circumstances might've raised some eyebrows, but considering what Myrcella had been dealing with none of the watching armymen thought it strange.

Myrcella smiled at him, laying her head against his shoulder for a moment before pulling back. "My family?" she asked softly.

"Captured. Jaime I'm going to send to the Wall. By the time he gets there he might be able to actually wield a sword with his offhand." At everyone's looks he shrugged. "I cut off his dominant hand during the battle. Cersei is alive, though I honestly have no idea what we'll do with her. And your brother is alive too."

"Oh really? Merry said one eyebrow raising. "Pity."

By that point the Wolfsworn had caught up with Ranma and they pushed the 'royal' prisoners ahead of them. Cersei's eyes lit up with joy at seeing her daughter, but Dacey held her shoulder firmly.

Myrcella curtsied to her mother, knowing the two of them had never been the kind to enjoy hugging one another especially in public, though Myrcella herself had since discovered that she rather liked cuddles. "Mother, I'm pleased to see you well."

"You as well my daughter." Cersei said, her voice one of intense relief, matching her face.

Merry nodded at her, but then turned her attention on her brother staring at him coldly while he stared back with rage in his eyes. She looked at Daryn, motioning to her mouth and Daryn grimaced, but removed the gag from around Joffrey's mouth. "Brother, you look well I suppose, for now anyway. I've long thought you were a young idiot ripe for hanging, maybe I should have said beheading instead."

Joffrey growled trying to escape the grip of the two Wolfsworn holding him back shouting, "I should've killed you when I had the chance!"

There was a gasp from practically everyone around, not just the Wolfsworn or the prisoners but the watching soldiers, Jason, the other Lords who had joined them and loudest of all Cersei. Joffrey didn't notice any of this simply continuing to shout vitriol at his sister. "It was you, you and Tommen! Always taking attention away from me, always trying to over shadow me with unimportant things, I should've killed you when I killed him! I am the king! All of you should be bowing before me and begging for forgiveness!"

"What you are is a kinslayer!" Myrcella shouted back, her own green eyes snapping with fury as she goaded Joffrey to confess openly. "You couldn't even take Tommy on in a fair fight! Instead you hired a damn poisoner to do your dirty work for you! And then you didn't even have the courage to come out into the open with your sadism, hiding under the name of the Vile One!"

"He deserved it!" Joffrey barked back. In his anger he completely forgot his audience if he ever had noticed them in the first place. He didn't even notice his mother's paling expression as she mouthed the word 'no' over and over again, shaking her head wildly. "Father and that traitor Stark would've named Tommen heir over me! I am the eldest I was the rightful heir!"

At that point Cersei had heard all she could take. Her mind simply shut down, and she slumped into unconsciousness, while Joffrey continued. "As for my sadism as you put it, who cares! They were only smallfolk, only traitors, like that bastard Tully! There are always more where they came from, and Edmure paid in fool for his treason against me! I am king! and you should all bow to me for forgiveness!"

Ranma looked over Cersei, shaking his head somewhat sadly. Regardless of anything else, he doubted that any woman really deserved to learn she had birthed a monster. "I think my Lords that we have heard enough from the bastard king." He said softly. "Does anyone wish to say anything in his defense?"

Not a person there did anything but shake their heads staring at Joffrey in disgust. Not even Lord Serret had realized how sadistic Joffrey had been or for how long. And that was without discounting the whole kinslaying bit. That was a crime against every known religion and law of the land, even if he hadn't done the actual deed.

"In that case my Lords, I see no reason to put off justice being done." He pulled Ice out from its sheath on his back and gestured to Daryn and Roger. They pushed Joffrey to his knees, pushing his body so that his head was leaning forward from the rest of his body. Even so Joffrey continued to shout angrily ordering them to release him that he was the king, that he would have them flayed alive for this effrontery. But no one was listening any longer.

It was only as Ranma stood next to him with Ice raised that Joffrey fell silent, staring up at Ranma, his face paling as he suddenly understood that nothing he said now mattered at all. "Joffrey Waters, by your own words you have proven guilty of the charges of treason and murder most foul in the guise of the Vile One of numerous smallfolk and my kinsman Edmure Tully, and of slaying your brother Tommen, the trueborn heir of Robert the First. The penalty is death."

With that he brought Ice down, and Joffrey Waters, would-be King of Westeros, the Vile One who had terrorized King's Landing before the plague hit, died.

OOOOOO

Later that same evening Ranma was staring out across the water of the gods Eye towards the Isle of one side Myrcella was shaking her head sadly. "She's catatonic. I don't know how long she will be so, but my mother can't do anything for herself now. I ordered one of my helpers to feed her, but honestly, I don't know if my mother's mind can recover from the strain of hearing about Joffrey's acts. She devoted so much of herself to him that hearing about how evil he had become, it broke something in her Ranma, and I don't know if she'll ever heal."

Daenerys stood beside the old younger girl, one arm over her shoulders. "I have no idea what justice would be in this case Ranma. All my old concerns and fears are telling me to execute the woman, but the queen in me says that wouldn't be justice now. How could it be justice when she can't even feel it, which can't even realize why she's being killed? "

"We'll send her to the Silent Sisters up in White Harbor. She'll get aid there I suppose, and that will put her far enough away from the Westerlands that no Lannister agent will be able to rescue her for whatever reason. If she ever regains her mind, we might have to rethink it, but until then I don't think there's anything we could do to Cersei now that her own mind is doing to her on its own." Ranma said with a note of finality his voice.

He looked up smiling slightly as Rhaegon flew above. Rhaegon would be carrying Daenerys to the island, while he rowed himself and Fenris out to it. The rest of the lords were busy reforming the army to march, or investing Harrenhal. But something told Ranma that he needed to be out there and getting the message tonight, when the moon was high in the sky and waning, when the skies were remarkably clear for an autumn day.

When she heard about it Daenerys had refused to let him go alone, saying she wished to see if she could hear the message as well. Myrcella had also wanted to come with them, but Ranma and Daenerys had put their feet down. Merry needed her rest, and there was no telling how long this might take. Myrcella had acceded to that, before curling up with Sunfyre, who had become almost as protective of her as they were of Daenerys. They wouldn't obey her commands of course, but they were protective of the girl-who-helped-to-groom-them.

Rhaegon landed with a splash on the shoreline of the large inland lake, grinning widely around a large fish that he had captured somehow. Daenerys laughed, rubbing her fingers over his eye ridges above his eyes causing him to croon a little before moving to get into the saddle. Ranma nodded at her, and said simply, "I'll see you over there. But don't land until I wave the torch all right? There might be other people over there for all we know."

Daenerys nodded, saying nothing. In actuality dragons could see in the dark almost as well as cats and Rhaegon had already scouted around the island, seeing no sign of any kind of habitation. Still if it that makes Ranma feel better I'll agree to it. She knew Ranma had beaten himself up inside several times since the treason of House Darry because he had not been there to defend her or Myrcella. It was foolish of him, after all who else could have led the attacks on the Golden Tooth or House Keith and accomplished both tasks so well. But it was still there.

Actually she and Rhaegon only had to circle the island twice before Ranma was there, the speed with which he was rowing himself through the water leaving a wide churning wake behind him. He jumped up over the side of the boat, then allowed Fenris to sniff the air for a moment before sending him deeper into the small forest that dominated the island. Standing there he stared at the trees he could see in the light of his torch. Each one of them had a face on them, and more than half he could see were the white of weirwood trees. God, there must be more weirwood trees here than there are everywhere else South of the Neck combined! No wonder the old gods have enough strength to reach me here!

After a moment Fenris came back, every inch of his body radiating happiness. This island was almost like being home in the North, still too warm for his tastes but the feeling the air was almost the same. And there were no people here either.

After getting that message through their link Ranma waved the torch he had kept from the boat, and soon Rhaegon landed in the shallows by the island's shore. Daenerys jumped off, then sent Rhaegon off to hunt for more fish. They weren't quite as good as crab, but they were good, and hunting them from the air was tremendous fun.

Daenerys stared around at the faces in the trees her own face showing awe. "This is, this is incredible! I've read about this place, but to see it for myself, to feel it... Can you feel that?"

"The power of the Children of the Forest, and the Old Gods is very strong here." Ranma said with a nod. He closed his eyes, breathing deeply in the air as one hand found Fenris' neck and scratch there deeply. "Come on. I think we need to go further in."

Arm in arm the two of them moved through the forest, while Fenris padded the side them silent as a forest creature could be. Soon enough the three of them came to a gigantic weirwood tree, carved not with one face, but with several. A few of them were quite clearly not human, too elongated, too thin of face and with their ears too pointed and large to be that of a human. The other faces were humans, and one of them in particular called to Ranma. He moved forward, gently tracing its features. "This one, this one could be my ancestor I suppose. Same cheekbones, same general features, frankly it looks like the carving in the crypt I've seen of my great-grandfather."

"That would be correct Stark," said a voice, causing Ranma to whirl, Ice suddenly in his hands as if teleported there. Fenris growled as well and, Daenerys quickly pulled out Dark Sister.

From all around them through the trees came ten men dressed all in green. The leggings were green, their shirts were green, their hair, what could be seen in Ranma's torch, was green and the masks they wore were also green. Those masks were simple affairs, simply bunches of leaves and a wooden mask. They could've been comical, but somehow, maybe because of the way they had snuck up on the Fenris and Ranma or because of something else, they were not.

"We are the Green Men." Said one before Ranma could ask who the hell they were or how the hell they had snuck up on them. "We tend the trees and we keep away those who would harm them. We have known of your coming for months now Stark, though you arrive barely in time. The Old Gods have a message for you, one that we do not know, but one which is important enough for them to speak to a mortal in such a way that we have never heard of before."

Ranma was silent, not speaking of the few times he had already felt the touch of the old gods on his mind. He understood that they had been more proactive of late to stave off a disaster they could see coming, but it would probably come as a shock to these men. Something about them said they were no longer men to his senses. Not really, they felt almost like trees themselves, but not quite.

"Kneel Stark." said one of them, his features and voice indistinguishable from all the others. "Kneel and hear the voice of the Old Gods!"

Ranma growled, shaking his head. "When I pray to the old gods I bow, I don't kneel." He moved over to the massive tree with the many faces carved on it, and reached out with both hands gently touching the weirwood tree on either side of his ancestor's face. Then he closed his eyes, and began to send his own senses out into the tree. The response was immediate and almost overpowering. Suddenly his mind was taken over, deluged with images after images.

He saw a woman of impossible beauty, with too perfect features to be truly human, locked in an embrace with a man, whose features were obscured. A voice whispered in his ear. An old trick used again.

Blood in the snow, hundreds men fighting in a snowstorm the likes of which Ranma had never dreamed. The dead walking, under a banner whose face he couldn't see raised in dead hands. Ice, mountains of ice moving slowly South. Creatures from out of nightmare, giant spiders, things that looked like polar-bears only with four heads and six arms wearing armor, undead dragons, massive undead mastodons with fell blue light gleaming in their eyes along with an inhuman intelligence.

And he saw the Others themselves, clad in armor of blackest night, their swords glistening like ice in their hands as they moved. He saw the dragons in the sky, he saw the Wall standing, he saw the passing of two moons and somehow knew that he had to be back in the North in two months' time. He saw death, he saw destruction, he saw sieges, he saw winter coming alive and engulfing the land of men.

He saw, and he saw until he wrenched his hands away from the tree and collapsed gasping for air.

Daenerys was at Ranma's side instantly, dropping Dark Sister to the ground beneath them as Ranma cradled his head in his hands. Blood was streaming down his face from his nose and from his eyes, but already his healing ability was kicking in. "What did you see Ranma! What did they want to tell you?"

Ranma looked up at her shaking his head. "T, two months, we need to be back in the north in two months' time, or else we'll be too late to stop the White Walkers from gaining a foothold on this side of the Wall. We're running out of time."

End chapter

---

And with that, we will have a chapter of what is going on up north, FINALLY, as well as other people, and we finally see what has been going on in the Vale. I wanted to put in a Margaery portion here, but decided against it simply because I couldn't quite get her speech in that part right. As such, I am afraid it will be shown in a "Two week's before" sort of thing. Not a flashback, but still not a literary tool I liked to us

As always hope you enjoyed it, and please review.

*Chapter 17*: Chapter 17

I do not own Ranma 1/2 or ASolaF, mores the pity. The second would be done, and the first would have had much more combat and romance father than slapstick comedy.

I would like at this time to recommend to my readers that you go and look for the light novel series called Heavy Object. Combat, comedy and character driven it is all there, and the translation over at Baka-Tsuki is one of the best I've ever seen on light novels. Some of the jokes man, so damn funny! I've even seen the anime it's based off of, and if it follows the light novel as much as possible, it could be the best new anime I've seen for a long time. Best giant robot anime in years no doubt, simply because the characters Heivia and Quenther, have to take out the giant robots with cunning and plans rather than strapping into one themselves. And their back and forth is freaking hilarious.

This chapter was a bit of an issue, simply because I am not as emotionally invested in most of the characters who I use as POV here. Unfortunately I couldn't just wave my hand and make the events in this chapter not happen, and I wanted to show rather than tell as many of these events as I could without becoming incredibly bogged down.

Thanks go to Anthony444 for his beta-work, but as always we are still dealing with missing space and DNS issues. The spellchecker on FF can't keep up with all the names, and stops working before halfway down the page, so checking it through is almost impossible.

Anyway, here we go.

---

Wild Wolf 17 Threats Abound

While Ranma was waging his Riverlands campaign against the Lannisters, the North had continued to prepare for the coming of winter and for the supernatural forces that every Lord in the North knew were on their way. It had been eight thousand years since the events of the Long Night, but the North still remembered. While only bits and pieces of knowledge of the great enemy had survived in story and song, with very few written records, what was needed to survive through a long winter was known by everyone.

"...And the mountain clansmen seconded to Lord Hornwood have reported they haven't seen any sign of further Ironborn, so I think we can assume that their aborted invasion has ended. In other news, House Moss sent a raven this morning. They report that their holdfast is prepared for winter, which means the last of bannermen have sent messages of their House's readiness. Of course just because the holdfasts are ready don't mean the people are or their larders, and I have my doubts about a few of them my Lord, so if you would..."

"Yes I know the ones you're speaking of, and I will send a force of my own men out on rounds to their holdfasts to make certain." Eddard said with a nod over his shoulder from where he was standing by the window. Yet it was obvious his mind was not on what Maester Luwin was saying.

He and his wife were staring down into Winterfell's courtyard, where Rickon was beginning to learn the ways of the sword. To one side Rickon's direwolf Shaggydog had begun its own training at the hands of the gentle giant Hodor. He was the only man in the Castle that was stronger than the direwolf at this point, and he was also utterly fearless around the large beast.

"That should've happened months ago." Catelyn said tartly from beside him holding their baby Hoster in her arms, jutting down at the direwolf with her chin. "Nor am I pleased with how fascinated Hoster is with the large creatures, every time he escapes me or his nurse he tries to find Shaggydog or Summer. Summer is a pure darling with him, but Shaggydog just doesn't have the same control over himself."

Presently Hoster was asleep, his lips still stained somewhat with mother's milk, and the sight of him there in Catelyn's arms made Eddard smile, his small but oh-so-warm smile that had made Catelyn fall for him years ago. While it was still too soon to tell what color the babe's hair would be, it looks to be as red as Sansa or Bran's, though his eyes were clear Stark, and he certainly seemed to have the same rambunctious nature as Arya, Rickon and Ranma.

"We'll have to train Shaggydog as much as we can, or let him out loose into the wild. And the direwolf would be a deadly threat to any band of hunters it came across."

"I know that, it's just I wish one of the others was here to help train him, that's all."

"You wish that for more than just the aid in training Shaggydog my love, as do I." Eddard said with a sigh. "Given the threat bearing down on us, I could wish that the Queen had not started this whole war."

"I think this war was brewing the moment Robert and the Queen married. The Queen was always a haughty, prideful woman, and no woman would willingly put up with the way Robert treated her, dishonoring her as blatantly as he did." Catelyn mused.

To that Eddard simply nodded, unwilling at this date to try and defend his friend's memory. "True enough." Then Eddard sighed, leaning over to kiss Catelyn gently on the cheek.

Taking her cue Catelyn nodded. "I think it's time for this one to be taken away husband, I don't want yours or the good maester's voices to wake him up." Catelyn smirked, shaking her head. "I don't get enough sleep as it is with him around."

Luwin stood up from his chair in front of his Lord's desk to bow from the waist as Catelyn left, then turned back to Eddard who had moved over to sit down, his face far grimmer than it had been. "I've picked out five of my best men, each of them will lead 10 others, to head out on inspections of the holdfasts on House Stark lands then to every minor Lord beholden directly to us. I refuse to let any of our folk freeze or starve because one of their lords did not wish to put forth the effort to truly prepare for winter, whatever his reasons."

Luwin nodded, then marked off a list of names that Eddard spoke before his Lord moved on to the next subject. "Has there been further word from House Manderly?"

"Yes my Lord." Luwin smiled faintly. "Lord Manderly might not be the most martial character, but he has some of the neatest handwriting I have ever seen. He reports that White Harbor is almost prepared for winter, and that he has put out the word on his lands ordering as many families as possible to gather in the city. It's giving him a surprisingly large boost to his workforce, and several old projects have been taken up apparently to renovate the city."

"More importantly, one of his factors in Essos has reported in. They were able to retain the Windblown, though of course White Harbor will have to supply them with winter coats and clothes before they can arrive, which the factor has taken out of their pay, a canny move that. According to the report they are nearly at full strength, 2,000 men mostly infantry and horse."

"That is fine." Eddard said with a nod. "I received word from our workers on the White Knife that it is clear all the way from Long Lake down to White Harbor and even the tributary that heads into House Cerwyn's land is now prepared for large barge traffic. When it starts freezing we'll have problems, but I believe that my son wishes to speak to the two of us tonight about that very thing." He smiled proudly. "Bran the Builder come again!"

He frowned thoughtfully then, leaning back in his chair as he stared at the ceiling. Word had reached them of the string of initial victories that Ranma and his forces had won, the fall of the Twins being the most major one. There had been news from White Harbor a few weeks back of another victory down near Fairmarket, but the further south the army went, the worse the line of communication up to the North became.

Eddard was worried for his oldest sons and Arya, worried about his daughter-in-law, worried about what might be happening down south, very worried. So was only with an effort of will that he was able to turn back to matters he could actually control. Leave the war in Ranma's capable hands, he's proven time and time again that he is up to that task. Deal with what you can here, so that he has a home to come back to when it's over.

"I note," he said coming back to the here and now. "That you did not mention Barrowton or House Dustin."

"No, my Lord." Luwin said coughing somewhat delicately. "Lady Dustin has not sent any word. And given the distances, I'm afraid I haven't been able to hear of any rumors about anything from there, but it worries me. On the other hand, Torren's Square has reported they are well along their own preparations."

"I'll write out a message to Lord Ryswell." Eddard said with a sigh. "As the woman's father, I suppose he can be relied upon to make certain that she is doing her duty there, old gods know if I write the woman myself she'll just dig in her heels further. I'll have it for you later tonight. Is there anything else we need to work on before I turned to Winterfell's own paperwork?" He allowed his lips to twitch and smile, and a slight, hopeful edge enter his voice for a moment.

There wasn't, and Luwin left his lord to his work. Despite having technically stepped down as Lord of Winterfell with Ranma elsewhere, all the duties of the Lord Paramount had once again settled on Eddard's shoulders. By rights he should have been making Bran help him, since for now Bran was his older brother's heir. But Luwin and Eddard had spoken about it along with Catelyn, and had decided that Bran's abilities were best spent elsewhere.

Later that evening Bran proved that allowing him to work on his own projects was indeed the best use of his time. He sat across from his parents at the head table, while all around them the meal continued while the youth gestured excitedly to several sketches he had made on precious pieces of parchment. "Skates I call them, they'll have to be heavy, and of iron, and putting them on and off will be a massive chore. But with this, and with some method of moving the ships down the river, we should be able to continue to use the White Knife for traffic once it's frozen over entirely."

Looking at the drawings Eddard pursed his lips. "How exactly would these skate barges move my son?"

"Pulled by teams of reindeer, father. That's one way anyway. Reindeer and moose can pull surprisingly large loads, not as much as oxen, but quite a bit."

"Will these barges be able to transport as heavy loads as you could if the river was not frozen?" Catelyn asked.

Bran shook his head. "No, if we tried the same size loads we'd have to use triple teams, and it would still be incredibly slow." The river barges could carry up to twenty times the amount of a wagon cart, possibly as much as seven thousand stone. "I thought about using wind power, but I don't think that would work really, since if the river-men were slow about responding they could find themselves skidding off the river and I don't think the skates would respond well to that. I'd like to set up some experiments father, if you don't mind? But I don't think that's the way to go. Smaller barges during the winter will have to be necessary."

"Building such will be another expense..." Luwin murmured.

"We are good for it, my friend." Eddard said with a smile. "Besides, I am almost positive that House Umber and House Manderly would be willing to pay for half the construction costs for some of these barges, and if we pay for half of them, then we get half the profits down the line that the families working them receive. Even in winter the economy must move."

Catelyn nodded firmly, and Luwin smiled slightly. That was one area where Eddard was totally unlike most lords. He understood the fact that the economy, the movement of goods and the exchange of said, made everything go around.

The designs in question were simple affairs, a barge with a large roofed portion in the front, where Bran said that the workers for the barge would be housed, simple cots shown on another sketch, along with a small kitchenette. Water of course would be no issue, and heating up the frozen water would remove any poisons from it.

"The work will be difficult." Luwin murmured, still playing the part of the Stranger's advocate, seeing the down side in all things as was his role in these meetings.

"True enough, but I believe that we can incite people to sign up to join these barge crews even in the midst of winter with incentives in the way of food or drink, or if whole families then they could be given a percentage of the profits from every load they deliver. Say 5 or 10%, unless they work on the actual creation of the barges as well, which of course would bump that up to 30 or 40. All of us would still make a tidy profit even so." Eddard replied thoughtfully.

That was true, and not just because of the iron deposits on the newly created House Shieldarm's lands. Those were even larger than Luwin's initial estimates had shown, though eventually the ease with which it was being mined would fade of course. House Umber however had massive reserves of coal. That coal could be the difference between life and death once the full winter chill closed in for many. And in return, the other houses would pay through the nose for that coal, either in goods such as from White Harbor, Winterfell, or House Locke, or in silver and gold such as in the case of the others.

"The profit point will be especially true when winter starts moving south of the Neck. The Riverlands might have coal deposits closer to home, but transportation would still be an issue as would the workforce in the dead of winter. I have no idea how prepared the Lords in the South are for this winter, even if the Council of Maesters announced autumn months ago." Catelyn said shaking her head, before going on.

"Worse, with the war raging down there I don't think any Lord will have enough time or energy to devote preparing his lands for winter, and while I have extreme respect for the common sense of the smallfolk, no doubt even among them there will be those who do not believe that this winter will be any worse than the last one. And coal was never mined as heavily south of the neck as it is here in the North."

"True enough." Eddard sighed, before smiling at his son. "You're fidgeting Bran. That means you have something else to show us, yes?"

Bran nodded, grinning at his father and then his mother who smiled proudly at him. Bran would never be a warrior, would never be a leader of men in the field of combat. But his mind and energy had done more for Winterfell and for the North in general than any hundred such men.

"Yes father I do." He replied, reaching down into a small pouch. What he pulled out looked like a large hand and a half sized cage of thing iron shaped in a ball, but inside was a small glowing piece of coal. The heat could be felt coming off a thing as Bran gingerly set it down on the table, holding it by a small chain that was about the length of his father's hand. "This is a new design father, it's nothing incredibly inventive, but..." He shrugged uncomfortably, never really happy about putting himself forward like this.

"But, it can be held hanging at someone's belt buckle." Said Eddard thoughtfully, tapping the end of the chain with a finger. "And held under a cloak?"

"Yes! That's what I thought anyway. It would keep a person's body warm, and so long as they had gloves and a cloak, it would, I think, be just enough to keep them warm enough to survive in a winter's night." Weeks later Bran had moved on from those projects, leaving them in the hands of skilled carpenters and blacksmiths pulled from all around House Stark's land, so that he could work with training up the first few groups of reindeer and Moose from the mountains. They had been brought down by the mountain clans, who are now investing Wintertown. This was part of their eons old agreement with House Stark. Wintertown was always open to the mountain clans in times of winter.

"Your lad's a wonder with the animals." Said the Wull, standing on the wall of Winterfell as he stared down into the courtyard, then over the wall out into Wintertown. "And I can't thank you enough for this Stark."

Eddard shrugged. "My family has always held Wintertown open for you and yours my friend, the length of the winter is immaterial to that."

"Aye, but we've been feeling it sore these past few weeks up in the mountains. Every man knows it's going to be a bad one, and a long one."

"True enough on many levels." Eddard said with a sigh. The two men exchanged a worried glance, turning their gazes northward. "That is the direction the real threat will come." Eddard murmured. "We have a few months, then winter will truly be upon us here in the North, and what comes with it." He shook his head. "I could hope my son has finished up in the south, but with all of the damned politics down there, that's doubtful."

The Wull grunted irritably, not saying anything about that. "It'll be worse on the Wall."

"Oh yes." Eddard said shaking his head. "I have no doubt it will be much worse on the Wall."

OOOOOO

At the same time that his family was being hammered by Ranma and Winterfell was keeping busy, Tyrion Brightwall, Lord Commander of the Order of the Ardent Defender, was leaning back in a comfortable chair reflecting on the past few months. The luxury was something unusual here on the Wall, and had been bought by Tyrion's quickly dwindling funds, but it and the bed that occupied a portion of his corridors here in Sable Hall, was well worth it. As were the services of the whore who was sleeping in his bed at the present moment, though her affections for a week cost him far less than paying for the transportation of the bed she was sleeping on.

It had taken his ship a month to get up from White Harbor to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, and another two weeks to travel along the wall back the Castle Black. The going was far harder on the ocean at this point, and bits and pieces of ice had begun to appear when they rounded the cape into the Bay of Seals, some of which would tear the bottom of a ship out as easily as any rock.

Still, the ship had made its way through, and he had eventually returned to Castle Black with the remit of his new knightly order in hand. Jeor Mormont had looked at the idea askance at first, but when Tyrion explained the king and queen's reasoning, as well as what it would mean for the Wall, he acquiesced with good grace.

But since then Tyrion gotten to work organizing his new order, seconding several men into it immediately. Most of these men came from the mercenaries who'd been hired in ones and twos from Essos or elsewhere, the least worse of them was Bronn. A decent swordsman and tactician whose loyalty stayed true to whoever bought it, Bronn had become Tyrion's second-in-command of the Order, and had already picked out land for it in The Gift.

Tyrion smirked a little. I doubt any of the Northerners really know why we've chosen that particular bit of land, and I'm certainly not going to point it out to them. It had originally been part of Brandon's Gift, and it was about three days back of the Wall straight down from Rimegate and Sable Hall. It contained an old mine. In the past it had apparently been for coal, but had been abandoned years ago for some reason. And according to Bronn it also contained what might prove to be a seam of diamonds.

At least that's what Bronn says, but since he and his men were brave enough to go into that mine to look around, it behooves me to believe him. Especially since the man said his father was a miner and his family miners as far back as anyone can remember. It will take time and a lot of hard work, but eventually my knightly order is not going to be totally dependent on the crown for its income.

Yet strangely enough for anyone who knew the Lannisters, Tyrion wasn't thinking about that fact with the idea of betraying Ranma and Daenerys. No, he had made a home for himself here on the Wall, he was respected here not as a Lannister but as Tyrion Brightwall, and that was worth more to him than he would have been prepared to admit given how many dreams he'd had of being Lord Lannister.

Indeed, he'd been so busy of late that he'd had no time to spare worrying about his family, not that he had any inclination to do so for most of them, an aunt or cousin here and there, and of course his brother was about all actually. No, that money wouldn't be used to foment any kind of rebellion, instead it would be used to make his life up here as comfortable as possible, well, him and his order in its entirety. That and the work being done here in Sable Hall was making it almost homely already.

Pretty good work, considering that I was only able to use fifteen men to clear the castle out. Six of the ten floors of the Castle have already been cleared out, and the last of my so-called recruits have been sworn in. I could wish that I had some input on the oath they had sworn, but frankly it makes sense and it's certainly softer than the Night's Watch oath.

The oath in question, which Daenerys and Ranma had come up with, was much like that of most knightly orders but made a special point to emphasize two areas: one, its mission of guarding the Wall, and two, maintaining the siege equipment along the Wall. This would allow the order to have a far larger segment of its numbers devoted to logistics than any normal Knightly Order would have been able to. Indeed, actual combat skills with anything but bows weren't necessary for the Order of the Ardent Defender.

The other bit was that one of the royals had realized that whatever they could do, life on the Wall would always be harsh, and forcing someone to remain there forever, especially someone who volunteered for it, would make recruitment far harder. So the order had three levels of commitment. Only one level, those men who had joined the order from the Night's Watch or like Tyrion himself who was here due to political reasons, had to remain on the wall the rest of their lives.

The other two levels were based on time spent on the Wall. The first was for raw recruits, an oath to remain on the Wall for a year, to see if they could handle it, named Novitiates. If they couldn't they could leave at the end of the year with no dishonor, but nothing to show for it save free transportation down to White Harbor, not even their weapons.

Named Cavaliers, a Braavosi term, the second group would be served for eight years. If they left at the end rather than signing up for another hitch the cavaliers would be paid handsomely for their time. Enough for any of man to set a man and his family up in a trade or with land and be very well off. Dozens of young men from White Harbor and House Flint had already signed up for this commitment level, and Tyrion had welcomed the additions to his work force.

His thoughts were interrupted by his door banging open abruptly. Tyrion looked up one eyebrow raised as Bronn stepped through leering for a moment at the whore on the bed who quickly covered herself up, scowling irritably at the other man. "Another new girl Little Lion?"

"Ah well, I have to do my part to live up to our orders name of the Ardent Defender you know." Tyrion laughed then asked, "So what brings you to my room Bronn?"

"A messenger has arrived from Castle Black oh ardent one, the Old Bear has called for a meeting apparently."

Tyrion groaned aloud, uncaring that both Bronn and the northern wench in his bed were smirking at him now. "Have mercy on these Westerlands bones of mine. Please don't say I have to go back out onto that Wall!"

"Life is hard and then you die." Bronn said with a grim yet amused smile. He moved over to a pile of clothing by the bed, smirking at the woman who chuckled a little curling up in the bed under the covers while Bronn turned back to Tyrion tossing the clothing at him. "Bundle up warm now yer Lordship, we wouldn't want anything important to freeze off would we?"

"Next you'll tell me that the sky is blue, or that water is wet." Tyrion groaned, but began to pull on a heavy cloak over his normal clothing. He then pulled on a warm set of excellent gloves, which he had made to fit before leaving White Harbor, since none of the ones sent up to the Wall or already here for the Night's Watch had come in his size. And they had been almost as expensive as the bed he'd ordered at the same time, minus its transportation costs of course.

Still they were more than worth the money, something he was forced to once more admit after leaving heading up onto the Wall. It was cold down below but up here it was far worse. Frostbite had claimed several lives already, and it was going to get worse. He and Bronn stood there for a moment, checking over one another to make certain that every bit and piece of skin was covered, a necessity for anyone working on the Wall at this point for an extended length of their eyes were covered by thin strips of cloth. "Let's get this over with." Tyrion said his words muffled by the heavy scarf he wore woven around his head.

Bronn nodded, and they both moved up on across the Wall briskly. The journey took several hours but thanks to their warm clothing, the trip wasn't nearly as arduous as Tyrion made it out to be.

Tyrion spent a brief moment looking over the Wall out into the distance of the North beyond it, wondering how the wildlings were getting on with this cold. Of course, they have a lot of experience with it just like these northern louts do. Though I don't think they'll have handled it as well, and of course we have the castles as well as all of the other preparations on the Wall.

It had astonished Tyrion how methodically and easily the Northerners had taken to the drop in temperature. It pained him to admit that most of the casualties were among the Night's Watchmen who had come from south of the Neck or the mercenaries. It had hammered his new Order quite a bit, but it had tapered off quickly as men began to learn the necessary skills to survive. Of course Tyrion's own ideas for the small signal towers and their braziers had helped tremendously.

When they reached the lift down to Castle Black all of the men nodded at Tyrion familiarly, causing him to grin and spend a few moments joking with them before getting on the large device. It was a sense of camaraderie, a sense of belonging and respect that he had never truly felt with anyone but Jaime and a few others from his own family who are willing to ignore his father's example before.

Soon enough Tyrion was ensconced in Jeor's room by the fire, while Bronn and his other men went off to find their own fires or other ways of getting warm. He was not the only one there. Benjen Stark was there as well, along with representatives from Eastwatch, Shadow Tower, and all of the other forces on the Wall. They all nodded respectfully to Tyrion, then turned their attention back to Jeor Mormont, who was sitting in his own chair in the circle, while before them all the map of the Wall was stretched out from one end of the table to the other.

After Tyrion had taken his seat Jeor turned his attention back to Harrion Karstark, while Tyrion idly wondered how he and the commander of Eastwatch had arrived before him. "So you executed them?"

"They might have been Night's Watch, but being in the Night's Watch only absolves you of crimes before you join. Both men were guilty of rape and murder, as well to try and cover up their rape. Moreover, the woman wasn't a whore from the Wall, she was one of the drovers wives from the Gift. If I hadn't executed both of them we might have had a riot on our hands. I did it cleanly, I doubt house Umber would've done the same."

"Aye, we would've made them howl for mercy first." Said Mors, scowling fiercely. "We can't let that kind of lack of discipline stand, especially when it c'd impact our supplies."

Tyrion remained silent, understanding that this talk was not the real reason why he was here, just something that had been going on before he arrived.

The old Night's Watch commander nodded slowly, like the bear on his old family crest, ponderous but with the certain weight to it. "True enough. But it isn't an isolated incident, those two made the, what, twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth men of the Night's Watch to be executed for crimes since the reinforcements on the Wall began?"

Another Night's Watchmen whose name Tyrion didn't know nodded from where he stood behind his Lord. "Some men just aren't willing to learn from examples my Lord, but for the most part the men realize what they can and can't get away with. I don't think it's a big issue just yet but once we face a large-scale battle it might be, especially if we take prisoners but..." He shrugged. "Those will be wildlings anyway."

"Sooner put my cock in a meat grinder then fuck a spearwife," said Harrion exchanging a laugh of agreement with a few of the others, including Tyrion. "Still, rights of war and all that."

To one side sipping at his own mug of warm ale Benjen grimaced. He knew all too well how his oldest nephew would reply to a statement like that and hoped that the boy never learned of it. But without Ranma here, there was no one who cared enough to stand up for such women after the battle ended. Yes, many of the men who were present would refuse to take part, but that was a long way from actively fighting their fellows to stop it from occurring in the first place.

"Let's move onto another topic." said Jeor turning to Tyrion. "Your requisition from King's Landing has finally arrived Little Lion. It had to be transported overland from White Harbor. Apparently the seas have become too rough to transport the wildfire safely. It and the alchemists are here now. We'll talk to them later, after Kyle, Denys and Bowen arrive from Shadow Tower and Westwatch-by-the-Bridge. For now, tell me about the latest work on the catapults."

Tyrion nodded agreeably, and went over what everyone there already probably knew before Kyle Condon and Bowen Marsh arrived a few hours later. Bowen Marsh was a short, fat faced man, with wide shoulders and a face made uglier by years and a nose that looked squashed and misshapen. He was not the most welcoming of men to the reinforcements, and had been sent to command Westwatch-By-the-Bridge after it had been reopened and repaired more to get him out of the way than anything else.

Ostensibly he should have been under command of Denys Mallister, commander of Shadow Tower. Slightly older than even Jeor, he'd been known as a stern, unflappable man who had joined the Night's Watch because he thought their calling an honorable one rather than because he was forced to. His death in his sleep had been a blow to all who knew him, and put a not insignificant hole in the Wall's command structure.

By the point Kyle and Bowen arrived it was night out, not that it mattered here in Jeor's study. After Kyle sat, and had a few moments to sip at the warm ale prepared for him and warm his feet by the fire Jeor began without further preamble. "Benjen, you have the floor."

Benjen nodded, setting his own mug down and looking around the circle grimly. "I've pulled back all of my scouts." He said bluntly. "The wildlings have pushed up almost to the edge of the Haunted Forest and their numbers are tremendous. I wouldn't have believed that anyone could move that many wildlings in one direction, but Mance seems to have figured out the tune to make them all dance the way he wants them to. My best estimate, and I hasten to point out this is only an estimate, is that the outriders of the horde number at least 12,000 straight north of Castle Black. A few of my scouts were able to get past them further to the east and west, and judging from how wildly they report seeing camps, all told the wildlings might number around 200,000."

Into the thoughtful silence that started Benjen went on in a softer tone. "Of course it's spread out, I would estimate that none of the wildling forces have more than six or eight thousand in anyone camp. But they're all coming south as quickly as they can."

"Did any of your scouts report anything... unusual?" Jeor asked, looking at him. The two of them had already gone over this, but a few of the commanders had evinced some skepticism about what the Lords from Winterfell had shared by raven weeks ago. He didn't, nor did Benjen.

Tyrion did somewhat despite his discussion with Ranma and his queen, but then again that was simply Tyrion's nature coming out. He never believed much of anything until he could examine it for himself.

"Several things." Benjen replied with a nod. "Many of them report seeing odd blue lights occasionally in the distance at night. Obviously none of them were wishful to come any closer than they had to such as that. And the wildlings don't go around at night in parties smaller than a hundred."

"They're not even attacking us in smaller groups than that." Said Kyle with a nod, his handsome face grim. He had been a skeptic at first, but the actions of the wildlings were beginning to worry him, lending credence to the idea of what might be out there. He then glanced at Jeor. "I understand that you tried to send an official parlay out?"

"I had hoped that the wildlings would be willing to talk at least." Replied Jeor. "But they don't. Their hatred for us, for the crows as they call us, is too powerful, let alone their disdain for 'kneelers' in general."

"My men would not be willing to go along with any kind of treaty with those savages." Mors Umber stated flatly nodding to a man behind him, who nodded back angrily. "Our memories are as long as the Norrey. They've raided our lands too often, carrying off our womenfolk and killing too many of our folk. If they want to come ahead, even if they're bein' pressed from behind by the White Walkers, I won't shed a single tear for the entire fucking horde."

"You would not be alone in that alas." Said Jeor. "But I have to look beyond the wildlings to the White Walkers and wonder what kind of force they have prepared. Not since the Night's King have they been seen, and even then it was more rumor than fact. Nor am I happy about how few of our men really believe the true threat coming."

Admittedly that was more a problem for Tyrion and Jeor than it was for the pure northern or clan forces. Southerners simply didn't believe in anything to do with the White Walkers until they stared at it in the face, and the fact that the only Maester on the Wall that did believe was the ancient Targaryen Aemon was not helping matters there. Every other maester on the Wall refused to even consider their existence seriously, some even calling into doubt the original stories about them.

"We could use their numbers holding the Wall, but if they don't talk to us..." Jeor shrugged philosophically. "There's nothing more that we can do. But I do want to make it very clear that if they begin to talk to us, we will be open to it. You don't have to like it Mors, but we might need those men, aye and women, on the Wall."

For a moment tension gripped the room as the two old men stared at one another their gazes unflinching and hard. But then Tyrion spoke up philosophically. "That is a bridge we can cross when or rather if we get to it. For now, are there any more preparations we need to make?"

"Two points. I am ordering the sealing of Stonedoor, Queensgate, and Rimegate's tunnels. I want them frozen all the way through as quickly as possible, which will leave the one here at Castle Black, we'll see if we can possibly trick them into attacking us here."

There were four tunnels through the wall, named for the castles they were part of. Defended by dozens of murder holes around and above them, several heavy oaken doors, and portcullises, they were the only technically weaknesses in the Wall's defenses. But they could be made as solid as the rest of the wall by stuffing them with stone and water, which would freeze and make the tunnels just another part of the Wall.

"Second, I think it's time we open the old armory in every other castle as we have here in Castle Black." Jeor went on. "I'm pulling off men from the continued work on the siege weapons to do those things."

Tyrion nodded, making a note to head down there himself. He'd heard rumors about the old armories, and the fact they housed weapons that had been used against the White Walkers eons ago, but what those weapons were he couldn't discern. Sable Hall had an armory, but it didn't have anything special in it.

Worse, Tyrion couldn't read any of the records that might pertain to it. They were so badly faded no one could make out anything but a word here and there, not enough to give them any true solid information outside what Jon Stark had found in Winterfell, which was far too little.

"I also want every Castle to have half of their men ready to reinforce the guards on the Wall day and night. Just because we have the Wall and the siege weapons and everything else is no reason we can overlook the threat the wildlings pose."

After that Jeor called in the alchemists, giving them their marching orders, and formally turning over Oakenshield, the castle directly east of Castle Black which had already been opened and cleaned, to them. "Whatever you need to make more wildfire you'll get. I want to give the wildlings and anything else coming south a warm reception."

Soon after, Tyrion excused himself. He and Bronn made their way down into the depths of the castle, where the armory here had already been opened.

Inside they found the room packed with old suits of armor, mostly bronze and iron, with a few bits and pieces of rusted rune-encrusted armor here and there standing out from the crowd, their surfaces mangled and scarred. There were also old casks of arrowheads, though when Bronn opened one up he laughed. He reached in, pulling out an arrow head and holding it up to the torchlight. "Dragonglass? Who would make an arrow out of Dragonglass, it's too brittle! The edge is wicked sharp but it won't get through any kind of armor."

Tyrion was silent, moving around him with his own torch holding it up to the far wall where row upon row of small Dragonglass daggers had been hung. Below them several dozen had shattered when they had dropped after the ropes tying them to the wall had rotted away, yet there were still more here than he had thought there would be. "Dragonglass..." Tyrion murmured to himself, his analytical brain going to work. "The White Walkers are supposed to be a force of ice and death, and Dragonglass is made from volcanoes, fire against ice."

Bronn stopped laughing staring at him incredulously. "I thought you were just going along with this northern madness, don't tell me you're actually beginning to believe it?"

"Magic has returned to the world, the dragons that the Stormborn showed me that. And if you need more, look at this." Tyrion moved past the wall of Dragonglass daggers deeper into the armory pushing through a mangled doorway at the far end to stand in another room.

What had caught his attention was a few plates of armor, the light of them glimmering for a moment with something other than the light of the torch. Bronn pushed in after Tyrion, having to kneel to go through the whole Tyrion had hacked in the doorway. Once within he stood, staring at the 12 bronze suits of full plate armor, much like the ones in the outer room, except these...

All of them looked almost as if they had been finished a few days ago, the runes on them, possibly of a better variety than the ones in the first room, having kept them in pristine condition. And those same runes were glimmering faintly not from the light of the torch, but from an inner fire, yellow and white.

"Seeing this, I think I'm beginning to believe, truly believe my friend." Tyrion said thoughtfully reaching out to tap one of the suits so that it rang. "Yes, I am really beginning to believe, and to be worried."

OOOOOO

"Ware, ice on the port bow!"

Theon Greyjoy and the captain of his current flagship, the White Walls looked at one another, then hurried forward. Both of them were heavily bundled up, though unlike on the wall it hadn't become quite cold enough here in the Bay of Seals to force people to go around with all of their skin covered for fear of frostbite.

The two men stood at the prow the boat for a moment staring at the rather large chunk of ice floating past. The ocean was so clear at the moment they could see slightly into it below the ice floating on the surface, so they knew that there was more ice below the surface.

The captain, a middle-aged man who looked as if he had been mauled by a bear or something similar in the past shook his head tugging at a beard that you could hide a small animal in. "That's what, the tenth we've seen since entering the Bay of Seals?"

"I think it might be more than that." Theo said shaking his head. "The Bay of Seals is getting more and more dangerous, but at least we haven't lost any ships just yet."

"Yes, but you hit the nail on the head when you said yet, lad." The captain said shaking his head. "It's only a matter of time before we start losing people. And once that starts happenin', no sailor's gonna want to attempt the Bay again. Ya'll have to switch entirely over to River and land travel ta send supplies up to the Wall." He whistled suddenly pointing off to the side. "Look at that one!"

The ice that the man had noticed off in the distance made the one that the ship had sailed by look small in comparison. It towered above the ships sides by a few meters, though thankfully it wasn't as tall as the masts.

For a moment both men were silent then the captain shook his head. "I'm going to order round-the-clock watch not only from the crow's nest but from fore and aft as well, and periodic soundings too."

"A good idea," Theo replied, shaking his head in too. "I could wish that this mission wasn't necessary, the Wall could probably use more men but..." he shrugged.

The captain laughed. "Funny thing is, if we just waited until the ice became too dangerous to sail in the Bay of Seals, that would probably stop the Raiders out from Skagos and Skane."

"Maybe, or then again maybe they'd be willing to attempt it anyway. Four ships have been attacked, and one totally destroyed in the past month and a half, and until the day completely freezes, sending supplies up by ocean still makes more sense than by land."

The captain grunted, then moved off bellowing orders to his crew. Theon remained at the gun walls, staring south now. I wonder how Ranma and the others are getting on down south? Half as well as I did I hope.

The Three Sisters had fallen relatively quickly, though the smallfolk living on them were still a surly lot. Each so-called Lord of the Sisters had tried to fight the invaders alone, and even knowing the waters around the small islands better than the men from White Harbor, their ships had proven completely ineffective against the larger war galleys.

The seas themselves had proven a more formidable obstacle than the small trading boats of the defenders, and several ships had to turn back with damage below decks from running across hidden shoals. One ship had been sunk, but its men and had been rescued by the others quickly enough that only five of them had died from the freezing waters.

Once they had secured a beachhead on each of the Sisters however, the battles were pretty much over. Wylis and the men of Manderly and Flint were simply better trained, better led and equipped than the Islanders. They lost men in the initial landings on each island, but after they had taken control of the docks, actually besieging the small holdfasts that the rulers of the islands called keeps had been relatively easy. Especially since two of them had been within range of scorpions on a few of the war galleys.

Those so-called Lords were dead now, along with most of the men that had tried to fight back. 80 of the locals have been sent to the work gangs for attempting to attack the invaders, including six women who had attempted to poison some of the men. Theon had heard about that, though he had not been a part of the landing forces. Instead he had commanded the naval side of things, and acquitted himself very well. Another 25 men had been sent to the wall after the last of the Three Sisters had fallen, including six men of house Manderly, guilty of crimes during the sack of the final holdfast.

Wylis and Theon both were very well aware of Ranma's policy towards rapists and murderers, and if they had actually gone through with the rape that they had attempted, all six of them would've been executed by Wylis. Older than the Wolfsworn and rather portly, there was nothing soft about Wylis when it came to making certain that his men acted honorably.

Theon smiled remembering those islands, which would be his soon enough. Word from Winterfell had come through, and Eddard, in his son's name, had formally recognized that Theon would be given lordship over two of the Isles rather than Skane in the Bay of Seals further north. That was a major boost, and Theon could already see that in the future his family, once he got around to actually starting one, would become very wealthy and powerful.

Not because the Three Sisters themselves were any real prizes. There was enough land on the three to put under plow and feed the inhabitants, but no secret mines or anything of that nature. No, the resources of the Three Sisters were in their harbors. Those harbors were small, only able to handle one or at best two full-sized war galleys, but there were nine of them spread out over the islands. Workers from White Harbor were already in the process of enlarging the first few of them, and once that was done all three of the Sisters would become an extremely dangerous naval base.

With those, and the growing port that the locals had begun to call Cranogtown the Bite was not only secure from any kind of sea-based invasion but also the sight of a growing economy thanks in no small part to Lord Manderly and his canny use of the large coffers that his family had built up. Indeed, it was actually bustling a little when Theon sailed north.

And as Lord of Three Sisters, I'll turn a tidy profit on any shipping that comes through. Now if only I could figure out what I want the last name of my house to be? With all the news we've hear, I agree with Lord Eddard that I can't remain a Greyjoy.

That thought was a grim one. He had long ago abandoned the idea that the Ironborn way of life was anything more than what Ranma had set it was, a very thin reason to allow rapine and pillaging. But to hear of the aborted invasion of the North, one without any provocation at all, that was hard. Which didn't even consider the bits and pieces of what had happened further south which had reached White Harbor.

"Still can't believe that we're going to that accursed island." Said a voice close by, causing Theon to break out of his musings. "They say those barbarians are all cannibals! And that they worship not the old gods but something else, something darker."

Theon turned, moving over to where a few of the armsmen, all House Locke men, were talking. All of them were working with their armor or weapons, redoing the leather on their hilts, or making certain that their armor fit properly, while one of them was working on restringing a bow rather inexpertly.

"Give me that!" Theon scoffed, reaching over the man's shoulder and pulling the string and bow away from down on a barrel he looked at the man who had been talking. "Do you have anything solid about Skagos to share, or is it all rumor?"

"No my Lord, but well, everyone knows! Animals that have never been seen in the North since the Age of Heroes still reside on that island, the men there're all cannibals, and they file their teeth to points. Like sharks!"

Another man spoke up hesitantly. "I wouldn't mind going hunting there. I hear that unicorns and other beasts, including aurochs and snow tigers still exist on Skagos."

"snow tigers?" asked Theon.

"Like tigers in appearance my lord only larger, with bone armor in places and huge, massive fangs. They are also supposed to be intelligent, like direwolves."

"Sounds like old wives tales to me." Theon scoffed, already finishing up with the bow he pulled at it, frowning a little then shrugged before handing it over to the man. "Try that."

The man did, and barely was able to pull back the string an inch. "Whoops." Theon smirked, sardonically, taking it back from him and loosening the string somewhat so that the pull was far less. "Sometimes forget my own strength."

Then he looked around at the men. "Rumors are one thing, will be seeing truth soon enough. Unless the Skagosi have somehow tamed those legendary beasts of yours they don't matter. Besides, I've met a few so-called legendary animals, and they're flesh and blood. So if it bleeds we can kill it boys."

That won him some laughter, though he noticed that a few of the men still looked nervous, and Theon sighed. Skagos was the island they were sailing towards, not Skane, because several of the raiders had been followed back to the larger island rather than its much smaller neighbor. Whatever the legends about it, the men there had struck out against the rest of the North, and would pay for it. Food and supplies were far too precious to those on the Wall for any other response to be considered.

"As for the men themselves on that island," he said now in a far more lighthearted tone. "Unless they have weapons that can cut through steel chain mail or shields, or tactics that can make our superior weapons useless, there's nothing to fear. Trust in yourself, trust in your weapons, and trust in your commanders, and those Islanders won't know what hit them."

The journey continued for several days, going slower and slower as more and more ice was seen floating in the oceans. Eventually however one of the lookouts shouted, "Land Ho!"

Theon and the captain along with several other men moved forward, staring at the island in the distance. They were coming at it from the southwest, and it began to grow quickly as they made towards it. Eventually it loomed in front of them from horizon to horizon a mountainous island with green and white showing interspersed everywhere, and they began to sail around the southern edge of had to search for a landing spot.

They found one, a decent bit of beach with the forest that seemed to dominate the entire island just out of bow range inland from the edge of the shore. It also didn't seem to have any hidden rocks or shoals. It was extremely shallow as well, but they had brought along enough rowboats to put the men ashore, if slowly. Indeed it looked as if it already been used as such, with several trees hacked down by the shoreline and marks in the sand as if longboats had been pulled through at those points.

The war galleys anchored offshore turning in such a way that they could bring their scorpions to bear on the shoreline. While scorpions were not meant to be used against infantry they could possibly be deadly at breaking up a charge. The archers, about 400 men all told, also lined the sides of the galleys facing into the shoreline, their bows at the ready. Theon was the only one not with them, he was in the first boat ready to go ashore.

The first two boats landed easily enough, and the men began to spread out along the beach while behind them their fellows continued to disembark. However that process was interrupted by a shout from the edge of the forest. Hundreds of men suddenly appeared there, charging forward. They spoke in the old tongue, shouting imprecations but mainly along the themes of "This is our land!" "Death to the cowards!" "Death to those who bowed to the Andals!"

Upon even an initial glance these men had more in common with the wildlings than the Northerners. Their weapons tended to be large hatchets, broadswords and a few greatswords here and there. Most of them were of bronze, with only one weapon of iron that Theon could see. What armor they wore, and it wasn't very prevalent among them, was mainly bronze, with some bone and boiled leather here and there.

Mainly however they seemed to go bare-chested, even here in the cold. Whirls of blood red and yellow adorned them here and there signifying Theon didn't know what. All of them bore scars, and Theon would later realize that every man there was marked in particular by a scar running from one ear down to their mouths on the left side of their face.

There were a few bows among them, and those archers began to fire on the men already on the shoreline. But two of them fell as Theon fired back quickly, his hands moving rapidly. "Form shield wall! Get the next two boats ashore!"

His next arrow took the man who wielded an iron sword through the throat with such ferocity that the arrow actually punched all the way through his throat so that only feathers on the end were visible, hurling the man backwards with the force imparted by the arrow. His body crashed into two men behind them, and all three went down in a jumble.

Theon didn't care having moved onto the next targets. Behind him the next boat beached itself and the men on it hastily jumped out into the shallows forming up with their fellows.

Behind them the war galleys and the archers began to fire. The scorpions slammed into the ground along the tree line, startling a dozen more men from charging forward, slaying several of them while the archers took the initial force under fire.

But by that point the fastest of the men from the trees had hit the shield wall. And despite being bronze, their weapons could still kill you just as well as steel. Here and there men began to go down, and the melee became general.

Theon dropped his bow into the shallows, pulling out his dirk and a small shield from his back, using it to block a blow from a heavy axe which astonished the man wielding it. That astonishment didn't last long, because Theon's blade took the man in the eye, carving through it and into the brain behind it before a kick sent the body sprawling away. Then he whirled around, bringing his dirk down to hack at a man's thigh on his other side, his shield, its edge sharpened, slicing into the man's throat at the same time.

A second later Theon was forced to block several blows at once, redirecting them with dirk and shield rather than trying to block them, lashing out as he could and killing several more men. With their bodies waste or knee-deep in the waters most of his men couldn't move as freely as he could, but then again once the attackers got to grips with them neither could they. Worse for both sides if someone went down with an injury, they had to get themselves back out of the water because none of their fellows had any time to spare to pull them upright again, so they faced drowning quickly.

The battle teetered in the balance for a moment, then the next group of ships arrived, beaching themselves on either side of the melee. There men, all Flint men jumped out and charged, joining the melee. They began to forge up from the shoreline, forcing their way out of the water to where they could move more freely over the hacked bodies of their friends and attackers both. More and more of the attackers turned to flee, only to be hacked down from behind.

Theon's blade took a man in the stomach, ducking him easily while Theon mentally shook his head at the idea of going into any battle without armor if you could help it. He then hurled his battered buckler into another man's face, sending him flying backwards with a broken jaw and nose. A stomp lashed out, crushing a man's neck where he was feebly trying to haul himself out of the water below Theon.

That cleared the area around Theon, and he stood back for a moment, surveying the battle before barking out orders. "Form shield wall halfway towards the forest! Get those boats back out there bringing more men in!"

The difference in the armor of the two sides had proved telling. Theon and his men only lost a little above 200, and most of them had drowned having fallen into the water along the shore and been unable to lift themselves back out of it. The attackers had lost upwards of 600 men, though that was just a guess, since most of their bodies had been pulled away out to sea by the current.

Theon called his four commanders together, a man from House Flint named Calis, Terrell Locke, a cousin of that family, and Sigmund, an armsmen from House Karstark. "We just won a major victory. I was always worried about our initial landing."

"If they had brought more men to the party we'd been in trouble." said Sigmund, nodding his head.

"Do you think those were the same raiders that have been attacking our shipping? If I remember my history, there were several 'clans' on Skagos, not just one."

"No idea, but we're supposed to secure a beachhead here so let's start building a fort, that might force the locals to come out and talk to us. If they keep on attacking us, we'll keep on killing them but I hope they'll see reason quickly."

"If we kill enough of them maybe." Said Calis, having knelt down to turn one of the dead bodies over and opening its mouth. After a moment Calis smiled. "At least the bit about them sharpening their teeth ain't true. Still have to wonder 'bout the animals though. I wouldn't mind me a unicorn horn to take home to the missus."

That elicited some ribald comments from the other men around him, but Theon had already turned away staring into the Woodlands. Now that he was coming down from the rush of combat, he was becoming, becoming bothered about something. This island, it was giving him the shivers, though he couldn't pinpoint why.

He still couldn't a few days later, after the men had finished making a makeshift fort out of cut logs from the forest a bare day's march in from the shore. Not once had they seen any of the locals, save a few skirmishers who tried to ambush his men. And none of the wild animals that supposedly made this place their home.

Standing on top of one of the long houses, he stared out over the forest all around them, scowling angrily. "If they aren't going to come to us, we'll have to go in search of them. We'll leave a force of 400 here, mixed swordsman and archers, while the rest of us march further inland. And I'm damn glad I didn't bring along any cavalry."

Calis nodded somewhat chagrined. It had been his suggestion to bring along cavalry, despite the fact that it would cut down on the number of men they could take since horses needed more fodder and space aboard a ship than men. Thankfully he'd been overruled. "The forest is too dense, we couldn't get a formed force of cavalry through it for all the gold in the Rock. And it's too steep and too rocky in most places too."

"None of our scouts have reported any sign of anything like a farm yet, so it's possible they live just on hunting, which means we can't find any real target." said Sigmund. "But I think we missed a problem when we were planning this. This island is actually larger than any other island around Westeros. That, with and the denseness of the forest and the nature of the land, we could be here for weeks!"

"Doesn't matter." Theon replied, shaking his head. "We've got a job to do, and we're going to do it, no matter how long it takes."

"And if they're not willing to talk?"

"Then we kill them all." Theon replied grimly. "If we wipe out all of their warriors, I assume the survivors will get the hint."

"Tall order if this place has as many men as a Noble House can call upon." Terrell said, shaking his head. "But you're right."

With that the small meeting broke up, but Theon remained there staring out into the distance. All around them the sloped of the land led up to large mountain in the distance, and he wondered really how many people were on this island. Still, if I need them I can call up more men from Flint and Locke, even Manderly if I have to.

Turning away he made towards the latter leading down the side of the long house, smiling faintly as he smelled dinner. He never saw the points of blue light staring at him out of the dark of the forest.

OOOOOO

It had taken a messenger from the new Baratheon-Tyrell army around King's Landing almost 2 and 1/2 weeks to make the journey to Highgarden. It was a perilous journey, both because of the weather and because of various bandit groups that had sprung up here and there, taking advantage of how many lords and their men had gone to war. Though in all honesty they were bandits in name only, since most of them were levy deserters from the Reach army.

Worse they ran into problems with their horses, and only being knights rather than lords could not demand remounts from the castles and keeps they stopped at on the way south. Even the army under Lord Bryce Caron had no supplies or horses to lend them. How much of this was real and how much Lord Bryce's own thoughts on the arrangement Mace had reached, none of the men Mace had sent to deliver his message could say.

So by the time the knight turned errand-boy and his guards had reached Highgarden, their numbers had fallen from 15 to 5, including the knight. He was named Brodrick Westbrook and while he was relieved to finally arrive, he was more hopeful that he could stay a few days in Highgarden before turning around, not at all eager to hit the road once more.

The mere sight of mud was enough to drive Brodrick to distraction by the time he had handed the reins of his horse to the grooms. Unfortunately, it was only the start of his problems. Kneeling before the Lady Margaery, he quailed at the expression on her face. It wasn't anger, it wasn't even rage. It was sheer frothing fury.

Indeed, it took all of Margaery's considerable self-control not to loose her tongue on Brodrick. It would've been impolite, not to mention useless while she read the missive from her father.

'Daughter, you know that I was angered by you and your grandmother's connivance to halt your immediate marriage Renly, but it seems as if you were correct to be wary of tying us irrevocably to him. Not only did he not possess Robert's spine, he didn't possess his military acumen either. The young fool led us into a disastrous battle against Stannis, one that has cost us ruinously. Indeed, I myself had to take part in the battle, and while I dealt with my portion of it exceedingly well punishing a band of traitors amongst our lords, the main battle was lost.

But fear not, for I have brokered a deal with Stannis that will still tie our family into the royal house! Selyse Florent is barren! Because of this King Stannis has agreed to set her aside in favor of your hand and our allegiance to his cause. I know he is older than Renly, at least there is proof that he will be able to do his husbandly duty. Whereas there have been rumors all along about Renly that I should've taken more seriously. Nonetheless, You will still be Queen of all Westeros my dear!

As such, I require you, and a band of guards of course, to present yourself to Stannis as soon as possible. Given the state of even the Rose Road, I know it won't be easy, but the profit will be well worth it.

I hope that Garlan has already begun to take the Ironborn to task for their idiocy, and that the lords we allowed to go on their way will do their proper job under Lord Bryce once they arrive to retake the lands along the Mander. Still if not, Garlan will be able to see to that after he has retaken the Shield Islands behind them. I have also heard that Willas is leading a force into the Westerlands, that is excellent news! The time of the Lannisters has passed, it is the time for House Tyrell to rise!

Yours Affectionately, Mace Tyrell, Lord of Highgarden, Defender of the Marches, Warden of the South, High Marshall of The Reach.'

She crumbled the note, making an effort of will that astonished her to not throw it at the man in front of her. That fool. That idiotic, arrogant, crown-besotted moron! Yes, Stannis can set aside his wife if she is proven barren, the precedent is there but this, so quickly exchanging one Baratheon for another! Using me as a pawn that blatantly, and to the one that the smallfolk are already calling the Stannis the Burner!

Actually most of the smallfolk seemed to call Stannis the Flame Fucker, but Margaery wasn't supposed to have heard that particular appellation. Needless to say, rumors of King's Landing reached here long before this message did. Does he think that the smallfolk and the Lords will simply forget, or understand that Stannis had no choice?

Intellectually that might be true, but emotionally? The Lords might be willing to understand that he had no choice but to burn out the capital if he wanted to be able to use his army as a mobile force. But the smallfolk? They'll only see the fact that he just burned the largest city in Westeros to save himself some time and effort.

"My lady?" Said one of the maids, hesitantly moving forward to touch her shoulder. Margaery smiled at the woman, then waved her hands at the Brodrick. "I will have an appropriate response for this soon enough ser. For now, one of the servants will show you too your room."

After the man left she looked at the maid who had touched her shoulder, speaking in a controlled yet pleasant tone. "Could you please go find my grandmother, and show her this?" She held out the ball up of parchment, her tone turning sardonic. "It should still be legible, or as legible as it ever was."

The maid nodded, and later that evening Margaery met with her grandmother. Olenna's mind had recovered from her heart attack after hearing of the assault on the Arbor, though her body had not. She could barely walk unaided now, and her fingers lacked what little strength they had before her heart attack.

Her tongue alas had recovered just as much as her mind had. "Stupid idiotic incompetent, why did we let the buffoon out without a minder!? The perfect time to back off and declare our open neutrality, where we could see to our own affairs then bow to whoever won out, and what does he do? Hitches us right back to a stag hell bent on dragging us into yet another war!"

"That was your decision and his, not mine." Margaery retorted coldly. She had not come back to Highgarden to put herself under her grandmother thumb once more and had worked since arriving back here to retain her independence while also putting the city on a winter and wartime footing. The men who had come back from Oldflowers and her standing among the smallfolk had allowed her to act as she saw fit here in Highgarden, despite Garth, the castle's seneschal, still being more of a follower of her father and Olenna than Margaery. Yet she knew she needed her grandmother, whose spy network was relatively extensive.

"Yes, yes, let loose your spleen on the defenseless old woman. Once you've done that to your satisfaction granddaughter, perhaps we could speak about what are we going to do about this message of my idiot son's?" the old woman replied tartly.

Margaery smiled thinly. "It isn't what we're going to do it's what I've already done. You might have forgotten the fact that I was friends with Ranma Stark, but I did not. Despite his marriage to the Dragon Queen, Ranma will never forget his friends. And I think that all of Westeros could do a lot worse than having Ranma Stark as king. The rumors from the smallfolk about the Daenerys Stormborn are promising as well."

She scowled internally. I could wish that they weren't married, but that seems to be a done deal as grandmother's spies reported months back, and such a man as Ranma will never set his wife aside regardless of reasons. And I will never be any man's second choice, no matter how magnificent he is.

"And what did you promise the Stark boy?" Olenna asked skeptically.

"Since he's crushed the Westerlands army and executed Tywin Lannister I think you can dispense with the 'boy' grandmother! And I promised House Tyrell's loyalty and resources, so long as they agreed that Willas would be the new Lord Paramount. I vowed to place myself in their hands entire, as surfeit of that loyalty."

The old woman reared back in her chair in shock. While those words changed meanings from case to case, what it meant in essence was that Margaery had placed herself completely at the mercy of the Ranma and this Daenerys Stormborn. They could decide to do anything they wanted to her, remove her from House Tyrell, take her as a maid or even as a war-whore. And even if they didn't do anything so unpleasant, they would control when and who she would marry. "How, how long ago?"

"Right after the Ironborn began to attack. I've been planning this for a while. I've also sent a message to Willas after this latest bit of provocation. If he agrees with me, we can remove our father on grounds of madness."

"That's well and good, but it won't matter. He's with the army remember? Whatever we do here, it won't matter a damn to Mace where he is. He'll still have his own power base, one that can take control of ours if it decided to see this as a rebellion."

Olenna paused before going on thoughtfully. "Then again, the power of Highgarden has never truly been with its army, but with its resources here. And if you can get the smallfolk on your side, I suppose it could work even once he returns."

"If he returns." Margaery said shaking her head.

She did not mention that she had ordered every smith in the city to start making armor, spearheads, swords, and anything else they could which would aid in the war effort. Margaery had also doubled the pay scale for men of able body and mind that came forward to receive training from the armsmen, archers and knights Garlan had sent back with her and the survivors of the battle at Oldflowers. They were five hundred good men who were already training ten times their number from men raised from the city. They wouldn't be a field force by any means for months, but they would be able to hold the walls.

But Margaery didn't mention any of that because she had no doubt Olenna already knew. But her grandmother was more concerned with familial issues than military ones. "And Alerie?" Olenna asked softly.

Margaery winced. "Mother doesn't take part in politics, and I am not exactly going to go out of my way to inform her of the message that father sent me. So long as she stays out of the way it, it will be fine. He is there, we are here. It's that simple."

"Only if he loses it will be that simple to her." Olenna replied coldly. "If they win, it becomes very confusing."

Margaery shook her head, a faint smile on her face. "I have faith in Ranma Stark. And as I said earlier, after the complete destruction of the Westerlands' military power, I think you should too."

Several days later two different ravens arrived. One was from Garlan, saying that he had arrived at Oldtown. The remnants of the Redwyne fleet had gathered there, and he was already in the process of planning the campaign to reclaim the Arbor and the Shield Islands from the Ironborn. Even better, he wrote that Lady Desmera Redwyne had escaped in a small fishing boat thanks to a fisherman who owed her family a favor.

That had nearly made Margaery break out in tears of thanks to the Maiden, knowing what horrors her cousin would have faced in Ironborn hands. Desmera was Lady Redwyne now, head of that house, and Olenna was already looking around for a proper marriage to the girl.

The other was from Riverrun. This contained a short summary of the events in the Riverlands, ending with Lord Tywin's execution and the response from Ranma and Daenerys. Margaery smiled thinly, and leaned back in her chair at the head of the family table. "And that I believe is that. With this very favorable response, I will send Ser Brodrick back with our response to my father's idiocy."

"I can't agree to this!" Said Alerie from her place nearby. She had somehow learned of Margaery's plans that morning, and was not happy for its implications. "This is your father you're talking about! While his actions of late might not be... be the most intelligent, you still owe him your loyalty as head of the household, daughter!"

"No, no I don't." Margaery replied coldly. "Where was he when the Ironborn invaded? Where was he when the Lannisters invaded from the west? Where is he now, when we are beginning to get reports from House Meadows, that the Viper of Dorne has turned his ruinous march into the Reach? My father has failed as Lord Paramount on practically every level mother! I cannot, we as House Tyrell cannot afford to continue to follow him into madness upon madness."

"Moreover, this is a most admirable document on a political level, both what is said and what is implied." Olenna put in thoughtfully, tapping the message. "The Stark youth and Daenerys are already acting as King and Queen already, something Stannis has not done yet, nor Viserys, if my agent's reports about his return are accurate. They're acting as if it is a certainty that they will win the war, and are laying the framework for what happens after. Excellent. I truly did underestimate Stark daughter, and I formally apologize to you for ending your engagement to the boy, to Ranma. If this is how he acts with the Dragon Queen beside him, I would have loved to see how he would act with you beside him."

"I would have too." Margaery replied tartly. "And don't think I'm going to forget that you and father agreed with that bit of idiocy anytime soon."

"But even so..." Alerie began, looking between them.

"Mother." Margaery said interrupting the older woman and reaching across take her hands flinching slightly when the older woman pulled back sharply. "I know you love father, but you can't let that love blind you to the mistakes he's made. Willas will make a far better Lord Paramount than father ever was and, when this is all over and dealt with, father can remain here in comfort."

If he survives which is doubtful, she thought, far more coldly than her words. It shocked her to the core to realize that she wouldn't miss the man overmuch. As a daughter he hadn't really had much in rearing Margaery other than doting on her occasionally. And as she grew older and more independent, Margaery felt Mace had stifled her, never listening to her as well as he did Olenna unless the two agreed, and even then not often.

"No," Margaery said aloud. "We need to start thinking about the future now."

OOOOOO

Others too were thinking about the future. Doing something about it however was a little more difficult.

"What do you mean she won't meet with us? Her turning away our messengers away is one thing, but here we, the lords of the Vale, her husband's primary vassals, are personally come to speak to her. What does that bitch think she's playing at?!" Lord Redfort of the castle of the same name glared at the messenger from the Eyrie.

He wasn't the only one. Many of the Lords of the Vale were in the tent, and practically every one of them was staring at the man. It was not a comfortable experience for the young man bearing the bad news.

The messenger was Alber Royce, son of Lord Nestor Royce of the Gates of the Moon, the castle set at the entrance to the Giant's Lance, the mountain that held the Eyrie. The army in question was currently camped just out of bow range of the castle's defenders.

He was also a distant relation of Lord Royce, who was in fact the only Lord not staring at him at the moment. Yohn Royce was looking down at his hands, his face thoughtful. He was also not wearing his armor for some reason, which was unusual enough to have normally caused comment, and would have if Yohn hadn't arrived on the heels of the messenger that was the source of the current issue.

"P-Permission to speak freely my lords?" Albar asked hesitantly. When Lord Redfort, acting as their speaker nodded he went on. "Lady Lysa refuses to come out of her rooms in the Eyrie. Only a scant handful of her servants are allowed in her presence. She, my lords, Lysa is mad! She is gripped by some kind of, of paranoid delusion that anyone and everyone is plotting against her and her son! She refuses to let the boy out of her sight, and is coddling Robert even more than she had before."

There were some growls of disgust at that and several of the Lords actually spat to one side in contempt. The knowledge that the boy was dimwitted, frail and still being weaned on mother's milk had spread far and wide. Indeed, more than one man there wondered truly if the boy really was John Arryn's son, whatever the age of the father had been upon his conception.

"Does she say anything about the events mentioned in our messages to her?" asked Lord Templeton. "There are great events happening elsewhere, a war for the throne, and here the Vale sits, stewing in our own juices!"

Albar gulped again. This part was not going to go over well, he knew it. "Could I have your words of honor that you won't kill the messenger my lords?" He said only half-jokingly.

That actually won him some chuckles, but it also aroused Lord Royce out of his introspection and he smiled faintly at his distant kinsman. "Speak plainly Albar. None of us will harm you for what you say."

"The lady Lysa keeps on insisting that the Lannisters were at fault for Lord Arryn's death, that they are still sending spies and murderers after her and her boy. Yet at the same time, she also says that Petyr, Littlefinger I mean, should've been in communication with her for months now! When she was told about the rumors of a siege cutting off King's Landing, she seemed lost, and became even more paranoid if that was possible. Now she is simply waiting for word of Petyr surviving before she does anything. She won't move from the Eyrie until he does arrive nor will she give any orders until he is here for her to, to consult with."

For a moment the Lords were silent simply staring at the young man. Then Lord Tollett spoke as if biting off each word. "Are you telling me that a minor Lord is going to be in position to order us around? Stranger's hells, House Baelish doesn't even have more than what, 40 men to its name! Hell's its not even three generations old yet! And judging by the rumors over the past half a year, Petyr has not exactly covered himself in glory!"

Lord Belmore was a younger man wide of shoulders and unfortunately wide of mouth as well. "You know whenever I saw them together I thought that Petyr and Lysa were close and he did ward at Riverrun when she was younger. You don't think..."

"Enough!" Said Lord Redfort cutting the man off with a chop of the hand. "We'll leave that kind of tale-telling to maids. We have more important things to mind at the moment. What you're saying, is that not only will she not meet with this, she plans to simply sit up there and do nothing. I don't know about the rest of you my lords, but that is not enough!"

"Leave us Albar." Said Lord Royce, nodding his head at in Redfort's direction. The two of them were the nominal leaders of this delegation, which consisted of a little under half of the houses of Vale. The other half were content to sit and remain neutral for now, not having any clear idea of the true events that had started this present war. Or rather, Yohn thought to himself as Albar left, not seeing any profit in them choosing a side at this point. It is a sad thing, but gold and profit matter more to many lords than honor and duty. Still so long as they do not oppose us openly, that is enough for me.

"Frankly my lords, so long as Lysa stays up there, the amount of damage she can do is minimal. I'm not happy with leaving the Eyrie and the Giant's Lance under her command, but judging by Albar's tone it sounds as if Lysa will turn her own men against her soon enough."

"What about your kinsman, Nestor?" Asked Lord Templeton.

"He stands with us." Yohn replied, nodding his head. He had been estranged a bit from his kinsman for several years now, but recently the two of them had opened dialog again. Yohn wasn't going to say it aloud, but something down King's Landing, either the latest rumor of the plague and the siege or something before it had changed Nestor's attitude.

Redfort gestured all the Lords back into their seats, which most of them had left jumping to their feet angrily when Albar had reported that lady Lysa would not see them. "Some wine my fellow lords, I think we need cool heads for this."

Yohn nodded, smiling at his ally and sitting down. "With Lysa drowning in her own madness, and no clear line of succession, it behooves us my lords to consider how we should act. Not only for the good of our Houses but the Vale as a whole."

"You're talking about the other messenger the one that the Stark youth sent to us yes?" Said Lord Tollett. "That man's journey must've been harrowing, especially with the mountain clans acting up at this point."

Yohn nodded, his eyes for a moment turning towards the North. I wonder how the others will react to my own bit of news?

"A large stain on the Vale's honor it might have been, but I myself cannot say I was unhappy to hear that the North annexed the Three Sisters. Lord Manderly is a shrewd fellow, and I have no doubt that the day of those be-cursed islands being used as bases for smuggling and piracy is over." Said Lord Pryor. "My House and House Elesham have been stung by them more than often enough. But neither of us have ever had a powerful navy to do anything about it."

"Some reparation will no doubt be made towards the Vale for that. Most of you met Eddard Stark during Robert's Rebellion my lords or before when he warded here in the Eyrie with Robert under Lord Arryn. Can any of you say that such a move was done capriciously, or with malice aforethought?" Asked Lord Templeton looking around the camp table shrewdly.

None of them could. Frankly most of them had already made up their minds about that and further what must've happened in the capital. The Lannisters had never been really favored in the Vale, save perhaps in Gulltown where their gold spoke the loudest. But nor were they willing to follow the Starks against House Baratheon, either of them.

As they were away with their armies, and lady Lysa was not sharing anything she received by raven, none of the Lords here knew about more recent events. This included the now utter defeat of the Lannisters in the Riverlands, the destruction of King's Landing, or Renly's death. The only one they had a hint of was the Lannister's defeat, which had begun to spread through the Bloody Gate by way of the Vale Road after the battle at the Ruby Ford.

"We will see about the language of this message that the so-called Dragon Queen and Young Wolf have sent us." said Lord Redfort, voicing most of their thoughts allowed.

Ser Breakstone was a knight of that House sworn to the service of House Ryger, and of an age with Tristan and Vincent. At Lord Ryger's suggestion he had been chosen by Ranma and Daenerys to lead the twelve men detachment that they had sent from Harroway to Gulltown and then from there to Runestone. Upon his arrival there Ser Breakstone had been told that Lord Royce was not in residence, and so had continued his journey until finding the army gathered outside the Gates of the Moon.

He was bedraggled, worn, and stained with the mud of several week's hard travel. But Breakstones' eyes were sharp, and the message that he handed over to Lord Royce was pristine in its carrying case.

Yohn nodded at the youngster then tore off the seal, staring at it thoughtfully for a moment with a faint smile on his face before handing it over to Lord Redfort who grunted as he looked at the image on it, smiling a bit at the artistry of it. Reading the message took Lord Royce only a few moments, and he handed it off quickly. "They are offering to compensate for the loss of the Three Sisters by three Crown remits to be used on three towns, to allow them to grow into cities. An interesting idea, and more than enough compensation."

Redfort grunted again, before handing the message on. "I note that it doesn't say anything about demanding that we raise our armies and march for them, or that we even simply stay neutral. It mentions Lysa by name and declares her unfit to rule of course, but what particularly interests me is that bit about deciding upon the future leadership of the Vale 'when time allows'."

"Yes that is interesting isn't it?" said Royce musingly while the message was passed around his fellow lords.

"You are both overlooking the evidence that they share about Joffrey's illegitimacy." said Lord Templeton staring at the other two thoughtfully. "To my mind that is the most important bit about this message."

The message from Daenerys and Ranma laid out their position in terms of the crown, Joffrey's illegitimacy and their reasons for enmity with Stannis and Renly. Renly running away from the capital was mentioned, which both Ranma and Daenerys had seen as a betrayal of both Renly's loyalty to his brother, and to the friendship of his family to the Starks. Stannis's attack on the ship was mentioned as well, though not the method of that attack.

They also detailed their plans to destroy the Westerlands army which added at that point had not been accomplished just yet. Simply mentioning the battle at the Ruby Ford wouldn't have been enough giving Tywin's reputation going into this war, so neither of them had mentioned it.

Then there was the message about the annexation of the Three Sisters and the reasoning behind it followed by what amounted to an offer of payment, one which all of the Lords there were eager to use in the future. The Vale had few towns, but many of them were in excellent positions to become cities if allowed to be so. Along the coast of the Vale, that growth would be fueled by trade with Essos and with the rest of Westeros by sea or river.

There were no demands, no call to arms, not yet. But the hint was there that such things would be coming, with the phrase for 'future military actions should such be required'. In many ways it was an understatedly arrogant message. It said subtly that the Vale so long as it remained neutral really didn't matter to their plans. That victory was almost assured whatever the Vale did.

Redfort and Royce both let the other Lords question Ser Breakstone closely about the events he'd personally seen, about what he had heard, about the state of the army that Ranma Stark was leading. They had heard of the fall of the Twins, but not that it occurred so easily, or by using the old Frey bastard's attitude against him. There was more than one Lord chuckling at that, saying the man had been hoisted on his own banner. The battle of the Ruby Ford was also mentioned, the total victory it had been, along with the portion of the campaign leading up to it, as well as the news that Stone Hedge and Wayfarer's Rest both fallen to Stark forces.

But that was the military side of things. The other side of things interested the Lords just as much. The obvious friendship between Myrcella Baratheon and Ranma along with Daenerys was particularly mentioned, as was Myrcella's command of the hospitals, though where that would odd name came from none of them understood. That she had kept the Army from being plagued by disease and contagion was also marked upon, and more than one messenger was sent for in order to start the organization of their own army camp along similar lines.

Yet even more than all that, the fact that Daenerys was in such control of her dragons was astonishing to anyone who had studied their lineage. The direwolves of the Starks brought some mutters, though Lord Redfort noticed that Lord Royce's eyes narrowed at that, and he stopped speaking at that point, simply watching the events around him.

After the messenger had been questioned closely about everything to do with the army and what he had personally seen however Lord Royce held up a hand. After a moment the other Lords paused in their discussion, and he stared at the messenger hard. "We have heard about their deeds, about how they acted upon this campaign, we've even heard about some of their long-term plans, all of which I find good. But tell me about the people Breakstone, what are your impressions of Ranma Stark and Daenerys Targaryen. Speak as a Valeman now lad, not as a knight sworn to House Ryger."

The young man winced a little at that, but after a moment nodded. "My lords, not since the Age of Heroes has there been a group such as this. Ranma Stark might only be a bare twenty, but he is the finest military commander I have seen or even read about, even comparing him to King Robert! The Stormborn, Daenerys Stormborn might lack military knowledge, but in the realm of politics I have never seen the like. She is ruthless yet honorable, determined and just, and personally courageous. Even Princess Myrcella is becoming her own legend among the army and the smallfolk my lords as the Maiden of Healing. I am proud that the house I am sworn to has sworn itself to their service."

There was a moment of silence as all of the men looked at the youngster who had before that speech simply answered their questions calmly and matter-of-factly. But with that speech there had been real passion in his voice, and Yohn nodded internally. Such a king I could follow, such a queen I could bow to. "Leave us, you'll know our response soon enough. There should be a guard outside the tent, send him in."

The Lords were silent as the guard came in. After Yohn motioning him near, he whispered into his ear for a moment. The man then bowed and left the tent quickly.

After that man had left, Lord Templeton was the first to speak, putting all of their thoughts into words. "The dragons conquered the Vale once, they can do so again. Whatever the latest rumors from the fisher-folk say, this Daenerys has two dragons to her brother's one. That is a potent threat, even or perhaps especially to us here in the Vale."

That was the way the Vale had been conquered the first time. The Bloody Gate had turned aside an entire army, the slaughter had been magnificent. And then a single dragon had flown over the Bloody Gate to the Eyrie, landed on the top of it and demanded House Arryn's surrender. Something similar could happen again, to each of their castles in turn, none of which were in the same league as the Eyrie in terms of a defensive position.

"What do we want out of the future my lords?" asked Lord Redford. "For my part, I want a strong and united Vale, a Lord Paramount House that is powerful and numerous."

"The destruction of the mountain clans." said Ser Belmore, entirely serious.

The mountain clans of the Vale while each individually smaller than the mountain clans of the North actually had more military strength combined than those clans did. However while the northern mountain clans were firm allies of House Stark and had been for thousands of years, the mountain clans of the Vale had never bowed to House Arryn or the Mountain Kings that preceded the Vale as a united kingdom.

The mountain clans were inherently warlike, warring upon one another and the lowlanders as they could. And unfortunately with the Vale leadership in turmoil, they had begun to raid the lowlands heavily. The army had dealt with several such attacks on its outriders by massacring the groups while they marched into the Vale of Arryn, but all of them had felt the stings of raids in their own lands. That was why the Army they had gathered to, if need be, besiege the Eyrie numbered a bare 9000. None of them could afford to pull more men out of their own lands.

"Rather an unreasonable request, my friend." said Lord Elesham. "One I would love to see, but one which is unfortunately out of our reach."

"Perhaps." said Lord Royce thoughtfully. "But this Stark youth might have some ideas in that direction."

"You're talking about more than just remaining neutral as they have asked." said Lord Redfort leaning forward intently and staring at his old friend, his normally mild eyes sharp. "Why?"

"You'll all see the answer in a moment." Yohn replied, his tone actually tired as he leaned back in his chair rubbing at his bald pate for a moment. Not a moment later, the guard entered carrying what looked like a piece of armor covered by a cloth. "Remove the cloth and put my armor on the table."

The guard did so, and once the cloth was removed gasps of astonishment spread among the Lords. The armor in question was bronze, etched with runes. It was the armor that had given Lord Royce his nickname, Bronze Yohn. Normally the sight of it would not incur any interest, practically every Lord in the Vale had seen Lord Royce and it at one point or another.

What they had not seen before was the runes on it glowing as they were now. Normally they were simply odd letters etched into the metal, though they evidently did something since the bronze armor did work just as well as normal suit of steel plate. But now, now they were glowing with a dim yellow light, and it was certainly not the reflection of the torches in each of the corners of the tent or the light from the open tent flap.

Yohn spoke in the silence the site invoked. "Magic has come back into the world and old powers stir. I know not why the Masters in the Citadel have ignored their age-old duty and not informed us of the black candles having been lit, but I know they have been. You know my family keeps to the Old Ways my lords. We Remember." That was his families motto, and it encompassed their attitude as much as House Stark's did its grim purpose. "We have done so since time immemorial, my family was among the First Men, and I've always been proud of that. Now that old blood is singing. When I last stood in front of my castle's weirwood tree, I sensed a call."

He stood up, staring around him with hard eyes. "A call to the North. I think it is there my lords that the new king and queen of Westeros will have need of us. Let our fellow lords stew in their neutrality, and indeed I will not raise my blade against any Baratheon, be it Renly or Stannis. But my lords I will still do my duty as a Lord of house Royce not just to my men and to my smallfolk, but to Westeros as a whole."

The Vale lords had always been more superstitious than those of the Westerlands, the Reach or elsewhere. And the old gods held sway here in more than just Lord Royce. A few lords objected, but with the proof in front of them that magic was returning, they couldn't argue. And all of them knew what threat might be coming from the North, and that it was the duty of every knight and lord to meet it.

In the end, they decided to leave about 3000 of their men here outside the gates of the Moon under Lord Belmore just in case Lysa tried to do anything, or more importantly to take over the running of the Eyrie in conjunction with Lord Nestor after Lysa had finally worn her man's patience down enough for them to do away with the woman themselves. Benedar Belmore was also an old man, older by 22 years than Lord Royce, and his body was frail liable to fail him on the march. His mind was still shrewd, and he was a veteran of the Ninepenny Kings war as well as the internal war that the Vale had fought during Robert's Rebellion.

The rest of the men, some 6000 strong would pick up another thousand or so more men from House Royce of the Gates, as they marched toward the Bloody Gate and beyond, making their way to the Kings Road to either meet up with Ranma and his army as it marched northward, or march north itself. Behind them Ser Breakstone turned around, heading back to Gulltown and the ship that would take him and his men to Harroway with glad tidings.

OOOOOO

But Gulltown would not be the safe harbor that Ser Breakstone and his men had left. Despite many of the Vale lords wishing to remain neutral, war had come to the Vale. It came on dragon wings. It came with fire.

Ser Damon Shett was a barely middle-aged man, and marked as one of the better knights of the Vale. But he was untried in the role of leadership, and in the past few hours that had been rubbed into his face. Now he stood on the streets of Gulltown, while around him and his men fought the men of House Grafton, hacking and slashing at one another.

He ducked under a blow from a mace from one man, slamming the pommel of his longsword into the man's stomach with enough force to knock the breath out of him despite his chain mail, before a punch to the man's head flung him to the side. But Damon didn't have enough time to capitalize on his opponent going down, because another man pushed through the scrum all around them to go sword to sword with Damon. But Damon proved the stronger, pushing the other man back with a single heave onto his heels, opening his defense up enough for an overhead slash to catch them right at the juncture of the neck in the shoulder.

Damon stomped hard on the back of a downed man then had to dodge as someone wielding a spear came at him. His sword thrust took the man in the chest, but he gasped in agony as someone from behind him cut into his shoulder. With that arm now hanging loose at his side Damon backed away, taking a moment to notice that his younger brother, a boy of only 16 or so, was dead at his feet.

In the distance Damon could see Gull Tower burning, and he yelled aloud. "Damn you Grafton, damn you!" He barely had a moment to notice that all of the attackers had suddenly pulled back, as a shadow fell upon him. He looked up staring for one wide-eyed moment before a tongue of flame took him from above.

OOOOOO

Pulling back on the reins and urging Balerion back into the sky Viserys laughed triumphantly. This, this was what it meant to be Targaryen! To fly, to have the very winds under your control, to go where you will and burn your enemies to ash! What mortal could stand against a dragon, what House could stand against his?

He flew wide allowing Balerion to torch a few of the scorpions under control of men who wore House Shett colors as they tried to tilt upwards in an attempt to attack him. There weren't many, and it seemed as if resistance in the town had broken. Good, they never should have stood against me in the first place. Still, judging by the way House Grafton attacked House Shett's troops from behind, it seems as if Littlefinger was telling the truth about being able to raise support here in the Vale. How much support however is still in question.

For a moment he banked Balerion around, staring towards the mountains that loomed in the distance, beyond which was the Eyrie. For just a second, he dreamed of following in his ancestor's footsteps, of taking his Balerion and flying from here to the Eyrie to demand its surrender. But I don't know enough about what's been going on in the Vale since I left Dorne. Is it still in stasis, each house trying to decide alone what to do or have they already chosen a side?

About an hour later while the men of the town were desperately try to put out the fires with the aid of several thousand of the Dornish army Lord Grafton wined and dined Petyr and his new King. The man was a bit of a weasel, even in comparison to Littlefinger, but he had up-to-date information about the Vale, and the events in it.

He told them that the Vale had basically sundered along into two groups. One, composed of some of the most powerful Houses, wanted to do something, though as far as Lord Grafton knew there was no real consensus of what that could be, other than removing Lysa Arryn from position of regent for the Lord Paramount. Then there those who wanted to remain neutral, made of more numerous houses, but generally speaking less powerful ones. The only thing apparently every Lord agreed on was that they were not willing to follow Lysa's orders any longer, whatever those orders were, even those who didn't want to remove her weren't willing to go to her aid.

This troubled Petyr greatly as he confided to Viserys once he and the king were back aboard ship. Petyr decided to come clean entirely, it might be the only way to appease the mad youth across from him. "Lysa Arryn was my puppet my Lord, a fool girl who believed I love her." As if she could hold a candle to dearest Catelyn, or that unsullied and so beautiful young Sansa.

For a moment Petyr fell silent thinking of the two of them, of Sansa in particular considering how happy Catelyn seemed to be too rut with wolves. I'll keep that bit of news from Riverrun to myself I think, if I have to cut and run, I might be able to steal at least something precious for myself down the road.

Then Petyr shook his head and went on. "But she apparently has gone mad in her isolation far faster than I anticipated. The mountain clans are raiding heavily, and several houses are, as Lord Grafton said, in open revolt.

Even with Lysa listening to me, the amount of support I could raise for you would be limited now, and without her, that alas becomes even less. As such I'm afraid that only four or so Vale houses will side with you, your highness."

"This does not please me Littlefinger." said Viserys with a lot of understatement. "You promised me that you could raise the Vale to support my campaign to reclaim my families throne. Now you tell me that this is impossible? What is to stop me from taking Balerion to each and every single castle in the Vale and burning them to the ground!?" I ask..." he went on, his tone of voice one that Oberyn would've recognized. "Only in the spirit of inquiry, you understand."

"Time, Your Majesty." Petyr said, yet again showing a cool head in front of Viserys' threats. He took them more seriously now than he had before of course, having seen how Viserys dealt with Lady Selyse Baratheon, and his sheer enjoyment in that act and others since.

But even so, he was well used to danger. "It will take months to bring the Vale to heel in that manner, unless you mean to simply kill all of the Lords in which case it would take only a few weeks if you go alone on Balerion, and could come to ground and hunt for food for the two of you without facing a bow around every tree. You would have to come down sometime to teach my Lord and you would be vulnerable."

"I say this not to anger you Your Majesty." Petyr said holding up his hand pacifically. "Or to point out any weakness. I say this out of concern. Balerion represents much of your military might, and you should use him as you see fit. But would it be a good idea to take the time here to conquer the Vales one after another using conventional means? Even if you can use Balerion on every castle to save us time and lives. With autumn upon us, that will be a hard, torturous campaign, one that will cost us men in the field, far more men than we would gain."

"He is right My King." said Arianne from where she was lounging on a bed of pillows near the brazier. This was not for preference, but need. Her clothing was from Dorne, and the rain and cold had begun to sap her energy. "If Lysa still commanded the loyalty of at least a few Vale Houses rather than their contempt, you could simply threaten her alone and gained the Vales compliance if not loyalty, but as it is..." she shrugged.

Nymeria, the Sand Snake in charge of meeting with Doran's local spies also spoke up. "I've only had a bare few hours to meet with the local factors here, which were limited to say the least, but they have brought rumors of fell deeds elsewhere to my ears, Your Majesty. Some which demand a response."

Viserys broke off staring into Petyr's face to glare at Nymeria. "What events?"

"King's Landing has been destroyed." said Nymeria bluntly. "Not just sacked, not just taken, destroyed! Burned from one end to the other along with practically every living soul within it." That had horrified her when she had heard of it, a Martell she might be, but even she would not have gone that far for their vengeance, not simply wiped out the entire population of the largest city in Westeros like that.

Viserys stared at her then sat down abruptly, his legs giving out from under him. "How?" he asked in a hollow voice. "Who?"

"Magic my Lord, and apparently the Red Witch we heard about long before this did it at Stannis's instigation. We knew of the plague of course, but Stannis seems to have decided that there was no point in trying to save the city. It was an utterly ruthless act, and I think he is actually more hated among the smallfolk now than any king has ever been in all of Westeros' history. But it is a fearful sort of hate, none of the smallfolk will room rise against him, but neither will they aid him, I think."

That was more than Viserys had asked for, but he didn't remonstrate with the woman. He sat there staring straight ahead blankly, his mind nearly shut down with shock. King's Landing, the city his family had made, the throne, the Dragon Pits, everything that his family had created, gone. His teeth clenched, as did his hands in his lap. "Where is Stannis now?" He hissed out.

"Marching north along the Kingsroad apparently, along with the remnants of the Reach forces, which he has somehow convinced to ally with him. None of my family's agents remain in the army and the rumor of how that came to be hasn't spread among the smallfolk yet, so I don't know what he promised them. But it is known he's heading to battle your sister and her Stark husband." Nymeria replied, letting some of her contempt for House Stark into her voice.

It wasn't that she had anything against Ranma, Nymeria simply looked down on the Starks as over-honorable fools. There were other messages left with her uncles agents here in Gulltown of course, but most of those messages were not for Viserys' ears.

Arianne hadn't heard about the destruction of King's Landing, and she too was shocked at it, but she was getting over it quickly. "That act cannot go unanswered my King. We must strike at him, at Stannis. Even more than your sister, he has made himself an enemy of our house, truly following in his brother's footsteps!" She added, knowing precisely what buttons to use to goad Viserys into action. Arianne did not want to get bogged down here in the Vale with one battle after another, with her Dornish countrymen bleeding out for little return.

"As always you speak directly to the heart of the matter my dear." Said Viserys, his eyes filled with fell fires promising retribution. "What Houses can you bring to our command Petyr, and how quickly?"

"I concentrated my personal influence here in the Bay of Crabs and around my own house's lands Your Highness, which will serve us moderately well now. House Grafton has already proven its loyalty to our cause, and House Moore can be added to our forces quickly enough, their keep is overlooking a small inlet further into the Bay, about a half days journey for a single ship. I believe that the two of them could raise somewhere along 3600 men for our cause. Possibly we could raise another 4,000 from the city if we simply conscript men at sword point, though we might have problems arming them."

"Unless my memory is serving me false, your House's lands are far further north, near to the plight then to the Bay of Crabs, yes?" Viserys mused.

"Yes my Lord, and unfortunately even if we could get there in any kind of time we would be bogged down in a small campaign there. House Corbray and House Lynderly would be willing to follow any messages I send, but at present they are in a three-way war with House Coldwater and the mountain clans. Both are powerful Houses, but distance, that conflict and the lay of the land means that they are out of reach."

Viserys scratched at his chin for a moment thoughtfully. "This does not please me. 3600 men trained men will barely add a few hundred men to the total number we left Planky Town with, though your suggestion with a conscript force has some merit..."

"Indeed my love but consider. These are Vale lords, their men will be a full infantry, like the swordsman who broke the pikes my family sent against the Usurper in his unjust war against your house. In many ways they might serve us better than our own infantry forces, which are made for the most part for quick skirmishes. For certain they will be better armored than most of ours."

The pikemen of Dorne were not like the pike regiments Ranma and Jon had devised. They were individual infantry given pikes, trained in their usage as warriors rather than soldiers, their lines and movements nowhere near as sharp or dense. Nor was their armor anything special. Indeed, it was common for most of them to wear simple boiled leather armor much like most archers, which amounted to nothing at all against swords or other cutting weapons and barely protected against arrows.

"And, because they are not of our nation, we have no requirements to try to husband their strength now do we?" She smiled a little as she knew that would please her husband.

"Once again you make an excellent point my dear, and as there is this too. Maidenpool and House Mooton will follow the rightful king. We will be able to land our troops there easily, and then march to where Stannis and my dear sister will no doubt soon be battling one another. I wonder if her little dog has another miracle campaign, I'd like it if they at least weaken Stannis for the kill."

"Possibly not so soon my Lord." said the last Sand Snake, Elia, who'd remained silent up to this point. "Armies travel far slower on land than at sea, especially those with heavy horse, despite what many might think. Foraging can only go so far, his supply train will be slow, and he'll have to stay close to it. I doubt that Stannis is even halfway up the Kingsroad. If your sister doesn't march out to meet him, we have possibly three possibly four more weeks before they start to clash in earnest."

"It will take a bare five days to get here from Maidenpool by sea. It would take far less in a straight line, but the waters in the Bay of Crabs are treacherous, and we'll have to take it slowly, unless we can find enough locals we can trust to lead us right, which is doubtful." Said Petyr, piling on while the piling on was good. "But once we land, we will be attacking them from a direction they will not be expected. Neither Stannis nor the Starks have any kind of spy network, though possibly in the Riverlands, the Starks could use House Tully's rather mediocre network. We could possibly take them entirely by surprise."

"Very well." Said Viserys standing up and his smile became vicious again. "Petyr, you will liaise with Lord Grafton, I want his men to aid my own in conscripting at least 4,000 levy troops from the city. I'll also order two ships to head to House Moore with a letter from you Petyr, to get that house ready. I want us ready to leave in two days for Maidenpool. For now however, I believe our guest needs to pay for her father's perfidy!"

"Not all my king." said Arianne, standing up quickly as did the two Sand Snakes. Since they left Dragonstone the three of them had made certain that Shireen was out of sight of Viserys, and therefore out of mind. It was nothing personal the girl was pleasant enough but rather ugly and unrefined to them. But Shireen was a powerful political tool, one that had to be protected.

Something that Arianne was quick to point out now. "Once you slay her father, the lady Shireen becomes heir to House Baratheon. Storm's End, despite not ruling over a land known for its riches, has always been the House of the Lord Paramount of the Stormlands. With her under our thumb and her father dead, we will be able to make whatever deal we need with her, before placing her as a puppet there, which may aid in settling the Stormlands down after their defeat at our hands. We don't want to have to put down another rebellion a few years down the line after all."

Viserys glared at her angrily but after a moment nodded jerkily. "Yet again you raise a good point my love. However I need to do something to get this anger out of me. I will go flying on Balerion, but I was serious. Be ready to depart in two days, along with those levy forces. We will sail to join the two ships already sent to House Moore, then for Maidenpool. For vengeance, for justice, and for my throne!"

OOOOOO

The castle of House Clegane was a small one, but extremely well-made, with very high and thick walls. In point of fact as Willas looked at it he knew that the land of House Clegane could never have paid for such a magnificent castle. I wonder how much gold the Lannisters sunk into this place. He smirked a little as his army moved forward. I wonder how much will still be here. I think my troops deserve some remuneration.

All around him the majority of his command marched forward, shouting and clamoring, but moving somewhat slower than they could have considering that all of his light cavalry was missing. All war is deception, one way or another. Willas knew that too much time had passed since the destruction of the marauders sent into the Reach. House Clegane had no doubt been warned by smallfolk if not their own scouts when he crossed the borders and so would be ready for him. Willas had no wish to be bogged down here in a common siege, so he had to use subterfuge.

Beside him Ser Graceford was grumbling irritably as he walked his horse beside Willas. He and Toulev had become Willas' main commanders. There was an actually brain underneath that knightly armor, once certain noble ideals had been smacked out of it anyway. In some ways however Ser Graceford had not changed and one of those ways was in his desire to rush ahead and get to grips with the enemy. "If we had been able to get here fast enough, we could've gone with our first idea."

That had been to dress up some of the men in House Clegane colors and send them ahead with a few volunteers among the smallfolk women to add to the disguise. Willas had not been in favor of it, considering that it would no doubt be people among the servants of the castle that knew most of the men who had gone off, and the reputation of House Clegane's castle was such that he had no wish to be a part of sending women into it. Still, it might've worked to open the gates for them.

"There was nothing we could do about it, the distances involved for just a little too great for that even if we used river travel."

"Are you worried about what's going on down south?" Ser Graceford asked quietly, making certain the men could not overhear. "I know I am. My family's castle might be better positioned than most, but it's still vulnerable from the river."

House Graceford's land was slightly past the fork in the Mander along what became the River Ash. It was small, as befitted a knightly house, but it was well maintained and had a moat along three-quarters of its walls while the fourth abutted the river itself. It wasn't unassailable, but it was a good defensive position.

"Judging by the latest rumors about my sister, I don't think your family has much to worry about. The Houses beyond Oldflowers along the Mander however will have. The Ironborn will have much to answer for after this war. But we personally can only deal with the problems in front of us."

"Is that why you decided to only destroy House Clegane and House Swyft?"

"Yes, I want to finish this campaign and head home as soon as possible. Unless I miss my guess Swyft will be the tougher fight, I doubt Ser Swyft will have taken entire leave of his senses, he'll have left a somewhat strong force behind. But that's also why I sent Toulev and a force of the infantry ahead on the remounts." Toulev and Willas himself were the only two men among his army that knew much about siege weaponry, and by the time the rest of the army arrived Willas wanted a few siege weapons, in particular catapults, to already be built or at least nearing completion.

"That leaves us woefully understrength for a conventional siege you know." Graceford's voice was merely thoughtful, rather than condemning. Your pinning a lot on our little ruse working."

"Not just that." Willas said with a slight smile. "I'm also betting that Clegane Hall emptied itself to provide those marauders that led the assault into the Reach. They might have something like a hundred men, but that is all."

"Still enough to turn us aside if they know what they're doing."

"We shall see." Willas replied complacently.

By midday they arrived within bow range of the castle and without any preamble or shouted demands to leave their lands the defenders began to fire on the front of Willas's column. He barked out orders forcing his men backwards for a moment, then spreading out to either side along the route slowly but surely encircling half the Castle.

He didn't have enough men for a full enclosure, but what he did have were infantry and archers, and the archers began to lay down a blistering counter-fire forcing many of the defenders along the wall to duck and cover. He lost several men from the archer's fire however, but he had a solution for that as well.

Pulling back most of his men he sent several knights and infantrymen off to a nearby copse of trees where they began to cut down a few trees to prepare barricades. The work was quickly done, and an hour later the barricades were ready and moved forward to defend the archers from the defender's arrows. It would be lifted periodically to allow the archers to fire back, but at this point they were basically just to keep the fire from the defenders on them.

They were mostly successful in this, and his infantry moved forward again this time wielding shovels and preparing ditches for themselves. More men moved into the copse. There they began to chop down more trees within sight of the castle's walls, but not close enough to allow the defenders to fire upon them.

This sporadic battle continued throughout the day and deep into the night, where his army began to use fire arrows, always concentrating on the wall. Of course the defenders also used fire arrows, and more than one band of archers was forced to retreat quickly once their barricades were set alight. The army didn't have enough water among their supplies to waste on putting out fires, and there was no nearby source of it either.

However, Willas was not unhappy with the day's work. After all, all this was merely a sideshow.

On the other side of the castle stood the castle's gates, and if the master of the castle was any kind of military man, he would've wondered why the attackers were not trying to attack from that side. Ander Clegane wasn't however, and he had seen the work going on in the copse, where several siege towers looked to be under construction. That was enough for what little curiosity Ander had to be satisfied that he saw everything the invaders were up to.

Willas had split off his light cavalry at the same time he had split off the force of infantry under Toulev. While Toulev swiftly made his way across House Clegane's land towards Cornfield, the light cavalry circled around the known position of the Clegane castle at a wide angle, well out of sight of any watcher from its towers. With them they had four valuable oxen, donated by House Crane. They slowed the light cavalry up more than a bit, but oxen were much more powerful beasts than horses.

Now the oxen were hidden in another copse of trees to the northwest of the castle, hooked up to a siege weapon that was mainly a large winch wrapped around with heavy, thick ropes on the end of which were grapnels. It was much like the siege weapon that the Lannisters and their allies tried to use against the Wolfsworn at Stone Hedge, only much better built, and there was no direwolf to terrify the oxen here.

The man in charge of the light cavalry detachment, Ser Bruster Flowers stared out from under the cover of a bush, looking up at the wall where he could no longer make out the shape of any watcher. "All right boys, Alec, Myrk, Laster, with me." He whispered.

The four men made their way forward, creeping along through the night towards the castle until they were right outside the walls. No alarm had been raised, no arrows fired, and most especially no burning pitch dropped down upon them. All in all this was an excellent start to the operation, thought Bruster. He nodded at his fellows, and one after another they all latched their grapnels onto the portcullis, which defended the wooden gate behind it.

When that was done Bruster nodded. "Myrk, you'll stay with me. We'll have to replace them if they don't grip proper."

Myrk nodded resignedly and the others returned to their fellows to take word but they needed to start the oxen moving. Moments later the two men who had remained behind watched as the ropes were dragged slowly taut, smiling at one another in the dark of the night as the grapnels all remained where they had been placed. The ropes began to strain, and there was a creaking groaning sound from the brittle metal.

Shouts of alarm began from one of the towers of the Castle above them. "Something is going on at the gate, get some defenders over here!"

"Time for us to go too," Bruster shouted, smacking Myrk on the shoulder.

The two of them raced away, and were nearly to the tree line when Bruster looked back at a grunt from behind him. It must've been a lucky shot in the dark, there was no way someone up there could've been able to see that well with no torches down here to illuminate them and with torches moving along the wall as men tried to see what was going on with the gate. But even so, an arrow had caught Myrk in the back.

Bruster raced back, putting his arm around the man and pulling him away from the castle and into the trees. He put Myrk down against one of the trees sideways, trying to pull the arrow out. But it had gone too deep, and he couldn't stop the blood gushing out of the wound after he pulled the shaft out. He remained there with Myrk for a moment, as a loud groaning sound reverberated through the night from the castle before shaking his head and pushing to his feet.

By the time dawn broke the oxen had literally pulled the portcullis out its trails and Willas quickly sent a force of infantry around the castle with the battering ram that had been prepared behind what the defenders had thought were siege towers. It was very well made, with a roof overhead to defend the man wielding it from overhead fire.

With the night spent using fire arrows on the gate to weaken it, and force the defenders to use water to put it out the gate fell before midday the next day. Once the battering ram was out of the way, Willas and the heavy and light cavalry charged through, not stopping as they ran into the small defensive line that been created directly in back of the gate, going over the rubble that had been placed there in a storm of steel and blood.

Several hours later Willas leaned against his forces side, one hand resting directly behind his faithful comrades as he stared up into the sky which was remarkably blue and clear for an autumn day. Such a magnificent day to see such horror. Willas had seen the horror that an uncontrolled army could do to smallfolk women and men, but this went beyond even that.

The dungeon of Clegane Hall was a place of horror. Several men had been tortured there, literally hacked to pieces and possibly brought in for that purpose, to give Gregor an outlet for his rages. Women too had been kept there, though thankfully most of them had died before his army arrived. A few had to be given mercy, evidently having been kept alive for the pleasure of the acting Lord of the castle. Toulev and a few volunteers from the lands the raiders had passed through had seen to them, their faces grave, and pitying.

Ser Graceford moved up towards him, his armor practically crimson with blood and when he pulled off his helm underneath his short-cropped dirty brown hair his brown eyes were grave. "We found the treasury my Lord. Two large chests of gold and several examples of expensive gold jewelry and other items were there. I've ordered one broken open and distributed among the men. The other, that is your portion and my own."

"Take what you wish from it," Willas replied, still not looking at the man. "The rest, I'll donate to the smallfolk of the Goldengrove. With their land the way it is now, they'll need money to get through the next few months. Anything else?"

"The last of the defenders have been put to death." Graceford said flatly. "By the time the sun moves in the sky we should have the riches of this place moved out, and have ready for burning. Though with winter coming on, are you certain that's a good idea? The local smallfolk might make use of it."

"No, I doubt any smallfolk will ever wish to use this place, not given the horrors that occurred here. The Mountain that Rode cast a long shadow." Willas shook his head. "I don't even want us to remain here for a single night, we'll bivouac outside in the camp we made already. Make certain that the man boil enough water to fill up their skins from the well and leave it as is, that at least will help the smallfolk around here."

Graceford nodded and moved off again leaving Willas to stare once again up into the sky.

It was a subdued and grimly satisfied army that moved off the next day despite the riches it had won itself. They marched deeper into the Westerlands while behind them Clegane Hall burned, the wood inside its stone walls succumbing quickly, the supports of the keep failing and collapsing under the weight of the stone.

It took them over a week to reach House Swyft. Once they arrived, they found that Toulev had prepared several catapults, which had begun to pound the walls.

He bowed formally to Willas and Ser Graceford as they rode up reporting in crisp, concise terms. "They don't 'ave enough men inside to sortie out my Lord, but they got more than enough to make any kind of assault deadly for us. I estimate 600 maybe 620 men all told, most of them not very well-trained, but in a siege you don't need to be very well-trained to thrust a spear down at someone trying to climb up a siege ladder, or hurl torches on siege towers. I've got the catapults banging away, but it'll take some time."

"What is the response of the local smallfolk to our invasion?" asked Willas cut as he dismounted.

Around them his archers moved forward into the prepared positions that Toulev's men had made, dragging their barricades into place in front of them as they began to exchange fire with the defenders. More men moved forward to shore up the siege lines around the castle, though Toulev had done his usual thorough job of it already, and had completed dug out trenches along two sides of the Castle despite not having as many men as Willas had in attacking House Clegane.

"Ambivalence my Lord. The rumors of what the marauders did in the Reach have spread backwards of course, and most of them seem to be happy enough that we're not paying them back and like in the same coin."

"Good, that's probably the best we could hope for. However I don't think that catapults are going to smash those walls down anytime soon." Catapults could only throw stones around 25 to 50 pounds. Stone walls could stand up to that pounding for weeks if not months, and Cornfield, while not having as high walls as Clegane Hall was still a well-made castle and the defenders were surely working on their own siege weapon to target his.

"Get our tents set up with the men here, and look at the water situation." Willas ordered as he began to pull off his armor. They were so far back from the front lines it was safe enough. "I'll go and join the workers working on the siege equipment. It'll take some time, but it'll be faster to build a trebuchet and use that rather than the smaller catapults." A trebuchet could hurl a rock upwards of 300 pounds faster and farther than a catapult, but they were harder to make and much more time and material consuming.

Still the time and resources issue could be solved by hurling men at the problem, and so Willas did for the next five days and nights. He was working at correctly pairing down some of the joints with a few of the men who had been carpenters before volunteering to join his army when Toulev found him. "My Lord, there's a messenger here from deeper within the Westerlands, wearing the colors of House Serret."

Willas frowned but nodded. "Lead him to my tent would you? I'll be there presently."

The messenger was indeed a man of the House Serret, one that Willas recognized, a cousin of Lord Serret who had been at several tournaments in the Reach in years prior, though his first name eluded Willas. "Ser Serret, I would bid you welcome, but since I believe that the Westerlands and the Reach are at war, I will instead ask why you are here under a flag of truce?"

The man smiled thinly, shaking his head. "Actually, I'm not here as a part of any kind of unified Westerlands force, in fact the Westerlands have for all intents and purposes ceased to exist. I am here in the name of the 'Duchy' of Silverden, and I am here on the word of my own House and that of Lydden and our allies to ask you what your intentions are towards our lands."

"Duchy?" Willas asked. "I'm afraid I don't know that term."

"I didn't know it either, until a missive from Ranma and Daenerys Stargaryen arrived, detailing what had occurred to the Westerlands army and marched into the Riverlands, as well as offers of what they were willing to give us in return for our loyalty going forward. As the Lannisters have led us to the brink of disaster, a meeting between the heads of Houses decided to go along with their proposals."

"I've heard rumors that the Lannisters had been pushed to the brink of defeat, am I to understand that is a done thing?"

"You might say that yes." The Westerlands' knight was dust dry as he replied, shaking his head. "Not only that, but the messages came from ravens trained at the Golden Tooth. That too has fallen, and will be incorporated into the Riverlands from now on."

He waited until the exclamations of shock and surprise passed, before going on. "The list of lords that they claim to have killed in battle is far larger than those that remain alive either in the Westerlands, or on the list of those sent into exile or put to work like common smallfolk." There had been some anger at that, but when the alternative was either exile or death, none of the lords could argue that it had been anything but merciful.

"The list of dead is of course topped by one name in particular. Lord Tywin Lannister was executed for his crimes against the crown and the people of the Riverlands." Ser Serret laughed, but there was more than a hint of fear in it rather than simple humor. "We've already begun to hear a song from the bards detailing the campaign in the Riverlands, the March of the Wolf King they are calling it."

Ser Graceford, Toulev and Bruster all twitched in shock, while Willas simply narrowed his eyes thoughtfully. "Interesting. But are you at liberty to explain what you mean when you say the Westerlands has ceased to exist?"

"I am at liberty my Lord, if only to make certain you are aware of our position regarding your actions against Houses Swyft and Clegane. We will take no action against you so long as you remain on House Swyft land. House Serret land however will be defended most vigorously." House Serret land abutted that of House Swyft to the north and northeast as a traveler went towards the mountains that separated the Westerlands from the Crown and Riverlands.

"Essentially what the new royal houses ordered is the dissolution of the Westerlands into various smaller 'duchies', each of which will be controlled by powerful houses and beholden to the crown alone rather than a Lord Paramount and through said Lord Paramount to the crown. The Lannisters will no doubt be the first among equals still, their control of Lannisport makes that certain even if you discount the Rock itself. They sent along a copy of the new taxation laws were going to be putting in place, but also a royal warrant to allow Copper Lake to grow into a city!"

Copper Lake was a town on the edge of House Serret land abutting that of House Lydden, and was owned jointly by both houses. Indeed, it had been the reason why the two houses had recently intermarried in the form of the heir to house Lydden and lady Serret, Lord Serret's second-born daughter. Situated on a small lake it had several nearby copper mines which gave the town its name, a thriving fishing industry, and was the home of more than a few gifted artisans.

They had been pushing Lord Tywin to go to the crown and ask for a warrant to allow the town to grow into a city. But neither Tywin, nor his admittedly weak father, had never truly wished any other cities to grow in the Westerlands to rival Lannisport, which gave the Lannisters a near monopoly on blacksmith, artisans and other laborers of that nature.

"Do you know if you're the only one to get such a warrant?" asked Willas intently. This is a shrewd move by Lord Stark, I approve, deeply approve! Time and past time more cities were allowed to grow in Westeros. But...

"We are not. We have had ravens from several other houses, many of whom received see similar warrants. So long as we agree to follow the taxation laws for the cities and raise men to serve in the Royal Army we will be granted the warrants for the cities, and be able to govern our lands as we see fit, answerable only to the crown."

"And of course you'll have to swear new oaths to that effect, yes?" Asked Ser Graceford frowning thoughtfully. He didn't understand much of the economic implications of what was being talked about, but the military ones he understood well enough. No single duchy, I wonder where they got that term from, will be able to raise enough man to threaten the royal house. "And how complete was their victory, you mentioned dead lords, but what about the rest of the army?"

"Demolished." Said Ser Serret flatly. "I don't think there's been a victory as complete as this one in centuries, the only one that possibly comes close is Lord Stannis' victory against the Iron Fleet during the first Greyjoy rebellion. As to the oath we'll have to swear, they sent along a copy of that as well. It's simple enough, but also very inclusive and..."

The man paused for a moment smiling faintly as he looked off into the distance. "It's about their duties to us as much as it is about our duties to the crown, my lords. There is definitely more reciprocity in that oath than in any other I've seen. We'll have to formally appear before them to take those vows, but that's a mere formality even with autumn upon us."

He recited the oath off aloud then. "I, heh, 'fill in name here', do vow on my name and sacred honor to be the king and queen's man, to follow and keep the laws of Westeros in both my house and my land, to be their true man 'or woman' in times of turmoil and plenty. To follow the Royal Family's lawful orders for now and for all time. Then in return they swear to act honorably toward us, to aid us if need, to treat us honorably and fairly, to match loyalty with dignity, honor and aid in times of war or trouble, and punishment for oath-breaking."

Willas and Ser Graceford both looked at one another then Ser Graceford spoke up looking at the other knight intensely. "That sounds somewhat like a knightly oath more than any oath of fealty."

"Indeed, that was my thought as well Ser. They expect honor and loyalty from their lords, and will reward such. But if you act in a treasonous fashion..." he shook his head. "They will not be taking any action against the Westerlands houses further unless those Houses take action against them, but the message also listed those houses from the Riverlands that had taken up arms on Joffrey the Bastard's behalf. All of them have been wiped out, defrocked and with their lands added to those of loyal neighbors."

"Frankly all told I think more houses have been wiped out or brought low in this war than any five previous! Lord Ranma and his wife apparently believe in making the Lords pay the price for going to war."

Ser Graceford smiled widely. "I like it, I like that a lot."

Willas stayed silent frowning thoughtfully. The Royal army is the key, he thought to himself. At first when he realized what was meant by the term 'duchy' he had feared a return to the time of Many Kings with constant wars between them. But if the royal house retains control of a royal army, one whose equipment and training not to mention numbers are better than any single noble house can match, they'd be able to keep the peace easily enough.

Epecially with the examples already set in this war that going against them will see your House not just brought low but possibly wiped out. What Lord would risk that? The Lannisters might be prideful enough to attempt it if Tywin was still alive and possibly even force the rest of the Westerlands to march with them again. Kevan was intelligent and charismatic in his own way but not someone the rest of the Westerlands would follow, not after so many of their fellows had been slaughtered doing so. The Westerlands as a united nation is truly gone.

That thought was a terrifying one considering his family's position backing Renly, and he hoped that the young idiot would sue for peace. Of course I'm assuming he'll beat Stannis, who I know won't sue for peace. Seven-damn it what a fucking stupid situation! I wish I was there rather than dealing with this little problem here.

That thought was a sobering one, and he frowned again. "This is all very interesting Ser, and you've given me more than enough food for thought. Will you require my written word that we will not extend our campaign into your houses' lands, or will my verbal word be enough?"

"For my part it would be enough my Lord, but Lord Lydden is a rather suspicious fellow. But if you could put it in writing I think that will be more than enough."

"Very well." Willas nodded at a page nearby. "Fetch my writing case please." Within moments the knight of house Serret had the message in hand, and was ushered out of the tent. He would be given a tent for the night, but Willas and his lords had other things on their minds.

"What are you thinking of my Lord?" asked Toulev.

"I think that the work on the trebuchet will be done in another three days. Once that is done and this castle taken, we will turn around quickly. We've retained a few ravens trained to reach House Crane. Once House Swyft falls, the Westerlands will have been paid back for their atrocities upon our people. Then will be able to turn our eyes to the Ironborn." Those ravens and the maester to look after them had been among Lord Crane's contribution to Willas' army.

"Not to the events happening in Crownlands my Lord?" Asked Ser Graceford. Rumors had begun to fly about something happening between the two Baratheon brothers, but the events after that battle had not yet reached this far. "We might not yet know what really occurred, but it's certain that the future of all Westeros will be decided there."

"Let my father play the kingmaker." Willas said, allowing a hint of scorn to enter his voice for the first time when talking about the man. Normally he was careful to keep his opinion about Mace in check, but now he let it out for a brief moment. "My duty to my house and to the land of the Reach. As such we will expel these invaders, no matter who they are or where they come from! We're nearly done with our duty here gentlemen, but more awaits us elsewhere. Let the larger politics and the events elsewhere happen, our duty is to our people."

Ser Graceford nodded firmly and after a moment Bruster nodded as well. Toulev simply nodded sharply, then left the tent quickly.

"We've gotten word that Garlan is going to take the battle to the Ironborn, but that leaves the Mander for us to retake. I'll want us back down on the river quickly, so the ravens will need to carry some orders to House Crane and Goldengrove..."

OOOOOO

The fleet flew the three-headed dragon banner of House Targaryen, along with the golden skulls on a spear of the Golden Company as they disembarked their troops on Massey's Hook. The ships would then move around the Hook entering Blackwater Bay to pick up the men once they were done here.

"It's a pity that House Massey and House Bar Emmon didn't respond favorably to our overtures my lords, but it will do to wet the men's appetites for further war." Said a young man, known to his friends as Griff, though he sometimes went by the name of Aegon, and had been using that name more and more as the trip went on.

"True enough." said one of the Golden Company commanders, smiling thinly. "You realize however that if my company takes this castle, we'll get the lion's share of the spoil?"

"That was never in doubt." said Aegon before either of the other two mercenary commanders could comment. The Long Lances and Company of the Rose were smaller companies and far less reputable than the Golden Company, but they added a light cavalry and scouting element to the Golden Company. The Golden Company had those of course, but the added numbers were welcome.

If only I was as certain that their loyalty was to my cause rather than to the purse of the Iron Bank, the young man mused, exchanging a glance with his father, who was not his father really. Still that was the way he thought of Jon Connington and still would, even though his real father was now known to him.

"But do remember that I will be taking a share for myself, yes? We might need it later on after all. So long as your dragon can get us within range to charge the wall with one of our shield squares, that will work well enough." So the Golden commander. "I doubt that the elephants will be needed for this, alas."

"In that case, I should be off." Said the young man, moving over towards his dragon who was being unlatched from its chains as he approached snapping and snarling at the men around it halfheartedly. It had been fed recently after all.

Moments later Aegon and his Calixares, which was what he had named his dragon, were in the air, high up and moving over the army where it was continuing to offload the infantry and more importantly the cavalry. The horses needed to be worked to get over their sea legs. We were lucky not to meet with any ships of the so-called Royal Navy, we can't assume we'll be able to move along Blackwater Bay from now on, and if we have to march inland, those horses will be needed.

His dragon bucked slightly underneath him, and Aegon scowled, pulling at the heavy bridle slapping the side of the dragon's neck while barking out an order in High Valyrian. "Still, Calixares! Climb the Sky!"

Aegon was not happy with the training he'd been able to give Calixares since they had taken to sea. He had thought that the bonding between rider and beast would take at some point now that Calixares was large enough to carry him, but it hadn't happened yet. That bond, which was something all the books he'd seen about dragon riding mentioned, was supposed to make the beast respond to his voice more quickly.

But the catalyst, time in the saddle, differed widely from dragon to dragon. Well, it will happen eventually, and Calixares responds well enough for now. I wouldn't want to put the two of us against any other dragon/rider pair, let alone the massive beast that Viserys is supposed to have, but for merely earthbound threats, our present style of partnership will do.

A few seconds later Aegon and his dragon were moving forward of the army and towards Stonedance, staying as high as he could go for now so as to take the castle from surprise. After all, House Massey doesn't know about Calixares.

It was a rugged castle, its walls thick and sturdy yet uncut, seeming to be hewn from the rock where it stood on a small hill, three sided for some reason, with a single heavy keep set into the center of it two, perhaps three stories taller than the walls. Each corner had a tower with a balustrade upon it, which held catapults, as did the keep's protected roof.

They might well have been deadly against any invading army, but the castle had no scorpions. And only scorpions properly prepared are a threat to dragons, so it looks like I can be of more use than a mere distraction! Arrows might be in enough numbers as well, but with shock on my side...

Calixares came out of the western sky above the castleland attacked without warning. Like Aegon had said before he left the army camp, House Massey and House Bar Emmon had both followed House Baratheon willingly into Rebellion, now they would feel the might of the true House Targaryen.

"DRAGON!" came the shout from one man, staring almost straight up in horror. Men on patrol or standing guard on the keep's roof of the balustrade of the towers craned their necks to stare, but only a few had the presence of mind to raise their bows.

It wasn't enough. Calixares' flame struck with the force of a battering ram of heat, flame and force. Men screamed and died where they stood, or fell as still living pyres to the ground of the castle. Each catapult was set alight, and fires began here and there along the outer walls and the keep's roof as anything flammable was ignited by the dragon's fire.

More and more arrows however were now crisscrossing the sky in an attempt to strike Calixares and Aegon, and he shouted, "Climb the Sky!" in high Valyrian. The dragon surged forward, pumping its wings hard and turning upwards and away from the keep. Arrows fell behind him as more men on the wall tried to shoot at him, but he was now too high up for their arrows to reach. Aegon and his dragon flew there, circling the keep and keeping the blasted and demoralized defenders attention on him.

Then from the southeast came the Golden Company, their infantry formed up into squares with shields before and above them. If they were facing a an army in the field, those ranks might have spears thrust out in front, but now instead the front squares carried siege ladders on their sides, hidden by the large shields top and front.

Ranks of more shield bearers moved forward, their heavy shields angled to block any arrows coming their way, while two ranks of archers knelt down behind them. So protected, the archers let fly. Watching the beginning of the battle from above Aegon winced. Now that number of arrows would have been much tougher to handle.

The arrow storm fell like deadly rain upon the archers on the wall. If they had been under cover or less than utterly panicked by Aegon's attack, they might have fought back. They would not have won, not with the professional way the Golden Company was going about its assault, but they would have at least spent their lives dearly.

As it was after a few of them died from the arrows, the rest broke and ran, leaving the wall around the castle's gates devoid of men. The infantry squares charged forward, reaching the castle's walls before reinforcements from the other two walls could get there. The squares opened somewhat, and the men pushed the ladders up and against the wall.

They lost several men from the arrows of the men inside the towers, and then more from the keep when they got onto the wall, but after that, the battle was won, and Aegon knew it. He circled lower and lower as the battle went on, then turned away, moving back toward the camp and the chain which would hold Calixares against the cruel ground, while Aegon joined the rest of the battle.

He ignored Griff's shout to stay back, to remain at the back, shouldering his way in among the men forcing their way through the now open utter gate. Aegon was eager to whet his blade in blood, and would see it happen no matter his father's words.

Thanks to his crown and his voice Aegon soon found himself at the front of the tide smashing through the now open keep, the gate to it shattered behind them. He hacked at a man who came out of a room to one side, killing him before he could notice the man had just been a servant, panicked and scared. Aegon might not have cared of course, but knowing that his first kill was a mere servant rather than a fighting man might have been galling.

Several moments later Aegon lay in one of the beds in the lords apartment. Lord Massey was dead, already slain by the last doorway into this area of the keep's upper floor. His Lady had already been taken by the commanders of the Golden Company to share between them. But the two of them had a daughter of fourteen, a comely lass with lustrous brown hair, doe-like eyes, and a budding figure.

She was tied up along his side now, crying softly. Part of Aegon was guilty about what he had just done, but the pleasure of the moment and the sheer power he felt even now after the act he couldn't bring himself to care. To the conqueror, go the spoils. With that thought and the memory of her clenching around him Aegon felt himself rise once more, and with a grin he turned, pressing the sobbing girl back down into her blood stained sheets.

The next day, the army was on its way once more with Massey burning behind them. They couldn't stay here for long, and they had Bar Emmon to deal with.

That castle fell just as easily, but it was also richer, making the mercenaries happy indeed. Aegon however had mixed feelings about it most particularly because of the news that his newest advisor brought. "What do you mean King's Landing is gone Eunuch?"

Varys, for it was indeed the master of whispers, smiled thinly. A master of disguise and subterfuge, he had made his way across Blackwater Bay easily enough by fishing boat, having easily escaped from the Lannister/Serret camp. "I am afraid that my admittedly blunt statement is wholly accurate Your Majesty. Stannis employs a Witch of R'hllor, who burned out the city from one end to the other."

With, admittedly, the aid of wildfire packets buried throughout the city, the number and strength of which even I had no idea about! That thought was galling to Varys, who prided himself on being able to ferret out such things, but he was well used to failing in that endeavor.

A thought that brought him to his next bit of news, which he gave quickly, before Aegon, Griff or his commanders could sink further into shock. "And your uncle is sailing in the Bay of Crabs. One of my agents, alas one of very few and far between in that area of Westeros, has spotted his ships there."

And Littlefinger as well, I wonder how that utter bastard managed that? Still, he picked the wrong dragon to back, hah! Fleeing from one sadist to another Petyr, how... fitting for one such as you.

"I have no idea at the moment about his long term plans but Lord Stannis is marching up into the Riverlands to battle your aunt. Now I am not a military man but we might, just might have an opportunity, if we sail for Duskenale as soon as possible..."

OOOOOO

It had only been luck that had allowed Asha to survive her fall into the mad ocean, and reflexes honed by years of fighting and sailing that sea. She had grabbed at an overturned rowboat that had somehow gone over the side of one of the greenlander ships, possibly from one of the ships that had been smashed open on the reefs. She hadn't seen it, but judging from the bodies that had still been in the process of sinking around the rowboat, they might have been survivors trying to escape a sinking ship. Stupid of them, but good for her.

While the man who had been going to kill her went to the Drowned God behind her, Asha had desperately clung with one hand to its side, while pulling off her armor, unable to pull herself up out of the water with its weight pulling her down. The pain of pulling the chain mail off had been agonizing, the wounds along her side and back screaming from her contortions and the seawater in the wound.

Somehow however Asha was able to pull herself up and into the rowboat. She lay there, gasping and utterly out of energy for a few moments. After a moment however, Asha forced herself up trying to get her bearings. But the waves had already carried her away from where she had fallen into the ocean, and the storm's fury completely obscured the battle going on now. She could see the ships, even make out a few clumps of combat when lightning slashed across the sky, but that was all.

With the aid of the lightning, Asha was able to see well enough to steer her little rowboat away from the battle. She couldn't figure out where she was going, but Asha knew where she didn't want to be. It was hard going, her wounds and the ocean itself literally trying to kill her now. Ironically the lightning allowed her enough light to work with, enough to rig up the small sail and head on her way. Several times she was nearly capsized, more than once Asha had to throw her body around to keep from being thrown over the side.

But at last Asha was away from the shoals, and with lightning still racking the sky she began to move towards Fair Isle. As weak as she was Asha still smashed her hand onto the ocean over the side of the rowboat, shouting aloud. "Fuck you Drowned God, you're not going to get me just yet!"

That was a little over four days ago, and Asha was now almost delirious with pain, fever, and hunger. She had no idea how, but at some point she had lost her way, heading straight out to sea. Now Asha had no idea where she was, and she knew that she was going to die here. Or Asha did, until she saw a small blot of brown in the distance.

With the last vestiges of her strength, she rowed in that direction. At last Asha reached what was a small strip of mountain jutting out of the ocean. Asha still had no idea where she was, but she was on land, something Asha would never have imagined she'd be happy for.

Standing up on woozy feet Asha more fell than stepped over the side of the rowboat. However that was a secondary concern. A few feet away she saw a berry bush ripe with berries, and another bush she recognized as one used to create soothing balms. Crawling forward Asha stuffed handfuls of the berries into her mouth gorging herself until her stomach began to rumble at her.

With that done, Asha began to do what she could for her wounds. They had healed somewhat, her clothing having been put to good use as makeshift bandages, though the one in her side was beginning to grow gray and smell when Asha pulled off her shirt. She crushed the leaves of the plant as much as she could, then screamed aloud when she rubbed them against the wound. "GAAAAAHHHHH! Damn me, well, pain is just nature saying that you're alive..."

She grit her teeth while her fingers worked, slowly but surely. These weren't the first wound's Asha had taken, nor the first she'd have to see to alone. That served Asha well now, but it was still intensely painful, and she would have two nasty scars for the rest of her life. They would be much less if she had a healer to look at them, but even in the best of times healers among the Ironborn were as rare as a virgin in a whorehouse.

Asha didn't know how long it took, but eventually she was satisfied. Out to sea Asha saw another storm coming, and she scowled angrily, looking around. "I need some fucking shelter, and some wood. Best to start exploring now." Wood was hard to come by, so she broke one of the paddles from the boat, and used one end to skewer some kind of furry animal that clung to a rock. Asha had never seen it's like before, but she got a feeling of overpowering laziness from the creature.

After that Asha moved up the small mountain and found a cave, or what Asha had thought was a cave at first. But several feet into it, the walls began to smooth and small paintings began to dot it here and there. Paintings of battle on the high ocean against creatures larger than men but scaled and wielding long tridents, with the symbols of lightning and thunder in every picture. Sometimes it would be accompanied by a hand wielding the lightning against the scaly creatures. "What... what is this place...?"

OOOOOO

The Old Gods and the Seven were not the only ones sending prophetic dreams to their worshipers. R'hllor was doing the same thing, trying to influence its worshipers not only in Westeros, but in Essos as well. Several dozen R'hllor priests and priestesses the world over had visions of the encroaching darkness, the coming of endless winter. More than one of them decided to book passage to White Harbor from wherever they were in the world.

Most of them knew that they would be looked at askance by the Northerners, but what did that matter in the face of a threat to all humanity? None of them would arrive quickly, and several wouldn't arrive at all with the sea becoming more and more treacherous as autumn continued, but they would do their part.

Out of all of R'hllor's worshipers Melisandre was one of the most powerful. While she was from a darker sect than the main line of R'hllor worshipers, that did not impact the power of her faith or the strength of the visions that R'hllor could send her.

The Red Witch came out of another trance, teeth clenched around a shriek while she fell to the side from where she had been sitting in the lotus position before the fire she had been using as a medium. For a moment it was all Melisandre could do to keep her body breathing, keep her heart going.

Because unlike the vision of the Old Gods, her vision was centered on the White Walkers themselves rather than the war and their pawns, and when it did, the White Walkers had felt it. They attempted in turn to both block and attack her through the visions. Melisandre thought it was the protection of her God that saved her mind, but it wasn't, her life had been saved by the magics built into the Wall.

Blocking a vision from seeing anything was easy, a defensive action. Following the magic of the visions back to Melisandre was an offensive action, and they couldn't get past the Wall. Yet their attack still stopped the visions, with an abruptness that Melisandre felt as if someone had dumped her mind into acid.

It was several moments before she was able to move past the pain, and Melisandre wearily allowed her acolytes to help her into bed. Melisandre knew that Stannis would be sending someone to fetch her soon, since he knew that she was going to be scrying that day. But right now Melisandre simply did not have the energy to meet with the man. "When one of the Fire Guard come for me, tell them to come back in a few hours." She murmured closing her eyes again.

Melisandre had thought to rest and think about the visions she had seen, but instead she fell into a deep dreamless slumber for several hours until one of her acolytes woke her up by shaking her shoulder. She opened her eyes angrily, but saw Stannis himself standing beside the woman. "Your scrying did not go well, I take it?"

"I..."Melisandre croaked,then gestured at one of her acolytes to bring her some wine.

The acolyte did so, handing a glass to Stannis who took it but did not drink from it, staring at the woman on the bed intently. "What happened? Did something go wrong with your spell, or has someone else begun to employ magic?"

"If by someone you mean the Great Enemy, then yes." Melisandre replied tartly, angry at being questioned like this, especially when she still felt so weak. "No one else has been able to block my visions, though I am unable to interpret the ones I see now even as well as I could before King's Landing burned. My visions are centering more and more on the Great Other, my Lord. They are gathering strength, and the Wall will not stop them! We must finish here in the South and march north as quickly as possible! Remember my Lord, you are the Azor Ahai, it is not your destiny merely to unite Westeros once more, but to defeat the Great Other!"

Melisandre was still interpreting much of her visions through the lens of her religion and what she had discovered of what she called the Great Enemy or the Great Other. While she had been able to discover or discern many of the towers the White Walkers possessed, she still thought of them as some kind of monarchy, with a king leading them which she termed the Great Other. In reality the White Walkers had no such single leader, they had no need of such things.

"I understand that, and I have always said I will march north to deal with this other enemy, but I will not leave enemies behind me!" Stannis growled. "Such would be madness, I would be deposed, the land and the lords turned against me all too easily." That his own actions had something to do with that didn't even occur to Stannis.

"Unless we can win this war in two months my Lord, we will have no choice. That is something my visions were clear upon. In two months, something will happen in the North. Something that will segue disaster." She went on to describe many of the things she had seen among the army which matched what Rannar had seen in the main though somewhat less detailed. Melisandre hadn't been able to discern anything about their strategies, except the time which they had still to act.

"Two months!?" Stannis said incredulously. He glared at the woman then stared over and away from her for a moment thinking hard. They were about three weeks or so away from the ruins of King's Landing now, and he estimated they had at least two weeks before they entered the Riverlands.

Depending on Stark's actions, that campaign could take months. And that doesn't even consider were Viserys is, or the second fleet, which I very much fear is the Golden Company, or the bloody Viper in the south. In the long run, the Viper is immaterial, he doesn't have a large enough army to conquer, and he has made no friends. And Viserys' army is a small threat if we can neutralize or kill his dragon. But the Northern and Riverlands Army, possibly the Golden Company, those are a different matter.

"I don't know if I'll be able to do that," he said honestly. "Unless Rannar Stark decides to bet it all on a single roll of the dice, a campaign in the Riverlands could take months. And we're still at least a week and a half possibly two weeks away from entering the Riverlands at all."

Melisandre nodded, not speaking. If she was a saner woman, Melisandre might've pointed out that possibly some kind of peace treaty with the Starks might be necessary at this point, but she wasn't. Melisandre was still enamored of the idea of sacrificing the Targaryen woman to her flames. The power that would give her would be incredible, and Melisandre now knew she would need that power when they went to war with the Great Other.

"Though I am loathe to suggest it my Lord could a return to the oceans hasten our journey?" She said after a moment.

"Without a doubt, though we might lose a few ships along the way at this time of year. But that would force us to either fight our way through the northern navy, which has grown in recent years, or have already beaten their king's army, forcing them to sue for peace." Stannis would never go to Rannar and offer a peace treaty, but if he beat the Stark youth he was more than willing to welcome the rest of the North into the fold once more. Better that than facing continual attacks on his army when he moved to the Wall.

"In any event, I will send a raven to Duskendale and have them send out a cutter to find Seaworth have him be ready to meet us either in Maidenpool or Duskendale. " They had received word that Dragonstone had been retaken, and Driftmark's port razed to the ground several days ago from a messenger from Duskendale. Stannis had been pleased to hear that Ser Seaworth had responded in precisely the manner he had hoped, that he would continue to pursue Viserys' fleet. He doubted Viserys would find any friends anywhere, which would force the boy to remain at sea. And at sea, Davos and the pirate Salladhor Saan would slaughter him.

"Can your visions tell us anything more, anything concrete?"

"I've seen visions my Lord that I would interpret as meaning that one of the Tyrells has won its little war, and is marching down to a river."

"Willas then. I doubt that Garlan would be in any position just yet to take the war to the Ironborn in the Shield Islands or along the Mander." In this he was correct, Garlan was still in Oldtown at that moment, gathering resources and arming his ships for the campaign to come. "Go on."

"The Second Fleet, the one that has a golden sheen to it Azor Ahai, has arrived and won a battle. I did not recognize the keeps involved, but it has arrived to Westeros and won several victories. This time however I was able to see some of the banners my Lord." She went on to describe them, and Stannis slowly nodded.

"A mercenary army entirely. If not for the Golden Company, their threat would be negligible at this point. My men and even those from the Reach are veterans, and veteran armsmen are always better than mercenaries who will turn their tails the moment a battle is against them. However the Golden Company, that makes it a different kettle of fish. They won't find any allies among the lords or smallfolk but they can have an impact on any battlefield. Can you tell me anything more?"

"A man who is not a man is joined them, and they may take to sea once more. But once at sea my Lord, my visions lost power. If I could but sacrifice someone..."

"Tell me the rest of your visions and then will decide on that." Said Stannis was still very wary of creating internal enemies by allowing Melisandre her head on that issue, but there were more than a few lords whose death he would not exactly miss. Arranging it in such a way that could not come back on that would be an issue, but not an insurmountable one.

"There is not to tell. I saw a city, portions of it burning but only portions. What that could mean I do not know. The Black Dragon my Lord is a mad creature that much I do know, that bit of my vision was tinged with madness fire and death."

"Viserys." Stannis replied grimly. "We already knew he was mad, the depths of that madness doesn't really affect us right now."

Melisandre nodded. "I saw some wild men battling men of the North, though there was no context, and it faded quickly into the visions of the Great Others that I've already spoken of. Whether it was part of those visions, a segue into them perhaps, or something entirely separate, I cannot say."

Melisandre hated to admit that, but she had to, the Lightbringer deserved to be told honestly about her shortcomings. Particularly since doing so might convince him to let Melisandre sacrifice someone to gain the power to see better. "I saw the Wolf and the Fish fully intertwined, marching on, got the impression they were marching towards us, but not directly. I also saw men marching east then north. I do not know their banners, so it meant nothing to me but..."

She went on to describe a few of the banners, and Stannis' smile twisted slightly. "The Vale! So those fools have finally decided to stop sitting on the sidelines?"

"East then north I said." Melisandre said sharply before going on in a softer tone, staring into his eyes. "They will not interfere I do not think with the war against our human opponents, but they hear the call North as well my Lord. We must go north soon!"

"If the Riverlands and Northern army is marching towards us, I may be able to smash them and move on to Maidenpool. From there it will take about a month or so if we're lucky to get to White Harbor by sea. That is the best I'm going to promise, and I won't even promise that until I know what the Golden Company is up to. If they were any other mercenary force, I would be willing to allow the remaining lords here south of the Neck to deal with them. But as it is, I can't even promise that."

"Then will you allow me to sacrifice someone to the flames my Lord?" Melisandre replied. "That is the only way I will be able to get the information you seek."

Stannis frowned. He didn't want to be completely dependent upon her visions. The need for a spy network was paramount in his thinking for the future, though he honestly only had the vaguest idea of how to go about building something like that. But right now, he couldn't turn that resource away just because he was worried about being dependent on those visions.

He finally nodded. "Yes I will, but you will have to wait until we are close enough to the woods near the God's Eye. I refuse to allow the army to realize what we are doing here. My position among the lords particularly from the Reach is not the best, and I can ill afford to empower such division when we are about to face our sternest threat."

Melisandre nodded eagerly. "I will have something prepared by then my Lord."

OOOOOO

The wildling assault on the Wall came with the pounding of the drums from the towers. In his castle along the wall Tyrion woke up abruptly during the noise, pushing the previous night's whore off him quickly and ignoring the woman's shouts of protest as she fell to the cold stone floor. He shivered a little himself as he got out of bed, but quickly raced over to pull on his armor.

About five minutes later Tyrion was up on top of the wall, along with Bronn and the rest of his order. A raiding party of wildlings had somehow crept up, in broad day light to the Wall and thrown up several of their climbing ropes. They hadn't been noticed until they'd done the same thing at least five times to get up the Wall.

"How the hell did that happen?" Tyrion shouted even as he drew his sword and raced forward to hack at a few of the wildlings who had scaled the Wall in the face of several dozen archers firing straight down at them.

"Ask questions later." Bronn grunted blocking a man from getting around the edge of the line and hurling him off the Wall with a fierce overhand blow the man had been forced to block.

The battle was quick and vicious, with over a dozen wildlings falling to their deaths and even more slain by arrows with only a few having been able to scale the Wall despite having had such a surprising head start on doing so before they were noticed. None of the defenders had been hurt by enemy fire, though more than one man was hustled back inside dealing with frostbite.

"What was the point of that?" Tyrion growled. Shoving his sword back into its sheath and sticking his hands underneath his armor plate. It was more sweaty than warm in there, but it was better than the alternative right now. Note to self, remember gloves next time old boy.

"I don't know Little Lion, it doesn't seem to serve any purpose unless they're trying to gauge how quickly we react, though why they don't know that yet, hell's I'm not going to guess."

"Maybe, I certainly wouldn't want to trust what a wildling scout could report about things like that. Hmm... still I have to wonder..."

Moments later just as Tyrion was about to head inside to find his gloves, the sound of drums reached them from much further down the Wall to the east. He looked at Bronn and the two exchanged glances before Bronn turned and began to bellow orders to the men around them to head in that direction while leaving several dozen archers where they were, spreading out as more men came up from Sable Hall to join them.

Tyrion hastened inside to grab his gloves, and by the time he caught up with his men the battle was already over.

"Another skirmish," said a Night's Watchman, who was in charge of this portion of the Wall. "We spotted them as they came up, and butchered them on the Wall before they could get up even two ladders worth."

The Imp hummed thoughtfully, still wondering what the wildlings were up to when yet another series of drum rolls began to bellow out.

About a week later, the drum noises had become almost constant.

At another meeting with the Lord Commander, Mormont and Tyrion met alone. None of the other lords could be pulled from their positions at this point for a face to face meeting, not when they all knew what was going on now. "They're trying to tire us out, keep on probing and sending small raiding forces here, there and everywhere along the Wall, pulling out the defenders this way and that, stretching us and exhausting us, using his numbers against us."

"Yes, but we can't do anything about it. While we have the best possible defensive position, they have the initiative as to where to attack. "

"And you're still adamant about not using the siege weapons until he starts to throw in larger assaults against us?"

"Yes. While a survivor of some of the original probing attacks might have gotten back down the Wall and to Rayder, it's doubtful. And it's even more doubtful that they would understand how deadly those weapons are now. Especially since all of them are on turn-aisles. I'm looking forward to them realizing that."

"But tiring out our troops like this, it really will have an effect." Tyrion said worriedly.

Jeor nodded, his eyes and face carved like stone. "That's why I'm ordering all of the northern lords and you Little Lion to pull two thirds of your forces off rotation on the Wall. My Night's Watch and the remainder will deal with these probing attacks, but I want most of our men rested and ready for when real battles begin."

So it went for another two weeks, while the weather became colder and the men of the Night's Watch and the others chosen to stand with them patrolled the Wall as aggressively as they could, leaving no area uncovered for long enough for even the fastest wildling raiders to climb the magic-imbued Wall, which was 700 feet tall for its entire length.

No wildling made it up onto the wall, but every day numerous patrols would run into attempts to do so, and the defenders began to flag. Everyone could feel it, even those back down in the castles. And so it came as no surprise when the real attacks began.

OOOOOO

The first full assault hit near The Torches, which was commanded by Harrion Karstark and his men. He was a youngish man, but stern and thoughtful. He stood now staring out down from the Wall as thousands upon thousands of wildlings streamed out of the forest heading towards the Wall.

Behind them hidden in the woods several dozen catapults began to fire up at the Wall, but they simply didn't have the range to reach the top. The stones slammed into the Wall with a great booming sound, knocking loose some of the ice covering it, but that was all.

Harrion nodded over to the nearest catapult team. "Aim for the back of the horde lads, not your opposite numbers. Leave that to the ballistae. Other than that, fire!"

The man nodded, ranging their weapons on the attacking horde, a few of them further down the Wall needing to push hard on the turn-aisles their weapons were affixed to before firing. Dozens of massive boulders flew out from the Wall, some of them separating in midair before they plummeted down to impact among the horde of wildlings charging towards the Wall. Screams of anger, pain and fear filled the air, loud enough to be heard high above on the Wall.

Still the wildlings came on, entering bow range now and taking even more fire, though admittedly at this far a range the arrows lacked any kind of penetrating power. Yet neither did the wildlings have much armor to speak of, and gravity aided the arrows lethality too.

Behind the horde their catapults continued to try to arrange upon the Wall, and one or two larger ones began to fire. Yet in response the ballistae now fired on them in turn, the anti-siege weapons taking out their fellows quickly, smashing them to pieces and oftentimes killing their crew.

Long ladders began to clank along the Wall, along with grappling ropes to carry the men up portions of the Wall, though of course none could reach the top by any single ladder. More and more men began to fire arrows straight down at the attackers at the bottom of the Wall, until Harrion ordered, "Rock barrels forward!"

Here and there along the portion of the Wall facing this onslaught, teams of men came forward bearing large barrels filled with small fist sized rocks. They began to liberally pour them over the sides, moving along the Wall as they did to spread the effect. They also ripped away grapnels and ladders, carrying any man either carried to their doom.

Harrion had no idea how many wildlings died over the remaining moments of that battle, but they probably outnumbered the men his House had sent to the Wall by at least 3 to 1 possibly more. And in return he hadn't lost a single man. The wildlings might be able to surprise us from time to time in small groups, and possibly larger ones during the night, but this kind of mad assault during the day is pointless. Not with the number of men that look the Lord Commander had ordered to be rested anyway.

And now to put a bit of an emphasis on it! Harrion smiled at that thought, looking over at one of the larger trebuchet. "Load one of the specials."

More than one man looked queasy at the very idea, but all of them set to willingly, loading the large siege weapon not with a giant rock as it could have held but with a large bundle of heavy, clay flasks tied in a loose net. The alchemist who helped them was looking incredibly nervous, hoping that the jostling wouldn't set off his precious cargo.

It didn't, and moments later the cargo of wildfire flasks was flung out from the Wall by the massive siege weapon. It didn't aim for any of the attackers, most of whom were now retreating. No, it aimed for the forest well behind them.

The wildfire ignited in midair from the jostling, exploding out from its casks one after another and spreading as it did, so what hit the forest was as near to a blast of dragonfire as could be contrived by human means. And it spread, lighting the forest on fire for acres in every direction, a maelstrom of green flame. Screams abounded, the noise of them reaching the Wall above even the tumult of the ongoing battle and more than one wildling turned to look, wailing in shock and fear at the horror that the defenders of the Wall had unleashed upon them.

They broke of course, even a disciplined army would've broken upon seeing their camps destroyed like that along with thousands of their fellows, not even considering the losses they had already sustained. Here and there in family groups or clans they broke, rushing away from the Wall and away from the wildfire moving north and west to get away from both.

Harrison stared across the battlefield, his face grim but his eyes showed the understanding of the terror had just unleashed. Still, he had his duty, and the wildlings now knew there would be no mercy from the defenders of the Wall if they kept this attacking. "Ready some men with torches. We'll need to send them down to the bodies piled up at the bottom of the Wall and in the clear zone. We don't want our real enemy to be able to boost its forces after all."

OOOOOO

Benjen led a force of ten Rangers and fifty Karstark men down the wall, rappelling down via ropes rather than using the nearest tunnel at Rimegate. Many of his men cursed at the necessity, but Benjen had agreed with Jeor's decision there, and his own mind was on the issue at hand.

Nearly an hour after their descent began, they reached the bottom, and for once, Benjen was glad it was so cold here at the Wall year round. It kept the smell of the bodies down to a minimum. They were piled so high in places that he couldn't see the ground underneath them. "By the gods old and new..."

The men all around him paused too, staring at the bodies. One turned away, throwing up against the base of the Wall.

Benjen shook his head after a moment, pulling up his scarf to cover his nose more securely, and pulling out flint and tinder. "Let's get this over with boys."

The men spread out wordlessly, taking burning torches with them, and soon the smell of charred meat was everywhere. Benjen and his men worked diligently and soon hundreds of the bodies had been set aflame.

Leaning down Benjen set another body onto the nearest pile, then turned back, moving to pick up another body. Suddenly two others nearby moved and two living wildlings jumped toward him, one from behind him, one from the front. The one from behind Benjen wrapped an arm around his neck, but Benjen grabbed the arm with both of his own, crouched and heaved, tossing him away. "Ambush, watch out for them among the bodies!"

For a moment there was shock, and ten men fell to wildlings blows before the others roused themselves and fought back. From above arrows began to fall, cutting down a few of the wildlings, but it was hard to tell friend from foe from so far above especially with the smoke from the pyres.

Benjen leaned back and away from a sword thrust, his weapon up and cutting into the wildling's side, before he danced back avoiding a wild charge by an unarmed raider. The pommel of his sword slammed into the back of the wildling's head, sending him down to the earth with a thud. "Damn it, stay down! Why won't Mance talk to us?! We know why you're coming south, if you,"

"Fuck you crow!" the man replied in mangled common, a knife in his hand as he lunged forward. "Never deal with the kneelers or you fucking cro-gah!"

The man's voice cut off abruptly as he practically impaled himself on Benjen's outstretched sword. Benjen sighed, kicking the body off his sword and looking around as the last of the ambushers died under the blades of his Rangers and the Karstark armsmen. "Damnit, what an old god's damned waste."

OOOOOO

Mance Rayder knew it was hopeless. He had known that since the first time one of his scouts had reported seeing men not dressed in the black of the Night's Watch on the Wall. The reports before that could've been discounted, men out for vengeance against wildling raiders, adventure seekers, young man wanting to be blooded in battle all those could've been reasons why the colors of Hornwood and Karstark among others were seen.

But the moment he had reports of those same banners on the Wall, he knew that any assault was hopeless. The Wall was such a strong defensive position that a hundred green troops could hold an army measuring in the thousands so long as they could concentrate on one point. That had been his original plan. Mance had wanted to stretch the Night's Watch, to tire it out, to make it seem as if every portion of the Wall was under threat of attack.

Then he would throw a few real attacks to the sides here and there or straight up the middle, wherever the defense appeared to be weakest. Then, when reinforcements had been rushed to that point, he would launch his real attack elsewhere.

That would have been either at Westwatch-By-the-Bridge across the bridge or even better up the Wall someplace where he knew the nearest castle couldn't have been easily put back in working order from his time in the Night's Watch. That would allow him to hold a portion of the Wall long enough for him to reinforce his initial assault and slowly but surely get his entire nation over the Wall whatever the defenders tried to do against the wildling's superior numbers.

Now that was impossible. The Wall wasn't held by a Night's Watch barely numbering in the thousand with much of them rapists and murderers, barely trained with bow and arrow, and not inclined to take their oaths seriously. It was held by forces from practically every Northern House, a force that might have given him trouble in the open field, let alone on the Wall!

"Harma's dead, along with more than two thirds of her assault force!" Said one of his advisers, a large man named Tormund. "They used some kind of, of green fire and they weren't tired out, they were waiting for us! And in numbers!"

"I know, I feared that." Mance shook his head slowly staring at the makeshift map of the Wall. Along it were a series of x's, where spoiling raids had gone in, marked in different colors in an effort to make sure that he knew which ones have been at least somewhat successful. Unfortunately that color was practically buried under the ones that showed unsuccessful attacks.

"I'd hoped that keeping the small spoiling raids going would allow us to wear them out despite their higher numbers. But they simply have too many men despite the sheer length of the Wall. They can't be strong everywhere, but they have a strong enough reserve that those reserves are spread out enough, and are aware enough that they can cover the entire Wall in enough strength to turn us aside."

"So what are we going to do?" Said one of his advisers angrily, a man named Styr, who led the Thenn, a group of wildlings more heavily armed and armored than most wildlings. "We're stuck between a Mormont behind us, and a long drop in front of us! We can't fight the Others, and they are pressing us hard. Every settlement and clan north of the Milk Water have been abandoned, including the Thenn curse it! And there've been reports of sightings from as near as the Fist of the First Men! It's only a matter of time before they follow us down here."

Mance grunted irritably. The sheer energy and speed with which the Others were moving, even now when winter had only just begun here in the True North was worrying, as was their openness in attacking large groups. And if you fall against them, you rise to attack your own. Worse, the wildlings had no weapons against them. They had no Dragonglass as their old legends said could be used against the Others, or Valyrian blades. Fire seemed to keep them at bay in large enough amounts at night, but even that failed against the Others themselves rather than their wights.

"Keep up the small attacks for now but I think... I think it's time we probe harder around the Gorge..." Mance said musingly.

OOOOOO

Though Mance didn't know, his authority within the horde had already eroded badly. While no wildling was even able to think of something like an easy victory, they had expected to at the very least hurt their enemies. Not one of them had truly understood how attacking the Wall, trying to get this number of people across it, was different from trying to sneak smaller bands across. And not a one amongst them except possibly Tormund and Styr, had understood what the reinforcements on the Wall really meant.

Now they did, and there were those who were rethinking the entire idea of trying to head across the Wall. Groups here and there broke off from the horde. Some of them headed over the mountains to the Frozen Shore or down towards the milk water's gorge further on to try and get across is there. They failed to do so, the nature of the mountains and the shore turning them back.

The largest group to break off, a force of around 6000, consisted of two clans who had been allied in recent years.

Their lands were along the shore of the Shivering Sea, and they had many a fisherman or sailor among them. "Enough of this!" One clan leader said to the other, who nodded in agreement. "You don't get through a wall by bashin' your head against it, and there be no battering ram big enough ta get through the Wall."

They headed through the Haunted Forest towards Storrolf's Point intending to make rafts and get around the Wall that way.

Not one of them would ever be seen again, not alive anyway. The White Walkers and their undead allies were closer than even Mance realized. And now with winter gripping the True North they were becoming even bolder.

OOOOOOO

Theon smiled thinly crouching behind a tree his bow raised side-along and an arrow pulled back to his chin as he stared through the forest towards his targets. It had been several days since the expedition had set out from the small fort they had made near the shoreline, and they had been attacked several times by small raiding forces. Not once had someone tried to speak to them. It was always "Death to the invaders, death to those who bowed to the dragons."

I thought the last punitive expedition sent to this cursed island would've made certain that the inhabitants knew the penalties for rising against House Stark, but I guess not. That had been a few hundred years or so ago after all, and the inhabitants were so used to being left alone that's they had simply taken up new grievances rather than going back to the old ones. Though I don't think that whole kneeling thing's applicable any longer. Ranma like to do a lot of things to Daenerys, but I doubt kneeling comes into it.

Just then Theon's thoughts juddered to a halt as the men he was targeting came through the trees towards the column visibly marching through the forest two-hundred yards or so to his left. Skagoski seemed to prefer to attack from the sides rather than straight on, and this attack didn't seem about to buck that habit. We'll see if they change their ways after one of their ambushes turned on them.

He waited a few more moments, his mind going blank as he concentrated on choosing a target, watching the ambushers slip into positions. Their position was on a slight rise in the trail that the column was trying to follow, allowing them a slight height advantage. But Theon still didn't see many bows or arrows among them. Spear users they had in plenty, and his men had learned to be wary of them throwing the damn things, but not archers.

And they're so confident that they haven't even noticed myself and my men. Theon thought scornfully. It was obvious that Skagoski were overconfident in their ability to move silently through their forest. It never occurred to them that someone else could turn the tables on them.

Theon gave a mental shrug, sighted down his arrow and between one breath and the next loosed. His arrow caught one of the would-be ambushers straight between the eyes. Even as the man fell like a puppet with its strings cut Theon had turned his eyes towards another, an arrow pulled out of the ground in front of him and loosed within seconds.

All around him the other archers had begun to fire, but by the time they had loosed their first ones Theon had already fired four times each time killing an ambusher. The battle was over before the column could even race forward to join in, the last ambusher going down with one of Theon's arrows in his thigh. That had actually been a tougher shot than simply killing him, but Theon felt it was time to get some answers from the locals, willing or no.

Even with an arrow almost entirely through his thigh the man tried to escape, crawling along the ground. When that didn't work and when he felt Theon and his men around him the local pushed himself onto his back turning to spit up at them while his hands tried to scramble in the dirt for anything he could use as a weapon.

He said something in the old tongue, but Theon didn't understand it. Theon turned to one of his men, who shrugged his shoulders. "You don't want to know."

"Charming." Theon replied dryly, crouching down to the man. When he seemed about to spit, Theon swiftly smacked him across the face hard enough to leave a bruise. "None of that. My name is Theon Greyjoy. I'm an Iron Islander, and if you've heard anything about me in mine, then you know I'm more than willing to start carving bits off you to get the answers I need."

While Theon didn't consider himself an Ironborn any longer, he was certainly willing to use his people's reputation for cruelty to his advantage if he could. "Now, can you speak common?"

The man grunted, and looked about to spit again. Theon smacked him once more on the other side of the face. "Pull out one of his hands. I think we'll start getting answers out of him by, oh, the fourth finger or so? What do you think?"

The men around him grunted in amusement, grabbing the local by the shoulders and holding him down as Theon pulled out a dirk. "Or are you simply going to answer my questions?" Theon asked looking down at the man.

He glared back defiance, but stopped and screamed after Theon cut off his middle finger. He started screaming then, and Theon waited patiently until he stopped his voice going down into a mumble. "I'll ask again, do you speak common?"

The warrior violently shook his head, then spoke rapidly. The man who Theon had looked at before shrugged his shoulders. "He can't speak it, but he understands it well enough. I'm not certain if he's just refusing to speak it, but so long as he understands we're asking I don't suppose it matters."

"True enough." Theon shrugged his shoulders. "Alright, we're here as representatives of Lord Stark, your Lord Paramount. Why are you all attacking us? Why were you attacking the transport ships?"

The man sneered and spat out something in the Old Tongue, while Theon turned inquisitive eyes to the translator. He frowned for a moment, then shrugged. "They've always raided the ships passing through the Bay of Seals, they claim it's theirs he says, anything they take is theirs by right. And the Starks have never held much sway here, and what little sway they had faded when they bowed to the, er, the dragon-fuckers."

"Really? I doubt they'd be able to find produce of ownership." He replied dryly, wincing internally at how alike these barbarians were to the Ironborn under his father. He squatted down again, staring into the man's eyes. They were watering slightly from the pain he was in, both from the arrow in the meat of his thigh and his finger..

Theon stared into his up the man's eyes, then asked. "How many men have you and yours lost the since we arrived on this Skagos?"

The local shrugged ignorance, still staring up at Theon defiantly. He then spat something else, something that the man who was translating frowned at. "It seems as if they have their own king now, and he is ordering them to continue to harass us."

Theon's eyes widened slightly. "Who's this King, did he order the attacks on our shipping, has he united the clans here?"

The barbarian nodded speaking so rapidly that the translator had trouble keeping up. After a moment the Northerner, who Theon absently noted was strangely enough a Glover man, nodded. "Apparently the raiding started before the king had united the clans, but the last one, the most successful one was under his command."

That had actually been the only one that was entirely successful in taking a galleon intact. The attackers had come up on the transport convoy during a heavy, cold fog, and the ship had fallen to the pirates before any of its escorts or sister ships could go to its aid, blinded as they were by the fog. Losing an entire ship like that had finally convinced Lord Manderly and Mors Umber to allow Theon to go forward with Theon's invasion plan.

The translator went on. "It seems as if the king, one Ulric, has magic and is trying to organize the people here. He's even built a small permanent village, calling it his capital. Or at least that's what I would translate that word too, maybe headquarters, or symbol?"

Theon smiled thinly. "I'd call that a target. Where is it?" He asked the man at his feet.

The man was happy enough to give them directions, of course he also interspersed his words with threats that the king would kill them all, that Ulric's magic would slay them and that Skagosi would enrich themselves with the weapons and armor of their invaders. Theon ignored it all, already making plans.

OOOOOO

Kyle Condon and castle commander Bowen Marsh did not like one another. Bowen Marsh didn't like the fact that the Night's Watch needed help at all, and in particular did not like the fact that none of the newcomers had been forced to swear the oath of the Night's Watch. It seemed to cheapen their ongoing and unending duty and sacrifice, not wanting to acknowledge the fact that he, and most of the other brothers, had only come here to evade the gallows. He looked on the order of the Ardent Defender in particular as a weak debased concept. He wasn't the only one among the brethren who felt that way, but he was one of the most highly placed.

This hampered their abilities to communicate with one another, and had worsened when it was the Night's Watch who were tasked to watch the Wall while the majority of the Northerners rested over the past few weeks. Taking their cue from their commander, there had been several dozen incidents between the two factions along the wall in front of Shadow Tower, Westwatch-By-the-Bridge and Sentinel Stand, the three castles that Bowen and the men seconded directly to him from the north commanded along with Kyle.

It had finally got so bad that Kyle removed his personal command entirely to Greyguard, putting some distance between him and Bowen Marsh, who had taken Westwatch as his command. He was still close enough to respond to any threats, and against orders he had taken over patrolling the Wall between Greyguard and Icemark, where patrols out of Castle Black took over. These forced him to use more of his men, mostly from House Mormont and Cerwyn, than he was supposed to, but he felt it was worth it.

But the bad blood between the two groups remained.

When the drums began to sound that a large assault had been spotted, the men of House Cerwyn and House Mormont responded with alacrity. But this time the attack came at night, and had begun by bands of fifty or so wildlings sneaking through the night until they were at the base of the Wall. Then they began to climb, trying to get to the top without being noticed.

By the time they were spotted thousands of them had made it up onto the Wall and were in the process of trying to climb up it. The catapults and ballista began to rain upon the groups still far below trying to rush towards the Wall, while the archers and the men carrying the heavy barrels of stone went to work.

For a moment it looked as if some of the wildlings were going to actually reach the top of the Wall, but Kyle and his men turned them back. The last wildling fell from the Wall screaming as a boulder the size of two fists pressed together smashed into the top of his head, shattering his skull and sending pieces of skull and brain matter splattering against the ice of the Wall and a few of his fellows to either side of him. His flailing body hit another man, taking him off the Wall below him, but many others had already fallen back.

They however left many of their ladders in place. Kyle ordered them burned, and his men began to fire down at them with fire arrows while he frowned at the retreating horde. They hadn't retreated entirely into the forest, he could still spot them milling around right at the edge. "Are they daring us to try to use our trebuchets and their special cargo?"

He didn't realize he had said this allowed until one of the men nearby, a man of house Mormont took in the scene at a glance. He guffawed loudly. "I bet the undisciplined bastards are tryin' ter figure out who's in charge now. We must've killed their clan leader or someatlike that. Look, ye can see several of the groups are simply breakin' off and heading east in full view of us, and I bet there are others retreatin' entire."

Suddenly huge boulders began to smash into the top of the Wall, barely below the parapet. Those boulders would've been fit to smash through any other Wall of nearly any other Castle. The Wall however didn't even twitch. Nonetheless, this was a new and possibly dangerous threat and Kyle scowled angrily. They might be marching east but they apparently left some of their toys behind to entertain us." He nodded over to the ballista men. "Do you think you can range on them?"

"Not through the trees commander." said one of the men, shaking his head. "Maybe we could shoot that far, but not into the trees with any kind of accuracy. I wonder how the hell they are even firing the trebuchet up through the trees. Those things take up a lot of space." The ones on the Wall were so large you had to actually walk through the legs of the device to move along it. The swivel mount for them took up the entire Wall's width, and when they were being turned it took seven dozen men on the bars set to either side to do anything to them. Turning them quickly was frankly impossible.

However they did so now, and the much larger defensive trebuchet's ranged on their opponents quickly. Yet at the same time, the force that had retreated from the initial attack on this segment of the Wall charged out of the woods again, with at least half again the numbers they had when they retreated. Kyle scowled as he realized this. Still it doesn't matter in the end! "Head back down to the castle," he ordered one of the men. "Get the rest of the men up here."

OOOOOO

What Kyle should've done was call in the Night's Watch from both sides to help deal with this, rather than committing his own men which would leave him with no rested reserves if he was called elsewhere. However his pride would not allow it, and he knew that the Night's Watchmen, at least those on west of him would rather leave him to die than come to his aid.

At the same time that attack was going on, tying up the majority of the men of House Mormont and House Cerwyn, another attack group was assaulting the Wall near Shadow Tower and Westwatch-by-the-Bridge. This group had no siege weapons, and while they had done just as good a job as their fellows sneaking up, the natural defense of the land here was the huge crevasse that separated the True North from the Wall. Admittedly the land here was mountainous, allowing the wildlings to fire from a slightly more equal position, but it also protected the land directly across from Shadow Tower.

The crevasse was only crossed by the Bridge of Skulls in front of Westwatch, which made Bowen Marsh's defense of that area of the Wall ridiculously simple. And because he hadn't gone to Kyle's aid, he still had his full complement, upwards of three hundred Night's Watch brothers.

Archers from both sides began to fire, but it was a rare wildling indeed that could range on the Wall, while the opposite was not true. Yet even so the wildlings continued coming and they finally began to use some weapons the wildlings had long devised to try to offset the height of the Wall.

From their vantage point a little along the edge of the crevasse and up into the mountains groups of wildlings began to bend back huge bows, far too large for a single man to wield. They were in fact incredibly simple and very muscle-intensive scorpions. They fired incredibly slowly, because two men needed to pull back the bowstring to click into place on the holder while a third slotted in one of the special arrows, which was the size of around three normal arrows put together.

Aiming the thing was difficult. Yet they were more mobile than regular scorpions, and Mance had sent forward every one of the things to bolster this attack. If the wildlings could gain a foothold on top of the Wall, then any amount of blood and effort would be worth it.

The Night's Watchmen began to die, because while the weapons of their enemies were not very accurate, there were a lot of them, and if one of those large arrows hit you, no armor or shield would turn it away. They fired in turns, trying to keep the defenders heads down, though they failed to do this, again because even here the Wall was just too damn tall. The defenders still fired back, their height allowing the smaller bows to range far more easily, and the men with the barrels of stone continued to drop them down on the attackers, even those who were able to get across the Bridge of Skulls.

But these were also the same men who had been on patrol practically constantly for the past two weeks. They were tired, strung out, and on their last legs. They began to make mistakes, missing clearly open shots, messing up the timing on the drops as the wildlings climbed up the Wall.

Though that wasn't as much of an issue. After all if they missed one target, the rocks would certainly hit someone below them.

Ducking behind a balustrade Bowen Marsh scowled angrily. All the other probing attacks were simply an attempt to pull us away from Shadow Tower, so that this, they're one real attack could go through! Where's Kyle and his so-vaunted Northern force when we actually need the puling weaklings?!

But Bowen Marsh too had been on patrol practically constantly these past few days, and he couldn't remember that he had in fact not sent a messenger east along the Wall requesting reinforcements. "Drive them back boys! Drive them back!"

OOOOOO

While that battle raged, Kyle's anger had died down. He was wary about the sudden stillness however after the last wildling had retreated back into the forest. The land out there was literally coated in the bodies of the dead, he could not count how many men had died this day, all of them wildlings.

Looking at it he found himself inexplicably weary. By the old gods why didn't they stop? We don't want to kill you, you bastards, just stop attacking us for the old god's sake.

It was a quixotic thought, and one he knew that his fellow lords would not agree with at all, but he couldn't shake it. After a moment however he roused himself, and turned to a few of his men. "Order the Night's Watch to stand down. We'll patrol the Wall for now. Patrols of 400 in each direction. After the initial patrols go out, send another further 820 men after them, they're to reinforce or relieve the signal tower men along the way, the rest are to fall back into the castle. Once you have that organized, I'll have a message for the last of them to carry to the Lord Commander."

That plus guarding this area of the Wall would stretch them somewhat for the moment. And if the Wall was any kind of normal height, that might well have spread them a little too far against a competent and organized opponent. As it was, they would still have enough men at any one point to have local superiority and they all knew it.

As the sun was beginning to fall, Kyle was resting himself when a few of his men came in. One of them looked very angry, and worried. "Commander, Shadow Tower and Westwatch 've been under assault the entire day! That bastard Marsh is too prideful to call us in, but I think we need to send men to reinforce them."

Kyle nodded, standing up and pulling on his helmet once again along with a scarf and very warm wool and sealskin gloves. Those had cost him several months' worth of pay, getting them transported up to the Wall (without them going missing) had cost him even more. Still, they were well worth the money. "Let's save the irascible old man."

"Actually my Lord, I'm just thinking of a suggestion the Little Lion made about the Bridge of Skulls. This might be the time to see to that issue. So long as we still have the light anyway."

Kyle smirked, remembering that suggestion himself. The Lord Commander and the other Night's Watchmen had been against it, though frankly it made a lot of sense to Kyle. "Do it."

As he was rushing out the man he had sent to command the first patrol heading eastward was returning. He saluted quickly. "We turned back several of what looks to be probing assaults further east my Lord, stronger than the normal ones. I think they just wanted to see if we were still up for more combat tell the truth."

"Keep it up." Kyle ordered slapping the man on his shoulder. "But you're to stay here and take command, Send Liseac instead. I'm off to save an old ungrateful ass from himself."

OOOOOO

Back along the wall by Shadow Tower and Westwatch the battle had continued. Bowen Marsh had lost around half of his command by this point, not all to the weapons of his enemies either. Most of them were down with frostbite or sheer exhaustion. The exhaustion had made them forget the necessity of keeping covered, and more than one man had pulled off his scarf or face wrapping to let themselves breath and then been too exhausted of mind to notice when they lost feeling in their faces.

The wildlings had begun to make them their way onto the Wall itself here and there. At the sight of that high above them, shouts of triumph rippled through the horde despite the horrendous casualties they had taken so far.

Out of the sky from the east came first a single large boulder, smashing into the horde on the bridge and sending them either careening off the bridge entirely or simply flattening them where they were trampled upon under by their fellows. This had happened before, many times during the course of the battle. The wildlings had actually gotten used to it, and simply ignored their losses as always, continuing to push over the bridge and to the Wall scaling up to join the fellows.

But this rock was special. It had in fact been what Tyrion called a rangefinder. A voice shouted from near the trebuchet that had fired it, the man staring out over the Wall, reciting the litany that Tyrion had come up with for moments like this.. "Target and distance bang on, change out the weights and fire put the next load right on their asses boys!"

A normal catapult could only throw rocks around 25 to 50 pounds. A trebuchet however, could throw a boulder of 200 pounds or more. One such followed the trajectory of the rock already thrown. You of course had to modulate the force upwards to get the same result with larger rocks, but that was much easier than turning the trebuchet on its pendulum.

In actuality that boulder didn't kill as many of the wildlings as the first one had. No, what it did was worse. While blotting out one man unlucky enough to be directly below it that rock smashed into the Bridge of Skulls. A crack formed, and a loud creaking was suddenly heard through the tumult of battle.

Hundreds of thousands of eyes suddenly turned in that direction, both from on top of the Wall and from the wildling side. They watched in dumbstruck silence as the crack it stopped, and the wildlings both on the bridge and on either side of it breathed heavy sighs of relief.

That was before another rock fell almost directly on the spot where the first had hit. With a resounding crunching sound of rock shattering the bridge gave way. It broke in the middle, dragging hundreds of wildlings down to their bloody ruin.

"Archers fire!" Said Kyle and he and his men suddenly stood up from where they had been hiding all along the Wall, waiting for that moment.

Half of them rushed forward to join the Night's Watch along the portion of the Wall directly in front of Westwatch while the rest piled in with their arrows from where they had been hiding. Others ran inside into Shadow Tower to grab up more barrels of rocks, something else that Bowen Marsh, in his exhaustion, had forgotten to order.

The wildling horde on the other side of the broken bridge faded away. They didn't break, they didn't run, they simply faded away, small bits and pieces of families and clans breaking off the action now that there was no hope of coming to grips with the hated crows and their kneeler allies along this area of the Wall.

Kyle marched through up to Bowen Marsh glaring at the man. "Next time you put your damn pride over our duty, I will gut you myself!"

Bowen Marsh glared back then turned away heading into Shadow Tower without a word. Kyle sighed, then went back to reorganizing the battle. Still, he thought philosophically. With the bridge gone we'll be able to draw down our forces here down to a bare pittance.

OOOOOOO

Mance leaned back a tankard of mead in his hand, his thoughts dark. We've lost utterly. With the numbers they have patrolling the Wall in strength, there is no weakness we can find to get up onto it. The men I've sent forward to look at the tunnels say they're frozen over entirely, the only one left open is the one in Castle Black, which is normally left open. That was to allow men of the Night's Watch to travel through it and head into the forest to give their oaths in front of the old gods at an ancient weirwood tree.

For just a moment he wondered if he should sue for peace and said so aloud looking at his top advisers. He knew that these men would not take it as a sign of weakness, though many in the army might have.

Orell, the leader of the few skin-changers with the army, shook his head. "None of us will make deals with crows!"

"Not unless we are looking straight at the death of our people." Said Tormund sharply. "Which we are in case you've forgotten."

The two men almost looked come to blows, and Mance shook his head sharply. "None of that. Still you answered my question so thank you. Our men will respond in that manner, and right now the kneelers hold the whip hand."

Mance used the word with feeling, having grown to share the disdain for the soft southerners that the wildlings held in abundance. He didn't look down on his former brothers nearly as much, though he still felt a certain amount of contempt for them in the way that all of them were so happy with simply going along to get along, of subsuming their personalities into the Night's Watch, to escape their pasts and anything else.

"How many men in total have we lost?" he said after a moment of stiff silence.

"Some 60, 64,000 I think. I know that at least a dozen clans have been wiped out already." They weren't actually wiped out, they had lost their fighting strength. While in the South that meant the houses themselves might be able to survive, here it simply meant that their youngsters and noncombatants were absorbed into other clans. Noncombatants were a very small percentage of the wildling population, usually denoted by pregnant women and those aged too much for battle but with important skills they needed to pass on.

Mance winced. That was a little over a fourth of his total force. Worse he knew those were only the dead, and even that number was probably lower than what had really happened in the past few days of blood and brutality, since it discounted the number lost in the smaller raids. And as for the wounded...

The wildlings had healers after a fashion, but they were very limited in what they could do. Four out of every five wounded who were debilitated enough to no longer be able to fight would probably die, making that initial numbers skyrocket. So Mance fully expected to be told in a few days that he was down to possibly a little over a third of his effectives.

A thought occurred to him. Mance stood up abruptly, pacing around as he continued to work at it then smiled thinly. "Get together some of our best night scouts, I want to go see the remains of this bridge myself. There might be something we can do with that."

OOOOOOO

A few days after the massacre at the defense of Shadow Tower, Tyrion looked out over the Wall at a massive attack heading straight towards the portion of the Wall that his order was sworn to defend, near Sable Hall and Rimegate. It was a massive force, almost as large as the reported army that the wildlings had lost almost in its entirety in that battle near The Torches. "How many men do they have?!"

He knew that trying to calculate the size the wildlings could put into the field was an exercise in futility. Practically every person in their society fought in some fashion, men and women, hell even children were taught how to fight and thrown into true combat well before the children of knightly or Noble Houses in the lands of Westeros. So where a normal, powerful Noble House would only be able to field a trained force of upwards of 4000 or so, a wildling clan might have near that same number, in a war like this could raise that number up to nearly their entire population.

Still, unless they're intending to make a mound of bodies in an attempt to get over the Wall, they're no real threat to us. For a moment Tyrion actually found his mind trying to calculate the number of bodies it would take to make such a ramp, high enough for the last few wildlings to reach the top of the Wall. It was such a morbid exercise that even Tyrion paused, shaking his head quickly than looking at Bronn. "I can't say I think overmuch about this King-Beyond-the-Wall if he's still trying to throw his numbers at us like this."

He frowned however when Bronn didn't answer him. "What's wrong?"

"I'm not a superstitious man Little Lion you know that. You know I'm still superstitious about this threat you and the other commanders see coming."

"Yes?"

"Ta me, this is more proof than any sparkling old-style lettering in armor or weird weapons." At Tyrion's inquisitive noise he went on waving a hand at the horde down below as it came under fire from the defenders of the Wall. Catapults began to fire, not with single stones but with nets of rocks which broke apart in midair spreading destruction. "This I mean."

"I know you an' the other Lords are tryin' to find some kind of military reason behind this. But that group out there, that ain't an army. I've never been beyond the Wall, but I've talked ta men who have and who've spoken with wildlings. Those are strong, hard and prideful people. They wouldn't continue ta throw their lives away like this, not if they had any choice. When I look at those toward hordes Little Lion, I wonder what they're so afraid of that this kind o' slaughter seems a better idea than facin' it."

Tyrion nodded grimly. "You're not the first to think it. All of the old Night's Watch commanders are saying the same thing. The wildlings never attack like this, they should've simply stuck to the skirmishing and raiding, trying to sneak across the Wall even if it wasn't working at all, they might have eventually worn us all down enough to break through somewhere, in a few months anyway." Tyrion shook his head. "If they keep this up, we might be looking at the death of an entire society here."

By that point the front of the horde had gotten close enough to the Wall to enter even Tyrion's bow range and he sighed lifting up his bow. It was a northern bow, though smaller than most thanks to unfortunately how close his shoulders were to the ground. "Well to work Bronn, to work."

Over the next few days assaults looks like this would come in then pull back right before they came to the bottom of the Wall, where they would begin to take losses from things dropped from above, which amounted to a surprising amount of those losses. Aiming at single targets at that range from up on top of the Wall wasn't actually easy, an archer could fire six or seven times and only hit on two of his arrows, which kept the wildlings losses down for now.

However they also started to use the same makeshift scorpions that they had used in their assault on Shadow Tower and Westwatch. Doubling up on the strings allowed the individuals wielding them to get their arrows up onto the top of the Wall, though it also made their firing much slower. However they were mobile, and that impacted how the wildlings used them.

Instead of trying to use them as cover fire for their fellows to rush forward and try to scale the Wall these scorpion men operated in groups of 50. They would rush forward at night, moving as silently and quietly as only wildling raiders could until they were close enough for their weapons to range on the top of the Wall. Then they would send up a barrage at a portion of the Wall, sometimes killing or wounding some defenders, sometimes not, before they would retreat.

In this way they had finally hit upon a method in which they could bleed the defenders without paying a horrific return. Tyrion and Harrion's men took some casualties now, losing five men into two nights then an unlucky patrol was practically wiped out, 25 men, on the third night.

The Lord commander called a meeting the next day. "This is a new twist on an old tactic." He said flatly. "I don't think they can hurt us badly with it, but they can certainly inconvenience us, and if they can weaken us enough, they might throw an even larger attack at us at that same point."

"Agreed," growled Mors Umber. He was cranky because his command Eastwatch itself, had not been attacked, only the area of the Wall nearby under Harrion's control had. That meant he and his men had yet to truly bloody their blades, or in this case arrow points, on the wildlings. "Do you want me to draw down my men, send them to reinforce the areas that have been attacked?"

Even as Jeor answered in the negative Tyrion shook his head, staring into the fire of the Lord Commander's office, not even thinking about the actual discussion. "How many men do you think they have to lose before they get the idea?"

The windrows of the dead after the assault on his Order's portion of the Wall was bothering him even days later. He had never imagined a slaughter like that, and it was bothering him somehow especially when combined with his own concerns and Bronn's words about what the true threat was.

"That would depend on how many what wildlings there were originally. The land beyond the Wall is larger than even the North so there's no way to tell." Said Benjen, looking even more haggard than Tyrion where he was slumping against one of the nearby walls. As commander of the rangers he and his men had been in charge of the burning parties that scaled down the Wall and burned the bodies of the dead after each battle.

It wasn't truly hard work save the climb down since the Lord Commander had forbidden the use of the tunnels, keeping them iced over. They had also been attacked a time or two by ambushers, but his rangers quickly became experts at sniffing such out, or they died. He had lost a tenth of his remaining rangers before the others learned. No, it wasn't hard physically. Yet dealing with that many dead bodies, that much death, got to a man unless he was a complete psychopath.

Worse, he actually respected the wildlings. To make any kind of life in the far North you had to be hard and tough, and he could respect that in anyone even if he felt that their raiding tradition was abhorrent, as were their courtship rituals. But the thousands upon thousands of dead bothered him, it bothered him a lot.

"Bah!" Mors spat, shaking his mangy head. "What did you think would happen? The wildlings know nothing except how to raid and rape! Not one of them will care how many of them die so long as their family or their clan lives. To stop them, we'll have to kill them all or this King Beyond the Wall this Mance whelp. And he hasn't shown himself yet."

"He did actually." said Jeor thoughtfully. "He led a raid on the area of the Wall right in front of Castle Black. One of those raids that could've been a major assault except they turned back rather than chance it after a few dozen of them had fallen to our arrows. I think Mance saw something."

"He must've confirmed the fact we've used ice to cover the tunnels my Lord, all save the one in front of Castle Black." said Benjen nodding his head. "It'd be a brutal business to attack it, but it is a weakness in the Wall."

"Yes, one we might need to do something even more permanent about in the future." said Tyrion thoughtfully looking at the mall. "Unless I am incorrect in assuming that such ice might not be a true defense against our real enemy here?"

There were sober nods of agreement all around the room, but Jeor had already moved onto something else. "I think." He said thoughtfully. "I think that the wildlings will make one maybe two more major assaults. I can't imagine there's more than 250,000 of them all told, and I think we've already killed at least a third may be even closer to half that already."

Benjen and Tyrion both winced, understanding that they weren't really dealing with an army here, they were wiping out an entire population. The Northerners on the other hand simply looked grimly satisfied, with the Norrey and Umber leaders both looking jubilant at the very idea. It was their people who had suffered most under wildlings after all.

"The trick will be to predict where along the Wall they're going to come." Benjen murmured.

"Yes." said the Lord Commander heavily. "They've lost a lot of people already, if they lose half again as many I think that there will be enough angry clan leaders to force a change in leadership. What happens after that, I don't know."

The question will be will they be able to surprise us?"

"What are your orders, commander?" Asked Kyle, who had been silent up to this point.

"I think you hit on it, I think they're going to try to get smaller raiding forces around the Wall and take us from behind either down the crevasse or by small boats in the Bay of Seals. They'll never be able to get large numbers around us, but smaller parties, those they could do. As such I'm going to pull your man off the Wall, Norrey." He said looking at the mountain clan leader. "I want parties of your men to start up into the mountains behind Westwatch and Shadow Tower. Mors, I want the war galleys based at Eastwatch to be reinforced, send an extra 50 men out on each and tell them to start patrolling the waters closer to shore heavily."

"You know that Theon's going to be angry about that. Those war galleys were supposed to be ready to drop off more men to support him on Skagos."

"He'll have to do without them for a few weeks. After that he can have them and your own men if necessary to reinforce his punitive force."

Mors nodded agreeably. Skagosi barbarians or wildlings, he didn't care very much who fell under his blade.

"I also want every converted cavalryman pulled off the Wall and ordered back to Castle Black. Just in case they get past the Norrey in numbers that your men don't want to face in the open field we'll have that group as a hammer just in case."

Going over the numbers in his head Tyrion frowned a little. "That will leave us short in some sections of the Wall." He cautioned. His own order would be half by that command, the other houses not nearly as much, since the North had never really had much in the way of cavalry outside of Manderly and Ryswell, and neither of those houses had contributed much to the Wall save in logistics. Though at this point they had horses at all was surprising given how cold it was appear. But the Northern horses were a shaggy, hardy lot, able to survive these temperatures when their southern fellows would have already succumbed. And the Maesters say it's not even full winter yet. Feels full enough to me!

"That's why we're going to redistribute the men of House Mormont and House Cerwyn." Kyle looked up at that startled.

But the commander went on unhurriedly. "You did an excellent job during the attack on your section and going to the aid of Bowen, despite his idiocy. We'll let him and his men stew in Westwatch and the other towers. I'll deal with him after wildlings have finally given up. For now however, half of your men don't need to be there any longer. Without the Bridge of Bones Westwatch and Shadow Tower are defended by the crevice enough that I am confident we can only leave Bowen's men there to patrol those two castles and even Sentinel Stand."

"If I may make a suggestion, I would think that a buffer force between Kyle and Bowen Marsh could be necessary at this point. No offense to you or your order commander, but Bowen Marsh is a prideful and very stubborn man, and his men aren't the most rational of fellows." Tyrion said.

Kyle nodded reluctant agreement. "There have been a few clashes in the past few days between us, no drawn blades but fistfights and shouting matches between patrol groups along the Wall are common."

Tyrion nodded in his direction before turning back to Jeor. "And my force is the one that you're going to be reducing the most when it comes to pulling back the cavalymen. That way the rest of the Order can be close enough if the cavalry forces run into trouble somehow. "

Jeor thought for a moment then nodded. "Agreed. I'd like to remove Bowen Marsh from command here and now, but I don't have anyone else with enough seniority outside the rangers I could set as commander of Westwatch, and the rangers are too useful where they are and serving with the clansmen for me to want to use one of their best that way."

The movements began the next day. While the sun gave what little warmth it could Tyrion and the men of house Cerwyn began to exchange their positions, with the men of House Mormont broken up to add a reserve force elsewhere along the Wall for the other commanders. Patrols became even more aggressive along the Wall, night and day, while the clashes between skirmishing groups became frequent once again. There was a tension in the air, as if everyone on both sides knew that the final clash was going to have to happen soon.

OOOOOO

Theon had sent back to the Fort for more men, pairing the defense there down to a bare 200 men, and sending back a few of his own wounded. With that done, and with the directions to the town that the new king had supposedly created, he and his men marched off deeper into the large island's interior.

The going was incredibly tough, because the village in question was on the highly used mountain on Skagos, which the local had called something which translated into common as 'World's Fang', or something of that nature.

Here the forest floor was steep, rocky and heavy with snow. Most of Skagos had been snow laden, but up here this no truly made their going much more difficult. Here they are along their chosen route they had to turn back thanks to snow and rocks being in their way. It slowed them down so much that what should've taken his men a bare two or three days to traverse took more than a week. By the time they finally saw their target with their own eyes the food situation among the men was getting grave even with foraging every day.

Strangely enough, they weren't attacked on their way. Theon took this to mean that Ulric knew where they were going and was going to try to smash in a trap there with whatever piddling little defense he had been able to raise.

Despite this, Theon and his commanders remained confident that they would be able to win their way through. None of the attacks they had seen so far had come in sufficient numbers to stop them. The armor and discipline of the Northerners had also stood them in good stead against the wild nature of the Skagosi in every attack that had closed to hand-to-hand.

Eventually Theon and his men were on top of a small plateau cut into the side of the mountain which continued on, looming above it. It was heavily laden with snow, but it was flat, much more flat than the lands they had traversed to get up to this point. The village wasn't much, a sprawling collection of small hovels, around one huge longhouse, which reminded Theon forcefully of the one he had seen on bear Island all those years ago.

There was also a wooden palisade thrown up around the village. From where he was staring out at it from hiding Theon could see over two hundred archers stationed up there. Now we know where their hunters are. I wonder if this Ulric has been planning this all along?

In front of the palisade were groups of men moving about. There were about six hundred all told, armed with the normal assortment of weapons that Theon had gotten used to since arriving on Skagos. Not enough to stop us, he thought to himself staring up at the wall behind those men. But enough to slow us down for the archers to have a field day with us. Yet they still have an obvious weakness.

Moving back to his commanders he nodded at them all. "All right, the archers with fire arrows will start the party, if they're stupid enough to come out chasing us, we'll fight their infantry here in the forest."

"We'll lose our advantage of the shield wall." Calis said cautiously.

"Better than being caught in the open against that number of archers." Theon replied. "I think there are equal to our own not in numbers that at least, and with the palisade heightened vantage and defense will have the worst of it against them. Besides, if the fire arrows work that palisade'll be a death trap."

"Makes sense." Sigmund grunted, before going on thoughtfully. "I'm still worried about the magic that prisoner spoke of."

"We can't plan for something like that until we actually see it firsthand." Theon shrugged. "Besides, he could just be a charlatan all we know."

There was more than one worried mumble about that, but none of them had anything concrete to pin their concerns on. The three northerners returned to their commands, and Theon moved over to join the other archers. Half of them ignited fire arrows, stepping from where they had been hiding around the woodlands to sight through the forest towards the palisade. "Loose!" Theon ordered, and dozens of fire arrows streaked out of the woods smacking into the palisade here and there.

Cries of alarm went up, but the arrows didn't seem to do much, simply smoldering here and there as if the palisade was made of greenwood, or as if it had been splashed with water. Theon frowned at that, staring as the men on the palisade and in front of it began to calm down, some of them even laughing. "Keep it up." He ordered.

Enough fire arrows seemed to do the trick though they were nearly out of them by the time the fires actually caught. Theon could see people trying to pour water down onto fires, but it was a slow process, and now the fires had begun to spread through the wood of the palisade.

Theon grabbed up a dozen fire arrows himself, not aiming at the palisade anymore. Instead he pulled back, aiming up over it through the canopy of the trees. His arrows impacted the huts and hovels behind the palisade, forcing the people there to rush to put out those fires. None of the huts had the same sort of protection that the wall seemed to have and he nodded grimly.

Now the defenders that had clustered in front of the wall charged out into the Woodlands, screaming their battle cries. They were met there by the men of House Flint and House Locke, while the men of house Karstark began to go around their flanks. Theon put his bow on his back, pulling out is dirk and moving forward.

He first came upon two men grappling directly in front of where the archers had been, though they had moved back quickly. One of them was a Skagosi, and Theon stepped behind the man thrusting his dirk into his neck before pulling it out and moving on.

The next clash went far differently for Theon. A islander had just finished off someone in House Flint colors and he turned quickly to engage Theon. He wielded a heavy cudgel and was much stronger than Theon had thought, nearly causing Theon to lose his dirk when he tried to block that first blow. However in return he was surprised that Theon hadn't lost it, and was open to a slice along one arm that nearly cut the arm holding the cudgel off at the elbow.

Even so the man roared in laughter punching Theon hard with his free hand sending Theon backwards in surprise. The man came on laughing crazily picking up the cudgel and hammering at Theon. Theon dodged to one side or the other until he was able to get in close and thrust his dirt into the man's chest. Even so the man grappled with him, his arm closing around Theon's body holding him close. Two headbutts slammed into Theon's head twice before the warrior's body suddenly realized it was dead.

Theon staggered backwards rubbing at his forehead for a moment while around him the battle continued. "What the hells?"

Terrell found him through the melee just then. "We lost about two dozen men already." He reported. "These bastards don't seem to feel pain! You have to hack them apart and even then if you don't hack off their head they'll just keep coming."

Theon nodded, and for a moment was reminded of that ambush that the White Walker's had sprung on the Wolfsworn when they went to up to the Wall. He shook his head rapidly. White Walker's can't cross the ocean, that's impossible. If they could, the Wall would never've been able to stop them.

"I know." He said aloud. "But there aren't enough of them to truly stop us, and our own armor and arms are still in advantage. Press them, hard!"

The other man nodded grimly, and the two of them moved forward towards the nearest clump of combat turning the tide there and moving on quickly. There was no way to really organize a battle like this in such dense woodland, but they had done their best in trying to make certain that every man knew how to work with their fellows nearby, and it eventually proved enough.

The last of Skagosi warriors went down, or fled back to the palisade. The losses were heavier than Theon had hoped for but less than he had feared. Soon enough his men were once again formed up and they marched out of the woods.

The palisade continued to burn here and there, but most of it had been put out. Many of the archers up top had joined the efforts to put out the fires and only a desultory hail of arrows greeted their appearance from the woods. At the same time a shout of dismay went up from the defenders as they realized their own men had lost the battle in the woods.

Two small battering rams were brought forward, while the archers and Theon laid down heavy cover fire. Realizing what was going on more of the archers that had joined the efforts to put out the fires came back. The archers began to take losses, as did the defenders but the battering rams went to work.

Someone on the other side tried to pour down something on the battering rams, but Theon shot the man before he could raise the cauldron up over the front of the palisade. The cauldron fell back, and whatever was inside hit several other men causing them to cry out in pain. He continued to rake the wall with arrows directly above the gate, defending the battering rams as they smashed into the gate. They made short work of it, and moments after they began it collapsed inwards.

The defenders fell back quickly, making for the longhouse, where more archers were already positioned up on top of the roof firing at the attackers as they swarmed into the village. Theon shot two of them, then raced forward soon pushing through the men from the battering rams and racing on shouting, "Get to the longhouse! Don't let them close that door!"

The archers up top of the longhouse cost Theon several men, but he still raced on with others following as the defenders tried to retreat quickly enough to leave them behind and close the door before barring it somehow. They didn't succeed, the last of them going down with a sword thrust through his spine as Theon barreled into the door, smashing it open in the face of five men who had been trying to close it. They flew backwards under the force of his charge, and more of his men barreled in behind him.

A short, very vicious fight occurred there in the area directly behind the door, but soon the last man was down, and Theon strode over his dead body, cleaning his dirk with a bit of cloth torn from one of the dead man's clothing. He looked around the interior of the longhouse, noting it was simply one long meeting hall, though there did seem to be some separate rooms at the far end and along one side.

Tables had been pushed forward to bar the door, but they hadn't been in position just yet before Theon had forced the door open. Other than ten or so men who had retreated quickly from the door there were also more than two dozen women scattered along one side of the longhouse, the first non-warrior women Theon had seen on Skagos, though for some reason all of them had strips of black leather covering their eyes. All of them were good looking too.

In front of the doors to the rooms at the back was a raised dais, on which a very crude throne sat. Before it stood a huge man who had to be Ulric. He was as large as Greatjon maybe, or possibly even larger. He wore heavy chain mail, and held a massive battleaxe and one hand, gesticulating angrily at the last of the defenders as they pulled back towards him, their eyes now showing fear for once.

Yet it wasn't the man who drew Theon's attention. No, Theon's attention was drawn to the woman who had been kneeling behind the throne. She was easily the most beautiful woman he had ever seen. High cheek bones, luminescent blue eyes set into a gorgeous face, small pouting and perfect lips, all framed by a magnificent head of wild blonde hair. Her body, from what he could see was magnificent, large yet perky breasts set on display by a tight shirt, legs that were long and slim, with skin unblemished by a single mark.

For just a moment as the last of the defenders retreated to the throne Theon and the woman locked eyes, and Theon could feel the attraction stir within him. That was all he had time for before the man who had been standing before the throne roared angrily, hefting up his axe and charging forwards.

Suddenly angry Theon charged forward to as well, outdistancing the men with him for a moment. He met Ulric, ducking underneath and axe blow and smashing his dirk's pommel into the other man's elbow as the arm went by. "HAHAHA!" The man laughed, taking the blow and turning, bringing up his leg to kick Theon hard in the chest.

Theon felt the air go out of his body as he was lifted off his feet. The man hit harder than Ranma! Even so, Theon had moved to the blow just enough to let him still retain his ribs in one relatively good piece, thanks to his chain mail blunting the blow somewhat. He ducked underneath another overhand axe stroke, his dirk finding the man's leg right behind the knee, gashing him only slightly.

The man bellowed again this time in rage and made to kick Theon away but his leg gave out. Even if he couldn't feel pain, if the tendons were actually sliced the body wouldn't obey any command sent to them by his brain. The man nearly collapsed before steadying himself, but by that time Theon was up on his back.

But Ulric dropped his battleaxe, reaching behind him to grab Theon's head and squeezing. He pulled Theon over his head before Theon could trust his dirk into his back hurling Theon to the ground.

Theon rolled with it, coming up with another man's sword and racing Ulric, dirk in one hand sword in the other. But he lost the sword to a blow from Ulric's axe which shattered the bronze weapon. A sudden lunge before Theon could get away Theon found his good arm grabbed by the man's huge ham sized hand, and soon found himself lifted off the ground as easily as child.

The man bellowed a laugh, saying something in the old tongue. Then he stopped, a quizzical expression on his face for a moment. That was because Theon had reached down to the pouch at his side and pulled out an arrow, thrusting the arrow into the man's eye and into his brain. For a moment Theon still hung there, then the man's body collapsed and Theon fell to the floor.

Around him a wailing began from the Skagosi, and here and there a few of them even threw down their weapons. Through the crowd the woman that had been kneeling by the throne approached slowly, men making way before her, even his own men, until she stood before Theon. She spoke in the old tongue, kneeling before him bowing her head and placing her palms on her forehead in token of surrender.

Looking up she noticed Theon's look of incomprehension, and then she spoke slowly in common, the first Skagosi that had done so. "What you kill, you keep."

Later that night while his men were seeking similar pleasures among the Skagosi women, who seemed more than willing for the most part, Theon lay with the woman who had apparently been Ulric's. He was caressing her gently, she was too gorgeous for him to want to speed things along quickly.

Her porcelain skin was so cold, but it wasn't painful, rather it was enticing. He wanted to warm her up, whatever it took. The woman had taken to his attentions amorously seemingly fascinated by Theon's barely hairy chest, and his lack of a beard, as well as all the attentions he was paying her.

That wasn't to say the woman, whose name was Elima, was a submissive lover, she gave as good as she did, kneading, caressing, kissing him hard and ardently, her hands working at his manhood bringing it to attention quickly. Soon even though Theon had wanted to take his time, he was simply to aroused to wait any longer. By the look in her eyes Elima was too. They were slitted, her cheeks almost flushed despite the porcelain nature of her skin, a fascinating hue.

Theon began to suck and nuzzle at her neck, as Elima straddled him, pushing him down onto his back as she moved her body down until she was sitting on his thighs, then raising herself slightly. "MMhhhaaa!" Elima threw back her head her eyes closed, moaning loudly as she guided his length into her. Theon bucked underneath her, the two of them began to against one another while Elima's head remained thrown back her eyes closed as she moaned loudly, saying something in the old tongue.

Despite all the experience he had, Theon found his end rushing to meet him quickly, something he put down to how long it had been since he had left White Harbor. Then we went he cum, he gasped feeling the woman clench around him as if trying to pull his cum out of him. Then it became painful, something else was happening, something Theon couldn't quite name was leaving his body.

He felt drained, more drained then the battle and their rutting could explain away. He fell back, his hands falling from the woman's breasts to lay limply alongside his body. Theon simply laid there as the woman continued to ride him, his erection not going down. Moments later Theon began to black out, his eyes slowly shutting, but just as he did so, he caught a glimpse of Elima's eyes opening again, glowing bright blue in the dark of the room.

OOOOOO

It was deep night, and the phrase 'deep night' was never so profound as a night on the Wall, Jeor thought standing on top of the Wall directly in front of Castle Black a cup of warmed mead in his grip warming his fingers and the steam from it kept his face warm as well as he stared out into the night for now.

Jeor was restless, his shoulders twitching underneath his ancient armor, his hand on the hilt of the Valyrian blade Longclaw as he stared out into the dark. He somehow knew that Castle Black would be attacked. It was stupid, an example of emotion and hope overriding fact, but the tunnel through the Wall here represented a possible weakness.

That was why I left it alone, a possible weakness through which the wildlings could pour their entire hordes far faster than going over the wall. I'm surprised Mance has been able to keep them from attacking us here so far, but at some point his command of the horde will break and they'll attack us here. And it needs to be soon, before they hunt out all of the wildlife in the forest feeding their numbers, and start to weaken and spread out.

This feeling was proven correct later that same night. The steam from his ale had long since stopped, and the cold was beginning to affect his ancient bones despite how covered up he was when those damnable portable scorpion arrows began to clatter and smash along the parapet of the Wall. Here and their archers who had been covering next to the parapet moved and began to fire back down into the darkness.

There was a shout and a clamor from down below in the darkness and then a shout went up. "Fires down below! They're trying to break through the door!"

Jeor nodded grimly. "Forward the barrels of stone! Pour them all out down there lads, all of them!"

He nodded to Castle black's Master-at-Arms. "Get our brothers up here, but not the Mormont men. We'll hold them in reserve for now, along with the dedicated archers. Wait to use them until they have light to see by."

OOOOOO

Later that same night a runner arrived near the ruins of the bridge of bones. "Mance," the man said gasping for air, hands on his knees. "The attack on Castle Black's begun!"

"Good." Mance said. He had committed all of the remaining portable scorpion's to that attack, along with Orell's men, Styr, all of his men and a little under half his remaining force that wasn't part of the small raiding forces still set to assault here and there further to the east of Castle Black, just enough to keep the defenders there to remain where they were. That attack would continue throughout the night and into tomorrow, along with heavy raidings along the Wall. But all of it was a cover for the real attack, which would be here.

He stared out into the darkness, staring at the expense were there had previously been a bridge. As he had hoped, the bridge wasn't actually smashed entirely, just the middle-most section. The distance between the two sides of the bridge wasn't wide enough to stop a man with a grapnel to throw it across.

Come on Weeper, he thought to himself staring at the bridge while all around him fully 40,000 wildling raiders waited along with their giant allies. Their war mammoths were down with a few of their men to make the attack on Castle Black all the more believable. But the clan chief was here along with his men. Come on Weeper, give us the signal...

OOOOOO

The Weeper was one of the most intelligent, experienced, and ruthless raiders among the wildlings. He was also personally loathsome, and feared among all his followers for his cruelty. All this made him perfect for the current task.

Three nights previous he'd led a small band down into the crevice and then across the frozen waters of the Milkwater the top of which had frozen more than enough to allow his men to simply walk across it. But getting up the other side had been long and arduous, and he had lost more than a dozen men.

Their screams as they fell to their death would've been enough to alert the men on the Wall far, far above them. However, every man with the Weeper had his mouth muffled in some manner. Those that had protested, had their mouths sown shut by the Weeper, or their tongues pulled out. Finally they were at the top of the ridge line, where they began to scale the Wall itself, which towered over the edge of the ravine.

At Westwatch, Bowen Marsh was an angry and rather bitter man. The fact that he and his men had to be saved by Kyle and the men he had so disdained, the fact that they could leave the Wall after the wildling threat was dealt with, galled him like fire. In his anger he had retreated into the pleasures of a brew of rotgut that a few of his men created here in Westwatch, allowing his men to do whatever they wished.

Very few of them wished to actually continue to patrol the Wall, as angry and bitter as their commander. Especially since without the bridge allowing an attack force across, the most action they would see might be the scorpion men firing on them. No force could scale down into the ravine and across then up again after few were staring toward the east, where faintly they could hear the drums sounding that attack was underway.

The first few of them died to wildling blades before they even realized they were under attack. A few tried to sound the alarm, rushing toward the nearest signal tower, but the wildlings were there before them, and the Weeper himself had raced into the signal tower with a few of his men killing the crows stationed there. He lost a few men to the damn crows, but all of the defenders on this portion of the Wall died before they could sound the alarm.

Looking around he nodded in satisfaction then moved back into the signal tower motioning to a few of his men, while still others moved about, taking axes or torches to some of the siege weapons. "You lot remain here, look as if you're crows if anyone looks in this direction."

"I don't know chief, Ah'm no sure I can act as if I don't have a spine!"

There were some chuckles at that, but not many. Far too many wildlings had died since they had begun to assault the Wall, and the metal of the Night's Watch and the men of the North had proven to be a match for wildling courage.

But now that was over with, and the Weeper smiled in anticipation while ropes began to be thrown back down the Wall making it easier for the next group, as other ropes were tossed across the destroyed bridge, making a very makeshift rope bridge there. It would be tough, and it would be slow, but they would be able to eventually get at large force across that way.

The moon was more than three/fourths of the way it down the sky by the time the Weeper had enough men on the Wall to decide to enter Westwatch. The route down to the castle was a wide stairwell carved into the back of the Wall, entering a high tower.

At that point however things began to go amiss for the attackers. While Bowen Marsh might have allowed his resentment and anger at the other commanders to color his command, the master at arms of the Westwatch was a man named Qhorin Halfhand.

Qhorin was in the same mold as the old commander of Shadow Tower, commander Mallister. He was a grim, elderly man who took his duties seriously, and truly believed that the duties of the Watch were an honor. He'd been out on patrol with the mountain clans until that night, but since he had come back he had taken Bowen Marsh to task.

Now Qhorin was leading a band of brothers up onto the Wall along the same staircase the wildlings were marching down. For a moment the two groups simply stared at one another, shocked at this sudden meeting. Then Qhorin snarled out "Wildlings! Attack!"

As his men surged forward he turned barking out commands to the men behind him. "Get back into the castle and send runner to Shadow Tower!" Qhorin stared up at the Wall noting that the signal towers in the vicinity were silent. "We can't expect anyone else to hear and come to our aid along the Wall!"

With that the two forces clashed, and the Weeper found himself face-to-face with Qhorin. The wildling chieftain snarled, angry at their plan being so suddenly halted in its place like this, and attacked with furious energy. "Damn you crows!"

Qhorin Halfhand was named that because he had lost all the fingers on his dominant hand in a bygone battle and been forced to re-train himself on his other. He had done so to such a degree that most people never really realized that his new hand hadn't always been his dominant one. He parried the blows of his opponent aside, slicing into the other man's bone armor and almost gutting him with his first strike.

The Weeper only saved himself by leaping back up onto the stair behind where he had been standing, staring in horror as Qhorin finished the swipe in another wildling's shoulder before kicking that man off the staircase and out into the air to plummet down into the courtyard of Westwatch.

Desperately Weeper grabbed a few of his fellows and threw them into the front of the battle. With that cover he turned away, pushing his way through the press of bodies away from the crows that were now forcing their way up the tower, their better weapons and armor allowing them to match the wildlings in this ferocious melee.

OOOOOO

Hearing the clamor of battle closer than it should've been, Mance groaned around allowed before turning away from the rope he was about to climb up the Wall to bark out orders. "Somethings happened up top! Get the Giants across and winch them up onto the damn Wall! If they can hold aid coming along the Wall we can still win this!"

His order went out, and with surprising speed given how disorganized the horde was the Giants were hastened on to the very slim rope bridge. The ropes creaked alarmingly under their weight, but held. The giant creatures, 15 feet tall and bulging with muscle were quickly across and then began to scale up the Wall as easily as any man.

With that done Mance turned staring out into the night out of the Wall. He prayed that the Weeper and his men could hold the top of the Wall against the men from Westwatch long enough for more of his horde to get across the bridge. Or else all is lost.

OOOOOO

Back at the front of the battle Weeper had fallen back through his men, staring in astonishment as the crows forced their way up the staircase. His men should've had the advantage, being able to stand above the crows and strike down at their heads. But the better armor and weapons of the crows was telling. For every one of them that fell, four or five of his own men were slain. He was quickly running out of raiders.

Luckily Mance's men had continued to come across the bridge and up the Wall, if slowly, since he had first slain the watchers on the Wall. Fully 2,000 wildlings had made it up the Wall by this point that weren't a part of his original raiding force, and they barreled down the staircase adding their weight to the battle and pushing the thin line of Night's Watch back.

But the rest of the castle had been roused by this point. More men began to pour out of it joining the ferocious battle occurring on the stairs.

For now that part of the battle was a stalemate and the Weeper sighed a little in relief. Then he stared as the first of the giants pulled himself up over the parapet of the Wall.

OOOOOO

Lord Tyrion was roused from a deep slumber by a pounding on his door. "What by the Stranger's puckered asshole do you want!? It's not even dawn yet!"

He opened it to find Bronn standing outside his face grim. "Trouble at Westwatch, the wildlings've somehow gotten across the gorge."

For moment Tyrion gaped at the man then shook his head. Stupid, stupid, stupid! Just because someone says the bridge is gone doesn't mean that the entire thing is gone! We should've thought of that! And I should've pushed for Bowen Marsh to be removed despite needing Qhorin out with the mountain men! "Rouse the Order, all of it!" he ordered, moving back and away from the doorway. "We'll march along the Wall to their support. Then get the cavalry moving as soon as possible along the Wall after us to intercept any groups that try to make it down.

Moments later Tyrion and Bronn joined their men about 600 infantrymen, on top of the Wall. Tyrion didn't mince words simply pointed west along the Wall. "Let's get it stuck in boys!"

The men answered with a roar and marched off in that direction, leaving behind man enough to man several of the trebuchets on this portion of the Wall as Tyrion ordered them to start firing the moment they had targets. Only the trebuchets could fire far enough from this position to range on the area straight in front of Westwatch and Shadow Tower.

Not even a quarter of the way to Sentinel Stand they ran into opposition, a force of wildlings moving down the Wall and taking out the signal towers guards and destroying siege weapons as they went.

Tyrion and his men arrived just as one signal tower was being attacked, the men there standing firm against the assault. But there were only five of them, against something like 200 wildlings. Even so one man was banging on the drums while the other four tried to hold the top of the simple tower, two bows firing down into the mass while the wildling tried to scale up the ladder against two men holding it.

The wildlings saw the reinforcements coming by their torches and turned away from the tower to charge at them. Tyrion pointed his sword at them. "Charge!"

At the head of his men Tyrion dashed forward, his eyes alight with battle. He might be a dwarf, he might be the Imp everyone called him back home. But right now, his blood was up as much as his brother's would've been in a similar situation.

He hacked and slashed at the first few wildlings that were in front of him, while behind him his men followed with a furious charge. A few wildlings were knocked off their feet and then off the Wall to either side such was the impetus of the charge. Here, just like on the stairwell down to Westwatch, the armor and weapons of the defenders proved telling, as did the weeks of training Bronn had insisted they all go through.

Each group of five men fought as a unit, watching each other's back and pushing forward as one, their shields in front of them. While they couldn't form a full shield linewall across the breadth of the Wall, the wildlings still couldn't truly flank them. Men fell on both sides, but the majority of dead were wildlings, and they began to fall back.

Tyrion turned slashing open one man's back before ducking under a flail made of bones, tendons and wood rather than metal and chain. He stabbed that man in the chest with his blade punching through his low quality ring mail easily.

Moments later however went up from the wildlings. "The Giants! The Giants!" at the same time many shouts of dismay or even fear went up from Tyrion's men.

Through the throng of wildlings in front of him Tyrion could barely make out a line of Giants coming, huge massive creatures with thick brows, small, deep-set eyes, and furry bodies with barely a loincloth to their names. The fur however was obviously both warm and thick enough to serve as protection, and as he gaped at them through a break in the battle, several arrows hit one giant only to either not penetrate into its body, doing nothing other than make him angry.

The giants wielded massive clubs rather than any more sophisticated weapon, but in their hands it was certainly enough. He watched in anger as they reached the battle, smashing both wildlings and his own men into paste with blows from those clubs. Worse they had the reach of any sword, even a greatsword.

From behind him Tyrion heard a shout of "Bring up long spears!" Which was a good idea, but one he couldn't make use of. Two of his men had died, leaving Tyrion too far forward from Bronn and the rest of his Order for the moment. He hacked left and right, trying to fall back, but the first of the giants was too close to evade.

Backing up will only make me an easier target! He thought fiercely, staring up at the beast which looked down at him as if perplexed by the small creature in front of him. Then the giant turned away obviously ignoring him thanks to his small stature.

This inflamed Tyrion so much he shouted. "Don't ignore me you hairy beast! Your mother could tell you that the best things come in small packages!"

Not his best material to be sure, but it seemed to work and the giant turned back, raising his club and bringing it down far faster than Tyrion had anticipated. Yet even so he ducked under it, rolling along the stone of the Wall. Yet halfway through the roll he was forced to fling out one hand to redirect a blow from a man standing beside the giant, who was bringing down a heavy axe on Tyrion.

Tyrion screamed as instead of smacking his hand along the flat of the axe and redirecting it, Tyrion's attempt had merely put his arm between the rest of his body and the attacks. The axe blow impacted his arm directly behind his wrist cutting off his hand entirely, but Tyrion continued to roll until he was underneath the giant's legs.

From there Tyrion furiously stabbed upwards with his blade, underneath the giant's loincloth.

"GRAHUOOOOOOOooooooooo!" The giant moaned, going to its knees as Tyrion threw himself forward, coming up behind it. From there he stabbed the thing in the back, forcing his full weight upon his sword hilt to press his blade into the things furry hide.

Another giant roared in fury at the other's death, raising its club but by that point several dozen men had come forward carrying cavalry lances and thrusting them at the giants. The one menacing Tyrion turned angrily as he took a lance point in the shoulder, hammering the man wielding it down with its club but falling back now with the other giants as they were menaced by the heavy lances.

They still retained at least reach parity with the defenders and men continued to fall, but the battle had turned, and a surge from his men pushed the giants and wildlings back far enough for them to get to Tyrion. Bronn grabbed Tyrion by the shoulder and pulled him back from the front line, staring at his wound before motioning to another man. "Help me with him."

"Don't bother." Tyrion grunted then nodded over at one of the braziers nearby. "Grab a coal out of that, we can cauterize the stump and stop the bleeding, but I'm not going back to the castle while the fight still going on. Can't you'll all have all the glory after all."

Bronn stared at him, then nodded. "We're gonna have to find a new name for you Little Lion. Little is not a description you can have after you slay a giant."

Tyrion grinned, then began to laugh and only stopped when the man who had rushed over to the brazier thrust a large piece of coal on a pair of tongs down onto his amputated wrist. He screamed loud and long at that, but Bronn held his arms still while other men held him down until the entire wound had been cauterized. It was an ugly ragged thing, and the bleeding hadn't stopped so much as slowed dramatically, but a rough and ready tourniquet was pulled on quickly. With that Tyrion was well enough to go on and he smiled grimly as the sun began to rise. "Press forward boys! Press forward!"

The battle didn't end with the coming of the sun. It remained bloody and desperate while more and more men from further east along the Wall joined in, the men of house Mormont leading the way to aid the order as they pushed towards Westwatch. Runners soon found the men of the mountain clans, and they went to reinforce the brothers of Westwatch and Shadow Tower, which had been besieged just as badly as Westwatch, only with the defenders in a better position to ward off attacks.

Cavalry units also began to patrol along the Wall, killing wildlings who were trying to scale down the backside of the Wall between castles. It was bloody and hard work. But that and even the battles occurring in the two castles under direct assault was a veritable picnic to the battle occurring up on top of the Wall against the giants.

The giants continued to wreak a bloody toll on the men of the Order and House Mormont for more than half the morning, their hides and size making them hard to kill. Yet there were never many of them, and after the last of them died the order still had more than half of its number. They continued to push the wildlings back and further back, soon aided by more brothers of the Night's Watch and other houses.

The horde that was still trying to press over the makeshift bridge also quickly came under fire of every weapon that could range from that position. Massive bushels of rocks were flung into the air to spread and wreak havoc amongst the horde.

Worse however was the single load of wildfire that was added to the mix on Tyrion's orders. The forest of the mountains on the other side of the crevice went up in flames all around and above the wildling horde. Thousands of them died in that fire before they could get away.

For the rest of that day the battle ebbed and flowed. The wildlings were desperate, and even with the fire raging behind them they still tried to cross the rope bridge. This despite the heavy fire from the siege weapons and then the archers as the defenders pressed forward along the Wall.

By the time the sun was high in the air the last of the wildlings had been thrown down into the Gorge they had climbed up from, the rope bridge had been burned, and the once mighty wildling horde had finally tasted complete defeat.

Though Mance didn't have time to realize it. He died when that one delivery of wildfire had hit the forest near where he had been waiting to go across the makeshift bridge.

That battle signified the end of Mance Ryder and the wildling hordes' attempt to assault the Wall. No one would ever know precisely how many thousands of wildling had died in that battle or the ones before it, but they would know soon how many survivors there were.

Several days after he had lost his hand Tyrion was yet again summoned to Castle Black. He had been on light duty since the battle, turning over much of the day-to-day running of the Order of Ardent Defenders to Bronn as Tyrion recuperated from his wounds. He had taken a nasty knock to the head at one point during the battle, which exacerbated the loss of his hand. Luckily it had been his left hand rather than his right, which was his dominant one.

He was surprised however to see Jeor Mormont on the Wall rather than inside Castle Black, along with several of the other commanders. In fact practically every commander was there, even Qhorin who was now second-in-command of the entire Night's Watch. Qhorin had executed Bowen Marsh for gross negligence after Westwatch was no longer under attack. .

"For what act have you called upon the services of a rather battered if still handsome Imp, oh mighty commander?" asked Tyrion bowing obsequiously and obviously falsely to the older man.

"Mock me not Little Giant, else I decide your skin would do me as a new rug." Said the older man, smiling faintly. That was Tyrion's new nickname among the men, that and simply Giantslayer. It was certainly a better last name than Brightwall to Tyrion's mind, and he was beginning to wonder if he could convince the King in the North to change his last name.

"You don't want my skin, its small and stringy." Tyrion replied then smiled faintly. "Still my lord, why are we here? My warm, and above all magnificently occupied bed is calling me back into her folds."

In reply the old man pointed down at the ground out across the open field between the Haunted Forest and the Wall. Tyrion turned and looked in that direction, peering up over the parapet to do so. He frowned as he noted a wide and very white sheet being held between four wildlings. "It looks to me as if someone wants to parlay."

Of course Jeor could not go down himself. That was left to First Ranger Benjen, and several of the others including young Karstark and Tyrion. Tyrion's men supplied the guards. The Night's Watch commander knew how the wildlings looked at them, and since this was supposed to be a peaceful meeting he had decided not to send that many brothers along so as not to further inflame the issue.

While the gates portcullises were raised and the party allowed through, the rest of the Wall was ready for a sudden attack. The Wall up on top was lined by archers and very siege weapon within sight was trained on the forest behind the supposed peace party. If this was some kind of trick, the wildlings would pay dearly for it.

They stopped several yards away from the wildlings, and Benjen stood forward holding his hands in front of him in token of peace. "I am Benjen Stark, First Ranger. These with me represent the people of Westeros, united in the Wall's defense. Who are you and what clans do you speak for?"

A woman stood forward. She was young, possibly the same age as Benjen's oldest nephew, with long shimmering blonde hair the color of dark honeyworn in a golden braid across one shoulder, with high cheekbones and pale grey eyes and a rather impressive bosom. Tyrion could not help but find her beautiful, a truly strange thing to think of any wildling woman.

"I am Val, and I speak for all the wildlings that remain." She said bitterly, her voice dulcet despite the bitter tone. "You and your blight-blasted kneelers have slaughtered our people so much that clans barely matter anymore."

Benjen hid a wince, realizing that that last fire and the trick assault on Castle Black must have cost the wildlings even more than he had feared. That assault had actually done a bit of damage to the tunnel's gates, but the fighting there had paled in comparison to what was going on miles to the west along the Wall.

"I'm sorry for your loss." Benjen replied. "You might not believe that, but we, those among the Night's Watch and those with us here, know the true threat that is even now gathering power behind you. I have to ask, have you continued to burn your dead?"

"We have." Val nodded now looking at him more thoughtfully. "You know what we flee from then?"

"Yes, and that is why I personally would have welcomed a peace treaty between our peoples long before this. We need the numbers." Now more than ever, Benjen thought sadly. While the Wall remained strong and their numbers decent enough overall, they had still been hammered in that last battle.

The order of the Ardent Defender had been smashed, losing more than two thirds of its members. House Mormont had lost fully half of its complement on the Wall, and the cavalry groups sent up to the Wall and added to the men of the Order that had turned away the wildlings who had begun to scale down the back of it had lost men as well. And the Night's Watch had lost practically two-thirds of their men in Shadow Tower and Westwatch was down to a bare two score.

"However, if you want peace with us you'll have to learn our ways." Benjen went on, knowing that would be a sticking point for the Northerners who were not among his brothers. "There will be no more raiding, no more internecine warfare. You will now longer be able to take anything you wish from someone who isn't strong enough to defend it as you have before, and that definitely includes women."

"You may keep your religion and even your courting rights amongst yourselves. However you will also have to pledge your oaths to that of the Lord Commander of the Wall to obey the laws of the land."

More than one wildling leader gritted their teeth at that and the young woman clenched her fists hard. Her voice however was still controlled as she replied. "You ask much."

"You have cost us much both in this war and over the years." said Harrion harshly. "There are mountain clan men up there who simply want to wipe you out, and most of the men of House Umber and even my own House would gladly help them," he said pointing at the men of House Karstark who were with him. Frankly they all knew that Mors would probably cause trouble down the line about this, but the number of men that this could bring it to the Wall's defense would be worth it.

Val looked at her fellows, and only one of them nodded. The other ones shook their heads angry at the fact that they'd have to give up practically everything that made them wildlings if they agreed to Benjen's demands. One of them put it into words shouting angrily "Never! We'll never kneel to Kings or give up the Free Folk way!"

"Then you can die here." said Kyle Conton, moving forward to stand beside Benjen angrily. "I'll be honest, I don't want to offer this to you, but Benjen and the others are right we could use even more numbers on the Wall than we have. What we've learned about the threats coming, the White Walkers and their undead allies, that's enough to chill any man's bone no matter how brave. But if you don't agree, if you can't speak for the majority of your people and keep them in line, then you're more trouble than you're worth."

Val chopped her hand, cutting off the other wildlings angry retort. "We will talk about it amongst ourselves and our people. We will return apart under the white flag once a decision is reached."

"Very well." Benjen said with a nod. "But do not tarry long. The threat to both our peoples is too strong and too powerful for us to afford you overmuch time."

OOOOOO

Theon felt as dried out and weak as a day-old kitten as he blearily opened his eyes. The torches were out, and Eilima was nowhere to be seen which considering how weak he felt was a mercy. What the hell happened? Blue light, did I really see that? Theon knew what that light entailed, he had seen it before in the battle against the wight's assault on the Wolfsworn. Is that, was that... no, that's impossible, White Walker's can't cross the ocean, it's Impossible!

But, but what else could it be? Theon didn't want to think about it, but he had to try and deal with what might well be a major threat. He then began to look around him wildly. Have to get away, have to go! Rouse the men!

He tried to move, but it took all of his effort just lift one hand up to scabble at the edge of the bed the two of them had been using. But Theon didn't give up, dragging himself out of bed and slowly pulling on his clothing. He forbore to put on his armor, too weak to put up with its weight. Once he was bundled up, he slowly began to ease himself out of the bed reaching down to pick up his bow and quiver, nearly collapsing for a moment under even that little weight.

All was silent and still as he made his way out of the room. Something was wrong, something above and beyond that woman possibly being a White Walker. There were no people in sight, not one. None of his men, none of the Skagos women, or their prisoners.

Warily Theon stalked through the longhouse's main hall, keeping his back to one of its walls, the wall that didn't have any rooms connected to it. He eyed every shadow, every corner and inch of the open hall, an arrow fitted to his bow while his body slowly began to regain its strength.

He made it to the doorway without incident, and looked out into the village beyond. But again there was no one there, it was as silent as the grave under the fool moon above, and Theon shuddered. Those women, with their eyes covered like that, could they have been wights? He shuddered, swallowing back bile at the idea, but then turned from a sound behind him.

Eilima stood there, naked as the day she was born. Even though her eyes glowed and Theon could now see that her ears were too long, her face too angular to truly be that of a human, Theon still had to fight down a rush of desire at the sight. She spoke in some tongue that Theon didn't follow, raising her hand to him. The end of it glowed, and Theon swiftly raised his bow and fired.

The woman stared in shock, but the arrow didn't do any damage. It smacked into the skin of her chest and shattered as if it had been frozen through and through, but the sound of it carried throughout the village's unnatural silence. The woman laughed, then said in common. "Strong, strong you are, but if not turned you be, then die you will and be servant."

"Over my dead body!" Theon growled, backing away and putting another arrow to his bow this time aimed for her eye. Even if the damn arrow shatters again it'll cause some pain at least won't it?

The woman cocked her head, then laughed musically, but it wasn't happy sound, rather it was cold and dark a sinister sort of mocking happiness. "That the idea!" She said in common again then continued to laugh high and cold.

Glancing all around Theon could now hear the sound of movement, and for a moment he hoped it was the men of his army roused from whatever unnatural sleep had been placed on them. And it had been, but it was the kind of sleep no one would ever wake from again. He stared aghast at Sigmund walking towards him from a hut, his eyes glowing dull blue in the dark.

From beyond Sigmund near the entrance to the village the men that had slept outside who had supposed to be on guard came walking into the village. All of those men had visible wounds, and were very obviously dead whereas the ones coming towards him from the village's huts didn't. But they were still just as dead as those that had been on guard.

Theon took one look around, then quickly turned raising his bow and firing at the White Walker. The arrow flew through the air swiftly but she caught it right before it would've impacted her face, the speed of her catch astonishing. The woman laughed and tossed the arrow aside, but Theon had already turned away, racing through the village.

The wights were slower than he was, and he cut several of them out of his way even though they had been his own man the day before, cutting at their hands or ducking underneath and cutting at their legs to put them on the ground as he raced on towards the palisade. There Theon leaped up, grabbing the top of the slim walkway and lifting himself up with a gasp of effort.

He was still quite weak from whatever the woman had tried to do him, but he was a Wolfsworn, and had endurance and strength beyond that of normal men. That was the only reason Theon was still alive, and he knew it.

Once on the parapet Theon threw himself over the top of it, climbing down swiftly. But by the time he reached the bottom the guards had turned from where they had begun to enter the village and were moving along the palisade towards him, with Terrell in their lead. Theon ignored them, racing on towards the Woodlands away from where the battle had occurred, hoping to circle around before heading back towards the fort by the shore.

The woman watched him go from the palisade wall, having reached it even faster than Theon had. She watched him go, a thin cold smile on her lips as she laughed then she turned northward, closing her eyes for a moment.

Several days later Theon hid himself among the trees high up in one of the branches, staring in shock at the fort. It's gates were open, and Theon could see several men there, but they weren't men any longer. Their eyes, when they turned towards the forest where he was hiding, were bright blue. The White Walker's minions had gotten there before him.

The boats, the ships are my only hope!

Several hours later Theon once again was hiding himself staring, appalled toward the ships. All of them were there, but they weren't going anywhere. The water around them had frozen, Theon didn't know how thick it was, but he could see it creeping up the side of the ships.

And on those ships was another White Walker, a woman just like the last one, so alike in appearance they looked like identical twins. She stood with one of the captains of the ships, their arms around one another as they whispered something to one another and the woman led him off. Nearby several other men Theon recognized as the captains of the other ships also stood or leaned against the masts of the ship, their eyes somehow vacant.

Just then behind him Theon heard a sound, and he turned quickly, his bow raised, his second to last arrow fitted to the string. From out of the woods all around him came wights, some of his former men and some Skagosi.

"Curse you!" Theon growled, raising his bow and firing at the man. His arrow took one of them in the eye, flinging his body backwards with the force of the blow before he turned, running out onto the shore. Dozens of men from those boats looked on at him, all of them with the same dull blue eyes. But Theon wasn't making for the ships.

No, he was making for one of the rowboats that had been left on the shoreline. He grabbed it, lifting it up over his head and then began to step out onto the ice. Gingerly he made his way across towards where he could see the ocean beyond the frozen shoreline, while behind him the wights chased after him.

Theon stumbled a few times, the ice creaking alarmingly underneath him. But his pursuers had far more trouble with their footing, and were unable to follow him fast enough to catch up before he reached the waters.

Once there Theon through the rowboat into the water where it splashed. He was just about to jump into it when something impacted his shoulder from behind.

He turned, seeing the white walker woman from the boat standing there, a bow of some kind of black wood or steel in her hands, and she smirked maliciously at him. Reaching back he wrenched the arrow out of his shoulder, staring at what looked like a shard of ice used as an arrowpoint before tossing it aside and falling into the rowboat.

"Not this time bitch, gah!" The rowboat rocked under him, and he nearly blacked out with the pain of his wounded shoulder, but he kept conscious through sheer force of will grabbing at the oars. "You'll not have me, not today, not ever!" Grasping the two oars he began to pull strongly on them, pushing the boat away from the shoreline and the ice.

OOOOOO

"Ranma wants me to allow Sansa to go south after everything that has happened?! No!"

"Calmly Catelyn." Eddard said holding up his hands pacifically. "You have to admit it makes good solid sense. Having one of our children reign in Riverrun is simply following the line of succession. Ranma could've made it his new capital I suppose, but I think he's got other plans." In fact Eddard knew he did: two capitals, one for winter and one for summer, though how realistic that was Eddard had no idea.

"I understand that it makes political sense." Catelyn said her voice an angry growl that would've sent Shaggydog running before going on almost desperately. "But it doesn't make sense to me, and I doubt Sansa would like to head south again either. Not after the events of King's Landing"

Eddard wasn't so certain about that. While Sansa had enjoyed being back in Winterfell at first, he had seen that had waned slowly. At first it was because so many of her siblings were gone and being reminded of the times she had spent here with her dead friend, Jeyne Poole. Then, even after she had made new friends, she seemed bored, and rather irritable at times about how little she had to do here.

It was as if Sansa had been forced back into a mold that she no longer fit. She had grown up on the trip into a fine young lady but there was no place for her in the power structure here in Winterfell. Lady Catelyn was the lady of the castle, and truly didn't need any help in that area, while Eddard (and Bran technically) handled everything else with maester Luwin and the Master-at-Arm's aid.

Instead Sansa filled up her time with work on various knitting projects. She had created several dozen scarfs, a few heavy, warm cloaks, and even gloves, all of them intricate, and all of them including something personal to the individual. Lord Glover's cloak for example had a picture of a town centered on a cloak of blue and brown, and Lord Manderly's gloves were pure white with fur lining the interior, and the image of a white buttress on the back of them.

Yet really, there was no place for Sansa in the current family/power structure, but in Riverrun she would have to grow into many new duties. He said so aloud and Catelyn frowned at him. Then she sighed. "I'm not going to win this, am I?"

"I'm afraid so my dear." Said Eddard, kissing her gently on a cheek hoping to soften her somewhat. It didn't work and she pulled away from him slightly. "But you don't have any issue with the two young men that will be sent to escort her?"

"No." said Catelyn shaking her head. "Those make a good solid sense. I doubt that Edd will be able to win Sansa's heart, they've been around each other enough that I think Sansa knows what she be getting into with him, and he isn't really her type. Young Ben however, he could be a different story. And reading between the lines I think Ranma understands that too. Tying our house to the Blackwoods makes excellent sense and I think it could become a love match at some point."

And with Edd defending her I have no fear of Sansa's safety. Catelyn thought to herself, a thought that Eddard shared. It would be a very brave and incredibly foolish group of bandits that tried to attack a party with a Wolfsworn among them.

"I'm just not happy about another one of our children leaving home." She said almost plaintively, crossing the small distance between them and leaning against Eddard's shoulder as she sat down, sharing his warmth for a moment.

"All children need to leave home love, and you can tell that Sansa is ready. She'll love her life in Riverrun, and I think she will do magnificently as Lady Tully." Eddard replied quietly, kissing her cheek gently once more, happy that this time she did not pull away.

Catelyn nodded morosely, still not happy about it but understanding her husband's point.

The next day when told of the news, both of her becoming Lady Tully of Riverrun and the fact that two suitors were coming up to escort her south, Sansa was both sad and ecstatic. She was sad that she was leaving the North so soon, but happy to becoming a lady on her own. Sansa had quickly become tired of having nothing to do but her sewing yet again, she enjoyed creating clothing but it wasn't something she wanted to make a career out of. Not when her mother had trained her so long to be a lady of the realm, and after her own experiences, both good and bad.

And while she had never met this Brynden Blackwood, what her older brothers message about him said sounded promising. I've always wanted a prince, a knight in shining armor. But then I learned that my prince was a monster, and my brother more of a knight than any other.

Now, now I think all I want is a kind, gentle man, and this Brynden sounds the sort. What did Ranma say 'he might not have the martial abilities of your knightly ideal sister, but he has the skills with song and poem.' Hehehehe, that sounds like fun, though I'll have to see for myself. And I also like the fact that I will be the one choosing between them. Heh, I wonder what Ranma would do if I told them either pressured me? Not that Eddie is likely to even try.

Eddie... Sansa knew Edd, and trusted him to protect her, though she honestly wondered why he was being considered as a candidate for her hand, after all he was practically family anyway. And he's a little too wild and unrefined for my tastes. I mean, Eddie's nice, and he has a... interesting sense of humor, but he likes to play with fire far too much, and I have to say I can't see him being happy to live in the Riverlands.

Still, I will have to give him due consideration for my hand, if only to be fair. Still, I wonder why him and not someone closer, like one of the Glovers? Is it just an age issue?

But then Sansa realized it might be a nod to the Northern houses, since both her father and Ranma, the heir, hadn't married a northern house. She said so aloud to her mother and added, "You realize mother that both Rickon and Bran will need to marry into northern houses to further solidify relations between us all?"

Catelyn looked at her daughter somewhat sadly. That comment showed a level of political acumen that she had not associated with Sansa before this, but it showed that her daughter had truly grown out of Catelyn's own image of her. "Yes, that is so. I have already thought about what houses would make good matches for them, but for now let us talk about Riverrun. As Lady Tully you will have..."

OOOOOO

Ranma and Daenerys returned to the army a few hours after the Old Gods visions had ended, having stayed on the island to have an argument. It wasn't a shouting match. It was simply an argument, two very intelligent and forceful personalities clashing about what they felt they needed to do from here on.

Daenerys understood how important the threat coming from the Lands of Endless Winter was, and was perfectly willing to send forces North to bolster the Northern forces that had stayed behind, even if this left them shorthanded to face the threats down here. However, she was just as firm on the fact that Ranma personally could not go: he was their best military commander and her brother was still out there.

She knew she couldn't command the army, and had misgivings about the lords that made up that Army. They were fine fellows, excellent small unit commanders or even commanding units in large scale battles, but not general material. If Jon was still with the Army, Daenerys would've been satisfied with him staying behind, but as it was they needed Ranma right where he was.

She was equally adamant that Ranma and their army could not afford to have their movements so controlled by the timeframe that would allow them to return to the North within the two months.

While Daenerys convinced Ranma of the first point, she could not convince him of the second, and found herself swayed by his point of view. They also argued about Ranma's decision to send men north now, where they reached a compromise.

The next day Ranma spent the morning staring out across the lake considering plans, discarding plans, thinking of travel times, and cursing himself for a damned fool for having sent Jon off as he did. It made sense at the time, and with the news that there was an army from Dorne ravaging the Stormlands it might prove strategically important. But right now, it was hampering his choice of strategy greatly.

"Deep thoughts for this early in the morning." Said a feminine voice from behind him, and he turned to see Myrcella and Daenerys standing there. It had been the younger woman who had spoken and she smiled when Ranma turned to them.

Ranma smiled back widely leaping to his feet and moving to engulf her in a hug. He whispered into her ear. "I'm so glad that you pulled through Merry! My world would've become a much darker place without you."

Myrcella flushed, not at the hug but at the emotion in Ranma's voice. Out in the open like this he couldn't say that he loved her, but the meaning still came her Daenerys smiled, putting her arms around both of them and the three of them stood there for a moment.

Eventually however Myrcella pushed him away. "None of that. What were you thinking about so hard?"

"Options, idiotic ideas, and time, time, time ask me anything but time!" Ranma growled.

"Have you come to any decisions yet?" Daenerys asked.

"Not happy ones, no. I don't want to face a strategist, a commander like Stannis with this time limit hovering over my head, you were right about that Dae. And we're not even certain where your brother is yet, so planning for that is tough as hell."

That wasn't to say Ranma had no ideas about how to go about it. Stannis was too linear, too controlling. Causing enough chaos and pulling his attention this way and that was a possible strategy, but it would take too long to set something like that up.

"I take it you're fact-finding mission went well then?" Myrcella asked cautiously looking between the two of them. Daenerys had not talked much when she joined Myrcella in their bedroll the evening before, simply holding the younger girl against her and falling asleep quickly.

"I got a lot of information yes, but none of it was very helpful." Ranma growled again.

While Daenerys simply hummed in agreement, leaning her head against his shoulder the sound sent a little shiver of excitement up and down Myrcella's spine. Ranma looked at her thoughtfully, shaking his mind free of his worries for a moment. "Are you sure you're all right? I know, um, I mean the healers, they did tell you..." He paused unsure how to word it.

"That I won't be able to have children, yes I know." Myrcella sighed, looking away for a moment before turning back. "I can't say that it doesn't hurt knowing I won't be able to be a mother at some point in the far future, but it doesn't hurt as much as I think it should be." She smiled up at Ranma, all her love for him in her eyes. "In a way, it removes a final barrier. Giving your official stance on my birth Ranma, there would have been massive political pressure on me to marry. Now," She shrugged then smiled happily. "Now I can be whatever I wish to be."

Ranma looked around them then gazed at Fenris who had followed Myrcella and Daenerys to the shoreline, using the direwolf's senses for a moment to see if there was anyone nearby. Assured that there wasn't Ranma reached down and gently traced his fingers down Myrcella's face, while Daenerys once more put her arms around the young girl. "And what exactly do you want to be?"

Myrcella's voice was a whisper, yet there was so much emotion it caused both of her listeners to shiver. "Yours. Yours always and forever, yours in any way I can be."

Daenerys smiled. Leaning down she kissed the girl lightly on the lips. "And so you will be Myrcella Baratheon, so you will be."

She leaned back, allowing Ranma to lean down in turn to kiss Myrcella on the lips, not allowing the girl to deepen it before pulling back. "None of that." he said smiling faintly. "We'll have more than enough time for that the rest of our lives Merry, but you're still not fully healed."

"Seven-damned teases, the both of you." Myrcella said smacking Ranma lightly on the chest before she burrowed deeper into Daenerys's side. "Seriously though, what are you going to do?"

"I'm going to have to share what I've seen with my commanders, and hope that someone else has a bright idea. Because I haven't thought of any just yet."

Later that day Ranma was true to his word, sharing why he had gone out to the Isle of Faces, and the vision the old gods sent him with the lords of his army. Lord Blackwood and the other Old God worshipers were frowning angrily, worry and fear on their faces. They understood what a big step this was for the Old Gods, and the Northerners in particular understood the nature of the threat that was coming.

On the other hand the Seven worshipers among his commanders looked askance at Ranma's news. Yet even they were prepared to accept it given the rumors that the septons had shared in Harroway, what they were concerned about was where the visions came from rather than their content.

Greatjon put all their concerns into words. "This is big news lad and I understand your desire to head north as quickly as possible, but two months? It would take the army a month on the road just to reach the Neck, what with the Riverlanders unable to keep up with us hardy Northerners." He smirked at Lord Blackwood who rolled his eyes at the other man but did not rise to the challenge.

"My son Harrion is on the Wall." Said Lord Karstark his face and voice like stone, his eyes almost challenging. "I trust him and the others there and as much as I also want to be in the North Ranma, we simply can't just leave Stannis and the other threads here the South to fester."

"Regardless of your opinions my Lords, the fact remains that we must be in the North in two month's time. Our forces there might be able to hold off until then, but not after. I have to trust that the Old Gods would not have sent me that part of the vision if it wasn't certain."

"You're not going to budge his mind on this my Lords." Daenerys said smiling whimsically and taking Ranma's hand in hers pulling it up to her mouth to kiss that Palm and gently. "Trust me, I tried to most of last night and didn't get anywhere. If I, with my powers of persuasion can't change his mind, none of you have anything that is going to do the same."

There was some muffled laughter that, and Greatjon in particular guffawed loudly slapping his thigh. With the mood of the discussion now light and Daenerys went on. "With that in mind Ranma, what are you going to send north now?"

"The Cerwyn Pike regiment, and two-thirds of the cavalry from the north, along with the prisoners heading north including Jaime though they'll have to be watched." Ranma said crisply.

Jaime was still in chains and would remain such until he arrived on the wall where he would become Jeor and Tyrion's problem. Cersei was still lost in her own mind, only kept alive by a servant feeding her occasionally. But Lord Serret would remain a prisoner of the army. Politically he was too important to send to the Wall, and honestly as far as Ranma was aware the only crime, if it could be called that, to lay at the old man's feet would be some of the measures he took to control the populace of King's Landing during the siege.

"We've gained a major cavalry force from the Riverlands and House Tully raised its own pike regiment, so we can make good the loss. Those light and heavy cavalry might be very useful in the North, and I don't think any more pike regiments have been raised just yet." Ranma went on.

Neither of the two northern pike regiments had taken enough losses to mention, not in battle or, like the rest of the army, from disease, thanks to Ranma and Merry's planning. The light cavalry had taken a pounding under Ranma's baiting of Tywin, and again under Brynden, but there were still a little over a thousand of them. The heavy cavalry of the North had lost near to three-hundred men all told throughout the campaign. But with House Manderly's heavy cavalry added to that of the other houses, they still amounted to a little over a thousand two-hundred men.

There was a moment's thoughtful pause, then Wendel Manderly spoke up. "My father intended to raise two pike regiments from the smallfolk of White Harbor over time, though obviously I don't know how far along that process is. From my own observation though, those pikes are as deadly against infantry as they are against cavalry. The wounds pikes cause can be horrible. But against wights or White Walkers?"

"Daenerys and I sent a raven to Dragonstone to order as much dragonglass as we can get our hands on, that works on both White Walkers and their wights. And fireworks on wights just as well, which I'll be certain to tell all of my unit commanders before we send them off."

"I'll send Timot Hammerhand up as commander until they reach the Neck, where he'll hand over command to Lord Reed, as well as a message from me to muster his men and head north with them, though I hope he's already begun his muster. They should be at Moat Cailin within a month and Winterfell a little under two weeks later, unless weather is badly against them." Ranma went on.

All of the lords nodded understanding, though the idea of sending a little over three-thousand men north when they had two enemy armies to deal with would have struck most as insane. But Ranma and Daenerys had won a lot of respect from these men over the past few months, and all of them knew the aid might well be necessary in the North.

"That's all we can do for now." Greatjon said shrugging his massive shoulders.

While messengers were sent to prepare the units chosen for the march as well as to find Timot, Daenerys turned to Alayaya. Even as she did so Daenerys had to suppress a deep pang of grief at seeing who wasn't sitting beside her. Domic's death was a wound that had yet to heal, but she could not afford to let her grief impact her ability to think. "Alayaya, what do you have for us?"

"There's been a fleet seen in the Bay of Crabs your Majesty." said Alayaya. "Many of them were flying the three headed dragon of House Targaryen."

"Heading in or out of the Bay, and how far in?" Ranma asked intently

"The fishermen of Harroway couldn't say." Alayaya said with a shrug. "If I was there to question them personally that might be different, but one of my agents there sent that rumor by rider, and he only caught up to us this very morning. Far out I would assume, at the edge of the Bay of Crabs."

Ranma frowned. "Could he be making for Gulltown?"

"If he is won't find much aid in the Vale." Alayaya replied shrugging her shoulders. "I had time to talk to merchants who trade with Gulltown before the army left, and the news out of the Vale is that it's sharply divided at the moment. There are Houses that want to continue to sit on the sidelines and technically obey your aunt's commands, and there are others who want to act in some fashion, many of whom want to depose her entirely but don't have any real plans beyond that. We haven't received any response from Ser Breakstone, and frankly at this point it's doubtful that he could get through to us anyway."

"True enough." Ranma frowned. "Still, that's important to know, thank you." The beautiful ex-courtesan nodded her head, even while the other Lords all nodded respectfully toward her. All of them knew that with the death of Domic Alayaya was now the head of their spying efforts, and that made her words extremely important even to those who still looked at her askance thanks to her previous profession.

Ranma stared down at the map on the small camp table, rubbing at his ponytail thoughtfully. There was an inkling of an idea in his mind but he couldn't quite bring it to the fore.

After a moment staring down at the map herself Daenerys broke the thoughtful silence. "We need to concentrate our thoughts on Stannis even with Alayaya's news. To that end, what can he know about us, and more importantly what doesn't he know?"

She looked around at the Lords who pondered the question, before Jason spoke up staring at the map himself now. "He's not within sight of our scouts just yet, which means he isn't in the Riverlands, though he'll probably be marching along the Kingsroad as fast as possible. So we don't know where his proper position is, but I can't think of any way that he would know where we are either unless he has his own spy network, and there was never any talk of that."

Alayaya piped up again. "I doubt more than one in a thousand smallfolk would be willing to pass on any news to anyone in Stannis' army either. They all hate him, no they loathe the man. There's not going to be any kind of uprising, but even here, even from the woodsmen who stayed near Harrentown even after its destruction I've heard rumors they call him the Flame Fucker."

There was a laugh, but Jason looked at her quizzically. Alayaya saw his glance and understood the unspoken question, woodsmen were not the most open individuals to strangers after all. In response she merely stretched her back a little and working her shoulders, bringing attention to her body. A pang of grief went through her as she did, knowing how often she had done the same thing to Domic, showing him how she always seemed to be able to get people to talk to her.

With a shake of her head Alayaya banished her grief for her friend and went on. "I don't think we're going to see some kind of general uprising my lords, none of the smallfolk are brave enough to face Stannis' men in battle. But they won't help him, certainly not with passing on information."

"Do not discount the Red Witch, good lady." said Ehiric the septon, stepping forward from where he had been standing at the back of the group. All eyes turned to him and he frowned. "The Red Witch is known to advise Stannis my Lords, and she is a magic user. What can one such as that do? And if the old gods could send his Majesty visions, could not her heathen god send such to her?"

"Scary thought." Ranma said still not looking up from the map.

"But she's not a fighting man." Rickard said slowly scratching at his beard. "Would the Witch understand the importance of some of the changes you've made to our army, Ranma? The heavy armor of the pikemen, the fact that they move in formation, their training. Unless some of the survivors from the battle at the Red Fork can get back to him somehow, that could still be a secret."

"True uncle." said Ranma looking up now with a faint smile in space. "And an excellent point. Especially if the Reach is now backing him as Lord Ashford told us." Ashford and his men were still technically prisoners, but all of them had been given their parole for now, and he had been very open about the events near King's Landing.

"Truly Lord Mace has gone mad." said Ehiric, shaking his head. "To use the Lady Margaery so is a travesty."

Ranma nodded, though inside he was hoping that Mace at least would not die if they faced Stannis. He really did not want to know what Margaery would do if his army was the one that killed her father. Whatever her opinion about Mace's actions, he didn't doubt that she still loved him in some fashion.

"We need to reinforce Maidenpool." Daenerys said shaking her head. "I agree that Stannis is the greater threat my Lords, but my brother will make for Maidenpool soon enough."

"Was he one of the Lords that passed on information to you and your brother when you were in Essos?" asked Alayaya.

"I never knew the names of the lords who were passing on information, just that they had aided our family in the past."

But having met the man, I have to say even if he wasn't, Lord Mooton's spine would need stiffening. While his words were flattering, they were just that, words, neither he nor Lord Blackwell have sent us any of the men they promised, and his family was one of those that lost a lot of their power for backing my family in the war against their rightful Lord Paramount."

"Are you sure of that?" Ranma asked suddenly, looking up once more for the map.

"Positive." Daenerys replied firmly.

"What was your impression on Lord Butterwell?"

Daenerys paused for a moment, thinking. "I did not interact with him as much as I probably should have to get a real reading on him." she said prevaricating slightly before going on. "I think that while his family has routinely and traditionally followed Mooton, the current lord Butterwell has ambition."

She paused again, tapping her fingers thoughtfully as she remembered something else she had heard. "He's also a rather bitter young man. The scuttlebutt I heard was that he was promised to the daughter of House Deddings, who was raped and murdered by the Westerlanders after her family's military strength was wiped out at the Red Fork. Why?"

"Does anyone know what the state of his castle is?" Ranma asked, not answering her question just yet.

The Riverlords looked at one another, and Silas eventually spoke up for the mall. "From all reports it's a smallish castle, but very well made and it has a moat along with a well. Those two things made Lord Tully and Lord Robert pass over the place during the war, though the family itself has never recovered from the loss of influence it took during the Blackfyre Rebellions."

Tyos nodded agreement. "They used to have a much larger castle called Whitewalls, but it along with much of their land was taken from them at that point. That castle represents a lot of their remaining capital from that time to now, they don't have any heavy cavalry or any horse at all really because of that investment."

"The castle itself is a defensible one, I want to be clear on that."

"Yes it is. It could only be taken by siege I think, unless of course the other side has an equivalent of your Wolfsworn." Silas smiled thinly. "I don't think anyone here believes that, correct?"

From where she was leaning up against Fenris behind Ranma and Daenerys, Merry winced. "The Shadow Warriors my Lords. They could cause tremendous harm in any kind of battle, let alone one inside a castle."

"Not with us there they couldn't." said Smalljon, smiling thinly. For just a brief moment his fingers glowed blue. "Leave the Shadow Warriors to the Wolfsworn my Lords, we'll handle them."

"And it's been proven that they are susceptible to Dragon fire." said Daenerys smiling equally thinly.

"In that case," Ranma murmured thoughtfully, pulling the discussion back to the topic on hand. "Maybe we shouldn't send reinforcements to Maidenpool at all. I think we're missing a major point here my Lords."

"And that is husband?" Daenerys asked, looking at him her eyes narrowing as she wondered where Ranma was going with this.

"These are not two Allied armies we have to face, these are two enemies not just of us but of each other. And Mooton is what, a week and a half journey from the edge of the Riverlands?"

Less for our army, and that's another advantage we have: speed. Even with the pikes, we can move faster than any other army in Westeros. Heh. And I also have the surprise from Seagard, Fenris, and commanders I trust to act on their own, I doubt Stannis or Viserys can say the same. And neither of them will want to drag this campaign out, each for his own reasons, which means they can be tricked into coming after us directly rather than strike at Harroway.

Stannis will want to deal with us as quickly as possible, to use the autumn to solidify his position as much as possible this side of the Neck, and I he'll want to do something to the Ironborn, even if the Reach has already assembled an army to do so. He'll need a lot of time to solidify his rule and convince the smallfolk to overlook his destruction of King's Landing. As for Viserys, he doesn't seem the type to think in terms of long campaigns, and the Dorne aren't suited for warfare in autumn, let alone winter.

"Something like that." said Lord Blackwood now staring at Ranma thoughtfully.

"Good." Ranma moved his fingers down the map, moving them this way and that as he thought. Then he looked at his wife again. "I'm afraid I don't know anything about the Crackclaw Point Houses, are you certain they'll follow you rather than your brother?"

"From all reports those houses have always been loyal to my house and bent the knee only unwillingly to Robert at all. They weren't weakened as the rest of the Crownlands in the war simply because they weren't as strong forehand. As for them following me rather than my brother that depends on what rumors have reached them. I think they'll choose to follow me, simply because at the moment I have the strongest history of victory and the strongest backing."

Ranma stared into her eyes for a moment then nodded again. "Good. I think however that we'll need to send them another message, along with an offer."

"Are you going to share what you've been thinking about now?" she asked sharply.

Ranma laughed. "Sorry, just working it all out in my mind. I think we're going to have to make our enemies do the work for us my Lords."

"You're talking about getting Viserys and Stannis to fight one another aren't you?" said Lord Blackwood frowning. "That would be an excellent idea, and possible given Stannis' stubbornness and the hatred Viserys apparently holds for all things Baratheon as you pointed out on many occasions, your Majesty." He said nodding his head at Daenerys. "But I don't know if it's possible with someone as cagey as Stannis."

"He'll have to fight Viserys at some point so he'll probably go along with it, and we can turn it to our advantage somehow." Ranma said. "To that end, I'm going to split off the northern clansmen that we've got with us. Daryn, I'm going to put you in charge of them. Your job will be to head towards Maidenpool, not to engage any large force, but to wipe out any scouting... or foraging force you can."

Daryn nodded. "You want me to blind the dragon and make him hungry? That's fine, I can do that so long as he actually makes port there."

"He will." Daenerys said resignedly. "The moment he knows I'm here, and he might even know that Stannis is on his way. His pride and fury will force him to come here as quickly as possible. Unless he's idiotic enough to think that his one dragon can turn the tide in a sea battle against the Royal Navy."

There was more than one headshake from the Lords around them and Jason put it into words. "Not a chance. Stannis will have left Seaworth in charge, and while that man might have been a smuggler at one point, he is a master when it comes to sea battles. And the Royal Navy was made into a juggernaut before and during the Greyjoy rebellion. Give Stannis his due, he was the one that pushed for that, and it might serve us all well now."

Tytos was less certain. "Viserys and his dragon could possibly wreak horrible casualties on the fleet, fire on a ship is the deadliest of foes, even normal fire."

Daenerys shook her head. "Viserys is not so stupid as to think his dragon alone could win him the throne. Even while he was destroying the royal navy, his own would be mauled, and with it any chance of winning against us or Stannis. Viserys is also arrogant enough to think that if he beats Stannis and us, the royal navy might capitulate entirely."

Ranma held up a hand, forestalling further comment. "Well if we can expect Viserys to arrive on time, then we also need to blind Stannis and his force. Meera, Lord Blackwood, you two are in charge of that. Whatever force you need you can have." That would amount to some of the men that Meera had brought with her from the Neck, half the remaining scouts from the army, and all of house Blackwood's men as well several hundred archers from the North.

"Other than that, I'm going to send a force of men down to aid Lord Butterwell in the defense of their castle." Ranma looked at the Lords then nodded at Tristan Ryger. "Lord Ryger, would you be willing to take command of that force?"

The younger man nodded, seeming proud of having a command given to him. That force would consist of the men of House Ryger and of House Wayn, the least trained force among the Riverlords, but one that was laden decently with archers so would be perfect for this mission.

With that Ranma stood up. "Let's get organized my Lords, above and beyond the forces being sent north, I want the rest of the army on the march by noon. We'll make for Duskenale for now. That will put us between the two opposing armies, and then we can move out of the way and let our enemies do our work for us."

End chapter

The little bit of lemon here between the White Walker and Theon was not marked because it was important to the plot, sorry to those who might have found it offensive. Theon's final fate is still unknown, he may live, he may not, we'll see.

The next chapter will be... interesting. I have to show Garlan assaulting the Ironborn, the campaign of the Four Armies, some bits and pieces from the North... eesh. Going to be interesting.

The first of the two new stories that I might take up as a third fulltime story will be up soon - A Fate Touched in Middle Earth.

But I had two questions for my reviewers about the other new story that was in the top four of the poll, Wizard of the Dead.

One, and I'd like an honest answer for this. How many people voted for it because of the inherently Ecchi/hentai nature of the universe? I'm all for the idea, heh, but I feel that in my first foray I overdid that aspect if anything.

And two, what would people think of the idea of using a much younger Harry, a prior to second year Harry say rather than after fourth year, as the main character? Magic can be such a game changer I'd want to limit its application somewhat, even in comparison to canon Harry who, let's face it, is a bit of a lazy ass. But there would be other issues involved in instituting that kind of age gap between the HOTD and HP characters, er... sort of along the lines of the Kanokon anime, only with a main character who has powers, and a libido...

*Chapter 18*: Chapter 18

Wild Wolf 18

I don't own ASolaF or Ranma 1/2. Whimper...

Merry Christmas! Well, an early gift for you anyway.

I was almost tempted to go with 'Two Dragons, a Stag and a Direwolf walk into a bar' as the title of this one, but decided against it.

As Always would like to thank Anthony444 for his aid in this, he helps keep all the disparate characters in order and is a font of ASolaF wisdom. Now without further ado, let us begin:

---

Chapter 18: The Judge of Kings

Sansa stood next to Lord Manderly in the Merman's Court, her hand resting lightly on his shoulder where he sat on his lord's seat, leaning to one side indolently a wide, almost vacuous smile on his face, though that was the only sign of his normal fool's mask. Above that smile his eyes were hard and shrewd as he looked over his 'court' before looking up at Sansa, who smiled down at him, causing his face to settle into a normal smile of his own.

While Lord Manderly had been somewhat surprised at the news that Sansa was being sent to Riverrun to become the new Lady Tully, Lady of Riverrun and first among the Lords of the Rivers, he had understood what a shrewd move it was, and approved. Riverrun wasn't a big city, more a large town really, but it was a decent manufacturing point for wool, cotton, and other clothing. It and the lands around it were a fine source of manpower too.

The benefits of putting another city under the direct control of someone whose loyalty you could trust implicitly, and who further tied it into the royal family even if once removed was also excellent. Tying House Tully, and by extension House Stark and the new Royal House (whose name Manderly thought rather silly, but there were SO MANY Houses that was true for it wasn't worth mentioning) to another powerful noble House was also a magnificent political ploy.

Sending her down to me for training in city management however, that was something I did not see coming. Lord Stark had sent Sansa down to White Harbor by way of the White Knife with a force of a hundred men five days ago, with the suggestion that Wyman start to train her in the skills necessary to run a city. This included managing the disparate interest groups without showing any one group favor, managing relations with the smallfolk, passing judgement, setting tax rates, making certain the upkeep of the defenses and the town was generally kept as clean as possible, and several other skills.

Wyman had always suspected that Sansa was a good deal more intelligent than most thought underneath her training as a typical noblewoman despite her enjoyment in such, but the past few days had proven it beyond a doubt. She had taken to her lessons like a seal to water! She was personable, outgoing, insightful, and was quickly learning to become decisive in her decision making. Wyman had enjoyed their time together immensely, and was sad the time had come to bid her farewell.

At his nod, his seneschal opened the door to the Merman's court ushering in their guests with a loud, "Edmund Blackwood of Raventree Hall, and Eddard Karstark of Karhold!" At those words the two men entered, side by side.

Edd was a decently tall young man, with the wide shoulders of a warrior, the dark eyes and wild hair of his family, and a small, yet unkempt goatee which had not been there the last time Sansa had seen him. He still had laugh lines around his eyes and mouth, but his face in general had become weathered.

In contrast, Edmund was clean-shaven and spare of frame, taller than Edd but not nearly as bulky across the shoulders, with a thin, angular face with high cheekbones, almost feminine but yet in some fashion also undeniably masculine, odd though that seemed. He had long fingers and tanned hands, and seemed as weathered as his companion. Sansa found herself blushing for a moment. He is a handsome fellow...

Both men bowed to Lord Manderly, but their eyes strayed to where Sansa was standing next to him, Eddy's eyes wide and delighted, while Edmund looked almost but not quite shy. Sansa found herself smiling openly now. This looks to be fun...

"Welcome young friends to the Merman's Court!" Wyman boomed. "Welcome to the North young Edmund, and welcome back young Edd! I have been apprised of why you have come, and Lord Stark, acting on his father's advice of course, has agreed to his brother, his majesty's, commands in that area gladly. As Edd know doubt already knows, beside me is the Lady Sansa Stark, she who will become Lady Tully at her investiture in Riverrun."

Ranma's actual status in terms of lord Paramount of the North was a grey area at this point. By age old 'custom', a King of Westeros could not also be a Lord Paramount except for the Crownlands, which in Wyman's view was one reason why the power structure of Westeros hadn't changed much before this current war. Considering the rumors that had begun to reach Wyman's ears of the losses among Ranma's enemies and even further south however, along with the sweeping reforms Ranma and his queen had begun to enact, that had already changed.

But until he had beaten all the other claimants, Ranma was technically not king yet, so could act as Lord Stark, and had when telling his family about his plans for Sansa, though couched as they were in gentle language. So Bran would, very technically, become Lord Stark after Ranma became king. But of course his father was acting in his stead, freeing Bran to work on other projects.

Wyman laughed, a booming sound, but his eyes were still and judging as he looked at the youths. "Of course, just because the Lady is here does not mean you'll be able to turn around and start your journey back immediately. You'll still have to head up to Winterfell to present yourselves to her family, though Sansa will go back with you. Eddard is eager to get firsthand accounts of his son's campaigns in the Riverlands, and of course Lady Catelyn is equally interested in meeting you both."

Edd and Edmund both winced slightly, causing Wyman to laugh again, while Sansa giggled at his side, though her eyes too were still looking at both men with interest.

OOOOOO

Outside, the army camp was a scene of hectic but controlled activity, as the various units of the army began to pull out of the camp. First were the men heading north under Timot Hammerhand: the pike regiment from House Cerwyn, and the assigned northern cavalry, a force of a little over three thousand men. Quickly on their heels was the force under Tristan, heading straight for House Butterwell's as yet unnamed castle, a force of seven hundred.

Daryn and his unit, a mix of scouts, mountain clansmen, with a smattering of archers from his own house numbering about a thousand-six hundred, was next. Tytos and Meera were slower to get on the way, and by the time they were ready most of the camp had been taken down. Tytos and his force of a little under 2,000 cut across into the forest nearby, heading around the shore of the God's Eye down towards the Kingsroad. This left a force of 17,000 or so thanks to the addition of House Wayn's troops and four hundred men from House Charlton.

As each group left, Ranma and Daenerys bade their commander's farewell, shaking hands and watching them go. Dacey, Rickard, Jason and Greatjon soon joined them after Tytos left, Ranma's four most trusted and senior commanders. Rickard shook his head. "I'd never have believed that an army could separate like this so quickly from camp, the various units getting underway so fast. You and your brother have done marvels with organizing the armies supply situation Ranma, but it's moments like these that I realize those changes spread to other areas of the army's effectiveness."

Ranma smirked a little, smiling internally. The difference between soldiers and warriors. A soldier can be a warrior, but the name 'soldier' implies a certain level of organization and unit cohesion that warriors lack. "It's not the only advantage uncle." He gestured with one hand towards some heavily laden mules that had been purchased in Riverrun, a small sample of the mules they had bought there really, since they had bought every single one that was in the city and practically every horse as well, leaving only the oxen behind. "Those are going to come as a nasty surprise."

Daenerys nodded looking over to where he was pointing. Those particular mules were carrying the surprise that had been prepared in Seagard, but she was more concerned about something else entirely. "Yes, but I think the heavy cloaks and other gear we've gotten since taking Harroway from further north will be even more important as autumn continues." Practically every other day there was a small or large storm, and many soldiers had been noted to remark that it was noticeably colder since the battle of the Ruby Ford.

"Yep." Ranma said smiling grimly. "Stannis might've thought about it, but I doubt your brother has. And since Stannis has to deal with the Reach forces under his command now, his own supplies will have been stretched thin. Not so much in terms of food, but everything else. Waging war in autumn is a different kettle of fish than in the summer. Disease and other issues will start to rear their heads soon for any unprepared army."

Greatjon grunted, rubbing at the stump of his ear in a gesture he'd picked up since the battle in Darry. "I have to wonder if Stannis is going to play to your tune, lad. He'd hurt us badly by simply ignoring our army and taking Harroway behind us."

Thanks to its more central location Harroway was actually more important logistically speaking than Riverrun. Riverrun was now creating many of the goods that came forward with the army, and a surplus of said was building up in Harroway. But Harroway was the hub of both that traffic and traffic from Seagard and further north, though of course that line of supply was far slower than the other two.

"True, and if I was Stannis that'd be what I'd do. But remember, his force consists of Stormlands and Reach forces, and both those nations are having issues at home. Whether or not he likes to admit it, Stannis'll be dealing with a lot of internal pressure to see to us quickly, and then turn around and head back South. Besides, taking Duskendale from him will have much the same impact that taking Harroway from us would in the long run."

What Ranma didn't say aloud was that very few lords thought in terms of logistics and supply. Stannis was one, but even he wouldn't be really able to think of terms of a strategy based off interdicting his opponent's logistics capacity. Greatjon wouldn't have thought of it either before this campaign, where Ranma showed that supplies and logistics mattered both in terms of targets and in terms of an army's strength.

"Besides, I already cut orders for Timot to remain at Harroway with his force for a few days. The troops could use some down time, and they'll make up the time later on using water travel from the supply depot by the Neck up to White Harbor."

Daenerys broke in then. "And the further into the Riverlands Stannis goes, the further from his own supply points he gets. If he has to fight in the Riverlands he'll have to live off the land, and most of the lands south of the Red Fork have already felt the depredations of war."

"True, but Stannis is too smart to believe he can take Harroway away from us. He might not have much of an idea of what the pikes can do, but I bet he knows about the speed of our army, and he won't want to give us the opportunity to come up from behind him like Daenerys said, pinning him at Harroway."

"And we're forgetting my brother my lords. Maidenpool is closer to Harroway than Stannis' army. We need to be in a position to block that line of advance and convince him to come after us instead." Daenerys said, showing once again that she had learned quite a bit about strategy.

"Then I suggest we get going soon." Jason said, nodding at his son and their men as they passed, his son peeling off to join the Wolfsworn. He wasn't quite able to use ki, so would be ineffective against the Shadow Warriors, but his training was coming on apace.

"Agreed," said Ranma nodding his head as Fenris came up carrying Merry. Though her body was healed, Merry still ran out of energy quickly, and Fenris enjoyed carrying the young woman around in any event. She had left the planning session before everyone else, wanting to check up on her mother. Cersei alas was still in a vegetative state, unresponsive to any stimuli, only able to eat if someone actively fed her.

Even so, Cersei would go north with two of Merry's aides, along with her uncle, Jaime, though their final destinations were different. Cersei would be sent to White Harbor to a sept of the Silent Sisters there, while Jaime would go on to the Wall with a few of the other prisoners. The Kingslayer had fallen into a deep depression after Ranma had cut off his sword hand, and had yet to come out of it, though that didn't matter much to Merry, who had never been close with the man. If anything she felt relief that Jaime was being sent to the Wall. Her mother's condition bothered her a lot, but there wasn't anything she could do about it.

Daenerys nodded, leaning up to pat the other woman's thigh before turning to Sunfyre, who she had chosen as her mount for this first day. "I'll see you when we make camp my lords." She said as she vaulted into the saddle, Sunfyre stretching his neck underneath her and warbling in happiness at the idea of flying with her, his cream-colored scales shimmering in the sun.

With that she gave the Valyrian command, "Climb the Sky!" and both Sunfyre and Rhaegon took off from the ground, massive gusts of wind billowing out from underneath their wings. Taking off from a flat surface like this was hard on the dragons, but thanks to the training she had been giving them, they were used to it.

The army marched for the rest of that day, making camp quickly then training in groups before turning in that night before moving off again just before daybreak, with Daenerys riding Rhaegon as Sunfyre rested in one of the carts. Several days of this routine passed before the first report from Tytos' men came in.

Lucas, Tytos' second son brought it himself, along with one of the precious maps that he and his father had been given by Ranma at Riverrun, copied from a larger version that Lord Tully had in his keep.

"We're harassing the scouts and foragers as best we can my lords, but a lot of Stannis' men're old hands at this too. They don't know the terrain as well as us, but we don't know it as well as we did when we were fighting the Lannisters. We're taking losses, not many, but we're not inflicting many either."

"I knew it would be a tough job when I gave it to you and your father Lucas." Ranma said with a nod gesturing at the map. "What can you tell me about Stannis' movements?"

"His army's around here my Lord just on the other side of the border. There's a heavy wood about two days march for his army I think the same that covers the northern and eastern sides of the God's Eye. We're using that as our base for the moment. We'll have ta move back as the army gets closer, but I don't think we're in any danger of being suddenly overrun either. Stannis' men've tried to set up a few ambushes, but his commanders aren't as good as my father at this game."

That was said with a more than a bit of pride in Lucas' voice. Those ambushes could've proven deadly to the skirmishing force, one of which happened in a small village, and another which happened near a copse of trees further south. The first Meera had spotted, pulling back and ambushing the ambushers later when they tried to return to Stannis' army. The second Tytos woodsman's instincts warned him. House Blackwood then turned the ambush onto itself, killing or routing a force of a hundred heavy cavalry that had been stationed in that copse along with the bait, a force of twenty men that had been sent ahead of the army to forage.

Ranma exchanged a grin with Daenerys, who reached across to grab the young man's arm firmly. "Well done." She said sincerely. "That kind of action is precisely why Ranma chose you, your father and Meera for this."

The young man blushed under the praise but went on quickly. "We've been able to sight his main army a few times when Lord, and it's been broken into three segments. My father thinks that's because of hygiene issues though maybe not. All segments're following the Kingsroad, but not very quickly."

Staring at the map thoughtfully Ranma fell silent while Jason spoke up. "Are these three units so far apart we could attack one without the others coming to its aid?"

Both Lucas and Ranma shook his head before Lucas answered for them both. "No my Lord, they're about a normal half-days march between them, but that kind of space can be made up quickly enough at need. Unless you can draw off the middle segment, that may leave one of the other formations vulnerable. It's doubtful though, since I think Lord Tyrell was put in charge of that, we saw the Rose banner flying high over several others there, and from what all my father said, he's not the quickest ta act decisive-like."

The young Blackwood waited a moment as Greatjon and Rickard stopped laughing at his understatement before going on. "Neither my father nor I know the banners flyin' over the third echelon. The first formation is being led personally by Lord Stannis. We saw his banner flying over it, a black stag's head in a burning heart with a crown 'round it's neck."

There were some exclamations of disgust at that, though they'd heard rumors that Stannis had created his own banner before this. No, it was more the way it showcased his new, horrific religion for all to see that drew those exclamations.

"Can you tell me what banners you saw?" Ranma asked.

"I'm afraid not my Lord. I don't have much of a memory for those things, sorry." Lucas shrugged apologetically.

"Can you estimate their numbers?"

Lucas hesitated, then nodded. "I they think somewhere around 30,000 my Lord. Smaller than the Westerlands army was at its height, and much smaller than the Reach force is supposed to be. I think Stannis mauled them badly."

"I need to know more about the composition of Stannis' army, how much of it is from the Reach, how much of it is from the Stormlands. That would hugely impact what kind of tactics Stannis could use in combat." Ranma muttered.

"Could the banners tell you that?" Daenerys asked. "I could fly down there on Rhaegon with one of our Myrishglasses, mark the banners I see them come back.""

"Let's hold that idea in reserve for now." Ranma said looking at her. "Remember, the Red Witch might've been able to figure out a way to attack your dragons in the air, especially given how she attacked the Fish's Scales with those Shadow Warriors to get at you. I don't want to risk that just yet."

Daenerys however knew how Ranma's mind works, and snorted. "But you'll be willing to risk yourself to head down there?"

"Fenris and I can outrun practically anything else that walks on this earth." Ranma said complacently. "We can head down there and come back quickly enough you won't even know we're gone."

"I'll know you were gone." Daenerys said, while Myrcella poked him hard in the back with her toe from where she was laying against Fenris near the back of the tent behind them.

Then Daenerys sighed. "Still, I suppose you're right. Any battle plans we make needs to be made on knowledge of what our enemies are like. And, knowing which lords are in charge of which portions of the Army could tell us a lot about how to defeat them. And what better person than you to see it." She sighed again, then leaned over and kissed him ardently on the lips, ignoring the Lords around them for moment. "But be careful," she ordered after pulling back, staring into Ranma's blue eyes. "That's an order from your queen."

"Of course your Majesty, your will is my command your Majesty, to here is to obey your..." That was as far as Ranma got before Daenerys smacked him upside the head, and Merry once again kicked him in the back while the Lords laughed and jeered.

That very evening Ranma left the army camp, racing South as only he, Jon, Arya and their direwolves could. No other animal had the endurance on the run of a direwolf, and no human who hadn't been trained by Ranma could have kept up with one, nor run at this speed for so long.

They traveled over a hundred leagues that night, and early the next morning Fenris began to smell familiar humans. The direwolf's nose allowed Ranma and Fenris to find where Tytos had encamped his men for the day, though of course not all of them were in the same place. Meera's portion wasn't here, stationed far to the east and south.

Ranma was spotted quickly enough and brought to where Tytos was camped next to a tree. Lord Blackwood stood up quickly almost making to bow before he remembered Ranma's apathy towards such things. Instead he simply reached forward and clasped the younger man's arm firmly. "I'd heard stories of how fast you and the Wolfsworn could move when you had a mind to my Lord, but this is something else entirely!"

"I'm traveling light for now." Ranma said with a laugh then he sobered. "What can you tell me about Stannis' formations?"

That conversation went on for an hour, before Ranma left Tytos' camp, heading forward again. He timed it so that he came upon Stannis' army, or at least the first formation of it at night, then began to write down on a piece of precious parchment the symbols he was seeing on the banners of the camp.

Then he skirted around to the east, heading towards the other two camps, one after another. He noted absently that the first camp was a little further west than the other two, off the Kingsroad entirely sitting along the edge of the forest that marked the northeastern edge of the Gods Eye. I wonder why that is?

OOOOOO

Stannis had long since chosen a Lord to execute, the pious Lord Kellington from the Stormlands. He had been in charge of the scouts over the past few days and had performed abysmally, as Stannis knew he would. The man was not willing to put forth any effort whatsoever for Stannis and his cause, despite having been forced to give his oath of allegiance. House Kellington had been known for generations for its piety and belief in the Seven.

But Stannis had placed several newly inducted Fire Guard in his command disguised as regular troopers. Then when an ambush had been turned on Lord Kellington they had taken the man captive and ridden off with him rather than fight the skirmishers.

Now deep in the woods with the Fire Guard spread out between his current position and his personal echelon's camp, Stannis watched as Melisandre ritually sacrificed the man to the fire. The sight gave him shivers, though he was loathe to admit that it wasn't just disgust he felt. Seeing Melisandre kneeling in front of the fire naked, which she claimed helped her control her visions, while Kellington's flesh continued to burn and sizzle in the flames, was a strangely erotic sight.

He ignored those emotions however, simply waiting to hear what the woman would report. His eyes widened however when she stood up, shrieking like a madwoman. "The Wolf! The Wolf of gold and blue that walks like a man! He is near!"

While Stannis continued to watch astonished Melisandre gestured, her hands entering the fire and not being burned to ash. They touched the man's flaking, sizzling chest, ripping out his heart as the man continued to shriek in the background. She suddenly gestured to one side. The shadows of the pyre began to coalesce forming into a Shadow Warrior, larger and more solid looking than any of the others the woman had created in Stannis' presence before this.

It stood taller than even Gregor Clegane, even though it stooped slightly, its arms longer than even its size could attest. In one hand it held a massive greatsword, larger than any man, even someone of Stannis' stature, could have wielded in one hand. In the other a shield appeared, a tower shield of all things, larger than most men top to bottom.

"Go!" Melisandre screamed. "Hunt the Wolf who moves like a man! He is southeast of us. Do not be seen by any other living man, but find and kill him!" With that Melisandre slumped to her knees again, closing her eyes as her hands moved to her face. She barely spent a spare glance for Stannis, halting him from saying anything, her voice brusque. "Wait my Lord, wait for now! I need to concentrate."

Unused to being so abruptly dismissed Stannis was about to step forward and shake the woman, to demand what was going on when the Shadow Warrior turned, staring at him for a moment before racing off through the woods. Scowling angrily Stannis tamped down his ire and moved to stand beside the woman, staring down at her face for now while in front of him Kellington's body continued to burn sending a smell of cooked flesh through the night air.

OOOOOO

Ranma was putting the final touches to his notes when Fenris began to growl. With a thought Ranma entered the direwolf's mind, using his senses for a second to try to figure out what had set Fenris' hackles to rise. Burn smell, smoke smell, unnatural! Like the scent of an old enemy, the things that attacked the wooden human thing which went on the undrinkable deep water.

That was enough for Ranma to know what was coming, and he pulled out of their connection, Ice quickly appearing in his hand from its sheath on his back. With a bare thought the Valyrian steel of the blade began to glow blue in the night air, and he set himself, staring to where Fenris was staring.

Out of the night of the plains came a Shadow Warrior, larger and more solid looking than any of the ones the two of them had fought for on the Fish's Scales. The moment the magically created monster saw him it roared soundlessly, charging forward, its huge sword raised high.

Ranma snarled like a Fenris, racing forward and smashing his own blade up and into its sword. Fenris raced past him, lunging at the beast.

It blocked Fenris with its tower shield, keeping the direwolf from ripping out its throat with his fangs or claws, both of which suddenly began to glow blue. With literally inhuman strength the Shadow Warrior threw Fenris aside, before twirling just as quickly, bringing his sword around to slice at Ranma's side. Ranma stabbed Ice into the ground, blocking the blow, twirling his body up into the air by his grip on its hilt, lashing out with a kick to the far larger creature's face channeling some ki into his foot for a moment.

The creature backed away rapidly, somehow knowing to be wary of the blue-gold ki light. But now it was between Ranma and Fenris, and the two of them charged forward exploiting that weakness ruthlessly. The Shadow Warrior blocked and parried Ranma's attacks, both ice and his own ki-laden feet or fist, trying to turn himself so that Fenris couldn't get behind them, but it failed.

Fenris leaped onto the thing's back, his fangs biting deep into the shoulder of the arm holding its tower shield. The Shadow Warrior's mouth opened in a silent scream as it threw Fenris off with a wrench, but that arm now hung uselessly at the creature's side. The thing still flailed about with his sword trying to block Ranma, but Ranma parried its greatsword down with a glowing blue-gold fist, wincing as the sword cut into his arm despite his strengthening technique. Using the momentum of that blow Ranma rose once again into the air, then thrust forward with Ice stabbing through the thing's upper chest.

The Shadow Warrior began to fall, but still tried to pull back its sword for one last stab, only stopped by Fenris grabbing the thing's wrist in his mouth, chomping down. Ranma grimly thrust Ice deeper into the thing's chest, until he could see through the thing that the tip of Ice had passed entirely through its body.

Then the thing admitted the only noise it had made in the entire battle, though even now the noise was but a whisper on the wind. "Thank you."

With that it dissipated, and Ranma landed neatly on his feet staring across at Fenris. "I think we've overstayed our welcome, don't you?"

Fenris rolled its eyes in an incredibly human gesture then sped off through the woods without another word. Ranma nodded bending down to pick up his notes from where they had fallen during the battle, before racing after his bonded direwolf.

OOOOOO

"GAAHHHH!" Luckily for Melisandre Stannis was close enough to grab her when she suddenly screamed, falling to the side from where she had been kneeling in front of the pyre. Her eyes rolled back in her head, and she looked almost insensate. Stannis easily lifted the woman into his arms, moving over to a nearby tree where he propped her against its trunk.

With that done he turned to one of her handmaidens, who had been chosen to follow them into the woods for this ritual. The woman had been staring into the pyre, her face almost ecstatic with a religious fervor, but now she was looking on worriedly. "Get me some wine from our saddlebags."

The woman obeyed with alacrity, coming back swiftly with the wineskin handing it to him then stood there looking on worriedly. Stannis grimly forced open Melisandre's clamped mouth, pouring the wine between her lips until she gagged and coughed, spluttering and spitting it out. "What happened?" he growled.

Melisandre coughed again, then stared up at him, tried to push him away from her, but Stannis held her against the tree easily. "The Wolf, the Wolf who walks like a man, Ranma Stark! He was near, somewhere close to the third echelon's camp, towards the east."

Stannis frowned, wondering if he could send runners back there in enough time to ambush the youth, but from the reports he'd been getting, well rumors were more accurate since they'd started to come near the Riverlands/Crownlands border, he doubted that was possible, especially not at night. And I'd rather not lose any more of the men I could trust on such a venture. No doubt the Blackwood men we've been fighting recently are out there just waiting for an opportunity like that.

Aloud he asked "I take it that your Shadow Warrior did not prevail?"

"No my Lord it did not." She replied tartly, yet in a far weaker tone than she would normally have used. "It should have moved faster than any human warrior could've kept up with, it should have slaughtered both the Wolf-Man and his beast. But somehow they are able to fight against my Shadowbound. It was not just the dragon's fire that saw off our first attempt to capture the Stormborn."

Stannis scowled, but didn't otherwise respond to that, wondering already what Ranma had been down here to do. Scout obviously, but what did he learn? Our formations. I'll have to change them up for the march from now on. Push the third echelon ahead of the first and second, then put myself in the center, but with the second echelon perhaps out to one side?

"I see. Did your creature at least injure them?"

"No my Lord it didn't."

"And what did your visions report before you became aware of his presence?"

Melisandre had to concentrate on that for a moment, the blue-gold image of the Stark man had filled her vision almost from the start, but she had discerned a few things before that. "The Army of the Starks is moving towards what I believe is the city of Duskindale, Azor Ahai. Yet from that city I saw another army arriving from the water, men with golden skulls on their banners, and a fourth dragon, young but still able to fly and be used."

"The Golden Company and a dragon? I wonder if this is some Blackfyre pretender come to try his luck, or something more." Stannis frowned. "Hmmpf, I had hoped that Seaworth would be able to catch them in the Bay or east of it, but I suppose he was pulled out of position chasing down Viserys."

At the mention of Davos, Melisandre scowled internally. The man was one of very few Stannis would listen to and respected implicitly, and had almost always been a voice against her influence with him. She was thankful Davos was no longer with them, and hoped her news would possibly start to make a chink in Stannis' belief in the man. "I cannot tell you anything about that, Azor Ahai. But I saw another army marching from the Bay of Crabs, from a town with a maiden hovering above it."

Stannis suddenly frowned, then laughed. "Very clever Stark, but not quite clever enough! Hah, he wanted to get me chasing after him, then move aside and let Viserys and I battle before he came in to defeat the victor. A neat plan, too neat to work in real life especially with a fourth army in the field, one which I doubt he saw coming. Now however, his maneuverability will soon be sharply curtailed, and I might be able to pin him against the Golden Company and Viserys. So long as you are certain you can deal with their dragons at any rate."

"I can my Lord. The blessing of R'hllor will allow me to control any fire I see, though it will take a lot of concentration at any distance. I could even turn their fire back onto the dragons, possibly burn them and their riders."

"A sound tactic." Stannis said approvingly. "Is that all?"

"My visions had already begun to turn north my Lord before they were completely overwhelmed by the presence of the wolf who walks like a man. There was a sense of urgency there! We are running out of time!"

"Then I suppose you should start creating your Shadow Warriors now. Enough of them would make any battle go much faster after all."

Melisandre stared up at him angrily, thumping the ground with one fist in a show of anger that she would never normally allow herself, but what she wanted to do was walk off angrily and she couldn't. She felt as weak as a kitten right now. "I will do so as soon as I am able my Lord. So long as you understand that we, that all Westeros is running out of time! Whatever happens with this campaign we must start north within the next month! Or else we won't arrive in time to stop whatever disaster will occur."

Stannis scowled, but nodded. "I understand your concerns." He said in a tone that made it clear he didn't, but was willing to humor Melisandre given the fact that her powers were very obviously real, which meant her concerns might be as well. "But I refuse to let Ranma Stark behind us. He at least must be dealt with before we head north."

Grimly determined the priestess of R'hllor pulled herself up using the tree has a backrest and waving her arms towards her returning follower. "Then we will start tonight my Lord."

Throughout that night several dozen crates were carried out of the second echelon's camp and into the woods, along with over 100 unconscious prisoners, just as many Fire Guard, and every acolyte that Melisandre still retained. Only a quarter of those retainers would return with only half the Guard, while not one prisoner was ever seen alive again.

The next day rumors would abound as to what went on that night, where the prisoners had gone or what had happened between Melisandre's retainers and the guards. But the first echelon was composed of those men who are most wedded to Stannis' cause, and the rumors would eventually subside while on the march. Yet they would not disappear, and more than one man began to wonder precisely what sort of King they or their lords had chosen to follow.

OOOOOO

Kevan Lannister stood unseeing at the window of his brother's study, staring down from the Rock towards the city of Lannisport. He had been standing there for hours now, ever since opening the missive sent by raven from the Golden Tooth. But it had not come from House Lefford, no it had come from the conquerors of possibly the most important castle outside the Rock itself in all the Westerlands. The Riverlands had taken the Golden Tooth under the direction of the new royal House, Stargaryen.

How did they do it? He thought to himself, not for the first time over the past few hours. How did they take the Golden Tooth so easily? Even if they could get around it somehow with a full army they couldn't have taken it by siege this quickly, the Golden Tooth is as defensible from the west as it is from the east!

But that part of the message was but the icing on the poisonous cake that was the rest of the message. My brother dead. Even now the thought didn't seem to register emotionally inside Kevan. Tywin had always dominated his life, always controlled everything and everyone around him, or at least given the impression he was doing so. Not only that, but the army has been smashed. The list of Lords dead makes for incredibly grim reading.

Kevan was a bit of a historian, and knew the losses from all of the wars that the Westerlands had taken part of by heart. And in this one war the Westerlands had lost more Lords and men than in any single war before by far. Most of the time lords and heirs are captured then ransomed back but this, this Wolf boy doesn't seem to play that game.

"You're still staring out the window, I would've thought you'd have started to actually do something by now." Said a female voice from behind him.

Kevan turned slowly to stare at Genna, his sister. One eyebrow raised and he actually essayed a small smirk. "I notice you're not in mourning colors any longer Genna."

The woman scoffed and Kevan could almost see that she was trying to fight the urge to spit to one side. "Please," She scoffed. "You know that there was no love lost between me my husband and I. And with the Freys no longer powerful enough for our marriage to mean anything, well..." she shrugged.

In response Kevan shivered at the way Genna was so blasé about having poisoned her husband. Still that was Genna for you, she always tended to speak her mind and go her own way. Or at least as much as she could get away with. Tywin had terrified her of course, but then again he had terrified everyone in the family, not because they feared him physically, but because his personality was so dominating. "That's nice..." he said slowly knowing that Genna would read how uncomfortable he was with the topic.

She scoffed again. Moving quicker than most would've given a woman of her size credit she came towards him, pulling him into a rough embrace for a second before plucking the message out from between his fingers and turning away. While she read it Genna moved back, pulling a chair around the Lord's desk with a loud squeal as it rattled along the stone of the room before plopping into it and actually putting her feet up on Tywin's desk. All of this while wearing a skirt.

For a moment Kevan simply gawked, there was something so bizarre about that sight, so disrespectful, that it took his breath away. But then again Tywin's dead isn't he? Kevan sighed and pulled out Tywin's own chair and sat in it, feeling very uncomfortable doing so, knowing now that he was Lord Lannister rather than simply acting in his brother's stead.

The message was well-written, to the point and utterly damning to their families power base. It laid out the bare bones of the campaign in the Riverlands, listing the number of dead lords and heirs, with only a few still missing. It then went on to the trials, trials for lords, hell even a Lord Paramount in a time of war! And of course, it told of how Tywin had been found guilty of treason and war crimes, then executed on the spot.

After that, it had laid out the reparations the Lannisters would need to pay to get Kevan's sons back, and the fact that the Westerlands was being broken up into smaller 'duchies'. Though it neglected to mention what in the way of incentives the new 'royal house' offered them. There had to be something of course, though given the major House's anger at the disaster Tywin had led them into, it might not have been much. Even so, Kevan could guess which Houses would jump at the chance to rule their lands with only a distant king to answer to rather than House Lannister.

The Serret-Lydden duchy, which those families, being the most powerful remaining houses and allied to several smaller in the area. House Crakehall, again not overly weakened but facing the Reach forces, and territory to its north to expand into. House Brax, badly weakened and in the mountains relatively near the Golden Tooth would grasp any way to remain neutral with both hands.

House Banefort might as well, they had never really cared for being ruled by the Rock, and the lands separating that of Banefort and Payne from the rest of the Westerlands, which meant reining them in would be tough. Worse, those Houses were supplying Addam Marbrand and his invasion force, so Kevan would need to tread very lightly there.

Prester... possibly would remain loyal, though Kevan doubted it. They hadn't sent many men to war, but they also looked do gain quite a lot of land if they agreed to the 'duchy' idea from the houses that had been wiped out in the war so far.

All in all, we'll be left alone, bereft of friends though not penniless thankfully, at least for a while anyway. He remained silent while Genna read the note, watching as she then put it down and turned to him, her emerald eyes cold. "So what are you going to do?" She asked bluntly.

"Do about which part of that gigantic piece of offal?" Kevan asked, buying time more than anything else.

"Don't come over the idiot with me!" Genna shook her head. "You might've always followed Tywin, but I know there's a brain inside of that skull brother. And you're as pragmatic as Tywin ever was, if a little slower to taking violent actions. So, what are you going to do? You know some of our family members are going to push for us to try and fight this don't you? And the only way to keep the Westerlands intact now is by force of arms. None of the Lords that will be forming these 'duchies' of the Stark-Targaryens will willingly join us. They've lost family members, some have lost their Lords or heirs or simply power, and the lesser Houses are practically gone! At least, if this list of dead is to be believed."

She paused a moment looking at him. "Do we believe it?"

Intelligent though she was, Genna did not have any resources outside the Rock for news. She was however quick, and almost up to Cersei's skill when it came to understanding political maneuvers, so understood that the Westerlands were no more. The country that name signified had ended the moment ravens arrived at the disparate castles they had been sent to from the Golden Tooth. If, that was, the news they brought was real and not some kind of trick which would be found out in the fullness of time.

"It's true," Kevan said with a sigh. "News of the beginning of the disaster reached me before the raven message. We were indeed that badly mauled, and Tywin at the very least is dead. The news of that disaster already reached the common folk in Lannisport. The March of the Wolf King is being sung in practically every tavern in the city! Tywin wasn't exactly a well-loved individual." He finished dryly.

Genna barked a laugh, knowing that to be only too true, but her mind was on more important matters. "And our monetary base?"

He sighed gesturing over his shoulder towards the window and down towards the city. "The Ironborn did a number on the docks and the fires they started did worse. I've been going over the numbers since that assault, and ordering the weapons we sent with the fleet and repairing that damage has badly eroded our gold reserves here in the Rock."

"We couldn't raise mercenaries enough to force the other Lords into compliance again?" Genna asked, playing Stranger's advocate. It was obvious from her face that she wasn't in favor of that idea.

"The two mercenary units that we had on retainer are gone. I doubt there are 10 men alive from either of them, either on the southern front or the Riverlands. Tywin executed Vargo Hoat for disobeying orders, and that news reached us long before anything else in the Riverlands occurred, so I doubt we could even get any mercenary group to take our money after that, and we'd need thousands of them."

"Even if we could pay them, it would be half a year at best before they could arrive here in the Westerlands. And we'd have to pay for their upkeep and their transportation! We could pay for it, but doing so would bankrupt us, and we don't have the transportation! Or even a way to get in touch with enough mercenary bands!"

Kevan rubbed at his forehead. "And besides, what kind of army would relying on mercenaries or even levy's make? The Northern-Riverlands army just smashed an army whose experience and leadership no new army could match. No, we would simply be throwing good money after bad, and I doubt we would survive it if he did."

He looked hard at Genna. "But all that is really beside the point, since this is all supposing we would be willing to forget the fact they have hostages. Including two of my sons!"

"The forces we sent to take the Iron Islands?" Genna asked, ignoring the bit about hostages. Those hostages might be important to Kevan, but they wouldn't be to the rest of the family. The only one that might was Daven, and even then many would look on him as a rival anyway.

"Too small to make a difference on the mainland, and already landed on Pyke, or at least I believe they will have by this point. The last report I had from Banefort said that." He sighed. "House Banefort might take up the offer that was sent to them, but I hope to keep that line of discussion open even so, and since they hadn't lost many men that's possible. The only other House we can still count on to be loyal to us is House Marbrand at this point. All the other surviving Houses will leave our side like rats leaving a sinking ship."

Genna nodded agreement, but she was looking at Kevan worriedly. "You know we're going to face internal pressure from the rest of our family to do something. The days of the Lannister's walking in step are gone, and there will be a lot of pressure on us to try to do something despite the fact that our options are so limited."

"I know." Kevan said with a nod. "But we'll have to silence those voices, and I will say this now: if anyone acts in such a way as to endanger my boys I'll order their deaths myself, even if I must become a kinslayer!"

He stared hard at Genna, who nodded, her face showing approval for the strength of his stance.

"The time of the Lannister's holding the whip hand in the Westerlands and in the rest of Westeros is over, and the sooner we resign ourselves to that fact the better will be. With Lannisport we'll still be a power to reckon with, the first among equals at least in the Westerlands, that will have to do for our family's ego."

He sighed again putting his head in his hands. "This Wolf King has two dragons to call upon. The Rock's never been tested against dragons, and frankly if the song's to be believed he's done so many incredible things in the course of this campaign of his Riverlands I don't think even the Rock would be safe. No, we build our power base up again, and we by the Seven do nothing to threaten my son's treatment in their hands. We be happy with what we have, or else we'll have nothing."

OOOOOO

Asha stared at the Ironborn longship that was closing on the small strip of land she had made her refuge for the past few days. "I wonder where this ship comes from, and what happened with the battle." She tapped a large makeshift bundle at her side, smirking at what it contained, and what it might mean for the future. "The victors truly did write the story, but such can be overwritten eventually. Especially in times of great upheaval, just like this one."

It was evident the ship was stopping here to search for freshwater, and she remained in hiding watching the men come ashore until she spotted the captain, Thereon Harlaw. She knew the man, one of the lazier captains of the Ironborn, and one of the fattest men she'd ever seen, and somewhat dull, even in comparison to other Ironborn captains she could name. The Reader however was more than capable of doing this thinking for him, and his loyalty to his lord had never wavered.

Even so she was cautious, coming out of the scrub brush above the party heading deeper into the island towards the small pool of freshwater that had accumulated from the rainfall that was almost constant now. She waited until the man was close by, then spoke sharply, reaching down with the butt of the makeshift spear she had created since arriving here from the wood of one of her oars.

The butt of it smacked into the fat captain's head, and he turned quickly, far quicker than Asha thought he could if she was honest. She glared down at the man and said sharply. "'Hail Thereon, be you still loyal to Lord Rodrick?"

For a moment the man's face was blank then his rotund face split into a wide pumpkin grin. "Asha Greyjoy! We thought you dead!"

"I nearly was thanks to treachery among my own forces." Asha growled, while all around her the man's crew stared at her in astonishment. "I was stabbed in the back, literally. Then I had to choose between dying with a sword in my guts or diving into the ocean. I chose the ocean, and survived everything the Drowned God could throw at me since."

More than one man shifted uncomfortably on his feet at her disparaging tone when speaking of the Drowned God, but more of them grinned at her spirit. Thereon however simply cocked his head in shock. "Why would someone betray you like that?"

"I don't know." Asha frowned thoughtfully, unwilling to mention the fact that her hated uncle had been named in that attack. No, she would wait and take her vengeance on the man if he dared show himself in her presence. "Maybe I angered the captains of those ships in the past or something, we're a fractious lot as you know. What happened with the battle, what's been going on since?"

"The greenlanders have landed on Pyke." Thereon said with a shrug. "The Reader's worried about somethin' they're doin', don't know what. The fleet's been smashed, Harlaw barely has 12 ships now, and we're the strongest of the islands at this point by a lot. A few of the captains've tried ta attack the Greenlanders since that battle, and had their ships sunk for their troubles, so the Reader ordered all o' our own ships back to defend Harlaw.

"Smart of him," Asha murmured, nodding her head. If she was the Reader she'd have cut her losses to. After all, my father's away, and they don't have enough ships to truly guard all of the Island's coasts. Maybe we can raid their supply lines, but that's doubtful too, with Banefort so close. The Greenlanders have the wind behind them now, it'll take something major to stop them.

"Any word about my ship or its crew?" she asked aloud.

Thereon shook his head. "Gone with all hands in the battle."

Asha winced at that, her fists clenching as she thought about her crew and her ship, her lovely Black Wind, which had been more her home than that old drafty castle on Pyke had ever been, more even than Ten Towers. After a moment though, she pushed her grief aside. "All right, let's get out of here than. I need to talk to the Reader."

She frowned thoughtfully. "With as few warriors of we've still got, we might have to strike a deal with the damn Greenlanders, but if they don't want to deal..." she smiled thinly, patting the heavy bundle at her side once more. "I might have a few surprises in store for them."

OOOOOO

Viserys soared through the air on top of Balerion, urging the beast down towards the ships flying the flag of the Royal Navy, the hated burning heart with the stag's head inside it. The Royal Navy had caught up to his fleet just as they came within sight of Maidenpool, sinking four of his captured war galleys at the back of the fleet before he could take to Balerion. Now it was time for vengeance!

"Dive!" He shouted aloud in Valyrian, "Attack with flame!" With that and with his grip on the stirrups turning the beast towards his chosen target the two of them dove down.

Though still young for the breed, Balerion was a massive beast, and quite mad. Viserys' training had been harsh, unfeeling, with every defiance met with pain, every attempt to break his chains or attack Viserys met with more, every act of anger or fury against others rewarded. But it was effective. Balerion roared, then a gout of flame seared out of its mouth and down towards the target ship, smashing into the crows' nest and setting both it and all of the canvas of the war galley alight in a single pass, along with the lookout, who had not seen them coming.

Balerion pulled up swiftly, using the updraft from the flames before continuing its run towards another war galley while behind them men screamed as they tried desperately to contain the fire. But war galleys were susceptible to fire at the best of times, with so much tar, wood, and rope all around. Though they would fight valiantly, those sailors would not succeed, Viserys knew it.

Nor would the sailors of the next ship succeed in staving off Balerion. Arrows flew, but they fell well short. Another gout of flame shot out, catching the main mast of the second war galley. The mast went up like a torch, the fire spreading to the canvas down to the deck, and everywhere quickly while Viserys crowed in delight. "On to the next!" He shouted gleefully, then switching to Valyrian. "On to the next!"

The third war galley was ready for them, and not only its archers but the scorpions set along the fore of the ship tried to range on them. But they couldn't quite turn far enough, with Viserys and Balerion attacking them amidships. The archers did better, and for the first time Balerion had to begin evasive maneuvers. Even so, only a few clattered against the dragon's hide, bouncing off harmlessly. Not a one of them hit its more vulnerable wings.

In response, Balerion's flame smashed into the ship. It yet again took out a mast before the tongue of flame turned downwards as Balerion arced his neck in the same direction to impact the actual deck, setting several men there on fire. They died screaming while their fellows tried frantically to put out the fires.

But Balerion at last paid for his success so far. Another war galley was close enough to their angle of flight to take Viserys and his mount under fire as Balerion pulled away with its main weapons. One of the scorpions of that ship nearly hit Balerion square on. He frantically dodged upwards, but the barb of the bolt still caught him in the tail, making a small, but deep gash there, causing Balerion to scream in fury and pain.

For a moment it was all he could do to control Balerion, the pain from its tail causing the beast to thrash about in midair, almost throwing Viserys off entirely. Viserys held on for dear life shouting Valyrian commands in as commanding a tone as he could make sawing at the reins at the same time. "Up, up climb the sky! Climb the sky!" Thankfully that ship was the only one that could range on them at that moment.

Balerion beat its massive wings gaining altitude, but on its back Viserys scowled angrily at how willful the creature was. It followed his commands, but that brief moment of panic from the pain had almost undone all of their previous bonding!

Below them the Royal Navy had backed off from the port of Maidenpool, spreading out so the fires of the ships already attacked couldn't reach the rest of the fleet. Through a spyglass he had taken from the Martells, Viserys saw all the scorpions of those war galleys were now elevated, to shoot up into the air as far as possible. Normally that would allow the ships to use arcing fire, shooting over obstacles between them and their target, like this, they could become deadly to a dragon trying to attack them.

If that scorpion had hit Balerion it would've killed him! His scales might have hardened enough to protect him against arrows, but against scorpion bolts? No. That will take years yet. "Back!" He shouted, turning the black dragon's head away and heading towards Maidenpool. "We've done enough."

For a moment the beast craned its neck around to look his rider in the eye. Its ire was up, and small gouts of flame began to appear at the corners of its mouth. But Viserys was unmoved, and continued to pull at the reins jerking his mount's head back and around towards Maidenpool. He thumped its sides with his boots, shouting aloud. "Back to home, food!"

It was that last word that probably caused the beast to come out of its blood fugue and it went willingly down towards the town. The two of them landed in the courtyard of the small keep of House Mooton.

All around him the men of Mooton stared in dread, fear or happiness Viserys did not care. At the same time his own men were already investing the keep, and Arianne was moving towards him even now, several dozen men behind her with the chains necessary to keep Balerion from going out of control, and two others bearing between them a whole elk.

Viserys remained in the saddle for now, waiting until the food was in front of Balerion before getting off him. The dragon chomped down, ignoring the now familiar feeling of the chains being lashed around its limbs, though it growled and snapped at a man who got too close, nearly biting his arms off before they could put the chain around its neck. Only Viserys pulling back on the reins that were still on the dragon prevented the man's death.

"Enough! Food!" Viserys shouted in Valyrian, and Balerion once more turned to regard him balefully, before going back to its food. Quickly the men put the final chain around his neck backing away hurriedly. Viserys left the saddle now, moving over to Arianne. That's right Balerion snap and snarl, show your power to both our enemies and our allies, let them fear the return of the Targaryen Dynasty!

"My king." Said his wife, leaning forward to kiss him lightly on the cheek and taking his hand in hers. "Magnificently fought! Your actions saved our entire fleet!"

It hadn't quite, they had lost nearly all of their stolen war galleys and another four hundred men, but it had certainly made the Royal Navy back off for now. Most of the fleet had already been within the port of Maidenpool however, guarded by its ballista and heavy catapults. The Royal fleet could still invade, but it would take severe losses against those set defenses. And she doubted it had the manpower or will to oust them if the fight spread into the town.

"The debarkation process is continuing." She said gesturing to her cousin Elia. "By your leave, the Lords will handle that, while Elia serves as liaison. You and I should meet with the Lord of the Keep and get some information from him, as Nymeria does from our family's contacts here. I know that Lord Mooton is loyal to your family, but his competency is somewhat questionable, so we might have to ginger up his ideas personally."

"Of course my dear." Viserys said, rather more mellow than normal, the joy of combat having filled him for a moment. "Let's see to that."

Lord Mooton was as obsequious and yellow-bellied as could be asked, but he was surprisingly more competent than Arianne had thought. "Your supplies are ready my Lord, as is a baggage train. My smiths aren't the best, so we haven't been able to supply you with as many arrowheads as I had hoped, but your coats and tents and other supply needs are ready. You will even have enough food for at least a week on the march, if you forage at least some of your army. Spears we have in abundance as well, but I apologize for the failure in production of swords and shields."

"Those at least we have brought enough with us." Viserys said magnanimously, sipping at a magnificent vintage from the Arbor that the Lord had kept in his cellar for years. A resplendent meal was laid out in front of them, and he was feeling even mellow than he had after the battle. "No single town can specialize in everything after all ."

The area around Maidenpool and over and down toward Butterwell was somewhat famed for its cheeses along with other cattle products. The fishery was also decent enough here, though not quite as good as deeper into the Bay of Crabs in terms of crabs. "So long as you were able to provide us with enough autumn gear, that will be enough. Gulltown was depressingly unhelpful in that regard."

"Hack, Hack. What can you tell us about what is going on?" Asked Jorah Mormont, while next to him Lord Grafton scowled at the dig to his town. Jorah looked much the worse for wear, and about two stones lighter than he had back in Pentos. He had fallen ill from something he had caught from a whore in one of their stopovers in the Broken Arm, and had only recently begun to recover. Despite this, he was still a respected leader of men and had requested to be a part of this discussion, the only war council he felt well enough to attend since long before they reached Dorne.

"I received a report from the so-called Wolf King my Lord." Lord Mooton replied, making certain that his voice was as contemptuous as possible. "As well as your sister. They are marching down to Duskendale, intending to either sack or take the city as a prelude to fighting Stannis, thinking it is the, they call it the logistical lynchpin for his army, odd words but understandable. Closer to home, I regret to say that there have been issues of bandits in my lands, no doubt rabble from the Westerlands army that have somehow found their way here. I have lost several dozen of my reavers and thief-takers already. I am afraid, I don't know what you'll run into out there and at this point."

"As if bandits could trouble a full army." Viserys scoffed. He frowned then thoughtfully. "We'll head out in a few days then, my men could use some time in a port, and our horses need to get their land legs under them. That will allow us to figure out where we wish to go."

"Surely we should make for Harroway my Lord?" Asked Elia. "Let the stag and direwolf fight it out between them, while we take the Riverlands from behind them."

"And let them think we're cowards!?" said Viserys sneering a little. "No, the Riverlands and every other nation in Westeros will capitulate once the two pretenders to the throne have been dealt with. I don't want us bogged down in small war after small war. Smash their armies entirely, not just a few towns here and there. Kill their leaders and make an example of them. That will stop others from trying to emulate their rebellion."

"I agree my lord, but we must be cautious." Jorah spoke aloud. "We do not have a large army, we need to use our advantage in horse archers and pike against their weaknesses, not take losses in any kind of 'fair' fight." Around him the Dornish lords all nodded firmly, having no desire to cripple their Houses for no return.

With that the talk turns to other things, with most of it dealing with the events in the Riverlands as Lord Mooton knew them. This included the size of Ranma's army, how loyal the Riverlords were, the latest news of battles in the Riverlands and elsewhere.

Later as they were being led to their rooms for the evening Nymeria Sand moved up to Viserys' side behind Arianne murmuring. "If you would my Lord, I think we should leave a token force here to make certain that Lord Mooton does not make any deals behind our back. He is..."

"He's as spineless as the cheese made on his land." Viserys replied dryly. "I know that. He's a snake, but a useful one just as you are my dear. Though in comparison he is a grass snake whereas you are a true viper's daughter."

Nymeria smiled thinly, eager to head out into the town and meet with her contacts here. She hoped that some of them would have news of her father's campaign in the Stormlands, though she doubted it. With war as spread as it was, getting news from one agent to another was difficult, even with their reliance on trained doves to do so.

"With your leave my Lord," said Petyr, who had been silent for most of the evening. "I could command such a force?"

"Your courage does you credit." Viserys sneered. "No, I want you where I can see you Littlefinger. Indeed, you and your Valermen, most particularly the levy force, will be at the front of the battle. I trust you will comport yourself well?"

Petyr fell silent with a graceful nod of his head, though internally he was angry. He had wanted to stay here to learn what he could of events elsewhere, and possibly put some distance between him and Viserys, who he knew now was quite as sadistic as Joffrey had been, only more controlled. Petyr, for all his other faults, was not a sadist or a madman, and had no desire to remain in Viserys employ any longer than he could.

But Viserys was so distrustful of him that he was constantly under watch, and of course Viserys would not allow him to remain behind. With an internal sigh, Petyr knew he couldn't get away from his current employer just yet, but he could set up a fallback plan. Surely one of his men could remain behind if he could not...

OOOOOO

Davos scowled, listening to half a mind as one of his captain went over the days' losses while he stared at the port of Maidenpool from the raised aft portion of his ship. When the man finished, he shook his head. "Pull the fleet back-a-ways and spread us out, say fifty leagues or so. We'll cordon the city, but I don't want us close enough so that damn Targaryen butcher can simply fly his black terror out and burn a few ships every day. No, as long as we can keep the Dornish army from pulling up stake, we've done our part. I want no more men to die in this chase."

OOOOOO

A few days had passed since Ranma returned to the army, with nothing much to show for it save the distance the army had covered. The Shadow Warrior's attack, and the fact it meant Stannis would know Ranma had seen his army, meant any information he had gleaned was unusable. The creature's strength and speed, which was almost on par with his own, had come as a shock and a warning for him and the Wolfsworn.

It was raining right now, and while the march was continuing, Ranma and his commanders had pulled off to the side of the road once again to meet with a lone rider from the South. Lucas had again been chosen as his father and

Meera's messenger, but the past few days had obviously taken a toll on the young man. "We're beginning to lose more men my Lord," he said grimly. "We're still killing two or three for every one of us we lose, but they've replaced whoever's in charge of their scouts, and this one knows his business almost as well as Lady Meera or my father."

While Lucas had doubted Meera's ability to lead and even fight before this, that opinion had faded since this campaign began. Her skill at blending into the land was phenomenal, and her speed on foot was noteworthy, as was her skill with bow and trident.

"Does your father want to pull your men back?" Ranma asked.

"Not yet my Lord. Their army is still pretty much blind, and the smallfolk aren't helping. Lady Alayaya understated their hatred for Stannis, Stannis has been forced to hang several dozen smallfolk from different villages to force their neighbors to provide his army with food, and he's slowly losing control of some of the Stormlands infantry he uses to bring in supplies."

Lucas spat to one side angrily though his grin was fierce as he went on. "Those are my favorite missions to lead my Lord, attacking those foraging parties. Give it another two weeks or more, and all three of that army's units're going to be feelin' the pinch."

"Excellent." Ranma nodded, though he and Daenerys were not happy to hear about the depredations upon the smallfolk. "Make certain you note down the tabards of the houses involved in that kind of crap for later however. If all goes well, we might need to have another round of trials. Anything else?"

"Er, that was the good news my lord. The bad news, the real reason my father sent me to consult with you, is... well... I don't know how they knew so quickly my Lord, but Stannis' army cut northeast practically the very next day after you and Fenris came down and had your bit of adventure."

"Maybe the Red Witch truly can tell Stannis things thanks to her magic powers." Daenerys said frowning thoughtfully. "That unfortunately gives more credence to your concern that she could somehow neutralize my little ones."

Greatjon laughed. "Your little ones aren't so 'little' anymore lady." He said, looking up into the sky where Sunfyre and Rhaegon flew above the army, happily moving through the air about one another. They were playing a game of tag Daenerys and Merry had thought up. A bright pennant was tied to Rhaegon's tail which Sunfyre tried grab with his claws without hurting his brother.

"Still it is worrisome, this magic..." Greatjon shuddered. "Give me a good sword fight any day."

"Ah, but remember the old saying my Lord, a sword in any wizard's bowels will still ruin his day." Said Dacey from nearby, smiling grimly.

"Whatever the case my lord, they are cutting across our route, and making up a lot of distance on the army despite our own speed. Plus, and this is worse I think, their own pace has increased recently. Though they are getting close to Butterwell, we might be able to have Tristan and his force sortie after the first two units pass over his land."

After sending Cley to fetch his map and looking at the points where the three disparate forces of Stannis were marching, Ranma nodded. "A point, but I think we need to do something better to slow them down. We can't face Stannis' Army and then expect to be able to face Viserys and his without pulling back to Harroway for rest and refit." Even the march was taking its toll on the men's equipment, their boots, leather and camping gear in particular thanks to the rain and mud, despite most of it being gear prepared to face autumn.

"And I've already gotten reports that ships were seen nearing Maidenpool." said Alayaya grimly waving a small message as several of her listeners looked astonished. "I was able to suborn a branch of the Master of Whisper's spy ring my Lords. Darry was one of their collection points."

"Whatever we're paying you it is not enough my lady." Said Jason laughing lightly, though his eyes were grim. "Do you think we have enough space to move out of the way and let them have at it here my Lord?"

"Stannis is too smart for that, and this Red Witch was proven too good at anticipating things. Now, Stannis would probably simply back off, keep his forces to our west and south, force us to fight Viserys first then come in afterwards to pin us against the Bay of Crabs somewhere."

He clapped his hands together like a sound of thunder. "Let's get this organized my lords. Greatjon, Rickard, you and my lady are in charge of the army, keep it moving on its current route."

"We'll cross into the Crownlands in another day at this pace." Jason warned. House Buckwell will have no love for us."

"Doesn't matter." Ranma said with a shrug. "They try to fight us, we'll smash them in the open field, but I'm not going to try to assault any castles anytime soon."

"Thank goodness for that," Roger murmured from where he was sitting nearby on his horse.

Several moments later he was groaning to his wife. "I spoke too soon didn't I?"

"Shut up and ride," Osha growled.

The two of them, a force of a thousand light cavalry and seven hundred archers were moving southwest towards House Butterwell's land, hoping to meet up with the force Ranma had sent to that castle under Tristan and then start either hitting the forward units or attack the baggage trains of Stannis' army if possible to slow up their march. The archers were on spare horses, indeed the force had practically every spare horse the army had, and were riding hard.

The force also included every Wolfsworn still with the army and of course Fenris. Daenerys had wanted to join them on her dragons, but she and Ranma feared what the Red Witch could do to them without some other dragon around to draw her attention.

Having to travel with the rest of the army obviously slowed the Wolfsworn down, but within three days they were met by another one of Lord Blackwood's man, but the news he shared was not good. "Your Majesty, Stannis has sent a force ahead, it's besieging Butterwell now. The rest of his army seems to have slowed down, and are turning aside to head further east."

Ranma frowned, wondering why Stannis would have sent a force ahead to siege Butterwell and turn his army further westward if he was trying to bring Ranma's army to battle. Unless... The Red Witch could have told him that my army was making for the road between Maidenpool and Duskendale. In that case he might be pushing to cut us off, possibly because he knows someplace along it perfect for an ambush. Could she have also warned him that I had invested Butterwell with some of my men as well? Or worse? No, don't fall into that trap Ranma, they're not omniscient. Still...

"Could it be a trap?" he said aloud. "Trying to draw our scouts out of hiding to defend the castle, or destroy a fast reaction force like ours?"

"I think that's well within Stannis' ability." Roger said with a nod. Hathan and the others nodded agreement.

"In that case," Ranma said grimly. "I suggest we go in spring this trap. 'If you've prepared a trap for a fox, you're not going to have prepared for the direwolf.'"

"I thought that phrase was, 'if you've trapped a fox you're not going to prepare for the bear?'" Dacey said laughing while the others all chuckled as well.

"I'm King" Ranma huffed airily, looking down his nose at her. "I think I can change one old phrase, can't I?"

They rested for the rest of that day before marching through the night to be within striking range of the Castle of Butterwell before resting for the rest of the night. They found that the castle was indeed under attack.

Fenris and Ranma moved forward with some of the scouts to see, and it wasn't a fake assault at least. A force of several thousand men had surrounded the castle, exchanging arrow fire with the defenders over the moat that surrounded it.

"We'll attack at dawn, sweeping across their flank here, then moving on." Ranma said, motioning toward a makeshift map he had made on the mud of the copse of trees they were hiding in for now. "We hit them hard and fast, roll them up now before they can finish any earthworks. But I want scouts all around now and during the battle. I want to make certain that this isn't a trap for us."

"You're the one that said this was a trap already for me and mine." said Tytos, who had met up with them a few hours ago, while Ranma was moving forward to inspect the positions of the force around Butterwell. Even after more than a week and a half of skirmishing he was still looking hale and hearty.

"Yes, but there's no reason to get complacent."

Despite Ranma's worries the night passed uneventfully. Just before dawn, Ranma and his men it broke camp, the light cavalry getting back into the saddle and the Wolfsworn preparing themselves, while the archers prepared to follow up the charge. Tytos and his scouts also prepared themselves, waiting for any opportunities to arise to snipe at the enemy.

The light cavalry and Wolfsworn road through copse in the waning night until they were on its edge nearest Butterwell, close enough to charge at the besieging army's camp. Ranma nodded all around and charged forward. The rest of the force went into a canter. Then when they reached about 400 yards away and the first shouts of alarm were raised from the tired men on guard of the camp, the horses broke into a gallop.

Surprise was almost total, with only a force of around fifty men able to gather together to form any kind of resistance. The light cavalry rode into the army's camp, swords flashing and cutting down dozens, then hundreds of men, throwing torches into various tents, or at barrels of food or other things here and there throughout the camp.

Looking around Ranma nodded grimly, cutting down one man with Ice and smashing another aside with a blow to the face. Neither man would die, but they would be crippled. In an attack like this none of the defenders had a chance against him even if they would normally and the other men would kill enough. Ranma had so much blood on his hands already he wasn't in any hurry to add more.

Fenris had no such compulsion, and was roaring through camp, killing with impunity. Suddenly he stopped, staring at a crate set nearby in the open, far away from any tent. Ranma felt his worry, and pushed through the melee to join him staring at the crate. Looking around he grabbed one of the panicking men nearby pulling him close and smacking him upside the head pointing at the crate "What's in here?"

The man gulped and tried to get away, but Ranma's grip on his arm was like steel. "The Witch's warriors, no one knows what she does, how she gets them but..."

"Shadow Warriors!" Ranma scowled, letting the man go, before smacking him unconscious with an almost gentle backhand. He stared up at the sun than around at the camp before staring hard at Fenris. "Find any more of these, open them. We can't let a single one of these crates remain."

Though why didn't they use them already against the defenders of the Castle? Was the trap for Tytos and his men? Makes sense, but the day cleared up so much they are useless now.

While Ranma and Fenris hunted through the encampment his men had gotten bogged down. The initial surprise and shock of the assault had worn off, and here and there pockets of resistance began to form. None of them were large enough to make any real headway, which was made worse when Tristan Ryger and the rest of the defenders of Butterwell suddenly sortied, the drawbridge clanking down and the man within riding out while the archers on the wall went to work.

It wasn't a planned maneuver. The defenders had been awake enough to see the attack coming in, and Tristan had decided to take advantage of it. Now he rode at the head of his family's men shouting. "The rivers, the rivers for the King!"

Meanwhile Ranma sliced into another crate, wrenching Ice out as shadowy claws tried to reach out of the now open crate. Each crate seemed to contain about five Shadow Warriors. However when the light of day hit them in the now open crate, they shriveled and screamed before dissolving into nothing.

OOOOOO

Melisandre grimaced angrily. "My trap has been sprung my Lord, but the Stark understood what was going to happen, he has destroyed all of my Shadow Warriors present in the camp."

Stannis however smirked. "So the Stark will now 'know' that he's spotted the trap and let down his guard, good." He nodded around him at a force of 3000 heavy cavalry. They were hidden spread out in a large ditch to the west of Butterwell, the scene of some long-ago river. Though given the fact that Stannis' horse was standing in four inch deep water, even though it was no longer raining and sunny for once, it might be a river once again soon.

"Pass the word, up and at them." He ordered, looking around at his commanders, Ser Richard Murrigen and Ser Alec Rogers, a knight of that House one of the lord's nephews who had impressed Stannis on the march. Both men nodded and moved off on their horses quickly.

OOOOOO

Outside Butterwell the camp was still in total disarray, unable to really muster up any kind of large-scale resistance, outnumbered now along with being surprised and attacked from two directions. While his men continued the rout, Ranma and Fenris concentrated on destroying the caches of Shadow Warriors. Both direwolf and man breathed a sigh of relief when they couldn't find any more crates. Ranma hoped this would stop the attack on Butterwell, since that would allow him to use it as a staging ground around the route of Stannis' army, but that would be for the future.

He turned quickly however when somewhere in the distance a horn was blown three quick beads then one long one. Before Ranma could even reach the end of the camp another horn blew from the walls, loud and low. It didn't take a genius to know that something was wrong.

As he thought that a shout was raised from the edge of camp, terror lending it volume to carry over the ongoing battle. "Heavy cavalry coming from the southwest! Seven preserve us, there's thousands of them!"

Ranma stared wildly around, leaping up to stand on top of a spear stuck into the ground nearby, staring over the battle still going on at the oncoming cavalry. Dammit it was a trap, and I walked right into it! With a snarl Ranma placed his hands around his mouth bellowing. "Retreat east! All forces retreat east!"

With that Ranma jumped forward, bouncing over the heads of men and astonished horses alike, while Fenris followed him rapidly until they were out of the camp. Behind him the Wolfsworn took up the cry, shouting and grabbing at their men all around them pulling them away from the battle while the camp's remaining inhabitants shouted happily at this deliverance.

Ranma left his friends and Tytos to it, knowing one thing that could hopefully give them enough time to get out of this trap. Once free of the encampment around the castle's front, Ranma nodded and Fenris who sat on his haunches and howled. "AWOROOOROOO!"

He howled long and loud, putting as much energy and timber into it as he could. It was the kind of sound that had for thousands of years told practically every other animal that here was the alpha predator, run or become lunch.

The Royal Army cavalry forces had become acclimated to the sound of the direwolves howling and growling over time, with Fenris or before they left one of the others howling every morning and sometimes during the march to train them for it. The oncoming cavalry horses had never heard such a sound before. Not even when they went through the Kingswood and heard the sounds of normal wolves. A direwolf's howl was like no other. Thousands of those horses panicked, twisting and turning away, pushing and shoving at one another in their haste to get away, to turn aside from where the sounds coming from.

Behind Ranma the Wolfsworn continued to try and pull the light cavalry out of the camp, but it was hard going with the defenders now realizing that they had a chance to exact some revenge on their attackers. Tristan somehow fought his way through to stand beside Dacey scowling angrily and nodding his head at Lord Butterwell, who had remained glued to his side. "Why don't we fall back into the Castle?"

Dacey shook her head. "We can't! If we do that, they'll keep just keep sending those Shadow Warriors against us, we'll never get out and they'll overwhelm us eventually." Ranma might be able to get out himself, but none of the others would be able to.

"You're asking me to abandon my Castle!" Lord Butterwell growled angrily, while Smalljon appeared from behind him, pulling himself up into a horse's saddle while Hathar guarded his back.

"Better fled than dead." Roger barked, coming through the melee around them the Valyrian blade his wife had delivered to him red with blood while she stalked behind him. Osha's spear tip was also bloody, though her helmet was missing, and one of her arms was being cradled against her side. "We need to go, Ranma and Fenris won't scare their horses forever!"

Dacey nodded. "Go or stay Lord Butterwell, it's your choice but we are leaving!"

With that she spurred her horse forward. Joining the other Wolfsworn they hacked and slashed their way through the melee following the rest of the light cavalry as they began to trickle out of the camp, racing away. The archers and skirmishers of House Blackwood had either already died, as many had been surprised by the heavy cavalry, or fled into the woods to where the extra horses had been tethered.

Even with Ranma and Fenris howling and disrupting their horses, the charge had continued, and now the two of them were surrounded by heavy cavalry trying to hack and slash them down. The first few attackers to reach them had been smashed from their horses, or the horses hacked out from underneath them by the direwolf and man, showing that lances really didn't work on someone as mobile as the two of them.

Ranma leaped up, landing on one such lance for a moment, balancing there in such a way that the man holding the lance didn't even feel his extra weight for just a second. Then Ice whirled around, decapitating that man slicing through armor and neck. Ranma then leaped off, cutting, stabbing, kicking and punching everywhere. For preference he tried to remain in the air jumping from one person's shield to another person's lance to another knight's horse, his punch lashing out and catching that man in the chest flinging him back with such force that he smashed two of his fellows out of their saddle to be crushed under the hoofs of their fellows, disrupting the charge further. "Winter is coming!"

Fenris snarled, his fangs piercing through plate mail and dragging a knight screaming from the saddle while one of his legs gutted another horse. Another knight brought down a large axe, but it shattered off Fenris's side, his fur acting like armor for a moment. The man gaped then died as Fenris leaped upwards, his front paw smashing the man out of the saddle with a scream before he turned grabbing a lance between his teeth and pulling that man down horse and all, before leaping from that man's corpse onto another knight.

The two of them however couldn't stop the entire charge. While around them a huge melee began with men trying to hack and slash at them the rest of the charge continued on its way, shouting as they went. "For the True King! The Reach, the Reach for the King! The Stormlands, Stormlands for Baratheon!"

The Wolfsworn were caught out in the open, but they stayed together, hacking several mounted armsmen and knights down, while around them more than two dozen of the light cavalry were caught as well. Heavy cavalry was one of the worst enemies of light cavalry. With their heavier armor both on man and horse any battle between the two groups would end with the light cavalry being simply ridden under.

From his position jumping around among the charging knights Ranma saw this, and also saw in the distance well back of the charge one group of warriors sitting on their horses and watching. Even from here he could make out what looked like blood-red hair on one of them, incongruously reminding Ranma of his female form from his past life. Yet I didn't have sparks of fire flashing from my fingers, he thought with a frown.

Behind where Ranma was still fighting the rest of the heavy cavalry had smashed into the camp, catching what forces had been unable to pull away, which included many of House Butterwell's men, but not the Lord himself. He had refused to retreat with the rest towards the east, instead falling back into his castle with most of his men, joining the archers from House Ryger and Wayn who had remained on the wall during the battle. They continued to fire at the attackers, but it was not enough to save their fellows still stuck outside when the drawbridge went up at Lord Butterwell's grim command. The Castle was safe now, but for how long?

Seeing the sparks in the witch's hands growing, Ranma snarled, dropping Ice for a moment. He then gathered his own energies in his hands bringing them down along his sides. Leaping backwards from where he had been standing on a rearing horse's head, Ranma brought his hands the sides snarling "Direwolf's Claw!" The new name he had decided on for the Kijin Raishin Dan.

The vorpal blades of the technique sliced through everything all around him, man, horse, armor mattered not at all. Everything in a set radius was sliced through. Ranma however gasped, barely landing on his feet as he fell to the bloody ground behind him. Using that technique took a lot out of him.

He turned as the last of the attackers in the near vicinity went down while the men not hit by the technique pulled their horses away retreating in sheer terror. All told the technique might've killed around four hundred men in a bare second.

Ranma however had other problems, a fireball hurled his way from the Red Witch at the same time he had cleared the area around him. Too close to dodge, Ranma was forced to hit it with his own attack, "Fierce Wolf's Roar!" A cerulean blue sphere impacted the fireball prematurely detonating it, but as the backwash of the blast reached him Ranma nearly sagged to his knees.

Projecting ki beyond his body without a physical connection was insanely hard for Ranma in this world, and for some reason it was getting harder over time, not easier with practice as it should. But the Red Witch seemed to have no similar problem with her magic. Already two more fireballs were forming in her hands.

Fenris moved up beside Ranma, his coat matted with blood and one eye shut due to the blood from a tiny cut right above it which had gotten through his armor technique. Despite being exhausted now Ranma was still defiant. Leaning on Fenris he picked up Ice from where he had dropped it, before shouting out towards Stannis. "Next time try to do your own dirty work, coward! We'll see if your blood is as black as your soul, Flame Fucker!"

With that he turned, flinging himself up onto Fenris' back. The direwolf howled once more, a deep, somehow contemptuous sound before turning and racing off so quickly he seemed to blur for a moment. Behind him a fireball suddenly crashed down into the ground where he had been standing, and even with his speed, another fireball almost nailed Fenris a second later, the explosion missing Fenris' tail by a hairsbreadth.

From where he had watched the battle Stannis' eyes had widened noticeably at whatever the Stark youth had done, then he paled as he saw the boy do something else to divert the first fireball Melisandre hurled at him. "What was that?" He asked, turning to Melisandre sharply, his eyes narrowed angrily. That first fireball would have possibly immolated some of his own men if it had hit Ranma.

For a moment Melisandre did not answer, casting the fireball that nearly caught Ranma and Fenris. Then she turned to look at him from her own horse, shrugging her shoulders. "I know not Azor Ahai. Some fell heathen magic from the so-called old ones, or mayhap the even more inhuman and demonic 'Children' of ancient song. It does not seem to have the range of my own blessed fires of R'hllor however, and if he had tried to attack us, my Fire Guard would have held him at bay while I worked my magics upon him. Even such as Ranma Stark could not survive a fireball tinged with the power of R'hllor!"

Stannis grunted noncommittally, surveying the carnage of the battle. He had hoped to capture either the leaders of the devilishly competent skirmishers that had been battering his foragers and scouts, or to take whatever reaction force Ranma Stark sent and wipe it out. He hadn't actually expected the boy to come himself, or for so many of his own personal force to get away, though he had planned for it just in case.

Killing the scouts he still had scattered beyond the fight took us too long, and the watchers on the wall saw us before we could encircle his force. After that, Stark reacted quickly and expertly, reading the situation and taking the only course of action that could save him and his men. Damned boy's as good as the tales made him as a leader at least, and as a warrior apparently. Yet without his personal skills, and that direwolf using his howl to scare the horses into panicking like that, we would have had them all. And now I have the measure of him now, which makes this a victory whatever else occurs.

"How many more Shadow Warriors do you have all told?"

"A small crate worth with us Azor Ahai, with another hundred or so scattered throughout the first echelon, and smaller packets with the others. I could make more of course." she asked smiling thinly.

"No." he replied sharply. "Unless your powers have suddenly evolved into illusions and trickery of that nature, there's not a place nearby where we could hide the sacrifices necessary. We'll have to make do. However...." he went on staring at the castle in the distance, the archers on the wall still firing at his men while they finished off the men still outside the wall.

"House Butterwell has decided to resist us. Send a few of them forward tonight. Order them to open the gatehouse, if they can, and if they cannot, or if you cannot order them to do so, then they are to slaughter all within." Stannis smiled grimly. "Perhaps after House Butterwell has fallen you can sacrifice their souls to make more of your little friends."

OOOOOO

It took Ranma and the Wolfsworn about an hour or so to gather up the scattered remnants of the light cavalry and archers, and when they did Ranma went visibly shook his head. "A bare 600, we lost that much of the light cavalry?"

"Aye." Roger said shaking his head. "We lost another hundred or so screening the archers into the woods. I doubt all of them died but..." Roger didn't have to say that most of the soldiers who had been wounded or knocked out of the saddle hadn't been able to escape the sudden trap. "I have no idea if Stannis will take prisoners but even if he does given the rumors of the Witch, it might be best if they died in battle."

Tytos shook his head. "You were right Lord Stark, it was a trap, but it was one that could've taken the wolf."

Dacey shook her head. "We gave as good as we got Tytos, no, better! We probably killed at least three or four of them for every one of us that went down! Stannis didn't tell the men besieging Butterwell that he was nearby, or to expect us. That cost him nearly all of those men, and Ranma and Fenris killed who knows how many among the attackers."

"Maybe, but right now we got we have to assume that they'll be after as if they have any light cavalry of their own. Keep the men moving now, and through the night, I don't care about tiring the horses for now. We'll walk them tomorrow but for now keep moving."

As his men obeyed Ranma stared back over his shoulder. He somehow knew that Butterwell was going to be assaulted, and even knew what tools Stannis would use to do it. It was almost tempted to return and do what he could to defend the Castle, but the Red Witch held the range and endurance advantage over his own skills. Frankly Ranma was exhausted, and it was all he could do to keep on Fenris' back let alone run himself. Even so should I use Umi-Sen-Ken to get back there and ambush her?

No, I've underestimated her once already. Her powers don't just include Shadow Warriors and visions. She might be able to somehow sense me magically. And even I can't fight that many men and her at the same time in my current condition..

With a final scowl Ranma turned, running along with the rest of the light cavalry as they cantered throughout the rest of the day and deep into the night. Behind them that evening the castle of House Butterwell fell, with every man within put to the sword or sacrificed to make more Shadow Warriors.

OOOOOO

"We're coming up on the point where we'll have to put too shore my Lord Stark." said the boatman to Jon. He was a local smallfolk man who had volunteered to man the barges along with several dozen of his fellows to transport Jon and his portion of the army as far south as they could go by the Blackwater Rush.

Jon did not turn away from where he was staring further downriver in the direction of where King's Landing was supposed to be. Every time they stopped over the past few days they had heard tales from the smallfolk about the capital's destruction, but more than one man couldn't truly understand or believe that King's Landing, the largest and most populated city in Westeros, was gone.

If we had time, I'd like to go and look at the ruins to see what was left of it, but we don't. "Put us ashore on the southern bank, Bertrand. Then I'm afraid will be leaving you and yours behind."

The smallfolk crews would be taking one of the barges back, while Jon and the others would have to carry the others overland to the Mander, which was supposedly three or four days journey for an army their size from here. Though of course they would be slowed by the need to carry their barges with them.

Jon couldn't afford to assume that they would be able to find similar barges on the Mander, and using the Blackwater alone had shaved off weeks of marching, which he had put to use in training the man in what they insisted on referring to as 'Stark tactics' every time they stopped.

He turned to his sister Arya, Edric, and Lord Beric along with the other commanders. "Let's get this organized." he ordered with a grim smile. "I'll want the boats roped in, the horses across and hitched up to the halters as soon as possible."

The journey from where they debarked along the Blackwater Rush to the Mander took over a week and a half. During this time Jon and his men got news of Stannis marching north, along with the news that he had sent a portion of his army back into the Reach to help clear out the Mander.

When he first heard that news, Jon had to squash the temptation to turn his force north in its wake. They could do a lot of damage attacking that army from behind.

But at the same time that the smallfolk shared that bit of news, word was beginning to spread from the Blue Bryn that another army had invaded from the Stormlands. The septon who shared that information with them was scowling angrily. "There have been reports coming out of the Stormlands my Lord, the Viper of Dorne has made an appearance with an army of mercenaries at his beck and call."

"Fuck!" Jon groaned. If the Reach were facing both Dornish invasion as well as the depredations from the Ironborn along the bottom half of the Mander, even knowing that aid had already been sent Jon could not in good conscience turn away. Not without having to answer to Ranma for it later, he thought ruefully.

With a sigh he pulled out a map, one of the many that had been copied in Riverrun during their stay there. It did not show a lot of detail, especially out of the Riverlands but it showed the courses of the rivers and the Royal Roads at least. "Can you tell me where along here you think the forces sent by Lord Stannis would be, and where you think the invaders could be?"

The septon traced the line of the Mander starting from its mouth and ending right before Oldflowers. "There have been raids and atrocities everywhere along here, and out along the river heavily to both sides. Several towns and villages have been wiped out or forced to evacuate by the Ironborn, but thankfully they only began to spread out from the river recently. The worst depredations are along the Mander itself, where a dozen villages have been burnt to the ground, and several House's keeps taken and burned."

"I know that Highgarden is dealing with a refugee problem. The septons there have called for aid from all the nearby septs, and the Lady Margaery has been said to have doubled or even tripled the size of the City Watch. She pays well, and demands they all be trained to a certain degree, further preparing the city for a siege, yet not causing panic among its citizens.

"Sound thinking." Jon murmured. "Go on."

"I have no idea where along the Blue Bryn the Viper is, my Lord, all I know is that rumor has it that the Viper's army is marching deep into the Reach rather than remaining on its outskirts, following the Blue Bryn. But there are a few Houses along that route. They might be able to get word to Tumbleton if you are able to convince that castle's seneschal that you should be able to contact them."

"I'll have to do speak to the man in any event. This is getting more complicated, and I think we need to tell the Lady Margaery that Ranma has made good the promise he and Daenerys sent, and what to expect from us." Jon frowned, wondering if he could convince whoever Lord Footly had left behind that he was acting in the best interests of the Reach as a whole, regardless of that houses stance on the ongoing dispute over kingship of Westeros.

To one side Lord Beric frowned scratching at his chin. "I want to send words to my house and my fiancée of course." He said, his voice low and filled with emotion. The two of them had been promised for years, and loved one another dearly. The bonds of duty were not light however, and he had been separated from her for a little over a year now. "But I cannot remember if Footly would have a raven trained to send to Blackhaven let alone Starfall."

"There is something else." The septon said hesitantly. "The forces of the Dornish Marches are gathering, save your own House my Lord, and that of House Tarly. But they are each taking to the field alone, and there seems to be no consensus among them on what direction to take. Two of them are marching for the Boneyway, another for the Prince's Pass, a third is staying put and marching around in the Marches, while the fourth is apparently marching straight north, their destination unknown."

Jon groaned irritably before looking at Lord Beric. "You and Edric are the only two of us that have led or been in the Reach. Would Tumbleton have any ravens that could head down there? Do any of those Houses have any ties to Dorne or Stannis we should be wary of?"

Both younger and older man shook their heads indicating ignorance, and Jon sighed wearily. The task Ranma and Daenerys had set him was becoming more and more complex. "Back to my original question then, where would the forces Lord Stannis sent be by this point?"

"Almost to Bitterbridge my Lord, I know for a fact that is the case." The septon smiled thinly. "I am one of six brothers from my family, four of whom were forced to take the cloth, mainly because our farm was going to go to our oldest brother. We all stay in touch and one of my brothers serves in a village along the Rose Road near Bitterbridge."

"If they are, then I doubly hope we can convince whoever is in charge in Tumbleton to aid us. If we can, we can hopefully get in touch with the army Lord Stannis sent down. Regardless of anything else, is in both of our interest to deal with this mercenary army. And the Ironborn of course." Jon's voice however did not indicate much hope in that. This will not be easy...

OOOOOO

"You know you don't have to come with us Desmera." Garlan said to the young woman before him, a good looking young woman who had just turned seventeen, with long brown hair tied up in a bun and the figure of a far younger girl. Desmera Redwyne, unlike his sister Margaery, was a late bloomer. The end result would still no doubt be stunning of course, and the hints were already there.

The two of them were standing next to the plank leading up to the war galley Shield's Honor, named in honor of the coming campaign against the Ironborn. It would be the last one to leave the port of Oldtown, and they were pushing it now to catch the tide. As evidenced by the glare the Captain, Joras, was giving him from the deck.

Still he had to try one more time to convince his cousin that she didn't have to come with them. The battlefield was no place for a woman, Garlan already had enough nightmares about what could've happened to his sister if his force hadn't arrived when it did, he didn't want anymore. Besides, I'm bringing her brothers along, those idiots are enough of a nightmare.

That unfortunately was true. Horas, the idiot who had been attempting to woo Margaery on her trip back from King's Landing, had made a fool of himself more than once on the march. And Hobber was even worse. One incident in particular had almost made Garlan hang the two of them for rape. And if not for the gold both brothers carried and handed off to the girl and her family, enough to agree when asked that it was consent, he would have too. Garlan was a knight, and took his vows seriously.

Horas and Hobber did not. They were the worst examples of what his grandmother Olenna had called 'Summer knights', young un-blooded idiots with a sense of immortality and an arrogance unbecoming of a knight, no matter how nobly born. They were also frankly slow of mind, idiots pure and simple. Garlan was of the opinion that if either became Lord Redwyne, it would be a bad day for the House, made worse by current circumstances. Their cousin Desmond was worth fifty of them.

"I owe it to my father, and to all those men and women who died trying to defend the Arbor, who have died since the Ironborn have taken it. I need to go." Desmera replied, though her lips and jaw trembled. If they lost this battle, Desmera would be sending herself into the hell that she had so-luckily escaped from. That thought terrified her, but Desmera couldn't turn away from it, not after hearing so much about her cousin's stand at the battle of Oldflowers.

Actually, if Margaery learned that Desmera was going into danger like this, Margaery would've been the first person to tell her not to and would tan her hide if she could. Margaery had gone to Oldflowers and made her stand there because she felt it was her duty but she would never ask any other woman to do the same, especially not her cousin, a sweet child and one of the finest examples of a normal noblewoman that could be found.

In comparison to her older brothers though, she at least understood that she wasn't the smartest person, and was willing to ask for aid. She also took her duties seriously, and wasn't prideful.

Garlan stared at Desmera for a moment then shrugged. "So long as you explain it to my grandmother when word gets out that you've asked to come with us, I'll allow it."

The younger woman grimaced, but nodded resolutely and followed Garlan aboard the ship.

About forty minutes later they had left the port joining up with the rest of the fleet heading out through the Whispering Sound. It would take them a bare two days to clear the Sound even with autumnal weather against them. The fleet consisted of over 90 galleys, though only thirteen of them were war galleys with the rest being converted merchantmen. However House Hightower had poured forth its effort and its coin to man and arm those ships for war, above and beyond what they routinely carried as secondary ships of the Redwyne fleet.

Every captain among the fleet knew that this war would be a tough one, knew that the Iron Fleet might well be ready for them. After all, none of them were very experienced at full fleet maneuvers, but they were experienced sailors, and knew that the Ironborn were among the most dangerous opponent anyone could face at sea.

Garlan too knew that he was no fleet admiral, so he had come up with a plan that was simple yet unstoppable. They would make straight for the Arbor's main port, Starfish Harbor, daring the Ironborn to try and stop them, keeping all of his ships close together so that they couldn't be picked off or diverted.

It was surprise, numbers and those Seven-damned fire ships that they sent in first that allowed the Ironborn to take the Arbor in the first place. But they paid for it badly, and their fire ships aren't a surprise any longer. If they try it again on the open sea against us we'll be ready.

The devastation of the fire ships was something that the captains of the surviving ships had informed Garlan about once they were discussing planning. No one knew how the hell the Ironborn had found enough fanatics, and it had to be fanatics given their fates even when they were able to perform their mission successfully, to man the ships. With the tales of magic returning growing in strength, and his own knowledge of the Seven-sent miracles that had hastened his army on their way to Oldflowers Garlan was worried that it might be a sign up that the Ironborn had access to magic.

To combat this, he had gone to the Citadel, demanding to talk to the Archmaesters and maesters there. But most of them were dismissive of his concerns or contemptuous and refused to see him. Garlan had to go to Gunthor and get his aid to force them to see him, and even then most professed to know nothing about magic. However, one of them, Archmaester Marwyn, had agreed to come with him, saying he might be able to do something to combat any offensive magics used against the fleet.

But even without Marwyn's aid, Garlan would still have put to sea and would have still assaulted the Ironborn. They had spilled too much Reach blood, too much family blood for him to do anything less. And they don't have Victarion anymore, and everything I've seen about Balon Greyjoy tells me he's overconfident.

Turning with a smile he watched Lady Redwyne be shown down into the war galley's interior to her quarters before turning to stare forward along the ship's route. Next to him Gunthor and Garth Hightower joined him, leaning against the railing of the ship alongside Garlan, staring ahead. Garth, the oldest and best of the two in terms of combat ability, asked, "What do you think we'll find on the Arbor?"

No rumor of what had been going on in the Arbor had escaped since the remnants of the Redwyne fleet fled. The Arbor was a large enough island that there were several holdfasts in its interior. From what Garlan had been told by the Two Idiots, they were mainly based as the center points for the huge vineyards where the wine that gave house Redwyne its name and much of its income. Most of them weren't very modern, but they were all situated in decent defensive position which no doubt would have given the Ironborn trouble in taking them.

Garlan for one hoped that most of the smallfolk of the island had retreated into those keeps, which were run by knights in service to House Redwyne. Most of those were not truly martial men, rather managers for the vineyards given knighthoods, but some were simply older knights given cushy jobs in their declining years. Men like that could be expected to lead spirited, and well planned defenses.

"It could be very bad around the ports and the towns, though hopefully not as bad as it could be."

"You don't believe that any more than I do." Said Gunthor shaking his head. "I think whatever we imagine, the reality will be far worse."

Garlan nodded sadly, his eyes hardening noticeably, and his hand twitching on his sword while he urged the ship on, the three men falling silent. We have justice to deliver, vengeance to take, and hopefully some countrymen and women to save.

OOOOOO

Balon Greyjoy scowled angrily as he gulped down one of the most expensive bottles of wine that the Redwyne vineyards ever produced. It had been put down forty years earlier and kept by Lord Redwyne's for the birth of his first grandson. The wine that was supposed to have been used on that happy occasion slopped into Balon's beard and down his shirt, joining the other stains that had spread there previously.

Despite their initial success, the Ironborn had not had an easy time of it, at least in their own terms. Yes, they controlled the ports, and most of the island. They had taken more treasure and goods than any had in decades of clandestine raiding, more even than they had in Balon's first attempt to rebel. But Balon had wanted more than simply to raid the Arbor, he'd wanted to conquer it, and so far he had failed.

Despite his penchant for not caring about the lives and his own people, for throwing them at any fight and assuming they would win through with their skill and determination, even Balon Greyjoy knew some battles were hopeless. While there were several dozen small streams leading deeper into the Arbor from the sea that allowed his ships to move around, not one of them was near any of the holdfasts that dotted the island. And those small keeps now held a portion of the population of the islands scattered here and there. So long as they held out, his conquest was not complete.

Worse, the Ironborn had spent so much time pillaging the ports of the island that the smallfolk deeper in to the islands interior had been able to gather up supplies before retreating into the keeps. So they had enough supplies to last them through the months since, and more besides.

Balon knew it was only a matter of time, and had sent crews of two ships to each of the seven keeps spread around the island. One of the keeps had even fallen a few weeks back to a surprise night raid. Germund Botley had maneuvered two scorpions through the night to target the keep's main gate. When they fired, the bolts smashed it down, allowing his men access to its interior. Needless to say after they had that access, the battle was over. Numerous the defenders might have been for a keep of that size, but they weren't very well trained, and very poorly led.

But that was the only bit of success they had in the interior of the island. And over the past few months a resistance force had sprung up. Not in any of the ports where his men ruled with grips of steel, but the supplies heading further inland to his forces besieging the various keeps were under almost constant attack. They'd hung thousands of men, killed dozens of known saboteurs and rebels, but still the smallfolk of this island fought back.

Terror should have given me this victory from the outset, he thought morosely, not for the first time. But then they began to fight back, then those first two keeps we assaulted threw back our attacks. That gave these bastards courage and they continue to defy me even now. And so long as they do, my plans are stalled.

Balon wanted to become the Islands King, and by that he meant king of every island, but he couldn't even conquer this one island, not completely. The Shield Islands he knew had fallen utterly. Victarion had sent him news of that, along with several ships from House Botley and others from Pyke. Though for some reason Balon hadn't heard from his brother in more than a month now. Balon put that down to his brother personally leading the assault up the Mander, and approved of it.

The captains are beginning to mutter about returning to the Iron Islands. They've taken enough plunder to fill their hulls with booty, and every man among them has at least two new salt wives, they want to return home with their Iron bought gains as they should before coming out to raid again. Indeed, Balon would've already lost at least a dozen captains to that desire if not for his orders that every woman should be kept ashore in the old Redwyne keep, which he and those loyal to him controlled. The amount of booty was astonishing, and would make all of their houses far better off once they returned it to the iron islands, but for now Balon needed that control to continue his conquest of the Arbor.

He slammed his flagon down angrily, sloshing the expensive wine again this time onto the table of Lord Redwyne's main Hall, staring across at his brother her Aeron, who suddenly lifted his head staring at Balon hard from the same odd bowl that he had used to watch the progress of the fire ships. "There is a fleet coming out of the Whispering Sounds." Aeron reported crisply. "90 strong, most of their ships appear to be converted trade ships that the Redwyne's seem to use so much. They are coming to reclaim the island."

"90 ships?" Balon said, ignoring his wine now as he stared at his brother. "90? That must be the Reach's entire remaining fleet! Good." He smiled, seeing suddenly another larger and even richer prize could be possible then completing the conquest of the Arbor.

I wanted to be King of all the Islands, but conqueror of Oldtown sounds just as sweet on the tongue. If we smash that fleet, the way to Oldtown will be open. And I would bet that old man Leyton has sent most of his armstrongs to man those ships as well. Kill the fleet and move on quickly enough, and we could surprise the few remaining defenders of one of the largest cities in Westeros.

With that in mind Balon leaned forward intently. "Tell me, have you figured out any more magic you can use directly? Anything that could tip the balance in our favor when battle is joined?"

"I have indeed." Aeron said, his smile widening into her shark's grin. The Drowned God blesses those who feed him well. Once battle is joined and bodies are falling into the sea, falling into his realm, I will be able to do something to aid us..."

OOOOOO

Elsewhere in the same ocean, about another week's journey away from the Arbor having just passed the last of the Summer Sea and heading into the Sunset sea, a lone longships sailed. It had made its way perilously through the autumn gales and storms from Essos alone. On it there was only one man able to speak, all the other men aboard having had their tongues removed and he always did so to himself.

"I wonder if either of my brothers still live. I sent word to start killing off the remnants of my family already, but I have no idea which of them might fall first. Asha?Victarion?Balon himself? The possibilities are endless and amusing to contemplate, but Balon would've been my main choice. Still, if he was with the force taking the Arbor I don't doubt he's still alive. And if Victarion isn't with him, I could perhaps persuade him to let me come back."

"Or at least close enough to do the deed myself. I wonder if the gods really do strike down kinslayers? There are so few laws against man and nature that I haven't broken, so what's one more godly punishment added to the list?" Euron Greyjoy laughed at his own joke, tapping a large silver enameled horn resting on the table in front of him in his room, while the Silence continued on its course toward the Redwyne Straits.

OOOOOO

It took Balon Greyjoy several days to gather his scattered crews and get them back on their ships once more. Even then he had to leave 300 men behind to retain control of the port of Starfish Arbor along with the keep therein. Balon knew that having pulled so many of his crews back out of the country side of the island and away from the keeps there he would lose what progress they had gained in grinding the smallfolk's resistance, but it had to be done. He would need that manpower whatever his brother might be able to accomplish with magic.

Overall, this gave him 62 ships, 34 from the Iron Fleet. Once all the longships were gathered, they made their way northwest through the Redwyne Straits towards the Whispering Sound, hoping to catch the Reach fleet as it exited the Sound, but they were too slow to gather for that.

Instead the two fleets caught sight of one another near the edge of the Redwyne Straits. In fact they were both within sight of Three Towers, House Costayne's castle which sat on the Dornish isthmus of the Whispering Sound.

Balon smiled grimly. Looking over to where Aeron and the four remaining Drowned Men stood all around the bowl they used to somehow concentrate their powers or worship or whatever it was they did to summon up the powers given to them by the found God. "Prepare your magics brother. Battle calls."

On Shield's Honor, Garlan nodded grimly looking over at Marwyn smirking slightly. "Normally I would ask a Archmaester to hide himself down below with battle this close. But you have the look of a man who has seen his share of fighting before this."

"Barroom brawls, some adventures of a misspent youth." the Archmaester replied dryly, holding what certainly appeared to be a Valyrian short sword in one hand. He also wore chain mail of excellent quality, crafted apparently by the man himself.

His eyes were serious as he stared at Garlan. "If the Drowned God has truly begun to give its worshipers powers again, I will be able to combat them somewhat, I'll be able to inform you of what they are doing and where, but that might be all. I have read books and studied magic from books and stories, but this will be my first time attempting to put my learning into practice."

"Then I suggest you get to the back of the ship, good Archmaester." Garlan said with a wide vicious grin. "I'll not keep this ship back when battle calls."

The man laughed, but stayed where he was. Turning away from the older man, Garlan took a moment to nod at the four men who he had stationed by the entrances to the ship its interior. Those men, all of House Redwyne, would be the ones to guard the ships interior from anyone trying to get past them. They were a last line of defense for his cousin and the very few other noncombatants aboard the ship.

With that done he turned to Joras and a small cabin boy who was almost dancing with eagerness. "The fleet will advance. For the Reach, for the Seven, and for justice!"

Joras nodded grimly, that was short sweet and to the point, exactly how he liked his pre-battle speeches. He nodded to the boy who turned racing up the mast like a monkey. From the crow's nest he put out the signal flags to signal the fleets to prepare for battle.

A few hours passed as the fleets closed with one another, moving from bare blips on the horizon to actual ships, with each fleet slowly spreading out. The Iron Fleet ships took the fore, while their smaller brethren gathered on either side of their line. The Iron Fleet ships kept to a decent formation, the other Ironborn ships did not. All told Garlan estimated that they numbered somewhere around half his total strength or a little more.

In contrast the ships of House Redwyne formed into two somewhat neat lines despite most of them being converted merchant ships rather than war galleys. The war galleys including Garlan's flagship took position in the center of both lines. Every ship was assigned a different unit, four ships which would work in concert if the battle became a general one. That, the lines along with the order to keep the range open as much as possible was all Garlan felt up to ordering as a fleet commander, something Desmond, on his own ship the Herald, agreed with. Now with battle on the way, Garlan was simply another knight waiting, waiting for the boarding actions to begin as they inevitably would.

The range closed quickly, and around Garlan the war galleys scorpions went to work, throwing out their bolts towards the opposing ships while all around them the other ships of the first line did the same. The second line of ships began to spread to either side, while the front line began to back oars, furling their sails, turning slightly to bring more of their scorpions to bear on the enemy than just the two that could be turned to face forward.

A moment later the Iron Fleet began to return fire, the number of launchers minimal in comparison to the Reach galleys, each Iron Fleet ship only mounting two or at best three while even the smallest war galleys mounted four and Garlan's flagship mounted six. The ships of the first line now had turned enough to bring their full weapons along one side to bear, and they began to fire even more rapidly as the men manning the scorpions on the other side of the ships hurried to aid their fellows.

Garlan estimated that at least six Iron Fleet ships had sunk already, but wind began to favor the Ironborn, hastening their closing speed. From where he was helping the effort on the oars, Garlan saw Marwyn scowl angrily. He held up his staff, which seemed to be lined with a band of stone or some kind along with a bronze tip, muttering an incantation.

The staff came down pointing directly at one Ironborn ship, not astonishingly the largest in the Greyjoy fleet. "There is someone on that ship trying to mess with the weather! He's not succeeding overmuch, and..." He broke off smiling as he felt something with his own magical senses. "Ah, that would be why no one tries to control the weather."

The wind that had been aiding the Ironborn suddenly slackened. This caused all of their ships to have to go to oar power. This slowed their advance enough for another few ships to fall under the weight of fire from Garlan's forces. But the Redwyne Navy now started to take casualties.

Two ships along one side of the front column fell out of formation, almost crashing into one another so close were they before they were able to get control. A war galley to places down the line from Shield's Honor floundered, a lucky scorpion bolt having caught it amidships right at the water line. It was sinking quickly, and the men aboard it moved to the two rowboats kept on the center of the ship to unload the troops.

"Whoever is over there should've stuck to spells affecting the waves. No magic user can control the weather, it's too powerful a force, too interconnected!" Marwyn seemed to almost go off into a tangent there for a moment before shaking his head. "That ship holds those wielding magic however, we'll need to smash it quickly. I feel magic in the air and waves, not affecting it but sending something, some kind of command deep into the ocean as if searching for... something."

"Can you disrupt whatever it is?" Garlan asked intently.

The man shook his head, small brief flashes of yellow light showing up around the tip of his staff, which he was waving it in the air. "No! There are too many minds at work. It's a joint working, I've never seen one of those before except some of the old Pre-Fall Valyrian tomes. I'm trying to cut them off from their power source, the men that have already drowned, but somehow they're taking the energy of those drownings and..."

From the east there was the sound of something exploding up out of the waves. Almost immediately it was followed by a harsh cry of terror coming from many throats, and the two men turned to stare, aghast.

What Aeron and the other Drowned Men had summoned was a horror of the depths. Sharks came up, ready to feast on all and sundry, ignoring their normal desire to stay away from ships at sea. Here and there other nameless things arose, creatures of scales and bone, feeding on the bodies of those sinking as the Drowned God fed on their souls.

But those were mere sideshows, brought up by the force of the summoning, not the actual target. The target of Aeron Damphair's summoning spell was a single creature: a massive kraken the symbol of his house pulled from the deepest depths. What Garlan could see of its body was longer than a war galley, and its tentacles, each of them featuring thousands of sharp seeming suckers, was far longer. There were at least 15 of those tentacles, possibly more underneath the waves, with two even longer than the others.

"Seven preserve us..." As Garlan watched in horror the monster assaulted four of the war galleys along that side, smashing their masts off the ships with furious strength, while other tentacles wrapped around the ships hulls causing the wood to creak and groan from the strain of its grip. The men on those ships screamed, some of them running and diving into the ocean in an effort to get away while others grabbed up axes and swords hacking at the rubbery flesh of the tentacles. But that rubbery substance resisted their blows, while their fellows screamed and died under the teeth of the sharks.

Garlan growled, then turned to Joras. "Forward!" He shouted. "Aim us towards the ship that Archmaester Marwyn pointed out! We must sink that ship!" He turned back to Marwyn. "Can you do anything to disrupt this now?"

The man gritted his teeth shaking his head angrily, his staff raising into the air once more. With that gesture more magical lights appeared from the end of his staff and he stared hard at the kraken. "Fuckkkk... I'm trying to break their control, but I don't know what will happen if I do! It could simply turn on them as well, that's better than nothing... but... I'm not... getting through! If we can kill one maybe two of the minds that are controlling this, I might be able to overwhelm the others, but that's all I can promise!"

"Then it comes down to steel!" Garlan nodded grimly pulling out his sword and readying himself as the Ironborn ships continued to close. Shield's Honor pushing forward, with the majority of the first line moving with it. The other Iron Fleet ships fired on Shield's Honor, but did not hit him, sinking one of his fellows but losing four in turn, opening up the way towards his target.

On his own flagship the Great Kraken Balon saw the oncoming war galley coming towards him, and pulled on his helm, readying himself grimly. "Protect Aeron and the other Drowned Men!" He ordered his sailors, who nodded and raised their own blades. "Protect them, and they will give us this victory!"

Even the Ironborn didn't want to get too close to the kraken, skirting around it to do battle with the Redwyne galleys which did the same save for the units under assault. The remaining ships that could still move under their own power went to their fellow's aid, firing scorpion bolts at the creature. These seemed to have an effect, sticking deep into the creature's tentacles, and one lucky shot actually caught the body of the beast.

It wasn't deep enough to cause much damage, but it let go with some of its tentacles from the four ships that it had been attacking, trying to lash out at the closest of those attacking it. One was able to remain out of range, but the other couldn't back oars fast enough, and was caught by the two largest tentacles.

Staring back Garlan nodded grimly at that, satisfied that the kraken at least was concentrating too much on those ships to do damage to the rest of his fleet. IF it had simply begun hit and run attacks and kept below the waves we might have been lost. Morale would have broken, and the reserve ships at least would have cut and run.

The rest of his fleet was doing well, trying in the main to keep the range open, save the war galleys around Shield's Honor which had followed his lead in closing. They were wreaking a horrible toll on the Ironborn ships, in particular the smaller longships which couldn't take more than one or two scorpion bolts before sinking.

That was the last moment Garlan had to take in the full battle before Shield's Honor slammed almost proud to prowl with the Iron Fleet flagship. "Across and at them! For the Reach! Growing Strong!"

Garlan was among the first men to hurl themselves over the ships' railings on to the longship, followed by Gunthor, Garth, and several others, including Horas and Hobber. They slammed into the Ironborn, but they had been ready for the Reach charge. The two sides hacked and slashed at one another, the battle spreading across the deck of the Ironborn ship quickly, as well as Shield's Honor, with another Ironborn ship coming along the other side hurling its own man across.

War galleys traditionally carried around 300 men, 200 or so who were dedicated armsmen to be used on the scorpions or during boarding actions. The other hundred however were still decent fighters at least at sea, not as good as the armsmen, and certainly not as well armored, but decent enough. Shield's Honor carried another 200 men, roughly equaling the numbers the two crews of the Iron Fleet longships.

And while these men were mostly 'summer knights', young men who had reached their majority since the first Greyjoy Rebellion, this did not mean they were soft any longer. Not after the marching, not after the battle they had seen at Oldflowers. Not after the constant training that Garlan had put them through while the fleet was made ready in Oldtown. The Ironborn were combat veterans by this point one and all, so the training between the two was relatively comparative.

It became a bloody and brutal affair quickly, men dying on both sides, with no one really understanding the flow of the greater battle or having any time to spare for it. None save Aeron and his fellow Drowned Men at least, who were protected for the moment by the rest of the crew. Yet they were concentrating on the bowl, keeping the kraken from retreating now that it had taken injuries.

Garlan hacked one man down, quickly turning, bringing his blade up and around to block the fall of a mace, kicking out hard to catch that man in the leg sending him falling to one side. Even as that happened, he turned engaging two other men with sword and shield, knocking them backwards. This knocked the shield of one out of position long enough for Garlan to get a thrust in catching him in the upper chest and punching through his chain mail to find his heart.

The other man roared in anger, but was felled from behind by Garth, who nodded his head at Garlan then went back to back with Gunthor, hacking and slashing it more Ironborn as they it assailed them. Garth was the better swordsman, and protected his younger brother well, but Gunthor too was acquitting himself decently.

Garlan nodded back at both men, noting that two other brothers, Horas and Hobber were nearby, both of them sporting injuries and looking rather panicky. Even as he watched they both shouted something to one another, the words of which he could not hear over the sound of battle, and broke back towards the Shield's Honor.

"FUCKING COWARDS!" Garlan bellowed, then had no time left to look elsewhere. Roaring he charged forward, bulling into the man with a mace, throwing him backwards with a shoulder rush. At the same moment Garlan pulled out a dagger with his shield arm. Stabbing his opponent underneath his chain mail right below the belt he was then forced to turn swiftly, catching another Ironborn's sword on his own throwing that man back with a grimace of effort, his arms and shoulders burning.

A second later Garlan winced, shield blocking another man's blow, but that man went down to a spear to the gut from one of the seamen who went down in turn to a slash that opened up his side. That left the way clear for his killer to move towards Garlan. His helmet was more ornamented than most, his movements somewhat slower, but certain. Eyes that seemed older than most of the combatants stared out from behind his helm as he glared at Garlan. "We Do Not Sow! I will send you to the drowned God, Tyrell!"

"Growing Strong!" Garlan roared and charged Balon Greyjoy going sword to sword with him for a moment before his greater strength threw the older man backwards.

He recovered quickly however, ducking to one side and throwing his blade up in an intricate series of slashes aimed to attack Garlan's shield and lag on that side of his body. Only Garlan jumping away for a moment saved his leg from the attack, but he took the other attacks on his shield, coming back and bulling forward bringing his own sword around into a series of attacks that drove Balon backwards.

As their blades locked once more Balon scowled harshly. "When you and your fleet dies, Oldtown will be ours for the taking! Everyone will know the true strength of the Ironborn, never again will we bow to greenlander kings!"

In response Garlan laughed high and cold. "My sister killed your brother Victarion, you know. He assaulted Oldflowers, and was even able to get inside to keep before he was killed by Margaery. A simple knife to the eye. So much for the vaunted Greyjoy strength! We burned his body and all those of his raiders too!"

Balon growled, trying to throw the other man back off his feet. "That's a dirty lie! And you'll pay for it!"

But Garlan was the stronger of the two and he pushed back easily keeping his feet while still speaking. "You think you're strong, you think you're fearsome, but a maiden with no training in war was able to kill your brother! And all of your successes have come against opponents that didn't see you coming! So how strong or fearsome are you really?"

Balon was so enraged he couldn't help but rush forwards, hacking and slashing like a mad beast, but Garlan was cool and calculated as he met him blow for blow with his sword or blocked with his shield. Said shield was soon battered into uselessness, so he quickly cast it aside. Now wielding his sword one-handed, he eventually was able to redirect Balon's sword to one side enough to get within his guard, smashing a gauntleted fist into the man's gorget.

Balon backed off quickly, his hands going to his throat and ripping the battered piece of metal away before could begin to choking, but Garlan was on him before he could set himself anew. Desperately the Ironborn King raised his sword, to block the vast overhand blow, but the attack shattered his sword. He thrust forward with the remnants of the blade, but it skittered across Garlan's chest plate not penetrating and Garlan's blow continued downwards, catching Balon between the neck and shoulder driving him down to the deck.

"So much for your strength," Garlan growled. Pulling his sword out he raised it hacking at the man's now open neck slicing it off not cleanly, but certainly enough to end Balon Greyjoy's life. "Go to your drowned God!"

While the death of their leader like that would have demoralized any other force entirely, the Ironborn hardly noticed. A few men of House Greyjoy did and began to fall back, but that was all.

Yet even so, the battle was slowly going against the Ironborn. No other longship had come to the initial two longship's aid, and the quality of the Reach armymen had begun to tell against the Ironborn. The Iron Islanders had grown somewhat complacent and lazy since the victory against house Redwyne, very few of them believing in training constantly when there was rape and plunder to enjoy.

While Garlan began to shout orders to try to instill some more organization into the chaos Garth and Gunthor had corralled some of their men and devised a small shield wall. Behind this a few of the sailors moved with heavy spears. This wedge of men moved toward where Marwyn had discerned that the control spell for the kraken and the other water beasts were coming from, the maester following after them, his staff red with blood along one end.

They burst through the last of the defensive cordon, and Garth was about to raised his sword to stab one of the men kneeling around the odd plate with water in it when master healer stopped him. "Wait! Guard my back for moment."

Garth looked at the man askance but did so turning to engage other Ironborn as they rushed to the Drowned Men's aid. But the men of Hightower held, pushing the Ironborn back, while Garlan diverted more of the armymen to their aid through the melee. However nearby another longship seemed to be coming closer to them now, which Gunthor saw standing slightly above the tumult of battle at the raised aft portion of the longship. "Whatever you're doing Archmaester Marwyn do it quickly!"

Marwyn smirked staring into Aeron's eyes, who he could tell was the center of this group working. Sweat was beading on the man's face, but he couldn't pull his attention entirely away from the spell, couldn't even move really. It was taking all of the concentration he and the other Drowned Men had to keep feeding power into their spell.

All he could do was stare angrily up at Marwyn, as he stood muttering words and raising his staff. He brought it down, not on the Damphair's head, but to smash the bowl that was the fulcrum of their spell.

The backlash of having the spell broken like that threw all of the Drowned Men backwards from the bowl, and they began to scream loudly. "GYAAAHHHHHhhhhh!" Without the ability to concentrate and no longer being fed by the power of those drowning all around them, the control spell began to feed off them, and they couldn't stop it.

"Amateurs." Marwyn muttered, spitting to one side. "Never do a working if you don't know the consequences of its failure."

Then he turned, moving with a speed that most would not have thought him able to standing on the bulwarks of the ship and staring over to where the kraken had been fighting against four Reach war galleys, the others having sunk. The kraken was almost absentmindedly tossing men into its gaping maw with a few of its tentacles, while it battled the remaining two ships in its range with the others.

Now however it flailed about wildly for a moment, then pulled back its tentacles from its victims, disappearing underneath the water. However the maester mage could tell it wasn't quite finished yet. There was one more repercussion from breaking the spell as he had. Cupping his mouth Marwyn bellowed as loudly as he could. "Back to the ship! Back to the ship and push us off, the kraken is coming!"

Garlan shook his head in wonderment then began to bellow the same thing. One did not question an expert on his craft in the middle of battle after all. All around him the men heard the call, falling back to their ship while the Ironborn tried to stop them. It was a tough, desperate battle for a few moments, and then the kraken arrived, its tentacles rising up through the water. At the site of that the Ironborn lost heart, all of them turning and running towards the side of their ships tossing themselves overboard allowing the men of the Reach to finally move back to their own ship.

More than half the crew began to push off desperately, trying to separate the two ships, while Garlan and others took up greatswords and hacked at any of the tentacles that came close to their own vessel. But the kraken didn't seem interested in them any longer. No, it concentrated its assault on the Great Kraken and stuffing its maw with as many of the delectable treats in the water already as it could.

Eventually there was a roar of triumph as the men on the oars were able to push the ships apart, pushing the ships further and further apart while other men readied the sails. The wind caught, and the war galley began to pull away from the beleaguered longship.

Behind them the kraken ignored Shield's Honor, dragging the longship down into the waters as its tentacles crushed it sides. Aeron was the only one among the Drowned Men to be powerful enough to still be aware of his surroundings even after the magical backlash, and he stared as the ship capsized slightly, allowing him to stare directly down into the jaws of the kraken. "Drowned God forgi..."

That was as far as he got before a tentacle swept him and his fellows down the deck towards the waiting mouth. Such was the true, caring, concern that the Drowned God and its beasts gave the men who worshiped him.

With its controller's dead, the kraken submerged once more, disappearing down into the depths of the ocean having eaten its fill. The rest of the summoning spell dissipated as well, the sharks and other beasts of the depths soon joining it.

The battle continued even after that for several more hours, the Ironborn simply having no ability whatsoever to realize when they were beaten. Without Balon, the kraken, Aeron or his magics, the organization and the range advantage of the Reach war galleys and converts won the battle. If not for the sacrifice of the ships that fought the kraken so bravely it could've been different, especially if Aeron had been able to summon up another one of those beasts, but as it was the battle was won.

Every single longship that took part in the battle was sunk. Not a single longship had retreated, but they had lost too many of their ships in closing or grappling range for the wider battle to work out in their favor, especially after the magic holding the kraken had been broken. There had been a sighting of one longship far off in the distance before it was out of sight over the horizon. But one longship wouldn't be able to stop the 64 remaining ships of the Reach.

It was just 64 ships, and even those ships had less men been they started with. There wasn't a single ship that had been damaged enough to send back to Oldtown that had not subsequently sunk. And if a ship began to sink, that was usually it for the men aboard. Putting to sea in their rowboats had been a death sentence for both sides of the conflict. Aeron's summoned creatures didn't care who they ate, the feeding frenzy had cost thousands of lives on both sides that might have otherwise been saved.

Even so, Garlan estimated that of his original force of thirteen thousand he had somewhere over eleven thousand remaining, the sailors and men of Redwyne and Hightower having done much of the dying in this battle. Despite those losses however, the way to the Arbor was clear, and the surviving ships quickly turned their course in that direction.

That night Garlan sat in a chair in his quarters on his ship, sighing tiredly as he pulled off his armor looking over at Marwyn for a moment. "We have you to thank for this victory Archmaester Marwyn. Without you spotting the ship those iron-loving bastards were directing their magic from, we might have been forced to fight through the entire fleet."

Marwyn took a long swig from a wine bottle before replying. "BURRRRP, ahhh... Even worse, that spell was incomplete. All those beasts and even the kraken were what could be gathered in quickly. Shoddy work! If they had waited until they had more power, they could've pulled three or four of those beasties up to fight for them. Amateurs."

"How do you know all this, do records of such survive in the citadel?"

"I would say that they only survive in the Citadel, and even then only because I have hidden them in such a way that my fellow Maesters will not find them. Such magics among the Drowned Men were known during the Age of Heroes but after that age magic began to fade, a decline that sped up quickly after the fall of the Valyrian Freehold. And every invasion of the Iron Islands made an attempt to stamp the Drowned God worship out, destroying more knowledge. I honestly have no idea how they recovered it frankly."

He smiled. "I myself actually have no idea how they were doing what they were doing, only the effects, and how to stop it. I can call myself an expert in magic, but frankly no one in this day and age is. Too much knowledge has been lost over the ages or willfully destroyed. We may have to re-create everything from scratch. Well almost..." he smirked, touching his chain and the staff at his side. "Some things still are known, at least to me."

"So you don't think we'll run into more magic when we take the Shield Islands?"

"I doubt it. Frankly I bet Greyjoy gathered every Drowned Man who knew even an inkling of such and took them with him on this assault. Now, are you going to fulfill your end of the bargain?"

Garlan looked at the older man thoughtfully. Marwyn had acquiesced to joining them on this campaign only under sufferance. Yes his expertise had been needed, but more importantly to him, Marwyn had wanted to go north and wanted either a land escort or ships to see him there. "Can you tell me why you want to go north?"

"I would've thought that was obvious." Marwyn said scoffing. "Magic has returned to the world, the Glass candles are lit. Do you know what that means?"

He sighed when Garlan shook his head. "It means that winter is coming, not just winter as a season, but winter as in the forces of winter, the White Walkers. They march, and all of Westeros should be preparing to meet them."

He shook his head sadly. "I know that's a pipe dream, but at least the North seems to know something of what's going on. But I want to go personally to aid what I can to aid such an effort."

"White walkers? What are they?" Garlan asked.

"Your education has been sorely neglected if you don't know any of the old tales about those fell monsters! But allow me to enlighten you student..." The old man said leaning forward his eyes flashing angrily at this sign that the old knowledge had begun to be forgotten even at the highest levels of nobility. My fellows have done their to shop far too well it seems. Damn them and their anti-magic bias, and damn the lords for their eagerness to forget the old tales!

The tale of the Age of Heroes and the place in it of the White Walkers took some time. When it was over Garlan looked the man thoughtfully. "Are you certain that they are appearing?"

"The Glass candles being lit show that their powers are growing. How they will attack is the question I cannot answer. The Wall was built to keep them out, but is its magic still in operation? Or has the neglect of Westeros towards the Night Watch had some effect there? Was the northern reinforcement enough time to offset that? Questions I don't know the answer to. Nevertheless, I mean to go north, and do what I can."

Garlan nodded, frowning thoughtfully. He wasn't disbelieving the man, rather the contrary. He had seen too many examples of magic himself to doubt that such creatures existed. No, what was causing him to frown was the fact that there were literally thousands of graves scattered throughout Westeros from this war. He and his army had burned the Ironborn under Victarion simply because it was faster than digging them all graves, but it looked as if that might have been an excellent idea anyway. "How far from the Wall can their magic reach?"

"Historically speaking it can't reach over the Wall at all. But something spooked the Northerners enough for them to reinforce the wall with a large force of their available men. Perhaps the White Walkers have figured out a way through the magics of the Wall, or perhaps even around somehow. Human dupes mayhap." The older man shrugged.

After a moment Garlan nodded decisively. "Stay with my fleet until we reclaim the Shield Islands good Archmaester. Then, we will send words to Highgarden. I received a message from my sister saying that a second force had been sent under Bryce of House Caron to clear the Mander of Ironborn Raiders. If that is indeed the case, we will sail north immediately. The entire army. If you're right about these White Walkers, then it is the duty of every noble and knight to meet them in the North, less we meet them in our own lands."

Marwyn stared at Garlan searchingly for a moment, then nodded. Garlan nodded to then stood up, cracking his knuckles. "Now if you'll excuse me, I have to go break the noses of two cowards who think they are knights."

OOOOOO

Myrcella and Daenerys woke up very differently. Myrcella was a morning person, who woke up the moment the sun broke the horizon, and was in full possession of her mental faculties within a few seconds of doing so. But even on the march Daenerys was not a morning person. She had to get a good run-up before getting out of bed most days. Unless of course one of her dragons breathed on her, their morning breath would wake the dead.

The younger woman knew that, and since joining their relationship had taken to waking up met Daenerys in fun ways for the both of them. She did so again this morning, kissing along the other woman's jawline before nuzzling into her neck, then moving up to nibble on her ear whispering. "Wake-up Daenerys it's time to get up..." In a voice as if she was talking to a little girl.

"Graaah...that voice and those actions just do not go together." Daenerys muttered pushing her away with a groan.

"I know!" Myrcella said with a laugh, pulling off the bed sheets of their small camp bed before pulling her feet around and getting up, wincing only a little now as she did so. Her side still ached from the wound she had taken in dairy, but it was a dull thing, going away slowly with time. "I'll get us some tea shall I?" Alayaya was even worse than Daenerys, utterly useless in the mornings though she had often remarked that was because of her former profession rather than personal preference. So Myrcella had to get the two royals their morning tea and food.

While Daenerys merely groaned in response Myrcella made her way towards the tent flap opening it only to find her way blocked by a large mound of fur. She smiled happily, rubbing her hands into the fur feeling it rumble underneath her touch. "Hello Fenris, I'm glad you and Ranma are back."

She heard the direwolf huff happily and the thump of his tail but she couldn't see it with the bulk of his body in the way of the tent flap. Fenris had finally stopped growing, but he was now larger than a plow horse at his shoulders, and even laying down as he was now he was an extremely large creature. It was only when he moved that anyone realized he still retained all of the body control and speed of his breed.

"We're happy to be back." Said a voice, and she looked up towards the top of the tent flap to see Ranma poking his head over Fenris' side. He leaned in quickly, his hand appearing beside his head and moving forward to gently cup the back of Myrcella's head bringing it up to kiss.

This was not a peck on the lips, but a full-blown kiss. Myrcella moaned happily, opening her mouth letting their tongues meet and writhe around one another for a moment. She pressed her body up against Fenris, eagerly arching her neck so as to give Ranma better access to her lips.

This went on for several moments, until Ranma reluctantly pulled away as he heard someone moving around behind him. "I love you Merry." He said in a soft voice.

Myrcella backed away, sighing happily while Ranma pulled himself over Fenris' back and into the tent while Fenris huffed happily, amused by the human's antics. "I love you, Ranma." she said moving over to the bed where Daenerys had opened one eye, smiling happily at the scene, then even more happily when Ranma moved towards the bed and did the same with her, including the murmured 'I love you'.

Moving over to her two lovers Myrcella gave them both kisses before leaving them there, knowing that she couldn't remain in the tent for long while the two of them had their reunion from the few days Ranma had been gone from the army without causing talk. With a sigh she left the tent, Fenris now moving out of the way and escorting her through the camp to the cook fires.

She smiled happily and waved at the greetings she got from many of the soldiers and lords around her, before taking her place in the line right behind Tristan. "Lord Ryger? Oh...." Her smile turned to a frown as she realized what the other man's presence might mean. "Something went wrong I take it?"

Tristan smiled grimly down at the beautiful young woman who seemed so strangely at home among these soldiers and men of war and with the giant direwolf beside her. He had actually at one point thought about courting her, but that was before his uncle died leaving him Lord of their family, and before she had taken such a horrendous wound thanks to Lord Darry's betrayal. He needed a wife to take his name now who could bear him a child, and Myrcella could not, nor could he marry her and take the Baratheon name at this point, since a barren woman could not carry on even her own family's name.

"You might say that Lady Myrcella," he said bowing over hand and kissing it in as courtly manner as he could. Then he stood up, his face going grim. "Stannis prepared a double trap for us. Ranma sprang the first and we all assumed that was the only one. It was only thanks to Fenris and Ranma that we were able to get out at all, but there were too many of them and we had to retreat."

He sighed sadly. "We tried to convince Lord Butterwell to retreat with us with his men, but he refused. I'm afraid that he and his household are dead by now. Stannis tried to use the Shadow Warriors as the first trap, and no doubt had more in reserve."

"May the Mother receive them as her own." Merry replied, shaking her head sadly. "I left Daenerys and Ranma to have a moment together, but I'm afraid that news will probably have ruined it for them."

"No doubt." The older man said with a shrug before handing Myrcella a cup of tea and a plate of camp bread, with a hunk of cheese. He smiled grimly at the cheese shaking his head. "That might be the last Butterwell cheese we see for a while."

By the time Myrcella got back to the tent, she found that Ranma and Daenerys had indeed halted their reunion quickly. Ranma was shaking her head as she entered the tent, saying. "He played us, any either of those two tricks could've worked, and both taken together would have smashed a far larger unit than the one I took down to try to relieve Butterwell. And if I hadn't been there, or at least if Fenris hadn't been there, Stannis' victory would've been complete. We would've lost every man there."

"As it is, we got mauled, and Stannis has a victory over us to his name which will no doubt bolster his troop's morale after the hammering they've been taking from Tytos. Tytos and Meera have performed magnificently destroying Stannis's foraging parties and scouts, but any morale benefit was probably lost with Butterwell, and after that Castle falls I don't doubt its stores will replenish Stannis' own."

"Is the overall plan still workable?" Myrcella asked as she sat down beside Daenerys. The two with girls exchanged a hand squeeze, before looking at Ranma, who had grabbed up some of the camp bread, biting into it hungrily.

"Yes it is, though it might be tighter than I was afraid it might. I think that Stannis' armies will start to lose the speed it had been using soon though. I bet that he had to use many of his spare horses to get that ambush force into position, and driven them into the ground. But he's still cut off too much of the angle on us for me to be really happy."

Daenerys frowned. "A messenger from Daryn came in this morning. My brother has landed, after a battle with the royal navy. He didn't know what the losses were on either side, but he said that he expected my brother to start marching in a day or two."

"We'll speed up then, put more distance between us and Stannis' army regardless of how much he's been able to cut our angle of advance." Ranma said with a grim nod. "It'll cut into the troops training time in the mornings to get more time on the march, but that can't be helped."

Daenerys nodded, though she and Myrcella exchanged worried glance. They knew that many of the Riverlands troops were still being worked up on 'Stark tactics', and that the Tully pike regiment was also still being worked up on most of the pike's tactics. Their individual training was excellent, and they tended to be able to work together as a unit, but their response to the horn commands left much to be desired.

Seeing their concerned expressions Ranma smiled taking their hands in his. "I know it's not the best solution, but unless we want Stannis to catch up to us while your brother is still out there unopposed, we'll need to do it. I also think we need to be aware that Stannis' forces are fully capable of moving separately if they need to be. He might be able to send one of them on an even sharper angle, say straight westward to block us from heading down to Duskendale. "I'm going to send Dacey ahead to take command of the scouts still with the army, just in case."

OOOOOO

Having been injured early on in the part of the Riverlands campaign that the bards had begun to call the Baiting of the Lion, Daryn wanted to make it up to his king and friend by doing the best he could on his current mission. Having set out in advance of the rest of the army and heading towards Maidenpool rather than down towards Duskendale, first he wanted to take out any reeve or thief-taker of Lord Mooton. These were the only men on his land that were loyal enough to Mooton to ignore the general swell of support for Ranma and Daenerys among smallfolk.

He actually hadn't had to do much. Out in the country all the smallfolk knew one another intimately, and they had a very good idea of who was telling tales or who was willing to. More often than not as soon as Daryn had moved into an area with his men they ran into more reeves and thief takers hanged here and there than his own men could have accounted for quickly.

Now knowing that there was no chance of anyone passing on tales Daryn sent men forward towards the town to watch the skies. He figured that seeing a dragon in the air above the city would tell him when to start expecting Viserys and his allies. One of his men was actually daring enough to hide right along the shoreline of the Bay of Crabs a league distance from the town, and watched the Dornish fleet arrive before reporting in.

Four days later that army began to march out of Maidenpool, and it found Daryn and his men ready.

At present, Daryn and a group of seven mountain clansmen were crouching hidden among large bushes by a small stream him about a day's journey out from Maidenpool. In the trees above other men waited with arrows drawn on taut bow strings. Across from the small stream a band of fifteen men came forward, their eyes alert as they watched all around them, though their visibility was hampered badly by the downpour occurring at present.

Noticing that most of the men didn't seem to have any autumn gear Daryn smirked evilly for a moment. The men wore light raincoats only if that, and their clothing didn't look all that warm. I bet their entire army is suffering, though I would assume they've commandeered as much clothing as possible from Maidenpool and wherever else they've stopped along their better this group doesn't seem to realize that there is danger about, they're wary, yes, but not as wary as they should be. Good.

Daryn had spent a single day observing the army, getting as close as he could, which was very close indeed, to note that it didn't have enough supplies for an army of some sixteen thousand. It was clear that they wanted to live off the land. Not a day out of Maidenpool, Daryn and his men began to see large parties of foragers who doubled as scouts for the army. After getting ahead of the army, this present battle was going to be the first of a series of ambushes to pare back those numbers.

The Dornishmen moved forward, dropping out of their saddles and allowing their horses to drink their fill at the stream while they shared some food they had taken from a nearby homestead. The smallfolk of that homestead had been removed quickly by some of Daryn's other men. It would be their choice whether or not to come back immediately to their house, or head west further into the Riverlands and away from this army's line of advance.

Daryn waited until a few minutes after the last man had dropped out of his saddle, before making a bird call. "Preck, Preck!"

At this signal, the archers hidden above in the trees fired, felling five of the 15 men, though only two of them were dead. Water had fouled their bow strings somewhat, nor were the men actually well-trained archers in comparison to most in the Royal Army.

The foragers turned, shouting consternation as a few of them raised bows of their own, aiming up into the trees. But Daryn and the men with him charged leaping over the small stream getting in among them before the Dornish realized they were there. Daryn's sword took one man through the neck from behind, while he sent a kick into another man's side cracking ribs and sending him flying with a scream of pain to smash into to others.

Pulling out his sword quickly Daryn turned, engaging two other men who had pulled out long sabers. Lighter than his own longsword somewhat, and curved whereas his own was straight they still wielded them relatively well. But to Daryn, it was as if they were moving in slow motion. He easily batted them both aside, flicking his own blade out once, twice, thrice putting both of them down their wrists and throats slit. The one with his wrists slit only looked up for a second before a pile-driving kick caught him in the face, throwing him backward with his neck broken.

Next to Daryn another man he turned fearfully, trying to jump up into the saddle. But the horse shied away rearing and skittish at the smell of blood and the screams of men. An instant later Daryn's sword took the man in the back, punching through his light chain mail, which was of really shoddy quality frankly, before finding his heart or lung. The body collapsed sideways into the river, it's red blood staining the water quickly.

Daryn looked around grimly satisfied. Every one of the foragers was dead, and seven of their horses had been corralled before they raced off in fear at the sudden combat. "Thomas, take the horses back to Goodman Burke and his family, they might need the animals to speed them on their journey west."

"We could use those animals too ya know," said one of his other lieutenants pushing at his lord's arm playfully.

"True." Daryn said with a nod. "But those aren't going to be the only horses we take from our enemies. Let's away quickly ourselves however, we're not that far away from the main army."

Over the next few days not every ambush Daryn and his men set up worked as well as that one, but most of them worked well enough. They accounted for somewhere around four-hundred Dornish, losing only fourteen of their own.

And any attempts to forage directly in front of or to the angle of the army's advance failed. Daryn had begun to empty the smallfolk villages and hamlets of people, along with every farmstead they could find, before Viserys and his army had left Maidenpool. That wasn't to say that the army wasn't able to find any food, but they certainly didn't find anything easily.

Several days after they had begun, Daryn was sitting on his horse hidden in a small copse of trees between two low hills, several days march away from the army which was marching down toward Duskendale. To Daryn's surprise, the Dornish army had turned in that direction almost immediately. Apparently someone in that army was still getting news on the movement of Ranna's army. That was good news to Daryn, it meant that setting Viserys and Stannis against one another would be all the easier.

Daryn wasn't thinking about that at the moment however, what he was thinking about was that one of the Dornish Houses had taken over foraging for the army, and its Lord was leading a foraging party in this direction right at that moment. Taking them out would put a hole in Viserys' command structure, if only for a little while.

It was raining again. It had rained or at least spritzed a little practically every day, though it was rarely overcast save when the rain was really coming down hard. At the moment, it wasn't raining hard enough to matter to visibility. A small stream however had begun to build on the equally small strip of land between the copse and the small hump of land on the other side of it, it's starting point out of sight from where Daryn was hiding.

As Daryn was staring at the moving water of the stream he began to hear the noise of horses cantering in the distance. Their hoofs made indistinct noises in the wet terrain, but he could still hear them well enough.

He nodded at the men on either side of him, all men of House Hornwood while at the same time readying his longsword. A few of them were even armed with lances, though obviously he didn't have any heavy cavalry with him. Those lances rather than being full metal affairs like those used in tourneys (or by certain rich Reach knights in war) were simply long spears lacking even metal points. Still with the force of a charge behind them, the fire-hardened points would break through chain mail easily enough, especially the cheap stuff that most of the Dornish forces seemed to favor.

He continued to watch from his hiding place in the copse of trees as riders crested the small hill. An instant later they began to make their way down towards the copse aiming for the small hamlet that had until yesterday made their homes among the trees here. They were apple trees, and more than one of his men had taken a few of the ripe fruit for themselves.

The moment those riders, around forty men all told, began to cross the stream, archers hidden among the trees and on the rooftops of the individual houses in the copse of trees fired. Several men went down, but the others spurred their horses on, charging forward.

Daryn yelled out. "Righteous in Wrath!" then spurred his horse forward, his sword raised and pointing forward.

The men coming towards the small hamlet were caught in the muddy area around the small stream their horses unable to move as quickly as his own for a moment, so their charge wasn't as powerful. Several men were smashed from their saddles, others pierced by the makeshift lances of Daryn's men. Daryn's own sword took one man in the shoulder slicing through his leather armor, while portion of his mind wondered why the hell people continued to think that leather was any defense in anything but bow range.

His next attack took another man on the shield, almost slicing through the shield and into the man's arm. But Daryn's blade was stuck in the shield for a moment, allowing the man to bring his saber around. Daryn ducked, punching out with his free hand catching the man in one of his legs shattering his kneecap. "GAHHhh!"

Pulling his sword out of the man's shield Daryn moved on leaving the crippled man behind to be finished off by one of the others. One man wearing colors of a house that Daryn had yet to see in this campaign, some kind of spotted cat holding an axe on a blue and white background, caught his horse with a lance from the side. Daryn leapt out of the saddle rolling as he hit the ground only to throw himself desperately to one side as one of the other Dornish tried to ride him down.

Getting his feet under him for a moment, Daryn stabbed his sword up, catching that horse in the side and ripping out it's guts before rolling away from another rider who once more attempted to ride him down. A brief glance around him however told Daryn the battle was going quickly against the Dornish, as more and more in of his men charged out of the small apple grove. Daryn had devoted over a hundred men to this ambush, not knowing how large a force the lord of whatever house had a cat on it would have with him.

Hacking and slashing at the horsemen around him, Daryn was able to move through the melee, though he did more dodging then attacking for a few moments, surrounded as he was by enemies. Even so Daryn was able to slice one man's leg off. Grabbing the man's sword arm right behind his wrist Daryn pulled him out of the saddle easily. He was just about to hop into the empty saddle when he heard a distant roar from the sky above him. It sounded like thunder, but not quite, more animal-like, a sound Daryn had heard close-up a few times in the past few months, one that filled him with dread now.

Pushing up his visor Daryn quickly looked up only for his eyes to widen in fear at the sight of a large black dragon coming down out of the sky. There was only one reason it would be coming out of the sky like this. Looking around wildly he dived into the small stream, which was more mud than water at this point but it was cool at least. "Down! Get down! Dragon!" After shouting that, Daryn quickly pulled his visor down again, took a deep breath, and buried his head in the mud and water as much as he could.

More than half of his men obeyed with alacrity, having gotten into the habit of obeying orders quickly. A few of them were cut down by the Dornish, but a few were actually were able to dive into the same stream near to where Daryn had. That was the only thing that saved them from instant immolation.

High above them Viserys shouted something that Daryn couldn't make out, and an instant later a torrent of fire came down from the dragon. It was wildly unaimed, torching not just the battlefield, but portions of the apple grove, more than one of the houses inside it, and several feet around where the actual combat had occurred. Screams rose in an unholy cacophony, only to be silenced as the individuals screaming died swiftly from the pain of their burns.

Thankfully the fire went out just as quickly at came, the dragon roaring back into the sky. Behind it Daryn pushed himself of the flash-fried mud, which was thankfully already wetting itself again thanks to the small stream and the rain.

"Old Gods damnit, that was close..."Daryn's back felt like it had been scalded even through his chain mail, and the wet chain mail was clinking with an almost angry sound having been warmed by the sudden heat of the dragon's fire. Steam was rising all around him, making it almost impossible to see, but Daryn still had a job to do. "G, Get me a headcount! Anyone still alive, shout out!"

Over seventy Hornwood men had been set on fire, immolating where they had stood and fought just a second before. Horses too had been set alight, screaming in equine agony with the survivors bolting in pure terror of the sudden conflagration. All of his own men's horses were dead or gone, the Dornish as well, and not just their beasts. The Dornishmen had not obeyed his shouted order, and paid for it, every one of them dying.

Nearby Thomas pulled himself out of the water looking at his Lord. "The, that fucking bastard! He just killed his own men to get at us!"

"He would've killed all of us if I hadn't heard him coming." Daryn pulled his helmet off wiping away the sweat that had formed on his forehead. "I'm getting the impression that Viserys doesn't really care at all who else he kills so long as he gets some of us. Daenerys was right about him."

All around him men began to tend to their burned fellows, those that had survived that haven't made it into the pool entirely. Six of them would have to be put out of their misery. They hadn't been able to get enough of their body into watery mud and been cooked in their chain mail despite not having been hit full on by the dragon's attack.

"Do you think that's going to be a new tactic? That Viserys will ride out and attack our men at the merest hint of anything?"

Daryn nodded grimly, staring around at the steaming, burning bodies, their fires being slowly put out by the ongoing rain. "Pull the men back, we've already succeeded in emptying most of the lands within a few days march of their army, we'll spread out backwards from that and continue. No direct clashes anymore above small parties of four to ten. Let's make certain if he does hit us again, he won't be able to do as much damage as he did today. I'll want runners to head out to the rest of our scattered forces as soon as possible to that effect."

The next few days were very nervous for Daryn and his men. Even though they had pulled back and reverted almost entirely to helping the smallfolk get out of the way of the Dornish army, they were still nervous that Viserys would begin to range further away from his army with his dragon. Thankfully he didn't seem inclined to do so, though why that was the case none of them knew.

The Dornish also began to send out larger parties, all of them horse archers rather than light infantry or light cavalry. The horse archers were a unique threat to Daryn and his men. They moved faster than most foragers could, and indeed faster than Daryn and his own men could in short spurts. While he still had horses enough to put one under every man he had, he had lost his trained light cavalry force almost entirely, so did not retain anyone who was used to actually fighting in the saddle. And while the few trained archers Daryn had with him had a range advantage, they weren't as mobile as the horse archers, who could fire on the move closing the range quickly before his own men could escape on foot.

Daryn continued to set up small skirmishes here and there, bleeding any foraging party or scout group he could while always keeping to the front of the army until they were well away from Maidenpool and the somewhat populated area around it. Soon they were deep into the far less populated zone between the Crownlands and the Riverlands, moving along the borders of the territory known as Crackclaw Point.

About two weeks after Viserys' army landed, Daryn sent Thomas ahead down the road, assuming that by this point the rest of the army was somewhere along it. "Tell Ranma that Viserys and his dragon are on the way. His army isn't quite blinded yet, but the bait is damn well set!"

OOOOOO

Viserys was angry, no he was furious. The Northerners had obviously known they were coming, or possibly been intelligent enough to not place any trust in Lord Mooton's loyalty. Whatever the case, within a day of leaving Maidenpool his army had come under attack. Small attacks here and there, never anything major but their foraging and scouting have been curtailed badly.

That sharply curtailed their ability to scout ahead of the Army. This in turn forced Viserys and Balerion to do the scouting, which they did so easily enough. They had even spotted that one ambush, wiping the victors out before returning to the army.

It hadn't occurred to Viserys that his attack had actually wiped out more of his own men than the attackers, nor would he have cared if someone had pointed it out. A few of the Dornish lords had privately speculated on that however after riding out to the site of the battle a few days after, but did not share their thoughts.

Jorah had taken command of both scouting and foraging, using parties of infantry to forage while horse archers covered them in every direction. This allowed them to stop several ambushes, but it slowed the army's progress even further. Viserys wanted to be in position to assault his sister or Stannis whoever won the clash between them, and hated everything that was delaying him now.

Arianne tried to do her best to keep Viserys calm, often times forcing him to exert himself when the two of them were in bed together to such a degree that he didn't have enough energy to be angry. It worked too, though was beginning to make her feel tired of it all frankly. Is my family's vengeance and my own ambition really worth this, this hell that I'm putting myself through? Viserys lovemaking had not improved since their first few times together, and he had begun to show distressing levels of selfishness and some low-key sadistic tendencies in their sex life, which did not please Arianne at all. Nonetheless she knew she had come too far to back out now, and did what she could to retain control over Viserys in some manner.

"Are you sure that we should be marching down to Duskenale? I know that Petyr says that Stannis and Ranma will be fighting somewhere in the area of the road but he is isn't a strategist. Why would they be moving in that direction?"

"For Ranma Duskenale makes for an obvious target. I doubt he knows of King's Landing, so he could simply be thinking of moving down the shore of Blackwater Bay to King's Landing if need be. And Stannis of course is going after him. There's no doubt Duskenale is the linchpin of his own logistics efforts, it has to be saved or protected." Viserys replied, his voice mellow as he leaned against the soft, silken pillow under his head, the sheets of bear fur covering his lower body.

"That does make sense, I had forgotten that would be important to Stannis." Arianne said with a nod. "My house is not used to thinking in terms of sea-based logistics like that." River traffic made much more sense to her, but even that wasn't exactly common in Dorne.

Viserys nodded agreeably, looking over her shoulder at a note she was reading, something Nymeria had given her that morning. "What is this?"

"I was just wondering about that myself my Lord. Apparently, the Iron Bank is not exactly happy with Petyr. According to this, the factors from Essos haven't been able to send us any solid information, or at least such hasn't been sent forward to the collection points like Maidenpool, but Nymeria says that the hatred is not unjustified. This is a suggestion from her, one she thought of several days ago but only now decided to share with me."

Viserys read it, then smiled thinly his eyes flickering with fell light for a moment. "Interesting. I have to say that Petyr has not exactly proven from much of an ally just yet. His spy network isn't better than your family, and bringing only around six thousand troops, more than half of which are nearly untrained levy forces was not anywhere near the amount of aid I was expecting him to be able to bring to our cause."

"And all of those lords my king strike me as more practical than loyal." Arianne mused. Viserys looked at her one eyebrow raised and she laughed. "They will be loyal to you now my lord, because Petyr has lost everything but their loyalty in terms of a powerbase. Whereas you have both the rest of the army, and your claim to the throne. Petyr might have delivered those men, might have negotiated their joining army, but they are ours now."

"And Petyr thus becomes expendable." Viserys said with a nod. "A lovely thought. Especially if doing so could garner any thanks from the Iron Bank. And agreeing to pay the debt the damned Usurper and his whore of a queen accrued with them, even if all of the proof of such on our side is now gone, would possibly bring them to our side entirely. Most devious my love." Viserys said, leaning down and kissing her pulling her back down among the covers of their large camp bed.

Outside a servant that Petyr had suborned not through money but blackmail within a few days of coming aboard Viserys' ship scurried off to find him. Petyr heard the man out wordlessly, then sent a messenger to the next tent over, summoning his bodyguards and servants. Once all still present with the army were gathered he said bluntly. "Start talking to the men of the army, spread money around if you have to. I want to know everything about the army's camp, about who is on watch, about the watch rotation, and the lords in charge. We might need to look for an escape route in a hurry."

OOOOOO

While the forces vying for the throne of Westeros were maneuvering towards one another, far in the North a small boat was seen floating on the waves of the Bay of Seals by a family of fishermen plying their trade. "Look at that father." The lookout said, motioning to his father. "Is that a rowboat? Who in their right mind would use a small craft like that all the way out here?"

"I don't know," replied the patriarch, frowning behind his unkempt grey-streaked beard. "But it might be someone in trouble. Jac, Kale, I'm gonna steer us in that direction, trim the sails to catch the wind from leeward. Let's see what's up."

The two young men did so, and within a few moments their fishing sloop was alongside the rowboat. Its sides were covered in frost, and a single person was lying down inside of it, covered by what had to be the worst skinned seal anyone in the family had ever seen. Then as they could grow closer, they realized it actually wasn't a botched skinning job. Someone had simply killed the seal, then pulled it aboard the small raft somehow without capsizing it, and had used its blubbery mass to protect himself from the cold. A smart idea, but an incredibly crude one.

All three men winced at the smell gasping. "Is that man alive you think?" said the youngest, Jac.

His father shrugged and jumped aboard the ship, moving over towards the man. Seeing that his beard was short and not very well cared for and what he could see of his face looked young as well he asked, "You alive, youngster?"

He was actually not expecting the younger man to be alive, so jumped back in shock when the man set up, staring at him. "W-who are you?" he asked through heavily chapped and bleeding lips.

"I'm Crant, these're me sons, Jac and Kale, we're fisher folk from the shores of the Bay. We be beholden to House Karstark."

The man nodded, crawling out from under the corpse of the seal. When his upper body came clear, Jac and Kale gasped at the site of his shoulder. I was heavily bandaged, but the bandages were dark black with dried blood, with some red seeping through even now over the wound.

With his sons helping him Crant was able to get the younger man into the sloop, then began to pull away from the smaller rowboat as his wife came out of the deckhouse. Quickly she began to undo the bandages on the man's arm, hissing in shock as she pulled them away. "Jac, get me a double draft of wine, boil it, Then some water and boil that too!"

"What did you get into youngster?" said Crant, staring at the man.

The man looked down at his own shoulder for a moment, as if not really comprehending what happened to it though Jack had took one look at it and thought that he was lucky to still have a shoulder at all. The skin around the wound was just going bad and it was deep and had bled profusely.

After a moment the younger man shook his head licking incredibly cracked and frostbitten lips. "M, my name's Theon Greyjoy. Take me to Karhold. I need to speak to Torrhen Karstark. They, they are coming." With that Theon collapsed, falling into unconsciousness as Crant and Kale moved forward grabbing him before he could hit the deck.

OOOOOO

Over the next few days Ranma's prediction about Stannis' speed proved true, the three units slowing down significantly. Many of their horses had been ridden nearly to death to set up the ambush around Butterwell. Even with a full third of the army no longer needing to forage for its food they were still slowed by that.

Within a few days at their new speed the Royal Army reached the road down to Duskendale, passing through House Buckwell's land in the Crownlands. Surprisingly that House didn't even bother sending out messengers to the army, simply pulling in what people it had and keeping their collective noses down while the army passed through.

This road wasn't quite as good a road as the royal roads, but it was far better than most in Westeros. Trade normally flowed from one port down to the other, luxury goods for the most part as well as out into the countryside. Though those roads weren't nearly as good as the main one. But of course there was no trade on it now. Merchants were even more intelligent than most smallfolk in knowing when to bunker down or hide.

The army began to march along it, now keeping their speed up without having to take away from their training times in the morning. To the army's delight they also began to see some resupply from the local smallfolk. Villages along the road would empty themselves at Ranma's urging, the inhabitants heading east away for now. But they would leave quite a lot of food behind for the army, a sign that the septons, not to mention their own and Merry's activity, had truly brought the smallfolk onto Ranma and Daenerys' side.

Ranma felt they would be able to continue down towards Duskendale for another week or so, before they would have to start making plans to turn back, and then dodge Viserys and Stannis somehow. But still wary of further surprises from Stannis, he had sent Dacey forward like he said he would to command the scouts left with the main army. Ranma had sent Tytos back to continue the campaign of skirmishes to further hamper Stannis' army.

About another week's or training and marching passed before Dacey came back with a report of an army coming up the road. And it was definitely not one of Stannis' attempting to cut them off from Duskendale without Tytos and his scouts having reported its movement.

"They've got what?!" Daenerys asked incredulously.

"I've never seen them in real life before, nor in books." Dacey said with a shrug from where she stood in front of Ranma and the others. "But I'd say they're elephants. It's pretty hard to confuse those massive beasts with anything else."

To one side Fenris perked up. He had seen a picture of an elephant in a book down in King's Landing that Ranma had read with Tommen at one point. They looked rather tasty, and perhaps large enough that one of them would feed even a pack of direwolves.

"Did you see their banners?" Daenerys asked intently. Elephants meant someone had come over from Essos, but who, and why? Could this be some scheme of the Iron Bank? Could they have thrown their lot in with Stannis and supplied him with another Army?

Dacey shook her head. "They've got a lot of scouts, and they all look like mercenaries to me, though of few of them are far more uniform than most mercenaries. But I did see one other thing, just as I was preparing to report back..." She said slowly looking at Daenerys intently, breathed in and then decided to just say it bluntly. "I saw a dragon flying above their army. I couldn't make out its color though."

Daenerys gasped before sharing a shocked look with Ranma. "Could Viserys have gotten around the Royal Navy somehow and gone down to Duskendale?"

"I wouldn't have credited it." Jason said with a frown, "but mayhap."

Ranma sighed. "I'll have to head forward with you Dacey. Fenris and I can sneak in when others wouldn't be able to." Fenris might not have Ghost's ability to, well, ghost around but he was still far better at moving through even scrub brush than any man could be. "Halt the army here for now, we'll be back by tomorrow morning."

The others dispersed to their various commands, while Ranma looked at Daenerys inquisitively. "You have a guess of who this could be?"

"The Iron Bank is the only force in Essos that has any interest in sticking their noses into the quagmire that is Westeros at the moment. If they threw in their lot with Stannis they could raise a mercenary army for him. The dragon though, maybe they didn't throw their lot in with Stannis, but found some other puppet king they could prop up, some dragonseed or other."

"Dragonseed?" Merry asked from where she had just gotten off Fenris' back. Already Eric was bringing up the horse she and Daenerys had shared since leaving Winterfell. Daenerys of course was spending most of her time up in the sky with her two dragons, so was only ever in the saddle for a bare hour or so every day.

"A word meaning a Targaryen by-blow, usually found on Dragonstone or Driftmark. I suppose a few of them could have survived..."

Ranma nodded grimly, understanding why this could be a problem. A mercenary army was poison to any land it passed through because most of its men would not be at all interested in ruling the land afterwards, simply plundering it now, and scum of the earth besides. And it also fucks up my plans something fierce. Dodging two army's is one thing, dodging three? "We'll figure out what this is then figure out a way to deal with them." he said aloud, his face showing stark resolve for a moment.

After kissing both girls on the cheek Ranma and Fenris moved ahead, while behind them the army halted its march, and began to fall out to make camp.

It took Ranma and Fenris a bare few hours to cross the distance to the farthest scout group towards Duskendale. Brynden Blackwood was the oldest son of Tytos, and his equal in terms of leaving small skirmishes and ambushes, though he had remained with the army when Meera and Tytos had been sent south. Brynden had found a small cave hidden in a small copse of trees about a half days ride away from the road and was using it as his base for now as he keep a look out on the approaching army.

He showed Ranma up to a nearby knoll, were Ranma pulled out his treasured spyglass, watching as the army coming from Duskendale came closer. "Do you have anything new to report?"

"Lady Dacey knew most of it when she left us Ranma." Brynden replied, showing none of the awe he was feeling at how quickly Ranma had crossed that same distance. Dacey had crossed it quickly, taking two thirds of a day or so to meet back up with the army, but even in comparison to that Ranma and Fenris were incredibly quick. "We've spotted a few banners among the outriders, I think we've spotted two, maybe three mercenary companies at least. And you're not going to like one of them my Lord."

"I don't like anything about this situation Brynden." Ranma smiled grimly still staring through the spyglass at the dust in the distance. "What is it?"

"One of them is the Golden Company my Lord." Brynden replied quietly.

Ranma turned to look at the man but seeing his seriousness he simply nodded. At least 10,000 men all of them trained and equipped better than most Lords in Westeros could field. Not as good as his own army, and Ranma would put his pike against their spear phalanx any day of the week, but still a very big threat. "All right, that tells me this army's dangerous, let's see what else we can figure out."

The two men remained silent, waiting. The sun was nearly falling, and rain had begun to patter down yet again when finally the front of the main force came into view. Ranma saw the elephants that had so astonished Dacey, while Fenris seemed to sit up abruptly, his nose turning in that same direction. "Don't tell me you can smell them from here?"

Fenris snored a lot a wolfish chuckle, nodding his head in the human manner as he sent an image. Big fat, smelly. A direwolf's sense of smell was better than even a normal wolf's, and a normal wolf's was among the best nature had ever devised. Fenris could find a single scent on the wind for leagues, and they were upwind of the army.

Ranma nodded pulling out of their connection with a shake of his head. "Interesting. I wonder how those elephants would react to my friend here..." He said scratching Fenris behind the ears grinning as wolfishly officially as his bonded for a moment while he looked over at Brynden.

Brynden winced, then smiled in reply.

A moment later, neither of them had had much interest in smiling. The army down there wasn't as large as their own, possibly around 14,000 or so, and there was not a single Westeros banner among them. What there was however, flying high over the entire army, was the banner of House Targaryen. "My lovely, so intelligent wife was right." Ranma said grimly. "It would appear as if the Iron Bank has found a patsy, or something else is going on here. We'll wait for tonight, then I'll sneak in, see if I can hear some of the talk among their army..."

OOOOOO

For various reasons the other three armies supply situations were not nearly as good as Ranma's which could have a cumulative effect on the road. Stannis faced Meera and Tytos' depredations on his foraging parties. Viserys faced Daryn's. But the army with the worse supply situation was Aegon's. Finding Duskenale not having much in the way of supply had forced him to supply his army off the land.

At first Aegon hadn't thought much of it, thinking the smallfolk would be happy to give his army food, happy to see the return of the Targaryen Dynasty. This concept was so off-target as to have no connection to reality whatsoever. Not that Aegon understood that. He simply put it down to this area of the Crownlands being uncertain of which Targaryen to follow.

Unlike the other army's however, Aegon was getting decent reports from his scouts, who had ranged ahead of the main army quite a ways, and had lost many of their number thanks to their opponents, but were still completing their missions. They had briefly seen the main bulk of the Northern/Riverlands army retreating back up towards Maidenpool at one point. Though since then they had not met with any great success, the Northern scouts keeping them at bay whatever they tried. Yet Varys network was still intact, and had reported that Stannis was in the area as well, marching to engage the Stargaryen force.

"Excellent!" Aegon said smacking his hands together for all the world like a child who'd just heard he was getting an extra present for his name day. "Varys, didn't you say that some of the Houses under Stannis will side with us the moment they see our banner? With that in mind, we might be able to smash both of these armies. After such a victory, and with my aunt either convinced to side with me or captured, Viserys will have to give over as well, wherever he is. And of course, his Dornish forces are not nearly as loyal as he believes."

"Be careful Young King." said Varys warningly. "Overconfidence has gotten many a ruler slain, and not just on the battlefield. Stannis and Ranma Stark have proven themselves to be dangerous generals, you would do well to not underestimate them."

"You worry too much eunuch." Said Old Griff, smiling thinly. "Stannis has only beaten his younger brother Renly in this war. That's no great feat, and before that, he was only in charge of naval battles or sieges. Naval battles are one thing, land battles are another and there is no easier a battle to plan for than a siege, either defending or attacking. As for young Stark, what wars did the Old Lion fight? He came late and never truly fought an actual enemy army in the war of the Usurper. He wasn't in charge of the overall strategy against the Ironborn, and before that Tywin simply smashed one or two houses one after another in punitive campaigns, not campaigns against an equal opponent."

Harry Strickland, captain general of the Golden Company exchanged glances with his commanders, particularly Tristan Rivers. They all saw this statement as yet another sign that their old comrade-in-arms had not retained his mental faculty over the years. Yes, sometimes sieges were ridiculously simple to plan for, but only a fool would ignore Stannis' ability as a general. And while Tywin's reputation had been based more in the realm of politics and backstabbing, from what Varys had passed on, which was quite a lot, the campaign that Ranma Stark had led against him had been a thing of beauty.

They were not nearly as confident. Indeed, the fact that three of the army's vying for the throne of Westeros had come together in this area of the continent was a sign that someone, either Stannis or Ranma had set it up in that manner. That was worrisome, as was the fact their scouts didn't seem to be able to get through the Northern and Riverlands scouts to what that army might be doing or what could be past it.

After Griff and Aegon left later that evening the remaining men, including Varys, continued the discussion.

"We've come too far back to back out now," said Gorys Edoryen, the paymaster of the Company. He was a cadaverous looking Volantene man with a pointed black beard and blood-red hair, who habitually wore a leopard skin draped across one shoulder. "We can't go back on our contract, not with the young fool, or the ones backing him. There's our reputation to consider, and the fact we don't have enough supplies to make it back to Essos even if we tried. Maybe if we left the elephants behind..."

"No." Harry said sharply, though all the men there knew it was more because he didn't want to leave the elephants behind than any care for the Golden Company's reputation. Strickland was not the most martial of men, though he was a good organizer. "You're right, and I'll hear no talk of us turning back. We came to win a throne, and that's what we'll do."

"I'm worried that we're only seeing what the Northerners want us to see." Lysono Maar said worriedly. He was the company spymaster, a feminine-looking fellow with lilac colored eyes and gold-white hair down to his shoulders. Yet he had been almost sidelined since arriving in Westeros, having no connections here. Then his place was further usurped by Varys.

Interacting with their scouts was the only job left to him now. "We've been losing two or three men for every one of theirs. Stranger's Hells, we've lost more men since meeting with their scouts than we did in taking Sharp Point or Stonedance. Then getting that one glimpse of their army, it's almost like they're baiting us."

Tristan shrugged. "We have to move forward quickly then, try to take some of the initiative away from them, get after the main army before they can prepare whatever surprise they are trying to do."

"Or retreat entirely back to Duskindale, get on our ships and head elsewhere, fight them on our terms after gathering more Westerosi support. I'm not happy about relying on the Reach houses turning for us mid-battle." Gorys countered.

Harry shook his head, looking over at Varys. "The Royal Navy, could it beat us back to Duskindale from wherever it is now?"

"They could certainly be back in Blackwater Bay before we reach the city." Varys replied. "My agent's last reported them near Gulltown, and Seaworth is an able seaman."

Duskindale had fallen easily enough to them, Lord Rykker lacking any kind of spine to face their army, especially since most of his defenses had been destroyed recently in the raid ordered by Viserys on the portion of the Royal Navy that had been left there in dock. Those docks themselves had been heavily damaged, and it had been a very nervous week while the army disembarked, its progress slowed badly by the damage.

"From the Gullet the fleet could possibly catch us in the port. I might not be a military man, but I believe that being attacked while your army is still being loaded onto your transports would not be a good thing, yes?"

"True enough." said Harry. "I'm not happy with how arrogant Aegon and Griff are, but when they say that our quality of troops can overwhelm our enemies they are starting a simple truth. The Reach cavalry against our spear phalanx?"

Or even northern pikes against them? They may get in a few kills, but eventually our discipline and the tightness of our formations will win out."

Varys was not a general, not a fighting man at all. He had no concept of how dangerous the Northern pike regiments were, and had downplayed them and their importance even more so than his agents who equally were not soldiers in the main. The Battle of the Ruby Ford had been put down to more to the Northerners ability to battle the Westerlanders in a smaller area, so that Tywin could not bring his full numbers to bare rather than the devastating striking power of the pikes.

"True enough." Said Tristan Rivers, smiling thinly. He was a bastard from the Riverlands, and was eager to head home the conqueror. "And after this war, we'll all be wealthy lords with our own lands!"

Marq Mandrake, a Westerosi native who had fallen into slavery once and then joined the Golden Company spoke up now. "You're all forgetting something: Stannis and the R'hllor whore he has somehow tamed."

Harry and the others all flinched at that reminder, and Marq went on grimly. "I'm worried more about the fact that we didn't know how effective this Red Witch's powers were before we took this contract. Shadow Warriors, burning the greatest city of Westeros with her powers? We don't have anything in our Company that can face such magic as that! And I'll tell you plain, I don't care a thing about our history of never breaking a contract, me and mine will run to fight another day rather than face such as that."

Varys smiled thinly. "Let me worry about the Red Witch Sers, trust me she won't be an issue."

Later that evening as he sat at a small writing desk Varys looked up sharply at a small noise, almost unseen at the edge of his hearing. Moving far faster than most would give him credit for Varys pulled out a small extremely sharp stiletto from a hidden fold of his garish clothing.

Turning slowly he stopped when a voice from far closer than the noise had indicated. "Valar Morghulis. Greetings from Illyrio, Master of Whispers. You and he have retained my sentences for one life. Do you know the name of the one whose death you have bought?"

Varys licked suddenly dry lips. "I, I wish for you to kill the woman named Melisandre, the follower of R'hllor that sits at Stannis' elbow."

For a moment the man in the shadows of the tent was silent. When he spoke again, the voice came from a far corner, well away from the first place the voice had indicated. "That is indeed the name given to me. Yet since coming to Westeros, I have heard more of her powers, things I did not know before. You and your friend either deceived us, or were deceived in turn. It matters not, but what does is the price. It has gone up, by three times the amount."

"Thr!" Varys gasped, unable to even get the word out for a moment. The initial price had been practically a king's ransom, begging every single bank account Varys had access to, and more than half Illyrio's estate in Pentos. Three times that amount...I can't promise that! That, that's something like 28 million gold dragons!

The number was so ludicrously large that calculating it actually snapped Varys out of his initial shock. Wait, the Faceless Men believe the contracts are a sacred bond with their Many-Faced-God. They would never haggle once a contract is made, even if the danger of the mission goes up. What is this?

After a moment he sat down again, staring straight ahead rather than continuing to futilely try to find the assassin in the shadows. "I see. I cannot promise that amount, and I believe you know that. What is it you actually want, that you would haggle with me now?"

A tense few moments of silence passed before the man replied. "Equivalent exchange. The Guild has sent me a mission, one passed on to me from within. I require information. Information on the whereabouts of one called Arya Stark..."

OOOOOO

"Viserys' army is about a week behind us." Said Daryn as he leapt out of his horse to clasp forearms with Ranma. "We well and truly blinded them these past few days, and did what we could to make their army go hungry as well as possible."

He watched through grim eyes as Daenerys alighted off her current mount, Rhaegon, shaking his head angrily. "I lost over 220 men thanks to Viserys using his dragon against us. He burned an entire village of smallfolk houses and his own men to kill some of mine not two days back."

Daenerys winced. "I'm sorry you had to go through that Daryn, but my little ones and I will do what we can to make certain that those are the last of our men that died from dragonfire."

"I hope you're successful in that my lady, it is a horrible way to go." Daryn shivered for a moment, remembering his own close call with that particular death but reached forward to clasp hands with her in greeting as well.

Dacey nodded. "And the other Targaryen army is coming up from the south about a week away."

"Other Targaryen army? What have I missed?" Daryn asked, blinking.

"A lot." Ranma said with a shrug. "But not enough to make my initial plan unworkable."

"Ranma..." Daenerys said gritting her teeth behind a faint smile "I think we're becoming a little overconfident here."

"No." Ranma said with a faint smile of his own, touching her cheek gently. "We're not. Oh, the initial plan isn't workable in terms of us sitting out the battle entirely. We don't have enough room to evade them all. But remember Dae, these armies aren't going to work together. They're going to be fighting each other just as much as us. And that will cause chaos."

"And chaos is where you thrive." She said smiling now. "Stannis doesn't, nor my brother!"

"Exactly." Ranma said with a nod. "Stannis might know this is coming, but he won't back out. He'd have to skirt wide down the road, then head down to Duskendale itself, and if an army just came from there there's no telling that that city will be able to feed his army. Tytos and Meera cost them too much in the way of supply for him to get anywhere else. He has to smash us, then move to Maidenpool to resupply there."

"Besides, Stannis is arrogant," Myrcella said from where she was sitting as usual on Fenris well on the march. "He doesn't think that anyone else is as strong, honorable, or smart as he is. He looked down even on Father for that, not just because he was resentful of being passed over for Lordship of Storm's End as was his right. He's also 'beaten' you once already Ranma, he'll think he has the measure of you now."

Ranma nodded at her, reaching out to ruffle his hair, but his eyes were grim. "I think it's we need to start preparing a new warm reception for all three of our enemies. Dacey, hand over command of the scouts to Brynden entirely and Daryn, you get back to your men. Don't try to block their scouts unless they are getting close, don't let them see our army or get around us."

He turned to Lucas Blackwood as Dacey nodded and Daryn went off, mumbling something about wanting to get some food before heading back out. "Lucas, get back out there and find your father. I want him here with the rest of the army soonest, but tell him to leave a third of his men out there under Meera. They are to get around Stannis' army, but stay utterly out of sight for now. I want them ready to attack the army from behind if they see an opening, but not until the army is fully engaged with us."

"I'm still hopeful that we can at least talk this pawn the Iron Bank has found into joining us. Our control of the Golden Tooth means that paying off the debt they believe the Iron Throne owes them won't be so arduous now. But that will depend on what role he is playing." Daenerys mused, leaning against Fenris and resting her head on Myrcella's leggings-clad thigh for a moment. "I could wish that I am not going to face a family member regardless, I have no desire to become a kinslayer."

"We all do what we must." Ranma said with sigh. "I would take that off you if I could, but given the fact I'll have to be trying to control the battle and match the Shadow Warriors and Melisandre, I don't know if I'll be able to."

The Wolfsworn around him nodded, understanding what technique Ranma and thought would be able to match a dragon in flight. The Lords around them however looked askance at his confidence. All save for Tristan, who had seen that maneuver Ranma had done to clear the area around him in the battle at Butterwell.

"So what's the plan?" Jason asked.

Ranma smiled. "You were wondering why I ordered so many shovels from Riverrun my Lord, now they're going to be put to use."

Over the next few days while the other armies continued to close with them the men of the Royal Army took turns resting, working on preparing fortifications, and training. Ranma, the Wolfsworn and even the lords and Daenerys took part in all of the work going on, lending their expertise, strength and simply more hands to the projects, and within a week the army, its esprit-de-corps higher than ever, completed the fortifications Ranma wanted.

The fortifications was a triangular line of ditches set between three large nearly L-shaped forts made out of wood cut from a nearby copse of trees, which almost denuded the entire copse. They were very simple forts only about two stories tall, with a parapet and overhead roofs supported by four pillars. But they were solid affair without any kind of stairwell. The individuals manning them had to climb up their sides via ropes.

As archer platforms they worked very well and each fortification could hold at least 400 archers, facing in every direction. The sides of them and the top had also all been covered with mud, and thanks to the now near daily rain they might be able to survive a fireball either from the Red Witch or the dragons of the enemy.

Maybe. If the dragon came in on an angle the men inside them might not. Then again if it did, they might be able to fire back anyway. But the army seemingly had confidence in Daenerys and her 'little ones' to protect them from other airborne threats. The Red Witch was another matter entirely, but Ranma had proven to have his own powers before this, and morale was high despite the rumors about her.

The forts were connected by several prepared ditches of various sizes. More than a few of those on the side of the triangle facing where Stannis' army would be coming from were then covered over by wooden slats which were then covered with mud and still living grass. It almost looked like normal ground if you weren't looking closely, and Ranma figured that they had a two out of three chance of working.

Behind the ditches was an earthwork about waist high, with a step behind it. This was true on all sides, though the ditches were not as complete on them, and there were several places where there was no ditch or earthwork, but there the pikemen of House Manderly were assigned, a show of trust that made them all puff their chests out in pride.

After it was all finished Ranma allowed the army an entire day off, even opening the very small and closely guarded wine supply to let every man have a single cup at Daenerys' insistence. The army, ecstatic by this act and proud of the work they had accomplished, cheered the royals loudly. The army truly felt now that they had a chance to win this war outright, regardless of the number of their enemies.

OOOOOO

The next day, the other three armies of the pretenders to the throne had finally seen both the main Royal Army and one another. The reactions of the commanders among them to the other armies' presence were varied. Viserys was wrathful, furious that anyone else dared to use the banner of the Targaryens, while his cousin was furious at the fact that he had no idea that Viserys was even in the area, blaming Varys for this as well as his own scouts showing a temper that reminded all too many of them about the stories of Mad King Aerys.

Stannis however was amused and incredibly impressed. "He did it." He murmured shaking his head with a faint smile.

"Azor Ahai?" asked Melisandre looking at him quizzically.

"Oh, I knew that Ranma wanted my army and Viserys' to fight, but even so, he still tried to keep on and might well have done it, simply leaving the three of us to fight it out between us if not for the fact that my army stands directly between him and the Riverlands lands. He has Crackclaw Point behind him, and no one wants to take an army through that land, even if they get local support." Crackclaw Point was dominated by dales, bogs, craggy hills and pine barrens, a wilderness which no army could move through easily.

"Instead he decided to fight here, taking the time to throw up those fortifications. Very good, very good indeed. This will be of tough battle, but I think our numbers advantage and the fact that all of us are fighting one another will give us the victory."

OOOOOO

The day was too far gone for any of the armies to launch full-scale attacks and strangely to Ranma's mind there were proprieties to be considered. "I can't believe we're doing this." Ranma said to his wife. "You don't honestly think that diplomacy is going to do anything at this point do you? Stannis, this 'Aegon' and Viserys all want the Iron Throne, even if the symbol of your family's rule is gone, and we're just as determined to not let them take it."

Daenerys smiled at his honest confusion. "Yes I know you just want to get this over with, but there are pragmatic reasons behind this. I've spoken to Lord Ashford, and I think least a few of the Reach Lords following Stannis might rethink that allegiance given our stance towards Mace. And Mace at the very least will be upset by it. If a few of those Lords decide to pull their men out of the battle citing divided loyalties that could let us tip the numbers in our favor against him.

"As for my brother, I believe that his Dornish allies are nowhere near as securely in his camp as he likes to think, unless Arianne is pregnant." Daenerys scowled. "There is no way my brother could have convinced Doran to back open war if not for a blood tie like that. And, we need to find as much out about this dragonseed and the Golden Company's reason behind this invasion as we can."

Looking at his wife Ranma frowned a little. One of Dacey's men had gotten close enough to over hear some of the Golden Company's scouts. They spoke of someone going by the name of Aegon, and Ranma knew that had been the name of Rhaegar's son.

Dacey had shared that tidbit with both of them, but Daenerys refused to use the name in relation to the man. "You realize if he actually believes that shit, his claim to the Iron Throne is stronger than yours, right? The line of succession always goes to the son of the oldest son, rather than to a daughter or younger son of the father."

"He's not my nephew Ranma!" Daenerys growled, frowning with a hint of anger in her voice. "My nephew died thanks to the Gregor Clegane's butchery." She smiled suddenly looking at him. "Have I thanked you for killing that monster lately?"

"You did that often enough before we married, my love." Ranma replied, that smiling faintly and nodding over at Jason and the other Lords, who arrayed themselves behind the two royals. Along one side of the pavilion that Daenerys had insisted they put up outside bow range in full view of the other three armies the Wolfsworn present stood like a grim honor guard. Silas, the only Lord among them who had been to Essos said close by Ranma on his other side, ready to tell him what he could about the men from 'Aegon's' army.

Besides the pavilion itself, which was basically a giant tarp which had originally been used for the dragons pulled taut over their heads, there was very little in the way of comfort. The table and chairs were all camp tables and chairs, simple folding affairs. Ranma, Daenerys and most of their lords wore armor, over which furs were hung. Even their crowns, commissioned by Greatjon and Jason in Riverrun and given to Ranma and his wife recently as gifts, reflected this austerity.

Ranma's crown was made out of hammered steel to look like wolf fangs, with a single gold fang in the direct center. Between each fang etched into the hammered steel of the circlet itself were wavy lines signifying rivers. Daenerys's tiara was also steel, but it was burnished instead of hammered, it almost gave the steel a shine. Silver was worked into it, showing small dragons in flight in position over her ears.

Taken all at once the image the two conveyed was of austere majesty. There was no pomp and panoply here, simply authority which came from who they were, not the roles they had assumed.

"How likely is it that we will be able to persuade Mace and the Reach forces to back off as a whole, my lady?" said Rickard. He had never met Mace or any of the Reach Lords, so had no knowledge of them as individuals.

Daenerys hadn't met them of course, but she had studied them and had closely questioned Lord Ashford about them, as she had told Ranma. Ashford was standing in one corner of the pavilion, looking noticeably tense. "I'm afraid that there isn't much chance of that my Lord, a portion of them perhaps, but not Mace. He is too arrogant to take our news about Highgarden and the lord Paramountcy lying down."

"It will almost certainly goad him into foolish actions however. We will see..." Daenerys broke off as she felt her dragons, who were lying outside the pavilion, stirring. Looking at them she frowned, reaching through their mental connection for a moment. Seeing through their senses Daenerys scowled angrily leaping to her feet. "They dare!?"

Ranma looked at her surprise, then over to where Fenris was now staring up as well where he was lying at the back of the pavilion. Then he frowned as well, but before he could do anything Daenerys had moved forward, leaving the pavilion to stare up into the sky.

From the sky above two dragons could be seen circling one another warily. For a moment Daenerys thought that they might actually come to blows right away but it was not to be. Both dragons landed, hissing and snarling at one another then at Sunfyre and Rhaegon.

One of the newcomers was a massive black dragon, and Daenerys stared at it in shock, noticing Viserys on his back and realizing this was the dragon from the third egg her blood and the fire in Illyrio's manse had hatched. The other was a red and brown colored beast smaller than even Sunfyre, barely large enough to carry a rider, but seemed snappish. Not as ill-tempered as the larger black one, but still more wild than her own two.

Sunfyre, normally the best behaved of her little ones, reared back hissing angrily at both the largest beast and the smaller. Rhaegon too angrily reared his head up, snapping and flicking its tongue out at the black dragon. Flames started to appear at the back of Rhaegon's mouth, but Daenerys sent a mental command to him, and he closed his mouth with a cluck.

The two new dragons continued to hiss and roar as hers until she opened her mind in that strange manner that Ranna had taught her, not concentrating on her own two dragons, simply shouting "Stop!" at the top of her mental and physical voice.

The word hit like a hammer blow and both new dragons fell back, nearly upsetting their riders, who had yet to dismount. The two dragons stared at her, and she glared back, completely without fear.

"Still!" She ordered in Valerian and sharply gestured with her hands down. She noted with the portion of her mind that was not busy at the moment the amusing look of consternation on the faces of Viserys and this unknown dragonseed's at the dragons obeying her. As the dragons subsided, Daenerys stared at the two men in the eyes for a moment. "There will be no fighting here, not right now. This is a parlay occurring under a flag of truce, not some, some kind of dick beating contest!"

Yet it was taking all of her energy to keep these two new beasts from breaking her control. The smaller beast wasn't fighting her so much. It was angry at her commands yes but obeying Daenerys as a younger dragon would a far older one. Of course there was none of the love or affection that she had built up with Sunfyre at Rhaegon there, simply respect.

Yet somehow she could feel this dragon saw the connection between Daenerys and her two little one. There was a sense of wonder there, yet it also shied back, a very odd feeling.

But the black dragon, the black dragon was another matter entirely. It was insane, there is no other word for it. Its mind was snarling, angry, and mad its own head, it reveled in the struggle in pain, it wanted to unleash its fires all the time, to burn everything. By the gods old and new, what did Viserys do to you? This was beyond even her worst dreams, she could sense the taint of its madness, cloying in its brain, could see the scars on its flanks and necks, and bile rose in her mouth.

In her anger at the two dragons Daenerys hadn't even noticed the parties that had followed them on horseback, and now she turned to them. She stared at Arianne then at the woman with her, who was one of the better looking women Daenerys had ever seen, an incongruous thing to notice here.

The men of the Golden Company were also not what she expected, there was not one among them who she would peg as a Lord or noble at all, they looked like what they were, rich mercenaries wearing their worldly possessions on their bodies. They seemed barbarically impressive, but time spent in the North had shown her that austerity bred much tougher men than those who wallowed in wealth.

"Remove your beasts." She ordered the two dragonriders. "Your parties may remain here until you return."

"You have your dragons here sister, it's only fair I keep Balerion! I'm certainly not going to let you..."

"My little ones are trained," said Daenerys coldly, reaching out to rub Rhaegon's neck while the larger of her two was glaring angrily at the black beast, who continued to try to break her control. "Your Balerion isn't, it would attack the moment I turn my back. I will send my two back to our camp the moment you and yours are gone, that is the best you're going to get, brother dear."

Viserys scowled, but realized that was the case. He had underestimated the aggressiveness Balerion would feel towards other dragons. He liked it, he liked that aspect a lot. He was eager now for the battle to begin so that he could unleash Balerion's stronger fire and larger body on the smaller ones who had obviously been coddled by her sister. Let alone the one that was somehow being flown by a lowly dragonseed with delusions of grandeur. "We'll see how you and your 'little ones' do in battle later sister." He scowled pulling his dragon's head around. "I will return anon."

Balerion's wings flapped, smacking into Sunfyre and the other smaller dragon, both of whom hissed angrily but were stilled by the weight of Daenerys's mind on them.

With the larger threat dealt with Daenerys turned to the dragonseed. Still in the saddle, he puffed himself up importantly, smiling in what he possibly thought was a winsome manner. "Dear aunt, there is no need for this of hostility, as he can see my Calixares is..."

"I cannot allow you to retain Calixares and send only my brother's Balerion away. As I said, this is a parlay, peace will be discussed here, posing and showing off has no place here. You have proven that at least you have Targaryen blood, well done." She said as concession. "Anything else can be discussed later. For now take your dragon back to your camp please."

The supposed Aegon raised an eyebrow, his smile segueing into a scowl. "Or what, Viserys might feel some familial loyalty to you, but mine is the strongest claim, by what right do you give me orders?"

"I don't give you orders." Daenerys said smiling thinly. "If common courtesy does not move you, then I'll give an order to your dragon itself."

The man scowled, wondering if he should call her bluff but given what she had already done, calming four of the beasts so dramatically, he decided not to chance that it was a bluff at all. With a final scowl he turned Calixares around then ordered it into the air.

Once the two interlopers were gone Daenerys spent a few moments caressing Sunfyre and Rhaegon's heads. She sent them thoughts of affection and happiness that they didn't lose control along with pride in the same. Then she told them to find Myrcella, who would have a tasty meal for them, some bear meat that had been taken by a one of their foraging parties. Not as good as crab, but crab did not travel well. With that done Daenerys barely nodded at the two groups that had followed the dragons before entering the pavilion, allowing them to gawk after her.

Varys was staring after her thoughtfully as were the Golden Company commanders, while everyone in Arianne's party was looking shocked. Nymeria in particular was watching her with narrowed eyes, wondering how in the Stranger's Hells the woman had somehow controlled Balerion, who even his rider had trouble with.

For his part Petyr was now very worried. He had not wanted to be a part of this parlay, for various reasons, but Viserys had insisted and he had not been able to get out of it. Not good, if she can control the beasts even that little a bit, they might be useless against her forces in battle. Without Balerion, our forces are by far the last least effective of the four gathered here in open battle. And then there is my old adversary Varys being among this 'Aegon's' army...

Varys was thinking along similar lines except his thoughts held more self-recrimination than Petyr's. I should've decided to back her entirely, rather than switch my allegiance to the easily led young Aegon. I had proof that Stark was more capable than I had thought, why didn't I think that the same could be said of the woman he took to wife? That bit of news had finally reached his ears, far too slow for his liking, but he had finally heard of it. But with Stark married to her, I doubt I could insinuate myself into their camp right now.

Others were dismayed as well, but not for the same reason as the others. Arianne was dismayed at seeing this dragonseed at all, realizing his presence meant any attempt to bring the Iron Bank to their side was useless. Her cousins were dismayed to see the acrimony between the three Targaryen factions, already seeing that bringing even two of them to the same side might be impossible.

While the two groups were discussing what happened and Daenerys was sitting down next to her husband demurely to grins from all around her, Stannis, Melisandre and his party arrived. Stannis wore a crown of gold denoted with flames and rubies, much like the one Viserys and the pretender were wearing though with different jewels.

Seeing this Ranma stood up, his face becoming grim as he recognized Mace from the description Margaery had given him once of her father. "If you'll excuse me, I need to go perform an pleasant duty." He moved to the edge of the pavilion, noting absently that it had begun to rain again, a light spritz that no doubt would continue through the rest of the day.

He nodded his head in acknowledgment of Lord Stannis. "Lord Stannis Baratheon, we never met, though my father thought highly of you before this all began. I'm Ranma Stark. I've met some of your witch's minions before this." He smiled thinly, watching as Stannis's eyes narrowed. "For now however, you probably noticed that we had to send Viserys and this newcomer back, so it will be a while before the parlay can actually commence."

Stannis nodded his head jerkily. "Your wife should never have brought her own dragons to this meeting, that was simply asking for trouble from those two. This should have been between men, and the fewer the better at the outset."

"Hindsight is always better than foresight my Lord, but that is neither here nor there. But I did not come out here to greet you. I wish to speak to Lord Mace for a moment alone, if I could."

Stannis stared at him, then nodded and Ranma gestured Lord Ashford to join them. Mace scowled angrily. "Bah, whatever you wish to say to me can be said here! Are you going to demand a price for Ashford's parole, and where is my son if so?" He barked a laugh. "Hah, I bet you don't want to release him because you're scared of meeting him in battle!"

No news of the outcome of Ashford's and Loras' chase of the bastard king and his party had reached Mace. Stannis had heard about the outcome from Melisandre, and had not deemed it important enough to share with the man, but that battle had not been witnessed by any smallfolk, so word of it had not spread far yet.

"Lord Mace, I regret to inform you that your son Loras died nearly a month ago. He was killed by Jaime Kingslayer in battle. My own forces came upon the battle after Jaime and Lord Serret's forces had ambushed their pursuers, though Lord Ashford will be able to tell you more."

"No!" Mace said, his face going white and he clutched his heart for a moment over his breastplate, staggering back as the other Reach lords in earshot cursed and exclaimed in shock. "No! You lie! My son was the most magnificent knight in all of Westeros, no one could best him, not even the Kingslayer!"

"I'm sorry to say Lord Tyrell, but it's the truth." Lord Ashford said somewhat hesitantly. "We had chased the Bastard King for days, and scored a major victory against them once. But in the chase after that we had exhausted ourselves thinking that Lord Serret and his men were also exhausting themselves. But then they turned on us, catching us unawares. We lost much of our own men, and it was only the timely intervention of the Northerners that allowed any of us to survive."

Ashford sighed sadly, shaking his head. "I personally saw your son fall, and how Lord Stark avenged him. He the Kingslayer's sword arm off at the elbow, and has since sent him to the Wall."

"He should've been killed! The man was a traitor to all Westeros, an oathbreaker twice over!" Stannis said harshly joining the conversation while Mace's face went white, his knees seeming to fail him.

Though he would never admit it to anyone, Loras had long been his favorite. Willas had been touted by his grandmother so frequently with Mace's own intelligence compared negatively to his oldest son that a distance had grown between them. Garlan had not spent much time at home since he was 12, being sent to ward with House Tarly, then marrying right after returning from that before moving in to live with his wife's family. Margaery of course was a woman, and thus not as important in Mace's eyes save as a bargaining chip.

But Loras, Loras had been his favorite. A peerless knight Loras who had listened to Mace, and often times agreed with his ideas, who followed his instructions and getting closer to Renly and to the royal house. Strong, dependable, honorable, and willing to follow Mace without question unlike his older siblings Loras had been all Mace wanted in a child. His death was like a saber to Mace's heart.

"I would've executed him, except we need every able sword we can get on the Wall, which is the reason this parlay in the first place Lord Baratheon." Ranma said to Stannis, motioning Stannis to move to one side while Lord Ashford continued to talk about Loras and his last campaign to Mace.

Melisandre's eyes narrowed having followed the two. "So you know of the Great Other as well? Then why do you fight against the Azor Ahai! Is it just in misplaced lust for your wife and a wish to bow to her ambitions?"

"The word is love, Witch," said Ranma scowling at her. "I love my wife and that is never 'misplaced'. Besides, you sent your Shadow Warriors to attack her while she was under my protection but not yet my wife. No House could honorably surrender someone who they had vowed protections to, especially not to such a force as you sent against us."

Melisandre scowled while Stannis did the same toward her, motioning Melisandre to be silent. Ranma nodded and went on. "But as to the Others, the White Walkers? Yes I've known of them and planned for it. This war I had not planned, but we're here now, and what has happened in the past cannot be undone." He smiled thinly looking over Stannis's shoulder. "I see that 'Aegon' or whoever he is and Viserys have arrived, shall we sit?"

By the time Viserys and his supposed nephew arrived Stannis and Melisandre had taken their seats at the table opposite Ranma and Daenerys, though more than one lord had stopped, stunned to see Ser Barristan Selmy standing behind where Daenerys was sitting. The fact he was still alive, and apparently had given his fealty to Ranma and Daenerys, came as an unpleasant shock to many.

The two Targaryen members glared at one another as they sat opposite on the other two sides of the table, their own parties ranging behind them. Harry Strickland sat to Aegon's right while Grif sat on his left. Arianne sat to one side of Viserys, while Jorah Mormont sat to his other.

Jorah could barely tear his eyes away from Daenerys, she was simply magnificent! I should have murdered Viserys when I had the chance, then Illyrio and I could have backed Daenerys entirely, maybe even found a way to get out of marrying her off to that Dothraki barbarian! Too late now, damn it all!

When he did tear his eyes away from Daenerys, he found his niece Dacey glaring at him. She was standing directly behind Ranma, her eyes locked on Jorah like she wanted nothing more than to take his life right then, and he frowned, not having expected to see her, or any of his family really, and he looked away rapidly.

"I am uncertain why we are meeting like this at all." Viserys said angrily looking around at the others. "Unless some of you have had a sudden change of heart, we have nothing to talk about! Baratheon, you and your family are regicides, only you immediately bowing to me will negate that! As for you Stark, if my sister renounces her claim on the throne, I will let you and yours live and return to the North provided you swear to never raise blade against me and my House again. Yet I know neither is likely!"

Viserys didn't want to show it, but he was badly rattled by his sister's ability to control Balerion even if only a few moments with just the power of her voice and glare. Before that he would've settled for nothing but their deaths, but now, with the very real possibility that he might lose Balerion if they came down to a fight between him and his sister, he was willing to deal.

"To me you mean, they should bow to me." Said the blue haired youth across from Viserys, smiling thinly. He held out a hand, and Varys put a scroll in it, before going back to leering, in a semi-discreet manner, at Daenerys and the other ladies in the tent. All of them were gorgeous but his aunt was head and shoulders above the others. No one said my aunt was so gorgeous! Hmmm... She hasn't gotten bred by the Stark yet, and keeping the line true is important...

He smiled in what he thought was a winning manner. Daenerys thought it made him look like a simpleton. "I am Aegon, son of Rhaegar, firstborn of the last King, the last true King of Westeros. The lines of succession are clear uncle, and here are my proofs. My Dragon and my ability to bond with it, and the word of Varys and my own retainer, Jon Connington, who Rhaegar trusted above all others. The two of them secreted me out of King's Landing before the Lannister's betrayal with my mother's contrivance, replacing my body with that of a dragonseed, his hair dyed to look like mine."

"You do realize that the Iron Throne is gone? Any kind of credence or legitimacy you might have thought to take from it is gone with it." Ranma asked lightly while Daenerys smiled thinly. Since the two of them had decided long before the throne was actually destroyed to toss it aside as a symbol of power, it mattered not at all to them. But that bland statement badly rattled Viserys and Aegon, even though they must've heard of it before. They stopped and stared at the two of them, their jaws working angrily before glaring at Stannis.

Stannis glared right back. "King's Landing had to be cleansed. A plague, in that city? Yes, I could've continued the cordon, I could've continued to starve the people within. But would that have been a better way to die? Better to die quickly in fire than a slow lingering death like that to disease and malnourishment."

He glared at all three of those posing as king', before concentrating on Aegon then glaring at Jon. "I remember Jon Connington, and you do look like him, if sickly. I also remember the rumors that you were infatuated with Rhaegar. That you would do anything he asked. That you could come up with a plot to somehow avenge him is easily within the realm of possibility, regardless of any truth behind it. I saw the bodies of Elia and her children, and how the Lannisters betrayal had taken everyone in the Red Keep by surprise, even Varys. This youth is no more a pure Targaryen than I am!"

Viserys found himself agreeing with Stannis for a moment, moving past the fact of the Iron Throne and King's Landing being gone to tackle the current issue. "Anything that comes from the Master of Whisper's mouth is a lie! You might have enough Targaryen blood in you to get a dragon to obey you, but that does not make you my nephew Aegon, nor does it give you the right to call yourself King!"

"Nor does senseless brutality or a dragon to your name." Ranma said. "We've heard what you did in Dragonstone. Do you think that makes you a better option for kingship than this 'Aegon'? The fact you sit there with the traitor Littlefinger and the coward and slaver Jorah Mormont isn't exactly a mark in your favor either."

He smiled thinly, his blue eyes darker than the ocean. "By the way, my mother wants to see you Petyr, well, no, she wants to see your head. My father told her all about your betrayal of him, and how you were the one to convince Robert to send me away, and she was quite emphatic about wanting me to send her your head. Possibly with a bow attached, though personally I just want to kill you, not emasculate you like that."

Petyr gulped, torn between fear, grief and anger. So she truly has forsaken me entirely. Very well, I knew it long before this, and Sansa was always the better option anyway, unsullied as she is.

He let none of his thoughts show however, merely sitting there silent while Jorah scowled at the accusations thrown his way, accurate though they were. Yet Jorah couldn't say anything, pinned in place by the cool contempt in Daenerys' eyes, forcing him to look away.

Viserys however growled angrily, ignoring the accusations thrown at his advisor's feet. "My family conquered Westeros through fire and steel, and if I have to do the same I'll do it!"

"I would say that since only Dorne has agreed to follow you, that is a very high possibility. But what will be left of the country after brother?" Daenerys asked, angrily smacking her hand on the table. "We've also heard rumors about the campaign that set the Viper on, would you rule over a nation of dead?"

She turned to Aegon. "As for you, I agree with what has been said about your claims, that is all they are claims! Varys cannot be trusted, a traitor to not one but two Kings, who has always followed those who will promise him more power and security. And your own power is based on much the same, money. I don't see a single Lord of Westeros with you, I see mercenaries, bought and paid for by the iron Bank no doubt."

"Hah, that is just because we haven't been in Westeros over long!" Aegon proclaimed grandly. "I'll gather more allies given time. And I'd say uncle that in terms of conquering Westeros I've made a far better start than you! Varys said that Dragonstone and Driftmark were both taken from you the moment you fled with your tail between your legs from the Royal Navy! Whereas I have already conquered two houses on Massey's Hook!"

Two of the men with Stannis flinched at that, but Ranma simply shook his head. "Fire and sword, is that all you know? And I wouldn't get all puffed up about attacking two Houses when their fighting men were elsewhere."

Stannis nodded, holding up a hand to halt the two men, Lord Massey and Lord Bar Emmon, from speaking. "I agree with Stark on that point, but I would ask if you would be willing to ransom any prisoners of those families at this point."

"We took only two captive from Massey, and none from Bar Emmon." Aegon replied, shaking his head, smiling thinly. "One I doubt you'll want back and the other I refuse to part with for now. Until I get a replacement at least." He leered at Daenerys and Arianne suggestively but neither replied verbally, simply answering his leer with disdainful glares.

Lord Massey growled his hand clenched on his sword hilt. But Stannis held up a hand again, forcing the man to calm himself while Ranma, understanding what the boy was hinting at, growled angrily, the sound sending a shiver up more than one spine.

Next to him Daenerys sighed faintly leaning back but her eyes were hard, nailing Aegon to his seat. "I had hoped to speak to a representative of the Iron Bank, to convince them to back off from paying for this mad venture. With the Golden Tooth under our control, we could pay off the debt in its entirety given time."

The Golden Company men looked interested at that, though Aegon and Jon Connington sneered contemptuously at the idea. Daenerys shook her head. "However hearing what you have already done along with your own position, that option is off the table. Instead, my husband and I will reiterate our position. There is no debt accrued to us, and you and yours will pay dearly in blood to get your gold worth out of Westeros."

"And so we come down to what really makes a king." Stannis said smiling thinly. "No previous claim of Lordship or family ties matter here, only brute force. I broke my brother's army, I have the Reach and the might of the Stormlands and the Crownlands behind me. And I have the prophetess Melisandre, her powers are mine to use."

He looked at Ranma especially, understanding he was the most dangerous threat and the most reasonable. "I am the Azor Ahai, the one prophesied to beat back the White Walkers, or as Melisandre puts it, the Great Other. Join with me, and I will guarantee you, your family and your wife safety so long as you swear fealty."

"What talk is this?" Viserys scowled angrily though if that was at being ignored for a few moments or the talk of something he hadn't heard about before, none could say. "What is this Great Other?"

Melisandre spoke up from where she had sat silent up till now beside Stannis. "The Great Other is a creature of darkness and death, of cold endless winter. It is coming with the power of winter, and we have very little time before disaster strikes."

Ranma looked at her, frowning at the knowledge that it wasn't only the Old Gods who were seeing disaster on the horizon. They had barely a little under a month to go before the ultimatum of two months was over, and frankly from here there was no way he could get his army up to the North in time, not its entirety. Even if they could take to sea that would be impossible.

But that was neither here nor there. "Actually, you don't have the Reach behind you. You have some of its military force, and it's deposed Lord Paramount. Mace Tyrell, your daughter and oldest son have decided my Lord that you have made too many mistakes. You allowed the Reach to be attacked while you were off trying to put kingmaker, and you have backed a follower of a foreign god, going so far as to pledge your daughter to a then-married man." he said looking at Mace who had apparently gotten over his shock at Loras' death and was now puffing himself up like a fish, glaring angrily back at him.

"The Reach, through your daughter Lady Margaery, has sworn to follow us. We've already sent them aid, doing your job for you Mace and will send more if need be." Daenerys took over from Ranma smoothly, holding up the message Margaery sent him. "If you wish you may examine this missive Lady Margaery sent us, essentially pleading for aid and in return placing Highgarden, and in particular herself, at our service regardless of your own actions."

"How dare you!" Mace yelled, making no move to take the message. "My children have done no such thing!"

Behind Mace and Stannis however, many of the Reach lords and knights were looking at one another in shock, and, though many were trying to hide it, hope. Others seemed concerned, which made sense on many levels of course, but regardless it was obvious to Daenerys that Mace's control of the Reach lords wasn't as total as he thought. But Melisandre had turned her body slightly so that she was watching them as well as the men behind Ranma, and most of their faces blanked quickly.

"My Lord." Said Lord Ashford quietly, as if to mirror Daenerys' thoughts. "I gave them my parole and my oath willingly. Loras, your son, he did not wish to follow Stannis. Not just because of his personal friendship with Renly, but because of Stannis's religion, as Lord Stark has said. How can you stand there and follow a fire worshiper, who listens to a witch who burns people alive! The lord who burned the entirety of King's Landing, whatever the reason!"

The septon Ehric took this opportunity to speak up, his voice solemn, soft yet carrying to every ear, and what he said caused even more consternation among the lords behind Stannis, than Ranma's statement. Even one or two houses among the Dornish contingent seemed startled. "The conclave of the Devout of the Seven has decided that Ranma and Daenerys Stargaryen are the right king and queen of Westeros. Her Majesty wears the sign of this backing at her side."

Daenerys smiled thinly pulling Dark Sister out of its sheathe slowly, holding it up to the light of the torches in the corners of the pavilion so that the others could see the Valyrian blade. "Dark Sister, the sword of Visenya Targaryen last wielded by Bloodraven, which was lost in the Dance of the Dragons, given to me by the Seven's representative as proof of their backing. As a sign of the rightness of our cause, one of the two blades House Targaryen wielded when they conquered Westeros takes some beating."

In response Viserys' teeth clenched, and Aegon and Varys scowled. Varys in particular was angry because Daenerys was right, as a sign of her primacy over the other two Targaryen claimants, that and her dragons were incredibly hard to beat. Stranger's Hell's, why couldn't Blackfyre have really been among the Golden Company, with that at least Aegon would have something the others would have to respect in terms of his claim. I truly did back the wrong horse in this race, curse it! And with Ranma of the oh-so-blindly honorable Starks sitting next to her, I could never convince her to allow me to switch sides, at least not without getting her alone first.

Stannis however ignored the sword, addressing the more important aspect in a combative tone of voice while Melisandre continued to sneak glances at their own lords. "Where were the Seven when we needed them? They never answered our prayers, never gave us power! When Melisandre asks R'hllor for power, it replies, that is all there is to it. I believe what I can see. The Seven, I have never seen proof of their existence!"

"R'hllor is the true god, all others are mere demons!" Melisandre said, her voice intense, her eyes alight with fervor.

That caused some anger from both the lords behind Ranma and some from her own camp and Viserys'.

Realizing this and looking at the faces of Aegon, Stannis and Viserys along with their advisors, Ranma knew that everyone had said what they had to at this point. All that was left was needless posturing, so he decided to cut it short. We've already planted a few seeds, and so have they among themselves. If there was one thing Ranma was certain of, none of these three had anything his own lords were interested in hearing at this point, certainly nothing that would make them change their allegiance at this late a date.

He stood up abruptly, motioning Daenerys to do the same. "We've all said what we wish to, and none of us are willing at this point to actually listen. We were here to talk not make threats, but none of you are willing to truly listen. Very well, the battlefield will have to decide this. Any Lord that takes his men and walks away from this will be allowed to do so, provided that they swear allegiance to my wife and I later. But at the moment I do not see if there can never be real peace between any of our camps."

Harry frowned, and was about to speak up, but Ranma turned to stare at him. "As for you mercenaries, if you hadn't already made war on Westerosi soil already, I would be willing to let you walk. As it is, you may retreat to Duskendale and leave these shores, if you leave everything you have taken in your assaults on those Houses."

The Golden company commanders scowled, seeing the contempt in Ranma's eyes, the hate in more than one lord's faces. Even Viserys was sneering at them. He had long hoped to woo the Golden Company to his side, and had spent hundreds, thousands of gold dragons trying to woo them. Yet the men now backing this false Aegon had eaten his food and drunk his wine then laughed in his face.

Stannis stood up as well, sneering at young Aegon and Viserys before glaring across the table at Ranma. "I agree with Lord Stark on you foreign scum yet I will say the same to you pretender, and you Stark. Disband your armies and bend the knee to me. Only then will this conflict end Stark and we can turn our attention to more important matters."

The young man going by the name Aegon stood as well glaring at them all equally. "There is one more way, with your deaths. I too will allow any Lord to walk away from this, you don't have to die for the stupidity of others." He said staring at the lords behind Stannis, Ranma and Viserys. "Go home, take your men and go. Bow to the throne later, so that you don't have to die now."

Viserys simply scoffed. "But who will they bow to, pretender? You don't even have the true Targaryen hair! Your claim is nothing, your power is nothing, bought and paid for by the gold of the Iron Bank as my sister says! And it will run just as easily as the steel that made the Iron Throne under Balerion's breath!"

He then turned to Stannis and Daenerys. "I have nothing to say to you Baratheon, you and your brother rebelled, and will pay the price."

Arianne spoke up before he could go on. "And if you fight us, your daughter will pay the price. Lady Shireen has been in our care since we took Dragonstone."

More than one lord behind Stannis gasped, and Stannis paled for a moment before his face firmed. "No, i will not be bidden like that. If you wish to make my innocent daughter 'pay' for my fighting you so be it, my vengeance on you and your house will be all the worse."

In response to that and the look in his eye Arianne actually quailed for a moment while Elia and Nymeria shared a glance behind her. They had not wanted to bring up Shireen at all in this meeting, hoping to keep her, and the fact they had treated her well despite Viserys (or Petyr strangely enough) at times, in reserve to procure their own well-being if things went wrong. But that might not be an option any longer, if Viserys gave orders to the contrary.

Viserys however merely scoffed and turned to his sister. "As for you sister, you and your wolf, you whored yourself out to him so that you could have your own power base, but it is not enough! I have the greater claim regardless of what you or anyone else thinks!"

"I'm willing to take the test of dragonfire." Daenerys said smiling thinly at both men. "Are you? I have already been bathed in dragonfire once, proving my immunity. Have you? Who is the true dragon here?"

Ranma ignored the glaring between the three Targaryen members staring hard at the lords beyond Viserys and Stannis, who both stood up in preparation to leave was well. "Walk away from this field today my lords, lest none of you leave alive tomorrow." With that he turned, taking Daenerys's hand and moving towards Fenris while his lords followed grimly.

OOOOOO

Later that night Ranma bid Daenerys and Myrcella farewell with a kiss for both of them, before exiting their tent. Daenerys followed, looking at her dragons before sending Rhaegon into the sky. Dragons could see as well as direwolves in the dark and if need be Rhaegon would be joining the defense against the threat they all knew was coming tonight. Around the fire set outside the royal's tent the Wolfsworn waited.

Patrek was there too, helping the others into their armor while looking morose. His training had not yet reached the point where he could use ki to empower his sword, so would be useless tonight. Ranma had actually thought about giving him Ice for the evening, but he wasn't trained on a greatsword, and he wasn't as fast or as strong as the Wolfsworn either. Sending him against the Shadow Warriors would be sending him to his death. Only the Wolfsworn had a chance against those creatures.

Ranma stood in front of them while behind him Fenris bumped his large head against Myrcella and Daenerys, receiving scratchings behind his ear before joining his bonded. "We all know what we're going to face. We're the biggest threat to Stannis, we'll face the lion's share of the witch's Shadow Warriors.

"You think he'll send any at all against the other two armies?" Smalljon asked, putting the finishing touches on his greatsword's edge. He closed his eyes for a brief second concentrating, and the edge began to glow blue gold, causing him to smile thinly behind his beard.

"Maybe, depends on how many the Witch has made. Stannis will want to overwhelm us and cause a lot of damage to the army, but we have to assume they know we can fight them, maybe not all of you, but me, Fenris and the dragons."

Roger grunted, leaning down to kiss Osha who while tall for a woman was still a head shorter than him. She was not joining them for this excursion. Not having any training with Ranma and no ki to speak of, Roger had jumped on that as an excuse to keep her from coming. He so very rarely could come up with one after all. Roger then turned away his new Valyrian sword in one hand. He had been trained on the longsword before taking up the battleax by preference. Thankfully Osha had not figured out that Valyrian blades didn't need 'ki', to be deadly to the Shadow Warriors.

He smirked suddenly. "I wonder what Jon and Arya will think when they hear they missed this party. Or even Edd! He might get a wife out of his trip, but I bet he'd give it over to be here now."

"I predict language they would not want our mother to hear." Ranma quipped, though inside he wished all three of them were here. For this battle he'd want the entire Wolfsworn here if he could get it, and he cursed himself once again for having sent Jon and Arya off as he had.

He exchanged a nod with Hathan, who stood up his heavy armor clanking greatsword sheathed along his back the same as Ice for Ranma. Then he looked around at the others and simply nodded. "Let's hunt, Wolfsworn."

They made their way through the camp, exchanging greetings with those who were still awake, while around them some 2000 irregular infantry were being armed with the little surprise that Ranma had prepared up in Seagard. Once they were armed they marched out along with the pike regiments as quietly as they could towards the west without any lights or anything else to give their progress away.

Patrek went with them as their commander until Smalljon or Ranma could join them. There was a small dip in the land about two leagues distance at the far end of the small forest they had been using as a source for wood. They would hide there for the rest of the night.

They might not've been able to hide from Stannis if his army was north or south of us, but as it is, the Golden Company and Dornish will do our job for us and keep his scouts from seeing that force. Ranma thought grimly as he continued through the camp.

Behind him Smalljon stopped, exchanging a hard hand clasp with his father before moving on, with Daryn, Roger and Dacey doing the same while Hathan did the same with Wendel. Everyone knew that Hathan was Wendell's half-brother, but they wouldn't acknowledge it, they owed the memory of Lady Manderly that much. Still, the hand clasp they shared before Hathan followed the others was warm and heartfelt.

Soon they reached the front line of the camp, where several dozen swordsmen were guarding the barricade, and 200 archers were stationed on top of each fort marking either edge. They all nodded at the Wolfsworn, the entire army knew what the Wolfsworn were going to face tonight. Knew that they were the only ones that that even if Valyrian blades had been made available to all of them, it would still have been an uphill battle to fight the Shadow Warriors.

"So how are we going to do this boss?" said Roger his fingers, twitching his eyes alight. He detested the tension before battle, and always sought to make light of it.

"Spread out, with Fenris and I in the center facing Stannis' army. Spread out until you can barely see one another, then wait for Fenris to give the signal to light up our blades. It is time for the Shadows to Fall lads, who's with me!?" Ranma's words were answered with a roar and the Wolfsworn walked on into the dark of night beyond the camp.

OOOOOO

The armies of Aegon and Viserys didn't have the Wolfsworn, and lacked any kind of magic of their own, but they did have two of the most capable spymasters in Westeros. So they knew that Melisandre might be sending out her Warriors, but also had ideas on what could face them.

Having no other recourse, Viserys set Balerion out on the edge of the army where he could see Stannis' army in the distance. Behind Balerion, Viserys had the lords who had Valyrian blades on guard, since Petyr, like Varys, had found out that such blades negated other magic, having been made by the fires of dragons, which was inherently magical. Yet such blades were extremely rare, and only two Houses had such. House Yronwood had one, called Steel Branch, and House Jordayne had another called Ocean's Call. But that was all.

Aegon did the same, but the Golden Company had more Valyrian blades in its possession. Such blades were slightly more common in Essos, where the Valyrian Freehold had held territory for so long. The Golden Company had seven blades, all longswords, though surprisingly the leader of the Company of the Rose, Rochland the Giant, had a Valyrian greatsword.

Despite their preparations both 'kings' were nervous, far more nervous than they had been during the day. The reports of the Shadow Warriors were horrifying and had made their situation worse than it already had been.

Balerion reared its head up, staring out into the darkness as movement caught his attention. He hadn't been fed yet, making him both hungry and angry, thrashing in its chains but not yet hungry enough or angry enough to try to turn its flame on the encampment behind it. Besides, the camp was out of his range anyway.

Out of the dark of the night came Shadow Warriors, five of them loping their way through the grassland towards Viserys' army. Seeing the dragon, they slightly changed course coming straight towards it.

Balerion's eyes narrowed, the red in them deepening into that of carmine as he reared up on his back legs. Flames began to appear around his lips, then Balerion opened his mouth, unleashing a torrent of flame upon the creatures. Three of them died screaming in that first attack, but the other two quickly spread out, coming at the large dragon from two different directions.

"RAAAHhh!" With a roar Balerion whirled, bringing its tail around to smash one of them. The blow flung it back unharmed while its blade cut into the dragon's tail near where he been injured in the battle against the Royal Navy. Balerion roared again, its flames engulfing the fourth Shadow Warrior before it turned, and a fireball destroyed the last. For a moment all was silent, then Balerion roared a third time in triumph. "RAAAAGGGHHH!"

Hearing that sound in the camp Viserys smiled thinly at his wife. "You see my dear, even magical creations cannot withstand dragonfire!"

Arianne nodded, then gestured to a few camp workers nearby. "Prepare some of the food and take it forward to Balerion, he's earned his meal tonight."

"I wonder if my dear sister and her paramour will be able to handle this...." Viserys mused. "She has two dragons true, but I'll warrant neither have the fire or combat mentality of mine. But Stark does have his own skills and Ice. Hmm...."

Despite their advantage in having more Valyrian blades, the Golden Company fared far worse. Again five Shadow Warriors were sent against it, but they attacked slightly later than the attack on Viserys. Melisandre had learned from their fellow's demise, and her mental commands had this group spread out. Only two of them engaged the smaller Dragon. The other three attacked the camp itself, slaying more than a hundred-and-sixty men before they were felled by the men who carried Valyrian blades.

But Ranma and Daenerys were right, the main blow fell on them.

OOOOOO

At the same time that those attacks were occurring, Ranma and the others had spread out, waiting nervously in the dark well away from the torches of their own army in an effort to bring more of the attack on themselves even if the Shadow Warriors spread too wide for all of their number to be caught on the line.

It was a very nervous time for most of them, waiting there in the dark with your friends only slim silhouettes in the distance. Not wanting any of them to ruin their night vision they hadn't brought along torches. Thankfully the moon was high in the sky, and it and the stars provided enough light to see for the most part.

To ease some of the tension Ranma addressed Hathan in a loud voice. "So Hathan, have you decided on the words of your House yet?"

From his far right Hathan shouted back, his voice carrying to the rest of the Wolfsworn present easily. "I've narrowed it down to four choices. "Our shield for your back', 'shield of the North', 'our honor is our shield', or simply 'honors shield'."

"The fourth one." said several voices through the night. "The others are too wordy." Roger went on shaking his head. "You could've told me you were having trouble with that you now, I would've helped you out."

"I've heard some of your poetry Roger." Said Hathan, and even though he couldn't see it Ranma could easily picture Hathan's smile. "Your wife's not interested in you for your ability with song and verse, my friend."

"Was that a joke?" Smalljon asked incredulously. "It was almost funny. Keep at it, we might make a jester out of you yet!"

"Old Gods forfend!" said Ranma and Hathan together, causing them all to laugh.

Then the time for jokes was over. Fenris suddenly sat up from where he had been lying beside Ranma. He sat up sniffing at then wind, howling aloud and snarling his teeth suddenly gleaming blue and gold in the darkness. "AWOOOO!"

Ranma link his senses to that of his direwolf for a moment, seeing the Shadows rising coming towards them. "Here they come!" he shouted aloud breaking the connection, pulling out Ice and holding it above his head while his fist began to glow blue gold. "Light them up boys, it's time to show the shadows the light can fight back! Winter is coming!" He howled aloud and then charged towards the incoming clumps of Shadow Warriors.

For a moment his friends could only stare in shock at the image of their leader charging forward with Fenris at his side then concentrated for those brief moments it took to bring out their ki into their weapons and howled after him. "The Wolves, the Wolfsworn for the king!"

OOOOOO

Back in the camp Daenerys stood silently in the tent, her eyes closed as she concentrated on her two dragons both of which were now aloft and flying around the camp staring down into the darkness. Good luck my love.

Next to her Myrcella took her hand squeezing it gently. Daenerys squeezed back thankful for the girls support, while she continued to watch the evolving action through her dragons' eyes, both of them at once despite it being a very disconcerting feeling. If the Wolfsworn failed or were flanked too badly she would have to send her dragons in to aid them, but if she did that she would put the Wolfsworn in just as much danger as their opponents. Unless I see a clump of them breaking off or something...

OOOOOO

The sudden howl of the Wolfsworn's raised voices along with Ranma's charge seemed to startle the Shadow Warriors coming towards the Stargaryen camp. But after that brief moment of hesitation they charged too silent as always, though they were not the uniform mass Ranma had expected.

A few of them were the giant, more solid looking types that Rama had battled with Fenris a few weeks back. Others looked almost half finished, as if the substance that made them up was losing power, their swords nonexistent only using their claws as weapons. Others were the more normal sort, with swords which looked like carved ebony in the darkness, drinking in what little light there was. All of them had the breeds fell red eyes, all of them stood taller than a man, moving with an unnatural loping speed that was disconcerting to watch as they closed through the moonlit landscape. Their limbs didn't quite move correctly, but it was obvious they were in full control of their bodies even so.

But worse was their numbers. There were over 120 of them streaking straight towards the Wolfsworn.

Ranma and Fenris slammed into the center of their advancing force like a hammer. Their bodies were entirely covered in blue-gold armor for a moment, blazing in the night visibly from the watchmen back in the forts before they were inside the Shadow Warrior's formation. They cut, hacked, bit, clawed at the Shadow Warriors all around them, downing ten in as many seconds.

The Shadow Warriors advance folded around them, trying to envelop them, but then the Wolfsworn hit. Daryn cut down a Shadow Warrior from behind his sword stained blue-gold with the light of his life energy, before he batted aside another Warrior's sword, leaving that Shadow Warrior open for an attack from Hathar which cut it in twain.

"Riding Free!" Roger roared nearby, yelling his family's battle cry and cutting to either side of him with his blade, which he had taken to calling Roan for the color of its blade. Next to him Dacey stood, guarding his back and hacking at the unholy creatures with her own glowing blue-gold blade, while Smalljon simply bellowed wordless defiance, his massive greatsword whirling around him.

For a moment again the Shadow Warriors seemed to hesitate, something about those glowing blades and the fact that they could be harmed by them penetrating what little thought processes the Shadow Warriors possessed. But then they attacked with renewed vigor spurred on further by the urge to kill.

"Back to back!" shouted Ranma over the din of battle and the screams of the Shadow Warriors, who always screamed when they died, the only noise they ever made in battle. Ice took one Shadow Warrior in the gut, then Ranma leaped into the air, kicking out with feet that suddenly glowed with ki fire. Both feet impacted other Shadow Warriors in the chest, crushing them and sending them flying backwards screaming as they dissipated from what would've been shattered rib cage and burst internal organs on a man. His heightened position however allowed him to see that the Shadow Warriors were now all concentrating on them.

"Form a circle, now! They're all focused on us!" So saying Ranma landed on an upraised tower shield of one of the larger Shadow Warriors.

He quickly thrust Ice deep into its skull, the Valyrian blade bursting out the back of its skull before Ranma ripped the blade sideways viciously, slicing into another Shadow Warrior's shoulder as the first dissipated. Launching himself off the barely there substance of the shield Ranma landed near where Fenris was fighting snarling and ripping and tearing at the shadow monsters.

Rather than forming a wall in front of the army the Wolfsworn now formed a forward position, pulling all the Shadow Warriors who were supposed to attack the camp down upon themselves. It was working to protect the camp, but the battle was fierce and hard-fought. While they all had a speed advantage over the creatures, it wasn't as much as Ranma's and the Wolfsworn for all their skills were mortal.

Only a few minutes into the fight Hathar grunted, teeth clenched over a scream. A Shadow Warrior's claws had just punched through the plate armor over one shoulder piercing through as easily as if it was made of paper to dig five holes into his shoulder. Luckily the wounds weren't deep. In response Hathar brought his greatsword down in an overhand strike, cleaving that warrior in two. "Why is it always me?"

"It's not just you this time, you big whiner!" growled Dacey, standing beside him to his left. She was limping badly, having taken a slash from one of the Shadow Warrior's swords to her thigh.

She didn't even look up as Fenris leaped over her head to land in the center of the circle of Wolfsworn. He stood there while his ki strengthening technique faded for a moment. He panted, his tongue lolling, before licking at a wound along one forepaw.

In front of the Wolfsworn's circle Ranma continued to fight, leaping here there and everywhere, occasionally using the Kijin Raishin Dan to slaughter a particularly large batch of Shadow Warriors and making certain to intercept the few larger of the larger types he saw. The attack however didn't seem to work well on them. Only the front ranks of them dissipated entirely, while the others would somehow reform in a few seconds. Ranma was not at all certain of the mechanics of that, nor did he care right now. It was still doing damage, but it was wearing him out quickly.

Behind Ranma, Roger overextended on a lunge, letting his body open for an attack from his side. A Shadow Warrior pounced on the opportunity, its claws raking his side deeply causing him to cry out. "Aghh old gods damn you and the bitch that spawned you!" The glow of his sword went out for a moment as he lost the concentration needed to keep ki funneling into the blade for an instant. Daryn's blade caught the creature in the side of the neck, killing him instantly while Roger got his feet under him again.

"Are you all right?" Daryn asked. Beside them Smalljon hacked and roared laughing loudly drawing a bit more attention than the others for a moment while Daryn saw to Roger.

"I'll be fine eventually I suppose." Roger said but his voice was filled with pain. "These bastards are tough!"

He waved off Daryn, standing up again despite grimacing in pain but still game enough, though his sword no longer glowed with his ki. Roger instead had to rely solely on its Valyrian steel. It was well he did, because two more

Shadow Warriors came at him then and he raised his sword, and he met them with a roar, hacking them both down in a series of slashes and thrusts. "Come on you fuckers!"

OOOOOO

Daenerys grimaced angrily. Seeing the level of combat through her dragon's eyes, she sent them towards Stannis' army. If there are anymore Shadow Warriors coming, my dragons have to intercept them. I know it's a risk, with the damn Red Bitch and whatever powers she has, but it's one I have to take. Or else none of the Wolfsworn might through the night.

Through Sunfyre's eyes she saw them, another column of Shadow Warriors. She had no idea how many there were, but there looks to be at least half again the number that was already fighting the Wolfsworn. If they join the fight, even Ranma might be overwhelmed, or worse, they could ignore him and our friends entirely to attack the army. That would be disastrous! With that thought she sent her dragons down, attacking.

OOOOOO

In the enemy camp Melisandre had waited for this moment. Yes!

Staring into the fire that she was currently using as a focus Melisandre thrust her hands out towards the images of the two dragons that only she could see flying through the flames. She grabbed them both, laughing maniacally as the fire inside the dragons called to her and R'hllor. Yes, the fire within you is still under the control of a higher power, foul, debased creatures. Now you will feel it's true might!

The moment the dragons opened their mouth, the unique magical and alchemical reaction creating their flames at the back of their throats she grasped it, turning it on the dragons themselves. Instead of roaring out of their mouths, it began to turn on its creators, beginning to crawl around their mouths and down their gullets.

OOOOOO

"No!" Daenerys said aloud and in her head. Feeling her little ones in pain she desperately told them to stop, mentally ordering them to rise into the air and come towards her and away from the witch's influence. They both obeyed quickly, soaring higher into the sky and away from whatever was somehow turning their own fires against them, but the pain in their mouths persisted.

OOOOOO

Melisandre grimaced, extending her willpower, losing some of her control over her Shadow Warriors. The second group, instead of heading towards the Stargaryen camp, now made towards where their fellows were still battling. That first group had been whittled down to half strength now, if that, with more dying every second. But if I can kill the dragons, then even if all of my Shadowbound die this nights wo, work...

Her attention suddenly wavered, her limbs beginning to feel heavy. She stared into the fire, her eyes opening wide as she looked around wondering where the exhaustion was coming from. "W-what?"

As she came out of her trance Melisandre noticed her two attendants for the evening had collapsed where they had stood. One looked as if she had been in the process of moving toward her, while the other had simply fallen. One of them, the larger of the two, was still alive, hacking and clawing at her throat, while the other was still and dead.

Even as she took in this surprising sight, Melisandre fell to the side shaking and shuddering. Some kind of, of poison, but how, where did it come from and how did I not see this attempt on my life in my visions? No, deal with it then worry about the how.

With an effort of will Melisandre reached out, grasping the dying life force of her acolyte and forcing it into the holy flames. The fire roared up, and she grasped it's power, pouring that power through her own body. She convulsed as it struck her, beginning to sweat profusely, burning whatever poison was within her out before it could complete it's fell task.

From the back of the tent someone entered through a tiny, almost invisible rent made there. It was a man, his features were nondescript, in fact they were totally nondescript far more than any normal person. There was nothing whatsoever about him to mark him out as an individual, he was quite literally the face that could be lost in the crowd.

Interesting, I will have to make a note for our archives, that with magic coming back into the world R'hllor worshipers can apparently burn poison out of their bodies. And are much tougher than they should be toward it in the first place, this woman should be dead several times over now. Now I have to kill her with my blade, pity. With a faint, almost unheard sigh the man picked up a tiny incense burner that had been hidden directly behind the fire pit, its smoke joining that of these sacred fire that Melisandre had been using.

Melisandre stared at the man, knowing him for what he was. "Faceless!"

Now the man spoke, a single word. "Indeed." He stood above her, the dagger ready as he knelt down. There was no last minute gloating, no apology or banter, simply a professional going about his business.

Seeing that blade ready to plunge into her chest Melisandre groaned, pulling back all of her concentration from the fire, her spirit once more fully inhabited her body, and she began to conjure fire from one of her palms. Before the man could do more than gawk the fire impacted his chest, throwing him backwards. But to her surprise it didn't burn him, rather he was able to pull off his clothing and tossing it to the side to reveal an almost unburnt chest.

But that still gave Melisandre enough time to raise her voice and cry the alarm. "To me! Assassin!"

Five of the Fire Guard burst through the tent flaps, their blades already out, but the Faceless man was faster. Dodging another fireball from Melisandre he was already in the back of the tent. In another second he was out and through it, running out into the rest of the army and mingling with the men.

"Two of you stay here to guard me inside the tent!" She ordered, moving around the sacred fire and grabbing the incense wrapping it in some of her clothing to keep the smoke from escaping any further. "Another one of you dispose of this, bury it somewhere!" She turned to the last two. "You rouse your brothers scour the entire army! Find him!"

With that done, she turned back to the sacred fire scowling angrily. The moment she once more sent her sense into it however she realized it was too late. The dragons had destroyed the second column of Shadow Warriors before retreating back into their camp, their fires doused for the evening. Dammit!

OOOOOO

The battle against the Shadow Warriors had continued throughout Melisandre's difficulties, and that battle had been just as hard fought as the one she had faced. Every Wolfsworn now sported injuries. Daryn could barely walk on a wounded leg, his thigh having taken several slashes from a Shadow Warrior's claws. Hathar had his helmet smashed in by a blow from one of the giant warrior's tower shields along with the injury to his shoulder. Roger's back had been opened by a slash from a sword, and his leg gauged. Dacey had lost her little finger and index finger from her offhand. Her lower leg was also bleeding profusely from a cut made there.

Smalljon however was the worst injured. His helmet had been opened up by a Shadow Warrior's blade which had taken out his eye, leaving the socket a bloody ruin. His side had been opened as well, though not as bad as Roger's, by the sword of another warrior.

But even so Smalljon was still fighting, roaring challenges, hacking and slashing with his greatsword, which continued to glow blue-gold. The intervening time since they had left the North had been good for Smalljon's ability to use ki and it was serving him well here. "The Giant's Rage will claim you all, you misty bastards!"

Outside the circle Ranma and Fenris were still going strong. The both of them had sustained cuts and bruises. Ranma's lizard-lion armor looked as if someone had taken a hammer to it, with dented dings and scratches everywhere. Fenris was bleeding from several dozen cuts along his massive frame, and he had lost one claw on a back foot.

Ranma looked up after hacking down another Shadow Warrior, and suddenly there were no other warriors around him. A few were still around the Wolfsworn, and he attacked them from behind, before staring wildly out into the night merging his senses with that of Fenris. Fenris too looked around, sitting on his haunches and staring out into the darkness. After a moment he threw back his head and howled in victory, a sound that echoed for leagues in every direction, causing many of the horses and other animals in the camps of their enemies to stir uneasily even at this range. "AROOOOOOO, AWOOOOOO!"

"We did it!" Ranma shouted. "We did it!"

The Wolfsworn answered with a weary but heartfelt roar while Ranma quickly moved to aid Roger as he nearly collapsed, the adrenaline leaving his body with a lurch and the agony of his leg. To one side Smalljon and Daryn leaned on one another, shaking their heads wearily.

With Fenris carrying Smalljon and Roger while the others all leaned on one another they made their way back to the camp. Daenerys and Myrcella met them with over a dozen of Myrcella's helpers, who quickly went to work while around them the guards began a low cheer, mindful of not waking up their fellows since battle might begin the next day. King in the North! Stark! Stark!"

Most of the commanders however were still awake despite that knowledge having known about what was going on. They all moved forward, congratulating Ranma and his friends on their victory until Myrcella shouted aloud "will you lot get back!? Let me and my helpers do our work!"

Greatjon guffawed, but his humor faded as he saw the severity of his son's wound. Then he shook his head laughing quietly. "Your uncle Mors going to be pleased my son, he's not the only one-eyed fool in the family now."

Smalljon laughed weakly, leaning heavily on Hathan's solid form while Myrcella began to work on his ruined eye socket.

To one side Daenerys hugged Ranma to her, watching their lover go to work on their other friends while Daenerys told her part of tonight's tale. "The worst part is, I don't know if the Red Bitch's power failed because we got too far away and she couldn't reestablish whenever connection she was trying to use, or something on her end interrupted the attempt. I, I honestly don't think my dragons will be able to attack any of the armies tomorrow, we'll try to keep the other two off our collective backs Ranma, but..."

She shrugged her shoulders, shivering. "It was the most useless feeling I have ever felt! I couldn't do anything, my connection to my little ones is through their minds and hearts, I can't do anything about their bodies. All I could do was tell them to run, and it, it...."

"I know." Ranma said with a sigh, his eyes closing in weariness before he opened them again, concentrating on her face. "She's a danger to us all, but I think we can match her."

"Are you certain we can win this Ranma? With the training you've given the army on moving silently, we could all be out of here tonight, not just Patrek and his force." Daenerys asked worriedly.

"No." Ranma shook his head. "Remember the time limit. We're dangerously close to a time when none of us could get up north, let alone the full army. We need to finish this now."

Daenerys looked at him for a moment then nodded kissing him lightly on the cheek. "All right. I'll get my little ones to rest for the rest of the night, you do the same. I'm afraid however..." she said looking over at the Wolfsworn, "that the Wolfsworn will be sitting out this battle."

OOOOOO

The next morning as dawn broke Viserys smiled grimly. Everyone in his army, and probably all the others knew that something had happened last night. Specifically something major between where Stannis' army was encamped and where his dear sister's army had fortified up. Who won or who lost that engagement Viserys didn't know, but he judged that his sister had since the guards on duty later that night had reported flashes of dragon fire in the distance. Yet whoever one or lost was immaterial, taking advantage of any weakness in either opponent was much more important.

In front of Viserys two thousand-men bands of horse archers rode out of the camp heading towards where the Northerners and Stannis' camps were. Lord Allyrion and Lord Ladybright led them, their families making up nearly the entirety of the units. Both men bowed their heads from the saddle to Viserys as they passed, while the rest of the army was forming up quickly. They would attack both camps in the habitual style of horse archers, hitting and running, thought their main task would be to see if either army had taken much in the way of casualties last night.

The rest of the army was also breaking camp, the process under Lord Fowler's command. They would attack whichever army had been weakened the most in last night's action, with the Levy forces from Gulltown and the rest of the infantry from the Vale that they had picked up leading the way under Ser Jorah's command. The remainder of the army, the pikemen, the light horse, horse archers, and light infantry which made up the larger portion of their army would follow them in allowing. The plan was to have the more expendable levy troops and better armored Valemen create a hole in the enemy's lines, which the rest of the army would then exploit.

"Keep at least half the horse archers and all the pike forces in reserve." Viserys said again, not acknowledging that he was actually speaking advice he had taken from Elia Sand. "If our infantry make any headway we can send them then to flank whichever of our enemies has been weakened, but the northern entrenchments are too good, and the Baratheon army's numbers too much for us to attack all out without letting them and the Golden Company battle first."

Arianne and the other lords standing around Viserys nodded fervent agreement. Every lord was very aware of the fact that they couldn't take that many casualties, and all of them were self-centered in a way. This battle might well settle everything, but they all wanted their own Houses to still have some kind of military force after it was all over.

OOOOOOO

At the same time Viserys was setting his army into motion, Aegon was doing the same. He was angry, last night's assault had slain several hundred men but it was also obvious that the attack on his army had not been the main target. Aegon was infuriated at this sign that he wasn't important, that he was somehow merely a sideshow to the main event.

However his advisers were much more capable of talking him around than Viserys' were. Therefore instead of splitting his strength and probing like Viserys was the Golden Company formed up into a massive column its spear phalanxes bristling as the men in them marched in step showing off the discipline that made the Golden Company what it was. In front of them the elephants, their massive bulk festooned with chainmail from head to toe, moved forward trumpeting loudly to one another. On top of those mobile siege weapons sat small towers, each of them holding 15 archers.

Their target was the camp of Aegon's aunt. The Golden Company commanders felt Stark had won last night's clash, and that the Northerners remained the most potent threat particularly after Daenerys' show of being able to control other dragons even if for a short amount of time. In fact Aegon had insisted on the assault because of that, worried that she could somehow take Calixares away from him. That was something he would never allow.

Strickland might have objected to this, thinking that Daenerys and Rannar were the most reasonable of their enemies and could possibly be reasoned with after the other two were dealt with, but his fellow commanders had argued against it. They saw that the fortifications facing them were the weakest the Northerners had, which was an opportunity they could not overlook. And the Golden Company, whose belief in their discipline and unit tactics was imbued into their very bones, believed that if they could get in among the Northern/Riverlands camp, they would be able to slaughter the numerically superior Stargaryen army.

However Harry, Lysono and his other commanders were not blind to the dangers that Stannis' army posed. Even if they had lost whatever magical battle had taken place last night the combined Reach and Stormlands forces retained numerical superiority over any other the other three armies in the field, if somewhat thinly, over the forces from the Riverlands and the North. To combat this threat the Golden Company had sent the Second Sons and the Company of the Rose out to guard its flank, aided by light cavalry and a few screening out elements. It also kept most of its archers and two thousand of its spearmen back as a reserve, under the command of, against most of the commanders' better judgment, Jon Connington.

The Second Sons and Company of the Rose's job would be to only slow down any attack from that direction, allowing for the reserve, which would follow the main spear phalanx slowly, to turn and prepare itself.

OOOOOOO

Rannar stood on top of a single large wooden pole in the center of the army's camp. It was simply a series of planks set into the ground, with Rannar standing on top balancing there with ease to the awe and amusement of most of his army.

Using a Myrish spyglass Rannar stared towards the north first, seeing movement. "Signal the army to be ready for an attack, I want all of our lines ready to receive."

Turning to the south he saw similar signs of movement, only this was much larger. Coming from directly west from Stannis' army, another column of dust began to appear. And another column, this one seeming more concentrated was coming from the south. "We're about to have company."

OOOOOOO

Lord Allyrion crested a hill, from which he could see the outskirts of Stannis' camp in the distance. Putting spur to his horse's side he urged it into a gallop, pulling his bow off of his back as he did. Two sentries fell to a few arrows from Allyrion's men before they could raise the alarm but as they passed by those posts, they saw the entire army was already ready to march.

A light cavalry force would've turned away immediately and raced off, but horse archers had the advantage of both speed and the ability to keep their distance thanks to their horse bows. Those bows were not as powerful as long bows, but they fired far faster. And the horse archers could move, even retreat, while still firing at the enemy.

Around him men began to fall out of their saddle here and there from defensive fire, but Allyrion noticed it was quite light in comparison to what he had feared. Evidently the Baratheon army didn't have much archers for its size. A second later however, Allyrion saw what the enemy's response to his probe was, and raised a long whistle to his lips, blowing on it four times in quick succession.

In response his men began to peel off in orderly groups moving sharply away from a force of heavy cavalry that had charged from the Baratheon army's lines towards them. Arrows flew from their bows, impacting among the heavy cavalry, but every man among the Dornish force knew not to aim for the knights themselves, but for the horses. Even those horses which had armor had to keep their legs free to run, making them vulnerable. And that armor was never as thick as the armor that the knights themselves could wear.

Hundreds of horses went down, while Allyrion's men wheeled away only to nearly run smack dab into another force of light cavalry that had circled around from the back of Stannis' army try to catch them in a pincer with the first. Neglecting his whistle Allyrion bellowed "Full retreat, straight north!"

His men obeyed with alacrity, pulling on their reins and turning their horses around so hard many of the horses nearly lost their footing. But still more than a few of them were caught in close quarters with the light cavalry. Even so their arrows and the arrows of the retreating men still fired, sending dozens of men crashing to the Earth. Among the light Calvary they didn't have to bother aiming for the horses.

Another force of light cavalry, about, a thousand strong joined the chase quickly. At the same time the first force of heavy cavalry that had tried to chase them down, more to grab their attention than anything else, wheeled back to their fellows.

Stannis nodded grimly from where he sat astride his own warhorse. "Excellent. The light cavalry will continue to screen our northern flank, along with the cavalry under Lord Staedmon, who will be in total command of that part of the action."

He looked across at his horse's head at Mace. "You and your echelon will advance directly against the Stargaryen lines, but you are not to be bogged down attacking them head on. I don't trust how simple the defenses facing us look. Ranma is a devious character, he no doubt has something ready. I want your cavalry to swing around them, see if you can find any openings, while your infantry attacks the front at range. There must be some opening or else they wouldn't be able to sortie either. If you see any unit out in the open however, feel free to attack it, whatever it's allegiance."

Mace nodded eagerly, his face cold and angry. Despite the battle going on last night, far too many of his lords had begun to question his leadership. The news of Loras' death, the fact his own children were rebelling against his choices, had acted like a rock from a trebuchet on the foundations of his power. More than one had voiced a desire to pull out, not wishing to back Stannis or Mace any longer, especially now that there seemed an alternative Lord Paramount back home.

In the end it wasn't Mace who kept them from doing so, but the fear of Melisandre and her magic. Even so, more than one lord was thinking of pulling out regardless, and Mace knew he needed to prove himself on the field of battle to shore up his authority. In the long run he'd still have to deal with his children in some fashion, but defeating the Starks would take away any hint of legitimacy from Margaery's actions, making that task much simpler.

Of course Stannis knew this, and had taken steps to make certain that key Reach lords knew they would gain more to continue to follow him, regardless of their opinion of Mace. Turning his head slightly Stannis turned to look at one such, Lord Ambrose, who was, not coincidentally, the second-in-command of Mace's echelon. Lord Ambrose nodded slightly, understanding it would be his job to keep Mace from becoming too engaged in the battle.

A moment later some 8000 men marched out from the rest of the army. The echelon was composed of slightly under 6000 cavalry and 2000 mixed infantry and archers. Watching them go Stannis nodded grimly before turning to his remaining lords. "Lord Buckler, you will take command of the third echelon, which will follow my own force southwest. Leave a few thousand more light cavalry behind to aid Lord Staedmon in protecting the camp and our backs, but your primary task will be to follow my own echelon and prepare to exploit any weakness in the Golden Company, or, if Mace finds a weakness in the Stark earthworks, to move in support of him."

"My Lord, why are we not concentrating on the most dangerous foe?" Asked Lord Buckler.

"Because doing so would leave us vulnerable to the weaker two. The Dornish are no threat in a pitched battle, we have more light cavalry than they do horse archers, and their infantry is nothing to fear, certainly not enough to stop a charge from the Reach cavalry."

Who will do the dying before my more loyal Stormlanders, he thought grimly. And if a few of their lords die in particular those lords who are chafing under Mace now and are leery of me, all the better.

"But the Golden Company is a major threat in any kind of battle. Their elephants can wreak havoc if used well, and their discipline makes their spear phalanxes a threat to any cavalry or infantry unit. That's why we need to attack from their flank, while they are busy attacking the Northerners, weakening them in turn."

"Why do you think they will attack the Northerners?" Melisandre asked tartly from where she was standing nearby, waiting to bid the army farewell. She was not in the best of moods, still feeling weak from the effects of whatever had been in the incense that the Faceless Man had used on her last night, though it had not affected her magical abilities, which would allow her to offset any of the dragons if they attacked.

She was not going with Stannis for both those reasons, instead staying behind in the army camp. Five-hundred Fire Guard stayed behind to protect her, while Staedmon saw to the defense of the camp and the army's flank.

"The dragons," Stannis replied. "You saw the Stormborn yesterday, she was able to command the other two, if only for a brief amount of time. Viserys and Aegon will see that as the most major threat, regardless of the military aspects. Their ego will be their undoing. I will push at their flanks while the Golden Company pushes at the Starks then they'll be pinned between us, but if we do this well, and if the elephants are committed against the Starks, it will be them who take the most casualties."

With the tactics of the current battle explained to his satisfaction Stannis smiled grimly at her, before riding without another word, his bannermen following him.

OOOOOO

Lord Ladybright led his unit towards the side of the Northern/Riverlands triangle facing their army with some trepidation. Yes they didn't look to be finished on this flank, but those forts anchoring the triangle's corners certainly were. And there were some ditches that too from the looks of things, which would funnel his men into what he was certain were prepared defensive positions.

However, he was a horse archer, and had been trained as such since he was young. He firmly believed that their speed, range and maneuverability, could overcome any opponent. So he charged with the rest of his men, coming up out of a small bump in the land charging towards the northern lines, losing their arrows as they came.

Most of those arrows fell at first on the barricades, then they began to smack into the side of the forts or even the roofs, doing nothing. They raced on, and Lord Ladybright gestured to one of his men. "They don't seem to be awake yet, let's circle around them to the west, I want to take back as much information on their earthworks as I can."

He wheeled away now, following the line of trenches, losing arrows as they went. As the majority of horse archers turned however, a voice from one of the forts bellowed "Loose!" like the voice of the Warrior come to life.

From all along the bulwarks and the fortress they were moving toward came a hail of deadly arrow fire from the fortress, smashing into them from what was almost point-blank range for the Northern longbows among those archers. Dozens, hundreds of men were plucked from the saddle, and several dozen horses went down under the hail of those merciless broad heads, horse archers not having the armor to stop them.

Lord Ladybright flinched as his banner bearer fell with an arrow in his neck, which passed all the way through, showering his tabard with blood. Another man quickly reached over grabbing the banner. "Retreat, wheel and fall back!"

Despite the severity, and the oddly controlled manner of the enemies response, Ladybright wasn't unhappy with the way the battle was going save for the death of his banner bearer, a cousin of his. Still, if they come out after us, we can pare them down in turn, and if they don't we'll just wheel back in and attack elsewhere.

But when they began to turn away they heard a sound that none of them had ever heard before last night. Only this time, it wasn't far away, it was up close and personal. "AROOOOO!"

It was howl, but it was unlike any desert wolf Ladybright had ever heard. Those were short, sharp barks in the night, and could be disconcerting to horses and men alike if close. But this one, this struck all of them with a fear that went straight to their bones.

Ladybright's men lost control of their horses which all whinnied in panic, bucking and rearing tossing men to the ground all around. As one the horses turned to try and race away from that horrifying sound, much like the Reach and Stormlands horses had responded to in Stannis' attempted ambush.

"The sun of winter!" Rickard shouted, leading a column of light cavalry out through the three pathways that had been left open in the segment of the defensive triangle facing north. They fell upon the Dornishmen, killing dozens in the next few moments.

Only a few of the Dornishmen, Lord Ladybright among them, were good enough horsemen to have retained their saddle. They raced off back and away from the direwolf who was loping along behind Rickard's horse.

Yet Viserys had already set the Vale portion of his army in motion, with the rest following quickly, and he was not in a position to change his attack plans, even if he had wanted to. Because above the front ranks of Viserys came him and Balerion.

Back in the northern camp Ranma stared down at Daenerys. "Get in the air my love, your opposite numbers are coming."

Daenerys nodded grimly, leaning forward in her saddle on Sunfyre's back, whispering into the dragons ear. "Climb the sky." At the same time she reached out, opening that door between their minds and began to give orders to Rhaegon. At her command Rhaegon sprang into the air flapping heavily growling irritably as he began to ascend straight up rather than in a spiral as was a dragons natural mode.

Under Daenerys, Sunfyre moved into a spiral quickly, ascending faster but going around in a spiral that soon carried them over the lines of the army below and out into the areas between the four opposing armies.

This brought her close to where columns of cavalry were appearing to the naked eye. But Melisandre didn't seem to be with them, or if she was there was no feeling of her magic trying to reach out as it had last night. Daenerys breathed a sigh of relief, affectionately rubbing Sunfyre's neck for a moment before turning back to business.

Soon after she had reached the height that she wanted Sunfyre at, with Rhaegon still trying to gain altitude above the northern camp. With a thought and a small tug on the reins, which Daenerys used more as a handhold than to direct her dragons, she sent Sunfyre towards the Dornish army.

Behind her Ranma leaped down from his position on the tower, landing neatly as Rickard came up leading his force back into the camp. His sword and lances were but both bloody, and one of his legs was bleeding slightly from a nick there, but he held his head high. "We routed them Ranma, I don't think there is more than a dozen left heading back to their camp."

"Well done uncle." said Ranma smiling grimly. He looked at both him and Greatjon. "The Reach forces are coming. Frankly I bet Stannis is going to sit on the defensive with most of his men, large scale probing attacks maybe but not his full force. I don't think they'll be stupid enough to charge our frontline, but if they are you know the surprises we've set up there."

Both men smirked evilly at him and he nodded. "You're in charge here, keep the defenses up keep the lines defended and the arrows flying. If you see a chance to sortie against the Dornish take it, but don't get bogged down beyond our own lines, and keep one eye on the sky just in case."

"Go ahead lad." Greatjon said clapping Ranma on the shoulder. "Spring your trap, and we'll still hold here."

To one side Smalljon stood nodding his head grimly. He was now wearing an eyepatch over his mangled eye but even injured he was still game, and would be in charge of the camp's emergency reserves. Dacey, and Daryn commanded the three forts, something they could do despite their injuries.

Myrcella had forbidden Roger to move, the wounds to his leg being so bad he was in danger of crippling himself if he walked on it for a time. His wife Osha however sat on a horse beside Smalljon, with Roger's sword Roan in its sheathe at her side. Her eyes were ablaze, and she was eager to get stuck in herself, having been sidelined the evening before.

"I'll get right to that big man, just make sure you're all here when I get back." Ranma laughed, before racing off through the camp towards the back most point of the triangle.

He smiled at the shouts and cries of "Stark!" all around. Despite knowing that battle was at hand most of the men were upbeat about their chances, and greeted him heartily as he raced through before he leaped over the small parapet and ditch near the westernmost point of the triangle. Landing Ranma raced on, and even as the people behind him watched he sped up, racing out of sight.

OOOOOO

Mace laughed delightedly, his banner crackling in the breeze over the head of his banner bearer. This was what it meant to go to war, riding forth to slay one's enemies gloriously in open combat! No political maneuverings like his grandmother so loved, none of the back room dealings that had so fascinated Margaery. No tactics or the need to remember about supplies or strategy that everyone always harped.

No, what mattered was the charge, bringing enough men to the fight to win it, presenting a martial attitude that could overawe your enemies. And with the might of the Reach behind him, Mace knew that he presented such an image. He pointed ahead with his lance, shouting laughing. "Look at them, they cower behind their fortifications, not even daring to challenge us!"

To his left Lord Ambrose rolled his eyes. Of course they aren't going to come out to challenge us, they don't have the cavalry to do so. And if they stay behind those defenses, they can shoot us full of arrows, Stannis is right, that line of defenses worries me. "Should we move left or right?"

Mace growled, wanting nothing more than to rush in right ahead and get involved with the cowards hiding behind their pathetic earthworks. But mindful of Stannis' orders he thought for a moment. "Send a few hundred horse straight at the line. If Stannis is right, they'll run into whatever trap is there and spring it so we know it's there. But the rest of us will skirt around it to the north!"

OOOOOO

At the same time that Mace was beginning his assault the dragons were pushing for altitude, that most important aspect of any aerial duel. The vanguard of the Dornish army had also appeared on the field, marching towards the Stargaryen encampment. Or at least the levy forces and the infantry of the Vale were.

Viserys had pushed out another thousand horse archers to his western flanks to bolster the assault force there, which had fallen back, but he was also keeping a set distance between the Dornish horse, what little infantry they had and the Vale forces in an effort to keep them back until the others had forced a crack in their enemies defenses.

A fact that Lord Grafton was well aware of as he led his men forward. They were only supposed to probe the defenses of the Stark's army, but even that was a chancy business. But those Stranger-damned Dornish lords will sit back there until we have. Worse, we're not leading off with our real assault troops save my own trained armymen. Not the southern pikes, but the Gulltown levees. That's amateur warfare! Why did I ever follow Petyr anyway?!

Of course Lord Grafton knew why. Petyr held two strings over his head. One was the fact that Lord Grafton and his family were deeply in debt to Petyr to the tune of some 700,000 dragons. And second, Petyr's knowledge of certain discrepancies in the bookkeeping of Gulltown. Lord Grafton personally also knew that Petyr knew and had proof about some of his own personal indiscretions, in particular a certain married lady who he had slept with some years back. If the lord in question learned of it, Grafton was doomed.

And of course there's Balerion and Viserys and his entire force to think of Lord Grafton thought sardonically as he marched along with his men. His horse had fallen lame a few days ago, nearly killing Grafton in the process when he was flung from the saddle. Just as Grafton had thought that he and his men had survived the attacks on the foraging parties, only for him to nearly die because of a small foxhole in the path his horse had missed.

In front of him a few of the horse archers that had been supposed to find of the weaknesses of the northern line for him and his men pulled up. Lord Ladybright stared at him, his face looking a little shocky. "I lost most of my men to the arrows from that line, but the Northerners seem mostly content to remain on the defensive, they only sortied with a small force of light cavalry and that blaster monster of a wolf! If you can keep their archers attention on you, Balerion might just win us this fight!"

Lord Grafton nodded grimly, and both men turned their heads upwards to stare up into the sky where two dragons were circling one another.

OOOOOO

Daenerys stared over the raised head and neck of Sunfyre towards Balerion and Viserys, who was charging straight at her through the air. It was larger and also more powerful than either of her own, and its wings beat easily pushing it along a straight course. She tried to reach forward again to touch the other dragon's mind, only to be thrown out quickly. Balerion was now deep into battle madness, what little seed of sanity he retained gone for now.

Yet even so she was able to get an inkling of its desires, and an inkling of his next action. Quickly she acted, ordering Sunfyre both mentally and aloud, as well as pulling lightly at the reins. "Dodge down and to the right! Fire incoming!"

A long tongue of flame shot out from Balerion's open mouth, passing through the area where Sunfyre had just been flying. In response Sunfyre roared his normally sunny disposition in abeyance now as his eyes began to tint to red his claws twitching and flames appearing at the back of his throat.

Daenerys sent another command, aiming the dragon's head around slightly trying to where Balerion would go. Gone was all her thoughts about not wanting to be a kinslayer, this was a battle to the death, and she could not afford any more thoughts along those lines.

At her command Sunfyre's own slightly smaller and far less powerful tongue of flame shot out, forcing Balerion to bank wildly to the right. It responded quickly, turning its head angrily and shooting out another fireball. Sunfyre dodged that too, but Balerion had continued his turn, and suddenly the two dragons found themselves almost within claw range.

Balerion lunged, his mouth gaping open trying to bite through Sunfyre's wing. But at Daenerys's mental command Sunfyre banked to the left again avoiding the bite. In response Sunfyre's back leg lashed out, along with its tail, while Sunfyre continued to corkscrew in place for a moment before righting himself.

Viserys squawked in agony when Sunfyre's tail smashed into his leg where it was squeezing Balerion's side and for a moment he thought the blow had shattered the bone. At the same time Balerion roared in pain as one forelimb was raked by Sunfyre's claws.

Even so the two of them turned quickly to follow Sunfyre who had continued his downward lunge. Now they were behind and above Sunfyre. In dragon on dragon combat, this was the kill zone. Daenerys turned her head to look back seeing her brother on Balerion's back now laughing wildly, staring at her. "You should never have turned against me sister, now you die!"

But to Viserys' surprise Daenerys simply smirked back and pointed over his shoulder.

Having been guided by Daenerys' mental commands Rhaegon had stayed well above the battle, not out of sight but out of mind for now. Then he had swooped down, using the higher altitude to gain speed as the flames in his belly began to churn. Then Rhaegon blew out a tongue of flame that was even larger than Balerion's.

Viserys looked behind him almost derisively only to seem Rhaegon incoming, his mouth already open, and the flames appearing within. Desperately he sawed at the reins "Bank! Danger!"

That last second invasion saved man and dragon from immolation. Rhaegon's tongue of flame shot through the airspace that they had recently been flying through, close enough to sear Balerion's side, low enough that it missed the all-important wing on that side.

"SHhhssssaaaaaa!" Balerion whistled in agony, thrashing in the air beating its wings desperately to stay in the air and moving away from the two enemy dragons who were now circling behind it.

Viserys yelled aloud in panic and fear, having just pulled his own leg out of the steer up on that side to avoid the limb being charbroiled but having lost much of his control on his mount doing so. "Back! Back to camp!" He ordered desperately pulling the dragon's head in that direction hoping that Daenerys would not follow. He had been outmaneuvered entirely here, and those two dragons were certainly not the pampered pets he had expected!

Flying low over the infantry that it already been forced forward towards the northern lines Viserys was pleased that the scattered archers below began to fire up into the air behind him, keeping his sister from following as she winged his way towards the army, Balerion snarling and crying aloud in agony from its wound. It was a wonder he hadn't flung Viserys from the saddle yet, but Viserys knew he had to get down to the ground before Balerion became too crazed from its wounds to do so.

OOOOOO

Below the aerial combat Lord Grafton and Lord Ladybright stared aghast at their side's dragon retreating back to the rest of the army while the enemy dragons began to circle.

For a moment the men of the Vale men halted there around Grafton and their other commander Lord Moore, torn by indecision whether to attack and get mixed in with the Northerners quickly so that the dragons could not attack them, or turn back hoping that the added bows of the army behind them could turn the dragons away. Then they watched as the two dragons banked sharply southward, leaving them behind breathing heavy sighs of relief.

That moment of hesitation and their inattention to the noise of battle in the distance however doomed them. More than one man stared to their right and ahead, then paled, shouting aloud "Ware, prepare to receive!" But it was too late.

Because in the next moment Lord Mace and Lord Ambrose led their heavy cavalry units around the northern edge of the stark front lines, only to see the infantry stuck there for a moment not moving. Mace had lost some two hundred or so cavalymen to the archers of the entrenched army and had yet to find any kind of break in the defenses. The four hundred or so heavy cavalry that had charged straight at the side of the triangle facing their assault directly had disappeared into heavy ditches.

Those ditches didn't seem to be lined with steaks or anything, but they too wide for any horse to leap, and far too deep for any horse to survive if they fell into it. Killing the men and horses that had fallen into that trap however had kept the archers of the forts and the front line from concentrating on the rest of the heavy cavalry under Mace as they skirted around it.

Mace laughed, his good humor coming back with a vengeance now that he saw a real target for his cavalry. Pointing his lance forward at the southern infantry he shouted "Charge!"

Before Grafton or the others could gather up their scattered wits enough to decide what to do, the heavy cavalry of the Reach was upon them. In disarray and with their leaders unable at this point to give out any commands the levy forces from Gulltown broke. They had been basically forced onto the ship at sword point and were only barely trained. They threw their weapons down and ran, racing westward and away, disrupting the lines of the better trained armsmen.

The heavy cavalry smashed into this disorganized force, killing and trampling with impunity every man that didn't have pikes able to hold them off. But even there, the pikemen were not heavily armored. Nor did their unit cohesion come anywhere close to matching that of the northern pike regiments. Here and there a man went down, opening up a hole which was exploited by more heavy cavalry following behind.

At the same time that was going on, Greatjon stared across the barricade at the Stormlands infantry of that was just beginning to pull up at the far edge of bow range. Fire arrows began to come out of that force impacting the forts anchoring his line, while his own archers began to fire back. He turned to Rickard nodding at him. "I think that Daryn and Dacey can handle things here, I'll take command of the southern line, you take command of the northern."

The other man nodded, and they both turned away. Rickard arrived on the southern diagonal to watch the battle, watching as the Reach cavalry began to split, portions of it reforming after its magnificent charge against Viserys' Vale infantry, moving once again to circle around the encampment. More archers from the westward most fortification began to fire on them, along with more archers on the line.

Here and there clumps of heavy cavalry charged the defenses mostly towards the obvious breaks in it, but in those breaks they ran into small units of pike. Taken from the 600 men that Lord Manderly had raised these men had not started out as well trained as the battle ax or stark regiments, but they had made up for lost time since.

Each break in the line was defended by 200 such men over an area where only fifty of them could fit in a line. Four rows of pike showed a front bristling with weapons that even the most insane (and most cavalry horses were bred to be somewhat insane or suicidal, horses after all are not predators) refused to face. The cavalry bunched up there, only to be continually raked by archers from behind the barricades or up on the nearest fort.

Behind them about eight hundred more heavy cavalry broke off entirely from the main battle, chasing down the levee units that had fled eastward. While Lord Ambrose and of another portion of the army was completely bogged down now in trying to get through what it appeared to be weaknesses in the defense, Mace disdained such. Instead he rallied his own men and more than half of the rest of the force he had initially led, continuing around the eastern point of the Stargaryen encampment.

OOOOOO

Surprisingly Viserys was able to land Balerion safely, if barely. He leaped clear of the saddle as the dragon hit the ground, squalling and breathing gouts of fire in every direction. Viserys scabbled away, shouting aloud "get some food for him!"

Quickly a few nearby soldiers raced in deeper into the Dornish camp, while every other soldier nearby backed away, staring at two men who hadn't been quick enough, their bodies burning as their screams began to fight Balerion's pained bellows to be heard.. Eventually Balerion subsided, turning its long serpentine neck to look at the burn marks along its flank.

A carcass of an ox was brought forward, 'and the dragon turned quickly at the smell. Leaning forward and grabbing it out of the hands of the four people who had been carrying it, Balerion dug into the still bloody carcass. With food keeping its attention for now Viserys and two other men snuck forward, clamping a heavy chain around its neck. Before Balerion could rear up and attack other men pulled the chain taught from the other end, forcing it back down.

Realizing he could still eat Balerion simply huffed, glared around before biting down voraciously. Other men moved forward clamping similar chains down onto its limbs. With that, and a rope tying Balerion's tail down in place, several dozen men who had been filling in as healers for the men and horses of the army moved forward. After making sure Balerion couldn't harm them, they quickly went to work on its side.

Viserys stared at Balerion's injury from a safe distance, his eyes wide, and his body trembling with anger and remembered terror. Those were not pampered pets, nor were those dragons moving separately, that, that was a prepared maneuver! How did Daenerys do it? Last night I was prepared to put her ability to command Balerion and that upstart's small freak down to her Targaryen blood, her personality and fearlessness. But this? Two dragons one without a rider working in concert in the air!? That's impossible! She truly is the most dangerous threat! If Daenerys can somehow control the second dragon without being in its saddle or even verbalizing her orders, she really might be able to do the same to Balerion! That is, if she's not able to just kill us!

His ever increasingly fearful thoughts were interrupted when Arianne moved towards him through the camp. "My king, I fear this battle is lost. We should retreat, husband our remaining strength for another day."

Viserys looked at her, his mind still more than a little shell-shocked. "I, but, but the infantry, the rest of the army, it's ready to march we..."

"The infantry have already been practically wiped out, we've lost everything we gained from going to Gulltown my King. They were so concerned about covering your retreat that they missed the Reach forces, they were caught in the open and unprepared by heavy cavalry." Arianne replied quickly staring out towards the southwest. "Remember, we must husband our forces! The Baratheons and the Starks have more men than we do, and I don't believe either of them have been bloodied as much as we have already. Let the two of them fight it out with the Golden Company without us for now."

"Very well. Viserys said, shaking his head. "Yet we can't retreat too far, I want us close enough to react if we see either of them taking enough losses to give us an advantage."

Jorah spoke up from where he had followed Arianne. "We'll need to stop at least the Baratheon army from sending men after us. "I saw a glimpse of the Golden Company moving into attack the Starks, but that leaves the Baratheons to come after us."

"They've already committed some of their cavalry, that's who destroyed our infantry my king, not your sister and her dragons." Arianne tried to keep any tone of recrimination out of her voice, having actually agreed with Viserys about how Daenerys would have ruined her two dragons through coddling them.

"Yes, those dragons thankfully won't be coming after us at least, they'll be busy dealing with the upstart dragonseed and his runt." Viserys said now finally regaining his mental equilibrium. "As to the Baratheon army, how many horse archers do we have left?"

"Around 3,600 my Lord. Were already using the remainder' to screen our flank from the Stormlands-Reach Army, and you remember we sent off 1000 under my cousin to see if they could skirt wide around the Baratheon army and attack their camp.

That had actually been Elia's idea. Given the events last night, she hoped to finish the Witch off before she could once more use her powers. She hoped a direct assault on her would work..

"Good, send half of the remaining horse archers to back up those guarding our right flank. Then get some servants to coat a pig with sleeping spices, Balerion won't be able to refuse a pig even if he's gorging now.. The moment he's asleep, we'll begin to retreat."

Next to Arianne Nymeria nodded before running off to relay Viserys orders to his lords, though inside she was wondering if they should possibly ditch Balerion, and if he objected Viserys too. And up until she had seen Aegon the evening before, she would have pushed the other lords to do just that, whatever Arianne might think. But Aegon wasn't any better than Viserys, whatever her uncle Doran might have hoped, and Nymeria refused to change from backing one sadistic maniac for an idiotic boy with delusions of grandeur and a barbarian's feelings toward women.

Still if we pull back now before we're attacked, we are still a formed force, one that can inflict a decent amount of casualties if attacked. With that we might be able to sue for peace with whoever won the rest of this battle.

Nymeria had no illusions how this battle would go, whatever Viserys thought. The army under her father had not drawn enough of the Stormlands and Reach lords off, and even if they had she wasn't certain they could've matched the Northern and Riverlands army. No, we need to survive for now. Ambition can wait until later. Makes me very glad Arianne has been smart enough to drink moon tea on a daily basis. No child leaves no permanent connection between our houses if Viserys dies suddenly...

OOOOOOO

Aegon had taken longer than Viserys or Daenerys did to get Calixares into the air, having to coax him up and override his petulant mood that morning. Once they were in the air Aegon watched from a distance the battle between Sunfyre and Balerion for a moment as he wondered where to strike first. I wonder where are my aunt's other dragon is? Or can she only use one in battle at any given time? That makes sense I suppose. Regardless, I have to thank my uncle for taking her attention away from me.

Moments later Aegon was past the front of his own army moving forwards, aiming towards the Stark encampments southernmost fortification and the line of balustrades moving from it on a diagonal. "Attack my Dragon!" At that command Calixares roared, the roar turning into a gout of flame that shot down at the fort below.

Thanks to the roofs on top of the fort, none of the men inside could shoot straight up, and that was where Aegon began his assault. The wet mud and dirt that had been heaped up onto the roof saved the fortification from going up like a torch, but even so the blast began to cook the wood underneath the mud.

Aegon didn't spend much time on that fortification, moving on quickly, Calixares continuing to assault the defensive line with his flame. Yet at the same time, the archers below and behind them in the fort began to fire up at him. Calixares could not shoot his fire far enough to remain out of arrow range, unlike the larger dragons, and this cost him now. Arrows hit Calixares' underbelly bouncing off the scales there, but one ripped through the membrane of one wing.

This caused Calixares to squawk, beating his wings to ascend higher away from the northern lines. Even so a little under 900 men had already died under his assault. There were also little fires here and there along the line forcing other men away from it to begin efforts to put them out. And that first fort was still smoldering, the mud on it cracking and drying off from the heat of the fire.

Calixares cared nothing for that, simply panicked by the arrow punching through his wing. It almost threw Aegon off doing so but he clung to his , his legs tightened around its neck, while his hands jerked on the reins, urging Calixares up and to the right. "All right, so the Northerners aren't panicking as I hoped."

Almost immediately after they moved out of bow shot however, Aegon saw the Reach cavalry coming around the eastern tip of the Stark encampment's triangle, and grinned evilly. "If the Starks are such a tough target, then maybe we should go for a softer one Calixares." Aegon Pulled Calixares further around before forcing his head down to face directly towards the cavalry circling the Stark encampment. "Attack!"

Calixares roared, moving down and raking the cavalry with his fire while the cavalry tried to break and run. Dozens of banners fell, including the largest one which had been leading the charge and hundreds, thousands of men burned alive in their armor in those few moments.

Then Sunfyre and Rhaegon pounced from higher above him, their own bolts of fire almost bracketing the smaller dragon. A desperate dive towards the ground and a bank westwards saved it, but even so it's squawking and pain at his tail was caught by Rhaegon's attack, and one of its wing tips by Sunfyre's.

Daenerys stared at the smaller dragon as he tried desperately to get away from her little ones, racing southward ignoring the Golden Company for a moment as they marched into position to assault the Stark encampment. Now through panicked and facing two enemies that had the altitude advantage Calixares was simply trying to get away, trying to flee. No way can that moronic pretender control him now. In that case, I should do what I can, see if I can bring Calixares to our side.

Closing our eyes and trusting Sunfyre to fly safely her Daenerys concentrated, sending her mind outwards. But not along in the worn and well-known paths between her mind and those of little ones, but towards the very tenuous link she had created last night.

But Daenerys couldn't get through like she had the evening before. Calixares was panicking, fearful, scared and angry all of which interfered in his thoughts, which made him much harder for Daenerys to influence.

Worse, Calixares wasn't as intelligent as her own little ones, and the one time she got through and tried to reason with him failed. It occurred to Daenerys that more than a years' worth of warging with her little ones had affected their intelligence. Certainly Fenris and the other direwolves were much more intelligent than normal animals. I can't reason with him, I have to force my way into Calixares' mind and I can't do it when he's so terrified!

Just then Calixares turned its head sharply around still flying straight but with its head facing almost backwards. With a desperate roar Calixares aimed past his rider's shoulder and head, trying to hit Rhaegon with a blast of fire.

"By the Seven!" Aegon yelled loudly, diving down and hugging the dragon's neck for a moment to get out of the way of the blast, while Rhaegon twisted aside, snarling angrily. Even so Calixares kept retreating, unable to get away from Sunfyre even as Rhaegon fell back slightly before reclaiming his position above the other Dragon.

Aegon shivered a little at the nearness of that escape, smacking Calixares on his neck angrily, speaking aloud in common rather than Valyrian such was his fear-induced anger. "Don't do that! You nearly killed me!" Aegon had never tested his ability to withstand fire, Griff had never allowed him to, saying that had simply been a tall tale perpetrated by the Targaryens, and he was in no hurry to see if it was true now.

But his dragon wasn't listening to him whatever language he used. Calixares was in full flight now, simply trying to get away from his tormentors, scanning the forest below them for a place he could hide.

Just then he Aegon saw something, a hidden dell between two medium-sized hills about five leagues away from the battle behind it wasn't the small forest in the dell that startled him. No, that was the army that was marching out of it as he watched. Their banners marked him out as house Stark and its allies.

"What, what, in the... There have to be thousands of men down there, why aren't they with the rest of their army?" As he watched those men began to march out of the forest, heading somewhat south. "They're going to attack the Golden Company from the side!"

That was as far as Aegon's thoughts went before a blur shot up from the army, climbing one of the trees and leaping into the air directly below him and his Dragon. A reflexive pull on the reins as someone shouted "Dodge away Daenerys!" saved Aegon's life at least for the moment. Something, unseen slashed through the air where he had just been as that same voice, which Aegon suddenly recognized as Ranma Stark's shouted "Direwolf's Claw!"

Ranma had aimed to cut off Calixares' head and possibly the rider behind him, Ranma obviously hadn't tested this technique on magical creatures like dragons, so didn't know if they had some kind of immunity to an attack like the vorpal blades of the Kijin Raishin Dan, though he doubted it. This guess was proven correct, though he didn't actually hit the target he aimed at. Instead, the ki-based technique ripped through one of Calixares' wing, cutting it into pieces in a welter of blood, bone and sinew from the shoulder to the tip.

"GYAARRHHHHHAAHAAAAH!" Calixares screamed in pure agony, falling to the side immediately as its ability to stay in the air ended abruptly. And they were falling near the ground in any event that they slammed almost immediately into trees, crashing through them like a boulder from catapult but this catapult's boulder wasn't a rock, no it was flesh and blood.

Aegon didn't even have time to shout in astonishment at what had occurred before he began to scream in pain, bits and pieces of the trees Calixares smashing as it fell smacking into him in turn. One tree limb caught him right in the neck breaking his neck and thankfully ending Aegon's life relatively quickly while Calixares continued his screaming descent toward the ground.

Ranma grimaced as the feeling of weariness hit him from using that technique again, but he landed easily enough on the ground waving up at Daenerys and her 'little ones' who were now circling above. He turned quickly shouting behind him at the army slowly moving out of the tree line. "Get a move on double time it, that dragon might start spewing out fire any moment, we can't get caught in the woods if they go up!"

Above him and Daenerys and the two dragons circled, as Daenerys leaned over Sunfyre's side shouting down "Balerion's turned aside and retreated! Do you want me to attack their army?"

Ranma shouted up at her while the army moved past quickly under Jason and Patrick's orders, their shouts encouraging the man to doubletime it. "No, remember we said we can't be seen using your dragon's too often on humans, and besides they probably still have too many archers for me to be happy with you putting yourself in harm's way like that. Just return to camp, but keep one of your dragons in the air to watch the battle!"

Her hair whipping in the air around her face Daenerys nodded. "I will! , Just make sure you return in to me one piece!" She would have said her and Merry of course, but in public like this that was impossible.

"I will." Ranma laughed then started off into the woods while the stragglers of the army raced past him. They slowed down considerably the moment they were out of the woods, after all pikemen weren't exactly sprinters, nor was the irregular infantry given the equipment Ranma had ordered them to carry and train with over the past few weeks. But they were all out of the woods, that was the important thing right now. He waved his hands at Jason who had moved back to him as the irregular infantry began to form up on either side of the pike regiments. "I'll join you in a bit, I'm just going to make sure that dragons dead."

Jason nodded, reaching over to grip Ranma's shoulder. "Be careful, we still need you alive, and a wounded animal is a dangerous one." Ranma nodded grimly at the older man before racing off.

He moved through the woods warily, moving from one tree to another listening for anything moving. All he heard was a low moan, a groaning peal of agony echoing through the trees. Soon he came upon where Calixares had crashed. The dragon was obviously dying, bleeding copiously from the stump where it's wing had originally been. Several bits and pieces of wood were also sticking into his body, the most prominent of which was a massive splinter from a tree which would've done well as the weapon of a scorpion. It had slammed into and through one of its back legs deep into its main body right by the pelvis.

Nearby Ranma saw Aegon, flung from the saddle at some point during the dragon's crash, his neck at an unnatural angle and his body perforated by several splinters. Ranma knelt down, closing the youth's eyes and shaking his head. "Poor fool,you were fed on lies your entire life and then used by the Connington, Varys, the Iron bank or both. You were just their weapon, just their tool. If only you hadn't invaded, if only you had been willing to stay away, or at least not assaulted the houses of Massey's Hook, you might still be alive."

He looked over at the dragon, moving behind its head, where it was weaving side to side, the pain of its wounds too much to let it do anything but groan in in agony. Before Calixares could see him, Ranma rammed Ice into the back of its head, putting it out of its his blade out Ranma cleaned Ice on the grass nearby shaking his head sadly. "And you were just a weapon too, just a tool."

With a final sad shake of his head Ranma closed Calixares' eyes patting the dragon's head once before turning and racing off to rejoin his army. He had a war to win.

OOOOOO

Back at the main battle, no one had really noticed or cared about the bit of drama going on well to the west. The Reach cavalry under Lord Tyrell had been slaughtered, horses and men burned alive regardless of their armor. But the rest of that initial cavalry force was still assaulting the northern side of the encampment, probing here and there while the force that had been assaulting the western line had retreated, coming around in support.

At the same time, Calixares had created a bit of a weakness in the southernmost flank of the Stark encampment. And the Golden Company moved forward to take advantage of this.

Now Harry Strickland led the elephants force along with the first two companies of the Golden Company forward, the elephants leading the way. The men on top of those elephants in their protected forts began to fire at their fellows in the Stark's fort, unable to win any kind of force superiority for now. However the elephants kept on going, ignoring the pinpricks on their own armor staring through the extremely expensive chain mail that was covering their bodies at the line of earthworks that was their target.

The first few elephants reached the line, smashing through the dirt mounds and the men behind them, while the archers from on high fired down into the men under Greatjon, who had pulled back most of his men rapidly. There had been a few ditches on the southern flank however. The elephants had found them stepping on the wood covering them so hard that it broke, forcing the elephants to back away bleating angrily before moving under their rider's directions to join their fellows.

But then the elephants were met with something they had never seen before. Fenris leapt towards them, landing on the side of one elephant and ripping at its chainmail with his blue-gold covered fangs and claws. The elephant trumpeted, standing on its hind legs and trying to get away from this monstrous predator. The men inside its covered fort shouted as many of them fell out the side, others hanging on for dear life.

The elephant tried to turn its head and grasp its attacker with its trunk, but Fenris ducked aside, leaving a long slash down its length. Then Fenris found and found one unprotected place right behind the elephant's head where the driver had previously been sitting. The direwolf bit down there, sinking his fangs deep into the elephant's neck, seeking its spine.

The elephant bellowed in panic, turning and trying to fling the attacker off. But even now it was beginning to lose energy, its lifeblood spurting out from its wounds, and then it fell, spine severed directly behind its neck.

There was a tremendous booming thump as the elephant's carcass slammed into the ground while Fenris grimly held on. A moment after it landed Fenris pulled back licking at his bloodied fangs and howling in victory. "AWOOOOO!" Then it looked at the other pachyderms, snarling, his bloodied fangs bared as he moved over the carcass ignoring the men that had ridden the elephant all of whom were now dead by the swords of the defenders or falling off their animal.

The elephants panicked. They had of course dealt with wolves, or at least their ancestors had. But it was a very foolish wolf who would attack an elephant let alone a herd. But this, this was something else. This was a wolf larger than any ever seen, and it already proven that it could get through their human made armor, which all of the elephants had learned protected them from practically anything.

With a monstrous bellowing they stampeded back the way they came crushing and killing anyone in their wake. Even the people in the small fortifications on their backs weren't safe. At the speed the elephants were going the howdahs were being shaken apart, but more importantly were listing from side to side. More than one of them fell entirely to one side or the other as the elephants raced on, dragging them along before the straps meant to hold them in place tore apart.

Fenris howled again and went after them. Several hundred of the Northerners all around him roared in turn. "The Starks, the Starks, the wolves of the North!" And went to follow him.

But that wasn't the plan right now, and Greatjon knew it. "Back into position! The first man that leaves his place on the barricade will get my greatsword up his ass!" At that threat more than one man paused, battle lust giving away to confusion or humor, and more than one man bellowed ribald replies. Yet they also all returned to their place on the mud and wood barricades.

Greatjon knew that they couldn't afford to charge out into even the first few columns of the Golden Company messed up as they were. And he was right. The Golden Company reforming quickly from the damage the stampeding elephants had done to it, the front ranks coming together once more behind the stampede while the ranks in front of the stampede opened up to allow it through. Seeing this even Fenris pulled back, retreating back into the camp.

That coordination is something else! Their total strategy might now be shot to hell, but each individual commander over there knows what they're doing.

Above him, Sunfyre and Rhaegon were returning, landing neatly in the center of the camp. Greatjon was tempted to pull back for a moment to go and talk to her, but before he could, Sunfyre was moving into one of the tents, and Rhaegon was leaping into the air again. He watched as Daenerys raced through the camp, running despite her lizard lion armor, until she was directly next to him. "Well done Greatjon. I'm sorry I couldn't stop that dragonseed's assault on your lines before this, but I had to concentrate on Balerion."

"No worries lassie." Greatjon rumbled, turning from her to watch the Golden Company attempting to reform, pulling what few units had come forward back out of bow. His normal low esteem for social niceties was even lower now that they were in a battle, but he smiled internally when Daenerys once again didn't seem to care. Now this is a real queen, one who doesn't need all that bowing and scarping crap. "Shit happens in battles, and ones like this even more so."

"I've sent Rhaegon up so I can use his eyes." Daenerys went on, uncaring that she was sharing the fact she could warg with her little ones with Greatjon, who had never actually been fully brought into the confidence of the Wolfsworn on that point about her, or about the Starks and their direwolves. As she expected however the Umber lord didn't even blink. "With that we can see what's going on elsewhere. I think my brother's army is done, and the Golden Company has lost its puppet, but frankly, given our stance on mercenaries, which they know after yesterday, they'll choose to continue to fight anyway."

Greatjon grunted and the two of them fell silent, watching, waiting.

OOOOOO

It wasn't only the elephants stampeding, or even Aegon's death that had caused the Golden Company's total battle plan to come apart however. It had taken a few hours, but Stannis and his army had at last overwhelmed the skirmishers of the Company of the Rose and the Second Sons. The survivors were in complete disarray as they fell back to the Golden Company's reserves.

Two companies of 1000 men each formed up along with half the company's archer unit, waiting for Stannis' charge. The rest of the Golden Company had fully reformed now, and Franklyn Flowers had taken overall command.

The spear companies hadn't taken many casualties yet. The Elephants had done more damage to the horse units directly behind them than the spear phalanx, which had time to react to the charge. Now they finished forming up, but Franklyn was debating with Tristan Rivers on if they should continue to attack the Stark encampment or turn and reinforce their fellows against Stannis' assault.

But before any decision could be reached, the fangs of the direwolf struck again this time from the west. Jason, Patrek and Ranma came marching into view from the trees several leagues distant, well westward of where their camp had been. With them came the Tully and Stark Pike Regiments, along with two thousand irregular infantry.

By the time they reached the Golden Company's advancing column, it had turned to face them. Say what you would about the mercenaries overall strategy, or its command of the total battle, but every unit commander knew what they had to do and worked well together. Seeing the spear phalanx facing him Ranma almost felt admiration for that, for their courage and coordination. But then he remembered what these men were, and his lips formed into a snarl. "Charge!"

With the pikes now up right as the pikemen behind him marched forward the irregular infantry charged with Ranma. Yet in their hands they did not carry swords or axes or anything of that nature, no they carried the surprise Ranma had ordered made all those months ago in Seagard, two to a man save for Ranma who carried five. They were long throwing spears, with their shanks, which had a hard pyramidal point and were about 24 inches long, was made of soft iron rather than steel.

In another world these would've been called pilum. Here they were simply strange throwing spears. Very few among the men issued them understood the point of them, though Rickard and Greatjon had, as had Jason. They understood that if used well enough, they could aid in opening up a spear phalanx or any other formation.

Ranma was the first to hurl his forward. He hurled it forward with such strength that it slammed into a man's shield, going through it and into the man himself. He fell screaming, but this place was quickly taken by another man, as the Golden Company began to charge forward as well.

Many of the commanders understood the overall situation, and knew they were now caught between two opposing forces. But even so they were confident. The Golden Company's tradition of unit cohesion, its organization and coordination had always proven beyond practically any enemy. And indeed against Stannis' force that was proving the case. The Reach cavalry under Stannis charged but fell back broken and bleeding.

Against Ranma's group however things began to go differently the moment the rest of the regular infantry was within throwing range. Their pilum were hurled as one at Ranma's bellowed, "Loose!" Fully 2000 spears were hurled in that brief moment, then again as the line of irregular infantry continued to charge forward.

Those pilum however didn't penetrate as Ranma had. Instead they penetrated the shields, then the pig iron warped, the spear shaft and the iron stuck into the hole into the shields of the men of the spear phalanx. Each of those spears weighed those large shields down further, pulling them out of position and wearing the men who were behind him down.

Seeing this Ranma grinned slowly skidding to a halt. "Now lads, split and retreat!" This maneuver was why he was with this portion of the army at all. He had drilled his men in difficult maneuvers like this, but this was the first time that they were under fire as they were doing it. Archers had claimed dozens of lives already as they charged forward, and it was going to be tough to pull his men back from completing the charge, the act going against all their previous understanding of warfare.

About fifty yards away from where they would've impacted the Golden companies spears as they came forward his men split, fading to either side of the center of his charge, moving backwards and away quickly. Ranma lost even more men, arrows impacting their backs and sides as they turned, but soon after he gave that command all of his irregular infantry were out of the way of the Stark Pike as they charged forward.

"Winter is coming!"

"The King! The true King and queen of Westeros!"

Some of the pikemen even shouted the chosen words of the new royal house. "Honor Above All!"

They were answered by the warcries of the Golden Company. "Beneath the gold, the Bitter steel!"

"Gold above the Gods!"

"Gold is our word!"

Such were their cries as pike met spear on that battlefield. Two organized, disciplined and coordinated units which prized working together over individual prowess, smashing into one another with death or victory in the balance.

On the one side roughly 4000 pikemen, 2000 from House Stark and 2000 from House Tully along a front of only 500. House Stark's pike held that front with its full 2000 complement, while behind them the Tully regiment continued to march forward adding their weight to the press. Their pikes were upright for now while they waited for when they had to bring them down to defend the flanks.

On the other side was a little over 6000 spearmen. The Golden Company's cavalry had died, trampled or broken by the elephant's madness or gripped by the same. But the spearmen had reformed, their discipline unwavering. Each spearman held a spear of oak, longer than a horsemen's lance but not as long as a pike. They also held shields, and were decently armored though not nearly up to the standards of the pikemen.

If either of these forces had been on the defensive, either one could've broken the other. After all, the tactics of both spears and pikes lent themselves to defensive formations. But this was not defense against offense. This was offense against offense, the Golden Company having charged towards the Northerners intent on breaking their mobile force before turning to aid their fellows against Stannis.

The pilum had also muddied the waters a bit. The shields of the spearmen in the front few rows were now heavily denuded with pilum, the weight of which was pulling them out of position. And the pikes had both greater range and greater depth along their front, which proved decisive.

To get to a pikemen, a spearman had to block his enemy's pike bearing it down to the ground or up above his head and continue forward. But in an organized pike charge you would have to deal with another pike head almost immediately. Get past that, and the third would find you. It was only after you got past the third row of pike that your own spear would be able to range on your enemy's body.

None of the Golden Company's commanders had ever dealt with a pike formation that was this densely packed, this well drilled and trained. Pikes were of course used in warfare elsewhere, but not like this, not as organized as this. The tightness of the pike regiment's lines were unlike anything they had dealt with before, and their armor was better as well.

Here and their men were able to break through that third line of pike, stabbing forward viciously with their spears but more often than not their spears simply didn't have the penetrating power at that far a range, they'd have to get a step or two closer to get more thrusting power behind their spears to get through the plate armor that the pikemen wore. And more often than not, those men died before they could take that step.

At the front of the first line of pike Patrek stood with the Stark, shouting encouragement. "All right men, this is what you've been trained for! Raise those pikes high and get it stuck in!"

With that he thrust his pike forward again, watching it smash into an enemy's shield, watching it bear the shield to the side, allowing another man's pike into stab. That man went down, and more spearmen took their place and more besides. Men began to go down around him, but far more of the enemy were going down. "We're winning this, men! We're winning this!"

He was answered with a roar, the words that Ranma and Daenerys had decided would be the motto of their house now being taken up by every voice not just a few. "Honor Above All!"

A spear caught Patrek along the side of the face, ripping open his helmet there and causing a gash to appear along his cheek, but his pike took another Golden Company man in the throat, his tip cutting into his throat hard enough to almost penetrate to his spine. Two more men fell, but others took their place.

It was a grinding, deadly affair, but the pilum had done its job, weakening the shield wall of the spear phalanx enough for the pikes to get in those first kills, opening up the spear phalanx further. Someone on the other side realized this, and drums began to boom calling for the retreat.

The spear phalanx gave ground now, stopping its charge and pulling back. But the pikes continued to press forward, and here and there the Golden Company's men began to die in clumps.

Behind the pike regiments Ranma and Jason had reformed the irregular infantry. "You take command here Jason," Ranma ordered, gesturing to the pikes. "I'm going to take these men and flank left."

Lord Mallister nodded grimly, hoping that his son was still alive at the front of the pike regiments. But before he could answer aloud Ranma was already gone, marching off to the left and around the current battle slightly. Jason sighed watching him go with a faint smile, then ordered the Tully regiment to spread their men out to defend the flanks of the Stark pike while they continued to batter their way through the spear phalanx of the Golden Company.

OOOOOO

That same spear phalanx was performing far better against Stannis' Army than it was against the pike. Barely 2000 Spearmen were holding at bay something like seven or eight times their number in infantry, the forces swirling together and smashing into the spear line again and again.

Where elsewhere it had been the Reach cavalry that had taken the brunt of the battle, here it was the Stormlands infantry. Knowing that cavalry would've been next to useless against the spear phalanx, Stannis had reformed his army, taking Lord Buckler and the other Stormlands men from the second echelon adding them into his own. Then he sent in the majority of his remaining infantry to tie up the reserves of the Golden Company, while he kept the remainder of his cavalry and the Fire Guard in reserve in two different units, with the second under the command of Lord Cordwayner.

There was no comparison whatsoever in terms of training, armor or weaponry between of the Reach infantry and the Stormlands infantry, yet even so, they were not having much success in breaking the Golden Company's line. They simply lacked the ability to reach the spearmen, and when they could break through the spear lines, found themselves most of the time alone and without any backup against the line of shields, which turned most of their weapons away.

Knowing this would probably be the case, Stannis had kept back his archers, now sitting in all of them at once to hammer at one specific area of the Golden Company's line. Yet for a time it seemed as if this ruse would fail. While the Golden Company did not have many archers, their numbers making up a bare thousand or so of the total 10,000 plus strength that the company was supposed to have under arms, all of them were trained to a very high degree.

Moreover their weapons ranged wildly in size and therefore range and speed. Some of them used the massive longbows that were favored in the North. Some of them had crossbows, smaller and lighter than most found in Westeros. Still others used smaller double curved bows made of horn and sinew from the far east of Essos, which could fire both rapidly and with penetrating power, which had caused hundreds of deaths so far among his infantry. And the last were 50 Summer Islands men who used great bows of Golden heart. Those bows had greater range than even the great bows of the North, and were being kept back purposefully to target any dragon that tried to attack the army.

But what the Golden Company lacked was magical defenses. Melisandre had not been slain by the Faceless, and knew two things: one, who to blame for the attempt on her life, and two, where Stannis was concentrating his forces. And while most of her attention had been centered on the dragons, now that they were no longer fighting and the Dornish army in retreat, she had attention to spare for the Golden Company and a bit of personal revenge.

Near the front of the spear phalanx Jon Connington laughed raucously as the Stormlands infantry all fell back. Yes, yes the Stormlands men would pay, they would all pay for Rhaegar's death, for killing the one man Jon had ever really loved. After a moment under Balaq's eyes his laughter faded into a smirk. "We've got this, Baratheon can't break our lines, and when he finally retreats we'll be able to concentrate on the Stark's forces outside their encampment. Then Varys should be able to talk the Dornish to our side after watching Viserys lead them into ruin."

"If it is all the same I will keep to watching the skies yes? I still wonder why the Stormborn queen has not set her dragons on us." The Summer Island man said in his accented Common. "I also not be counting my gold until after... the... battle..." Balaq's voice trailed off and he snarled angrily, pulling his massive Golden Heart bow off his shoulders and readying a large arrow. "I be thinking that the eunuch's Faceless failed to kill the witch. Pity he not be near, least I could have shown him the price for failure."

Jon turned in the direction the man was looking only to gape. A massive fireball had grown from a small flickering light in the air, ignoring Balaq's arrow, which he had tried to use to disrupt the fireball somehow. It grew and grew as the men below it began to look up then fell on the spear line in front of them before Jon or any of the others could order their retreat. It hit with a massive "BOOOM!" sound, engulfing several hundred men, immolating them where they stood.

Sitting on his horse well back of the battle Stannis was waiting for this moment. He pulled out Lightbringer, holding it up high as the blade erupted in flames. Then he pointed at the area Melisandre's fireball had cleared. "There! Push them there now!" With that he charged forward.

Around him the 2,000 men of his Fire Guard charged with him, all of them on horseback, while his reserves did the same, followed quickly by his horded cavalry.

Or some of them anyway. In the midst of battle Stannis did not notice that several of his lords were keeping their men back from the action. Or that the second column, comprised of 7,000 men of the Reach, had not joined the main Stormlands and Reach component he was leading. News of Mace's death had reached them, and most of the lords of the Reach had decided that they wanted no further part in this battle.

Stannis had started the day with around 28,000 men. Though he did not know it, he had already lost a little over half the Reach cavalry he had sent to harass the Stark encampment, with the rest embroiled in a battle there. Now more than 8,000 men had quietly bowed out of the battle. And even as the battle turned against the Golden Company more than two-thirds of the men he had left to guard his camp and flank against the Dornish horse archers had also pulled back. Not returning to camp once they heard the news of Mace's death, they moved away from the battle entirely, out eastward. And Lord Staedmon and his house's men, pulled out of position from the horse archers, hadn't even noticed.

At the moment, he barely had 12,000 men, all of them embroiled in this one portion of the battle. Stannis had fallen into the same trap Renly had, though not quite as badly. He had concentrated on one aspect of the battle, losing sight of the bigger picture and trusting his lords to be doing their jobs. A mistake given the quality of those lords whatever his opinion about their loyalty, especially in relation to the lords serving Ranma and Daenerys.

OOOOOO

The spear phalanx could not stretch itself to the sides to protect its flanks very well, and Ranma and his men were in and among the Golden Company's camp quickly. As his men went about the business of pillaging, Ranma sped through the camp looking for the most garish tents he could with a band of 10 men behind him. They killed several armed servants and Golden Company men before they came upon the tent Ranma was searching for.

Dashing inside, he found not the commanders he had been hoping to ambush and kill, thus taking away any remaining strategic cohesion from the Golden Company, but a young girl tied to a bed. Her face showed tearstains both old and new. Her wrists and ankles were rubbed raw from where she had tried to break her bonds. In her mouth she had a gag, and she was wearing some kind of silk chemise, which was much too large for her spare frame.

Scowling angrily Ranma ripped off his wolf-fur coat tossing it over the girl's body and moving to one side of the bed while he barked orders of his men. "Spread out! Find me the command tent!"

One of them had already ordered the others to do so, and came back with a prisoner. "This was trying to get away my Lord! We caught him by the horses. Ranma spared a glance at the man's captive. "Varys! Excellent, keep an eye on him, he's got a date with the hangman or my sword, and I'd hate for him to miss it."

The men laughed, while Ranma ripped off the gag in the girl's mouth tossing it at the man who was holding Varys' arms behind him. "Stick that in his mouth for now too. Everything that comes out of his mouth is poison."

The men chuckled grimly, while Ranma turned back to the girl working on her bonds. "And who are you, milady?"

The girl shivered, but the weight of the heavy fur coat on her shoulders and the kind, understanding look in Ranma's eyes caused her to answer honestly. "I-I'm Glinda of House Massey I, I suppose the Lady Massey now unless, unless my brother and father still live."

"I can't help you there, milady. I'm Ranma Stark, and I'm afraid your brother and father are currently fighting against me and against these bastards. I haven't seen your House colors yet, but I saw your father at a parlay yesterday, so there's some hope at least. Don't worry, you'll be treated as a respected guest by my men so long as you're with us, and I won't try to use you against him or anything like that. Can you ride?"

The girl nodded, while Ranma pulled the fur coat around her more tightly before lifting her out of the bed, grimacing angrily. She was but a slip of a girl, barely Myrcella's age! Yet the way she twitched and trembled in his grasp, the wounds she had and the way she had been tied to the bed told Ranma all he needed to know of the ordeal she had been going through.

Within moments upon exiting the tent both Glinda and Varys were placed on horses with Varys tied there, his hands tied up to the shoulders around the horse's neck so they met by his wrists only to be tied together there. Ranma turned to the man who had taken charge of the 10 men unit that had followed him. "Sean, take these two and about forty others and head back and around the battle. I want them back among our encampment soonest!"

"Aye my Lord." the man replied, nodding his head quickly and moving off, grabbing more commandeered horses from among the few horses left in camp by the Golden Company. All around him the looting continued, but Ranma had made certain that his men understood his orders. If any of them tried to take liberties with a woman, be she a camp follower or not, they would die. And there was no drinking or burning going on either, simply killing and looting.

Another man ran up, one of House Blackwood's man named Barnabas who had remained with the rest of the army. According to Tytos he couldn't move silently to save his life, so was useless as an ambusher, but he was a decent enough swordsman. "My Lord!" he said bowing his head quickly. "We found the commander's tent, but it was empty save two. We killed them both as they were trying to escape. I think the rest of the Golden Company commanders are out with their men."

Ranma nodded then both men paused as a distant 'BOOM' grabbed their attention. Looking around for something to climb so he could get a view of the total battle Ranma spotted a spare howdah. Racing over to it he motioned Barnabas to follow him. There he leaped up easily landing lightly and staring out around the battle.

He couldn't see all of it from his vantage point of course, it wasn't nearly high enough to give him that kind of view of the battle which spanned five leagues in every direction. But he could see that the Golden Company had been stuck between two fires. Stannis had flanked them from the west with his main force and he and his men had flanked them from the east, pulling their attack column away from engaging his camp even though it looked as if the elephants had done a number on his southernmost defenses.

He could see the fractured spear phalanx his own pikes were facing falling back continuously now, one or two men panicking as the vaunted discipline of the Golden Company began to fray. But that was a slow process, and the commanders on that front seemed to have a better grasp of their men than the ones facing westward. Those were a bare league away, and they were breaking as he watched, one entire flank of their formation gone for some, possibly magical, reason. Is that Stannis leading them? With that flaming sword it has to be.

He shouted down to Barnabas. "Get the men formed up, we need to pull back from the camp! Stannis is coming!"

It took some time for Barnabas and the other sergeants (as Ranma thought of them in his head) to bellow the men back into order, sending off another four hundred men with laden horses with their purloined loot, which would be distributed among the total army later on, with some of it possibly returned to House Bar Emmon and Massey after the war.

As his irregular infantry formed up to face the Baratheon forces, that scene in the tent was replaying in Ranma's mind. The look on the girl's face when he and his men entered, the fear he saw there. Why do some humans think they need demons and devils to create hell, when so many are so good at creating it right here on earth?

Seeing the might of the Baratheon army coming towards him Ranma frowned, getting his head back in the war. I wanted to husband my own strengths just in case Melisandre was able to do something more today despite what happened last night, but it looks as if she shot her bolt already. Fine, that lets me shoot mine, and maybe we'll be able to get out of this, or at least hold until the pike is finished with the Golden Company. He looked at Barnabas. "Prepare to sound the charge."

"My Lord?" Barnabas looked worried at the massive force of infantry and cavalry coming towards him now. The spear phalanx that was holding them back had broken, shattering now. The cavalry of the Stormlands and Reach were now fully engaged slaughtering the Golden Company men as their phalanx, the cohesion which had spelled life-and-death broke a bare bow's range in front of where they had formed up right outside the Golden Company's camp. "Shouldn't we try to retreat back to the pikes?"

Ranma shook his head. "No, the spear phalanx on that side is still holding strong. They're breaking too slowly for us to think we'll have much aid there, we'd just lead this bunch straight to them. No," Ranma cracked his shoulders for a moment rolling them under his lizard line armor. "It'll be up to us to hold, and that means we should get in among them now before the Baratheon forces can reform after smashing the Golden Company. That kind of melee will play to our strengths."

"Follow me in!" With that he charged forward, his hands falling to his side as he gathered his ki. About a hundred yards away from where the melee was occurring Ranma stopped. An arrow from a Summer Islander with a massive bow slammed into his chest, bouncing off his lizard lion armor. Before the other archers could try their luck Ranma brought his hands forward. "Direwolf's Claw!"

The blades slammed into the ferocious melee, slicing through men, armor, horses, weapons, everything. Screams of fear and agony erupted from both the embattled sides, and Stannis stared in shock as two of the Fire Guard directly in front of him were ripped in two by the odd technique that Lord Stark used. So that magic has a slightly longer range than I thought, though it seems to spread to all sides equally, he thought grimly, seeing that the entire back of the spear phalanx had been gutted, along with his own men who had begun to encircle them.

With that, what little cohesion the Golden Company had still retained disappeared. Men began to run for their lives turning this way, northwards and southwards to get away only to run into the onrushing Stark irregular infantry.

Stannis himself was about to shout to his men to try and reform them, but a spear thrust up catching his horse directly in the stomach. The beast whinnied shrilly, standing on its hind legs suddenly and throwing Stannis off.

A few of the Golden Company infantry made for him, but his Fire Guard formed up quickly about six men dispatching the Essossi before one of them pulled Stannis to his feet. "Your Majesty, we should retreat! The second cavalry units, it, a-a few of the Reach men are saying said that Lord Tyrell has been killed, and the Reach forces are all pulling back!"

"What about Ambrose, Costayne and Cordwayner, or Appleton?"

"Lord Ambrose and his men are still engaged on the far side of the Stark encampment. Lord Costayne's missing my lord, possibly cut down by the other lords with him, and the other two are dead! Appleton just now and Cordwayner took an arrow to the eye!"

Stannis grimaced angrily. With those four men dead or not available he had lost his most powerful proponents among the Reach Lords that he could trust to stay loyal to their oaths to him. "Very well, signal...."

That was fought as far as he got for a voice intoned "Honor Above All!" A single fusillade of oddly shaped spears hammered the melee still going on than the Stark Irregular infantry charge slammed into them.

The infantry of the northern and Riverlands had been trained on the march, with the Northerners having been trained for months now to work together, to form small shield walls here and there, to watch each other's back. Stannis had tried to do the same to his own men with differing levels of success.

He had taken the marines of the Royal Navy and forged them into a land-based force, but they had been hammered badly in the battle against Renly. His Stormlands infantry had taken the blunt of the battle here against the Golden Company so far, and their cohesion had never been the best even before that. And his cavalry and reserves that had broken through and encircled the Essossi had been mauled a moment ago by whatever strange magical skill Ranma Stark possessed. Thus numbers was on one side, cohesion and training the other.

It was anyone's guess how this battle would go now. All the maneuvering, all the planning, all the strategy no longer mattered. Chaos had played all the cards it could, and now it was down to numbers, blood, courage, and steel.

Stannis grabbed a nearby horseman, pushing him out of the saddle before leaping up into it. "Rally to me! Rally to me! We can still win this, rally to me!"

OOOOOO

Melisandre stared into the fire, her mind unwilling to focus easily, it took an effort of will to not give in and not look away. Whatever that Faceless did to me must still be in my system somehow despite the cleansing of R'hllor. She only been able to conjure up a few fireballs so far, one of which had hammered the northern encampment somewhat, and the other which had shattered the Golden Company's spear phalanx. But Melisandre could not, no matter how hard she tried, bring enough willpower to bear to take control of the dragon flame and turn it on Daenerys' creatures, despite the one still in the air being within her range.

With Calixares dead and Balerion heavily injured and retreating with the entire Dornish army, Daenerys had achieved air superiority, but instead of using it to ruthlessly wipe out her enemies, she had retreated to her encampment. Only one of her creatures now circled the battlefield, not taking part. That was the one Melisandre was trying to attack magically, but it wasn't working. Somehow whatever had been in that incense greatly impacted her ability to use the sacred fire as a medium even now, and it wasn't going away.

It never occurred to Melisandre that the Faceless might have attacked her in two different ways since she had seen the man hold up the incense burner. But the Faceless were not known for failure, and this one had prepared a second bow to his quiver. After all, the logs of wood Melisandre used for her pyres weren't anything special, and its supply was unguarded. And in autumn in the Riverlands, who would ever notice the logs being coated with something a little slimier than normal rain could account for.

Why is the dragon circling like that anyway if it isn't going to attack? And by R'hllor's breath, how is the Stormborn wench controlling it when she isn't in the saddle? Surely her power of voice and eye cannot remain after the beast leaves her presence? Melisandre didn't understand how Daenerys was controlling the beasts, not understanding the warg connection. Could they have been trained to such an extent that they can act on their own without a rider, is that even possible with dragons? Wait... No!

What had caused Melisandre to turn away from her attempts to attack the flying dragon was the glimpse of the Stargaryen cavalry sortieing, passing under the dragon in her vision. They had been husbanded up until this point but now they rode out, moving in such a way to flank the battle between Lightbringer and the Golden company's infantry. At the same time the Wolf-who-walks-like-a-man had used his odd magic to break through the remainder of phalanxes among the Golden Company, his infantry charging behind them to pin the Azor Ahai and his army in place. It wasn't a planned assault, there being no way for the two groups to communicate, but it would work as well as one.

Where is the rest of the army? Have those cowards forgotten their oaths to the Azor Ahai? If they have, they will burn no matter how far they run! But that is for later, right now, I cannot allow the Azor Ahai and his men to be pinned between two foes! Wearily Melisandre concentrated, her hands moving into the flame again clenching the flames between her fingers, before, she began to concentrate, sending them into the image directly above the charging cavalry.

She looked up sharply as a scream from outside and bugles sounding broke her concentration. Standing up she weaved dizzily on her feet for a moment, before pushing the tent flap open and staring out. One of her few remaining acolytes turned to her. "My lady, the Dornishmen thegahh!"

An arrow took the woman from behind, and Melisandre glared angrily at the sight of hundreds of horse archers pelting into the cake encampment. They were being met by the portion of the Fire Guard had been left behind to guard her, but where were the screening elements?

She shouted that question aloud, and a Fire Guard who was racing through the camp on foot stopped for a moment to answer her. "Overcome we think my lady, they were pulled out of position and flank from both sides by this new stronger force of horse archers, Lord Staedmon is dead, and his men were routed! The Reach forces..."

That was as far as he got before Melisandre turned, conjuring up a fireball and sending it whistling through the space between two tents, impacting six horse archers that had been charging towards her. Hmm, that was much easier than trying the same with the sacred fire, odd.

"I know not why the Reach have fled, but there will be a reckoning! Azor Ahai will see to that! For now to me!" She held up her hand, conjuring a bright green flame for a moment sending it into the air above her position. Then she gestured, and another tongue of flame shot out, igniting several dozen horse archers, man and horse screaming as one as they were immolated. "It is the time to fight and die, but by the grace of R'hllor we will prevail!"

OOOOOO

Greatjon bellowed in laughter, pointing his sword ahead. Daenerys was right! They had been able to get the heavy and light cavalry out of camp and flank Stannis' force, almost coming in from directly behind but not quite, without any of his other forces interfering. Daenerys had predicted that, having seen the Reach forces pulling back from the field of battle through Rhaegon's eyes. She had supposed that Mace must have died somewhere, not having seen the banners of the unit Calixares had immolated.

The Reach units really have mostly fallen back! Damned cowards, but it works well for us! Now, even though Ranma's irregular infantry was out-numbered heavily they had friends coming, and they would catch Stannis' force between them. "The Giant's Rage! The Giant's Rage for the true King and Queen!"

His lance slammed into a Stormlands horse, the colors of the man on it indicating he was from house Buckler. A second later his greatsword was out, cutting the man almost in half despite the chainmail he wore. His next opponent wore heavy plate, but that didn't avail him any better than chainmail did his fellow. Behind Greatjon's massive strength his greatsword crunched into the heavy plate armor, shearing off the man's sword arm.

All around him the carefully cavalry of the Riverlands and the Northern cavalry that had remained with the Army charged into the disorganized and force of Stormlands infantry and what little cavalry remained under Stannis' command.

Stannis saw this, and shouted again "Rally to me!" before pointing at Greatjon and the chained giant banner flowing behind the man. He looked to his side, noting that he was surrounded by Fire Guard grimly. "Slay that one, slay the giant under the Umber banner, and we'll demoralize their assault, force it to retreat and we can pull back!"

The man all around him nodded grimly then moved forward as a unit, their lances down. Their horses trampled their own men to get to grips with the Stark cavalry.

From his own place in the battle Ranma kicked out, lashing out with hands, feet and Ice, leaping around here and there causing havoc and carnage wherever he went. Behind him the irregular infantry pushed forward, hacking and slashing at their fellows, dozens of men dying but taking hundreds with them. The effect of Ranma's first assault had shattered the morale of the enemy, which had been on the high after taking advantage of the fireballs that Melisandre had conjured into the Golden Company's ranks, and now both sets of enemy's were fighting just as hard to get away as they were to kill their opponents.

Standing on top of a horse's rearing head for a moment Ranma lashed out from to the side with Ice, killing the horse's rider and six other men around him while he looked around. Orienting on the fiery blade of Lightbringer where it was forging through the battle he saw the banner of the freed giant had appeared with the rest of the cavalry. Greatjon you magnificent bastard! He then led to another horse for a moment, staring past and his own men and smiled grimly.

A few moments later he had made his way back and stood next to Barnabas for a moment, leaping out of the melee to land where the man had paused. His own shield had been smashed to pieces, and he threw it to the side before reaching down to a dead man picking up his shield. He jumped a little when Ranma landed next to him. "GAH, um your majesty? Er, how are we doing?"

"We're doing fantastically Barnabas!" He shouted those words to be heard by the nearby men. "Greatjon and the cavalry have come from the side! And the pikes are nearly finished with the Golden Company phalanx. Hold here until they arrive, be the anvil to the cavalry's hammer, then tell Jason to press forward when he arrives with the pike!"

From what Ranma could see that phalanx hadn't broken like the one that had faced Stannis. It had simply died. Here and there a few men had run, some had even surrendered once they realized that their camp had been sacked. But the majority had fought, giving ground only grudgingly against the pike, doing more damage to the pike regiments than the entire war had done so far but losing five or six men for every one man they slew.

"And yourself, Your Majesty?" Barnabas asked, flexing his shield arm for a moment getting used to the weight of the shield he had taken from the ground, a Golden Company shield rather than one of his own men's.

"I'm going to cut off the Stag's head." Ranma replied grimly.

"More power to you milord!" said more than one man around him, shouting over the din of battle having heard Ranma's statement over the same. Ranma laughed grimly, then turned and leaped out over the heads of his men where they retained a semi-cohesive shield wall.

Landing, Ranma found himself surrounded by Stormlands infantry, some House he had never seen the colors of before, purple and dark blue for the most part with a small stag on a black background run through with a red chevron in the flew in an arc decapitating two men, before Ranma kicked out smashing one man's chest so hard that he flew backwards into another man taking them both down. Then he was leaping on, stopping here and there to attack but mostly heading in the direction he had seen Stannis moving through the battle.

Greatjon's horse went out from under him, its head practically sliced off by Lightbringer. "Old Gods' damnit!" Greatjon bellowed, but kicked loose of the saddle, rolling and grunting irritably as his plate armor took the weight of the landing. But he was on his feet quickly, greatsword whistling around to smash aside one man's mace, before coming back in an economical movement with a bare twist of his wrists to slice that man's throat open, cutting through gorget and jugular with equal ease.

An instant later he brought his blade back up and over to block with both hands a blow from Stannis' own greatsword. "Stannis Baratheon!" Greatjon rumbled grinning behind his beard. "That's a fancy blade you've got, let's see how good you are with it."

Not a Wolfsworn, Greatjon had still been reckoned a fell blade not only in the North but among those of Westeros who had heard or seen him. He was huge, monstrously powerful even for his size, one of very few men who could have reasonably gone toe to toe with Gregor Clegane in a strength contest and while not win not be humiliated either. He was also fast, and had trained with the Wolfsworn on and off again since this war began. His blows were economical, swift and certain.

Stannis however could also have been marked as a great warrior, not the swordsman Jaime or others of that level but still a renowned blade in his own right. And Lightbringer was a magical blade, its flames gave it some of the properties of a Valyrian sword, making the greatsword light in his hand allowing him to match his opponent's speed. And Stannis was too canny a man to try to match the larger Greatjon strength for strength.

The two large men exchanged about six or seven dozen blows in the next few moments. Greatjon was pressing Stannis hard, while around him the men of his house dueled with the Fire Guard. For the moment their contest was even.

Osha too was there, stabbing out repeatedly. She attacked horses and men alike, using her unhampered speed to great advantage, though she paid for it. One of her arms was hanging limply at her side, and she had a bruise developing along her cheek, from where a mace had caught her at the tail end of its swing. The helmet Roger had forced her to wear had saved Osha's skull, but she'd gotten some new scars for her collection today.

Nearby Greatjon had gotten Stannis into a position where he had to block an overhand blow. Bringing his greatsword down, Greatjon bellowed. "You're mine!"

Stannis swung his own blade upwards, and the Umber lord gasped in dismay as his blade was cut in two by Lightbringer. He dodged back rapidly as Stannis brought his blade back down and around, almost slicing Greatjon across his upper chest. His last-minute dodge had saved him, though his armor was opened right along one pectoral, the plate no match for the tip of that enchanted weapon. And the fires of the blade burned his chest, causing Greatjon to bellow in pain. "GAH-damn magic!"

He stumbled over the dead body of a Stormlands' infantryman, scrabbling one-handed for a blade for a moment, but knowing he would be too late.

Stannis made to thrust down with the point of his sword but before he could complete the thrust, another sword interposed itself, smashing Stannis' blade aside. "Tag in my friend." Ranma said nodding his head at Greatjon respectfully. "I believe this fight is mine."

Greatjon nodded wearily, pushing himself to his feet and holding a long sword, the blade looking incongruously small in his massive hand for a moment. "More power to you lad, just beware that blade of his. Although I suppose you have an advantage there too." He guffawed, bellowing in laughter while hacking at a few Fire Guard men who had been about to attack Ranma from behind. "The Giant's Rage, the Giant's Rage for the King and Queen!"

Behind Greatjon Ranma smiled grimly raising his blade to his face in a gesture of respect towards Stannis. "Lord Baratheon, I believe it's time we end this."

"Aye Lord Stark, I believe it is." Stannis did the same, and the two men charged one another.

OOOOOO

"By the sands, gahhh!" Elia dodged frantically, leaping out of the saddle and rolling through the thankfully muddy ground to rest for a moment between two tents of the Baratheon army as the ten man group of horse archers she had been personally leading was immolated by a ball of fire. The overall battle was going their way, but Melisandre was costing them grievously, smashing them here there and everywhere.

The Witch conjured up shields of flame blocking any arrows coming towards her. Long tongues of flame shot out, incinerating man, horse and anything else that got in their way. Most of the Fire Guard were down, and what camp followers the army had, had long since fled, and the battle was going against Melisandre and her forces quickly. But the woman didn't seem at all dismayed by this.

She stood in the center of the camp staring all around her as the horse archers pressed in, forcing the Fire Guard back deeper into the camp. There were only about 100 of them left now, the rest having fallen to the arrows of the horse archers but even so she still stood there arrogant and unmoving.

Then a new wrinkle was added to the battle. From behind the horse archers, arrows began to fall among their own warriors. Men appeared, dashing forward with spears, makeshift spears for the most part but still deadly, attacking the horse archers from behind. "The Riverlands! The Roots of the Tree for the true King and Queen!" shouted a voice, and the skirmishers of House Blackwood came out at from behind, striking here, there and everywhere.

And several hundred men also aimed arrows towards Melisandre from several directions. This caused her attacks to stop as she desperately conjured up her flame shields to burn the arrows midair.

Elia absently noted that the gem on the Red Witch's choker was glowing so hot it almost hurt to look at, before her attention was taken by something closer to her. Beside where Elia had landed in the mud, a hand appeared. Suddenly a short, yet well-formed girl was there, where she hadn't been before, her body covered with mud and grass, having somehow blended into the ground so well Elia hadn't noticed her. Or the trident she had just pulled out of the mud beside her.

For a moment the two women stared at one another then the girl was off, moving quickly and silently through the camp towards Melisandre, pausing whenever the increasingly frantic Melisandre was looking in her way. Faster than Elia would have thought possible the girl was crouching behind a tent directly behind Melisandre, her trident ready.

The instant Melisandre turned her attention away, the girl struck, her trident's tines stabbing into the witch's back.

Melisandre gasped in agony. For all her powers, for all the strength of magic she possessed, Melisandre was still but a mortal woman. The trident had stabbed into her back, piercing her intestines from the back and nicking her spine. It wasn't a immediately killing blow, but it was a fatal one.

She screamed, turning. Her hands glowing red as she reached for the girl, but the trident pressed on, the girl keeping her away from the range of the witch's hands. "You, you foolish girl, you, you've doomed us all, the Great Other, without the Azor Ahai, they, they..."

"Just fucking die witch, Westeros will be a better place without you!" Thrusting hard again the girl bore the woman down to the earth, holding her there pinned until Melisandre gasped her last. With that the girl pulled her trident out, raising it high in the air in victory.

Elia couldn't take your eyes away from the sight of this young girl the short, almost petite girl having downed that Witch who had claimed so many Dornish lives today. She did however look around when a naked blade tapped her on the shoulder. "Would you mind surrendering? It would be a shame to separate that gorgeous head from your shoulders." Asked an almost jovial voice by her ear.

She turned to stare at a young man behind her. He had wide shoulders, dirty armor and hair as black as night with a tanned face and lively brown eyes, which at present were locked on Elia's own. Around them her men were surrendering or dying, the trap having enclosed them from all sides.

Almost in a daze at this sudden turn of fortune, Elia raised her hands above her head, going to her knees in submission. "I am Elia Sand, daughter of Oberynd Martell, and I formally surrender."

OOOOOO

The duel between Stannis and Ranma was rather anti-climactic. Tired as he was from using the Direwolf's Claw and the battle against the Shadow Warriors the night before, Ranma still had strength and speed beyond any normal human. Unfortunately for all of its magical abilities Lightbringer could not aid the physical abilities of its wielder.

Stannis did his best, parrying some of the massively powerful slashes and cuts of Ice. But the greatsword was glowing blue, and it was a Valyrian blade, forged in dragonfire long ago, more than a match for the flames of Lightbringer. Stannis desperately tried to get some distance, tried to defend himself as well as he could, hoping that Melisandre would somehow come through with another magical assistance.

She didn't.

A few bare minutes into the duel Stannis tried to block a slash coming in from his side, holding Lightbringer in such a way as to redirect Ice into the ground only for a fist to catch him on the chin shattering his jaw and throwing his head back. He saw stars for a moment, but gamely brought Lightbringer up in a desperate attack.

But Ranma ducked underneath it, and then thrust upwards with Ice taking Stannis in the center of the chest, punching through his armored chest and out his back. The blow lifted Stannis off the ground for a moment before Ranma pulled Ice out, moving away slightly.

Stannis went to his knees staring hard at his killer him as he gasped. "Well, well fought Stark, well fought."

Ranma nodded his head respectfully to Stannis. Then without further ado Ice came around, decapitating the last Baratheon brother. With that he held Ice above his head and shouted aloud 'Stannis Baratheon is dead! Surrender, or join him!'

OOOOOO

Myrcella had gone to work long before the battle actually began. Knowing that she would face more burn victims than any normal battle would see she and her helpers had built up a large supply of burn cream and anything else that could aid them. In fact from the perspective of medical supplies the army had never been in better shape than it was before the battle of the Shadows Fall began. Myrcella had also doubled her helpers, added two new Maesters who specialized in healing, one from House Charlton, and a student of the maester from Riverrun.

The moment that Calixares began to attack the Dornish lines casualties began to flow in and several hours later they were still getting them.

Merry wiped blood from her hand, sighing as she stood up again nodding over at the maester from House Charlton who nodded back wearily. Tristan Ryger would never be able to walk without a cane ever again, one of his legs had been crushed by an elephant's hoof, almost literally flattening the leg. But thanks to the two of them, his life was no longer in danger.

I wish I could say that for most of the other men we've seen, she thought grimly as she moved to help a few of her aides in dealing with a screaming man who had horrendous burns covering his upper body. One glance at the man told Merry he wouldn't live out the day and she quickly shook her head at her two aides, motioning them away.

One of them went her eyes tearing up, while the other simply mechanically nodded, leaning down and giving the man a small pellet, saying it would help with the pain. The pellet was a fast acting painless poison. It would deaden the pain from the burns for a time, and then would gently ease the man into death. Far better than the hours of screaming agony he would have to put up with from his wounds.

The man, a Northerner who had been with her from practically the beginning of the campaign named Luft shook his head. "Running low on t'ose." he said, his accent thick. He was a smallfolk from house Glover land, one of the few men from that area of the North that had joined the army at Winterfell.

"I know, we're running low on practically everything now." Myrcella sighed. "Still, we do what we can."

Patting the man on the shoulder and telling him to do his best not that he wouldn't otherwise of course, she left that tent and hurried over to another. A few hours later, she looked up irritably as someone called her name. Motioning to one of her aides to come forward and start wrapping a man's chest up with bandages after resetting several of his ribs she turned with a snarl on her face.

Her expression softened slightly as she saw her bodyguard standing there. "What is it, Eric?" she asked wearily.

"Prisoners are being brought in my lady, several dozen of them from the Golden Company's camp. Apparently our boys sacked it. One of them's a young woman, was sent here by the Young Wolf and a force of guards. Think you should look her over, personal." Eric said.

Myrcella frowned but nodded and followed the man.

In the next tent over, several beds had been cleared, two from walking wounded and one of a man who had succumbed to his the pain of his burns. In one corner stood Varys, under guard of four men. She scowled at the Master of Whispers, then ignored him moving towards the young woman who was laying on one of the cots. "Hello, I'm just going to give you a bit of a checkup okay?"

Then she paused and the woman cocked her head, looking at her quizzically. "Princess Myrcella?"

"Yes, I recognize you, but I'm sorry I, you were at court once, with your father and brother yes? Some Narrow Sea House I think?"

"House Massey, milady, I'm Glinda Massey. Until recently I was the personal..." she frowned and looked away, her eyes filling with tears. "T-the personal..."

Myrcella quickly reached across hugging the girl, stopping her from speaking. Glinda stiffened for a moment then began to sob quietly into her shoulder. Eventually she ran out of tears for now, and meekly allowed Merry to work on her.

Eventually the story came out, and Merry was quick to tell her she was safe with the Royal Army, and that Aegon was apparently dead along with his dragon, a statement that made the girl smile viciously. Luckily the young woman wasn't suffering any major physical damage. She had rub marks on her wrists and ankle, some malnourishment, but that was all. Yet it was very obvious that she was scared of men, shrinking whenever one of the guards moved around them.

Leaving the tent Merry gave orders to the nearest aide. "Only women are allowed into that tent, in fact, find Dacey if you can. Maybe the offer of getting some martial training when she's up to it will help Glinda calm down a little. Remember, no men, if I see a single man try to enter that tent I'm going to feed them to Fenris!"

She turned her face furious and staring at the guards who had come out with Varys at an abrupt, imperious gesture from her. "That means you take that thing to another tent!" She ordered pointing a trembling finger at Varys. "I imagine his execution will come soon."

At some point during his capture Varys had been able to work his bonds a little, and he now pointed up to his mouth indicating he wanted to say something, staring into Merry's green eyes. Against her better judgment Myrcella nodded her head, indicating that the guards and Varys himself should follow her into a nearby tent. "What do you want?" She barked staring at the eunuch as one of the guards removed his gag.

"You have changed quite a lot since the last time I saw you, little Princess," Varys said after a moment spent working his jaw, looking at her with calculation in his eyes. "Tales of your healing prowess spread far and wide, but my agents neglected to understand that with such would come the courage needed to deal with harsh truths."

"If you're just going to flatter me, put that damn gag back in your mouth." Merry replied coldly.

"That was not the only reason I wished to speak to you, no. I wish to ask you to intercede on my behalf with Ranna Stark. Perhaps get me in touch with Daenerys herself? I'm certain that she will be pragmatic enough to see I am worth more alive than dead."

Behind the eunuch Myrcella saw a flash of platinum hair, and Daenerys stopped in the tent flap, raising one eyebrow and motioning with one hand to Myrcella indicating that she should let the eunuch talk. In one hand however she held Dark Sister, its blade still red with blood and her shoulders drooped wearily. Behind her Ser Barristan and Rickard Karstark stood, with Rickard leaning on the older knight's shoulder, a very makeshift tourniquet tied around one shoulder and his neck.

After sending off Greatjon and their cavalry, a fireball had struck the northernmost barricade, opening a hole for the Reach Cavalry under Lord Ambrose. Daenerys and Sunfyre had gotten involved in defending the center of the camp, where Merry's hospital had been situated, from them and the assault had been a bloody one. She had killed four men, and Fenris and Sunfyre had slain more than a hundred in her defense.

The sight of the injured Rickard made Merry want to simply push Varys aside and start work on the man, but even Rickard was looking on with interest at what Varys thought he had to trade for his life. So she sighed and replied to Varys. "And what exactly do you know, oh Master of Whispers, which would make up for your treason against my father, against the throne? What could possibly make up for backing what amounted to an invasion force of Westeros?!"

"Several things," the 'man' replied, smiling thinly. "I know what and where bodies are buried of course, my network of little birds is still intact for the most part. How is young Alayaya doing by the way? I have listened to the twittering of my little birds about her with interest. Nonetheless she is young, and her 'network' a bare shadow of mine."

Varys smiled almost condescendingly as he went on. "The smallfolk backing you is... nice I suppose, but the merchants in the cities and the surviving lords are where the power truly lies. I also have the names of several of the small banks where Petyr stored his ill-gotten gains scattered here and there. Would that not be a major boon for a new Royal house, whose control of their crowns is not nearly as solid as they might think. Particularly in realms which have not felt their efforts personally."

"Not enough of one to keep your head on your shoulders." Myrcella replied bluntly. She absent-mindedly noticed that Ser Barristan had left, leading off Rickard, which she was happy to see. "Frankly I'm inclined to take it myself."

"But you won't. You see, I know something about you, something that many of my agents also know. If they don't hear from me in over four months, such secrets can regrettably be leaked."

Varys was trying to establish some kind of control over the girl, he desperately needed her to go to bat for him. From the information he had, it was obvious that Myrcella wielded significant influence over Daenerys and Ranma.

How else to explain the fact that the former Queen had been seen riding north recently along with Jaime both of them still alive. Yes his reports indicated that Cersei's mind had shattered after the truth of the Vile One came out, that she was now a mental invalid and that Jaime had lost his sword hand but even so, letting them live was distinctly odd considering who they were.

"And what do you think you know that could ruin me?" Myrcella asked coldly.

"The name of your true father, and the facts about your birth." Varys said with a shrug. "That Stannis' claims were correct, that you and your older brother are children of incest between Cersei and her twin, and that this can be proven."

Myrcella stared at the man then, rather than become angry or frightened as Viserys had thought, she began to laugh. "You, you honestly think that anyone will believe that? God, that's been bruited about so much, I hardly care anymore when someone brings the idea up. It's disgusting to think of, but even if true, I am not my mother, Stranger's Hells, I'd rather not link myself to House Lannister at all!"

"Yet it would ruin your reputation still. You might not care but the smallfolk will. The same smallfolk who love you now will turn on you in a heartbeat. Or what of Ranma? What will he and Daenerys think of your origins, once they are proven fact rather than false propaganda?"

"That is only if your agents themselves will believe your lies, or would be willing to attract attention to themselves after your death." Myrcella scoffed. "In any event, I believe I've built up more of a rapport with the smallfolk over the past few months than you can imagine Varys. That 'lie' will never be believed now, I am Myrcella Baratheon, even if I can no longer carry on the name." She smiled then, staring over his shoulder. "As for Ranma and Daenerys..."

"For my part," said Daenerys's voice from behind Varys who whirled towards her only to pale significantly as he saw the blood splattering her armor, and Dark Sister in her hand. "For my part, even if it was proven true I believe that it would be hypocritical of me to look down on Myrcella for her origins when my own family practiced such for so long. And Ranma wouldn't care less. He would blame the people who did the act, not the girl magnificent young woman who came from it."

Though understanding that this was not going the way he had wanted it to Varys smiled, convinced he could bring Daenerys to his side of things. "I apologize for seeming as if I was trying to browbeat the princess your majesty. If I had known you were here I would never have resorted to such tactics. I simply wanted an audience, and the chance to prove that I am loyal to your family, and to the prosperity of Westeros."

"You're loyal to yourself." Daenerys interrupted him with disgust clear on her face. "If you were loyal to the crown, you would've done all you could to keep Cersei from starting this war. You would've done all you could to keep House Lannister's power at a minimum in the court. Or you would've worked to make certain that it was Eddard Stark rather than Robert Baratheon that took the throne after the war. And if you were loyal to my family, you would've backed my older brother or myself rather than some dragonseed you and the Iron Bank found somewhere."

Daenerys held up a hand as Varys went to speak. "No, I don't care about your reasons, about what twisted chain of logic makes you think you're loyal to my house or care for the welfare of Westeros, despite all evidence to the contrary. You have proven untrustworthy; you are always scheming, always hiding things and only sharing them when it can benefit you personally. You, Varys, represent a threat to Westeros, not a resource. We cannot afford such threats any longer."

Daenerys turned without another word, shouting outside for the guards to enter and tie the eunuch up again, binding him tighter and gagging him at the same time as he tried to speak again. "Enjoy these last few days of peace in silence, eunuch." Daenerys replied over her shoulder as she and Myrcella moved off with Daenerys sheathing Dark Sister after cleaning it and looking at Myrcella. In the distance they heard the horns roar out in victory and shared a smile. It seemed as if victory was theirs to stay, though dearly bought.

OOOOOO

The battle continued for the rest of the day despite the Stormlands and few remaining Reach units surrendering wholesale, because no surrender was offered to any of the Essosi at Ranma and Daenerys' orders. Any mercenary who fought that day was put to the sword. They had ravaged the land of two Narrow Sea Houses, they had pillaged and raped their way along the road from Duskendale up to the point where Dacey and her scouts began to intercept them. No mercy was to be given to these men, though Ranma and Daenerys left that to their lords.

Not that there were many of them left. The Company of the Rose had numbered around 1,600 men, mixed infantry and cavalry, the Second Sons, another 900 all mounted light infantry. Stannis had smashed them, pulling their attempts at screening elements out of position circling and annihilating them in small groups. Ranma doubted that there were more than a dozen men of those companies still alive, but even so he designated 600 men under Lucas Blackwood to hunt them down.

Those men and the shattered remnants of the Golden Company were all that was left. The once vaunted Golden Company, the largest and inarguably most powerful mercenary company to ever exist in either Essos or Westeros, had been annihilated. They had started the battle with a little over their supposed ten-thousand man complement. Now, if there were more than a thousand men wearing the Golden Company colors left alive Ranma would eat his greatsword.

None of those left alive included any of the commanders or knights. Harry Strickland had died with the elephants, trampled under the beasts he loved so much as they tried to get away from Fenris. A few of the elephants had actually survived the battle, and would later be rounded up, taken down to Duskendale to be used to aid in the repair of that unlucky city.

Jon Connington was dead, he and Balaq had both died from Ranma's ki attack while trying to lead a fighting retreat. The other company commanders had died with their units against the pike, in the command tent, or with Harry. Most of the knights and cavalymen were trampled by the elephants.

Aegon was dead, along with his dragon, both deaths Ranma regretted but had not shirked from. Aegon had proven too far gone, fed words about his 'rightful place' and had destructive level of entitlement which would have cost far more lives in the long run if he had been allowed to live. As for the dragon, it could have been saved if it had let Daenerys talk it down, but as it was, a dragon was too dangerous to let live in the wild.

The Stormlands army was utterly crippled there was no other way to put told, of the might of the Stormlands that had marched off to war under the Baratheons, only 3,700 men would return home, spread out in small packets to the houses that had taken part. Not a single House that went to war would survive as powerful as they had been.

Of the lords who had originally backed Renly, only Lord Murrigen, Ser Horpe, and Ser Donnel Swann had survived to surrender to Ranma. Of Stannis' original backers, Lords Buckler, Bolling, Errol, Bar Emmon and Massey, three were dead, Buckler, Bolling, and Bar Emmon.

Lord Massey was also dead, but his son survived, and Ranma, smiled gently at the man as he surrendered his sword. "Ser Massey, I believe I found someone that will be very happy to see you when we sacked the Essosi pretender's camp. Your sister Glinda was Aegon's personal captive." Ranma scowled. "I don't have to tell you what she went through, but I sent her back to my army's camp, and nothing bad will happen to her under our protection."

Justin looked at Ranma for a moment, his eyes wide under his sweaty slick hair. "I, thank you, your majesty. I would very much like to speak to her in the near future. Thank you."

"I am a brother too you know Ser, and I cannot imagine what I would do if my sister had to go through something like that." Ranma gestured to a nearby Lord Grell. "Lord Grell will take you to see her now if you wish."

"Thank you, Your Grace," Ser Massey said with a tremulous smile. "Um, and can I congratulate you on a magnificent victory?" Stannis was marked as a great general, and you not only beat him, but two other enemies on this day.

Ranma shook his head. "I didn't beat Stannis, I let him be himself. If the Reach lords had more respect and trust in him, if they hadn't pulled back, this aspect of the battle would've gone much worse for me and mine. We might have won in the end regardless but it would've cost us thousands more dead, and I'm still wondering what the hell happened to the Witch to stop her using her magic."

Besides that, I had Lords, commanders I could trust to act in the best way they could. And I sat on the defensive with most of my army, which allowed me to let the other army's fight it out in the open as much as possible. Other than that, I let the chaos of the battle work for me in a way that Stannis couldn't.

"Honestly, if I had faced Stannis alone this battle would've been much harder, but with him having to split his forces to defend against Viserys and take on the Golden company as he did rather than simply pinning us in place and letting the Red Witch's magic weaken our defenses this battle would've been much different."

Ranma shook his head, smiling slightly. "In any event, Lord Grell will take you to see your sister now."

While the other young man was led away, Ranma turned back to taking more surrenders. As he did, his mind went back to going over what they had already learned about the makeup of the remnant of the Stormlands army.

The men of Buckler would return and serve a distant cousin who had been left behind in Bronzegate. One out of four had survived the war, too small a force to really matter to anyone. Bolling had never had that many men or members, and was now practically extinct. Lord Errol had lived, but was more than willing to be sent to the Silent Brothers. His younger brother had not agreed with backing Stannis, and would take over the lordship easily. Their men however had been mauled, and only a bare hundred would return home.

This level of destruction spread to those Lords that had personally backed Renly and survived the battle of the Blackwater. Of them, Swann and Rogers were the only Houses that could still field more than a thousand men. Rogers had taken some losses yet while Lord Rogers had died, most of their men, led by a grizzled armsmen named Robal, had survived by surrendering at the top of their voices and throwing down their swords while hiding behind their shields. It worked, something which Donnel Swann was quick to emulate.

As his thoughts reached that point Ranma looked up to see Daenerys in the air above him, coming down swiftly. She landed Rhaegon nearby, quickly getting out of the saddle but before she could, Daenerys found herself in Ranma's arms, pulled into a very fierce hug. The two of them stood there beside Rhaegon for a moment simply basking in one another's presence. Ranma frowned however as he pulled back, looking at the blood splattered on Daenerys.

In response to his wordless query she shrugged. "The Red Witch threw some fireballs at our camp's defenses, breaking them along the northern line for the Reach cavalry that were still trying to fight us there. They nearly got into the main camp, and Sunfyre and I were forced to fight against them." She smiled checking her head. "Sir Barristan was beside me every moment though, don't worry."

Ranma nodded, kissing her forehead gently. Then he pulled back one eyebrow raised. "Do we know what happens to the Red Witch yet?"

Daenerys laughed. "Yes, actually! We got a runner from Lord Blackwood, Tytos and Meera led a assault on the Baratheon's camp while the camp was under assault from Dornish horse archers."

She laughed again. "Melisandre was killing hundreds of them, but both sides were blindsided by our own assault. Yet the most amazing thing is, Meera somehow snuck up on her. It was Meera who killed her."

"We're going to have to call Meera Witchslayer now." Ranma laughed as well, shaking his head.

Then he sighed looking above Rhaegon's head at a rider coming towards them under a flag of truce from the west. "I bet this has to be about the Reach forces. I'll leave them in your hands for now; I've got to get to the rest of this mess organized."

Daenerys nodded. "The Reach were Targaryen loyalists in Robert's Rebellion, they'll probably take talking to me alone better than you. But I'd like some more bodyguards." Ser Barristan, who had just ridden up behind them, nearly sagged in the saddle in relief of his charge showing some sense.

"I was going to insist anyway." Ranma laughed. He turned, looking over to where Greatjon was kneeling down next to a dead body whose colors Ranma didn't recognize for a moment until placing them among the men who had followed Aegon that weren't from the Golden Company, obviously some other mercenary band or other. As Ranma watched Greatjon pulled out a Valyrian greatsword, with a very odd looking hilt. "Greatjon! Could you gather some of your men and go with Daenerys to talk with the Reach lords?"

Greatjon looked over at him from examining the blade and nodded, before moving to join Daenerys who pulled herself into the saddle of a horse Ser Barristan held for her, while Rhaegon leaped up into the sky once more.

OOOOOOO

Ironically despite the Reach's losses to their lords, more of the men of the Reach survived, though their leadership was shot to hell. While Ranma was dealing with the Stormlands lords and men, Daenerys talked to the remaining lords and knights. The senior of these was Lord Fossoway, who Daenerys put in charge of the others for now. A decent, honorable man who was not a very forwardthinker, he was respected by the others and could keep them in line.

The Royals would need to take their oaths of fealty later, but the wording would need to be worked on a bit, considering that Willas, their lawful lord Paramount, which no one could argue now, had yet to swear his own oath. Margaery had given herself up to them, but that didn't quite translate to the same thing.

Talking about it a few hours later, she and Ranma decided they were too battered mentally, their morale shot to hell and back, to be of much use in the North. "And none of those pretty chargers of theirs would survive the winter up north anyway." Ranma stated bluntly, which ended that discussion.

But the battle had not been won without a price in blood. The pike regiments had paid for their victory, with the Stark Regiment having taken 800 casualties and the Tully Regiment having taken around 600, though thankfully as many as half might eventually be on their feet again.

Tristan Ryger had been crippled, his legs smashed to pieces by a trampling elephant as it turned away from the southernmost flank of the encampment. His men had also been hammered badly. House Seagard had also taken heavy losses, though both Jason and Patrek were still alive. House Wayn, Shawney, and Blackwood had all taken losses, though not as much.

The Northerners had suffered as well, men of Hornwood, Ryswell, Umber, Karstark, and Manderly. House Manderly had the worst of it, losing four hundred and sixty men of their pikes to Melisandre's fireball and their being subsequently overrun. Hundreds of families in the North and Riverlands would face their father's not coming home, their brothers and nephews and uncles never returning.

In total, the army had upwards of 3,000 men dead or crippled, with the numbers still being added to the next day. And it would have been even more without the forethought and effort of Merry, the Maiden of Healing or Ranma's decision to sit on the defense with most of his army. But the war wasn't finished, not yet.

Ranma and Daenerys pressed north after the Dornish army within a few hours, while sun was setting. They took about 12,000 men, the remaining light cavalry and heavy, along with the majority of the irregular infantry from the Riverlands, which had not been as bloodied during the battle, as well as most of the army's archers. They left Jason in charge of the rest of the army, and in particular the prisoners.

They pressed the pace somewhat, hoping to catch up with Viserys, though not so hard as to exhaust themselves or their horses. Greatjon and Silas asked Ranma why he was not pushing the pace harder, and he laughed. "Because I don't want us to tire ourselves out. Those men are running after a lost battle, fear is driving them far harder than I would ever drive ours. No, we'll continue at this pace."

"But at this rate they'll possibly reach Maidenpool before us, and maybe have a full day to fortify it. I thought you and Daenerys were against using Sunfyre or Rhaegon against towns and such." Silas Shawney said. He fully agreed with that policy too, after seeing what dragons, even ones so young as these, could do in war.

"We are." Daenerys said with faint smile having been let in on a final little trap Ranma had set. He hadn't expected Aegon, but he had never really expected his idea of getting Stannis and Viserys to fight one another to work perfectly either. No, he had planned ahead of little, planning on something given her word that there might be another force available that could come to their aid, at least in a roundabout fashion.

Deciding to give their lords a hint she elaborated. "My lords, my brother and his army have been away from that city for over two weeks now. What makes you think that they will find it as they left it?"

Greatjon rolled his eyes. "Out with it!" he ordered punching Ranma in the shoulder.

Ranma laughed, smacking the larger man's hand aside playfully. "What, you don't want to wait for the surprise?"

"This has been a long war lad," Silas said shaking his head. "I think we've all had enough surprises."

Ranma sighed but nodded seriously. Aegon and the Golden Company had caught them all by surprise, though they had been able to roll with it and even deal with the problem eventually. And Stannis had come close to winning the war at least three times since he and Ranma's forces had begun to battle weeks ago. If not for the Reach forces pulling back after Mace's death, he could still have won the main battle, especially considering the fact that Meera's attack on Melisandre would never have been possible without that.

"All right, it was the Crackclaw Point Houses. Do you remember me asking Daenerys whether or not they would be loyal to her or her brother? I sent them a message with an order and an offer..."

OOOOOO

Karhold was a good-sized castle, a five-story keep surrounded by walls with two of them further defended by a moat that was made up of the Sun Stream, a river that came in from the Narrow Sea. The walls weren't as tall as Winterfell's, and the keep wasn't as well made, but it was still a decent defensive position.

Looking at it through the intervening trees, Theon just hoped it would be able to hold out the White Walkers. He grimaced angrily, his good hand moving up to his opposite shoulder and touching it gingerly. The fisher's wife had mended it, and had actually fought back the gangrene that had begun to plague his shoulder, so he hadn't lost the limb. Wouldn't that've been ridiculous, a one armed bowman?

But what really worried him was the fact the trip to Karhold had taken so long! There were no roads or paths through to the Karhold from the Bay of Seals. And going through the woods of had been slow going in comparison to even normal travel in the North, made worse by the snow slowly building on the ground and the debilitating cold.

He nodded at the leader of the Karstark men around him, who he had met a few weeks ago while they were patrolling through the woods of their lands. Since then they had been able to speed up their journey, though not nearly fast enough to make Theon happy. The fisher-folk had broken off then, determined to head back to their boat and sail down the shore to the Bite. "How much longer?"

"Will be there in another few hours my Lord." said the man.

"Good," Theon said with a nod. "I just hope Torrhen listens to me."

In fact Torrhen did listen to him, leaning back in his father's chair his fingers tapping a thoughtful staccato on the armrests. He was not a normally thoughtful young man, in fact he was brash, outgoing and quick to think with his fists. But he had been left in charge by his father, and he and his mother had between them kept Karhold running along with the lands around it. After Theon stopped speaking, he exchanged a glance with his what mother, who was standing next to him, frowning all the while as Theon spoke.

Torrhen desperately wanted to make a joke. He really, really did. Something about Theon's dick getting him in trouble, or whether or not the White Walkers pussy was as cold as the rest of her. But with his mother standing right next to him, that just wasn't going to happen. And frankly the rest of the news Theon had shared killed any enjoyment he had about the Greyjoy lush's libido getting him into trouble. "So what you're saying," he said slowly, is that the White Walkers are definitely on Skagos?"

"If you have a better explanation for what I saw, what I experienced, I'm all ears." Theon replied coldly. "I don't know how they got there, I thought that the old legends said they couldn't cross the ocean, but they seem to have figured out a way."

Torrhen nodded already thinking about what he had to do. "I'll order my men out to scour the holdfasts on our land. Our people have already begun to gather in those in preparation for winter, but against something like this the holdfasts won't... hold." He smirked a little at his word joke but went on seriously. "I'll also have our own men start cutting back the forest around Karhold itself. We've already got it cut back somewhat for a safe zone, but we should probably cut it back even further."

"The wood will be necessary too." Lady Karstark said thoughtfully. "We should send a raven to house Umber, see if we can get in some more coal before these White Walkers fall upon us."

"We'll have to send raven's out in any event, To the Last Hearth, to Eastwatch-By-The-Sea, and of course to Winterfell." Torrhen replied.

"Winterfell first." Theon said firmly. "I'll write that message. Everyone needs to be warned."

Torrhen nodded and stood up. "Get yourself warm, get some food in you, and write that message Theon. We have some preparations to see to."

OOOOOO

"Say that again?" Petyr said sharply looking at Osney Kettleblack, who surprisingly had ridden out to the Army rather than wait for their arrival. But the news he brought was such that Petyr was thankful the man had done so.

Osney shrugged his shoulders angrily. "House Brune and the other Crackclaw Point Houses have taken the city. They moved up along the coastline, there's a series of small roads there, infiltrated the city over a series of days then took it! They've got Mooton locked up, only his daughter has leave to exit the keep now, and they rounded up all of his men and anyone else that could possibly side with him or the king."

He shrugged laconically. "Few even bothered fighting them honestly, the smallfolk of the town were on their side almost from the get-go when they declared they were claiming the town for House Stargaryen, Seven's Hells, I had to get out before someone recognized me! Though they haven't raised their flags on the walls yet for some reason."

Petyr stared at him then frowned as he pictured the walls of Maidenpool, still a full days' journey ahead of them tomorrow. They weren't very high walls, but they were decently durable ones made of stone, and had towers dotting them here and there. Nothing a siege or a truly persistent army couldn't break through, but their army lacked that willpower at this point.

The men that Petyr had brought to the cause were dead or scattered along with more than half the army Viserys had started with, the horses archers sent against the Baratheon camp lost to a man, and the force sent against the Starks badly mauled. The Dornishmen were shocky, fearful, the morale extremely low at the sudden turn around. Balerion was wounded and nearly mad from the pain of it, un-flyable and almost unapproachable entirely. The beast had been carried on a cart sedated for most of the journey.

Yet they aren't putting their flags on the wall to declare their allegiance, why? Petyr's thoughts shuddered to a halt. They're not trying to hold the city against us, they're trying to lure us in. Smash us between the walls and the Army behind us.

He shook his head. It's over. Viserys and his faction are done. Even if I informed them of this, what would they do? And what would I gain from it? I backed Viserys because I had to, because his force caught my ship, it is now time to cut my losses. And perhaps, just perhaps...

"I think..." he said aloud, "I think it's time for us to go. Oswell, you have our disguises, and the list of lords in charge of the guards on duty tonight? " I may not be able to sit on a king's counsel anymore, but I might be able to salvage something. "We make for the shore tonight, then from there..."

OOOOOO

Petyr's disappearance was found out the next day as the army came within shouting distance of Maidenpool, and Viserys and his wife both scowled angrily. A rat leaving a sinking ship, Arianne thought angrily, though she had anticipated this. What she had not anticipated was that Petyr and his sellswords would have been able to bypass her own preparations. She had hoped the man would be caught, the hatred Ranma Stark bore for Petyr could've made handing him over a good bargaining chip, at least enough to get Ranma to parlay with them again.

"It matters not my dear," Viserys said though he scowled as he said it, staring at Balerion. His wounds had healed somewhat, and Viserys felt he could fly with Balerion once more, but the rage and fury in the dragons eyes dissuaded him from attempting it at the moment. "We'll still be back in Maidenpool within the hour, and with its walls and siege weapons, we can hold for now while Balerion continues to heal. I won't be caught by surprise..."

He trailed off staring at the walls. "Those banners, they weren't there before, were they?" Seconds later the front ranks of the Army began to come under sudden fire from the walls and he glared up at them. "Traitors!"

Arianne gaped at the walls as well. "The Stark Army is only a day behind us! What are you going to do?" She was beginning to panic now, all of her dreams of vengeance, of becoming Queen of Westeros had slowly but surely segued into disaster, and this seemed to be the final straw.

Viserys glanced over at Balerion, who had roused itself, staring ahead at the screams of the dying. "Get those chains off him!" He ordered, before turning back to his wife. "If I can reclaim those walls, we can get into the town. We have to do it quick, I'd wager my sister's army is closer than we think."

"If you can clear a section of the wall, we've got grapples enough to get a force up on top of them." Arianne nodded, getting a grip on herself.

As Viserys made his way over to Balerion, a saddle was brought forward, but he shook his head. "No, that will aggravate the wounds on his side. I'll have to ride without them. Fit the reins, that's all!"

Balerion moved its head wildly, but eventually the men got the reins in place, but not before it had bitten the arm off one of them. With his mouth still bloody, Viserys moved to Balerion's back getting on top of Balerion right in front of its wings. "Climb the Sky!"

A moment later they were in the air.

Nearby, Nymeria scowled, knowing this entire affair had become a simple disaster. Now it was time to make certain that she at least made it out of this alive. While Arianne raced off to get in the way of the lords trying to from up the army Nymeria grabbed several men of House Martell. Without speaking she led the way towards the 'special prisoners' tent.

Within they found Shireen who looked at Nymeria coldly as she pushed the tent flap out of her way. Nymeria didn't speak to her simply ordering, "Grab her, but be gentle. We'll need to then head to the cart Balerion was transported in."

OOOOOOO

Behind the Dornish army Ranma and the portion of the army he had taken with him on this chase had also come within sight of the walls having pushed hard throughout the night to close the gap. Sunfyre and Rhaegon were both up in the air as was Daenerys, this time on Rhaegon's back.

Below Ranma stared ahead, but it was Fenris' hearing which made him nod, hearing that the battle had begun. "They've come within bow range of the walls. The army will advance!"

All around Ranma the light and heavy cavalry were switching from their horses, moving to relatively fresh mounts. The small number of infantry had already dismounted and was riding away in two columns, with Greatjon leading one and Patek the other while Silas lead the light cavalry and Ranma the heavy.

Meera had taken charge of the archers, and was following the infantry in two mobs, which spread out as they went forward. That way when the archers joined the battle, they would be attacking from all sides and would not present any single target for a countercharge from any remaining cavalry among the enemy.

Within moments the cavalry was within charging range, and Ranma raced on with Fenris beside him and the heavy cavalry charging in his wake as the light cavalry spread out to start attacking the flanks of the Dornish Army, which had begun to spread as well, though slowly.

OOOOOOO

Viserys soared above Maidenpool, aiming his dragon down at a portion of the wall. "Attack, attack there!"

However Balerion balked suddenly, staring over to one side and then began to flap its wings heavily, trying to gain altitude. Viserys looked in that direction and his heart quailed as he saw one of the dragons of his sister coming towards them. He could see his sister was riding on its back, and an irrational anger suddenly filled him at the site. Below that dragon, the army that had pursued them over the last two weeks from the battle of the Shadow's Fall was marching forward, almost within charging range as he watched.

It's all over, Viserys realized with a sudden wrench inside, and a building fury. It's all over. All of my dreams of a triumphant return, all of my hopes for the future, my dreams of justice and vengeance, everything I worked for done in by a traitor sister and her stinking wolf of a paramour!" But if I can't win my throne, I can at least make certain you never sit on it sister!" Viserys shouted, allowing Balerion his head. "Kill her." He shouted leaning forward along the dragons neck. "Kill them both!"

With Sunfyre still gaining altitude behind them Rhaegon and Balerion circled one another, with Daenerys directing Rhaegon with her mind far more than with her legs and words. It was an advantage, but it wasn't working so well now. Viserys wasn't directing Balerion anymore, simply pointing him in their direction and letting Balerion do the fighting.

And it was a massive beast, easily half again as large as Rhaegon, its scales also proportionately tougher. Its front scales along its neck and face turned aside several blasts of Rhaegon's flame as the two beasts closed, while the return shot forced Rhaegon to evade wildly. The two continued to circle for several minutes, neither one getting an advantage, while Sunfyre came closer all the time from above.

Balerion however had seen the smaller dragon coming, and pressed forward hard, his wings pushing him forward and to the side faster than Rhaegon had anticipated, nearly catching Rhaegon with a blast of fire dead on when Rhaegon ducked to that side, Daenerys and Rhaegon having anticipated an attack on their previous position.

Rhaegon was almost able to dodge the blast, but he squalled in pain when the tip of one wing was caught in his enemy's fire. Balerion capitalized, moving in quickly with another gout of flame causing Rhaegon to desperately duck down and away from his charge, but that gave Balerion the height advantage.

Roaring victoriously it reached down with its front claws ready to gouge deep into Rhaegon's back near where his sinuous body met his tail, hoping to kill this enemy before the second, smaller dragon could join the battle.

But it had neglected to think of Daenerys. Kicking out of her stirrups, Daenerys turned her body entirely around, grasping the saddle horn with one hand and pulling out Dark Sister. Crouching there on Rhaegon's back for a moment she readied herself to attack the black-scaled dragon when it closed. Realizing however that the Dragon would still maul Rhaegon she let go of the saddle horn, crouching there for a moment before thrusting Dark Sister up with both hands.

Balerion's own downward momentum carried it onto her blade, and the Valyrian steel sword pierced his chest going deep into it. he screamed in agony, a sound that sent a shudder through Daenerys as she fell backwards onto Rhaegon's back, desperately turning and scrabbling at the saddle, sending the thought Away, down and away! to her dragon.

Rhaegon obeyed with alacrity, almost throwing Daenerys off but one desperate hand grabbed the saddle-horn, and gritting her teeth hanging on for dear life while Rhaegon bank away, almost colliding with the ground they had descended so much during Balerion's chase of them.

Ignoring the other dragon for now Rhaegon craned his neck to look at Daenerys, crooning softly as he stared at her, and if a dragon could look incredulous and worried Rhaegon was that dragon right then. "I'm, I'm alright," Daenerys said softly, now pulling herself further into the saddle. "That's not something I want to do again though."

Nearby Sunfyre was banking downwards as well, his own voice a louder croon than Rhaegon's as he craned his head in to make to make certain that she was all right. Daenerys opened her warg link to both dragons, sending feelings of love and relief, while she turned her body to stare at where Balerion what was plummeting downwards towards the ground behind them.

Balerion fell like a stone. By the time the Daenerys had righted herself in her saddle, Balerion's corpse was slamming into the ground at a velocity to equal any catapult thrown stone gouging a bit of the earth out with its impetus. Viserys screamed desperately clinging to the dragons neck, cutting himself on its hard scales before the impact threw him from its back to land, still living but with the wind knocked out of him.

He looked up groggily, just in time to be ridden into pulp by Daryn Hornwood, leading a portion of the light cavalry around the main battle on this flank. Daryn looked behind him, then at a few of his men, shrugging his shoulders, a somewhat embarrassed but also vindictive smile on his face as he viewed the 'last true Targaryen's' ignominious, and all together ignoble, corpse. "Oops?"

OOOOOO

Tired, malnourished from the chase through territory they had already picked clean and now caught between the wall of Maidenpool and the approaching army, the Dornishmen stood no chance. Hundreds of them surrendered, throwing down their arms rather than fight, with Nymeria Martell urging the lords to do so, standing on the cart and shouting it at the top of her lungs while at her feet Shireen Baratheon sat, the two of them guarded by House Martell men. Nymeria hoped that the girl and her own family's connection would be enough to see her through.

Arianne however tried to rally some of the lords to keep fighting, until one of them ordered his men to take her into custody. Jorah Mormont at first tried to rally their men as well, but died from an arrow from an unknown archer of House Locke, one among many arrows in that particular assault.

Later that day Ranma and Daenerys received Nymeria in their tent. They weren't going to enter Maidenpool, not just yet. The rest of the army under Jason was barely four days behind them, prisoners and all, minus a force under Wendel Manderly, who was still hunting down the mercenaries and the men of the force from the Dornish army that had broken under the Reach cavalry charge.

When the rest of the army arrived, the lords would all enter together, a triumphal parade for the smallfolk here which would quickly spread the news of their victory well beyond Maidenpool's walls. Then too, it would allow Daenerys and Ranma a few more days to hammer out several decisions they had to make before turning their attention fully to the North.

Ranma nodded at Nymeria somewhat cordially. "The two healers I brought along say that Shireen was not abused in any way, though she is of course showing signs of grayscale. Still they're old, and it's obviously been cured so no dishonor can accrue to you due to her treatment as your prisoner. I'm not going to turn a blind eye to the fact that your family wholeheartedly endorsed Viserys' attempt to return to power, or the acts of your father down south. You realize he's signed his death warrant leading that a mercenary army?"

Nymeria twitched, glaring at him angrily losing control of her tongue for a moment. "Are you certain you can afford that? I would think this entire war would show that my house takes vengeance seriously."

"I'm certain that by the time any order I sent down to try and take him alive the man would already be dead." Ranma replied bluntly. "As to your House, part of the reparations we will demand for letting the Lords still alive among your army and their men go, is that House Martell is removed from power over Dorne. Your family's time as Lord Paramount is done, just as the Lannisters. If I have to break Dorne just as we did the Westerlands I'll do it."

Nymeria quailed a little under Ranma's grim blue eyes. "I, I understand. What, what will be my fate?"

"You and your sister, who we captured after the battle a few days ago, will remain prisoners of our House. Until your own House is removed from power in Dorne, we cannot afford to let you go I'm afraid." Daenerys said, from where she was leaning against Fenris moving her shoulders wincing occasionally.

During that brief aerial battle with Viserys Daenerys had pulled something in her shoulders. Though whether or not that happened when she plunged Dark Sister into Balerion or after when she had to hang on to the saddle horn for dear life she didn't know.

"Of course your safety and well-being will be assured. As far as we know you and your sister were not involved in any atrocities. You followed your house into its war of vengeance, but we cannot in good conscience say that you personally did anything to dishonor yourself."

"We could've done more." Nymeria said, now staring away from the two, disarmed by this bit of generosity. She had fully expected to be put to death frankly, her, her sister, and cousin. "My sister and I, we knew Viserys was insane the moment, the moment he fed one of our own Lords to that freakish dragon of his! We hid Aegon's arrival entirely from him, and were prepared to convince our lords to throw off Viserys for him, yet he was just as bad, not as violent, but just as mad, just as cruel. After that, after that we were stuck."

"Sometimes all you can do is hold on." said Daenerys smirking a little at her joke, though her tone was serious as she went on. "Chance and the impetus of fate can carry you where you'd least expect to go."

"Your cousin is a different matter. Arianne will need to be executed for her part in this war. Without her, your family would never have joined Viserys, and he would never of had the strength to invade Westeros. Undoubtedly Viserys would still have attempted something, but the odds of him being as successful, without your House's intervention, is doubtful. Arianne needs to pay for that."

Nymeria nodded her head, knowing he was correct, sighing faintly. "My sister tried to play the game of thrones and lost. I could wish that you would simply exile her to the sisters, but I can't imagine that she would last long in one of their septs. She is not made for the hard life that such would demand. Killing her now might be a mercy frankly."

"There is one question I have though." Ranma said after a moment. "One that I need answered right now. Where... Is... Littlefinger?"

"Gone. He must have learned of your trap before the fact somehow. He disappeared last night."

Ranma growled, and Fenris did too, standing up from where he had been laying down dislodging Daenerys who grumbled but did not protest overmuch. The fact that Petyr was still alive bothered both of them, given the role he had played in the battle in King's landing, along with possibly aiding Joffrey in setting up Tommen's death and hiding the bastard's identity as the Vile One, along with his designs on Sansa.

Ranma looked at his direwolf who looked back, and Ranma suddenly smiled. "Did he leave any articles of clothing behind?"

Nymeria shrugged her shoulders at the odd question. "I assume so."

Moments later some of Ranma's men had returned, with a few of the camp workers among the Dornish army, one of whom was carrying a large bag. He nodded his head at Ranma, opening it and quickly pulling out several articles of clothing. "All Lord Baelish's your highness, all left behind last night."

"Thank you." Ranma nodded taking some of the clothing from the man and holding them out to Fenris, who sniffed them, memorizing the scent.

"Hunt him down my wolf." Ranma said formally, laying his hand on Fenris' large head, which was even with his own at the moment. Hunt him down, no matter how long it takes, unless he head out to the big water, though frankly I doubt he'll do that. I bet he's heading for his family's land in the Vale. Then find me in Winterfell, he said mentally, envisioning Winterfell in his mind's eye.

Fenris huffed, nodding his head, his nose already going to work, separating the few particles of 'Littlefinger' from the background smell of the camp around them. With that the direwolf turned loping off out into the night.

Ranma watched him go for a moment, before turning back to Daenerys, while Nymeria was led out of their tent. "Now, I think we need to send a message down to the rest of the army, have them meet us up here, and let the Reach and Stormlands groups go. Then, I want a boat sent out to the Royal Navy. I've heard good things about Seaworth, and I'd like to meet the man in person. It could just be that his ships could be used return us to the North as quickly as possible."

OOOOOO

The water was frozen, and snow was everywhere. Piled here and there becoming deeper slowly, but it was more the pervasive cold at the moment that told every Northern man and woman that winter was here.

That was far truer here than it was anywhere else. The shore of the Bay of Seals had frozen utterly, from the shore out to several leagues to nearly five yards straight down. Upon this frozen sure arrived an army, though it was not an army as anyone else would understand the term. No, these were men and women, even children, the entire population of Skagos brought across slowly by the ships Theon had left behind and the men Theon had lost.

They brought other things as well. Creatures out of legend and nightmare, their eyes glowing blue each and every one of them man and beast.

Here were undead unicorns, their inherent magic making them unusable by the White Walkers in life, but not death. Here were massive snow tigers, as larger than even a direwolf, with two large serrated fangs and monstrous claws, their minds broken and cowed. No direwolf was among them. Like unicorns direwolves could not be broken, only killed, and they were too wily to be caught out even by White Walkers.

But there were others, creatures of ice and dead body parts, homunculi horrible to look upon, larger than even the greatest beasts found naturally in nature. The most terrible of these were five massive, skeletal dragons, which flew in some fashion that had nothing to do with normal aerodynamics above the army. Where they came from only the White Walkers knew, and of course they would never tell.

The transportation process took several weeks, but by the end of it the White Walkers had a sizable army within striking range of Karhold. At some unseen signal those that army began to march, heading inland.

The ships remained behind, and men were seen moving aboard one of them, dragging out what looked like a giant frozen crystal of blue ice. As dawn broke dreary and overcast the crystal had been transported into a cave near the shoreline. There several White Walkers moved, sitting down all around, it their hands touching it gently as they began to send out their power. It would take time, but soon their power would spread far beyond the shoreline of the Bay.

The invasion had begun.

---

End chapter

Holy Bleeding Fuck. That battle was the hardest scene to get right that I have ever done, well in terms of combat scenes anyway. Normally those are a lot easier than others. But this one, with so many bits and pieces, so many sides, ye-gods it was really bloody hard.

This signals the end of really concentrating on the human enemies, at least in terms of full on warfare. Politics, Oberyng and the cleanup will take some time, but Ranma and his army are obviously needed elsewhere, so Jon and the allies he makes along the way will need to deal with them. The Others are here now, and Ranma and co. have to face them or lose everything, in time anyway.

*Chapter 19*: Chapter 19

I do not own GRRM's work, or Ranma, more's the pity.

In regards to ATP, my ATP muse went head to head with my WW muse for what little free time I had this month, and lost. As such, I decided to postpone the ATP chapter until the Superbowl, or more accurately, the evening before (cross your fingers). While I have all of it's combat scenes written and the rest outlined that might be pushing it. And before anyone thinks of asking, no, the chapter for Horse for the Force did not slow me down, I had most of it written last month, there were just two scenes kicking my balls that had to be sorted out. Apologies to all those waiting for ATP, but that's the way the muse ran.

Thanks go to Antony444 for betaing, and for his work on finding grammar/minor mistakes.

---

Chapter 19: Death's March, War's End, Wolf's Run

Fenris sniffed the air, his eyes glowing slightly in the darkness of the rain swept night. It was raining again here in this too warm place, but not enough, nowhere near enough to impede his sense of smell. Despite his chosen humans understanding of the difficulty that Fenris faced in trying to translate smells into what a human could understand, Ranma didn't really understand how much he was missing out in that translation.

It wasn't so much that Fenris had the best nose in all of the animal kingdom, which Ranma understood. Ranma knew Fenris was also intelligent, but he hadn't quite made that leap to understand how that intelligence would affect the direwolf's use of a direwolf's traditional senses. Fenris could not only smell everything within five kilometers of his current position, he could understand all of those scents as well.

A metal smell coming from a trap someone had laid in a farmstead nearby, the scent of human blood there mixed in with that of animals, the scent of fear and pain still wafting in the air. A normal direwolf would have smelled them all, but could not have understood what had occurred. Fenris did, and his lips rolled back in a snarl. Killing people he could understand, even these giant battles of pack versus pack that the humans seemed to be so enamored of. But killing the young? It was a very foolish punter that killed all of the young, else there wouldn't be more to hunt later on. And why humans preyed on their own kind was beyond him.

Moving on, Fenris was a black shadow in the night. Unseen and unheard he passed through the Riverlands hunting his prey. Eventually the prey had made for the wide undrinkable water which led to the crab place, causing Fenris to stop for a moment. The smell of tar, the smell of wood, wet wood from the rains and from the waters. But, there was also this scent of his prey.

Cautiously the direwolf circled the area around where the prey entered the wooden man-thing on the shore of the undrinkable water, making certain that this was not a trap, his nose raised high in the air to smell anything that could be construed as such. Unfortunately it wasn't. His quarry really had taken to the water.

But, Fenris thought in the way of his kind, a state somewhere between that of human and will direwolf, he did not enter the waters or swim in it himself. Fenris could still smell him on the wind, moving away over the water in the wooden thing.

With a whine that was far too close to a whimper for Fenris to ever admit to in company he began to move towards the water, cautiously swimming out to where his feet could no longer touch the bottom. He hadn't swum often, but it was something his siblings and he had done occasionally. The waves were a bit of an issue, but Fenris was strong enough to deal with it for now. And the scent was still in the air, the betrayer, one of those responsible for his pampered sibling's death. Such needed to be addressed by family after all, and any hardship he had to face in doing so was worth it.

OOOOOO

It had finally happened, and Eddard still found himself quailing inside despite having prepared himself for this for over a year now. The forces of the Great Enemy had returned, and now they had to respond to this threat. He looked across his desk at Maester Luwin, whose face had paled considerably upon reading the message he'd brought in from the raven's tower. "So, they've completely bypassed the Wall."

"I did not think that was possible my Lord," said the maester. "From what little I've studied of magic, the White Walker's magic cannot cross water, so how do they do it?"

"In the end however how they got to Skagos is immaterial to the fact that they now have a forward base on the flank of our strongest defense against them, where, I don't have to remind you, much of our mobile forces have already been sent. The North lies open, and we need to prepare."

He leaned back for a brief moment, closing his eyes, suddenly happy that Sansa was probably leaving White Harbor at that moment, or might have already. She'd be down in the South in Riverrun well away from this soon enough, and distance might well protect Sansa better than walls or armies. It was an odd thought, but Eddard actually thought for a moment of sending his remaining family south, possibly to Lord Flint of Flint's Finger, or Lord Reed and Greywater Watch. But none of them would go, and it was but a fleeting thought.

With a shrug remarkably like his children's direwolves, Eddard the father receded, and Eddard Stark returned. He opened his eyes, staring hard into his maester's eyes. "Get out your pen and parchment my friend, we have orders I need to send out."

"I have them here my Lord." Luwin said simply, holding up the writing implements, and a small slate of wood behind the parchment, smiling thinly.

"These first messages will be for House Flint of Widow's Watch, Woolfield, Umber, Manderly, and Hornwood. The message is as follows: 'My Lords, the Great Enemy has risen once again, as my son and his friends warned us at the moot in Winterfell, but from a direction none could have seen. Somehow they have gotten around the wall, taken Skagos, and might even now be landing on the shores of the Bay of Seals.'

'Therefore you are ordered to pull all of your smallfolk back to your castles or send them further south. I care not if they want to move, they are to be forced if necessary. Abandon their farms, their holdfasts, anything! Remember that these enemies will not feel pain, will not fear death, and may well keep coming in the face of casualties that would break any human army.'

'Furthermore we do not know the full extent of the Great Enemy's own magical abilities. On a similar vein, you are to be on the lookout for any particularly handsome man or beautiful woman whose skin is pale like porcelain and cold to the touch. They have apparently used the same trick they used on the Night's King in days of yore, and may use it again.'

'I want it understood my Lords, that we are trading land for time. Until sufficient weapons arrives in White Harbor, we must give way to this attack, holding those castles that we can without them, but giving ground everywhere else.'

"End it there and give it to me to sign for the Lords Flint, Woolfield, Umber, and Hornwood. Then add an addendum to the one for Lord Manderly, telling him he is to use his own discretion in the distribution of the dragonglass weapons when they come in. I expect that by the time the Lysene pirate arrives the places those weapons need to go will have shrunk." Eddard finished grimly.

"My Lord, what about a message back to Karhold?" Luwin asked, frowning slightly at that oversight.

Eddard sighed deeply. "Torrhen knows his duty, and Theon is there. I don't think they'll be able to hold, but I trust both of those young men to realize that, and began to retreat as they can. Besides, they have the river Sunstreamthere. They could be able to get all the way down to Widow's Watch or further by sea."

"No, Nothing I can say or do will affect that battle, I will simply send Torrhen a message in my own hand entirely, commanding them to do what they see best, and may the Old Gods aid them." He sighed deeply then shook his head. "Set those aside now if you finished with that, you can copy the messages later. I have more orders."

Maester Luwin nodded his pen in his hand, and Eddard went on as the man pulled out a fresh piece of parchment. "This is to go to House Mormon, House Ryswell, House Cerwyn, House Glover and Tallhart. 'Attached to this message my Lords, you will find the message relayed to me about the events on Skagos. If the Great Enemy was able to get to Skagos, Bear Island is also a target, or even more so since your House Lady Mormont, is known as a true vassal of the North, whose loss would weaken us all."

He went on, trusting Maester Luwin to remember not to send that last portion to all the other Lords without being told. "'To that end, I Eddard Stark acting for your Lord Paramount my son Brandon, and our King Ranma Stark, command House Ryswell, and Glover to send half your remaining infantry and archers to reinforce Bear Island. It cannot be allowed to fall if it is attacked.' Correct me if I'm wrong, but that should give Maegh Mormont around 4500 or so to add to her own forces?"

"Hmmm... less my Lord, remember House Ryswell doesn't have that much infantry, and Glover and Tallhart are masterly houses for a reason, their lands can't support as many men as a great House." This was because Tallhart was based in a Torrhen's Square, a fishery and lumber center, and Glover's property was situated on the shore of the Bay of Ice between it and the Wolfswood, a hardscrabble area that couldn't produce enough food to maintain a large population. I think at best 2,900 my Lord, and that will leave Deepwood Motte and Torren's Square without infantry at all. But Lady Mormont should be able to make up the numbers."

"It will have to do, and the Mormont clan knows Bear Island better than any, I imagine they will make any invasion pay dearly. However, make a note that they are to receive at least half of the first shipment of dragonglass arrowheads and weapons once they arrive in White Harbor."

"My Lord, transportation from Winterfell to Bear Island will be atrociously slow, I am uncertain that that is a wise move." Luwin cautioned.

Eddard thought for a moment, calculating travel times. It was true that if he sent those weapons that way, the North might feel the need for them on the other front well before they arrived at Bear Island. "Very well, you're right travel time would be bad."

"The next part is for Lord Ryswell alone." Maester Luwin nodded and Eddard went on. "My Lord I ask you to send half of your remaining light cavalry to reinforce Lord Hornwood. I myself and House Cerwyn will be sending men to reinforce Hornwood and the Last Hearth."

His own and his direct neighbor's forces Eddard had a much better grasp of than those of the other noble Houses. House Stark had barely sent fifty of its trained armsmen with the army, having instead sent the Pike regiment, which had been raised from the smallfolk for the most part, with only its officers and troop leaders coming from their armsmen. This meant that House Stark retained around 1,600 men here in Winterfell despite having sent men up to the Wall. And most of the minor Houses from House Stark lands had also not send their men away. With them he would be able to raise another 1,800 or so.

He looked over at the Wull, who had been silent up to this point despite Eddard having included him in this conference. "Will you send some of your men with mine my friend?"

"To hold the Last Hearth or Hornwood? Aye." the other man said with a grim nod. Since he and most of his people had arrived in Wintertown, they had been treated like honored subjects, and all of his men had received the steel weapons that House Stark was making now.

"Good, but we won't split your men. I think that the Great Enemy will strike first at the Last Hearth; Hornwood is far much further south than the Last Hearth or Karhold. We can't get to Karhold to aid House Karstark, but, we can use the White Knife and the canal from Long Lake to send aid to House Umber. I want 1,400 men on the road within the week, half of which will be your men and mine, the rest will be made up of men from the nearest minor houses. I'll be sending messages to my minor lords and telling them to pull back from their holdfasts to join us here with their people at the same time."

The Wull frowned for a moment. He was not a man at home with numbers, but some numbers were important to the survival of his people, and paramount among those was the number of warriors on hand at any given time. "I can send around 400, that'll leave me here with 300, but that's the most I can send. If I try to send more my warriors will object, fearing that we won't have enough strength on hand to defend our womenfolk."

"Understandable," Eddard nodded. He knew that wasn't an insult to his House or their generosity, since guest rights was inviolate. It was simply a bred in the bone response from the clans: they needed to keep enough men home to defend their lands and their families. "Besides, I wouldn't've wanted you to send more. Sooner or later, the Great Enemy will attack here as well, and we might need all the help we can get by that point."

"My Lord," Maester Luwin asked hesitantly. "What of warning the Houses south of the Neck? I have ravens trained to all the Lord Paramount Houses, as well as a few more in the Vale..."

The Wull scoffed, waved his hand at Eddard who nodded and watched the man leave before turning to Maester Luwin. The Wull of course did not care for any southerners and that was without taking into account the fact that a war down there had pulled most of the North's strength well out of position to deal with the real threat.

"We will send such messages yes, but I doubt that anything will come of them. Still, send a message to Riverrun first, mark it as urgent as you possibly can. I'm certain the maester there can get a messenger to my son wherever he and his army is. We need that army back here as soon as possible, whatever is going on south. For now however, there are other messages to send to Locke, Reed, and Barrowton."

Later that day Eddard composed the last message to be sent out that day, the one copied and sent south. This was a much shorter message as long distance ones had to be, composed of only four sentences. 'My fellow Lords Paramount, my son, and any who receive this message, the Great Enemy has returned and found a way around the Wall. Even now their forces march on the lands of men. The White Walkers are here my Lords, it is time to set aside our differences for Westeros must stand as one lest we die separately.' Attached to the message sent to Riverrun was a copy of the message Eddard had received from Torrhen Karstark.

One last raven left late that night, leaving Winterfell's Maester's Tower emptier than it had been in centuries. But this one was sent to the Wall and the commander of the Night's Watch, warning them to prepare for attacks from behind, especially at Eastwatch-By-the-Sea.

That evening while his wife fell asleep after spending most of the day in the sept praying, Eddard left, heading into the godswood. He remained there for some time, sending his thoughts out to Jon and Ranma. "We have run out of time my sons."

OOOOOO

The White Walker's influence spread from their new stronghold on the shore of the Bay of Seals. Undead began to rise as far south as the start of former House Bolton lands within two weeks of their arrival on the shore. Cemeteries and former battlefields became disturbed as the dead clawed their way out of the earth, answering the call of the Great Enemy to once more take to their feet and deal death to those still living. But this was a mere sideshow for now to where the true power of the Great Enemy would land.

OOOOOO

In his reading room Rodrick Harlaw sat silent for the most part while Asha relayed all that she had seen in the battle of the Straits, as well as what had happened to her since. Asha held nothing back, including what she had seen and found in that hidden cave, the proof of what Lord Kenning had only hinted at.

While Rodrick was a skeptic about anything smacking of the mystical realm he had not interrupted her, nor had he called in the guards to have her thrown from the tower as worshipers of the Storm God should be according to the Drowned God followers. In truth there weren't many of those, most of the Ironborn espoused views that followed the Drowned God's ways, but what they really worship was the Old Way itself rather than the god.

Yet even that has taken a pounding recently, Rodrick thought to himself smiling sardonically, though carefully hiding the expression from Asha. She was in no mood to see the humor in anything, the loss of her beloved ship of every man aboard it weighed heavily on her.

The Iron Islands have lost so much manpower, there aren't one in twenty raiders left alive, and without them, the tradition of raiding, of paying the Iron Price may well fade, at least in its present format. If we can retain some of the islands it might grow again, but that's doubtful. Our longships themselves have been shown to be inferior now to the war galleys of the Greenlanders, so much for our pride.

"So I want you to pull your ships back from anything but defending Harlaw. Even the Straits between Harlaw are to be left to the enemy. Those shorelines are cliff faces so we can post a few archers there and use the ships that were patrolling that area to reinforce elsewhere."

Hearing that, the Reader came back to the here and now shaking his head slightly. "I'd already pulled back my few remaining ships to guard the ports of my island Asha," He said mildly. "There aren't enough left of us to fight the Westerlands war galleys. They're never separate, they always move in groups of four, and their captains have learned to keep the range open no matter what tricks ours try to employ. They patrol the ports they've taken on Pyke, and they guard the troop ships coming from Banefort. That trip is too short and too well guarded to let us raid them."

"I haven't heard anything about what's been going on the mainland, are we facing the entire Westerlands army invading us now?" Asha asked sitting down at last as she ran out of energy to pace.

"We are not. My few remaining factors on the mainland say that there isn't a real Westerlands army left, at least not one that represents the totality of the Westerlands. Indeed, from the latest bit of news the Westerlands as an entity might also be gone. The Starks destroyed the Lannisters in the open field, and smashed the Westerlands cohesion. I'm not certain how they did that second, but the March of the Wolf King has become a rather popular song in the bars down by the port."

"I heard it when we came in, I thought it was propaganda! Who would've thought that old bastard of a lion would be killed by the young wolf? Still, that doesn't answer my question. If those troop transports aren't bringing in troops, what are they doing?"

"Bringing far deadlier goods my dear. Weapons and food."

Asha frowned for a moment, but the Reader did not enlighten her, simply staring at her silently. Eventually she nodded her eyes widening at the implication. "They're arming the thralls aren't they? By the Storm God's spleen and fury, they're going to arm a thrall rebellion!"

"Pyke is gone." Said Rodrick shrugging his shoulders. "Your father didn't leave many fighting men behind across its entire length, and what there was gathered at Lordsport in an attempt to stave off the invaders. Now that news has spread throughout the rest of the island that the invaders are willing to arm the thralls and help them gain some revenge, Houses on every island are rebellion now, which will only get worse when the Lannisters transport their new allies from Pyke on to the others."

"And what about here?"

"Harlaw has never had that many thralls, not in comparison to Great Wyk, where they are treated as disposable thanks to the mines of House Goodbrother. We were the bread basket of the iron islands as you well know, and farming is at least somewhat less deadly than mining. The fact my father and I passed laws forcing thralls to be treated well, and that their women could no longer be used as salt wives, have also helped, as have our treatment of blacksmiths and other tradesmen whose skills make them valuable. Alas, that simply became one more reason for the other islands to look down on us as soft." Rodrick smiled thinly. "The Lannister will never be able to gain popular support here, but the other islands?"

"So we sacrifice them." Asha said grimly nodding her head.

"Agreed, as I said we don't have the ships or the troops." Rodrick barked a laugh. He'd never forgiven Balon Greyjoy for exiling Alannys back to Harlaw when her mind broke after the deaths of their two oldest sons. Both young men, poisoned by Balon's faith in the Old Way, died in Balon's first attempt at rebellion. Balon had never treated her well, and sent her home after her mind cracked, and had been rutting with any woman he could capture since. "I find it the height of irony is that your father's adherence to the Old Way has possibly destroyed it for all time."

"I can't say I'm entirely unhappy about that outcome either." Asha said. "But you realize that leaves me with not much in the way of power base? Frankly I bet many of your minor lords will question why you're even listening to me, at least until I bring out my little present."

"You have me and my House." Rodrick replied simply. "You're not your father, you have never acted preciously, and you have always been far more intelligent than the average captain of the Ironborn. You would make a good queen."

"Lady Paramount." Asha said with a shake of her head. "If that. I'm afraid our independence will be at an end whatever happens. Still, I am happy that I have your support."

"Always my dear." Rodrick said smiling at the girl he regarded as a daughter. "Always."

Her face hardened noticeably. "Good, because I doubt the differences between Harlaw and the other Islands will occur to the Greenlanders. They'll come against us here eventually. When they do, I mean to show them that taking Harlaw will cost them far, far more than they are willing to pay." She smiled thinly, tapping the pack next to her lightly, causing it to rustle with a metallic clank.

OOOOOO

Oberyn smiled faintly as the scandalized servant left him alone in Lady Taena Merryweather's room. "I think you've scandalized her servants magnificently my dear."

"That would be we have my Lord Oberyn." The woman said sultrily, gesturing to a table which was already laden with small delicacies and fruit. "It takes two to create a scandal after all."

"It takes two to do many things." Oberyn said gently caressing her rear through her conservative, yet strangely provocative dress as he moved past her. While he was here to get information, that didn't mean he needed to be in a rush about it, now did there?" Especialy when the wench is so obviously willing. "But before that, business I'm afraid."

Taena Merryweather of Longtable nodded, pouring them both goblets of wine and holding one out to him in both hands. Oberyn chuckled, taking it from her and lifting it lightly in salute before sniffing at the wind and then taking a slow long sip, his eyes never leaving hers.

But when he set it down however, he was back to business. "The news my lady."

"There is quite a lot of news actually. The latest from up further north, is that the two Baratheon brothers faced one another and the younger came out the loser. You've probably heard rumors about that and the burning of King's Landing already?" Oberynd nodded and she went on more grimly. "They're true. Stannis now controls the remaining Reach forces up there, and burned King's Landing to the ground using some kind of magic from his Red Witch, purportedly to combat the spread of a plague. Have you heard of her before?"

"We've heard rumors of that before we set out from Sunspear. But the rumors are true?"

"Yes. And that isn't the only sign that magic that has returned though I'll get to that in a moment. Stannis apparently received word about both your depredations and the assaults the Ironborn have been making, you know of those?" Oberynd nodded again, and Taena smiled and went on. "Much of the Mander below Oldflowers has been given over to the Ironborn, for several leagues away from the river unfortunately."

Taena shook her head frowning a little. "Honestly, I need don't know why the Ironborn are continuing to raid as they are, their numbers aren't very large, and I would've thought that even those raping murderous bastards would've had their fill of raiding for now and returned back to their islands, if for no other reason than to drop off their booty. But they haven't. It's as if they're gripped with some kind of, of madness. And that's not even considering what's happening on the Arbor."

"Pity," said Oberynd, holding the goblet up to the light of the window behind her. "Whatever will Westeros do for wine without the Arbor to call upon?"

That statement showed what little concern Oberynd had for people of any realms save his brothers, he was here for vengeance that was all. Nothing else mattered and nothing would get in his way. Well, that and putting Viserys on the throne I suppose, though I'd rather be facing Stannis myself than simply causing so much chaos down here as to force him to split his army. He's known as a mighty warrior, but I'd bet my spear and its little surprise would see him off quickly enough.

For all her self-control Taena almost looked taken aback at his attitude, but controlled it quickly. "S-so, Lord Stannis knew of your depredations and those in the Ironborn, and sent a force under Lord Caron to retake the Mander and work with the Marcher Lords to crush you. Another force passed by here on the Mander several months ago under Ser Garlan Tyrell. He was heading down to Oldtown to join with the remnants of the Redwyne fleet to retake the Arbor. It's rumored that he arrived just in time to save his sister at her stand at the Castle of Oldflowers."

"I've heard that from a few of my armies... guests. Though I also heard something else, something about miracles aiding him on his way?"

The woman shivered a little, turning away from him for a moment before looking back. "Some say that the Seven have been at work my Lord. Seven miracles guided Garlan on his way, and since then the crops have been bountiful and coming in far more quickly than they should be, so much so that many Houses now have a surplus. There are tales of fallow fields springing to life and blooming all in the space of a month."

"The septons are all all saying that it's a sign that we should be backing Daenerys Targaryen and Ranna Stark. They've been saying that for months, and it's taking in the smallfolk's admittedly limited minds. You won't find any aid among them, nor will Viserys if he wins through."

Which is frankly doubtful to my mind, the spymistress added internally. But she was a consummate spy, able to play off all sides against one another for her own ends. Right now Oberynd was right in front of her, so she had to play the good Martell spy, as she had previously played the part of Varys' loyal spy or Petyr's agent.

"I see." Oberynd said with a frown. "Still, unless they intervene directly in the battle I can't see anyone caring overmuch. As for Viserys, I've no doubt he'll be smart enough to keep out of any large-scale battle until the Starks and the Baratheon's wear each other down."

He leaned back frowning thoughtfully. His job was to hurt the Reach and the Stormlands, do as much damage both to their farmlands and fighting ability as he could. Bryce Caron, hmm from what I remember he's young, untried as a commander but well thought of. A summer knight with a bit more sword skill than most, but no real knowledge of how to lead in battle. Excellent. "Where is Lord Caron's force now?"

"Unlike Garlan, Bryce never thought of using the Mander to hasten his journey my Lord, he has followed the Roseroad. The highway however dips westward quite a ways. He crossed Bitterbridge about a month or so ago I think, so he should be halfway between there and high guarded by this point, possibly as much as two thirds of the way.

"Well out of the way of any assault along the Mander then. Or..." Oberyne frowned for a moment, thinking. "What are the defenses of Cider Hall like at present? And are there any bridges over the Mander between here and Cider Hall?"

"The defense of Cider Hall is in good shape. Lord Fossoway left several knights behind, along with the majority of his trained archers to hold the walls. Lady Fossoway has been meticulous in bringing in smallfolk and preparing the castle since word of your assaults along the Blue Byrn reached this area."

Oberyne cocked his head and eyebrow at her, causing Taena to smile thinly, shrugging her shoulders. "One of her ladies in waiting reports to me my Lord, she is not a dedicated spy, merely a gossip who thinks of me in the same manner. I asked her to look at her lady's response to this current crisis because I needed advice but did not want to outright ask for it for pride's sake and the little idiot believed me."

That was actually the way Taena got most of her news: by being known as a gossip, and talking to others of similar bent. There was nothing wrong with gossip after all, especially considering that she really had followed through with her idea of following Lady Fossoway's lead in preparing Longtable. Of course Longtable was not a very strong castle, and the lands around it were not as rich in terms of population as the area around Cider Hall, but she had done what she could.

Of course that was before she opened her gates to Lord Oberyne and a small entourage from his army, which was still camped in the sacked keep of House Cockshaw. None of them were wearing tabards or anything that could mark them out as from the invading army, the news of whose presence had spread.

"As to whether there is a bridge or not between here and there, there's one of the main ones on the Mander, it's quite wide and made of stone. It will easily accommodate your army's crossing, though I have to ask why you would be crossing in the first place."

"I don't want to have to fight my way through Fossoway territory as you seem to indicate we'd have to. Simply following the Mander down from here would force me to come within bow range of Cider Hall, which my army does not have the discipline to simply take and ignore."

"You realize if you cross the river, you will probably run into Lord Bryce eventually? He'll hear of your coming through the smallfolk and the septons, and turn aside before reaching Highgarden. "

"If he does we'll defeat him in the open, but if he doesn't we'll take him from behind as he is making for Highgarden. There's no better time to ambush someone than when he sees his target in sight."

"And what of Lord Willas? News from Goldengrove indicates he's arrived there, and is preparing river barges to carry him back down to Highgarden. You might also face him in battle." Taena objected.

That made Oberyne hesitate for a moment. Despite the hatred their families were supposed to hold for one another, he and Willas had been firm friends for several years. A fact that broke through his need to keep going, to burn and make the Reach suffer as his family had. "I, I will cross that bridge when I come to it. After I take Bryce from behind, I'll turn immediately northward on the Rose Road towards the Crownlands. Viserys will no longer need my army's aid eventually in that campaign."

We'll cross the Mander, then fall upon Bryce, that young fool won't know what hit him. Then we'll burn the lands between here and there, which should sate my army's lust for blood, booty and fire for a time, before turning north. I just hope the young idiot really is smart enough to stay away from direct clashes for now. His black beast might be larger than most of the breed, but it's still young, so isn't as tough or dangerous as Viserys probably thinks.

"Now," he said setting the glass aside and reaching for Taena's hand bringing it to his lips. "I believe that business is concluded, unless you have any other information for me?" Oberyne spent the rest of the day rutting with Taena in her marriage bed. He wasn't the first she had welcomed to it behind her husband's back, but Oberyne felt a thrill as he always did in moments like this. He left as the sun was setting, satiated for now in more ways than one.

Behind him Lady Taena stood at her window frowning as she watched him go, tapping one finger against her thigh thoughtfully wincing occasionally. Oberyne had been a passionate lover but not a gentle one, and she would have to wear high neck dresses with long sleeves for quite a few days until the bruises healed. But that wasn't what she was thinking of. What she was thinking of was the fact that the Seven had returned, and seemed to be backing Lady Margaery, Willas, and through them Ranma Stark and his wife. She was thinking about that and the rumors of another army marching down to the Mander from the northwest, one with the banners of House Stargaryen flying overhead.

She owed Lord Doran quite a lot, without his little monetary gifts Taena would not have been able to keep herself in the creature comforts that she had become used to in Myr and without his aid certain indiscretions of her own might've come to light. And yet, and yet the gods are pointing the way, and frankly I don't think Viserys has any chance in the Stranger's Hell against Stannis or Ranma Stargaryen in the open field.

No, I need to make a decision based on what I think is the main chance here and now. And I didn't like what I saw in Obery's eyes. Those are the eyes of a man who has become so accustomed to violence and death. So much so that he has lost sight of his real goal, of anything but the next battle, the next slaughter, much like the mercenaries under his command. It faded slightly when I mentioned Willas, but it came back with a vengeance when I spoke of Lord Caron and his army. Worse, if he marches over the bridge on the Mander, that'll take him directly into the heartland that feeds half of Westeros, which would be a disaster. And I don't think he even cares.

She stood for several more moments before sighing and ringing a small bell. I'm sorry Doran, you've been good for me, but I think that the Stargaryen's star is on the rise, and I mean to jump on the cart now.

Her trusted lady-in-waiting, a Myrish woman who had been with her long before her marriage to her oaf of a husband entered, bowing slightly averting her eyes from her mistress so as not to see the signs of her recent indiscretions. "Get me a few of my long neck and long-sleeved gowns to pick from Misera, then after you've helped me dress, I'll need to inform the master I'll be needing two raven's prepared. One for Highgarden, and one for Bitterbridge I believe."

OOOOOO

All was silent in the Commander Mormont's office of Castle Black for a moment after Jeor Mormont read out the message from Winterfell. It was not so much a contemplative silence, though there was contemplation going on. No, this silence was more shock and fear driven than anything else. As ready as many of these men had been, as respectful as they had started to become towards the threat of the White Walkers, they had all assumed that they would have to attack the Wall head on. Learning they would face assault from another direction was a severe blow.

Tyion broke the silence, shaking his head as if he was throwing off a blow. "Lord Eddard's right. They will be coming for the Wall as well as pressing out elsewhere. What can we do to fortify our defenses from attacks coming from south of us?"

"Quite a bit actually," said Commander Mormont coming out of his stupor from the news quickly now that someone had started the ball rolling. "There's a reason the Night's King was able to hold against the powers of the wildlings and the North for so long. First, we'll have to choose which castles to keep fortified, and which to abandon and break down. If we don't fortify them, we cannot allow any castle's staircase or elevator to remain connecting them to the Wall."

"If they came from Skagos, then Eastwatch-By-the-Sea is the most threatened," Growled Mors Umber. Shaking his shaggy head he rose to his feet with a creak of his old bones. "I'll head back now, best ta get a jump on forting up."

"You do that my friend, however I think we also need to realize that our lines of supply may well be broken soon there whatever we do. After all, the Bay of Seals itself might freeze, and once it does, no ships, going to be able to get through. I'll want hunting parties out every day until we sight White Walkers to bring in fodder for the castles. Also I want messages to go out to all of the smallfolk that have moved into the gift. They're to pull up stake and join us here on the Wall. Castle Black and the others we keep open will have enough room to house them, though that means our supplies won't last as long."

"Bear Island and Westwatch," said Kyle, frowning heavily. "Maybe we can set something up there had to bring in supplies from Bear Island?"

The mountain clansmen frowned looking at one another but nodded. "Until we're under attack up there, we can bring in supplies over the mountains, though it'll be slow goin'."

Tyion frowned. "It'll have to do. We should start rationing immediately I think, the better to force our supplies to last longer, and keep it up when the smallfolk start arriving. But I think all we'll be able to do is hold on here until the North pushes this incursion back."

"Easier said than done." scoffed Qhorin Halfhand. "I don't mean to demean the courage of the Northerners my lords, but we know the King and much of the North's army is down south. It would take them months to get back at best, even if Lord Ranma started out the moment he heard the news, and we all know that there's still a war going on down there."

"I wish I could say different." said Tyrion honestly. "My older sister's bit of madness couldn't have come at the worst time for humanity as a whole." He smiled suddenly. "Or should I say former sister hmm?"

"Enough." said Commander Mormont shaking his head. "Deal with what we can here, leave the rest to the king and his men." He looked around all at them all and nodded towards Tyrion. "Giantkiller, I'm giving you the command of speaking to the wildlings. They have Two days more to come to a decision to join us or be left out in the cold. We need their manpower, but if we can't get it I'm not willing to keep Castle Black's tunnel open for longer than that. Just because the White Walkers might be coming at us from further south doesn't mean they won't also be coming at us straight north. It's what I'd do if I was them."

"That won't be much of a hardship." Tyrion said, smiling slightly as he remembered the frankly gorgeous young woman who led the wildlings now with her two advisors. Those advisors might have some say, but Val was the driving force among them.

Commander Mormont nodded then turned to Kyle and Harrion. "My lords, I want any of your men with carpentry or stonework skills to join those from the Order. They will move into Eastwatch. I want them to look into the idea of somehow setting up a pulley and winch system down to the Gorge. If we can do that, bringing up cargos along the river might be possible. If not, I want Eastwatch as fortified as we can make it. I'll have my own men with skills in that area working here in Castle Black, while I decide what other castles we should keep intact."

The two men exchanged a worried glance. There were at least 40 leagues of gorge between Westwatch and the Bay of Ice. Traversing that far by boat would be incredibly hard, and dangerous too. Even if men could be found to pilot such boats, the size of the shipments would be small by necessity. And Deepwood Motte was no White Harbor. But still there was nothing they could do about that, if Eastwatch was cut off they were in for it anyway. So both men simply nodded, and the meeting went on from there.

OOOOOO

The mass exodus of smallfolk from the lands near the Bay of Seals and further south on the eastern front was a slow process, with many families not truly realizing the danger and simply trying to bring everything they could with them rather than push for speed. Several dozen such families from the northeastern portion of Umber land had joined together to make a caravan, moving down through former Bolton land heading towards Hornwood rather than the Last Hearth or Karhold. It was a long journey, but the folk making the decisions for the caravan felt that Hornwood was a safer bet.

The nights are getting even colder thought Robett, one of the men assigned to guard the camp, as he stared out into the dark beyond the fires of the camp. Those fires were burning low now, they hadn't taken the time to gather much fuel for them that day.

He shivered. Old God's damn it, it was cold. In fact, it was colder now than it had been a few moments ago. Don't be stupid, Robett thought, shaking his head. That's just your imagination. The temperature can't drop that quickly. Can it?

Robett's thoughts cut off abruptly. What is that? In the deep of the woods on the south side of camp he had seen a blue light of some kind. It was there for just a moment and then it was gone but Robett could've sworn it was there. He saw another light a few moments later, but then there was nothing for several candles, and he put the lights out of his mind, concentrating on staying awake and alert.

It was nearly the end of his shift and the fires of the camp and burned to nothing when the lights were back with a vengeance. He turned to shout something, only for a hand with long, thin fingers to clamp over his mouth. Those fingers were longer than a human's should've been he noted in that brief second and then something sharp slammed into his back, then he knew no more.

Screams abounded through the night, while a family consisting of three members, a mother, a teenage daughter and a young boy burst out of their tent. Their names were James, Nira, and Fiera. They had been sharing a tent and indeed a blanket together to share warmth, but the cold had woken them up, and then the screams had started.

None of the fires were still lit, making sight difficult in the dark of the night, with only the stars and a half moon above them to light the scene. But there was a strange eerie glow of blue here and there, and that was enough to see the beings moving through the camp.

They stood taller than most men by at least a good foot. But they were thin, almost emaciated looking in their faces and arms, which were visible from the shoulder down, which was strange considering how cold it was. All they seemed to wear was armor, black armor with spikes showing here and there, small ones in various patterns and larger ones on their shoulders. It gleamed in the faint light from their eyes and from the moon in a way that made it look more like dark ice than steel, but not quite.

Nearby the boy saw his father charging one of them roaring a battle cry, bringing his axe around in a sideways blow that should've taken the attacker off his feet at least if he had been able to block it at all. For just a moment the overwhelming fear that had gripped James and his sister the moment the screams began faded and they shouted together "Go father!"

But the creature was able to interpose its blade between that attack and his own body. It was still knocked off its feet but was very much alive, and it rolled the blow, coming up hissing something in a language that sounded foul to James' ears.

The two exchanged several dozen blows, but then to the man's surprise his axe shattered after another exchange of blows. The steel of it had been frozen so much that it was brittle enough to shatter like glass. But his surprise didn't last long, because the creature's sword came back, cutting his neck and head off in a welter of blood.

James shouted "No!" but had enough presence of mind to grab his mother and big sister's hands and try to pull them away. Both of them were staring in shock at their father and husband lying there dead, but James knew he had to get them away quickly before whatever that thing was could turn on them.

His mother suddenly shrieked, her hands going up to her face breaking James's grip on her wrist as an arrow hit her cheek, going through the skin there and out the other side. She looks down at her children, gritting her teeth to keep the pain at bay as something dark and vile began to make its way through her system. "Run! Run!" With that she reached down, grabbed up a hatchet that had fallen from somewhere and turned, shrieking towards her husband's killer.

The two children ran, somehow escaping the camp for a moment, but as they raced on through the woods they could hear someone pursuing them. James let go of his sister's hand, reaching down grabbing up a large cob of wood. "Keep going!" he shouted, "keep going!" Nira looked at him, and he shook his head. "Run! They can't catch us both!"

Nira nodded, her eyes wide and frightened but determined. She leaned down quickly, kissing him on the cheek. "May the old gods keep you brother."

Then she barreled off through the woods in a different direction, making as much noise as she could which James noticed after a moment. He scowled angrily realizing that she was trying to draw their pursuer after her but with a growl he took off in a different direction hoping that one of them at least would survive.

It was not to be. Through the forest James could hear his sister scream, the sound cut off abruptly. And suddenly all around him he saw lights, small blue lights. He stopped running, putting his back against a tree, raising his makeshift weapon. "S-stay back!" he shouted, trying to sound as brave as his father had been. "Stay back!" And failing.

They came out of the woods, several of the same creatures that had slain his father. They did indeed stand taller than a man, with long pointed features almost like a foxes, complete with pointed ears. Their hair was uniformly white and wispy, falling to their shoulders, glimmering disturbingly in the light of their eyes, which glowed a pale, somehow sickly blue. Their thin lips were curved into cruel sneers as they saw the young boy in front of them.

James snarled and rushed towards one of them, raising his makeshift weapon with a cry. "Rahgg!"

One of them laughed, saying something to another in that strange hissing language then negligently flicked his blade, smacking the cob of wood from James' hands.

At this his bravery deserted James, and he fell to his knees, staring up at them. "Please!" he said, praying for something to save him, or simply for these creatures to go away. "Please, mercy!"

One of them leaned down, his thin, alien face almost directly against James'. "Please, mercy?" It said in common.

"Please," James said tears of grief, pain, fear and shame running down his face. "Please, mercy."

He gasped and screamed as something barbed wickedly slammed into his stomach, and he was hoisted into the air above the creatures head. "Please mercy!" it said, laughing as it imitated the words, and soon the others took up the chant, thrusting their own barbed blades up into the boy's body where it hung from the first one's blade. "Please mercy, please mercy!" They chanted, laughing all the while as the young boy died on their blades.

Several leagues distant, a wight horde thousands strong marched through the night, with a large majority of the creatures the White Walkers had suborned on Skagos. Above them, two undead dragons flew through the night on silent wings, their target, and that of the army below them several weeks journey south.

OOOOOO

"No Old God's damnit!" Torrhen said growling angrily at Theon as they sat at his family's table in the dining hall, while all around them the noise of the meal continued. "This is my family's seat! I fully agree that the holdfasts and other minor houses should be evacuated, but this is a castle! Furthermore, we've spent months preparing it for a siege, we can hold out for years! I don't care what forces the White Walkers can bring against us, so long as we have men to man the walls we will defend Karhold!"

Theon glared angrily at the other young man, while Lady Karstark remained silent, her face showing her uncertainty. The last of the smallfolk and minor lords from the lands around Karhold had arrived that day, carrying tales of undead having risen from family graveyards. Thankfully there weren't many people on the Karstark land, only four minor houses and a few hundred smallfolk families. A single massive forest dominated the area which kept the numbers of people it could support down much like the wolfsworn did for Glover, and, much less so, Stark and Cerwyn. Though those families which did live in it tended to be excellent hunters and archers for the most part, many of whom had been folded into the defense of Karhold, making up some of the numbers Karstark had sent to the Wall and down with Lord Rickard.

"If the wights were a normal enemy, you might be correct, this castle could stand any kind of normal direct assault. At least until the river froze, and they could come at you from that direction. But they aren't human!"

He held up a hand as Torrhen made to speak. "No I didn't try to fight the undead when I was on Skagos, but remember I faced them with the Wolfsworn up in The Gift! I know what we're facing. Wights don't feel pain, they don't feel fear, except with fire. They will keep on coming until you literally have to hack them into pieces, and even then those pieces will still try to attack you! Their hands and feet will try to trip you up, their heads will still try to use their teeth! They won't retreat when they take losses, they will simply keep coming!"

He sighed leaning back. "If we had weapons that could harm them, I'd be the first to say stand and fight, but we don't. You when I personally checked your family's armory for anything that could be used, and we don't have even a single dronglass knife to our name."

"I hear what you say, but I think we have enough fire arrows, enough strength in the walls and numbers to see us through." Torrhen said stubbornly. "We'll continue to ferry smallfolk out to the Narrow sea. But my family and our arms men will stay and fight! Will you stay with us Theon? Your skill with a bow would be an aid beyond price here."

Theon stared hard at him, then over to lady Karstark and back. He finally sighed nodding reluctantly. "I'll stay."

OOOOOO

Petyr reached the Saltfans within a bare week of leaving the Dornish army behind. After retrieving a small cache of gold hidden in a merchant's house there, he and his men stayed in the town for a few days, recuperating and generally having some down time after the hard life they had led with the Dornish army both before and after its defeat.

"So where to now my Lord?" asked Lothor.

"We'll head on to Fairmarket, and then up to the Green Fork." Petyr smiled thinly looking between two small pieces of parchment. One was a message from one of his spies in Riverrun, the other was calculations of various speed and distance questions. "I will acquire my personal prize, and then we will head on to Seagard. I have agents there who will be able to smuggle us onto their cargo ships, from there we will head down to Oldtown, and from there out of Westeros entirely."

"And we'll be paid for this will we?" Asked Osmund Kettleblack, exchanging glances with his brothers. Having to leave their family's lands behind, and knowing that their lands would no doubt be seized by the Royal House was a hard pill to swallow despite the amount of money that Petyr had already given them. It was made worse by their father's death to disease on the march with the Dornish army.

"Oh yes." Petyr replied quickly. "You saw the money I had stored here? I have the same again hidden in Fairmarket, and even more stored in Seagard. I felt that was one of the last places anyone would look for it, and my agents there were some I had made in my time in Riverrun, so I can trust them more than most. Yes..." He mused, his voice slowing as a wide, somewhat disturbing smile appeared on his face. "Yes, you will be paid handsomely I will have my prize, and we will live like kings in Essos when this is task is finished."

Now if only I could shake the feeling that someone was following us before we entered the town...

OOOOOOO

It was drizzling slightly which was becoming the norm here in the Riverlands when the rest of the Royal Army and its accompanying prisoners arrived. Behind Ranma and Daenerys the portion of the army that was already present gave a loud cheer, answered by its fellows as they moved to join them. The camp had already been prepared, with several hundred tents brought out from the city to add to the armies already large stores so that every man had a tent above them that evening, even the prisoners, though those were much more crowded than that of the rest of the army. The camp was also well made, to keep any hint of disease at bay.

Ranma and Daenerys however cared nothing for that. What they cared about was that Merry was with that army... along with their other friends of course.

Even as Jason Mallister and the other lords dismounted the royal couple had to fight to keep from looking at Merry, who was beaming happily at her two lovers. She dismounted quickly, rushing over to hug Daenerys before moving over to where Sunfyre and Rhaegon were laying down behind her. Both dragons rumbled happily to see the female two-legs who gave good scratchings and smelt of honeysuckle and blood. Daenerys laughed, putting an arm over the younger girl, leading her off through the rain as Ser Barrister followed, exchanging a nod with Eric who followed Merry, guarding her as always.

As the women moved off Jason looked at Ranma, nodding her head towards Merry. "If I could, I would bring Lord Darry back to life to kill him again for what he did to that girl. She would make a magnificent lady Paramount, but with her injuries..." Jason shook his head.

"It makes her no less of a lady my friend." Ranma said with a laugh, clapping Jason's shoulder.

"True enough and she's a bossy little one. Lady Merry basically took over the army while you were gone. She and her helpers made certain that everyone was getting the treatments they needed and that the Reach Army and their camp was organized enough to prevent disease. Oh and she's got about three dozen maesters from the Reach now following her every command like a little general. That's how Renly apparently decided to address the issue of disease on campaign, simply accosting every maester he could and dragging them along with the army."

Ranma winced at the implications that might have in the Reach, but Jason caught it should and shook his head. "Don't worry, my friend. The Reach has always had an overabundance of Maesters. Minor Houses there have them, not just the Great Houses, which would in turn have two or three. I've no doubt some of them were left behind."

Ranma nodded, his mind already moving to other things. As they had waited for the Army to rejoin them Ranma had become increasingly worried about the time limit which was rapidly approaching, indeed they were a few days less than two weeks away from the two month time limit.

Luckily Ranma and Daenerys had not been idle in the week spent waiting for the army. They had made several hard decisions on what to do with their prisoners, and they had written up a message to send to Lady Margaery for her eyes and for Jon's eyes once Jon reached Highgarden. That had already been sent with a force of twenty men to Riverrun where maester Vyman would send it on.

They had also opened up dialogue with the Royal Navy. A tentative meeting had been set up with Davos, though he insisted that it wait until some of the army which had served under Stannis was present. He wanted to question them closely on his Lord's actions, specifically what part Stannis had played in the destruction of Kings Landing. This of course would color his relations with Ranma, the man who had not only defeated his army but personally killed Stannis in battle.

Neither Ranma nor Daenerys had any problem with Davos' stance per-se. Indeed, the man's caution and loyalty to Stannis spoke well of him to them. But they needed the Royal Navy right now, which meant that Davos had a lot of bargaining power, and they were forced to wait, something Ranma was very unhappy about.

"Let's get inside the tent my Lords," he said looking around as the other Lords that had remained with the Army, including all of the Wolfsworn save Daryn joined them. He noted absently they were looking much better since he had last seen them. Roger in particular was looking good, able to get out of his saddle and stand with only a slight grimace as his wounded leg took his weight.

He spared a moment to nod at them all especially, nodding at Meera at the same time, something which made the young Reed heiress well up with pride. "The next few days are going to be very busy and very hectic for us all, but we hope to have it all organized at least from the get go."

OOOOOO

As the two of them walked off towards where Shireen Baratheon was being housed in a tent by herself guarded by two Tully men Daenerys squeezed Merry's hand, while Merry squeezed back just as tightly. "I missed you." Merry said fiercely, leaning against the older girl's shoulder for a moment.

"Ranma and I missed you, too." Daenerys said shaking her head. "I dislike being apart from any of my loved ones." She looked back at her dragons who were following them, smiling and reaching back to scratch at Rhaegon's eye ridge for a moment causing the dragon to rumble in pleasure while Merry did the same for Sunfyre. "I wish I could say this the last time we'll be parted, but with life being what it is..." she shrugged sadly.

"The deadline for the Old Gods' warning is coming up quickly. There's no way will be able to get the whole army back North, but we still have to try." Merry said with her own sigh. "I could wish for a few days at least just to have some down time, but..."

"I know exactly what you wish for you horny little girl." Daenerys said, smacking her thigh against Merry's slightly as she pretended to stumble in the muddy ground of the camp for a moment.

"Can you blame me? Merry asked archly, despite the ferocious blush on her face Daenerys' words had evoked. "You and Ranma, both of you are Seven-damned teases."

Daenerys laughed, but as they walked on, she went on more seriously. "We might be able to make time for that at some point Merry but right now, we need to talk to Shireen."

"Have you talked to her at all since taking custody of her?" Merry asked, smiling and nodding at the soldiers around them, who bowed to the queen and the Maiden of Healing.

"A little, but she seems very twitchy in my presence. No doubt her father and uncles filled her head with tales about my family, he'd be spoiled for choice alas. She seems a little bit more at home around Ranma, which probably means she doesn't know he personally killed Stannis, a fact I would like to keep from her for a bit longer. But he and I have been so busy with other things we haven't had much time to devote to her."

Merry nodded, not commenting on how rarely Shireen was around the king or Renly. Neither had ever seen the girl as family, and not entirely because of their frosty relationship with Stannis. A few moments later she was bowed into Shireen's tent by one of the Tully armymen on watch outside it. "Cousin Shireen?"

Shireen was a thirteen going on fourteen year old girl with the Baratheon light blue eyes under brown hair and unfortunately both her father's square jaw and her mother's large ears. A bout of greyscale when she was an infant had left half of her left cheek and most of her neck covered in gray and black skin. Though she had not been mistreated, and indeed had been treated well for the most part thanks to the Sand Snakes, the depredation of being a prisoner to a king whose temper was as volatile as Viserys had taken its toll on the girl's nerves. This showed in her face and body when she turned to the tent flap, her eyes wide and wary.

After a moment however, that look went away to be replaced by confusion. "Prin-er, Lady Myrcella?"

"Cousin, not lady or princess." Merry said, moving towards her with her arms outstretched for a hug. "I am so sorry about everything that has happened to you in this war. My mother was an arrogant and willfully blind woman at times, but I never thought she would commit treason as she did to keep Joffrey Waters on the throne."

Shireen hesitated then nodded, not wishing to delve into that conversation any deeper since it would bring up the dubious nature of Myrcella's own birth. She accepted the hug demurely, surprised at the strength and firmness in Merry's arms, which surprised a real hug out of her in turn. "I could say the same Myrcella, Your Majesty, for my father's actions." She said looking over Daenerys, unable to stop herself from taking a shot at the Stormborn. "Yet some of us seem to have gotten out of it far better than others."

"I would've been perfectly content to be the Lady of Winterfell and remain with Ranma in the North. We would both have been content to remain in Winterfell, but events forced us to take the throne. I realize that sounds trite, but in this case it is true." Daenerys replied, pulling up two small camp chairs and sitting down as Merry set aside her. "Now that Merry has joined us, let us talk."

That discussion went on for some time, giving Daenerys a far better idea of Shireen's character than she had before this. Her reserve seemed to fade somewhat, and she spoke well and somewhat intelligently, if not as well-read or worldly as could be hoped. Still, is that a sign of her age, or her natural temperament? Regardless, I don't think she's ready to become Lady Baratheon.

Several hours later the two girls left Shireen behind, talking quietly to one another while they walked through the now dark camp. Their path was lit here and there by braziers and fires despite the ongoing drizzle, yet that did nothing for the mud underneath their boots. "What do you think of Shireen?" Merry asked.

"Much better that time around than my first impression of her. I thought she was a shrinking violet, but there is a brain in there. But I don't think we can install Shireen at Dragonstone or at Storm's End. She's not trained for it, knows nothing about Storm's End, and is far too timid."

"I'd suggest keeping with us as a lady in waiting, teach her what she needs to know slowly. Or, better yet, keep her with the army until we reach Winterfell and then have Lady Catelyn and Lord Eddard start teaching her, I think they've proven their ability in that areas." Merry said, smirking slightly. "I could always use another pair of hands, and it would let you keep her as a hostage, whatever that might be worth."

"I dislike that, no we won't use Shireen as a hostage, though the awarding of lordship of Storm's End could be kept in reserve." Daenerys mused. "Besides, we've already got a few such captive, no need to add a fourth."

"You're talking about Arianne and the Sand Snakes?" Merry asked shrewdly.

"Yes. After talking to a few of our lords, we decided we can't simply execute Arianne as her actions against Westeros really deserve." Daenerys laughed harshly. "Oh, that was a hard fact to admit to, for both of us. Still, doing so would set Dorne against us in the future as well as now, and Daryn and the other's talked us out of it. Oberyn's death, once Jon contrives it, is going to have a big enough impact. We can ill afford to tie up the manpower it would take to remove Doran from power down there right now, the smallfolk and remaining Lords respect him too much for us to move against him. This was a disaster for Dorne make no bones about it, and the Lords with the army might be willing to do so, but those back home? The best we would get would be a civil war, and Ranma and I don't want that. We'll be turning to other means to make Dorne pay for backing Viserys."

"Good. I'm sick of this." Merry confessed leaning her head against Daenerys' shoulder. "I'm so sick of the killing and everything that comes with it."

"I understand that all too well and I too am tired of killing." Daenerys replied, letting her own head fall against Merry's head for a moment.

"So what will you do about Storm's End now? And about the Sand Snakes and Arianne, if you're not going to execute her I mean."

Daenerys smiled grimly, and told her about a plan Ranma had thought up for Arianne. Merry gasped at first then laughed aloud, shaking her head. "That is so appropriate it's not even funny."

"I thought so. But the Sand Snakes, what to do with them eludes us at present. They have more standing than I expected with Dornish army here, and if that spreads to the smallfolk back in Dorne even they can't be executed without causing problems in the future."

"Why not..." Merry said slowly... "Why not do the same to them as you wish to with Shireen? Keep them with the Royal House and train them up, see how they do. Put Nymeria to work in helping Alayaya put together a complete spy network while watching her closely. If she does well, name her to that post permanently along with Alayaya. That will show that you're able to let bygones be bygones, and splitting the post of Master of Whisperers like that might be a good idea in any event, set a precedent for the future, since it would stop someone like Varys from playing kingmaker. Besides, it worked well enough for us so far hasn't it?"

Daenerys nodded, and the two of them fell silent, once again remembering Domic and how he had died. After a moment however Merry went on. "As for the other, the one Meera captured, isn't she a decent commander? Watch her, keep her with the army and if she proves a decent enough fighter, make her train with Dacey."

"Hmm, that's a good idea I suppose. The training itself would serve as a punishment in a way, and the upshot of her becoming, what a Sand Stalker, or something of that nature?"

"Sand Spear." Merry said firmly. "Weapons or shields, you need to keep using that sort of symbolism."

"In fact." Daenerys said taking that idea and running with it. "I actually have an even better idea there, something that might tie the Martells to one of our most loyal Houses. But I'll have to talk to Rickard about it first."

At that point the two of them entered the royal tent, finding Ranma there alone, having just sent his lords and friends off to bed. One moment Merry and Daenerys were talking seriously, the next Ranma was hugging them both, twirling around with the two girls in midair, laying kisses on face, neck and mouth as he told Merry how much he missed her. Though they didn't go much further than that, the serious discussions for the day were certainly over.

The next day the army marched into Maidenpool to cheering from the smallfolk, something which began the moment they formed up for the March from smallfolk lining the walls of the large town. Of course this wasn't the full army, Maidenpool could not have housed them all. The surrendered Dornishmen and the rest of the prisoners were kept outside.

All the Lords that had surrendered and the Reach Lords that had retreated from the battle however came in with the rest of the Army. That battle was now known as the Shadow's Fall due to the events the night before and Melisandre's power which had been used during it.

Those Reach lords were in a sort of legal limbo at this point, an honorably surrendered force but one which had taken actions against the crown and the smallfolk since falling under Stannis' command. Yet while they had technically followed Stannis, they had truly followed who they thought was their Lord Paramount at the time, and such loyalty could not be held against them. But any actions they took while following Mace still had to be paid for, and since Willas wasn't here to do that, the Royal family could do with them what they wished both as vassals of their loyal lord and as prisoners.

While the portion of the army that had come into the town was allowed to have some downtime, Ranma and Daenerys presided once again over a series of trials. For these trials they were joined once again by Rickard to represent the North and Merry as well, in her position as the former Princess of the former Royal family. Lord Blackwood represented the Riverlands this time rather than Jason, who remained with the army outside the walls for now. They were also joined by two newcomers.

One of these newcomers was from the Reach: Lord Fossoway of the Green Apple Fossoways, Garlan Tyrell's father-in-law. The man was brought to the court within a moment's of the army's investiture of Lord Mooton's keep.

He stopped for a moment in the doorway of the dining hall, staring at the hall which he and the prisoners had passed through with the other, extremely nervous Reach lords mere moments ago. None of them believed that a Stark would stomach any kind of torture or anything to willingly surrendered prisoners, but there was the Targaryen girl to think of. Her father wasn't the only madman that House had produced after all, something even the most pro-Targaryen lord remembered all too well.

The hall had been changed in the brief time since he had last seen it. Gone were Mooton's banners, which had been strewn here and there from the ceilings of the roof. In their place was one banner for every Lord that was sitting on that table, with the Royal Houses the most prevalent hanging right behind them, its words, 'Honor Above All', visible to every man who entered.

For a moment the hall was silent then Daenerys spoke. "Lord Fossoway, we have questioned many of our own lords about who among the Reach nobles we should look to for his probity, adherence to the law and honor. One name they all agreed upon was you. As such, we ask you to take part in this proceeding. Realize that this is a trial, no one's fate has been decided yet, though my husband and I have heard the evidence of some of the cases, and we have some idea on the penalties we will be demanding for the most... politically sensitive prisoners, but for many even that is in the air."

There Ranma took up the tale. "We ask you to sit, to give us your opinion on what you hear. This will not accrue any special right or new power to you. The Reach is a mess as you well know, but it's one that we are too far removed from here to have an accurate picture of. Furthermore, we have duties in the North that we need to see to. Therefore, we will be leaving the remapping of the Reach and its territories to House Tyrell in the form of its new Lord Paramount Willas and his spokeswoman Lady Margaery, along with our Hand, Jon Stark."

Lord Fossoway twitched at that eyes narrowing. "My Lord, may I ask where this Jon Stark is now?"

"Jon Stark was already sent into the Reach with a force of allied Houses before Stannis and our army clashed. We estimate that by this point he has probably reached the mouth of the Mander, and begun his travel down the river. His skills as a leader and warrior will be needed there against the depredations of the Dornish mercenary army, but I have no doubt that my brother's mind will be even more necessary in the coming days." Ranma smiled, his entire bearing showing the confidence he had in Jon.

Inwardly however Ranma grumbled, not liking this formal talk, but again this was most only the place for it. And the way my wife is pinching my side is definitely a clue that she would be unhappy if I broke from the script. Hmmpf, I'll get you back for this tonight love, you know I will. To his side Daenerys retracted her hand, flushing at the way Ranma's hand had caressed it just right for a second there.

Lord Fossoway thought for a moment then nodded slowly. "As Lord Willas would be my Lord Paramount's heir regardless of anything else, I feel that I can in all honor serve in this body. Realize however that I will give my opinion honorably and honestly. I am no man's yes-man your majesties. I was not even that for Mace or King Robert."

"Is any northern Lord a yes-man to anyone?" Rickard scoffed angrily. "Myself and Lord Blackwood sit on this panel to give our opinion Fossoway, not to parrot back Ranma's words. He's never wanted something like that, and never would. Even Lady Daenerys is remarkably open to suggestion and debate."

Both Royals smiled, and Lord Fossoway looked at Rickard then at Lord Blackwood, both of whom he had met in the past though Rickard only briefly during the Greyjoy rebellion. Lord Blackwood however he had met several times. Indeed, they had debated at one point whether or not they should unite their Houses through a marriage between one of Lord Blackwood's sons and one of Lord Fossoway's daughters.

Seeing both men nod he simply nodded in turn. "Very well, where should I sit?"

The other newcomer was Lord Brune of Dyre Den. He was the patriarch of the most powerful House of that land, and had led the secret assault that had taken Lord Mooton and the town of Maidenpool once the Dornishmen left. As such he was now the incumbent Duke Crackclaw, with a stake in the town of Maidenpool, the revenue of which would go to creating better roads into and out of Crackclaw point, and in creating a port town for themselves on the Point in the future. Unlike Lord Fossoway, he had heard all the stories of Daenerys and Ranma, and had no reservation in giving his oath to them or taking part in the trial.

After that, the trials began quickly and many of them were very easy. The Stormlands lords in particular were ludicrously simple to deal with because there were so few Lords from that realm left alive. Because of that, and the fact there was no trueborn Baratheon male remaining alive, the Stormlands would be broken into duchies like the Westerlands, with each duke beholden directly to the crown rather than a Lord Paramount.

Despite its part in backing Stannis, Massey became the first of these to be recognized. They would take control of Massey's Hook, along with a large section of the shoreline facing Blackwater Bay towards the Wendwater. That land had formerly been controlled by House Kellington, a house which had been annihilated between the battles between the two Baratheons, their lord having died on the march afterward under Stannis, though no one seemed to know how.

The new Lord Massey was incredibly grateful to Ranma's rescue of his sister, a sentiment which had not faded since the battle of the Shadow's Fall. Justin knew all too well what would've happened to Glinda if any but his own men had found her when the Baratheon army overran the Golden Company's camp. What Glinda had already suffered was more than enough, and the fact that Ranma and Daenerys were prepared to waive any reparations from his House for their part in backing Stannis thanks to the deprivations of the Golden Company on their lands simply solidified his excellent opinion of the royal house. And indeed sent a message to the remaining Stormlands armsmen as well, a very good one.

The only other remaining lord of Stannis' original backers, Lord Errol, had survived, and strangely enough no wrong doing could be laid at his feet despite rumors passed on from the armsmen among the prisoners. Lord Brune and Rickard took a dim view of him, but the others were not convinced by rumor.

As House Errol had no heir or lady that could be trusted to run his lands, and because those lands were important in terms of food production for the Stormlands, he was allowed to return home. But the reparations Haystack Hall was leveed with would cripple his family's finances almost as badly as the war had hammered their military strength.

From there the trials moved on to deal with the surviving Stormlands lords that had originally followed Renly.

Lord Lester Morrigen was given the choice of joining them to serve the Royal Army as a knight until winter ended or exile. He agreed to this realizing it was a life sentence yet also a way to regain his family's honor. No other reparations would be leveled against his House because of this, and House Murrigen would be allowed to enrich itself on the lands of their neighbors under his surviving son, Richard. Richard had impressed everyone on the march with his intelligence and acumen, and Lester was happy the royals were willing to keep him as the House's heir despite knowing he himself might well die in the near future.

The last remaining actual Stormlord, Lord Horpe, was the first lord to be executed for war crimes in this series of trials. This was because Lord Blackwood had followed Ranma's instruction on noting down the colors of those Houses most involved in preying upon the smallfolk as Stannis' army marched into the Riverlands.

Lord Blackwood had personally seen Lord Horpe leading such bands several times, and had even gathered a few witnesses, spiriting them away with his skirmishers. Horpe's lands, like that of Musgood, Trant and others, had felt the Viper's sting already, but they would still be officially turned over to House Grandison, the nearest surviving House that had any strength remaining. Grandison however had no surviving representative among the prisoners, so they would have to speak to the Royal House's representative when they were in the Stormlands.

Of course a final redrawing of the borders within the Stormlands would need to wait for a time. That work which would be left to Jon, Lord Dondarrion, and the representative the royal family would be sending down there with the remains of the Stormlands army to make certain that anarchy wouldn't erupt in the Stormlands, whose name would be announced at the end of the trials for the Stormlords.

Frankly the only powerful Houses, the Houses that Ranma and Daenerys's representative would have to lean on to control the chaos that the Stormlands would devolve into with so many Houses wiped out or powerless, were those who had stayed at home. Dondarrion was easily the strongest of these, with other Marcher Houses that had kept some of their men home coming a distant second, along with House Grandison, with the town of Grand View to call upon.

The fate of the last house with a representative present, House Swann, was a surprise for most. Donnel, Lord Swann's oldest son and heir, hadn't exactly covered himself after being sent to war with a force of around a thousand of his house's men, but he was still alive, as was his younger brother Balon. When Balon was shown in, the two brothers stared at one another in surprise, neither having realized the other was present among the thousands of prisoners.

Ranma smirked slightly at the surprise on the two Swann's faces before speaking. "Ser Balon, I trust your stay under our care has not been too unpleasant?"

The former Kingsguard nodded his head slowly, his eyes looking all around. Of course he had heard what had happened to his former charges, and had even learned about Joffrey being both a Waters and a kinslayer, but it hadn't made his failing to defend Joffrey or Cersei as his oath demanded. "No... Your Majesty, my stay as your prisoner hasn't been unpleasant at all. You and your men have treated myself and all your other prisoners with all the decency honor could demand on the march."

"Good. You are here now Ser Swann because Ser Selmy has spoken up on your behalf, saying your placement into the Kingsguard was one you deserved in terms of skill and personal honor." Ranma watched as Balon's eyes moved to look at Ser Barristan, where he was standing along one wall, his white armor and cloak once more immaculate white.

"As such, we have decided that the dishonor done to you by being forced to serve a pretender to the throne is enough of a punishment. As King and Queen, we relieve you of your oaths to the defunct knightly order called the Kingsguard. You and your brother will serve our representative, Ser Selmy, in restoring order and our rule to the Stormlands until he is satisfied. Your house maybe called upon to take up more responsibility for the lands ravaged by the Viper's madness, but we both believe that your father will be up to the task. And I think we can trust the two of you to serve Ser Selmy as honorably as you served the Kings you were previously oath-bound to. Is this the case?"

Both brothers' eyes tracked to Ser Selmy, the penultimate example of knighthood, who, despite being surprised by this appointment, simply stared back stoically. Time enough for him to bring up his objections to this move later in private, though his previous dealings with kings and queens told him it would probably be futile.

The Swann brothers then turned to one another, communicating without words as some siblings could, before turning and bowing deeply to the two monarchs. "Yes your majesties, we will serve Ser Selmy and the realm as best we may, you may depend on this."

After the Stormlands was dealt with, Ranma called for brief recess. While the other Lords went off to find something to eat and before Ser Selmy could speak up, Ranma nodded at Daryn. "Bring Davos in, he should be ready to make a decision by this point."

Daryn nodded, and not a minute later came back with Ser Seaworth. He had been closely questioning the men of the army. Not the Lords, but the men who served under them while he tried to build a picture of what had happened around King's Landing. He had come away with a grim understanding of how Melisandre had ruined the honorable man that Davos had given his oath to. "Your Majesties," he said, bowing his head to Ranma and Daenerys. "I have..."

He paused, then went on steadily if not happily. "I served Stannis Baratheon, not only as Lord of Dragonstone but as the person who I felt was the rightful King of Westeros. When we met, he was honorable to a fault, fair-minded if rather hidebound, but a good, decent man for that. By his own actions, and by the actions he allowed the Red Witch to take, it's obvious Stannis fell from that high perch before his death. I, I therefore am left to do my duty as my oaths to Westeros as a whole dictate. Both myself and the fleet I currently command in the defense of all Westeros are yours."

Ranma smiled in welcome. "Take a seat Ser Davos, you aren't on trial here at least."

When Davos did so, looking at Ranma in astonishment Ranma simply laughed quietly. "Davos, we've talked to our lords and men, both those who served in Robert's Rebellion and in the Greyjoy Rebellion. Not one of them had anything bad to say for you. Besides, you're not the only good man whose loyalty led him astray in this war. You did your duty as you saw it, you did not commit any atrocities, and you served in an exemplary fashion, retaking Dragonstone and sinking several Dornish warships before blockading Maidenpool. We're not going to hold the fact that you served Stannis against you."

"Indeed, your actions speak well of your abilities, and the fact that you did not storm Driftmark, or put that House to the sword as we feel Stannis must've ordered speaks for your honor." Daenerys said.

She reached out with one hand, and knowing his cue young Cley moved forward, handing her a large scroll set with the new royal seal. "This is a warrant declaring you as Duke Rainwood. We have no idea what the nobles houses from the Rainwood left at home, but none of their military forces sent to war survived. As such, your House is the sole surviving power in the region, and will be called upon to keep order there. The size of that area means you will no doubt become one of the new Stormlands dukes given time. We would like you to create a port somewhere along Cape Wrath for the future, but at the moment, this warrant and what it means is all we can do."

Ranma held out his own hand, and Cley smoothly moved to place another scroll in his hand while Davos took possession of the one Daenerys held. "This is a message to Lord Estermont. We would like you to designate a trustworthy captain to lead a small number of ships down to Plankytown in Dorne, but they will stop over on Greenstone. Estermont kept their naval power at home, and that will give the expedition down to Dorne some added bite."

Staring between the two, Davos could barely understand what was happening here. Kings should not treat defeated forces so kindly after all, certainly not reward them for services rendered to their enemies! But these two were, and it suddenly occurred to Davos that maybe kindness was yet another weapon in their arsenal. And it isn't like they haven't amply demonstrated their strength by this point. Davos thought sardonically, thinking of the songs that had already begun to be sung of the Shadow's Fall, the March of the Wolf King, and, his personal favorite, the Battle of Dragons.

After a moment he nodded humbly. "My liege, your majesty, I know just the man. But if I may ask, what would you have the bulk of the Royal navy be doing at this time?"

Ranma smiled thinly. "That is quite a tale Davos, but one you need to know in full, because we need your aid, yours and the services of the Royal Navy. Though, I hope that you were in Dragonstone long enough for our order for dragonglass weapons to give you a clue as to what we're going to be dealing with."

The three of them continued to talk for a time, with Ranma and Daenerys outlining what they wanted to do. Davos however had to inform them his fleet didn't have the lift capacity to transport the army in one go to the North. So the royal couple were forced to split off some of their forces.

The Riverlands cavalry, Tristan Ryger and House Shawney would stay behind with the mountain clansmen, who had professed severe unease about ocean travel in any event. The Tully cavalry would be sent to Harroway for now, on hand there in case Ser Blanetree needed a bigger hammer in dealing with the bandits.

Another six hundred men, mostly made up of Lord Ashford and his men, all of whom had given their allegiance to the Royal House, were to work with House Buckwell of the Crownlands. They would carry word to the Crownlands Houses of the outcome of the war, relay a message to House Chelsted, the most powerful house in the Crownlands (by a significant margin at this point), and restore crown control over the lands. But without King's Landing, the Crownlands weren't a large enough issue to devote more time to.

Davos left the dining hall knowing that he had done the right thing to bend the knee to Ranma and Daenerys, and grimly determined to do his part. Not a turn of the candle later, Royal Navy war galleys entered the town's docks and portions of the army began to move through the town embarking on the waiting galleys.

The moment Davos left Ser Barristan turned to the royal couple. "Your Majesties, you cannot be serious! My place is at your side your grace. I thought I had proven that you need a bodyguard long before this."

"That might have been true in times of war, my knight." said Daenerys, waving the man into a chair. "But I hardly think I'm going to face assassins around every corner now. Moreover, can you really argue that we have no one else to send that knows the Stormlands?"

Ranma nodded agreement. "Jon's going to have his Hand full in the Reach." He paused smirking at Daenerys who rolled her eyes at his joke, smacking him on the shoulder and he went on. "And Lord Dondarrion is going to be busy down in the Marches. We need someone in the Stormlands to ride hard on the mess it's become, restore order. You've been with the army for months, you've seen our methods, you've seen our organization, and you're from the Stormlands."

Actually, House Selmy was one of the more powerful remaining houses, having sent only a third of their forces to war under Renly because they were considered a Marcher House. Ranma hoped that that would add to Barristan's ability to rally the shattered Stormlands to his aid in order to restore order and law to the lands which had been left without their lords for too long.

"I might have been raised there your Majesty, but I have not been to the Stormlands in years! Well," the older man amended honestly. "Save for traveling the Kingsroad down to Storm's End with Robert occasionally. That's hardly the same thing as knowing the lay of the land enough to plan an anti-bandit campaign."

"It isn't simply about knowing the lay of the land my knight and you know it." Daenerys replied firmly. "The Stormlands will be in disarray for years whatever we do. Too many Lords have died, too many armsmen have died. Many houses have been torn down and despoiled already in this war. When we spoke to Justin Massey telling him we needed him to restore order down there we were telling the truth. The Stormlands will slowly fall into chaos, chaos breeds bandits, lawlessness, and dissension. We need to send someone down there with the remnants of the Stormlands Army to restore order! And that means you."

"No one can the question your honor or integrity Barristan." said Ranma coming back into the conversation. "Everyone knows you as one of the truest knights of the realm, and hopefully by the time you get down there the word of your new oaths to the royal house, which means people won't even question whether or not you'd do something dishonorable if you were ordered to. We want order restored to those lands, we want those lands repaired, and the houses that remain in the Stormlands shown that we can be merciful and as my wife says, that means you."

Ser Barristan frowned, shaking his head. "And what about my own point, who will guard the Queen's back while I'm away?"

Before Ranma could speak he held up a hand. "I realize that while you are hear Your Majesty my presence is rather superfluous, but the point still stands seeing as you're not always around, the duties of the crown to compel you so. And none of your Wolfsworn have training in how to spot assassins."

"No they don't, but my dragons have a strong sense of smell." Daenerys replied firmly. "Whenever Ranma is not with me, I will bed down with the dragons, surrounded by the Wolfsworn. That will be enough to see off assassins surely."

"I suppose," Ser Barristan agreed reluctantly. "But what about poison?"

"Merry." Daenerys replied with a shrug. "We also have several other Maesters here. Merry is learning more and more all the time not just about healing but about poisons and other things of similar nature. Plus, when Fenris is around or one of the other direwolves as will be the case when we reach Winterfell, they'll be able to smell if anything is strange or unusual in my food."

"I dislike the idea of placing your safety in the hands of beasts my lady, no matter how intelligent." Ser Barristan said, though it was more rote response than anything else. He had seen the devotion the animals had to Ranma and Daenerys respectively, and Fenris at least had taken Daenerys to heart as well though the dragons certainly hadn't done the reverse with Ranma. They still occasionally tried to bite him, which was rather amusing to watch. If dragons could pout Rhaegon certainly would have the last time he'd try to bite Ranma and was smacked on the nose with the hand of the arm he'd tried to bite off.

Daenerys reached out, taking the older man's hand. "Ser Barristan, this is not a sign of distrust or of the fact that we don't need you, we do, it is just that right now we need you down in though Stormlands rather than by our side. When your task is done, then you may return to us."

The knight sighed, squeezed her hand and nodded. "Very well your majesties, I will take on this quest for you."

OOOOOO

At the same time that Ranma and Daenerys were dispensing justice, Ser Garlan Tyrell was finally leading the majority of his fleet in towards the Shield Islands. They had been held up for over a two weeks in retaking Starfish Harbor, but now at last they were within striking distance of the last lands the Ironborn had taken from the Reach.

Originally Garlan had wanted to assign the Redwynes to retake the island, but after their deplorable display of cowardice, neither of the two Redwyne 'knights' could be trusted for the task. So Garlan had been forced to use a hammer to smash an egg, and further had been forced to give both of them a chance to reclaim their honor by putting them in charge of taking House Redwyne's keep.

And of course Horas and Hobber fucked that up too, Seven save me from fools! Garlan thought, actually pouting a little as he thought of the battle the two had tried to plan for reclaiming their family's keep. Not a well-built or decent castle by any stretch, retaking it had still cost him two men for every one of the defenders. The only good side, and Garlan had to admit it was a morbid one, was that the two morons had gotten themselves killed almost at the start of the battle, trying to show that they did have some courage to them.

Others might have thought their deaths had reclaimed the honor they lost in fleeing from the battle on Balon's flagship. Garlan, despite being related to them simply wished their stupidity hadn't resulted in so many other good men dying. At least this paves the way for Desmera to take control of House Redwyne, a gloomy thought to be sure, but at least I know she and her cousin will retain the island behind us, and I think between the two of them they can start to heal the wounds the Ironborn left on the Arbor.

Garlan shivered, and it had nothing to do with the cold wind blowing all around him as he stood at the prow of Shield's Honor. The Ironborn's occupation of the Arbor would take decades to heal, and that was only possible because their captives, thousands of womenfolk, had been kept in the keep rather than on their ships. The thin, scared, broken faces of those women when they had retaken the keep would haunt him forever. And there was the damages done to the harbors, holdfasts and vineyards to see to as well.

Still, I can leave that in Desmera and Desmond's hands, I have four more Islands to retake. Then, then I will have to turn my attention north. Archmaester Marwyn had not lost any of his certainty about the threat growing beyond the Wall, and Garlan had given his word.

Hours later however, the battle he had assumed would be waiting for him had not occurred. The fleet slowly spread out investigating the waters around the Shield Islands, but they didn't see a single longship. With the rest of the fleet patrolling off shore of South Shield, a single boat was sent into its port.

The captains report was odd, troubling but not in an immediate way. The Ironborn ships, about five ships worth, had up and left several days ago. They left the islands even more ravaged than the Arbor, because the 'salt wives' the crews had taken since investing the islands had gone with them. But, and this was the odd thing, the small fleet had sailed off southwest rather than north. That was odd, since that way would only take them around the Arbor and into the Summer Sea rather than back to their Islands.

Five Ironborn ships could to some damage further south I suppose, but that's not enough manpower to take any of the Reach castles on the shore, and barely a tenth of what they'd need to take Oldtown. No, wait, it's not five, it's six, isn't it. One ship came in, and soon all the others left with it... I wonder who was on that ship. Hmm... I think we'll leave several war galleys here, then sail over to the mouth of the Mander to make certain they aren't waiting there.

But Garlan's fleet would find no sign of the Ironborn ships. Other longships were still up the Mander somewhere, but the forces left on the Shield Islands were just gone. With that confirmed, Garlan left a fourth of his fleet to guard the mouth of the Mander and the Shield Islands, then, after taking on food and water from a few supply ships up from Oldtown, turned north, heading along the shore to the Westerlands and beyond. After all, just because he was heading north didn't mean Garlan couldn't make some stops along the way.

OOOOOO

After that break, the trials continued with the Reach lords and two others. First was Lord Mooton. For his part in supplying Viserys and allowing him to land his troops he was exiled to the Silent Brothers.

His daughter however was not because Lord Brune spoke up on her behalf. It turned out that she had actually helped the Crackclaw Point invaders get into the keep. She had been corresponding with Ser Tyle Brune for several years, and when Tyle requested her hand in marriage, Ranma, quickly agreed. This tied into the fact that the Crackclaw Point Houses would be getting a portion of the tithe for Maidenpool, which was given a royal commission to grow into a city.

Ranma honestly doubted that Maidenpool would ever become a major port, not with Harroway a bare few days sail further into the Bay of Crabs. But it could turn into a major exporter. The lands around it were very good for dairy products. The cheese from this land and from Butterwell were famous for a reason after all, and Ranma had already turned over house Butterwell's land to a knight of that house who'd remained with the army, a distant cousin to the Lord of that house that had been serving under house Mallister until that point.

The next issue to be dealt with was Varys. He had tried several times to escape the army's custody. But with Dacey and the other injured Wolfsworn in charge of him, he had not succeeded, and now faced justice for his many crimes.

Here the lords on the tribunal were split on what to do. The evidence against him was damning after all. The fact he had backed a pretender to the throne, withheld information from Robert (and Joffrey, but no one cared about that) and had played a part in bringing the Golden Company into the conflict, betraying his post as Master of Whisperers to two kings, possibly three if you counted Aerys the Mad, could not be argued. But Fossoway and Blackwood both felt he might be more useful alive. They did not persuade the rest of the lords however, and Varys was executed within a few moments of the verdict being reached.

He died quickly, despite his protests and attempts to sway the court to his side. To the last Varys had thought he could talk his way out of his execution, but nothing he said mattered in the end and Ranma actually sighed with relief as the eunuch's head left his shoulders.

From that point they turned to dealing with the Reach. Three lords were accused of taking part in the razing and rapine of the smallfolk, though only two, Lords Cuy and Mullendore, were convicted of it and sent into exile. Their House's men suffered far worse, most of them being executed on the spot. These were not smallfolk levees after all, these were knights and armsmen who not only took part but exulted in preying upon those they should've defended. But since the lords themselves were only seen taking parts in raids where there was burning and looting rather than killing and rapine, they were exiled rather than executed.

The third however could not be convicted, because Lord Blackwood and his men had only seen his colors in places where very few smallfolk had actually died under his forager's blades. There also had been no burning under his command so far as any witnesses could be found, so Lord Rowan went free. Again, this wasn't exactly a perfect way of dispensing justice for wrongs committed, but it was the best the King and Queen could contrive.

The trials continued well past sunset before they finished. Then, after a quick snack Ranma and Daenerys once again sat in judgment with the panel of judges, but this time they were not alone. No, this time every Lord from the Reach, the Stormlands, and the Riverlands was in attendance. Even Lord Buckwell Antlers was there to represent the Crownlands, thanks to Jason having thought of contacting the man after the battle and telling him to come with them with a small retinue. He hadn't taken part in any of the proceedings so far, but had witnessed them all as one of many such witnesses that had been brought in to see justice done.

"Bring in the prisoners." Ranma ordered coldly.

After a moment the doors to former Lord Mooton's dining hall opened, and the surviving Lords of Viserys' army were shown in, along with Arianne, Nymeria, and Elia. They started for a moment at the Lords arrayed against them ranged behind the central table and along all of the walls. Lord Buckwell, the Reach Lords, Lord Massey, the Swann brothers and Lord Errol were lined up along the walls, while the River lords, the two Northern Lords and the Crackclaw Point Lords were arrayed behind the table.

Unlike where they had been sitting in judgment, Ranma and Daenerys sat alone at that table now. In front of them on the table was Ice crossed with Dark Sister. To one side of the crossed blades was a stack of scrolls sealed with the new royal seal. To the other side was piled the trio of crowns that had been taken from the bodies of Viserys, Stannis, and Aegon. Even the one that had been taken from Joffrey was there, on the bottom of that pile, almost unnoticed at first. As a sign of the victories the royal house had won so far, that took some beating.

Nonetheless Daenerys had wanted to do this outside so that her two no-longer-little ones could also be included. That would have driven the point home that the new royal house had the same power as the old House Targaryen, but even more support from the nobles. But it was raining again, and it would've taken a day or so to set up a large enough pavilion for all of the Lords and the dragons to be within.

Nonetheless, I suppose that the total effect is enough to get the point across. You face not just the royal house with one or two Lords Paramount behind us my Lords, you now face the totality of the rest of Westeros, united for once, and hopefully well into the future.

Ranma gripped her hand underneath the table, and Daenerys squeezed back twice, signaling that she wanted to wait a few more seconds. She let the silence of the hall linger, then nodded regally at the guards by the door who began to shift the Dornish Lords forward, until they were directly in front of the noble's table.

When they were in place, she began to speak. "It is said that you Dornishmen play politics even more subtly than the Reach or the Westerlands. Thus you will realize that when we speak we speak not just for the Royal House, but what the Royal House represents, Westeros united, united by the sword in some cases, united by words in others, by blood and oath of fealty. But a great thing is not great until it is finished, and Dorne alone remains to be brought into the royal fold."

Ranma took up the tale, as they had discussed. They needed to drive home once again that this was a true even marriage, with both Ranma and Daenerys being co-equal as rulers. The other Lords had already learned this, the Dornishmen needed to learn it now. "I am not just a student of warfare but of history, and my wife knows the history of her own family as well as any. We have had several weeks to think about this my Lords, and we have allowed our initial rush of anger to subside. Simply because we know that if we do what justice truly should demand, we would face unrest in Dorne, which could possibly boil over despite our best efforts."

He fell silent, allowing hope to awaken in the Dornish Lords for a bit. That they would might be able to get out of this debacle with nothing more demanded of them than the normal reparations paid out by the loser.

Then Ranma continued to speak, crushing that hope ruthlessly. "Yet the fact remains that you backed a butcher, a psychopath who used his dragon and his influence over you to burn and slaughter hundreds of people in some vainglorious efforts to reclaim the crown in the only way he thought he could. That must be paid for. So while we will not be executing you as was our first desire Arianne, neither will we let you free. It is on your shoulders, on your shoulders alone that Viserys was able to come back as a true threat to Westeros at all. Without you and your father, he would have nothing but mercenaries behind him and not the numbers or the influence to truly be dangerous."

Daenerys spoke up then, seeing the objection in many of their listener's eyes. "Yes, his Dragon could've made him a power, but not enough of one to be a threat to all of Westeros as he had become with your aid. You and your family must pay for that."

Ranma nodded and went on. "Arianne Martell, for your part in bringing war and death to Westeros, we sentence you to live out your days in White Harbor. Specifically, you will remain there and be in charge of carrying for the former queen Cersei Lannister. When the revelations of her son's true nature came out, Cersei's mind broke, and since then she has been comatose, calling for a permanent day-per-day care. You will be in charge of that, and so long as she lives, your safety will be assured and you will live as your noble status would demand. If anything should happen to her, you will be stripped of all of your comforts, and sent to join the Silent Sisters in that same city."

Despite seeing the poetic justice behind that sentence, Ranma had not been happy with it. Despite their time on the trading galley together, he had never warmed to Arianne, and she was to blame for helping Viserys become the threat he had. He had wanted to execute her, but his advisors had convinced him and Daenerys otherwise.

And after going over the history of the Targaryen's interaction with Dorne Ranma had reluctantly agreed. Killing Arianne would've caused more trouble down the line, making her another Elia Martell for Dorne to rally around. But this was an elegant solution. And if Arianne thinks that she'll be able to try to gain some influence in White Harbor she's sorely mistaken. Lord Manderly will handle her easily.

For her part Arianne was staring aghast at Ranma and Daenerys. To lose her family's influence, to be exiled to the cold North, regardless of whether it was supposedly a city or not, was one thing. To be forced to take care of Cersei, a Lannister and not only any Lannister, but one of the ones who she blamed for her family's dishonor, that was beyond cruel!

Seeing this Ranma took a bit of vindictive pleasure in the horror that was passing over Arianne's face. Let the punishment fit the crime he thought grimly, now truly getting behind this idea. "Take her away." He nodded at Dacey, who along with Hathar and Daryn were stationed by the doorway.

Dacey nodded back. Moving forward she took the other woman's arm pulling her back towards the doorway when Arianne continued to stare at the royal couple in horror.

Behind her and Nymeria and Elia exchanged a glance. That was well beyond what they had feared would happen, and showed both mercy and justice in equal amounts. Which spoke well of their own chances here, especially in regards to the conversation Nymeria had with the two royals after the Dornish army first surrendered. They must truly be willing to listen if they were able to set aside their anger at Arianne to that extent.

Daenerys spoke up then, staring at the two girls. "In like mind, we realized that the position of base-born in Dorne is different than in most of Westeros. And if we cannot take aggressive action against the one who was the archetype of my late brother's return to Westeros, we cannot take action against either of you to a greater degree. For your parts in this, you will serve the Royal House until such time as my husband and I believe that you have repaid your debt to Westeros through service."

"I hasten to add you are not hostages to your family's good conduct, you are simply serving out your time much like those men and Lords assigned to duty on the Royal Canal project from the Westerlands. Your duties will be decided upon and described to you later."

Both women bowed, and at Daenerys's imperious gesture the two of them removed themselves to the door, where they were escorted out by six more guards, men of House Tully and Blackwood.

Ranma stared at the Lords of the Dorne. "Your own positions and that of your men is somewhat different than that of House Martell. House Martell's men have already been consigned to working on the royal canal for five years, but you and your men will face a different fate. Much like to Westerlands lords who followed the Lannisters, cannot be held accountable for where your loyalty let you, only the actions you took since. But we cannot let you off with mere reparations like in the past or even Dorne in general."

"House Martell will pay reparations to the crown." He went on, tapping the long scroll of parchment that had been laid on top of the crossed swords in front of him and Daenerys. "Plankytown is to become Crown Land, its revenues taxed to pay for reparations to the Stormlands for Obery's campaign there. Your houses will pay a 5% increase in taxes to be used to repair Gulltown and to replace the ships of the Royal Navy destroyed in this war, along with what damages you did to Dragonstone and Driftmark."

Daenerys took up the tale there. "Furthermore, House Dayne will be rewarded for not taking part in this. It, the lands of House Wyl, Fowler and Manwoody will be combined, and added to a new duchy which will join the Stormlands Duchy of Dondarrion."

That won some exclamations of shock and consternation as all of the Dornish lords realized the implications, though not from the lords themselves. Those lords had added their men to Obery's command, and might well have gone with him on his slash-and-burn campaign. Without those men at home, their lands would fall easily to House Dayne's if they agreed to back the crown, especially since Dayne was more powerful than any two of the others three combined in any case.

But that didn't matter to the lords present, what mattered to them was the strategic implication of the passes coming under the control of a house that disdained House Martell and the rest of Dorne. While invading Dorne would not be easy thanks to its desert nature, if you controlled those passes it was possible. It was also a very pointed reminder that Dorne's semi-independence was at an end.

"Further you and your Houses my Lords, will swear fealty to us personally here and now, or be sent into exile. Your men will be turned over to the royal army without you. You will all serve the Royal Army for five years, and will return home so long as they survive the coming war."

One Lord raised his hand cautiously. "Your Majesty, what do you mean when you say 'the coming war'?"

"The black candles have been lit my Lords." Ranma replied. "The Great Enemy of all life has returned, and this war was frankly a sideshow taking us away from the real one. We must march north as soon as possible to combat it in the North."

'Impossible!' said Lord Yronwood. He was something of a historian, and he understood what Daenerys was talking about, whereas the other Dornish Lords were simply looking confused. "You're talking about the White Walkers, the threat that the Wall was made to defend against? They can't exist any longer, it has been thousands upon thousands of years since they were seen! Besides which, they can't get past the Wall."

"We have seen signs of their return my Lord, and my husband and his Wolfsworn met and destroyed a force of wights that were found on this side of the Wall in the Gift." Daenerys replied, squeezing Ranma's hand to let her answer first. "Magic has returned to this land as well my Lords as you all well now. Is it such a giant leap to assume that the Great Enemy has also returned?"

"I suggest that you all familiarize yourself with those old stories." Ranma said dryly. "We also realize however that your horse archers will be next to useless in winter, your horses will probably die within a few days of heading north, so they will be left here and put to work. However your archers themselves, those can be useful. And as such, you and your men will have the opportunity to win back your honor. Now, will you swear your oath?"

OOOOOO

"I am so happy that's over. Have I mentioned how much I hate politics?" Ranma moaned, falling face first onto the bed that he and Daenerys had commandeered here in. He turned his head slightly to glare at Daenerys and Merry, who had entered with a few servants who were carrying trays of food. The servants looked torn between giggling or trying to hold it in at his overacting, while Daenerys and Merry showed no such confusion, laughing aloud at him.

"Politics is possibly the thing that person who came up with the phrase necessary evil was thinking of when he coined it, my love." Daenerys said, patting him on the leg for a moment before moving over to the table where the servants were laying out a repast for her, Merry and Ranma. The two of them had waved off any idea of having dinner with the rest of the Lords tonight, wanting to have some quiet time with their friend, which all of their Lords had understood.

They had left Jason, Patrek, Daryn, and Tytos in charge of moving the army through the town to the waiting Royal Navy. Though they could've hoped to have some time to allow the army a break, the time limit was pressing down hard. Even now they wouldn't be able to get the army up to White Harbor within the two month timeframe, though they could come close enough that Ranma hoped they could get by. The four of them and Davos were in charge of that, and the Royals felt they could leave it in their capable hands.

Tonight however, tonight was for the three of them.

"You both did magnificently though. Firm but fair, justice given without anything to hint that it was based on revenge." Merry said, sitting down across from Daenerys she flushed a little as she felt Daenerys's hand on her thigh over her dress before the servants had even left, glaring at the girl who smiled back innocently before removing her hand and diving into her food like one of her no-longer-little ones.

"That coupled with what we did to the armies that face this will solidify our power more than anything else could have." Ranma said shaking his head. "I realize that, but that doesn't mean I have to like it. And I still feel that Dorne is going to be a problem."

"Doran and his son Quentyn, possibly, though our holding Arianne, Elia and Nymeria might make them reconsider striking at us. Though if Doran accedes to our demand that he send us the magister's head, that will remove at least part of the problem. And we left his own fate open-ended. If Margaery and Jon decide Oberyn and his mercenaries have done too much damage, they have the naval power to do something about it." Daenerys shrugged. "We did the best we could this far removed considering the threats in the North."

"With him out of the way, the only true schemer that I do here that still out there is Petyr. But Fenris will see to him however long it takes." Ranma smirked evilly, an expression Merry mirrored for a moment.

"We haven't heard anything more from the Westerlands, which concerns me considering we're going to be heading north and be out of touch from the rest of Westeros." Daenerys shook her head worriedly. "I know that travel times mandate a long turnover, but we should still should've heard something from them."

"Not necessarily." Merry said with this shake of her head. "Where would the ravens have gone? Most of the Westerlands houses wouldn't have ravens trained to travel to the Riverlands. Moreover Kevan, from what I remember of him, was always a thoughtful sort of person. He's intelligent, but he's not going to rush to a decision quickly. And he'd be the only one with the Raven that could get to Riverrun, and from Riverrun to the army a messenger would take what, two, three weeks at best?"

"If that." Ranma said with a sigh. "While the Royal Roads might've been able to withstand the pounding of the army's march, the roads we've traveled since marching east from Harrenhal aren't. It's going to be slow going for most anyone that travels that way. In fact Ser Barristan will probably run into trouble heading down towards Duskendale. The road between here and there is good, but not good enough to stand the pounding and the rain it's taken."

With another sigh he stood up, moving over to join them at the table laying a kiss on Merry's neck and shoulder before doing the same to Daenerys. The three of them simply ate for a few moments, talking about nothing in particular just simply enjoying their time together, mostly concentrating on where along her journey Sansa could be, what could possibly be happening down in the Reach, and Jon and his task.

"I might not like her personally," Merry said shaking her head, "but I think that Margaery will handle everything in the Reach well enough. I've heard nothing but good things about Willas long before this all began, and you saw that none of the surviving Reach Lords had any issue with your assumption of authority over them once Lord Mace died, well save those who you exiled. That speaks volumes about their low opinion on him. But we'll need to do something to tie Highgarden into the fold in the future."

"I'll leave that to Jon as well." Ranma said complacently.

Merry looked at him and Daenerys, her eyes narrowing. "Are you two trying to play matchmaker?"

"As much as we can this far removed, possibly." Daenerys replied, smiling slightly. "But it makes good sense. We'll have to think of some Northern Houses to marry your brother's off to Ranma, to further tie the Starks down into the North, since Bran will be the new Lord Paramount of the North, but Jon's hand in marriage is still a card we can use."

"When Bran's of age, yes." Ranma said with a laugh. "Though I think that teaching him politics and anything about land governance is going to be an uphill battle. I'm glad I can leave my father to it."

Both girls laughed, understanding that he was simply stating a simple truth.

With a sigh Ranma leaned back, closing his eyes for a moment before opening them to concentrate on Merry, who was now giggling at something Daenerys had just said that he hadn't heard. He caught Daenerys's eyes, raising an eyebrow and she nodded with a bright smile.

Merry cocked her head at that smile before turning to Ranma, only to squeak when his lips found hers. Her eyes widened in surprise before closing as she melted against him. Daenerys moved behind her, moving her hair aside to gently kiss her neck.

How they got from the table to the bed remained a mystery to Merry for some time, because the next thing she knew she was lying with her back on the bed, with Ranma hovering over her as Daenerys moved in for a kiss of her own. The two women kissed their tongues out and twinning around one another ardently. Ranma worked on the ties of Merry's dress.

Lemon Warning!

As his two loves kissed Ranma finished pulling Merry's dress apart, carefully lifting the younger woman up at the hips so as to pull her dress down from her shoulders, down her body and off her legs before setting it aside. This left her clothed in a silk chemise which Daenerys was already pushing up from her stomach, leaving her lightly tanned skin their bare. The sight of Daenerys' pale hand against the backdrop of Merry's slightly tanned skin was strangely erotic to Ranma, and he leaned in, kissing Daenerys' fingers and the skin of Merry's stomach all around it while more and more skin was revealed.

He took a special moment to look at the scar from the battle at Darry, kissing all around it and then licking lightly at the scar itself. I hope Darry's roasting in hell somewhere, but whatever torment he's facing in the afterlife is a picnic in comparison to what I'd have done to him had he lived! Shaking his head clear of such thoughts Ranma trailed his lips over to Merry's naval.

Merry moaned then giggled a little as he found a ticklish spot, though most of her attention was still on the kiss she was sharing with Daenerys. After a second she pulled away, breathing heavily. "T-this is no dream, is it? I'm not going to wake up and find myself back in Riverrun before the trials am I? This is really happening?"

Daenerys moved from Merry's mouth to one of her earlobes, nibbling at it gently and running her tongue along the edge causing Merry to moan, lifting her body off the bed as she gasped and shuddered. Daenerys had learned long before this that her earlobes were an especially sensitive spot for the younger girl. "This is really happening Merry, and I think you've been a very good girl having to wait so long for our relationship to... climax... shall we say?"

"Oh that is so bad!" Merry laughed, pushing her away slightly with one hand as she groaned, which had nothing to do with Ranma's continuing ministrations, at least at first. That changed abruptly when Ranma completed Daenerys' task of pushing her silk under garment up above her breasts.

He cupped Merry's breasts gently, marveling at the way they fit into his hand. Not having grown much since Ranma had first noticed them on board the ship up to white harbor, Merry's breasts were smaller than Daenerys', which more than a handful. But both girls' breasts were firm, perky, malleable to the touch and incredibly sensitive. Daenerys' nipples were a pale pink. Merry had surprisingly bright red nipples, which just begged to be sucked.

Never being one to question such things at a moment like this Ranma leaned down, whispering "I love you Merry" before taking one of her nipples into his mouth. He sucked gently at first, causing Merry to moan, bringing one hand up to fist into his hair while the other was busy holding Daenerys' head in place as the two girls resumed kissing.

The two broke off for a moment and Merry moaned aloud "I love you, both of you Seven help me, I love you both so much!"

Daenerys' smiled, her own hand joining Merry's on top of Ranma's for a moment before joining its fellow in pulling her own dress over her head before Daenerys tossed it to the side, shaking out her hair a luxuriant platinum cascade for a moment before she leaned down. Pressing her forehead against Merry's she looked into the other girl's brilliant green eyes, her own violet ones brimming with love and desire. "And we love you. We may never be able to say it public, we may never be able to marry you in front of the Old Gods or the Seven, but we are married Merry."

"Amen!" Ranma mumbled, pulling away from Merry's now distended and glistening nipple. "The three of us are a perfect triangle! Let no man, woman or god come between us." As the two girls began to kiss once more, Ranma leaned back, getting onto his knees for a moment while pulling off his shirt, then turned slightly to sit on the edge of the bed pulling off his pants kicking them aside before turning back to the action.

In those brief few seconds Merry had pulled Daenerys' underthings aside and pulled off her own silk chemise leaving both girls only clad in their panties. Ranma nearly growled, his ardor rising at the sight of the two girls. Their upper bodies pressed against one another, their breasts rubbing against one another while they kissed, Daenerys' rear waving in the air above Merry as Merry writhed under Daenerys' attentions. A wet spot was growing on Daenerys' panties, showing how much she was enjoying this.

Ranma leaned in running his tongue over that wet spot causing Daenerys to lift her head from Merry's mouth crying out "Ranma!" Then she said it again in a far different tone of voice when Ranma gripped the side of her panties and ripped it off rather than pulling them down her legs. "Ranma! That was my favorite pair!"

"I'll get you a new favorite pair." Ranma said with a laugh, beginning to use his fingers on Daenerys' already drenched slit.

Daenerys moaned, shuffling forward slightly to get away from Ranma's touch, turning around and reaching forward to grab Ranma and pull him into a kiss which was mostly tongue. Below them Merry watched this one hand gently kneading her breasts while the other went down to her panties, pushing them slowly down her legs. She wasn't surprised to find that her own panties were almost drenched, the anticipation of this moment, the foreplay that they had just been doing, and the sight above her all combining to overwhelm the, at least in this area, innocent girl.

Ranma broke off the kiss with the Daenerys to lean down to kiss Merry in turn, while one hand gently stroked down Daenerys' back before gripping her small but very pliable rear. Daenerys smiled watching the two, grabbing Ranma's hand and moving it around her thigh so he could get to work again on her sit. She laid down next to Merry, looking one leg over the other girls, leaning in to kiss and knead her breasts.

She had never done this before, and found that having another girl's nipple in her mouth was strangely arousing, as was the moaning coming from Merry. Merry broke her kiss with Ranma, moaning "Daenerys, Daenerys! That feels so goo..." she broke off into a louder moan when Ranma pulled off her panties and one finger gently stroked down her glistening wet petals.

Daenerys briefly lifted her head off of Merry's nipple, licking it sensuously for a second before saying, "In the bedroom Merry, you can call me Dae." When the younger girl's eyes locked on hers she winked. "But only in the bedroom if you please."

Merry laughed. "Dae, I like that!"

"I came up with that at Moat Cailin, was trying to find a nickname for Daenerys that she liked." Ranma said rather proudly, while he leaned back slightly, turning around again to kick off his underwear.

When he turned back, Merry couldn't stop herself from staring. Not even Daenerys' continued ministrations on her breasts or the fact that Ranma had gone back to fingering the both of them could take her attention away. She had heard Daenerys and Ranma make love several times and had heard of Dae exclaim about how big Ranma was, but that was a very different thing from actually seeing Ranma's penis for the first time. It was a little intimidating frankly. "That's supposed to go inside of me?"

She didn't realize that she had spoken aloud until Ranma reached down, gently cupping her face and kissing her nose and forehead. "It's supposed to but I promise I'll be as gentle as I can. If you don't want that to happen just yet that's fine. Nothing will happen tonight that you don't want Merry. I love you, the last thing I want to do is hurt you or pressure you in any way."

Merry nodded, but didn't reply either way, simply staring at Ranma's cock before Daenerys turned her head away slightly to lean in for a kiss. That took Merry's thoughts off of her fears, and she returned the kiss ardently, before pushing Daenerys away pulling the other girl up the bed enough so that Merry could work on her breasts for a change, leaning to the side over them and nibbling and sucking at Daenerys pale white skin before latching onto her light pink nipple.

"Oooohhh that feels, feel's good! Very different from you Ranma, but just as goood!" Daenerys moaned, each word coming out breathy and drawn out.

Ranma laughed, leaning down to work on Merry's breasts once more as his fingers continued to work on both women. Moving his body to the side so that now he was laying within Daenerys' legs he rubbed his now achingly hard shaft against Daenerys' core.

She broke off moaning long enough to look up at him, and nodded, before leaning down to kiss Merry's Forehead. "Watch Merry." She whispered, her voice a sensual purr. "Watch."

Merry did so, her eyes slightly wide as Ranma slowly sheathed himself inside of Daenerys, throwing his head back with a low moan that was the most animal-like yet arousing sound Merry had ever heard, making all of her attempts to overhear their love making pale in comparison. The sight of Ranma's toned, lean body beginning to move over Daenerys' own gorgeously proportioned and pale one was also erotic in the extreme.

Both of Merry's hands moved down to join where Ranma was still gently fingering her core, two fingers joining his own in thrusting in and out of her flower as she threw her head back into a moan. But still her eyes were wide open staring at the sight before her.

Looking at his ladies sprawled there on the bed with Daenerys gently kissing Merry's neck and shoulder as she moaned at his ministrations, with Merry simply washing Ranma piston in and out of Daenerys core he once more noted their different skin colors. Daenerys was pale, the pale of genetics rather than lack of sun. She had never tanned in Essos, and her skin color hadn't changed at all when they went north. Merry's in contrast was slightly darker in tone.

In order to better control himself Ranma closed his eyes, his body now on automatic as he tried to concentrate on other things lest he lose control and end this moment with Daenerys too quickly. They hadn't been able to get together on the campaign since Riverrun after all, and Ranma had found his self-control in this area decreased swiftly. His thoughts rather naturally turned to all the moments the three of them had shared, both Ranma with Daenerys of Merry and all three together.

The first time Ranma and Merry met: how she had seemed a bright yet unloved child. The times they'd shared on the trip down to Kings Landing as he told her and Tommen tales. The amusement Ranma had when Merry decided to feud with Margaery over his affections despite at the time being rather embarrassed by it and her crush on him, not realizing that a crush could grow into something more. The kiss they had shared when he was under the influence of whatever it had been at the tournament.

That first moment when Ranma met Daenerys stood out sharply in his mind. How fierce she had been, how strong she had seemed, simply standing there her clothing burned to ash on her body as she held the two dragons eggs, fierce and unbowed. That first morning on the ship when Ranma had described how to put on a proper hidden dagger, the times he helped Daenerys train her little ones, when they discussed politics, when they simply sat and looked out over the ocean.

The laughter, the discussions, and the jokes they had shared before he had to leave, and his joy at seeing Merry on the ship with his father, when he realized that she had been the one to save his life. The moment later on when he realized that Merry was becoming a woman. The flirting, the discussions of the future, Daenerys and him growing closer, their eyes meeting and being lost in one another as they danced, his proposal and her joyful acceptance.

His and Daenerys' first night together and every night since. The moments Daenerys, Merry and he had shared on the campaign, all three of them growing closer, Ranma seeing the two of them laughing and talking, hugging occasionally, sharing a horse as Merry leaned against Daenerys' back while her arms were around the taller woman's waist.

The realization that he had come to love her in Riverrun, the moment he learned that Daenerys had too. All of those moments passed through Ranma's mind and he kissed them both on their foreheads, unable to put into words what he was feeling right now.

Daenerys pulled away from kissing Merry, throwing her head back and moaning loudly "Raaanma!" as she climaxed. But Ranma didn't stop his thrusts, simply varying their tempo occasionally, driving her to multiple small orgasms one after another.

Moments passed like this, with Merry also orgasming from her own fingers and Ranma's and he began to lose control. He thrust harder, faster into Daenerys, with Daenerys eagerly lifting her hips off the bed meeting him thrust for thrust. "Love you, Dae, Merry, love you both!" Ranma moaned leaning down to kiss first Merry then Daenerys as his hips spasmed cuming hard,, sending his seed deep into Daenerys' womb.

He collapsed boneless on top of Dae for a moment, simply breathing in the scent of her sweat and whatever Dae put in her hair as he recovered from his exertions. He raised his head however to look at Merry as she, sweating and gasping from her own release, started to giggle. "What?"

Merry shook her head, leaning over and running her hands down his back to his rear gripping it for a moment before coming back and pushing into his hair. She pulled her hand away, showing that it was glistening with his sweat. "You're sweating! It's just, I've seen you march or run all day, train with the troops and you never really seemed to sweat, but you're sweating now. It just struck me as funny for some reason."

"I take that as a compliment," Daenerys said archly, pushing Ranma slightly off of her body for a moment, so that she could turn to give Merry a gentle kiss.

Ranma shook his head with a laugh, pulling out of Daenerys gently causing her to moan in something between pleasure and displeasure. Merry watched avidly as Ranma pulled his shaft out of Daenerys, causing a small flood of cum to escape as he did. He was still hard however, and he looked at Merry, leaning down so that their foreheads were touching. He looked into her eyes, a gentle smile on his face. "Yes?"

Merry understood what he was asking and with her body still flushed with endorphins from her recent orgasm, her fear had been swept away. "Yes."

She opened her legs wider, and Ranma moved over until he was kneeling directly between them. Merry licked her lips as she stared down at Ranma's cock, making a note to herself to try it out as Daenerys had once described. At the time it had not sounded very appealing, but seeing it glistening with both Dae's and Ranma's juices it did.

"Just lie back and try to relax." Daenerys said into her ear, one hand gently stroking Merry's hair while the other trailed down her body pausing for a moment to play with her nipples before heading downward again, stopping at the small little hood directly above her slit. When Daenerys began to flick it lightly Merry lifted her hips off the bed, moaning aloud her name. "Dae, don't tease!"

Ranma gently laid his cock along Merry's slit laughing quietly. "I think that's going to become a kind of inside joke isn't it?" Both girls actually giggled at that, though Merry broke off into a low animal like moan as Ranma and gently eased the tip of his cock into her. He paused for a moment watching her, but she didn't seem to be in pain, and he slowly inserted more and more of his shaft into her glistening slit.

Once or twice he stopped when Merry winced. But she was so stimulated right now, with Daenerys continuing to stroke her clitoris and her previous orgasm that the pain didn't really register for long. Each time pain was quickly overwhelmed by pleasure, and she urged Ranma on. "More, I can take it now, more Ranma!"

Soon however he came to a barrier, and stopped, looking at Merry. She nodded, and he leaned down kissing her gently, though the gentleness ended when Merry thrust her tongue into his mouth lifting her hips slightly off the bed at the same time, wrapping her legs around him. It wasn't enough for her hymen to break, but it was certainly enough to break Ranma's self-control, and he thrust forward before he could stop himself, bursting through that final barrier with all the subtlety of a battering ram.

"NNFF!" Merry moaned in pain for a moment into Ranma's mouth, but she did not stop kissing him. Soon the pain of that final barrier breaking turned to pleasure and she thrust her hips up again at Ranma giving him the hint that he should keep going.

The two of them continued their liplock while Daenerys kissed both of their necks and shoulders, breaking off after a moment to kiss Daenerys in turn. Merry began to work on the other girl's breasts while Ranma did the same, one hand lifting from the Merry's waist to start to finger Daenerys once more, making squishy noises as he played with her recently filled quim.

This time Ranma couldn't last as long. Merry was tight, as tight as Daenerys had been their first time, and the sight of the two girls below him, with Merry licking and sucking at Daenerys' nipples also had an effect on his self-control. Merry's continual cry of "harder, faster, love you Ranma!" did not help at all either.

At the same time Daenerys wailed her way to another orgasm from his fingers and Merry's work on her breasts Ranma leaned down, pulling Merry away from Daenerys' nipples for moment to kiss her hard on the lips. Dominating the kiss from the get-go, his tongue thrusting into her mouth, his hips went into overdrive thrusting into her core.

Merry's legs tightened around him, and she screamed into his mouth as she came again, the rippling this caused in her core breaking through his last vestige of endurance. He thrust inside one last time, moaning into her mouth "Merrrrrry!" As he came. The younger woman shook with aftershocks as Ranma came inside of her, feeling the warmth of it, the strange full sensation, before her legs unlocked and fell limply back to the bed.

Ranma rolled over, coming to rest on Merry's other side as Daenerys laughed quietly, kissing Merry on the neck and ear for a second. "Are you still with us Merry?"

"Ruined..." Merry muttered, "Loved every minute of it, but completely ruined!"

Ranma laughed quietly, leaning down to kiss her gently this time. "And we love you." Then he leaned back, a wicked smirk on his face as Daenerys leaned down in turn to kiss her before kissing Ranma as they both looked down at Merry. "But you don't think we're already done, do you?"

Merry looked up at them both, and all she could think of to say was, "Oh my." But her arms were moving without any input from her brain, pulling them both down to her.

End Lemon

Two turns of the candle later looking down at both girls, who were fading into unconsciousness as he watched, Ranma groaned under his throat, just realizing that if Myrcella was here he could not be. We could come up with an excuse for Merry's presence in our bed for an evening, but not if I'm here too. I hate having to hide this! Dammit, I love her just as much as Daenerys does, just as much as we love each other! But we can't show it to the public, even with Merry no longer being able to marry it would be a very bad move socially. Especially considering that one of the first things the septon's council will ask us to do will be to remove that damn law that Joffrey passed about polygamy being allowed in the Royal house.

With that in mind Ranma moved over to the suite's bathroom, where a bath had been filled with water which had long since gone cold of course. He washed himself off putting on his clothing and exiting the room quickly. Down the hallway he found Ser Barristan standing guard at the stairwell heading down.

The knight turned to him, one eyebrow raised and Ranma shrugged theatrically. "I've been kicked out. Apparently Daenerys and Merry wants to have some 'lady's only' time, don't ask me what that's about."

Barristan laughed, though he didn't believe Ranma for a moment. He had suspected for a while that the former princess had fallen in love with Ranma and Daenerys, and was honestly happy for all three of them. They worked so well together, it seemed only natural that they make that union 'official'. Of course that wouldn't matter to the public or to the Faith of the Seven, so he decided to run with Ranma's excuse.

"Best not to inquire my Lord." He shuddered theatrically shaking his head. "I remember when Elia and the Queen would have such discussions. They were remarkably close despite their age gap, and what they talked about, well it would make a hardened soldier blush."

"Should I be worried that are trying to gang up on me or something?" Ranma asked, going with it. It would make a good cover if it got about anyway, which it probably would considering that there were still servants about even this late at night.

"Probably not, though the secrets of your bedroom escapades might no longer be secrets."

"Joy," Ranma groaned, shaking his head.

Ser Barristan laughed again then both men turned as they heard a clanking sound of someone in armor coming up the stairs. A moment later Daryn came into view, his face grimmer than his still wounded leg would allow for. "Ranma a messenger just came in from Riverrun. He says he took a boat from Riverrun, and he must've pushed it badly, because he looks half dead."

He shook his head. "But there's something more, something is riding the man, he's frightened, more frightened than most anyone I've ever seen before." Ehiric is with him now, trying to calm the man down. He asked for a septon immediately upon arriving."

"Shiiiiit..." Ranma scowled. "There's only one thing I can think of that would scare someone that much."

"That's what I thought too." Daryn replied grimly.

A moment later the two men left Ser Barristan guarding the stairwell, hurrying downstairs to where they found the messenger, somewhat calmer than Daryn said he had been, but still pale faced and shaking as he gulped down wine and spoke quietly to the septon. He stood up, spilling his wine all over his trousers but he didn't seem to notice as he bowed quickly to Ranma. "Your Majesty, a message came from Winterfell. Maester Vyman opened it, and shared it with the town council and with me in case I lost the message he gave me to pass on to you. It, it's..."

Ranma held up a hand that held it out taking the message from the man. "I probably know what it says already Ser, and regardless your speed and dedication to duty does you credit. Now get back to drinking and put some real food in you."

With that said Ranma opened the message, tilting it slightly so that Daryn could read it, while behind him the rest of the Wolfsworn, marched in or limped in as the case may be. He read it silently, then looked at Daryn who looked back before turning to the others. "The White Walkers've gotten around the Wall, and we can't get it to the north in time to stop them where they are. Get Rickard up here." Ranma ordered looking over at a guard on the door. "He needs to be told. Smalljon get your father up as well."

Once gathered the two northern lords were told what was occurring, and both of them paled slightly with Rickard paling significantly more than Greatjon. Greatjon simply shrugged after a moment. "Last Hearth'll hold, I know we've got some dragonglass weapons in the armory, and our positions defensible enough." He looked sympathetically at Rickard.

"My son will do his duty." Rickard said stoically, only his eyes showing his growing concern and fear. "But we must head north as quickly as possible!"

"We already were doing that Rickard," said Ranma calmly. "The army's already begun embarking. That process will continue through the night and all through tomorrow." Ranma thought for a moment then stiffened his shoulders, throwing back his head. "But I won't be with it."

"Ranma?" Rickard asked, frowning heavily. "I realize that 'politically'" he said, spitting that word, "you should probably stay here in the south to ride herd on everything going on here but..."

"No, my duty is in the North uncle, and you know it." Ranma said smirking at Rickard sighed visibly relieved. "I simply said I wouldn't be with the army, not that I wouldn't be in the North. I'm going to leave within the hour, and I'm going up to Winterfell."

For a moment none of the Lords understood what Ranma was saying, then Dacey said, "You can't be serious Ranma, Winterfell is months away! It'll be faster to go by sea."

"For the army yes, not for me. At the pace I can go alone, I'll get there long before this army reaches White Harbor."

The Wolfsworn shared glances, most of them angry ones. With their injuries, they couldn't move nearly as fast as they had when they marched on the Golden Tooth, and all of them realized that even that speed had been slower than Ranma, Jon and Arya could move with their direwolves. And whereas most kings' safety would've been an issue, with Ranma it most certainly wasn't.

"You think the White Walkers will march on Winterfell right off?" Greatjon asked after a moment.

"If I was the white walkers, I would make for White Harbor, Moat Cailin and the Wall." Ranma said firmly. "If they can take and hold the Wall, they can bring their forces directly down via the land, they wouldn't have to worry about holding Skagos, no matter how they got to it. Retaking the Wall would be incredibly hard." But I hope my father's thinking about Bear Island as well, he thought to himself, not wanting to alarm Dacey at the moment, she looked angry enough to bite nails already without that worry.

"They're not human, they won't think in terms of cutting the North off from further reinforcements or any other human idea, at least I don't think so." Roger said his voice calm, but his eyes a little wild. Now that it came to it, Roger was not looking forward to crossing blades with the wights once more. That, and his son was in the North as well, his newly born son who had held in his hands for a bare few weeks before having to leave for the conclave and Winterfell.

Daryn was facing similar issues. The last time they'd had a message from the North, his wife, a wife he had barely a few days with before being forced to march off to war, was getting ready to give birth. Hornwood and The Rills were strong, but to defend against the White Walkers?

"That's why I think they'll make for Winterfell if they can. I don't know how they remember things, but I'm certain they know that Winterfell is the center of the North, and one of the most defensible castles as well. You could siege Winterfell forever and never break in, plus I bet Bran the Builder put in some magic in Winterfell's walls."

"Get Davos and Jason in here." Ranma ordered. "Go over the schedule for embarkation, think of any way you can speed it up. Break up the Royal Navy into groups maybe, sending the ships off piece by piece? Any portion of the army we can get into the North quickly, we need to do! I'll leave that to you my lords, I need to leave within the hour as I said, and I have to tell my wife what has occurred."

"Better you than me." Hathan murmured shaking his head and tugging at his goatee thoughtfully. "Much better that you than me."

When Ranma entered their room, his two wives were where Ranma had left them splayed out on the bed, sweat along with various other juices slowly cooling on their bodies. At the sight Ranma shook his head moving quietly through the bedroom into the bathroom. There he found a towel, wet it in the bathtub water and came back, slowly cleaning the two women. As he had hoped this act woke them both up, though Merry fell asleep again almost immediately. The younger girl was utterly exhausted, not having built up the endurance to this kind of exercise that Daenerys had.

Daenerys however was awake enough to frown slightly. Ranma did do this occasionally, but he shouldn't even be here at all, her muzzled mind thought, looking over at Merry. That realization woke her up enough to notice that despite the tenderness Ranma was showing his current task he was frowning. "What's wrong?"

"News came from Riverrun." Ranma replied grimly. "A raven arrived from Winterfell. The White Walkers have found a way around the wall, apparently Theon ran into them on Skagos. They've taken the island entirely, though he survived thank the Old Gods." As Daenerys' eyes widened Ranma went on, detailing some of the information sent and that and send down to Riverrun specially.

By the time he finished speaking Merry was awake if still groggy and without any kind of energy. She laid her head on Daenerys' thigh, staring at Ranma as he finished cleaning her body, shuddering slightly as the towel gently caressed her sensitive parts. Yet to say that Daenerys and Merry took the news that he was going to rush off poorly was an understatement of epic proportions. "Ranma as strong as you are, what do you think you'll be able to do alone?"

"I won't be alone, I'll probably catch up with Timot and the forces under him traveling through the Neck."

"Don't give me that!" Daenerys ordered shaking her head. "You won't stay with that army, it'll move much slower than you will alone, you'll just go racing off again."

"One man alone can do a lot in the right place," Ranma replied quietly taking her hands and kissing them lightly as he stared from her eyes to Merry's. "I have to go. This was why I was brought here! Not the war we've already fought, not the changes we've begun to make to Westeros. Those are side benefits. This, facing the forces of the Great Enemy, is why I'm here. I need to go. The army might not reach the North before the deadline, but I might be able to."

Daenerys stared into his eyes, seeing the honest belief of that there and finally she sighed pulling her hands away with a nod. "Go." She said, then reached forward quickly grabbing him by the ears and pulling him into a kiss that went on for several moments until she had to break it in order to breathe. "Go." she ordered again. But stay safe until we see you again, my love."

"In one piece if you please Ranma." Merry said reaching up to take Ranma by his hair and pulled him down into an equally ardent kiss. "Please."

Ranma nodded at them both. "I will, I promise I will see you both in Winterfell my loves." With that he kissed the pair of them, then walked out the door while the two women turned and began to aid one another in finding their underthings and dresses. Moments later Ranma raced out of the keep, through the town and out into the lands beyond, picking up speed and racing through the night, following the shoreline towards Harroway and the Kingsroad.

OOOOOO

"I still say we should have fled my love. That was an order that came directly from Eddard Stark! I know you think we can hold out here but..." The speaker was a dirty-blond haired woman, with something in her shoulders and eyes that told of Flint heritage, but you had to look hard to see it. She was currently sitting up in bed, looking down at her husband, her face twisted in concern.

"Oh hush Moira," said Laris Stonegate. "If we leave, we stand to lose everything we've gained since The Leech overstepped himself." He shook his head. "Just you wait, when our grandsons come around our house will've risen to masterly status! A generation later, we'll be a great house!"

Laris Stonegate was a typical Northman, stubborn, honorable and unyielding and most of the time those traits served him and his family well here on the hard scrabble land of the North. He had been a minor lord beholden to House Bolton, and he had enriched himself since that House's fall. Many more prominent minor lords had reacted poorly to their overlord's fall, leaving Laris to gather up more lands and smallfolk to his own name, even when the minor and great Houses of Bolton's neighbors had split up Bolton's land between them. While Marsh, Bloodtaker and Redflag acted out and were destroyed for it, Laris kept his head down, quietly acquiring the land of his neighbors. Farmers, woodsmen, and one small quarry and the smallfolk working it were now under his family's control.

But while Laris might have enriched his house greatly in the past few years that was a pittance to what he hoped to achieve in time. He knew there was really too much land and certainly too much distance between the seats of Hornwood, UMBER, and Karstark to be left without an overlord forever. That was why he and the other few surviving minor Houses had been left to their own devices since. But that couldn't last for more than a few generations before Lord Stark recognized the difficulty, and put a Masterly house above them the better to control and defend those lands.

"That's only if we're here to see it." Moira, Laris' wife, replied tartly. "Which we might not be if all the stories from further north are true."

"Lord Stark's jumping at shadows. He's right to do so if there's even a hint of trouble, but that doesn't mean that we have to leave all I've gained here! Look," he said, reaching over to kiss her hand lightly. "You know we've put up that outer palisade and our house has the special stone fall above the gate! There is nothing that can get through that, and they can't climb up onto the roof so long as we man the defenses."

"I hope you're right." Moira said, but then leaned in and kissed him again on the cheek. Laris smiled, wrapping his muscular arms around her pulling her back down on the bed.

Outside it was still daylight, because despite his confidence Laris was not a fool. He knew the White Walkers always attacked at night so he stayed up at night, while his sons were in charge during the day.

However, he was wrong. The White Walkers might prefer to attack at night, but they were perfectly capable of sending out their wights and other forces during the day. This was why Laris was roused from sleep by the sound of a gong going off elsewhere in his holdfast sometime later.

Laris pushed Moira off his chest, rolling out of bed and grabbing up leather breeches and undershirts. Maybe in the South someone could've simply pulled on their armor and rushed out, but here in the North, even during summer that would be an incredibly bad idea. Now that full winter had come, Laris knew he'd be facing frostbite or worse if he ran out there undressed. It took him some time to pull on his fur leggings, shirt, armor and cloak as well as the heavy gloves his wife had made him several years ago.

By the time he was dressed, his wife had also thrown on her heavy dress, pulling out a short sword and nodding at him as she moved to the doorway. Laris nodded back, rushing out past her and up the stairs. He knew she would check on their two youngest, both girls aged 12 and 10, before taking control of the servants and smallfolk who were not part of the defense. Laris himself raced to join sons, twins of 19, unmarried at the moment though he had hopes, up on the roof of the holdfast.

The Stonegate family's holdfast was a large affair of stone, shaped like a long capital 'I' three stories tall, with heavy ramparts set all along the roof. Around this Laris and his men had raised a wooden palisade in a circle, portions of which were backed with stone from the quarry, though not as much as he could have hoped. Many of his own smallfolk had fled further south when Lord Stark's orders had spread, cutting into his workforce.

He was left with around 60 armsmen, most of whom were on the roof were on the palisade as he bolted up the stairwell to join those on the roof, and another two-hundred smallfolk men, most of whom were at least partly trained archers. As he smashed the trapdoor open, Laris bellowed, "Christian, what are we dealing with?"

Christian was his oldest son by a few seconds and the one in charge during the day technically, though he and his twin Carson tended to split the duty. "We're under attack father, from all sides too!" Christian said, from where he was kneeling behind the parapet, arrow on his bow as he fired rapidly out against...

For a moment Laris' breath left his body and he stared disbelievingly. I didn't believe it, I really thought Lord Stark was jumping at nothing. I should've known better.

What was attacking them wasn't an army of humans, bandits or even wildlings, though at first they look enough like humans to confuse the eyes slightly. It was only when you noticed that they weren't wearing heavy clothing despite the cold, that many of them looked like children and women, and that many of them seemed to suffer from a case of being dead, chunks missing here and there, that you realized what they really were. "Wights." He breathed out, shaking it his head. "Wights like in the old tales!"

They charged silently through the snow, moving as easily as a man would over grass despite the fact that Laris knew there was at least 2 feet of snow out there. And all of them, regardless of apparent age, held a weapon. These ranged from swords of various varieties to hoes, spears and anything else under the sun.

"Arrows don't do anything!" came a shout from the palisade. "We're not slowing them!"

Even as that shout went up the first of the wights reached the palisade, then began to climb up it with their hands, only to be thrown back by many of the smallfolk who had joined Stonegate's family in their holdfast. They thrust spears down at them from the top of the palisade as their fellows tried futilely to kill the wights with their normal arrows.

But the wights didn't simply take this. Laris watched in horror as one man was pulled over the palisade by several wights grabbing his spear point. His scream cut out abruptly when his throat was torn out by a random wight below the wall.

Behind Laris Carson came up out of the holdfast leading up a batch of men carrying bushels of fire arrows. He distributed them quickly, with the men lighting them from the braziers set on the roof. "Fire when ready!" Laris bellowed, nodding proudly at his son before grabbing up a bow of his own.

The fire arrows lanced out, slamming into targets here and there in the horde that was trying to scabble over the palisade. The wights screamed as those arrows hit, letting loose the first noises they'd made since the battle began. They even retreated here and there from their fellows as those hit by the arrows went up in flames quickly, something in their undead status making them even more flammable than humans normally were. More like a human dipped in tar, Laris thought morbidly as he watched this.

But it wasn't going to be enough to keep control of the palisade, and Laris knew it, not against the numbers of undead hiding along the wall from fire coming from the holdfast's roof. As he watched two more spear-wielders were pulled off the wall and killed, and he saw a wight's hand grabbing the top of the palisade for a moment before an archer used a knife to hack it's fingers off, the wight falling to the ground below.

He moved to the front of the 'I' directly above the doorway into the holdfast, cupping his hands over his mouth to be heard above the clamor of battle. "Fall back! Fall back to the holdfast!"

Even as he did so here and there the wights had pulled themselves up the one story side of the palisade, despite the best efforts of the defenders. Laris turned to Duncan, his face set in grim lines. "Let down some of the rope, then get downstairs and tell your mother to set off the rock fall."

Duncan's eyes widened, but looking at the battle raging outside the palisade nodded his head. "Yes father." With that he was gone, racing along the wall and ordering men to throw down clumps of rope before heading down into the holdfast once more.

Several other men came up with more bushels of fire arrows and the battle continued unabated for several moments while the men from the palisade retreated quickly, more than half of them being pulled to their deaths by the wights before they could fall back. Laris joined the archers firing as well as he could, only to stop and stare for moment.

There on the palisade, a man Laris had seen be gutted by a wight mere moments ago was getting to his feet! They're not supposed to be turned that fast! No stories ever said that wights rose that quickly!

Below he heard a thunderous series of booms, and he smiled grimly. At least they won't be getting in from that direction.

The stragglers of the wall pulled themselves up the ropes from the rooftop, then were forced to turn quickly with spears thrust into their hands by their fellows to keep a few of the undead from following them up the rope. The ropes were chopped in half, leaving the wights who had been trying to climb up them to fall back, scrabbling at the stone of the holdfast.

"That's the way lads!" Laris said moving around the roof, slapping men on the shoulder here and there and shouting words of encouragement as Christian did the same. "Let them scrabble and tried to climb up the walls, there's no give anywhere in them! They'll have to climb over the bodies of their own dead to get up here!" Inside however Laris was wondering if they would do that exact thing, and was very frightened they might.

Despite that pessimism Laris knew his family's holdfast was made very well, with no chinks in the stonework or easy handholds on its wall. With that and the stone fall blocking any wights from coming through the main doors, he hoped they'd be able to hold out until help arrived. How long that would be Laris didn't know, but Laris made a mental note to talk to his wife about starting to ration their food immediately.

Snow began to fall then, obscuring the sunlight, hard and heavy. But the defenders were still able to see clearly enough to target the wights nearest the foot of the holdfast. "Husband the fire arrows," Laris ordered. "We've only got so many of them prepared."

That order was quickly passed around the roof, but torches were easier to make them fire arrows, and some enterprising man headed down into the holdfast, returning quickly with several dozen torches, tossing a lit one down on a large group of wights gathered by a corner of the holdfast, trying to scrabble up its face. "Good lad." Laris bellowed. "That's the way!"

That brief boost in morae disappeared however when suddenly arrows began to fall among them, killing several men. "What?" Laris exclaimed. "Where is that coming from?"

"From the palisade, some wights are on the palisade and they're shooting at us!" Christian roared back from where he was at the back of the 'I'.

The old stories never said that the wights were dexterous enough to use bows! Laris snarled internally.

And yet here they were using them, already taking a toll of his men. The roof's ramparts was good cover, but not that good, certainly not good enough to deal with an arrow storm like what was coming at them from all sides. The wights weren't aiming for the defenders, they were simply shooting large amounts of arrows from all around from the palisade up at the holdfast.

"Duncan!" Laris bellowed, gesturing to his son to join him. "Grab as many of the fire arrows as you can, start at the front, then work your way around. Don't aim for the wights down below, aim for where the palisade is! Let's see if we can set it alight!"

"That's mostly green wood father, I don't think we'll be able to."

"Then we'll at least kill some of those archers! Do it." Laris ordered, cuffing his son upside the head. The youth nodded, racing off and Laris turned back, grabbing up his bow and firing blindly towards the palisade. The snow was so bad now, he couldn't even see the palisade from where he was standing here, and that was only around 200 feet from the edge of the roof.

Fire arrows shot out in bunches from the roof while Duncan and his men moved around the wall, and Laris took stock of the battle. He was appalled to note that there were only about 62 defenders left on the wall, and most of them were with Duncan moving around it now firing at the palisade. We lost that many men already!? That meant he had lost the equivalent of every man that manned the palisade at the start of the battle. And it isn't even night yet...

Still, if we can set that palisade on fire, we'll get some time to rest and restock our fire arrows. I doubt the wights inside the palisade will be able to stick around once that large a fire gets going behind them, they'll break for the areas that haven't been set alight yet. And without the palisade, they won't be able to fire up at us so easily which means they won't be able to use that arrow storm against us again.

But the palisade didn't burn, fires here and there began in the wood but the wood was indeed green, and it was so cold out and the snow falling so thickly that the fires sputtered rather than spread. Suddenly there was a loud crash, and a shout went up from the defenders along the back of the holdfast's roof. "The palisade's gate is down!"

It was only then that Laris realized that the gate hadn't fallen before, after all why would it considering the fact that the wights had been able to climb up the outer wall so adroitly. He wondered why they were opening it now, but got his answer as another shout went up. "Old Gods save us, there's hundreds of them!"

"Duncan!" Laris bellowed, racing that way along the roof. "All archers, follow me!"

Duncan and his men obeyed with alacrity, firing arrows as they reached the edge of the roof down into the massive horde of wights that had just burst through the outer gate. Laris gaped again, watching as a dozen wights led the charge carrying ladders! They're not supposed to be that smart!

But it wasn't the wights that were smart, not really. Wights were dead, as simple as that, reanimated through fell magic beyond the understanding of men. But the White Walkers were now on this side of the wall, and at the moment, this battle was the only one calling for the White Walkers wizards' attention.

The fire arrows broke up the wight horde's charge, but they couldn't stop it. There was now so much snow that when a wight's body fell it was almost immediately smothered by the snow, so fires couldn't spread among the undead ranks. Worse, the archers from the palisade were still firing, still causing casualties among the defenders.

We're losing, he thought to himself, though he did not, would never, say it aloud. We're losing, and there's nothing I can do about it!

Laris jumped forward, joining several other men to push a ladder away from the wall, then running over to the next grabbing his greatsword from his back and hacking and a wight who had just made it up the wall, wielding a halberd of all things, which it had used to slay farmer thrusting down with a spear. Idly, Laris wondered how the thing had been able to climb up a ladder with that, but he didn't let that thought take up too much of his time, instead hacking it to pieces, its head coming off like a shuttlecock, his back swing cutting the thing's arms off.

For a moment it was all he could do to concentrate on the fight directly in front of him, but he did pause between blows when he heard a distant slamming crash. Though when it didn't continue, he turned his attention back to trying to throw the wights off the roof. He cut down several undead, hacking at their bodies with his greatsword. All around him his armymen did the same, much more at home with this kind of combat than with archery, though the archers from the palisade were still taking a toll on their men. Though Laris didn't know it, he had lost several dozen men already.

He realized this when he heard Christian's voice. "Aghh, the dead, theeegghh!"

Laris turned his head, seeing Christian born to earth by several men who had been struck by arrows. They had come back almost immediately as wights, killing his son and several other men before they realized what was going on.

Screaming in fury Laris charged forward with Duncan, hacking and slashing at the wights who had so recently been their armymen. With those men rising as wights however, the battle on the rooftop was finished. Eventually the two Stonegate men realized this and Laris shouted, "Pull back! We'll close the inner door against them, we can pile up furniture against it or something, but pull ba..."

His thoughts trailed off as men began to come up from below. But these were not just some of the servants or smallfolk who had not joined the defense, but the women and among them were his wife and two daughters. But they weren't coming to help, no. Here and there on their bodies were what were obviously mortal wounds. His lovely wife Moira was missing half of her face. His daughters, the jewels of his life, had their throats slit, possibly by their mother as a last ditch effort to save them from the horror they were now experiencing.

"How?" he said to himself even as Duncan noticed what was coming up from behind them and began to wail aloud in horror. "How did they get through the rockfall?"

The rockfall was a specially designed segment of the roof directly above the heavy oak door into the holdfast. It was made so that when a special capstone was removed from the floor of the second level, the entire roof of the room above the gate would collapse down, blocking the gate entirely. It wasn't perfect, but it would have put several hundred pounds worth of stone in front of the gate, which should have been enough to keep out any battering ram manned by humans.

But it had not withstood the sheer weight of numbers that the wights were able to pile against it. The wights had taken a second battering ram, lashing it to the fist on perpendicular to the first. This allowed them to put more men on the ram, and eventually thrust their way through the rocks.

I was wrong, I was wrong and I was arrogant, and my arrogance killed us all. Laris thought, ignoring the rest of the fight as he stared at his wife and children as they came towards him with glowing blue eyes, dropping his greatsword to the rooftop with a clang. Death, when it came was a mercy after that.

OOOOOOO

The Last Hearth was not called that because it was the seat of the most northern Great House. It was called the Last Hearth because it had been there almost as long as Winterfell, as had House Umber. And like their liege lords, House Umber had never thrown much of anything away something Hother Whoresbane was very happy for. While they didn't have many arrowheads of dragonglass, they had several hundred daggers, and they had the Last Hearth itself.

Stone walls defended a central keep of equally heavy, if inelegant design, which was a bare few feet taller than the walls themselves, with a simple square roof and no ornamentation. Those walls were four stories tall and fifty feet thick, with their feet noticeably thicker than their parapets, with several squat towers scattered here and there. It also had a large gatehouse, the gate tunnel having several portcullises within it. The Last Hearth was able to house practically all of the smallfolk living on House Umber's own lands, as well as many of those of the minor lords beholden to them. Its cellars, several stories deep, were large, well maintained, and currently full.

And we're not without our own friends either, Hother smiling faintly as he watched over 1,400 men marching through the snow towards him, the banners of House Stark, Cerwyn, and the Wull clan flying over their heads. He clumped down the stairs from the gatehouse, greeting the leader of the band as he slipped off of his horse.

"Greeting Hother, I am Ser Alec Willowtree," The man said with a nod. "My Lord Stark sends his greetings, and sent us and Wull allies to aid you in the defense against the White Walkers."

"You made good time," Hother said gruffly, smiling grimly in a face that looked like a mountain carved by a glacier, complete with a beard that looked like the foot of a mountain. "We've heard tell of a few holdfasts attacked, some farmsteads destroyed. Nothing major, nothing organized you might say, just the undead rising from the graves." He shuddered a little. "Never thought I'd see this, tell the truth. I ordered our own tombs disturbed and put to the torch, Old God's damn the need."

Willowtree nodded grimly. "I have a hundred archers from the mountain clans and 400 archers from the lands of House Stark and the rest are swordsmen and armsmen. We bring pikes, two large carts full of them and armor, another two cart's worth. Last Hearth will hold my Lord, they'll have to take it over our dying bodies."

"Against any other enemy that'd be good crowd pleasin' shit, against the White Walkers, t'ats precisely the way they'd want ta take it." Hother said shaking his head.

Willowtree coughed, looking a little apologetic, then gestured out past the gatehouse as his men began to move into the small courtyard, the carts with them making their own slow way inside, pulled by the first few teams of trained reindeer from Brandon Stark. "I notice that you and your men were busy outside my Lord, isn't it a little late to try to dig a moat?"

"A normal moat maybe youngster," said Hother still smiling grimly. "But not one like that. We ain't gonna be filling it with water at all, but with something else. Keepin' snow out of it'll be more difficult, still, I hope at least it'll provide a bit of a surprise at need."

OOOOOOO

Jon had marched his forces straight from where they had left the Blackwater Rush towards the source of the Mander making his way down along it in turn. He had also been able to convince the castellan of House Footly to send a message down to Highgarden for him, and had received a reply as soon as possible given the speed of raven's wings. Of course his army had continued its march while Footly waited for a response. They were halfway to Bitterbridge before the messenger caught up with them.

In her brother's name Lady Margaery had, ordered all the lords along his route to pass on messages, and had also sent back all of the barges that Garlan had used in his own journey down the Mander. A few of the barges soon reached the army allowing him to rest some of his troops daily on a rotating basis, and of course also lightening his supply train considerably.

They had just come within sight of Bitterbridge when the scouts shouted back a warning. "Riders incoming! Six of them my lords!"

"More messengers?" asked Beric cocking his head. "I wouldn't have thought that Caswell would be so quick to follow Lady Margaery's commands. I'd have thought he'd bitch and moan so long as she wasn't there in person to glare at him personally, the little streak of piss."

"Lady Margaery's force of personality already surprised me in the messages we've exchanged. I've no doubt that even by raven message Caswell would be overwhelmed quickly."

Beric smiled, nodding his head slightly. "I've actually met Lady Margaery, both when we were in King's Landing and before that at a ball for her 14th birthday. For all that Loras was her father's favorite, I think that Margaery was always the most intelligent of them. Bar Willas perhaps. And when angered, she is a very scary lady indeed, her tongue can flense the bones off a man in moments."

Jon laughed, leading the way through the army towards the front of the column as the rider and the scouts who'd spotted them came into view. "Indeed, her last message showed that intelligence quite clearly, as well as Willas' ability on the battlefield." That message had summarized Willas' campaign in the Westerlands. "Several problems have been solved there without us needing to intervene thank the gods. Frankly I think mothers and daughters everywhere will sing Willas' praises for the destruction of Clegane Hall."

"True," said Beric, biting off the word. "Your brother did a magnificent deed when he executed Gregor Clegane, I drank to his victory then, and I'd do so again in an instant. Honestly if you think about it, that moment began the destruction of the Lannisters mystic of unstoppable ruthlessness."

Jon nodded, and the two fell silent while Edric and Arya came through the army behind them along with Ser Piper. By the time the messenger and his guards reached the front ranks of the marching army, they were all waiting for them to the side of the trail.

"My Lords," the messenger began, bowing his head trying hard not to stare at the odd Wolf/Dragon head banner floating above the army, or the equally strange giant wolves ranged out next to a young woman and man who could only be Starks. "I hail from Bitterbridge my Lords, where we've had a message from Lady Taena Merryweather."

Beric frowned slightly, bringing up one hand to hide his mouth for a moment but Jon had caught it anyway. "What?"

"Lady Taena is a notorious gossip, and there have been rumors of infidelity around her for years, so much so they spread to my seat in Blackhaven, though obviously none were ever proven. Still, I suppose she is bright, brighter than her husband certainly, and certainly in touch with whatever is going on around Longtable. I would however be wary of taking anything she says at face value."

The messenger held out the message, and Jon opened it, moving his horse slightly to allow Beric to read it over his shoulder. The message was from Taena and detailed Oberyn coming to her for information, saying that in return he agreed not to despoil House Merryweather's lands, before going on to describe Oberyn's long term plans. It ended with an earnest plea for whoever was in charge of the Stargaryen army to try to stop him. Nowhere in there was mention of Taena's role as spy mentioned of course, but neither did Taena shy away from hinting at her 'gossip' skills.

The two of them read through it, glancing at one another when they finished. "This isn't good," Jon said, his tone dust dry and understated, but also very serious.

"Your mastery of the understatement is profound my Lord," Beric replied scowling angrily. "This could be a disaster."

Arya plucked the message out from Jon's hand, reading it quickly before handing it over to Edric and Ser Piper. "Am I missing something here? I mean yes it would be bad for the lands that Oberyn passes through, but you make it sound as if the impact would be much larger than that."

"The area between the Rose Road and the Mander is called the heart of the Reach lady Arya," said Ser Piper shaking his head. "It's not called that because it's in the middle, but because it is by far richest territory of the entire Reach, every single league of that land is farmland given over to the growing of one crop or another. That land could feed the rest of the Reach and then some my Lords, and with the damage already done to the lands around the Mander and up around Goldengrove it becomes even more important. Oberyn could doom the Reach possibly the Stormlands and more to starvation if he puts that area to the torch."

Jon growled, pulling out a map of the area looking over at the messenger to aid him in placing their current whereabouts as well as where he thought Oberyn's army under could be if they had left the keep of Cockshaw and made their way around Merryweather lands. After a moment he shook his head. "We'll never get there in time, even if we all could pile onto the barges Oberyn we'll have crossed long before we can stop him from beginning his campaign of terror again."

Arya frowned, then looked at Nymeria and Ghost. "I, I think I have an idea actually." She looked at the two direwolves.

Catching the look, Jon motioned the others away, leaning close to his sister. "What's your idea, sister?"

"The direwolves take over packs when they try to send messages long distance right?"

Jon nodded, though there was a range limit for that kind of thing. With each successive wolf pack the information passed became less and less useful.

"Well, Ghost and Nymeria are both smart, really smart. We could send them across the river now, have them head down to look for Oberyn's army then take control of some wolf packs around there to harass the mercenaries. You know how horses who haven't been trained act around them. They wouldn't be able to go nearly as fast as if their horses run off every night."

"That's an idea," Jon thought looking down at Ghost. "It could work, but I think we'll need to do a bit more..."

An hour later Arya, Ser Piper, six hundred men of his house, Edric and the two wolves were racing down the river on one of the fastest barges, disembarking two days later. Behind them the army picked up speed, force marching along the river, while the messenger returned to Bitterbridge with a raven message for Lady Margaery.

OOOOOO

Ranma had passed around Harroway in the night a bare day and a half after setting out but did not stop. People had seen him of course causing Ranma to laugh aloud at the odd looks and exclamations of shock at his appearance and the speed he was moving. Grimaldi even tried to send a horseman after him to discover why Ranma was running through the town like that, but the horse floundered after the first few leagues, while Ranma kept on going.

At the pace Ranma was going even the finest horse would've floundered. Ranma set a blistering pace from the get-go, one even Fenris and the direwolves would've had trouble keeping up with. He ate on the run from a bag of jerky and drank from his wineskin (which held camp water) when he needed it but otherwise just kept on going, stopping only to rest for a few hours every night. In this manner Ranma crossed in a bare four days from Maidenpool through the lands of House Wayn and beyond on the Kingsroad.

Since passing the Vale Road intersection however Ranma had noticed that the Kingsroad and the ground directly on either side of it showed markings which told of an army passing by. At first Ranma hadn't noticed it, simply assuming that it was from the time his own army had passed down from the Ruby Ford. But a little bit after leaving House Wayn's land he began to make a note of it, and became concerned. Is there another army moving about out here? Could the Lannisters or Stannis have brought the Vale into the war? And if they have, how will that army react when they learn the war's over before they could join in?

Early on the fifth day as the sun was beginning to poke over the horizon, Ranma saw scout's moving through the woods slowly. Some of them were on horse, while others were on foot, either guards or scouts Ranma wasn't certain. They didn't seem all that concerned with keeping a watch out to the south of them, which told Ranma where the Army might be headed.

Could it be moving to interdict Crannogtown? While an excellent supply depot, Crannogtown was not very well defended. Despite the palisade around the town really depended on the army smashing any force that could threaten it long before such a threat could get into position to attack it. Or could they be going after Timot and his troops?

Off the top of his head Ranma could not think of the number of Houses and men the Vale could put into the field, a round number of 15,000 was the best he could come up with. An army that large could have destroyed Timot's force, and with it any chance of getting a formed military unit up into the North any time soon. Davos had been very pessimistic about the timeframe for the Royal Navy to travel from Maidenpool to White Harbor, saying it would be at least a month and a half, maybe more. Hence why Ranma was doing this in the first place.

For a moment Ranma debated on whether he should slip into the Umi-Sen-Ken and keep going, trying to pass through the army and figure out what was going on by listening in on random conversation. But if he was spotted somehow, if someone ran into him, tripped him, or more likely, saw his tracks in the mud along the edges of the Kingsroad, he would give a very bad first impression. After all of this point I don't have any real proof that this army's a threat, I'm just being paranoid. With reason, but still...

Eventually one of the scouts noticed him coming up behind them, turning their horses around and staring at the man running at a speed their horses could barely match. "Hold stranger! What's your business here, and where are you going in such a rush?"

Ranma slowed, still jogging forward but slowing down enough while the scouts on horseback galloped back down the Kingsroad toward him at their comrade's shout. Soon five of them were around him, keeping pace with him as he continued forward. Idly he noted that the colors all of them were wearing looked like a Vale House, House Tollett he thought, which made his guess about where this army came from accurate at least. Now to find out what its intentions are.

"I am Ranma Stargaryen, and I am heading home the fastest I can to deal with a threat that has grown beyond the wall. Who are you and who do you speak for?"

One of the men scoffed, reaching forward to grasp the hilt of Ice where it was sticking over one of Ranma's shoulders. "He's just some vagabond thief trying to run away, with a sword he's probably stolen! Look at it, iEEEE!"

That was as far as he got Ranma grabbed his arm, pulling him out of the saddle with ease. Before his fellows could draw their swords Ranma was holding the man above his head as if he was some kind of packing crate. "Take me to your leader!" Ranma ordered, having no time or inclination at this point for games. "Now!"

The four remaining scouts stared at him then up at their fellow who was simply dangling there, as easily as if he weighed nothing all in Ranma's arms. Then one of them spoke to the others. "Didn't the tales about him say that the King had strength greater than most normal men? It... it could be him? Though I question your Majesty why you are out here alone?"

Ranma laughed, gently placing the man he had holding up on his feet. One or two of the men made to move forward their blades half-drawn but the others shook their heads, including the one that Ranma had just sat on the floor. He had no desire to see what Ranma would do if he became angry.

"Like I said, I need to be in the North as fast as possible, and my army can't keep up with me." That won Ranma even more awed looks, and while normally he would've found those irritating at the moment they serve a purpose, so he didn't say anything.

The scouts formed up around Ranma and began to trot forward with him, quickly catching up to the rest of the army which was slowly breaking camp to get on its way once more. The camp itself was a much more sprawling and disorganized affair than any unit Ranma had trained would put up with, and Ranma couldn't quite figure out how large the army was as he was led through it.

Soon the rumor of who Ranma was spread, causing many men to stop what they were doing to stare at him, with one or two of them shaking their heads and muttering questions about his sudden appearance or questioning who he was, let alone why he was there. By the time Ranma was presented to them, Lord Royce and the other commanders of the Army had gathered together in one place in front of the tent they used as a meeting area.

Bronze Yohn looked at Ranma from head to toe for a moment, while Redfort, Templeton and Tollet looked between him and Ranma, knowing Yohn had the best chance of knowing if this was an imposter or not. Indeed Yohn recognized the hilt of Ice on the young man's back, and though it had been a long time he also recognized lizard-lion armor when he saw it. The looks also matched what they had been told Ranma Stark looked like, but that didn't overcome his surprise at the young man's appearance here, especially all alone as he was. "You claim to be Ranma Stark, yes?"

"I am Ranma Stargaryen, first of his name, King of Westeros through right of lineage and conquest." Ranma said smiling grimly. "The sword on my back should have been proof enough Lord Royce, you fought alongside my father in Robert's rebellion didn't you? And I'm certain that Ser Breakstone gave you at least a description of what I look like. Where is he by the way? And more importantly, what are you and this army doing here, heading north?"

Royce looked away from them younger man's even stare. It should have been ridiculous, no king or even minor Lord for that matter would travel alone on foot like this, with no guards no companions, no anything! But beyond the fact that he had Ice, beyond the armor or the looks, there was Ranma's presence, a certain implacable nature that shone through even as he stood there unmoving.

After a moment Royce nodded his head. "Your Majesty, I welcome you to our camp. Young Breakstone parted company with us at the Gates of the Moon, he was travelling back to Gulltown, and we have not heard from him since. As to why we are here, we five represent those Houses in Vale lands that are willing to act, and act for you, though we refuse to raise arms against the Baratheon brothers. How goes that work?"

"Finished," Ranma replied with a thin smile. "Stannis defeated his brother Renly down near King's Landing, and my wife and I defeated him and the forces of the Reach he could call upon. The survivors of the Reach and Stormlands gave their oaths to us and are heading home. Viserys and his army has also been smashed, and a surprise late entry as well."

Lord Royce sagged somewhat, shaking his head before asking hesitantly. "We've heard rumors of Stannis and Renly's battle, and King's Landing's destruction though none of us believed it. But more personally, my liege, my son Robar went into the Reach to see if he could serve under Renly. The last I had heard from him he had been made one of Renly's Rainbow Guard, a pretentious name but even so I was proud of him. Do, do you know if he lives or not?"

"I don't think so." Ranma replied with a wince, derailed from his questions about why the Vale army was going north. "I'm sorry my lord, but from what we were told by the prisoners after the battle about the conflict between Renly and Stannis, none of the Rainbow Guard survived." There were some questions about one of them, but not Robar.

Sighing faintly Redfort reached out to put a hand on Yohn's shoulder nodding his head at Ranma. Though he personally was still wondering if this really was Ranma or not, it was obvious Yohn believed it, so he would act as if he did too. "Your Majesty, please join us in the tent, I think we all need to hear more about what has happened in the rest of Westeros as we were on the march. Though since entering the Riverlands we have heard about the former bastard King and his death, and the destruction of King's Landing as my friends said."

Ranma was ushered into the lords' tent, and filled them in on what had gone on since Breakstone had been sent to talk to them. The news of Melisandre's magics and the pretender Aegon appearing backed by the Golden Company caused exclamations of shock. Their defeat, and the death of two dragons, though Ranma didn't mention how he had killed one of them personally, caused even more. His brief description of the trials after however made every lord there smile or nod, seeing that Ranma was more interested in justice than vengeance, which spoke well of his ability to rule.

"But that was then, now I am needed in the North because of a threat rising from beyond the wall, something which I believe you know already." Ranma finished, staring around at them all with a faint smile. "Or is my mind playing tricks on me when I remember that House Royce kept to the Old Gods?"

"You do not misremember Your Majesty. My House has followed the Old Gods since our founding, We Remember." Lord Royce pulled his tabard to one side so that the runes on his armor could be seen underneath. "Magic has returned, and when I last stood in front of my castle's weirwood tree I felt a call north. I was able to convince my fellows Lords to join me, and we have been on the march now for months."

"Good." Ranma said with a nod. "I already sent some of my army up north nearly two months ago. They should be nearing the Neck by this point, but every sword helps." Ranma frowned. "But now that the war is over, will the Vale still stand separate, or will it rejoin the fold as your initial words indicated?"

Royce looked at his fellows for a moment, then back at Ranma and finally bowed his head. "Your Majesty, we wish to join you, let the Westeros be whole once more. But we have to say, the Vale lands are divided. The mountain clans have been causing more and more trouble, forcing us to keep most of our forces home to combat them. That began long before this war. Jon Aryn's widow is a mad woman your Majesty, which has caused a break between the Houses of the Vale in regards to how to deal with her. I mean no disrespect I know she is your aunt but..."

Ranma shook his head. "I'll never take offense at the truth, Lord Yohn. We heard about Lysa's madness even in the Riverlands. In fact there were rumors of it before I even left Winterfell. Did you leave enough men behind to protect your lands against these mountain clans?"

"We did, but not to hunt them down on their own lands. Fighting the mountain clans in the mountains is hard, dangerous and costly work."

Ranma nodded thoughtfully, going over the list of the portions of the Army that would not be heading north with the Royal Navy. He also tried to remember who else among the lords present counted as the most powerful lord besides Yohn. "Tell me, who did you leave behind to speak for the Vale in your stead?"

"Lord Belmore, Your Grace." Redfort replied. "He commands a small force keeping a siege going on at the Gates of the Moon, or did when we left. We did not anticipate any trouble with Lysa but we wanted to make certain that the woman could not get any messages out to her erstwhile accomplice Petyr, and we wanted a force in place to take over the Eyrie when Lysa finally made her men snap."

"She was allied with Petyr?" Ranma asked sharply, wondering if the man had maybe tried to head to the Vales, and wondering what sort of mischief he could get up to there before Fenris ran him down.

Tollett scowled, actually spitting to one side. "Bah, allied she practically went to pieces when news of the siege on King's Landing reached us! Lysa told her men she wouldn't do anything until he arrived to 'advise' her."

Lord Royce scowled angrily. "We have since heard news of the attack on Gulltown thanks to one of my factors sending a raven to the Bloody Gate. We know who attacked, and who sided with them, House Grafton was known to have close ties to House Baelish. Might I ask..."

Ranma shook his head. "None of House Grafton's men survived the battle. Nor did any from House Moore. As for Petyr himself, he will be dealt with. I have my best... man... on the job."

Redfort frowned, wondering at the odd pauses there, and the smirk on Ranma's face as he said the words. None of the other's however noticed anything unusual and they merely nodded, satisfied.

Ranma however had already moved on, and the topic brought Redfort's attention back to him very quickly. "Tell me Lord Royce, your House and Lord Redfort's have not intermarried for quite some time, correct?"

Both lords got the implication of the king bringing that subject up immediately, looking at one another while the other three Lords murmured in surprise, though they were mostly approving. Redfort and Royce had been the leaders in this entire endeavor and had kept the Vale if not united then largely at peace barring a few scuffles they'd heard about up further north between Corbray, Lynderly, and Coldwater. "Indeed, our Houses have not married into one another in generations my Lord."

Ranma nodded. "Parchment and quill." He reached into the pouch where he kept the jerky and asked. "Oh, and if I could get some more jerky and some camp water, please?"

One of the servants ran to fulfill that request, bringing back camp water and jerky enough to fill Ranma's pouch and wineskin while he wrote out two messages on different pieces of parchment. Eventually he finished, setting them down on a table, writing out his name, as well as that of his wife before stamping both of them with the Royal seal which he kept on a ring around his neck under his armor. Daenerys kept hers on her finger along with the ring Ranma had given her.

"This," he said holding out one of them up "Names you and Lord Redfort as the crown's duly appointed representatives in the Vale lands. Essentially this places you as first among equals, able to make decisions together that affect the Vale as a whole. This will also allow you or your own representatives to mediate disputes between your fellow lords. It also states that once your Houses intermarry, that the couple's son will become Lord Paramount, and the start of a new House to rule the Eyrie."

That son would in turn be sent to the Royal House to ward, but Ranma decided not to bring that up just yet. After all, it would be years, maybe a decade or more before any such thoughts were necessary.

Lord Redfort and Royce exchanged proud smiles, and nodded formally, with Yohn speaking for them both. "Your Majesty, we accept this charge humbly, and will do everything we can to prove your trust in us is not wasted."

Ranma smiled, nodding his head before holding up the other message. "I would like one of your most trusted commanders to take this one down to Harroway. Quickly if at all possible, my army tends to move much faster than yours, no offense meant. It will command about 2000 men of my army to head into the Vale and meet up with the various Houses there to solve the issue of the mountain clans."

Those two-thousand would be taken from Silas' command, made up of the troops that wouldn't be embarking on the Royal Navy in Maidenpool. After all, the Riverlands cavalry wouldn't be worth much in the North anyway, and devoting those men to this campaign now might free up four times their number of troops from the Vale. The mountain clansmen might bitch about it, but I bet they'll like what I offered in payment. Transporting and paying for stone enough for them to make their own keeps up in the mountains is one heck of a carrot considering what it could mean for them long term.

Lord Royce nodded over to his son Andar, who had stayed silent and watching the proceedings since Ranma had entered the tent. "This is my son. He will head back to Harroway immediately my Lord with five hundred men. They will aid your men in this task, though I don't know if 2000 men will be enough."

"They will if they go about it sensibly." Ranma said complacently. Silas had impressed him, and Tristan seemed to have a somewhat decent head on his shoulders so long as he kept his temper in check. And that kind of combat was the sort of thing that Silas would take to very well. Using light and heavy cavalry for the task is going to make it harder, but the mountain clansmen should make it easier. And maybe they'll even be able to talk their fellows to giving up their raiding for a while. Doubtful, but I can dream.

Ranma nodded, then held up the third message. "If you present this at Crannogtown you'll be allowed onto the ships there. The galleons will transport your army up to White Harbor, which will get you into the North that much faster and hopefully closer to where you can do the most good my Lords."

There was some murmur among the Lords at that, who hadn't considered that possibility before this. Indeed the strategic implications of Crannogtown had entirely passed by them, but they approved of the idea of course.

"And by that time hopefully the first consignment of dragonglass weapons will have arrived as well," Ranma went on, "which will give your men enough weaponry to do some good against the White Walkers. For my part however, I have to keep going."

"You won't stay with us Your Majesty?" asked Tollett in surprise. He was still having trouble with the idea of a king simply running up off like that or indeed having the ability to keep moving through the area that Ranma had described so quickly, but the ring, the way he talked and his tale of the war had given enough evidence of Ranma's identity for him.

Ranma laughed. "Normally I would, but I'm under a time constraint." He stared seriously at Lord Royce then around at the others. "You spoke of feeling a pull to the north Lord Yohn, but I had a vision."

He waited for their shocked exclamations of surprise to fade before going on. "When we were near Harrenhal, I went to the Isle of Faces to pray to the Old Gods. There I received a vision, a vision that foretold disaster if I was not in the North within two months. But I couldn't leave Stannis or Viserys behind me to, not even considering Aegon and his sudden appearance. So right now, I simply have no time to waste."

There was a moment of silence, then Royce nodded his head grimly. "May the Old Gods favor you my Lord, and we will see you again in the North."

Ranma nodded, exchange handclasps with him and the other Lords then left the tent, sprinting out of the camp and further toward the North. Within moments he was out of sight still gaining speed leaving behind bemused, awestruck, and worried Vale Lords. Lord Hardyng, a normally silent fellow, put their worry into words. "In the long term our fortunes might well be on the rise my Lords, especially if the Royals spread the idea of more cities and suchlike which the king mentioned as some of his carrots to the Westerlands. But right now, right now I don't know what to make of our fates and I'm very much afraid of this winter is going to be the worst in all of Westeros' history."

OOOOOO

Lord Manderly greeted Salladhor Saan in the Merman's Court where the fires were raging warmly, something that Saan was very happy about even with the brief trip through White Harbor from his ship. Sailing up to White Harbor from Dragonstone had been arduous, dangerous, and above all cold! He had sailed northern waters before, even up to Ib Nor a few times on the large island of Ibben, but with winter here the temperature was far worse.

Worse his ships crews had not truly been prepared for it. Most of them had some clothing able to deal with the cold of a night at sea, but not to this extent. He'd lost several dozen sailors, possibly even as many as 100 throughout his fleet to frostbite and cold related accidents, and he had still more down with flus and other ailments. He related this all too Lord Manderly before opening up discussion on payment for his fleet's merchandise, because he knew Manderly had a reputation as a shrewd and dangerous opponent when it came to the bargaining table.

To his surprise however Lord Manderly simply nodded. "Show my factors the weapon's you've brought us, and we'll pay the promised price: one silver stag for every two arrowheads or one dragonglass dagger, with spear points costing two silver stags. And, if you agree to continue to supply us with as many as you can until the Bite freezes, we will furnish your entire fleet with wintertime clothing for free, as well as housing here and on Three Sisters every time your fleet stops here for two week. Every Captain will get another 400 golden dragons upon the receipt of every cartload's worth of good weaponry their ship brings in."

For a moment Salladhor Saan was silent. While he would prefer to deal entirely in gold, silver still clinked just as nicely in his pocket. But... "That is indeed the amount I was promised, but I have to wonder why you're offering it. Is it true, the, what are they called, the Others, have they really returned?"

"Yes they have. We have verifiable attacks occurring everywhere along the Bay of Seals, and they are slowly spreading. I myself have ordered the cities cemetery to be exhumed and all the bodies within put to the torch. I know that many other lords have done the same to any burial place they know of that doesn't have weirwood trees over or near it. The Old Gods fight the Other's influence, or so the old tales I've recently studied say."

"But because of that we are in deep need of those weapons. I will pay the price we agreed upon your arrival with this shipment could well be the difference between life and death for many." Wyman's eyes and face hardened, locking onto Saan's own, causing the much thinner man to stiffen slightly. "But no more. We might need more of those weapons down the line, but I won't be gauged, whatever our need. Am I clear?"

Salladhor scoffed, but after a moment nodded. "Very well, I agree to the price. Shall we get our pursers in here to do write up the paperwork?"

The Lysene pirate had fifteen ships to his command, each of them able to carry about twenty carts worth of goods, mostly in barrels or packing crates. Lord Manderly kept three, distributing the daggers and arrowheads among his men. Four shipments were reloaded onto river barges here before being transported up the White Knife to Winterfell and Cerwyn.

The rest of the shiploads of precious dragonglass weapons were handed off to Lord Manderly's fleet. Two would be brought up to Widow's Watch. Two more were sent one each to Ramsgate and Oldcastle, while two more would be transported from Ramsgate up the Broken Branch river into Hornwood territory, along with a force of archers and armmen from White Harbor and Ramsgate to defend it until it reached Hornwood. While Ramsgate, Oldcastle and Widows Watch did not have ports or even wharves, they would still be able to take possession of their new weapons much faster from the sea. The last shiploads were given over to five Manderly war galleys, who would head up to the Sunstream where they would hand over their goods to river barges which could take them up to Karhold.

The North now had the weapons they needed hopefully. Now it was just a matter of getting them where they could be the most use.

OOOOOO

Sansa arrived in Crannogtown without incident, exchanging greetings with the men there absentmindedly while she once again thought long and hard about the two young men that were accompanying her. The past few weeks had been tough in that area, both of them had definitely put their best foot forward in the 'contest' as it were. She giggled at the thought, remembering the times she danced with Ben or exchanged puns with Edd, much to the chagrin of all around them. It had felt nice to be the center of attention of two young men, without feeling any kind of pressure on her to make a choice.

Edd had surprised her a time or two, not with his sense of humor which she had of course known about, but with his gentle nature in other ways. I wonder, she thought now is it a sign of strength that you can afford to be so gentle? Ranma is the strongest man I've ever met, and he's one of the gentlest too. Or is it just Ranma's training that make people so? That he instills some other quality along with physical skills?

With a shake of her head Sansa sighed. But even so, Edd's like family! It'd be so wrong! Whereas Ben... Ben was all Sansa thought she had seen in Joffrey and more, he solid in a way that Joffrey at his best had never been able to pull off. He was witty, charming, handsome, well read, and knew the Riverlands like the back of his hand. Sansa was not blind to the fact that would be a tremendous help to her in days to come, but really it was small part as to why Sansa felt she had fallen for Ben Blackwood. No, my decision was made between these two long ago, but should I tell Edd now, stop leading him on? Though honestly, I'm getting the impression these days he's sort of realized it.

Sansa's sigh turned into a frown suddenly when she heard a snippet of a conversation. Moving over to the dockworkers who were talking, she smiled at them, causing their initial start of surprise and bows of obeisance to stop. "I'm sorry, but I couldn't help but overhear what you were talking about? Rumors from the North?"

"Yes my lady." said one of them, a worker from White Harbor. "There's been rumors of strange happenings, and Lord Stark put out an order to all the smallfolk pulled back to the Great House's castles, not holdfasts!"

The crannogman he had been talking to nodded as well, looking up at Sansa from where he stooped. "Milady, the White Walkers have returned, somehow found a way around the wall they have! Lord Stark, he's hoping to trade land for time, so says my Lord Reed."

"If Lord Reed says it, I'll believe it. He's a good friend of my father, and has been a firm friend and ally to our entire House since long before I was born." Sansa said smiling at the man who puffed himself up at her words. "Could you tell me more about these rumors?"

The two men did so quickly joined by several others eager to speak directly to the Flower of Winterfell. The tales were garbled and disjointed but still gave Sansa a picture of what was going on in the North. The news must've reached Winterfell almost at the same time we left White Harbor! That's truly horrible timing, I could wish to be with my family at a time like this but the Riverrun does need a lady, now more than ever. We'll have to keep going.

But, Sansa thought as she looked over at where Edd and Ben were talking to a few of the other guards that would accompany them on the rest of the journey. But that doesn't mean Eddie has to come with us. He could do a lot of good if he turned back now.

When she broached the subject however his response was short and unequivocal. "No. Ranma asked me to see you safely to Riverrun milady, and that is what I will do! I know about the troubles in the North, I've heard the same rumors, and remember Karhold's a lot further north than Winterfell. But even so, I gave your brother my word."

Sansa leaned close, speaking in a soft voice. "Eddie you, you know that that I don't look at you the way you want me to. That isn't, it's not going to change if you stay with me till Riverrun. Ben and the rest of my guards can see me to Riverrun just as well as you can, but you could do a lot of good up north."

"I could, And I do know that." Edd replied. He sighed, looking away then back at her. "It was a bit of a wrench," he said, the pain on his face showing that for a moment to Sansa who had to stop herself from throwing her arms around her. At the moment it would send out the wrong message, either way he decided to take it. "It's just, you grew up to be such a gorgeous woman! I had a crush on you were a young girl, but now..."

Sansa blushed a little looking away but it wasn't the first time that Edd had complemented her in that manner. "Eddie, it wouldn't work. Dynastically it might be a good idea, but I don't think of the two of us could be happy together."

"And that is why I'm willing to say I've given you up." Eddie shook his head with a faint smile which still hinted at pain. "I've seen you and Ben, the connection forming there. And I do want you to be happy. Moreover, my own tastes in the personality of women have changed, if not in their looks. You're right, I don't think the two of us would make one another happy in the long term."

He shook his head. "But that has nothing to do with my promise to your brother. That promise still holds power over me, and until I see you safe to Riverrun, I will guard you with my life." He smirked suddenly. "And though I've given up on you, that doesn't mean I'm going to give you and Ben any more alone time together. Just because I'm over you doesn't want me I want to see you kissing another man."

Sansa laughed and slapped him on the shoulder blushing hotly as she denied the very idea and their time in Crannogtown passed quickly. The next day they were on their way towards the bridge at the twins or the former twins. Ranma and Daenerys hadn't yet decided on a name for that area just yet, which would fall under royal control of course. The bridge itself would still be important place for trading and transportation despite the canal further down the river, but no one want to see another house rise in the area, so the guard detail had remained there since the Twin's destruction.

There they picked up a dozen men of House Stark who Sansa took from the guard detail adding them to her personal household. "It would be good," she said to them, "to have men I know and trust with me and Riverrun no matter how warm a welcome I receive."

They all acceded to her command eagerly, and the trip went on. Once over the Green Fork, they immediately turned south following the Green Fork for several days, passing by the area where the new canal was being worked on then moving on toward Fairmarket.

OOOOOO

After the expedition across the Mander had left, Jon and Beric set a blistering pace for the rest of their small army. Rotating as many men onto the barge as they could they sped along the side of the river quickly, moving day and night with only a few hours per night given over to rest. The men would have complained if not for the fact that Jon and Beric kept going tirelessly, though Beric notably had to change horses several times, and tie himself into the saddle at night.

Near to Longtable they met more barges and a surprise, because the barges were not alone. A force of archers had travelled upriver on them. Their leader, a young man of Jon's age about as his men paused. "Lord Stark, I am Ser Kevin Conklyn. "Lady Margaery sent me and my men to aid you in this battle. We are yours to command."

Jon nodded, while Beric gleefully slid from his saddle, refusing through force of will the urge to rub his battered bottom. "I'm glad to have you, archers is one area we're not well supplied with, we only have around 300 with us at all. Yet I'm surprised, given what the tales tell of her courage at Oldflowers, I would have assumed that Lady Margaery would've come herself."

That was only half the truth actually Jon was interested to see if the reality of Lady Margaery would match up to the tales and not just that one. Ranma had talked many times about Lady Margaery and their interrupted courtship in King's Landing, and Ranma made a point of emphasizing her intelligence, not just her beauty.

Kevin laughed. "She meant to, but her grandmother and Lady Tyrell put their feet down. Margaery was fully prepared to try and sneak out, but Lady Olenna bribed her personal maid to put a sleeping draught in her food the morning we were due to leave."

"Mothers and grandmothers are like that I suppose." Jon laughed shaking his head. "But how many men do you have with you?"

"Near to a thousand five-hundred my Lord and also bring have enough bushels of arrows to fill up a barge from stern to stern. I'll warn you, not all of them are the best quality archers, but every little bit helps, as the saying goes. Most of them were raised from Highgarden and the lands surrounding it in the past few months, so have only been lightly trained but they're all strong enough to keep pulling a bow for as long as we need them to, even if their aim isn't the best."

Jon nodded, staring thoughtfully at the river. "For what I have in mind, I don't think their quality will be an issue. Can you tell me about the lands around the bridge that Oberyne is making for?"

Ser Conklyn nodded, and as the unit commanders joined them he described the lands there. There was a small but very fruitful grove of trees that began about three hundred feet away from the small road leading over the bridge Oberyne was making for. Of course the road itself was clear, but the grove itself might make for good cover.

"The other side is mostly clear, a few farmsteads here and there and of course wheat fields, but no place where you could set an ambush my Lord. Not one large enough to stop an army Oberyne's reported to be at any rate."

"So the apple grove, or rather right before it begins would be our best bet." Jon mused aloud, looking at the river again. "How far away from the bridge are we?"

"At the pace you apparently set my Lord? I... I would estimate another two days or so?"

"We won't be going that pace." Jon said with a quick shake of his head. "Unless you say that Oberyne is within sight of the River again."

"No my Lord. As Lady Taena reported he swung out wide of Merryweather land. But he's also slowed down considerably according to the smallfolk that have fled his army's approach. They say he's lost nearly all of his horses in the past few days."

Jon nodded grimly, wishing he could send a mental feeling of pride and satisfaction to Ghost just then. "Good, in that case we'll slow the pace for now. I'm going to send a little of half of your archers back down the river to the other side of that bridge. But first I want to use one of the emptier barges to get several hundred of my men down there who know how to handle axes and shovels."

He looked around at his commanders, the knight and Beric for a moment. "Let me make one thing perfectly clear.

This will be a pure ambush. No discussion, no parlay, no chance for peace. Oberyne has led a mercenary army reaving, raping and murdering its way across the Stormlands and the Reach. Every man in that army is under a death sentence, mercenary or no. And we will be carrying that sentence out."

His lips pulled back into a snarl that any direwolf would have been proud of and the others smiled grimly as well. "You'll get no arguments from us Jon." Beric growled speaking for them all.

OOOOOO

The siege of Karhold began one evening without warning. Arrows began to rain upon the outer wall from the forest surrounding Karhold, despite it having been cleared back from the castle for the most part. Quickly the shout went up from the defenders. "Wights!"

Then quickly put a fire arrow to a brazier, raising his bow and pulling back on the string searching for a target. Seconds later hundreds of fire arrows were in the air, impacting the attacking horde as it came out of the woods from the walls of Karhold. A warcry ripped out of hundreds of throats as the defenders prepared to defend the seat of one of the most powerful Great Houses of the North. "The Sun of Winter!"

Archers among the wights began to fire back while the remaining wights raced on, moving over the snow which lay heavy on the ground by this point.

Theon pulled back on his bowstring, letting fly with such force that the arrow hit his target hard enough to propel it back into four others behind it. Two more fire arrows quickly followed impacting the wriggling mass of undead, lighting them all on fire.

As the fire arrows continued to streak out, there was bellow from the woods like a giant beast, or maybe a many of them, roaring aloud in anger or fear. Theon frowned looking over at Torrhen, who had raced out onto the gatehouse's roof with him. "Wights don't make noises, what could be out there?"

"I don't know." Torrhen replied, pulling back his own bow with another fire arrow on the string. "Keep firing!"

The battle continued throughout the evening and into the night, with the defenders rotating shifts every time a candle set into the gatehouse burned down. But it was at night when the White Walkers pressed their attack. As the sun sank below the horizon the temperature began to plummet precipitously far quicker than it should have. Men began to complain of frozen fingers, and the cold slowed the rate of fire from the defenders tremendously. The wights pressed forward, their own archers beginning to get mastery of the defenders here and there despite paying for it with hundreds of their own dead, but what did that matter to them?

From his spot on the gatehouse's roof, Theon had taken a moment to examine some of the wights with a Myrish spyglass, which he idly thought must've cost House Karstark quite a pretty penny. Most of the dead from the battle so far must've come from the graves of people here on Karstark land, or from elsewhere near the Bay of Seals. There weren't any newly dead among them save a few of the archers at the far back.

He told Torrhen this, and the man frowned angrily, moving away from the parapet, though they still had to almost shout to be heard above the tumult of battle. "They're softening us up then for the real blow." He looked at Theon, scowling angrily. "You're right. They don't attack like a normal army would, they're not retreating they just keep on coming, and the cold, it's at their command too isn't it?"

"Probably." Theon replied with a nod, not saying anything like 'I told you so'. There was no time for such now. "I think we should light those fire traps up now, and try to keep them going through the night."

Here and there stumps of trees had been left in place. Elsewhere large tree trunks had been left on the ground, with the snow kept off them, and some scrub brush piled on top. The undead steered clear of those places instinctively, but still dozens of the wights screamed and died when they were set alight.

Several moments of silence passed between the two young men while they watched the results of this little surprise. But then Theon shook his head. "It won't be enough." This was only the truth. After those initial losses to the firetraps, the wights had steered clear of them and kept on coming, their archers continuing to fire back and cause casualties among the defenders while others brought up large ladders. "Besides, we still don't know what made those bellows from earlier. I get a feeling the White Walkers have more surprises in store for us."

He stared earnestly at the other young man and Torrhen growled in frustration, but before he could reply a shout went up from the back wall facing the river. "The Sunstream's starting to freeze! I'm seeing ice on it!"

The two young man raced along the wall to the keep, racing up out onto the roof, where they gazed over the parapet at the water of the river, which was indeed freezing. Even as they watched some of it slowly froze by the dock set against the castle's wall, and more than one men on the large barge moored there, one of two in the river at present, was staring over the side. Theon turned back to Torrhen, reaching out to grab his shoulders, shaking the man hard. "Retreat now! Retreat now before we can't any longer!"

Torrhen stared at him, then down at the waters, before turning back to stare out over the battlefield, before nodding reluctantly. He turned away shouting for a runner, and soon enough people, smallfolk from the last batch that had retreated into Karhold along with the servants and all of the womenfolk were rushing out to the waiting ship.

"RAHHHHH!" They had left it too late. There was a roar from above rather than the surrounding woodland, heralding a new surprise from the White Walkers.

Theon turned to stare up, his eyes going almost comically wide as something flew through the night above them, something huge with vast wings of bone and pockmarked sinew. "What by the gods old and new..."

From the smoke obscuring the sky above the battlefield a large maw appeared on a long serpentine neck, snaking down and ripping a man on a tower in half, caring away his upper body. A moment later as the thing's wings' disturbed the smoke enough to let everyone on the towers and walls see it, a long tail lashed out, smashing two more men from the wall as a cry went up made of equal parts fear and shock. "A dragon, an undead dragon!"

"A wight dragon..." Theon growled, while Torrhen stared up into the fire-lit night in a futile attempt to track its course. "I wish I could say now I've seen everything, but I'm afraid the White Walkers might take that as a challenge." Theon frowned staring up into the sky himself, a fire arrow ready on his bow.

"You think you'll be able to hit it on the wing?" Torrhen asked, knowing Theon had the best chance of something like that.

"I'll be able to hit it, whether or not a single arrow will do the deed, that's up to luck." Torrhen nodded, and raced off back to the gatehouse, to take command of the defense once more.

The undead dragon made three more appearances in the next few candles, and each time Theon tried to put an arrow into it only to watch as his fire arrows skipped off its scales. In response the dragon let loose a cone of freezing air, so cold it actually froze humans into ice if it hit them full strength. Over a dozen men died each time it appeared.

Theon's desperation grew with every arrow he expended on killing it. He moved from tower to tower and wall to wall, trying to anticipate where the dragon would attack from next, only to fail nearly every time.

Faced with this, the cold, and the wights, the men began to falter, but with Torrhen and his chosen commanders exhorting them all they continued to defend the castle while the last of the servants rushed out of the castle to the waiting ship. That ship pulled away, heading down the river quickly thanks to desperate punters polling it from along its side before the wind caught in its sails.

At a signal from Torrhen, one man in every three began to retreat from the walls as the second barge pulled up to the dock. Its crew were fearful but determined, several dozen men aboard also taking shots on the far bank, though very few wights had appeared there just yet.

Unfortunately thanks to the defenders retreating and the dragon taking so much of their attention, the wights now had come close enough to the castle in enough strength to throw up ladders here and there along the outer wall. Once this was done they began climbing up them with the speed of spiders despite whatever shape their body appeared to be in. Then a battering ram was brought against the front gate, and despite the fires begun in several of the wights all around it, they began to batter at the gate.

At the same time, the wight's arrow assault redoubled. Theon turned as one man screamed aloud, a loud whining sort of wail as he fell backwards. He saw the man had been hit in the shoulder and shook his head. "Walk it off you fucking coward!"

The man continued to scream, convulsing in place, quickly expiring to Theon's intense surprise. He ducked back down below the parapet, reaching forward to the man's corpse, grasping the arrow shaft, hissing and pulling away quickly. Despite his leather gloves his hand had practically frozen against whatever the shaft was made of. The man to was cold to the touch already, but that didn't stop Theon from setting a torch on his chest, where the fire caught on the man's fur coat.

He stood up, staring out into the night, trying to see this new force of archers when Torrhen's voice reached him from the gatehouse roof. "Fall back to the keep! Fall back!"

Theon saw that several dozen wights had gotten up onto the westernmost wall and had slain several of the defenders. Those defenders rose in turn, and had to be hacked down by their fellows. As he watched the eastern tower came under attack from the dragon, the men on its roof dying from its breath attack and claws. He quickly loosed the arrow he had on his string, reaching for another only to watch in despair as both of them bounced off the dragon's snout, doing no damage.

More wights began to make their way onto the wall as Theon continued to watch, a feeling of despair filling him. He looked around, noticing now that several others had reached one of the nearer towers cutting him off from the stairwell down to the courtyard and to the rest of the wall.

Looking down at the ground he saw a nearby pile of hay that had been slated to be brought up and tossed over the wall before being set alight. It didn't look particularly solid, but it was certainly better than trying to fight his way through the armymen around him and the wights now coming over the wall in several places near him. With a roar of "Old Gods damnit!" Theon hurled himself off the wall, slamming into the hay and rolling for a moment to come out with his feet under him.

He found himself surrounded by men retreating back to the keep, and he pushed them on shouting "Retreat! Get inside the keep!"

With that he turned, pulling out his longsword, which he had taken from Karhold's armory, hacking at a wight that was coming after them after being kicked off the parapet. There were only a few of them in the courtyard just yet, but they were pursuing the retreating defenders quickly.

Theon exchanged sword blows with two of them, before hacking the leg out from under one of them, and stabbing the other with his dark, which he had replaced much like his longsword here in Karhold. He took that one's eyes out, letting it flail around before retreating quickly from the other one, which was still trying to scabble after him despite not having a leg anymore.

Reaching down he grabbed up his bow where he had dropped it, racing on. Theon was one of the last defenders to retreat into the keep, yet when he turned at the gate, he stared in astonishment, only then realizing that Torrhen and more than two dozen others hadn't retreated from the outer wall at all and were now cut off on the gatehouse's roof.

Torrhen shouted down at Theon. "Close the door Greyjoy!"

"Come on Torrhen, jump for it!" Theon shouted back, all their differences forgotten, as he pointed at a haystack near the gatehouse. "Hack your way through dammit!"

Torrhen shook his head, turning about and firing at a wight who was trying to un-limber a longbow on the wall to shoot at the defenders on the keep's roof. "We'll hold here." He said sounding almost calm even though he was shouting to be heard at all. "Tie up as many of them to attack us here at the gatehouse as we can. Go Theon, go!"

Even as he spoke two men facing the outer wall poured boiling pitch over the side. It had taken hours to come to a boil, and even then it was more lukewarm than anything thanks to the cold of the night. As soon as the pitch was out of the cauldron another man threw down a burning cob of wood, killing possibly a hundred wights gathered around the gate and destroying their battering ram.

"Go Theon!" Torrhen shouted, another arrow on his bowstring.

Seeing over a dozen wights making their way towards the keep's gate, Theon growled angrily, but ducked inside nodding at the men all around him, all of whom were looking at him with expressions that mixed grief and shame with grim determination. "Close it."

They complied and Theon raced away through the keep while the men of House Karstark continued to fall back through the keep, racing out the back of it towards the waiting boat in groups. The ice on the river was getting thicker, mostly centered around the dock and the ship, showing a fell intelligence was driving the cold in its work on the water.

Theon however didn't care for that at the moment. Stopping only briefly inside the keep to restock his quiver with fire arrows, Theon raced on, exiting out onto the roof and moving to the center of the portion of the wall facing Karhold's outer gate. Breathing in deeply, he set a brazier directly next to him, then thrust his entire quiver into it, the fire arrows sticking up out of the coal of the brazier.

For anyone else the fire of the brazier would've set the shaft of those arrows on fire before they could be used, but not Theon. He was too fast, grasping and firing them in one smooth motion, one arrow every half a second.

Even as his arms began to feel heavy, he kept on firing until all of the fire arrows near him were expended leaving over three dozen dead wights on the wall around the gatehouse. He moved onto the next brazier, commandeering the fire arrows from the archer stationed there and did the same, only turning his eyes upwards as he heard a roar.

The undead dragon was back, attacking the keep itself now, coming so close as to almost however over the roof, it's head rearing back in preparation to use its breath attack . Theon coolly drew back on the bowstring, letting fly at the thing's head, knowing the dragon had at last come too close. This time instead of impacting scale and bouncing off, Theon's arrow found the undead dragon's eye. "Die, you fucking monstrosity!"

"GRAHHA!" It roared, bellowing fury and letting loose with a torrent of ice from maw trying to slay its attacker, but Theon ducked aside, rolling on the stone of the rooftop. The dragon glared angrily at him, but more fire arrows from all around began to strike it on the wings. With another bellowing roar it took off, flying higher into the air away from its attackers.

"The sun of Winter!" The men around Theon all shouted aloud jubilantly, but Theon ignored them, moving back to his place on the wall, grabbing up more fire arrows from several dead archers. At the same time, the special arrows of the wights began to fall amongst his fellow defenders.

A shout from below in the keep reached Theon and his fellows then. "They've got something hammering at the gate, and the last of the defenders and servants are aboard, come down! The barge master says we have to go!"

With teeth grit in grief and rage impotent rage the last men of Karhold began to fall back, with Theon the last of them to duck down into the keep. One last arrow left on his bow, slamming into what he hoped was a white walker, a figure in odd black armor whose gender was indeterminate.

It was trying to loosen arrow at the top of the keep from the outer wall, which was now almost entirely under the control of the attackers. It let out a keening wail, falling back and smacking at its chest. But it was otherwise undamaged as it rose, its eyes glinting evilly in the dark and fiery smoke of the battlefield.

Theon however had already raced down into the keep, joining the throng of defenders as they moved through the key towards the waiting boat on the docks.

Theon was one of the last men aboard, and he turned watching the castle as the boat pushed away from the dock and out into the river, the sails catching the wind quickly and the man on the barge's sides punting it through the still slowly freezing water. He kept on staring, watching as the dragon came back, slamming down onto the top of the gatehouse, which was still holding out. He kept on watching as it lunged forward with its gaping maws towards Torrhen who turned roaring something lost on the wind and distance as he charged to his death.

Karhold had fallen.

OOOOOO

At around the same time that Karhold fell, Last Hearth too felt the brunt of a White Walker assault rather than the small undead attacks that had attacked the few remaining holdfasts north and east of it. By this point all of those smallfolk had retreated or died, giving the defenders of the castle around 2000 more hands and mouths, bringing the total of the household up to almost 5000, which was near the totality that they would have been able to produce in times of war.

Of course more than half of those numbers weren't truly trained armsmen, but thrusting a pike down against climbing White Walkers wasn't exactly training intensive. And many of the smallfolk had training in archery.

The Last Hearth was built in large plain dusted here and there with large boulders, with very few trees anywhere nearby. Certainly not enough cover to allow an army to sneak up on it. This allowed Ser Willowtree and Hother Umber to stare out at the army of wights marching towards them from the west. Here and there at the back of the horde were beings that could only be the White Walkers: taller than most men, and obviously not human their movements faster and smoother than the wights around them over the snow.

Willowtree pointed that out, watching as they moved further back through the horde which continued to advance towards the Last Hearth. "Do you think those are the White Walkers themselves?"

"Could be." Said Hother, his ancient eyes narrowed thoughtfully before he looked up to one of the archers nearby.

The two of them were standing on top of the gatehouse, which was the tallest tower set into the outer wall of the castle. "Do you think they're within bow shot?"

"Probably not my Lord." Said the archer regretfully, putting an arrow tipped with a dragonglass arrowhead to one side. Those were precious since they barely had 50 of them all told. They had enough daggers to give every fourth man one of them, but the arrowheads had not withstood the test of time as well as the larger daggers. They would only be used against the White Walkers themselves rather than their wights.

Instead he pulled out an arrow, of which they had several thousands. House Umber's fletchers had been making these ever since the first report from the Lord's counsel had reached them, and they had more fire arrows than they did regular ones at this point.

"Damn."

"I wish you would tell me what that little surprise in your moat is my Lord." said Ser Willowtree looking at the older man with one eyebrow raised. "You seem awfully happy about it. Does it have anything to do with the giant piles of coal that are everywhere in the courtyard? Or with the small catapult?"

"Feh, about time ya put it together." said Hother, grinning through his beard at the younger man. "Me house has got the most coal quarries in the North, I figured we should put some of it to good use." It hadn't actually been Hother's idea, but he had certainly run with it when it had been suggested.

Hother hoped that the White Walkers, or at least their wights, would not realize the danger represented by the moat at all. TO help that it was currently covered by wooden slats all around it. With the snow having covered the slats since then, the trap looked as normal as any other bit of ground out there. For now anyway.

The wight army came on, and at the back of that army were several fantastical beasts. Snow tigers, aurochs, and other, strange looking undead beasts. But none of them mattered really, not in this kind of battle. If we tried to face them in the open those beasts could well have spelled our doom no matter how well we're armed, but as it is they won't be worth anything unless they can break our walls somehow. Ser Willowtree thought.

A few moments later the invading army finally reached the outskirts of arrow range. Several hundred normal arrowheads flew out, impacting the frontline here and there and causing absolutely nothing.

Those men came on, even with arrowheads sticking out of shoulders necks, or even heads. Although every wight wielded some kind of weapon, not a one of them seems to bother with a shield or even armor unless they had been killed in it which was a good thing as far as the defenders were concerned. Ser Willowtree nodded grimly, exchanged a glance with Hother, and turned shouting orders. "Switch to fire arrows!" That call passed on all along the parapet, and moments later hundreds of fire arrows were in the air streaking towards the oncoming horde.

Despite the snow that had just begun to fall, those fire arrows struck and began to cause casualties among the undead who screamed as they were lit on fire, losing whatever power was in them continued to drive their bodies forward. As others had noted since this war began, the wight's bodies were even more flammable than normal corpses, which allowed the fires started by those arrows to spread quickly among their ranks, at least for a few moments.

In response the wight's own archers began to fire, but the parapet of the wall protected most of those on it, and the tower's arrow slits and tops were untouched by this attack, too small a target or too high up for that first volley to reach. They'd have to get much closer and fire at a much higher angle to have any appreciable impact on the defenders.

Ser Willowtree frowned however, staring as the undead spread out, not only attacking from two directions now but encompassing the entire area around the Last Hearth. "The fires won't spread from one to another any longer." he said, watching as more fire arrows streaked out, impacting the front of the horde killing hundreds of them, but not slowing the horde down overmuch.

"Don't worry, we've still got some surprises."

"Yes?" Said Ser Willowtree frowning thoughtfully as he stared over the horde and the smoke from the several hundred small fires out there now. The sun was still high in the sky, but snow was falling, making visibility somewhat difficult. "The question is, do they?"

The attack continued for several hours, well into the night, the battlefield lit by the now thousands of fires set in the bodies of the wights. Ser Willowtree had taken a break as had Hother, but now both of them were back on the wall staring out from the gatehouse again into the gloom of night. "The fires are killing my night vision." Ser Willowtree said worriedly. "We can't tell what anything about what's going on out there."

"If I gotta choose 'tween keeping those fire arrows goin', or seeing what's out there, I'll take the fire arrows." Hother replied tartly.

Moments later the first of the wights reached the foot of the outer wall. There they began to climb up, having a surprisingly easy time of it for now. Here and there defenders poured down boiling water, but it didn't do anything to the wights, they simply climbed through it, ignoring the damage it did to their skin. Pitch would obviously be more effective, but there was very little of that in the North save in the towns and in White Harbor. Last Hearth had enough pitch to fill three cauldrons, but only enough to fill one was being used right now. That had been stationed over the gate, where it could do the most good.

Soon the first of the wights climbing the walls came within range of the pikes held in the armsmen's hands. Thrusting down at them, the sharp steel heads severed limbs, cut heads in half and sent more than a hundred wights falling back to the ground. But most of those wights got up and tried to climb back up the wall, their success only hindered by the limbs they had lost.

So the battle went for a while, before a battering ram was brought forward through the undead army. Once it was in position, it began to work on the outer gate.

"Wait for it," said Ser Willowtree, laying his back against the outer parapet. He waited until he had the timing of the battering ram down, then nodded over at two men stationed by a boiling cauldron. "Now."

They tipped the cauldron over the side of the parapet and the pitch poured out and down impacting the battering ram and many of the wights around it. This slowed them down but otherwise didn't bother them. However when a burning torch was thrown down upon the pitch, the entire battering ram went up in flames quickly, along with hundreds of wights all around it.

"GAAAAYAAHHHHHH!" Their screams rose into a crescendo, actually causing the wights around them still pushing for toward the wall to pause for a moment. But then they came on even faster.

While Willowtree was dealing with that, Hother was surveying the rest of the battle. The wights' ability to climb the lower portion of the wall was not surprising, but their progress on the upper portion was, considering they all carried weapons, and didn't seem to have any concept of being able to sheathe them, those that could be anyway, as they climbed. So they're much stronger than normal men. Not good, but not a problem either.

He walked along the parapet and through several towers, surveying the entire battle before coming back to the gatehouse which was not under attack any more. The defeat of the battering ram had stymied that section of the assault entirely, and since it was still burning none of the wights were willing to get close to it.

From there he looked at the walls directly on either side of the gate, scratching at his beard resulting in tiny wight flakes spreading in the air around him for a moment as he watched the number of wights on the wall. Then he nodded. "Light them up."

The reason the wights had so much success climbing the lower portion of the wall was because there was a series of ropes there tied in a crisscross pattern. But it wasn't just a rope, no this rope had been soaked mere hours ago in cooking oil. Being dead the wights had no sense of touch and couldn't tell that the ropes were wet, but they were. And even as cold out as it was, cooking oil was still flammable.

After all, Hother thought, why use a cauldron of cooking oil once, when you can soak countless lengths of rope in it then use the rope like this? Wish I thought of it myself, but can't argue with the deviousness of it.

He had wanted to bring as many of the wights onto the wall as possible before lighting it up, and had done so now. Here and there several of the pikemen were trying hard to keep the wights from climbing over the parapet. There wasn't any break-ins just yet, but it was close, so it was the perfect time to set off the trap.

From every tower men moved out along the parapet, setting several trailing ropes alight where they hung over the parapet. The fire spread down their length to the rest of the ropes quickly.

And just as Hother hoped, setting alight nearly every wight climbing the wall. The wights were too concerned about climbing up to notice the fire until they were burning, losing hundreds, possibly thousands of men in those first few moments.

"GARAAAYAAHHHHH!" A wail of pain went up from thousands of throats, dwarfing the cry caused by the battering ram's destruction as the wights went up like dry kindling where they clung to the walls. Around the Last Hearth the horde actually fell back, retreating from the wall as the rope and their fellows burned.

The White Walkers at the back of the horde stared then as one moved in quickly, the smiles they had worn since the battle began now in abeyance. When they reached bow range they halted, pulling back on their bows and letting loose. With the battle not going their way, the White Walkers wanted to if not turn the tide at least cost the defenders more than they had so far.

Their fire was far more accurate than the wights. Whereas the wights had to fire hundreds of arrows to hit one defender thanks to the castle's defenses, the wights each fired once, and each arrow found its mark. They were no stronger than normal men, but they were hellishly accurate.

Forty-two men died from this assault within an eye-blink, while Hother ducked behind the gatehouse's doorway for a moment watching the White Walker's arrows strike home. Those arrows seem to ignore light armor somehow, penetrating chain mail like it wasn't even there. Though it was turned aside by plate, Hother noted as two arrows struck a man in the chest, one of the archers from House Stark. But if a man was struck by those arrows wherever it hit, they fell spasming to the parapet.

He also noted that regular arrows didn't penetrate the White Walker's own armor. Whatever it was it turned arrows aside. Shaking his head, he bellowed, "Switch to black arrows!"

The archers who had proven themselves the best shots in the castle that were stationed along this portion of the wall quickly grabbed arrows with dragonglass arrowheads. They looked at one another taking glances over the parapet before ducking away, while more men around them died under the White Walker's deadly assault. The most senior of them held up a hand. "On the count of three, one, two, three!"

At that command all of them stood up, aiming at the White Walkers. Two of them died from the White Walkers' arrows, but then their own fusillade went out.

The White Walkers didn't care, calmly reloading their bows not realizing these arrows were slightly different than most. The dragonglass arrowheads slammed into them, punching straight through their strange black armor here and there, killing some of them instantly. Those were the lucky ones.

"IESSSHHHAAAA!" The others who had been shot with Dragonglass screamed, like someone was trying to rend their souls, spasming on the ground as the dragonglass, the embodiment of the fire of the earth, went to work on them like one of their own shots did on a human.

The surviving White Walkers, about ten all told retreated quickly. Then by some unseen command the wights did as well falling back from the Last Hearth, its lower walls still on fire.

Seeing this, Ser Willowtree nodded grimly then bellowed "See to the dead!" At that command man began to move along the wall, grimly going about the business of stabbing every dead man through the heart with a dragonglass dagger. They hoped that this would stop their bodies from rising, and it seemed to work.

As the sun began to go down the White Walkers and their army did not seem in any great rush to rejoin the first day of the siege of the Last Hearth ended. It would start up again soon enough. But unlike Karhold, the Last Hearth would not face the dragons or the White Walker's fell magic right off the bat. It would hold, for now.

OOOOOO

Ghost and Nymeria moved through the night like twin shadows, with a wolf pack numbering more than forty beasts around them. Normal packs were only about six to fifteen wolves at a time. But thanks to the direwolves force of personality, and of course their sheer size and presence they had brought together five different packs into one massive one for the task their companions had demanded of them.

They had been following the mercenary army for over a week now, attacking outriders whenever they could, howling the night away always from the front and west. The army had slowed badly because of this. Any horse that escaped the Army's camp was immediately set upon, and the wolves had eaten well practically every day, building up fat for the coming winter.

Now however, the bridge was in sight. The army would reach it within a few hours, and Ghost and Nymeria both knew that their smaller cousin's parts in this battle were over with. With growls and nips, they drove the Wolf packs away slightly, letting them break up now. Moments later the two of them moved northwards, while Nymeria took the lead, sniffing the wind eagerly as she caught the scent of her bonded.

OOOOOOO

With the direwolves and the wolves harrying his army, Oberyng's progress was slowed tremendously, even more than Jon had anticipated. Worse for him, Lady Taena had underestimated how the smallfolk viewed his army thanks to its previous actions. They snuck out of their hideaways at times, staying well clear of the wolves but also attacking the outriders of the Army whenever they could. Worse, they had stripped their lands bare of anything that Oberyng could use to feed his force.

Of course the mercenaries hunted and killed hundreds of them, and Oberyng ordered reprisals against any nearby, killing hundreds more. Oberyng had even ordered the camp followers they collected executed, passing them off as locals and making a point of doing it where any watchers could see.

Yet while that helped their supply situations slightly it that didn't deter the smallfolk, they were convinced the Seven was on their side. Discontent was rife in his army now, facing a real supply issue and the losses of their horses. Therefore when Oberyng finally saw the bridge ahead of him he sighed aloud in relief. "Finally."

"So we'll finally be rid of those wolves you think?" Said a young voice behind him and Oberyng turned in the saddle to stare at 'Darkstar' Gerold Dayne.

He had acquitted himself well these past few days leading several punitive expeditions and had actually slain some of the wolves that plagued the army's steps. Those wolves bothered Oberyng, quite a lot frankly, more than they did his men because it was so out of the ordinary for wolves to act in such a manner. And there was only ever one House associated with wolves.

But surely a Stark force can't be anywhere near here, can it? But if there is then... no, no this is probably some kind of Seven-based 'miracle' the beasts of the forest rising to protect the faithful. Too small and too weak a 'miracle' to save the lands from our torches though.

"I suppose, at least it can be hoped." Oberyng replied aloud. "Nonetheless, take some of your men and watch our back trail, I want to be on the lookout for them until we're all across the bridge."

Darkstar nodded, turning his horse, one of a bare fifty remaining with the army, around and heading back towards the end of the column, while Oberyng scanned the column for Obara. He spotted her after a moment, coming towards him, flicking her whip out at one or two of the mercenaries who must've made a comment toward her. She looked wan and worried, which was the norm for her these days. She had not taken to live with the army well, and with each passing day there seemed to be distance growing between them.

She nodded a greeting at him, then looked behind the army as a howl was heard in the distance. "It's unnatural!" She spat, not for the first time. "Those wolves, they can't be real wolves, they must be demons wearing wolf skins!"

"We'll be leaving them behind soon enough Obara." Oberyng shrugged. "That's all we can do at this point, our attempt to hunt them down failed miserably nearly every time! You'd think that a human was leading them for how intelligent they were about it."

"That makes my idea even more likely doesn't it?" Obara spat tartly. Oberyng merely nodded and the two rode on.

A moment later the two of them were on the bridge. The bridge was a large affair made of stone. It arced over the river high enough to allow for river traffic to pass beneath it on either side of a single large massive stone column set into the center of its expanse.

Obara and his daughter rested their legs for a moment, leaning against their horses while watching as the army marched past them over the bridge in the normal desultory march of mercenary groups everywhere, before turning to look at the river. Suddenly someone behind them shouted. "There's a barge coming up the river!"

The two of them turned to stare at what was indeed a large barge coming up towards the bridge. While that might have seemed innocent to most of the mercenaries, it didn't seem so to Oberyng, or to the mercenary commanders. He glanced around him, and shouted "Archers! Archers to the riverbank!"

Seeing his daughter's questioning look Oberyng rolled his eyes. "Daughter, the news of our army's advance no doubt spread ahead of us. I refuse to believe that just because we skirted around House Merryweather's land that the river traffic of the Mander would assume we wouldn't be coming back. Remember, paranoia is a necessity for those of us in the business."

Obara scowled for some reason, moving away to her horse leaving Oberynd to look after her quizzically, wondering why she had reacted like that.

At his order, several hundred horse archers who had been dismounted thanks to that those damnable wolves took up position all over the bridge and began to fire at the oncoming barge. The barge stopped, and from where he was Oberynd could see the crew running about while they began to let the rivers flow would take them back down river.

While that was going on other portions of the army continued to move over the bridge, but then a shout from the front ranks went up as well as screams. One of the mercenary leaders came back at a trot, pointing over his shoulder. "Dere's some kindaditch in de way down the road, its curved, and it's also blockin' de way either side 'long the riverbank."

Could Lord Caron have gotten down here ahead of us? No not possible, even if he could he wouldn't be smart enough to try and ambush like this. He is a knight of the Reach, they're all about honor and the charge."Did you see any banners?"

"I didn't spot none, but there coulda been some hiding in the woods."

More cries rang out as arrows from that area began to fly, and Oberynd grit his teeth. "Form the men up and push them out of the way, I have a bad feeling about this." Above them it began to rain again, and Oberynd shook his head. "Oh, of course, doesn't that just make everything that much better!"

Oberynd's army began to shudder like a living thing, portions of it moving forward, while other portions moved to the side to allow the better armored troops of mercenaries from the Company of the Cat to move forward. While that was going on Oberynd spotted his daughter grabbing up a bow and moving to join the archers. "Keep the Dornish portion of the army back for now." He whispered in her ear. "Let them do the dying."

His daughter frowned but nodded, setting aside her bow to join Oberynd in gathering up the Dornish troops and keeping them on the bridge for now. Since most of them were archers currently shooting at the barge heading down river that made sense to their fellows, so none of the mercenaries noticed what was going on.

Suddenly another cry went up from the side of the bridge facing upriver, causing Oberynd to turn. Another barge was coming down river, and he quickly turned to look at the first. The other barge had stayed at long range of other bows, but now arrows were flying from it out into his army. This wasn't aimed fire, just simply hails of arrows, but they didn't have to be given how bunched up his army was on the bridge and on the Mander's western bank.

"Get some fire arrows!" Oberynd shouted at the top of his lungs. "Get some fire arrows on those barges!"

But his cries went unheeded for a few moments, while the archers of his army died under that hail of fire from their opponents. Horse archers might be able to fire faster, but their smaller bows didn't have the range of their opponents, and those barges were just a little bit out of most of his men's range forcing what few archers there were among the mercenaries to take up the slack, and they simply couldn't.

Oberynd growled, kneading his horse forward pushing through the throng of confused and now worried mercenaries, only of whom were still trying to charge forward towards the barricades, while others were now looking over the shoulder worriedly as arrows continued to fall among them. His army was too large for their losses to matter just yet, but it was the sudden turnaround, the fact that they were being attacked like this after so long without facing any real opponent in the open which was making these mercenaries nervous, on top of the morale problems the wolves and the supply situation had caused.

I have to get control of this battle he thought, staring hard at the ditches which were stymieing his forward march. The ditch was about four feet by four feet, with the bottom lined with ditches, with the opposite side featuring a small lip to it two feet or so tall

"Get in among them! Get in among them cut those stakes, first rank cuts the stakes, second-rank armed with polearms pushes forward!" He shouted aloud, and finally the mercenaries around him began to respond like the experienced warriors they were. "Get in among them, they can't have the numbers to face us!"

With that their courage was restored. With the Company of the Cat leading the way, most of the army on the western bank charged forward into the ditch with a roar.

OOOOOOO

Jon stood with two men of House Stark that Ranma had sent with him, both experienced men of the pike Regiment who Ranma hoped Jon would be able to use to train another regiment from the Reach at some point. They had been experienced armsmen before that, and Jon was happy to have them.

"You know the score men!" He said. "Hold the line and weather that first charge!" He said aloud in a calm tone looking to both sides along the half-circle. In front of them the mercenaries finally found their spines again, and began to push forward. Behind him the few archers that Jon had retained with his men fired, aiming for those men among the mercenaries who had horses assuming those were the commanders.

There was a mighty roar, no real single warcry, just a screaming animalistic bellow from the mercenaries as they charged forward. "One warcry lads!" Jon shouted, leaping up onto the small lip of the ditch holding his short swords in the air, trusting to his lizard-lion armor to turn any arrows. "Tell them who we are!"

"Honor above all! Westeros for the King and Queen!" was the cry that greeted him.

Then there is no more time for words. The mercenaries slammed into the ditches, hacking and slashing and dying on the stakes inside of them, while men armed with spears of similar flimsy construction stabbed down into the ditch killing dozens of the attackers. But those first few thousand did their job, cutting and hacking at the stakes, pushing aside a few spears here and there and allowing their fellows to charge up the slope of the ditch into the face of the defenders.

Jon howled "Winter Is Coming!" and brought his twin swords around, one sword blocking a sword thrust from another man, as his other blade found a mercenary's throat opening it up with a quick economical slash across the barred jugular before he turned, dueling with four men at once and sending three of them back into the ditch with fatal wounds in as many seconds before the fourth fell to a sword thrust by one of his men. "Hold! Hold them! Just until the other jaw of this trap closes!"

OOOOOOO

With the arrow assault from the two barges slashing into their ranks from the Mander, all of the mercenaries were eager to get to grips with the opponent they could reach with their own weapons. But there wasn't enough room, not between them and the ditch, to bring their greater numbers to bear.

Thousands of them were still on the bridge and on the other side for a time, but those men were dying quickly from the arrow storm. While the front of the mercenary army knew what was going on and could see an enemy to attack those behind them, those stuck on the bridge and on the other side were close to breaking. Oberyn's decision to keep his Dornishmen slowed this process down, yet it was also costing him his most loyal troops.

From her vantage point downriver Arya looked out from one of the closest farmhouses to the river in whose cellar she had hidden along with Nymeria this morning to avoid Oberyn's scouts. Not that this was difficult given how jittery those patrols had become thanks to Ghost, Nymeria and the surprising resistance from the smallfolk. Because of this, all around the farmstead and in other little hideaways, 600 men of Tully and Piper footmen were waiting within sprinting distance of the bridge and the battle happening there.

Behind her Nymeria lay with Ghost, panting happily at being back with her bonded after nearly a week apart. Ser Piper waited nearby, with Eddard flexing and un-flexing his hand nervously on his sword hilt.

Arya and Ser Piper exchanged a glance, and the older man, nominally in charge of this portion of the ambush, frowned for just a moment surveying the battle. Then he nodded sharply, looking over to his signalman, who turned quickly, waving a bright red pennant out of the farmhouse's doorway.

A moment later his men charged out as silently as possible from their hiding places, joining up on the run into a single force. They were noticed of course, but not before Eddard, Arya and the two direwolves were nearly upon them.

"Winter is coming!" Arya snarled, Fang slashing out and catching a man in the back before she wolf-rushed another, bowling him to the floor while Eddard killed two more with quick, economical thrusts of his sword. But it was Ghost and Nymeria who did the most damage. The entire rear of the Dornish army pulled back, falling over themselves to get away from the direwolves. Most of the few remaining horses screamed and bolted at their approach, mentally tortured for over a week by the constant howling and attacks far beyond what their riders could control.

The four of them held the eastern side of the bridge alone for a few moments, then the men of Tully and Piper were there, cutting down the men who had fled to either side of their approach before they could encircle the foursome. With the eastern bank now devoid of enemies, Ser Piper and his men formed a shield wall to defend the eastern side of the bridge. "The Rivers, the Rivers for the true King and Queen!"

OOOOOO

Darkstar scowled, staring through the rain and the tumult of battle at the colors this new force was wearing. He wasn't very well educated on the noble Houses of the rest of Westeros, but he certainly recognized the youngish boy wearing House Dayne colors following the direwolves around. He smiled evilly, then looked around at the rest of the battle, a sight which caused his smile to slip off his face.

Arrows were still falling from the barges on either side of the river in a seemingly inexhaustible hail. Darkstar wondered how they could keep up that rate of fire. It wasn't aimed fire of course, but that didn't matter, especially since there were so few archers on the Dornish side left. The barges had moved in, allowing the bows to have even more killing power when they struck.

And the casualties they were causing among the mercenaries were horrific. Most mercenaries didn't have much in the way of armor. Chain mail, or leather Jerkins were the norm, with the exception being the larger Company of the Cat, where several hundred had plate and the very few remaining lancers from Dorne. Most of those were on the front line now, trying to hack their way over the ditches and out of this trap.

A direwolf howled, and Darkstar grimaced, rising up in the saddle as his horse tried to bolt, pulling furiously on the reins trying to get control. An arrow whizzed out of the rain, impacting his horse's neck, and Darkstar scowled angrily throwing himself clear as it collapsed to one side. Rolling along the cobblestones of the bridge he came to a stop, pulling out his sword and holding it high. "Rally to me! Rally to me, Stranger curse your hides!"

Several moments later he had a force of around fifty of his own House around him, and he pointed at one edge of the shield wall that had taken possession on the eastern edge of the bridge. "This battle is lost. Let Oberyn and the mercenaries die, we need to get out of here. Push the mercenaries forward in that direction, break their line and then we'll push on and out of this trap."

Darkstar wasn't the only commander with a thought of getting away now rather than fighting. The mercenaries had not faced a true enemy in this entire campaign really, ambushes and small skirmishes, even a few simple sieges yes, but no threat that could conceivably beat them. They had become complacent, certain of themselves and had of course accumulated a lot of loot that now they were scared to lose.

When this battle had begun the Dornish forces numbered around 8,000. He'd lost a little over 3,000 men since this campaign had begun to disease, festering wounds, and simple death in combat, which was actually the least important of the three before this battle began. He now had a bare handful of cavalry, even fewer archers, and what little courage the mercenaries had was waning quickly, and with it any chance of winning this fight.

Oberyn knew it, and as Darkstar and other commanders tried to break out back over the bridge, Oberyn rallied several hundred men near the center of the ditch's half-circle. Jon's twin swords were a visible blur there splattering blood and viscera everywhere, the rain doing no job whatsoever in cleaning them between strikes.

"Kill him," Oberyn said pointing his spearhead at Jon. "Kill him, and this army will break! He's the leader of this force, I don't know why a Stark-led force is here at all, but that is Jon Stark! Kill him, and we can turn this all around, roll up the ditch sides, then move out of range of the barges!"

The men all around him nodded grimly, and they waded through the rest of the army charging forward. Several of them died from the arrow storm continuing behind them, and more died as they slammed into the ditch, joining their fellows there. Still others got bogged down there, hacking and cutting at the spears being thrust down into the ditch at them, or racing up its side to engage the defenders elsewhere.

But twenty-four of them stayed on target, attacking the portion of the ditch right in front of Jon. The Stark men to either side of Jon did their best, engaging three men each, falling back reluctantly. But this opened a hole, one of many that had been opened on the ditch line now.

Beric led a small force forward to assist from the small reserves waiting behind the ditch, but those few men were the last of the reserves. Jon had underestimated the numbers in Oberyn's army, and been forced to push forward his reserves almost the moment Oberyn was able to convince the mercenaries to attack en-masse. The arrow storm was doing its job still, but the line above the ditch was in real danger of being overrun despite the enemy force's morale and lack of organization.

That didn't matter to Jon at the moment. A thrust from one of his blades caught one of his attackers in the shoulder, then Jon pulled back dancing to one side as a broadsword came down on where he had been standing. His blade flicked out, catching that man and across the nose and eyeballs blinding him, causing him to fall back with a scream which ended as a kick from Jon caught him right in the diaphragm rupturing it badly.

Three more men fell before Jon was forced to retreat from a spear thrust towards the head then another one to the side, then the third aiming for a shoulder, each of them faster than the last. But Jon dodged them all, before thrusting his swords up to form an X, with both of his blade, catching the spear right behind the head as it made to come down on his head in a slash. With a heave Jon forced the spear to one side, lunging forward with his blades outstretched.

While the man next to him died to one of Jon's blades, Oberyng deftly dodged to one side, then spun his spear, smacking a kick aside with the butt of his spear as he nodded almost cordially towards Jon Stark, a small yet vicious grin on his face and battle light in his eyes. "So what brings the bastard of Winterfell down into the Reach? I'd think you'd be with your brother facing Stannis somewhere."

"My brother doesn't need me around to carve Stannis into giblets." Jon replied, bringing up one bloody sword in a sardonic salute before flicking the blood off his blade and attacking viciously. "You and your murderous band however have to be stopped!"

Oberyng scoffed, thrusting forward as quickly as he could move his spear forcing Jon to keep his distance, then was forced to dodge backwards as Jon redirected one of his spear thrusts before closing quickly. Using the spear now as a quarterstaff Oberyng blocked several sword thrusts, but one got through on his shoulder, not deeply but opening up his shoulder slightly.

In reply the spear butt slammed into Jon's side, but not with enough force to matter. Instead Jon lifted his thigh up into the butt of the spear as it was pulled back, forcing Oberyng to move with the spear, twirling around quickly and bringing it up to block another sword swipe, only to see Jon's blade hack through the spear halfway down the shaft.

Undeterred Oberyng brought the butt of the spear around, trying to slam it into the side of Jon's head but he ducked. This allowed Oberyng to catch him in the face with a knee, or so he hoped. Instead Jon threw himself to one side dodging that knee.

Then when Oberyng tried to bring the club down again Jon brought one of his swords up and around to slice the half of the spear thrusting towards him in half again, forcing Oberyng to drop the useless chunk of wood left. He backed away hurriedly, falling back down the muddy side of the ditch, grateful for the chance to get away from the deadly young man.

Four other men suddenly charged up over the ditch's lip engaging Jon before he could follow Oberyng. Waiting until the four were engaged with Jon, Oberyng changed his grip on the half of the spear he was still holding, then hurled it forward from a distance of only about five feet straight up at Jon where he fought on the lip of the ditch. "Can't miss!"

Jon saw the flash of the spear through the rain, and dove aside at the last second, accepting a blow from a mace to his shoulder blade that made him grimace in pain to dodge the spear. Even so he thought it was a good exchange, Jon wasn't about to trust any weapon that the man called the Viper wielded.

His sword caught the mace wielder in the thigh, nearly cutting through his leg and dumping him to the muddy, bloody ground. Jon leaped over him, killing two more men before once again engaging Oberyng at the ditch's edge, the Dornish prince now armed with a longsword purloined from a corpse. Around them Beric and his men held on to the edge of the ditch grimly, the battle titling in the balance while arrows and rain continued to fall.

OOOOOO

On the bridge, the fighting was equally furious. Gerold 'Darkstar' and a few lieutenants had been able to rally enough of their men to try and push through the shield wall holding the eastern side of the bridge.

Arya ducked her head underneath a blow coming at her from a broadsword, Fang flicking out and taking that man in the side of the knee before coming up in an arc to catch another man's arm, cutting deep into it. Fang caught on the man's bone and when the man pulled back screaming he pulled Arya off balance for just a second.

The man next to him raised his blade to cut down Arya. He died however when Edric took him in the stomach with his own blade while Nymeria took out another man guarding their back. Ghost was elsewhere in the battle, hunting down a few men who had been able to break through the shield wall and run for it.

With the training Jon and his men had given them the men of Piper and Tully knew how to work together, forming smaller groups here and there cutting down a dozen men for every one of their own even now when their shield wall had been broken in places. They were aided in this by the fact that most of them had better armor of them their opponents, they were well rested, and well fed, whereas the mercenary army was neither thanks to the wolves and the smallfolk's attacks.

Even so some of them were breaking through. Arya growled as she ripped Fang out of that man's bones, pointing to one side as a group of 50 of the mercenaries hacked their way through ten men from House Piper before they began to turn north, trying to get out of the melee. "That group's going to get away!"

Edric looked up, pulling his own blade out of another enemy who had tried to spear Nymeria from behind after being knocked down by someone else. Staring through the tumult of battle and the rain he frowned. "Those men, I know that House, and that man in the lead! We have to get after him!" Arya nodded, and twenty other men turned with them, racing to engage the fleeing force.

However Darkstar had noticed Edric as well, and he grinned evilly falling back through his men pointing them in that direction. "Those two youngsters are coming after us with that damn demonic wolf!" He shouted. "Those of you with spears concentrate on that direwolf, the rest of you cut down those two, and we'll then be able to get away clean!"

Darkstar and his men attacked as a group, pressing forward hard, separating Edric, Arya and Nymeria from their men for a moment, pushing them almost entirely off the edge of the bridge. Several of them with spears tried to keep Nymeria at bay, with very limited success while Darkstar engaged Edric with several other men and the majority of the others tried to pin Arya down.

That was even harder than the battle the spear wielders faced with Nymeria. Arya was a shadow, jumping here there and everywhere using all of the tricks that Ranma had taught her to stay mobile, fang flicking here and there aiming for weak points in their armor when they had any, or simply carving through leather Jerkins with ease.

Darkstar and Edric met, their blades crossed. Darkstar laughed coldly. "So nice to see his cousin! I haven't seen you since you were what, nine?"

"If you're talking about the time you tried to push me off a cliff, I think I was around ten at the time." Edric replied grimly, battering Gerold's sword aside letting it pass over his head and elbowing the man sharply in the ribs.

Before he could follow up on that blow he had to dodge back from a knife thrust as Darkstar pulled a knife from his belt. The older man rubbed his stomach where his nephew's elbow had landed, wincing even through his plate armor. "You seem to have some bite to you now, heh, let's see if it's enough!"

Edric didn't replied, simply smiling faintly holding his sword in both hands for a moment as he attacked, each blow faster and stronger than the one before it. Not a Wolfsworn by any means, he had still trained with Ranma and the others for several weeks, and Jon and continued his training. He was well beyond what any normal swordsman would've been able to deal with, which surprised Darkstar. Known as one of the better swords in Dorne, he realized quickly that his cousin was faster than he was.

Blocking a slash to his side Darkstar pushed, using his greater strength to bear Edric backwards then lashing out with a kick which caught Edric in the thigh. Collapsing to one side Edric was still able to bring his blade up in a massive uppercut, blocking Darkstar's sword, smashing it out of his grip.

Rolling in the mud and bloody ground at the edge of the stone bridge Edric tried to regain his footing, but Darkstar slammed into him, pushing him down with one hand on his head and pulling back his knife for a thrust down into his cousin's vitals. "I will have Dawn cousin! If I have to kill you and everyone in your family to get it!"

Edric grabbed his downward thrusting arm right behind the hand, holding it with both of his own, pushing Darkstar back slightly until the older man was forced to bring his other hand down as well, pushing his knife down. For a moment that they were locked there, then Edric suddenly wrenched to one side at the same time letting Darkstar thrust his dagger down.

The dagger slammed into the mud where Edric had previously been, and Edric rolled back, trapping one of Darkstar's hand underneath him as his own hand came up slamming into Darkstar's chin with punishing force throwing the other man off him to one side. Grabbing up his own belt knife Edric went after him, smacking Edric's own knife thrust to one side. His other hand came up with a clack of mud, and through it point blank into Darkstar's face. Darkstar gasped, reaching up with one hand to clear his eyes from mud while waving his knife in front of them.

Edric lashed out with a kick, knocking the knife out of Gerold's hand flipping his own dagger up so he was now holding the blade by the edge and bringing in around. It crashed into his cousin's temple, knocking him sideways but it didn't knock him out. He still tried to woozily get to his feet, snarling angrily. "Can't finish it cousin?"

"I'm not a kinslayer." Edric said backing away.

Darkstar was about to laugh when a sword caught him right in the back of his neck, severing his spine and pushing through to come out of his jugular in a bloody display. "But you're no kin of mine." Said a female voice from behind him, her words almost the snarl of an animal. "So I don't have a problem with ending this."

Edric smiled faintly, wincing at his wounds as he stared at the body of his childhood tormentor, reaching down to grab up his sword and smiling at Arya taking his place next to her as they moved back towards the bridge and the main battle. "What was that about?" Arya asked.

"I'll explain later, it has quite a bit to do with your own family's history, and a Kingsguard, one of the truest knights to ever live. He was called the Sword of Morning..."

OOOOOOO

Oberyn could now feel that the battle was lost. No cohesion remained among the mercenaries, no will to fight, and from where he was standing he could see most of his own Dornishmen were down dead or unconscious. Without the ability to use maneuverability, his horse archers were overmatched by the range of the longbows, and had been wiped out to a man, and all the other Dornish troops were gone as well. Even his daughter was nowhere in sight, a face that drove a blade of pure ice into his gut. He vaguely hoped she at least would live out the day somehow.

Oberyn knew he wouldn't, he a realist and knew he was overmatched here. Jon had sliced through every man that Oberyn tried to put between them. Now, as the mercenaries tried to retreat away from the ditches Jon and his men were pressing forward, pushing the mercenaries back against the river's edge. They lost dozen of men in the ditches themselves, but the mercenaries didn't have enough cohesion left to hold it against them.

Suddenly Jon was in front of him again, his brown eyes stormy as his blade hacked forward. Oberyn's sword came up, blocking one sword blade and trying to hook both of Jon's shorter swords on his own pushing him back. Jon let him do so, letting one blade fall to the side for a moment, before ducking slightly to one side, allowing Oberyn's next thrust to continue past him.

There was a sharp stabbing pain in Oberyn's chest, and he looked down to find Jon's short sword embedded in his stomach. He looked at Jon, hacking up blood as he smiled grimly. He was going to say something, something about his family avenging him, but Jon's other blade came around, cutting his head off his shoulders in a welter of gore before he could get the words out.

Jon stood down at Oberyn Martell's body, shaking his head. Then he had to bring his swords up again as some men charged at him, banishing his thoughts of what-ifs and wishful thinking to the back of his brain once more.

It took a few more hours to finally wipe out the mercenaries but in the end it was more simple butchery than a battle. No quarter was asked, and even those who mercenaries had tried to surrender were butchered where they stood. An army of a little over 8000 slaughtered by a force barely over half their own size.

At the end of the day, Jon had lost around 900 men, with a further 320 injured ranging from small wounds to crippling injuries. House Piper had taken the brunt of those losses, contributing most of the men on the other side of the bridge, but in doing so they had won back the honor they had lost facing the Westerlands army and in their Lord's decision to remain neutral afterward.

Leaving behind 200 men to go through the battlefield, executing what mercenaries still lived and reclaiming the treasures that they had taken throughout their campaign Jon moved the rest of his force back upriver several leagues before letting them rest for a day. While Beric, Edric and Arya saw to the organization of the camp, Jon retired for the evening to write out a message to be taken over to Longtable and sent to Highgarden from there. The first part of the Reach campaign was over, now Jon needed to look toward the next stage.

OOOOOOO

Petyr smiled thinly his eyes lighting up with joy as he saw the small party moving through the woods along the Green Fork. They were taking their time, and the guards he saw were certainly on watch, but there are ways and ways, and Petyr was an old hand at sneaking around even in the Woodlands.

He looked around shuddering slightly. But this is the last Stranger-damned night I spend in the woods! I can't shake the feeling that someone is following us! That feeling had been at the back of his mind at first, growing stronger over time. Nothing, not taking to the Blue Fork, or staying in Fairmarket seemed to shake it for long.

It's just a feeling he thought for the thousandth time. There's really nothing out there. You've spent so long playing at the great game, you're too used to people watching you so now you're jumping at shadows! Don't mess this up now! You might not get everything out of this you wanted, but you will get something to enjoy at least.

Petyr continued to watch as the small band moved down the river, though he had to move quickly several times to stay out of sight. The Northern man with the spear seemed to have a knack for moving through the woods, and had nearly spied Petyr several times. Eventually Petyr decided to give it up for the day, and slowly retreated through the woods.

He returned to their camp in a small hidden alcove at the base of a giant tree. The tree had fallen to one side its roots coming out of the ground and create this small, yet it was at the top of a small rise in the ground, which coupled with the number of large roots above them allowed this small nook to remain somewhat dry in the rains which were now constantly drenching the Riverlands. Once inside, he nodded at his men grimly. "It's her, we'll strike tonight."

The man all nodded, shifting nervously. The band never spoke of it, but they were all competent burglars, sneak thieves, and other things. All of them had learned over the years to feel when they were being stalked. And they were getting that feeling now, had been for weeks.

"Let's just do this and get it over with." Osney growled, causing his brothers to nod in agreement. "The sooner we're out of the Riverlands the better."

That night Petyr snuck forward with Lothor and Osmund moving as quietly as they could leaving behind the two younger brothers. Once they found the place the northerners had camped for night, Petyr paused scowling angrily as he noticed that one of the guards was the young Northerner, moving around the camp purposefully staring out into the gloom.

Backing away slightly he gestured his two men closer as they moved further back. "We'll not get in there with him on guard like that. One of you skirt around the camp, cause some kind of disturbance north of the camp for him to concentrate on, maybe pull him up out of the camp entirely."

The two men scowled angrily, exchanging glances. They didn't like that idea realizing that such a diversion could well cost them their lives if the northerner caught up with them. News of what the Wolfsworn could do had spread far and wide in the Riverlands, including descriptions of them, and the one with the spear was memorable at least.

Eventually Lothor grunted. "I'll do it. I can swim if need be, and the river's right there." And I also have most of the gold you've paid me these past few weeks on me now if I have to make a break for it.

He moved off through the dark of the wood. An interminable amount of time later there was a faint but slowly growing louder sound to the north of the camp. Eddie frowned, staring in that direction then over at the other guard. He pointed at himself then over towards the noise, and the younger man nodded, moving over to wake another Stark man up to join him on watch while Edd loped off through the woods.

Petyr and Osmund looked at one another, waiting for a few breaths then Petyr nodded and they raced in, moving as silently as they could through the wet and muddy woodland. Aiding this approach both of the guards had turned their attention to the north despite knowing better.

One man died with a gurgle as a dagger went into his unprotected kidney, a hand around his mouth blocking out all sound. The other gasped as a garrote went around his neck pulled taught by Petyr. Several seconds went passed until the man in Stark colors breathed his last, and Petyr gently lowered him to the ground. Petyr nodded grimly, signaling with his hands that Osmund should let out a call if anything happened, before moving forward.

With Osmund standing watch Petyr moved in to the camp, slinking around the two tents that belonged to Sansa's guards, before coming to her own. With a whisper of cloth he moved inside, pulling out a pad of cloth covered in knockout water, a creation of the alchemists that could knock anyone out for ours once the fumes of it were breathed in.

He held it just over Sansa's mouth and nose, taking a moment to look at her shaking his head. She looks so much like dearest Cat, so beautiful. Oh yes, this was an excellent idea. You and I my dear, I will make you so happy and you in turn will make me happy, depend upon it!

With that thought he brought the cloth over her mouth and nose, causing Sansa to wake up with a start. Her hands moved, and suddenly one of them held a small dagger. Luckily Petyr could hold the cloth against her mouth and nose with one hand. Fast as a viper his other hand grabbed her arm, banging it against the ground by her bedroll until she let go of her dagger. A moment later she fell back, unconscious and Petyr breathed a sigh of relief.

That sigh of relief ended abruptly when he heard an owl's hoots. That was the sound of Osmund warning him that the northerner was on his way back. He scowled angrily, grabbing the girl up in his arms and putting her on her back for a moment before running out of the tent.

Moments later Edd was back, frowning as he moved through the camp for a moment then back out the other side, heading towards where the guards should be. He had snuck up on Lothor, but the man had been trying to get into the river, and he had died in a short, very brief fight without giving anything away. But Edd was suspicious of a single man following them like that, and had hurried back.

Petyr and Osmund had just finished binding Sansa's arms and legs when Edd found the two dead guards. "To arms! To arms!"

Edd raced back from where the two Stark men had been killed, moving through the camp and pushing two men aside as they tried to grab him asking what was going on. He pushed open Sansa's tent flap, staring inside aghast. "Kidnappers!" he shouted, turning away and looking around through the woods. "Someone just kidnapped Sansa, spread out, find me some tracks!"

Ben and the others nodded, Ben's face going pale in fear for Sansa. They all grabbed up cobs of wood from the fire, racing out into the woodlands. Their desperate searches through the wet woodlands didn't find anything for some time. But then one of the crannogmen that had joined them at Crannogtown got lucky and found the print of a boot.

Kneeling over it he pointed away through the woods, where by the torchlight tracks could be seen "They must've heard you coming back here, they bolted off, didn't care enough to hide their tracks, traded stealth for speed."

Before he even finished speaking Edd was off racing through the woods with Ben hard on his heels. Soon however the Wolfsworn left him behind, racing through the woodlands recklessly.

Finding the trail had cost the pursuers time, and Petyr and Osmund had reached their small hideaway before they had. "Osney, Osfrey, we've been blown! We must away!"

There was no reply from the little muddy hollow underneath the roots of the tree.

"Osney, Osfrey!" Said Osmund "come on Stranger-damn it, this is no time to fuck about, I don't care if you fools fell asleep, let's go!"

Still no reply. Petyr looked at him and motioned with his head and Osmund moved forward cautiously, sword out. He came backwards quickly shaking his head wildly. "Dead! They're both dead! Looks like some kind of..."

At that point Fenris came out of the woodlands behind him, barring Osmund to earth before he could cry out. His head darted down, ripping the man's throat out with almost negligent ease before the giant direwolf turned, glaring through the night at Petyr who backed away hurriedly. Throwing Sansa down in front of him he pulled out a dagger holding it to her throat. "None of that! You, you beasts are smarter than you're supposed to be, so I know you know I'll kill her if you come at me!"

The jolt of hitting the ground woke Sansa up, and she groaned, shaking her head. "None of that my dear," said a voice that she had heard not heard for months behind her. At the same time Sansa felt a prick against her neck.

"L-Littlefinger?" Sansa gasped, trying to see him, but from her current position she couldn't turn her head around enough to do so.

"I'm delighted you remember me my gorgeous one," he said, kissing her hair behind her head, causing Sansa to shiver in revulsion. "I regret the method of our meeting, but life has not been good to me of late."

"A-and you think this will make it better? You think..." she tried to laugh only to stop as the point of the dagger pressed into her throat more. "You, hehe, you think there is anywhere you can go, anyplace you could hide that my brothers would not find you? You're not that much of a fool!"

"You're naïve my dear, naïve but beautiful, so gorgeous, just like your mother was at your age. Did Cat ever tell you of our years in Riverrun together? We were in love once Cat and I, so much in love. But she had her duty!" He spat the word. "And her father was a fool who did not see my mind and abilities, only the size of the fortune my family could call on. He spurned my suit of her, and Cat was first forced into a betrothal with that lout Bandon, who died like a fool! And then, when I thought the way might be clear for her and I to finally love one another openly, your father accepts the transfer of the betrothal to himself."

"Liar!" Sansa growled. "My mother never loved you! She saw you as a younger brother, and that faded quickly! She came to loathe you..." Sansa stopped speaking as the knife pressed in deeper.

"I know that now, the moment Cat was forced to lay with that wolf of a father of yours, I should have realized she was out of my reach. Yet still I hoped, still I planned! Only for Eddard to survive! For your family to not only survive but thrive despite all that was thrown at them, by me or others! But by that point sweet Sansa I had moved on anyway."

His hand moved over her head down her cheek and neck. Again Sansa shivered trying to move away as Fenris growled, stepping in closer.

"Stop right there!" Petyr said looking up at the direwolf. "You're going to be a good little animal and you're going to let me go! Because if you don't, I'm going to cut her throat. I know you can understand me, and I would rather die with her than allow anyone else to despoil Sansa as Eddard did to Cat!"

Fenris growled, then looked at Sansa whining a little before moving backwards slightly, still more than close enough to jump on Petyr if he tried to get away of course.

Petyr however turned his attention away from Fenris, going back to stroking Sansa's hair in a way that disturbed her greatly. "You, you combine all the attractive features of your mother, with none of the experience that so sullied her, that turned her away from me!" He laughed, leaning down again to kiss her hair once more. "I know that this isn't a good way to start wooing you my love, this isn't how I wanted this to go at all, but I believe that you will come to love me as I love you in time."

"Never!" Sansa's said a full body shiver going through her at the very idea of this man touching her. "Never!" She yelled aloud even when he pulled her hair sharply.

Fenris growled again moving in quickly but Petyr glared at the direwolf pressing the dagger hard into Sansa's neck. "Back you unnatural beast-ARGH!"

Edd's spear came out of the dark of the woodlands behind Petyr, taking him in the shoulder of the arm holding the knife to Sansa's throat, cutting the arm off almost entirely. He continued to scream as Sansa scrambled away trying to break the grip his other hand had on her hair then Fenris was on him.

"Seven no it cannoGHH!" Petyr screamed as the direwolf bore him to earth, its fangs ripping at the arm holding Sansa, tearing it off at the shoulder and allowing Sansa to roll away while the giant beast finished tearing Petyr to shreds. The last thing Petyr saw as his head lulled to one side was Sansa glaring at him with hate in her eyes, visible in the moonlight above.

Edd raced in, nodding at Fenris. "Fenris couldn't you have, I don't know, finished him off before he took Sansa away from us?" As a Wolfsworn Edd understood how smart Fenris was, so addressed him as he would a man.

The giant direwolf huffed at him, fangs bared on one side of his blood-stained muzzle in a gesture as close to a scowl as he could get. Tracking Petyr had been very difficult, and he had almost lost him several times thanks to Petyr staying in towns and exiting with other people or because of heavy rainfall.

Fenris turned to Sansa now, whining slightly and wiping his bloody muzzle on the grass beneath him for a moment before moving over to nuzzle her shoulder. The redheaded pack-mate didn't like messy or bloody things Fenris remembered. But that didn't seem to matter to her now as she nuzzled happily into his shoulder while Edd and Ben untied her, murmuring "Good wolf, good wolf."

OOOOOO

Timot Hammerhand's back scouts saw Ranma coming from where they had been just about to pull off the Kingsroad and marched towards the Crannogtown. The small army halted quickly while Hammerhand made his way back through the column to meet Ranma. "My Lord? What happened? Where's the rest of the Army?"

"Taking to sea at Maidenpool, but they'll take at least a month and a half to get to White Harbor, we're needed up in the North now! Word reached Riverrun and then was passed down to us that the White Walkers had found a way around the Wall." Ranma replied grimly, gulping down some of his water at the same time.

Hammerhand looked around at the men within earshot, all of whom had stiffened noticeably. "I've been marching the men as close to the pace you normally set us to as we could go my Lord, I don't know if we can speed up any further. But we're nearly to Crannogtown, that should save us at least two, three weeks marching, depending on where in the North you want us to go."

"No." Ranma said with a shake of his head. "I want you to keep marching down the Kingsroad through the Neck. Send a messenger to Crannogtown, I'll give him a message to give to Lord Reed, he should be at Crannogtown waiting for you, and I don't want to stop. He should still take command, but I want you to keep marching up the Kingsroad to Winterfell that way."

"Why don't you want us to take the boats to White Harbor my lord? Surely going by the White Knife would let us cut off at least a week's worth of travel time?" Timot asked.

"Not if the river's frozen, it won't. And I don't want you to use the ships at Crannogtown because there's another army, one from the Vale, coming up behind you about two week's march back. I want those boats still here waiting for them when they get here."

In fact the White Knife had indeed frozen in places by this point, slowing river travel tremendously including the supplies of dragonglass weapons. But it hadn't stopped them just yet, not even those on the Broken Branch. Yet in that case, the men who had been sent with those shipments would find the river had frozen behind them, slowing their return journey to a crawl and forcing the commander to decide to join the defense of Hornwood rather than chance it. When news of Karhold's fall reached them, that choice proved even more correct.

"Very well my Lord we'll keep on going, though if we set the pace we need to stave off disease in the Neck we'll need to rest at Moat Cailin."

"I'll leave that to you and Reed, but keep on going as quickly as you can." Ranma ordered.

"Won't you be waiting for us there?" Timot asked.

Ranma shook his head, already moving off. "No, I'll meet you in Winterfell. I need to get there as fast as possible, and that means going on alone. If Winterfell falls, the North falls with it!"

---

End chapter

To those who wonder, yes, Obara is dead. No way I could let her live, that would be stretching the laws of chance in a combat setting way too much. But with Obelyn gone, the last large enemy force in the south is crushed, leaving Jon, Margaery and Willas to turn their attention to smaller enemies, domestic affairs, and reinforcing the North. Not much happened with Ranma and co. this chapter, travel times being what they are, but that won't be the case in the next chapter. The White Walkers are riding high right now, but they better watch out, the big bad wolf is coming home.

Hope you all enjoyed, and as always, please leave a review.

*Chapter 20*: Chapter 20

I do not own ASolaF or Ranma. You know how you can tell? Because I'm actually going to finish the story.

Would like to thank ultimaflare0 for his work as a beta on this, and Anthony444 for his irreplaceable aid in fact checking and plot points.

---

Chapter 20 Winter's Grip, a Fulcrum's Effect

Lady Maegh Mormont had not been idle since returning to her island after the War Council in Winterfell. First, she had gathered the heads of the families that resided on their island and informed them of events. Unlike other major Houses, House Mormont did not have minor houses under them, instead they had large powerful families, all of them intermarried to one another and to House Mormont, most of whom lived almost but not quite like smallfolk would elsewhere. Bear Island's population wasn't large, but they were a tight knit community, and a very martial one as well.

While a palisade was quickly raised around the scrub and broken stone scattered around House Mormont's longhouse and various other structures built elsewhere, foodstuffs began to be prepared and set aside, until the longhouse had enough food within its walls to feed the entire population of the island for at least half a year. Then that palisade was reinforced with what stone they could move into position behind it, and arrows laid aside, fire arrows and regular arrows, as many of both kinds as could be made. So many that they had to be stored in several of the guest rooms in the longhouse rather than in the armory.

When the news of Skagos falling and its implications was sent to her from Winterfell along with the news of reinforcements being sent to her, Lady Mormont once again reacted forcefully and energetically. She ordered the island's small graveyard dug up and the bodies within burned, no matter how old or decayed they were. Bear Island was small enough that it had only had that single graveyard, but it was still dirty, disgusting work, and the people on it had to be rotated off on practically a daily basis to make certain that no sickness or disease could spread from the bodies.

Maegh also sent the old, lame and what few pregnant women were on the island back to Deepwood Motte. Anyone above the age of twelve that was strong enough to pull a bow however remained behind, man or woman. House Mormont had long prided itself in training its womenfolk in war, and that bore fruit now, allowing Bear Island to raise a force consisting of a little over 4000 men and women combined, where any other Great House would only have been able to field half of that if they were lucky from the same area.

The first reinforcements from House Glover arrived barely a week after the message from Winterfell. Maegh greeted Robett Glover, the younger brother of Lord Glover, shaking the taller yet far less built man's hand firmly, so firmly the younger man winced. She noticed and was pleased, though did not show it on her face. "What've you brought me?"

"Around 600 men, the most my House can raise beyond those defending Deepwood Motte. My brother made the decision to not send his entire force to aid you, because he figured that the defense of the town was more important. After all, we don't know if the White Walkers will be able to send forces past Bear Island in the same manner they reached Skagos."

"Good." said Lady Mormont nodding brusquely. "We wouldn't've been able to house more men anyway. In fact, I sent word of that back to Winterfell, House Ryswell and House Tallhart's forces will be more use elsewhere."

That had been several days ago, and since then the temperature had dropped precipitously night after night, until it was so cold that the ocean around the island had begun to freeze. Even so Maegh insisted on keeping patrols going along the shoreline. House Mormont had built several small but extremely well-made guard posts at the best places for ships to come ashore, each of which had enough wood to allow them to set up a signal fire which could be seen from further into the island, and the patrols were based out of these tiny forts.

It was the men from one of these which sounded the first alarm. Before the fire burned low Lady Mormont and more than four-fifths of her forces had gathered on that shoreline. Maegh of course led the force, leaving her second eldest daughter Alysanne in charge of the defenses of their longhouse, intending to ask the scouts what they had seen personally. But when they arrived, that proved unnecessary.

Out in the ocean there was an island where there should not have been one. But it was not an island of stone, rock and sand. This island was ice, a massive mountain of ice cut away from the Frozen Shore or further north and sent out into the ocean. It rose out of the water at least twenty stories, it was difficult to tell from this distance, out of the ocean around it, and was even wider across. And it was slowly heading towards Bear Island.

I think we just solved the mystery of how the White Walker's got forces to Skagos, Maege thought grimly. This is a new trick, and one with a lot of longer-term consequences behind it. For now though, it gives me and mine something to hit at least. She'd nodded over to the patrolmen. "Good eyes, how long do you think we have until it reaches the shore?"

"They should be here by evening tide lady," said one of them.

She nodded brusquely then shouted orders. "You lot, dig some ditches and get some stakes ready. You forty, head back to the longhouse and grab as many torches and fire arrows as you can. I mean to see if we can see this attack off here and now."

That evening the iceberg did indeed smash into Bear Island's shore, causing a shivering shake to go through the feet of those waiting by the shore nervously. Now that it was so close, they could tell that the mountain of ice sloped gradually at first, and was quite wide too, about a bow's range along the edges. From there it had several large crevasses on the side of the main mountain of ice, which rose sharply from that point and then spread to either side out well beyond what they could discern in torchlight.

For a moment after that, the night was silent save for the crackling of the torches and the curses of a few men praying to the Old Gods for strength. Not for protection, not to save them, but to give them strength to do those tasks themselves. Such was the Northern way.

Then suddenly there was a keening horn blow from high above in the dark of the upper areas of the iceberg and hundreds of arrows sped out from the night above. At the same time a horde appeared around the edges of the iceberg from some hidden cavern the entrance of which could not be seen by the defenders current position.

The attackers looked like wildlings, Lady Mormont had seen more than a few in her time, while others looked to be clad in the remains of Night's Watch colors, though beyond that Maege could not tell anything of their origin in the light of the torches. But they weren't the source of the arrows which were hitting her line. That came from higher up the iceberg, from some hidden archers they couldn't see in the dark.

She'd already lost six or seven men to those, but the wights charging them were a greater threat. "Fire arrows on that horde!" She shouted, pointing with her sword at the oncoming wights. "Regular archers, see if you can do anything about those blasted arrows!"

Her orders were instantly obeyed, half the force of archers firing fire arrows at the oncoming horde. Given the fact their level of training varied wildly, their fire was noticeably sporadic. Yet at the same time at this range they could hardly miss. Indeed for a few moments as the battle began if an archer missed his or her target, they still hit some other wight.

At the same time the armsmen and levy forces of the island raced forward to take a position along the ditches. Many began to bang their shields, shouting battle cries more to get themselves psyched up for the battle than in any real hope that they would have any effect on the enemy's morale.

The other half of the archers, mostly House Glover men, fired up into the iceberg, raking its visible face from one edge to the other. They still couldn't see, the dark of the night was too oppressive for that, and their own night-sight was shot to hell because of the torches and fire arrows that were even now streaking into the attacking horde of wights.

This was telling, because they could not silence the arrows coming at them. Men continued to fall screaming, their bodies freezing and giving out even from arrow wounds that they could've should have survived otherwise. Dealing with these casualties tied up more and more men as the battle went on.

The horde of wights crashing into the ditches along the shoreline however had a much harder time of it. Men and women armed with long makeshift spears thrust out at them, while others, mostly those younger, threw burning faggots of wood over their heads to land among the horde. Fire arrows slammed into former wildling and Night's Watchman alike, causing them to go up like torches in the dark, screaming. It was the first noise they had made in the battle.

The wights spread in an effort to find a hole in the ditches, but that did not allow them to concentrate enough forces to burst through the defensive lines. Those ditches spread far enough to either side of where Lady Mormont was that they couldn't get around them without going into the water, which they seemed loath to do even here on the shoreline, where the water was slowly freezing into ice.

That was an interesting little fact that she made a note of, but then Maege roared, "Here We Stand!" charging forward and joining her men along the line as a renewed surge of wights struck the center of her defenses. After a few moments of getting her blade wet cutting dead wights into pieces, she retreated from the line, staring at the overall battle while more men moved forward, hurling the bits and pieces into the countless fires that had started up scattered around the battlefield.

The sniping from the iceberg was still going on, wreaking a toll on her men, but the force of wights was down to a bare handful, and as she watched the last of them fell struck by several fire arrows at once. There was a cheer of 'Here we Stand!', then the archers with fire arrows retargeted firing their arrows up at the ice. For a moment Lady Mormont thought they were trying to simply melt the massive edifice of ice, but then she shook that fancy off. No one was that stupid, they're just doing their part.

Yet the attacks from above continued unabated, and she scowled angrily. They didn't have any Valyrian blades here since Longclaw was with Jeor Mormont in Castle Black. Nor did they have any stock of dragonglass weapons. But right now, it looked as if that they were going to have to go in and dig out these White Walker's anyway.

Just as she thought that however more arrows began to fall, so many that it drove her forces out of the ditch and she cursed, knowing what that might mean. "Fall back! Fall back to the wood line!"

All around her men obeyed with alacrity, but hundreds of men went down from that sudden deluge of arrows. As they did Lady Mormont stared in astonishment at what only had to be undead giants suddenly lumbering out of a crevice in the iceberg, dozens of them. With them came what only could be a few white Walkers themselves. There were only a few of them, but their alien appearance was obvious even from here.

So that's the face of the enemy, Maege thought, before reaching down to grab up a fallen bow and a sputtering fire arrow. She pulled back on the strain, and let loose trying to hit one of the White Walkers.

One of the giants however lumbered in her arrows way just as she loosed, and it roared aloud in pain and fury, patting at the arrow in its chest. Unlike a wight however it didn't immediately combust. It was not made wholly from flesh magically revived from death, ice and stone were also part of its makeup. With this defense it was able to pat the fire out before surging on, roaring angrily.

Maege absently noted that too was a difference between these undead creations and simple wights. The wights made no sound as they charged only when they died. Indeed, their battle silence was one of the most unnerving things about them. But these things seemed to still have some life in them, or perhaps had been gifted with it rather than were simply extensions of their White Walker's will.

She fell back to the cover of the trees as the arrows from above continued to pepper the men around her, taking a heavy toll on the defenders as they continued to retreat. But Maege was still able to watch as the giants reached the ditches, smashing all the stakes aside before scrambling up easily over the ditches.

Scowling angrily Maege rallied the men nearest her with a single bellowed command, then pointed her sword back the way they had come. "One volley of fire arrows at our dead, then fall back!" Maege raised her voice as the men around her obeyed her order with alacrity, making certain all the men nearby could hear her. "Fall back, fall back to the longhouse!"

Knowing that controlling her people in this mad nighttime retreat through the woods and scrub of the island would be impossible Lady Mormont simply took to her own heels, running off as quickly as she can despite the armor she wore. She paused occasionally to shout encouragement and orders when she saw clumps of men around her gathering several hundred as the retreat went on through the night. Yet the dense scrub and forest of the island made any kind of organization for this maneuver impossible.

Even so her men were not fools, and that initial shout had been heard and passed on by most everyone on the battlefield. Rather than fight a losing the battle for the rest of the island against enemies they could barely see in the dark, Lady Mormont pulled back all of the defenders with her to the longhouse. She hoped that the cleared ground around it and the scattered cover would allow her archers to get the better of any White Walkers that tried to attack.

Maege was not the first to meet reach her family's seat, nor was she the last. But by the time the last straggler came in gasping and breathing loudly his breath visible over chapped, cracked and frostbitten lips, Lady Mormont had an estimate of the numbers.

She shook her head in dismay. Over 2,400 men lost already! Robett was missing, along with more than half of his men, and the losses among her people were atrocious, especially among the less experienced men and women of the levy forces. Though thankfully not the younger set who had, thanks to not wearing much armor, been able to retreat faster than the rest. That and the fact the attackers didn't seem to care about what targets they aimed at saved many of them.

But we'll probably see many of those dead soon enough, she thought grimly, ascending to the palisade around the longhouse as behind her along the roof of the longhouse and all around her archers refilled their quivers and set up braziers. Fifteen men on the longhouse roof also began to work on loading up a small catapult which had been built on top of it. Other men tossed rope ladders over the side of the longhouse and she nodded grimly. Good Alysanne, you listened! That meant the drop fall had been activated as she had ordered, which might help the longhouse protect itself if the palisade was lost.

The drop fall the longhouse used was somewhat similar in type, though Maege did not know it, to the one that House Stonegate used. But instead of simply dropping large rocks down to block the interior of a gateway, House Mormont's drop fall dropped a single gigantic piece of stone into a set recess into in the ground along grooves in the longhouse's thick outer wall. That piece of stone weighed so much that even Ranma, Jon and Smalljon combined would have had trouble lifting it. That, plus the groove and the recess it was set into meant no one could bring enough force to move it without shattering the stone walls of the longhouse and the stone floor as well.

While that thought was a comforting one it soon left Maege's mind as, cries from the watchers around her abounded. "Here they come!"

As Maege had feared first out of the trees were the wights, the men and women who'd fallen by the shoreline turned and sent against their still living brethren. More than one man choked back a sob as they saw a loved one, and a woman near Maege broke down entirely, shaking her head and sobbing. "No Bartran, no!"

"None of that!" Maege barked. Those aren't your loved ones out there any longer! They're simply wights now, their bodies turned to evil! Will you let those bastards use them so, dishonor their memory so?!"

The woman choked back a sob, wiping a gloved hand over her eyes, but her tears had frozen where they fell down her cheeks. Thankfully she was able to wipe her eyes away and she stood up, thrusting a fire arrow into a nearby brazier and putting it to her bow. "Come on you cold fuckers, Here we Stand!"

"Here We Stand!" the roar went out all along the palisade, and the defenders fired. They fired off so many fire arrows that it lit the ground around the palisade.

The sternness of that response seems to take the attackers aback, and most of the new wights died in the semi-open ground around the palisade as their masters hesitated. When the giants came out into the scrubland that surrounded the longhouse they did so without any further cover from their people. Nor, thanks to the broken nature of the cover, could they bunch up en-masse or find adequate cover for their large bodies. Two of them died under half dozens of fire arrows impacting them almost all at once.

At that point at some unseen signal the others retreated back into the forest. Soon after that the ice arrows or whenever they were started to fall among the defenders, shot by White Walkers who had made their way forward, using the scattered cover to somehow made their way forward unseen. But the palisade gave enough protection from this assault. Moreover it gave the defenders the same height advantage the White Walkers had possessed at the shore.

Their returned fire actually started to force the attackers back. The fire arrows couldn't kill the White Walkers, and they lacked the dragonglass needed to penetrate the White Walker's armor. But enough fire arrows could apparently singe or injure the White Walkers, and they seemed much more conscious of their own lives than they were of their undead thralls.

Lady Mormont stayed on the wall throughout the night, hoping that the White Walker's had already lost too much of the strength they'd brought to the island to attack in force. As the sun rose, bringing with it the light and an end to the attack it seemed that was indeed the case. They still had those giants, so Maege wasn't about to become complacent, and she had no idea of their numbers, but it looked as if they'd be able to defend the longhouse. At least for now.

During the night Maege had taken the time to get an accurate number of the defenders left, and came away grimly satisfied. She still had a little over 2200 men and women, and she quickly organized them into four different sections. One section would be on guard, two sections sleep, and the fourth doing repair work, eating and simply having downtime. That group would rotate with the one on guard, then they would switch off with the other two.

Soon after that Maegh left the wooden palisade, moving back to climb up one of the rope ladders with more effort than she would ever admit to, before nodding at her second eldest daughter. The two women shared a wordless hug there in the corridor leading up to the longhouses roof, before Alyssane straightened and moved around her mother, heading out to take over the defense during the day watch.

Maegh looked after her for a moment, thinking of her, her two grandchildren, and her three other daughters. The only one of her family not present here was Dacey, who was serving in the Wolfsworn. She wondered for a moment if any of them would see the spring, then shook off her bleak thoughts, going in search of her House's maester.

Maester Feros was an old man of her father's generation, who had trained up two of the local boys and a local girl (despite all convention being against it) to help him watch the ravens now that he no longer could get around as well as he could, knowing that finding a new maester to serve House Mormont would be an impossible task. The three of them nodded at her as she came into his suite, though he simply turned his head to look at her through rheumy eyes. "I understand that the battle did not go well?"

"It went about as well as we could expect I think." Lady Mormont growled angrily. "I want a message sent to Winterfell and Deepwood. We can hold out here for now, but they're not to bother sending more aid to us unless they bring dragonglass!"

OOOOOO

Their scouts of course spotted it first, their target, their goal, the place where their most hated enemies had lived for generations. While it might not be the most important in terms of strategic importance, or even defending the North from reinforcement from the rest of Westeros, it was important to the White Walkers because of what it represented. Because to them, Winterfell and House Stark represented their defeat.

Memories were long among their people, and the memory of their loss thousands of years ago, when they were turned back, pushed out of lands that were rightfully theirs, and then walled off like animals, burned in every one of them like the accursed fire burned in the earth itself. They didn't care to know much about their enemies, but the name House Stark, that they knew.

That was why the main strength of the force the White Walkers had been able to transport to Skagos was sent marching on a straight line to Winterfell from the moment they reached the shores of the Bay of Seals. No new Builder would rise, no new Winter King would beat them back, not this time, whatever the Old Gods hoped. With the humans so busy cutting down one another in the South, Winterfell would fall, and the true kings of winter would put their hands on the soul of the North and crush it utterly.

With the dragons flying overhead, and thousands of wights new torn from the earth along their route the army marched on to Winterfell.

OOOOOO

Ranma had barely paused long enough to take a quick meal with Timot before racing on. It took him about a day to cross the Neck from there, and he arrived in the early morning dawn at Moat Cailin. He smiled gratefully when he saw the three manned towers of the ruins of the massive castle, knowing that he was about a little over two-thirds of the way home. His smile widened however when he saw the rampant lizard-lion on a field of green with an eye of red that signified Lord Reed was in attendance.

Shouts went up from the watchers on the towers as he came into sight, and Ranma chuckled as he saw more than one man visibly start at the sight of him, visible even from this distance. I wonder what the smallfolk will come up with to call my journey. The Wolfs Run, hmm sounds a little cowardly. The Kings Run, even worse. Either cowardly or a competition at a tournament. That's actually a tough one...

A moment later Ranma put those thoughts to one side as Lord Reed appeared, holding up his hand in token of greeting as he moved away from the doorway of one of the towers. Ranma slowed down, nodding his head at the older man. "Lord Reed."

"We were told you might be coming." The older man said without preamble, his low, rasping voice causing Ranma to smile fondly. "I've already gathered what I can of the Neck's forces. We're not the most numerous Houses your majesty, but all told I can field around 500 away from the Neck and the Moat. In total 900, I'll leave more than a hundred men to keep order in the Neck, and the rest will bolster the defense here at the Moat. But every man I've got are trained hunters, archers and all decent with their trident too."

"I thank you for that Lord Reed." Ranma said thankfully. "Though, how did you hear that I'd be coming? I can understand your mustering your forces, but not that part." Unless rumor really can fly faster than raven wings, that would be a little freaky frankly.

"My son." Lord Reed said nodding his head over to the tower he'd exited, where Jojen was making his own way forward. He stared blankly at Ranma, a thin almost unpleasant smile on his face. Jojen had hated and loved his ability to predict the future his entire life. He hated what it could do to his body at times when the visions came upon him suddenly. But he loved being able to tell the future like that, to see people and know their fates. It gave him a sort of power, one at odds with his small, somewhat weak body.

Lord Reed went on. "My son saw your arrival, he said that if you decided to 'run the earth' as he put it, then the North might have a chance. If you put all of your trust in wind and wave, then the heart of the North would fall before you got here."

"The heart of the North is a lot stronger than you give it credit for Jojen." Ranma said smiling thinly. "I don't doubt that the North would have been able to hold out even without me there for weeks if not months."

"The future is clouded." Jojen said, staring hard at Ranma. "The fulcrum must reach the place where it can tip the balance. If it cannot, the avalanche will start, and it will not stop. With every victory the avalanche will gain strength, until they can sweep all before it."

Ranma nodded biting his lip to keep from saying something really sarcastic. Wow, that's just really informative, not! Fucking prophecies. "I see." he said instead. "Thank you for that Jojen, I suppose."

With that he and a shake of his head Ranma turned back to Lord Reed, who was smiling somewhat blandly, realizing that Ranma didn't put much faith in his son's visions. Not that Reed blamed him at this point. Where before his son's visions would've been accurate if somewhat cryptic, these days even Jojen had trouble discerning what they were about, and their accuracy had also been failing badly.

"Tell me, do you have ravens here? Specifically one for Barrowton?"

"I do."

"Good, I'll need one of them, and parchment and ink. I want to send a message to Lady Dustin, an order to send all the horses and carts she can gather down to the Moat."

"That's a nice thought, but we won't need that much transportation, we have our own." The older man replied, gesturing to one side where several carts were being constructed, the finishing touches put on them, and small doughty horses being led to them. There weren't many of those horses, the men of the Neck had no use for such, but House Ryswell had sent them down in preparation for aiding the Lord Reed people into the battle.

"They're not for you my friend, they'll be for the force coming up the Kingsroad. I have around 6000 or so men marching into the Neck even as I speak. They'll be here soon enough, and they'll need to be rushed on their way afterwards. In fact, I'd like you and your men to wait here for them, you'll take command once they reach here. Timot Hammerhand's a good man on the march, but he's not a Lord, and he doesn't have enough experience leading people into battle for me to want him in control once they get past the Neck. I have to believe that the White Walkers might be able to send small scouting portions down into the Barrowlands at least."

Reed nodded, smiling at that news. "How long until the rest of the army arrives?"

"There's another army beyond them on the march from the Vale lands, about 12,000 strong. They'll take boat at Crannogtown then ship over to White Harbor, though I have no idea how long it will take them to get there. I didn't stay with them long enough to get a feel for their marching speed. The rest of the army will have taken to sea in Maidenpool when we heard the news from Riverrun that my father passed on, but Davos Seaworth, the master of ships at this point, if my wife hasn't changed the title, says it'll be at least a month and a half at best for them to get from there up to White Harbor."

Jojen winced, but Ranma simply looked at him, and he shook his head. "The dragons will be needed, needed at the Wall for some purpose. It involves a stone, and magic as old as the Wall itself. But more than that I cannot say."

"That is interesting, and helpful thank you Jojen." Ranma said, smiling at the boy before going on, taking the quill and parchment as it was handed to him writing out a quick note before sealing it with both the Stark seal and the new royal House seal, before handing it back to the maester Lord Reed had brought from Greywater Watch along with the ravens. "As for me, I need to get going again."

"Alone? You just said that the White Walker's will probably have scouts out past Winterfell." Reed said looking at the younger man in concern.

"They might," Ranma grinned, reaching up to pat the hilt of Ice where it rode over one of his shoulders. "But if they do, it's going to go very badly for them. I didn't run all this way just to lose to the first group of cold-blooded bastards I come across." With another laugh Ranma clapped Lord Reed on the shoulder, turned and raced on.

OOOOOO

In comparison to her husband's race to the north, Daenerys and the rest of the army moved at a snail's pace. No, she thought darkly, a snail would put us to shame. Contrary winds and storms had forced the fleet to move at a glacial pace through the Bay of Crabs, taking over a week to cover what should've only taken four days max with Ser Davos and other local experts leading the way.

"Nor were we able to get away as soon as I had hoped," Daenerys said, shaking her head and looking over to where Merry was feeding more wood into a small brazier, while her two dragons curled up around one another on the other side of the large tent that had been set up on the deck of Davos's flagship. Both dragons were too large to fit into anything but the main hold now, and Daenerys refused to be parted from them, so she routinely bedded down here on deck with them. The Wolfsworn grumbled about it, but they too bedded down on the deck as protective as a pack of wolves around their cubs.

"I know," Merry replied. "Still, it's not like you were wasting your time." She leaned in, whispering now. "And besides, I needed some recovery time to allow myself to walk without a noticeable limp."

Daenerys laughed, pulling the younger girl into a hug and kissing her fondly on the forehead, just in case there were any nearby watchers who could see their silhouettes on the outer tent canvas. It was true however that she hadn't exactly been wasting but the time spent waiting for the fleets to get underway.

First, she bid farewell to Ser Barristan and to the forces heading down to the Stormlands and the Reach forces which were heading home. Ser Barristan led the shattered remnants of the Stormlands army, a bare 2,000 men, combined with a little over five hundred men from the Crackclaw Point Houses, and a further six hundred heavy cavalry cobbled together from various Reach Houses under Lord Ashford, with orders to supplement their numbers from House Selmy and the other Stormlands Marcher lords.

The Reach forces heading home consisted of practically all of their remaining heavy cavalry, whose horses would be useless in winter conditions for any length of time, which made up some 5,700 of the barely 9,240 strong force from the Reach that that survived serving under two Baratheon kings in quick succession. The rest, archers and light infantry, were added to the Royal Army, broken up and placed under the lords who had proven their worth to Ranma and Daenerys. Most notably Jason Mallister, Tytos Blackwood, Rickard Karstark, and Greatjon Umber, the four lords Daenerys was leaning on heavily for their expertise in warfare now that her husband had raced off alone to the North. These men would serve out the duration of the campaign in the North, and be paid as the rest of the army.

Daenerys also had to write out various orders, as well as an updated report for Jon and Lady Margaery, which would be sent first to Riverrun and then down via raven to Highgarden. Another message was sent overland to find new Lord Blanetree, informing him of recent events. A third was sent to the Golden Tooth and Lord Brynden, informing him of events since he had taken command there. With both Daenerys, Ranma and their armies in the North, Brynden, Blanetree, Ryger, and the Lord Piper became the most powerful forces remaining in the Riverlands, while Jon became their official voice in the South.

He's going to hate that, she thought to herself, shaking her head and moving away from Merry for a moment to sit down by her dragons. Rhaegon nuzzled into her side, and she gently stroked his eye ridges as Merry moved over to sit beside Sunfyre, sitting on a small cushion set onto the deck. The deck was wet and cold of course, but the large brazier set into the center of the tent and the warmth reflected off the dragons made it somewhat pleasant for the two girls.

"I'm still worried about allowing Lord Serret go." Daenerys said. "I realize that he did nothing personally dishonorable, and indeed did his duty to the crown in an exemplary fashion as Hand, but still, he was one of the strongest supporters of the Lannisters. I can't just wave my hand and make that those years of loyalty go away."

"You won't have to." Merry said, smiling slightly. "I talked to the man several times on the march, and he was disenchanted with Joffrey long before his Vile One persona came out. And let's not forget that Tywin threw away a lot of the Westerlands power in the Riverlands Campaign. Lord Serret's pragmatic enough to realize which way the wind is blowing, don't worry. Besides, I can't think of a better way to show that we are serious about respecting loyalty. With the Duchy of Silverden strongly in favor of us and the Golden Tooth in Royal hands, the Westerlands can't keep us out any longer even if the Lannisters are able to rally the other Houses. And that itself is a big if."

Daenerys nodded, then looked up as Ser Davos stuck his head in to the tent. He smiled at both ladies, making a particular point to bow to Merry, who he'd met occasionally before this war began. She had become a truly beautiful young woman since, though he was still bemused by how much the northern army had come to love her as one of their own. Several of his crewmen had been overheard commenting on her beauty in a slanderous manner, and he and several of his other men had been forced to step in to protect them from reprisals from some of the Northerners they were currently carrying.

"Your Majesty, we've finally reached the open ocean, but a ship's been sighted to the southwest. It's waving white flags from its prow and main sail indicating peaceful intentions, and it looks as if it's got the Citadel's mark on its sails. What do you want us to do?"

Daenerys stood up, moving over to pull on a large bearskin cloak. "Get me Alayaya, our two prisoners, Lord Fossoway and Septon Ehric please." she said crisply. "I'll want their take on what this could mean." Moments later the ones she had called for arrived at the front of the ship, where Davos was pointing out to Daenerys and Merry where the ship was just over the horizon southwards from the fleet as it moved out of the Bay of Crabs.

"What do you make of this?" Daenerys asked turning to them all with a smile. She nodded her head to Lord Fossoway, who nodded back, moving over beside her as Alayaya, and their two prisoners did the same.

The realities of their situation, had been told to the two Sand Snakes the morning after Ranma had left on his run, and to say they had been astonished by the largess bestowed upon them was to put it mildly. Both Elia and Nymeria knew they would be watched of course, but being watched and even judged for their actions was fine by them so long as they could in some measure prove their worth in such a way to win their eventual freedom.

"I believe that the Citadel has finally woken up to the fact that a new royal family has been created your grace." Said Lord Fossoway. "Late to be certain, but those old Archmaesters always take over long to reach a decision. Committees, bah!"

"Do not think this is because of their largess your Majesty," said Nymeria, speaking up quickly after looking at Alayaya for permission. "The Archmaesters play politics just as much as any of the great Houses, even more so amongst themselves. Whoever they sent will have an agenda, and that agenda might not be in keeping with your own. Be wary about anything he says, and don't trust him with any of the Grand Maester's traditional duties until he proves his loyalty."

Grand Master Pycelle had died on the march to Harrenhal. This had not been deliberate or anyone's fault, he had simply been too old to keep up with the strenuous pace after so long on a starvation diet. Ranma had ordered him buried with full honors, and a message set aside to be sent to the Citadel about the man. He might have served two mad kings, and been partisan towards the Lannisters besides, but he had redeemed himself in the days of the plague, trying to keep it from spreading, trying to do his best to contain it in a city where such a thing was frankly impossible.

"Do you have any idea what their agenda might be?" Daenerys asked.

"I don't know, but they might well be a little desperate if they've heard about magic returning. Most maesters have preached for decades that magic was waning or it no longer existed at all, that their new 'science' had proven to be stronger." Nymeria mused.

Elia smirked slightly. "There's also always been that rumor that they had something to do with the dragons dying out." Nymeria looked at her as well as all the others and she shrugged. "What, am I the only one that's heard that one?"

"That's because it's only a rumor." Nymeria said slowly as if speaking to a simpleton, causing her sister to glare at her angrily, a brief smile of triumph appearing on Nymeria's face in turn. Nearby Dacey shook her head, while Daryn and Roger chuckled at the byplay, but Daenerys had no time for it. She looked at Nymeria to elaborate and she went on. "There's never been any proof of that, nor any real explanation for how they could be involved."

"I'm just telling you to keep it in mind." Elia said defensively.

Daenerys nodded, then looked over at Davos. "Please signal one of the ships to go out and meet with this interloper. I don't want us to wait here for them of course, but they'll be able to catch up to us I assume?"

Davos nodded wincing a little at the idea of someone assuming that a fleet could even stay in one position like that. My new queen might be a landlubber but at least she's smart enough to take advice.

He nodded over at his first mate who nodded in turn towards a young boy stationed by the mainmast, then turned back as Daenerys asked another question. "How are we for supplies? I know you said that the fleet wouldn't be able to reach White Harbor without resupply, what did you mean by that, and why did you ask for permission from my husband and I to send out those small, what did you call them, cutters?"

"Cutters are small single-masted ships built for speed your Majesty, they serve as messenger boats and small fishing boats at times. You see, their keel is..." Davos stopped as he saw that most of his listeners looked as if he was speaking in a foreign language.

He went on hurriedly "Er, heh, I sent them ahead of us to a few of the smaller ports along the Fingers, Old Anchor and Sunkenwood, telling them in your name to send out supplies to meet us on the open sea. That'll save us time, and let us resupply which we'll have to do." He shook his head. "As it is will be on half rations for most of the way until we meet up with the ships out of Old Anchor."

"I'll set my dragons to hunting up anything they can in the ocean for us, which should help to meet out what we have." Daenerys replied. "And there'll certainly be able to feed themselves." With that thought Daenerys nodded to Davos once again murmuring that she would leave him to his business until the messenger or whatever was on that ship joined them here.

Hours later, Daenerys was roused from a nap against Rhaegon's side by a cough from the tent flap and Dacey's voice. "My lady, a rowboat's just pulled up alongside us, they are indeed carrying a maester who apparently is here to serve the royal House. He's not alone, he's got a few students with him as well."

"Good." Daenerys said with a nod looking over at Merry who nodded as well. She was always eager to meet others who might be interested in the healing arts. With that the two women exited the tent to meet with the new maester.

The maester, was a tall broad shouldered middle-aged man with rather handsome features and smiling eyes, reminding Merry somewhat of Jaime's features, though with none of her uncle's dangerous air. He also had gentle hands, something Daenerys found out when she held out her hand to shake his. It wasn't proper Royal behavior, but Daenerys had been among Northerners so much that most of her 'queenly training' (a name she had heard Daryn use more than once) had slipped to the wayside outside of formal events.

It seemed to take the man aback at first, cutting him off mid-bow, but he recovered quickly. "Your Majesty," he murmured, smiling somewhat overmuch for Daenerys taste. "Rumors of your beauty have travelled far and wide, yet even the most effusive do not do it justice. I am Crowe, a maester of the Citadel."

"I would leave flattery to my husband, Maester." Daenerys said somewhat coldly as she retrieved her hand, not liking how familiar he was attempting to be. "They matter not at all to me. My men say that you were sent here to serve the royal House?"

"Indeed your Majesty," replied the man, recovering his poise quickly from the firm response to his empty platitude. "While news of your campaigns reached us long since, it was not until a few months ago that we realized that your army lacked a maester to serve it as healing specialist and advisor. As such I was hastened on our way, but the ocean in autumn is nowhere for those in a hurry."

The men of the army around them laughed, and Hathan placed a large hand on Merry's shoulder, squeezing it as more than one man looked to her. She flushed under their gaze, but smiled back brightly and turned to the maester. "In truth good maester, I have been acting in that capacity since almost the moment we left the Neck behind. We had a maester from House Locke with us, but he died in an attack on one of our camps during the first Riverlands campaign."

"Then I am certain I have a lot of work to do." the man said. "No offense to you my lady, but a woman can never truly be a master healer, and a few months learning on the fly can never match a lifetime's worth of education in the citadel."

That was the man's second mistake and he froze as grumblings of discontent echoed from the men all around them, with Roger and Daryn in particular looking ready to commit murder on Merry's behalf. Daenerys smiled thinly. "On the contrary my friend Princess Myrcella has done an exemplary job. She might have learned on the fly, but that has not been a hindrance. Moreover you will not be the only maester serving the army at this point, we have a little over a dozen serving with the army as healers since the last battle. And if you're tact does not improve, you will not be serving it in any capacity whatever."

"I apologize your Majesty, I was merely voicing what was common sense before this. If the reality is different from that, then I apologize profusely, and am eager to learn how it was done." Crowe said recovering once again quickly. "There is one area however that I am more proficient in than practically any other Archmaester in the Citadel, which is of a delicate nature your Majesty, one we should talk about in private."

Daenerys' eyes narrowed, then she looked around. "Dacey, Meera, Merry could you join us please?"

The man frowned, but seeing as the woman Dacey was heavily armored and armed, and the other, Meera held a wicked looking trident, decided not to try to dissuade them from joining. As the quartet moved over towards the tent with the dragons, Elia and Nymeria frowned, looking at some of the servants who were being shown towards the hatch leading down into the ship. Specifically one of the students. "Is that...?"

"I believe it is. We might need to look into this, sister."

Crowe stopped as he entered the tent, staring at the two dragons which were sleeping side by side, disinterested in him and anyone else at the moment. They were much more imposing in person than he had expected, but that did not change what he was here to do to their mistress.

Daenerys sat on the small camp bed by her little ones, leaning back against Rhaegon's side staring at Crowe. "What is this private matter?"

The healing area I spoke of your Majesty is pregnancy," Crowe said simply. "I am a birthing specialist, an area where your mother I do not know if you were taught this, had trouble with every time, it was well known in the court at the time. That kind of thing is very often hereditary, and the Citadel's Archmaesters felt my aid in this private matter could secure your goodwill towards the Citadel and its policies."

Dacey and Meera exchanged a glance, knowing now why Daenerys had chosen them, possibly anticipating the thrust of this discussion. They both moved back to the tent flap, keeping a wary eye on the man, but no longer really worried he was a threat. Physically anyway, politically this was a very shrewd move on the Citadel's part, and certainly a way to gain the crown's favor, but the two of them didn't care about that.

For the first time since he came aboard Daenerys smiled at Crowe, and for just a moment he regretted his mission, the queen truly was a beautiful woman. "Then I welcome you to our service maester Crowe That is an area I have been concerned about, but with the wars over with here in the South, it is time to think about the succession."

She shared a glance with Merry, who nodded slightly. The younger woman knew that Daenerys hadn't taken any moontea after that night the three of them shared back in Maidenpool, and that Daenerys had been tremendously concerned about it but decided to take the plunge. Ranna and she had talked about it, and had put the decision of when to have a child squarely in Daenerys' hands, saying he would be happy whenever, so long as she told him immediately when she could that she was pregnant.

And given his ardor, I have no doubt already quickened, she thought to herself, smiling somewhat complacently as her hand came to rest on her stomach. Now I need to make sure I can keep my side of this arrangement. Looking up, she joined Merry in questioning Crowe on his knowledge on the subject, coming away impressed and sending to his quarters with a much better opinion of the man than her first impression had been. It did not stay that way long.

OOOOOO

At the same time that Crowe was having his interview with Daenerys, Elia and Nymeria had convinced Alayaya to let them go in search of one of Crowe' students, who they claimed to recognize. Of course she didn't let them go alone, but they wended their way through the ship in search of the quarters that had been assigned to Crowe and his students, and were surprised to find the one they were searching moving towards them after closing the door behind him.

Or rather her, Alayaya realized with a start, staring at the figure in front of her. She was a master at spotting the female form whatever covering it was under, and that was a woman. Not a particularly good looking one, but those hips were definitely that of a woman.

"Elia, Nymeria." Said the student, then staring hard at Alayaya. "...How goes it?"

"As well as could be expected when we were forced to back a sadistic incompetent." Said Elia, shrugging her shoulders. "Viserys is dead, the idea of putting him on the throne died long before that though, and our family is going to pay for backing him. We'll fill you in, but first, what are you doing here, Sarella?"

The so named young woman said nothing, staring at Alayaya who raised one wintry eyebrow. "I'm not going anywhere, whatever you say you'll say it in front of me, or you'll say it in chains. With the White Walkers pressing hard in the North, the Royal House can't afford to have to deal with hidden dangers."

Sarella stared back silently for a moment before Nymeria stepped forward gripping her hand. "Sister," she said earnestly, giving away their connection now. "The Queen and King could have executed us both, regardless of our connection to House Martell. They could have destroyed our entire army, slaughtered every man in it, but they didn't. They've shown mercy and honor at practically every turn, and while I can't say I'm happy about being their prisoner, I'm happier with them on the throne than I think I would have been if either of the two claimants our uncle apparently backed gained it."

"If that's not enough for you Sarella," Elia said, one wary eye on Alayaya who hadn't reacted to the sister part of what Nymeria had said. "Then here's another point. The current king and queen destroyed the Westerlands' power, the Lannisters will never be Lord Paramount again, and the Golden Tooth is under royal command. Without those mines, the Lannisters will never be able to buy their way into greater power again, not for a long time. They also killed the last Baratheon brother, and have broken the Stormlands as they did the Westerlands. Our vengeance for Elia's death has been taken in full, even if not by our hands."

Sarella had been at sea for so long that she had no knowledge about many of the events on the mainland, and her confused, wary expression showed that. "I'm going to have to hear about that in greater detail."

But she frowned staring at her two sisters then shook her head. "My loyalty isn't to our House first anyway, whatever you might say. I gave my loyalty to Archmaester Marwyn, and it is as his spy I'm here. The Citadel's high council does not want to see the return of the dragons, and they sent maester Crowe here to see to that, however he could contrive it."

"Do you have any proof of that?" Alayaya asked sharply.

"That would depend on if you can find anyone on your side who can tell what a poison is? I doubt you'd take my word alone for it after all."

About a turn of the candle later Alayaya had gathered a few of the Wolfsworn, along with septon Ehcric. While Crowe was being shown around the ship by Davos, who knew to stall the man, they entered the room where he and his students had been housed, moving the four remaining students out of the way abruptly as they tried to protest this invasion of privacy.

Ehcric quickly searched through Crowe's luggage, coming back with four different vials, which held liquids he could not quickly identify. "I think we'll need Merry's help with these."

Merry was sent for, and she scowled angrily as she was told what Sarella had passed on. "Why don't they want the return of the dragons?"

"The return of the dragons coincides with the return of magic, it's, there's some kind of cyclical connection there." Sarella said trying to explain something that she didn't actually understand herself. "They think if they kill off the Targaryens or the dragons, magic will begin to wane once more."

"That's nonsense!" Merry said shaking her head. "There were tales of magic returning long before Daenerys hatched her dragons! How in the world do they explain the White Walkers, or that Red Bitch!?" Shaking her head in disgust at such a narrow-minded view she moved over to join Ehcric kneeling over the four unknown vials. "I'll need some cloth, white for preference, and an empty jar."

Behind her Daryn nodded and turned quickly exiting the room.

With that order given Merry opened the first vial, holding it up to her nose for a moment to sniff before pulling back. "That's a deadening agent, and a good one too..." She poked her finger in, nodding as it went numb. "I'll just be keeping this, see if I can duplicate the formula, it would be incredibly useful." she said pushing it to one side. There were chuckles from around her, but she ignored them, moving through the other three.

The next she didn't recognize, but Alayaya, leaning over her shoulder laughed as the scent hit her. "Oh, ahahah, I, um I recognize that one. That's a... let's call it a bedroom aid. It's for men who have trouble... rising to the occasion, or think they require some more energy in that area."

She turned to the four male students, all of whom flushed, looking away, but one face in particular was red with embarrassment. "A little hint boys, girls prefer men who know what they are doing and have some care for their partners pleasure. The ability to go all night long is nice, but energy alone can't beat creativity and the ability to work with your partner."

Merry and Ehric both flushed while the Wolfsworn, Elia and Nymeria laughed while Sarella merely rolled her eyes.

The third vial's liquid was also harmless, which Merry found out after dipping some of it carefully on the cloth Daryn provided before bringing it to her nose. It was simply a powerful soporific, the kind you would give someone who was plagued with seasickness.

The last liquid however, that one Merry almost thought was similarly unimportant. But then she let some of it drip onto the white cloth and watched. The stain should have turned pink after a moment if it was the harmless healing agent she had thought.

It did not, instead it stayed as black as black could be, even drying slowly. She nodded her head grimly over at Daryn, who along with Dacey had stepped up to lead the Wolfsworn. "Arrest him." she said coldly. "But make sure you keep him alive. We'll need to know if more poisoners will be sent if he is discovered."

She turned a gimlet gaze on the four students who had frozen at the sight of the poison. "Search their luggage too, then get them off this ship. They can join some of my other workers on one of the others if they're cleared of suspicion."

It turned out they were, and the young men were bundled away quickly. Crowe however was not so lucky. Not two turns of the glass after leaving Daenerys's presence, he was back, protesting his innocence to no avail.

Daenerys stared coldly at the man. "While we do not believe in torturing confessions out of people, or torture at all, we are sorely tempted in this case. Merry?"

"The poison we found is not a poison that would kill you your Majesty, not quickly, but it would make you barren with even a single teaspoon's worth. It could also be used on your dragons I think, though their immunity to such things might have protected them. It's almost odorless, and tasteless, and in its diluted form, plus added to several other ingredients, the poison is a part of a healing balm, hence my test. There's certainly enough on hand to douse both you and them, with quite a bit left over." Merry replied crisply.

"I see... So it would not have been a threat to me but to my unborn children," Daenerys said her face almost shutting down, save for her violet eyes, which began to blaze with fury. "This does not make me any more inclined to mercy than I already was. Sarella Sand, step forward."

As Crowe glared at her angrily Sarella did so, dressed now in one of Alayaya's dresses and looking much more feminine and almost pretty, though not as pretty as her older sisters. "Your Majesty." She said with a brief, and rather clumsy curtsy.

"Tell me everything about this Citadel's politics you can, and this... man... in particular. I wish to know if the Citadel in its current form can be saved, turned back to its original purpose of serving the pursuit of knowledge and the people rather than itself. If it cannot, we will have to deal with it eventually as well."

"We've already begun to create a healing Hall," Merry said with a faint smile, remembering the work that had begun on that in Riverrun. "We might need to break more of the Order of Maester's traditional areas of control away from them in the future, letting one institution control such learning is a dangerous if they are inclined to meddle in affairs outside their purview."

"Agreed, and hopefully the next batch of oh so intelligent morons will know not to meddle in politics or King making." With that Daenerys turned her violet eyes on Crowe, who quailed at what he saw in them, before she turned to Sarella, who also flinched slightly under that gaze. "Now talk."

OOOOOO

Two small armies faced one another across a narrow field near where the Golden River and the Rose Road came closest to one another, about halfway down the river between the lands of House Rowan and Highgarden. Several barges lay hove to along the river bank loaded with men and horses.

The road and the area around it were also congested with men and horses along with several dozen carts scattered throughout that army. That second army outnumbered the one by the river, but neither seemed to be in a rush to join battle. The greatest sign of this was the two parties which had met halfway between the two armies under a flag of truce.

Willas stared across his horse's withers at Lord Caron. "I realize and respect the fact that Stannis sent you back into the Reach to aid us my friend, however, I will not agree to bow my head to him until after news of his battle against the Starks has reached me. The Starks too have sent aid. Word reached me from my sister that His Majesty Ranna Targaryen sent his brother and a small force into the Reach with orders to fight the mercenaries coming up from the south. With so much of our own strength away, the Reach cannot afford to turn any aid aside."

Bryce Caron frowned. "That puts me in a precarious position my Lord," he replied honestly. "Lord Stannis did indeed send me down when we heard about the reavers along the Mander and the depredations of the Dornish army, but he also did so because at that time your father had vowed that the Reach would stand with him. Your actions put you at odds with your father's given word."

"Yet I'm also being very prudent about doing so," Willas replied tartly. There was no need to inform Bryce about how he and Margaery had decided to oust their father as Lord Paramount for gross negligence and incompetence of course, but neither was he going to hide his position. "Face facts my Lord, Lord Stannis will either win his crown on the field of battle far from here, or not. So at present, what does it matter here in the Reach who wins? The Ironborn and mercenaries are still here on our lands."

"I gave my oath to Lord Stannis, and I am a man of my word. If you side with the Starks against him, I will be forced to move against you."

"I won't fight you Bryce, but I won't let you fight the Starks force either. According to my sister's last message, Jon and his forces will meet the Dornish mercenaries in battle soon enough. Let them do so, then let us wait to hear what has happened elsewhere. Hopefully by the time you reach Highgarden the war between the Stargaryens and Stannis will have been settled one way or another."

"And if it is settled in favor of Lord Stannis?" Bryce asked.

"Then we will see." Willas didn't actually think that it would frankly, but was willing to hedge his bets that much. Whatever his personal feelings on the matter, Willas knew his first loyalty had to be to the Reach and its people.

The two young men stared at one another for a time then Bryce slowly nodded. "Very well, I must admit to not being in any rush to fight you and yours my Lord, spilling the blood of countrymen like that would sit ill with me." To one side Bryce's half-brother nodded his head, sharing a brief smile with Ser Graceford, who nodded back. "You and your army are free to go on your way unmolested, and we will see you at Highgarden."

Within a turn of the glass the barges once more men were moving down the river, quickly leaving behind him the Army following the Rose road. Willas stayed for a moment at the back of the lead barge staring back at that army, before shaking his head and turning downriver, wondering how the battle between Jon Stark and Oberyn had gone. Don't make me a liar Stark. I too don't want to fight my own countrymen, whatever the events elsewhere.

OOOOOO

It had taken weeks for the Wildling Princess, as the Night's Watch and Northerners had come to call Val, to convince her fellows that they needed to bend their necks if any of them were going to survive. By that point disease and injury had seen off several hundred of them, and the White Walkers had been seen, gathering the dead of the battles along the Wall to them, those dead bodies that had not already been burned anyway. Unfortunately, despite the Wildlings best efforts that was a lot of bodies.

There were certainly far more than remained alive from the once monstrously large wildling migration. Of those that had begun the exodus south, there remained a scant 4000, comprised of bits and pieces of more than a dozen clans which had been forced to come together into one. That was all that remained of the once proud and independent people of the far North, but even so those numbers were a tremendous boon to the defenders on the wall.

In those same days the castles slated for destruction had been razed to the ground. Or rather not the castles themselves, but the stairwells from the castles up onto the Wall itself, a much easier task than destroying the castles entirely. The wildlings were allowed through the Wall at Castle Black then up onto it, and given command of two of the castles to the west of Castle Black, Stonedoor and Hoarfrost Hill. They weren't the most well prepared castles, but they also had somewhat decent south-facing defenses, two outer walls shaped like a triangle, with the third side being the Wall at the back.

This put them between the forces of the Ardent Defender, the Night's Watch, and the forces of House Cerwyn and Stark under Kyle Conton. In other words, the forces that were least likely to have any blood debts against the wildlings for their raiding, and the most disciplined.

There were some protests among the wildlings when they've realized that the Night's Watch men did not intend to let them simply through the Wall, but to defend it. But when told that the White Walkers had seemingly found a way around the Wall somehow, they decided that the giant magical edifice provided at least some chance of surviving the coming winter.

For his sins Tyrion had been given the task of liaising with Val, a task he took to with a certain fervor. The woman was utterly beautiful, deadly dangerous of course, but since killing a giant and losing one of his hands Tyrion had decided that few things in this world could frighten him. Certainly not a wench like this.

The two of them were walking along the Wall, staring to either side of it as Tyrion told her what he had learned about Theon and the Wolfsworn's abilities. He was trying to impress on her how dangerous the assault coming from Skagos must have been to overcome Theon.

"It makes no sense," Val murmured in response after Tyrion had finished speaking. "If the Others could get around the Wall like that, why have they not before? Why did they not use that kind of skill in the first wars against their kind? Why haven't they used it since?"

"While you wildlings might not wish to recognize it, tactics and strategies change over time, just like farming or other skills. A common blacksmith of today is of course much better than a blacksmith of a thousand years ago." Tyrion replied, smiling slightly at the girl who rolled her eyes at the barbs at her people's way.

Val understood that the Wildlings needed to change if they were going to survive, but Val was uncertain how that change was going to occur. Nor did she think that right now was the time to think about it. "Let us survive the winter first," she had told the other chieftains, "then worry about reclaiming our lands and becoming free from the kneelers and their cursed crows once more." Despite the fact they had been welcomed onto the Wall the wildlings still retained a certain disdain for the 'kneelers' and the Night's Watch. Even with their defeat having been so total.

"That's true enough, but if the Others can change at all, then why didn't they use this kind of... strategy... before?" The word strategy came out hesitantly, as if Val was uncertain she was using the word correctly. The wildlings after all did not think of strategy, they barely understood tactics.

"I don't know, but I think it could be because of the size of the force needed. Maybe the White Walkers don't multiply as well as humans do over time." Tyrion replied. "That could be a good sign of course. It might mean if we beat their assault off this time, it will be another several thousand years before they..."

He trailed off, cupping his glove covered hand over his eyes, which were mostly covered by a cloth wrapping to keep his face from freezing. Val too was covered from head to toe in cloth, which was a crime in Tyrion's opinion, who longed to peel her out of that clothing one piece at a time. But right now that thought was furthest from his mind. "What is that?"

Val scowled turning to see what had taken the small imp's attention. He had a quick and intelligent mind, and tales of his prowess in battle had reached Val before the first parlay between the Night's Watch and her own people. But even so she could not quite overcome the stigma his dwarf size held in her eyes. To her mind he should've been smothered as a baby by his mother, who had shown weakness by not having done so. If there was one thing no wildling could abide, it was weakness.

That thought left her mind as quickly as the thought of her body left Tyrion's however when she saw what he was staring at. "A flock of birds? No, it's too large for that, and they're coming closer-OLD GODS Protect!"

Her voice rose on the last word as they came close enough to discern some more detail. Flying through the air towards them were what looked like thousands upon thousands of birds. All types of birds, but that wasn't the weirdest thing about the phenomenon. The weirdest was that they surrounded several far larger shapes, which looked like... "Dragons?"

"Somehow I don't think those are regular dragons." Tyrion replied as all along the Wall the alarm drums began to beat out a tune. Tyrion ignored the noise for a moment, staring not at the approaching flyers but below them into the Haunted Forest as he tried to see any detail there. When he did, he wished he hadn't. "By the gods old and new, it's them. They are coming."

Val turned her eyes in that direction, but her eyes weren't quite as keen as Tyrion's and it took her a moment to see the details that Tyrion had. When she did Val gasped, shuddering in fear. Out of the woods came a horde, there is no other word for it, thousands upon thousands of undead wights shambling their way forwards. But that could have been borne, even if those wights were former wildlings, or even people that Val had known personally. It was what was coming up behind them that made her gasp.

Pushing their way through the forest, knocking down trees as they came were giant mastodons. Every four of the beasts were tied together dragging giant siege weapons behind them, which stopped soon after they were spotted. The massive catapults began to lob stones at the Wall while the birds and dragons came closer. There were dozens of them in sight of where Tyrion and Val stood on the Wall, and Val wondered bleakly if this was the only place the Wall was being attacked, or if these same numbers were being thrown at it all along its length.

Beside the mastodons stood other giant creatures, which looked nothing so much as ice spiders. They were simply giant spiders made of ice and what looked like black steel, powered by fell magics. They were easily the most horrifying site Val had ever seen, and she shivered as they scuffled forward towards the Wall. On their backs they carried what looked like dozens of wights or White Walkers, it was impossible to tell at this distance.

Bronn raced up, slamming a helmet down onto Tyrion's head and thrusting a sword into his hand before raising a bow, aiming down an arrow into the distance. All around them hundreds of men of the order and in the other surrounding castles boiled out onto the Wall, shouting oaths of surprise and dismay as they stared at the horde coming at them.

The feel of the helmet slamming down onto his head broke Tyrion out of his shock. "All archers load with steel broadhead and aim for the fucking birds! Catapults, aim for the horde down there, the spiders in particular if you can!" He grabbed a nearby Order member, shouting into the man's ear. "Get to the nearest tried trebuchet, tell them to start hammering at those siege weapons of theirs! Then keep on going down the line, until you get tired and hand that order off to someone else to carry on. I want the entire Wall knowing those things are the main targets for the trebuchets!"

Tyrion had no idea what kind of ammunition those catapults down there were armed with. Nor did he think they could range on the top of the Wall. But he didn't want to take any chances either way.

"By your command Giantkiller!" The man said, racing down the Wall to the west.

As he did, Tyrion looked around him. Here and there several men who had come out from inside the castle too quickly had to retreat, the jeers of their fellows in their ears as they hurried to pull gloves, scarfs or face wraps on. But most of the men on the Wall were ready. They quickly began to fire at the approaching flock of birds and dragons.

"Why regular steel little lion?" Bronn asked pulling back on his bow and using his old name for Tyrion rather than his new, thankfully more popular one. The shot flew true, impacting a crow on the wing sending it tumbling down.

"The needs of flight." Tyrion replied grunting as hacked at the downed bird, while next to him Val grabbed up a bow of her own. "Wights can keep on coming and soak up a lot of damage, but birds need two working wings to fly regardless of any magic powering their bodies. At least I hope so."

His hope proved to be accurate. While the dragons kept on coming despite the arrows in them the flock of lesser avians around them quickly thinned out. The archers on the Wall went for number of arrows rather than accuracy. They loosed dozens of arrows each in those first few moments, thinning the attacking flock tremendously.

But then the dragons were at the Wall. The first of their number roared, breathing out deeply and a cone of immensely cold ice raced down towards the defenders. Some men were able to dodge but many were not so lucky. They died almost immediately under this attack, frozen solid between one breath and the next.

"Every fifth man out from me either side switch to fire arrows!" Tyrion bellowed over the screams of the freezing men, grabbing up the fire of his own and sticking it into a nearby brazier. "Fire arrows on the dragons!"

Unfortunately the fire arrows didn't seem to do much damage to the dragons. They were simply unable to penetrate the dragon's scales, but the fire itself did do some damage to their wing membranes, forcing the first two dragons within sight of Tyrion's position on the Wall to retreat. The last attacking Tyrion's section however suffered a much more interesting fate.

It tried to touch down nearby, landing with two feet on the balustrade and two scrabbling at the northernmost face of the Wall. It was only there for a brief second, its head rearing back as a prelude to breathing in before it shrieked in agony. "GUAGGHHH!"

Tyrion heard a deep throbbing noise coming from beneath his feet, the entire Wall humming somehow, a thrum he felt through his feet. Then here and there along its length small and large runes lit up green, the green of a pine needle, the light of magic gifted by the Old Gods, though none save perhaps the ancient Targaryen Maester realized this.

Down below the first group of wights had reached the Wall and were scrambling up it, climbing almost as well as the spiders that were following in their wake probably could. However, those first wights died screaming horribly, the magic in them canceled somehow. Though weak, the magic of the Wall was still active, still buried in its stone and ice. And it would suffer no trespass.

"The Old Gods are with us!" Said a Stark man to the far west of Tyrion. "The Old Gods bless Bran the Builder!"

Tyrion nodded absentmindedly, while Val stared to either side of her at the lights of the runes, moving off into the fog shrouded distance. Later Tyrion would study them, but right now he watched the horde down below reform and quickly retreat from the Wall. The spiders hadn't even come close yet, but they were already changing their tactics. Their siege weapons fired, slamming into the Wall here and there, and some of them even reaching perilously close to the top of it despite the range.

The remains of the flock of birds too reformed, flying over the Wall now and diving down. Even as the archers turned their attention to them the birds began to act like feathery missiles the injuries to their wings no longer able to stop them from getting at the humans below them. Now the defenders once again started to take losses, but every man downed took dozens of birds with him.

Yet there were worse problems elsewhere. Not every commander had been so quick to recognize the danger the birds represented, or addressed it so well. But even worse, here and there along the Wall the magical defenses had not activated. The runes had flickered for a moment, before slowly fading. The magic in the Wall was weakened badly, and worse yet none of the people on the Wall understood how to re-energize them.

At several points along the Wall the attacking whites did indeed climb up, and the dragons attacking elsewhere along caused far more damage to the defenders. But with the Wall's natural defenses and their numbers the defenders held. Here and there, in particular by Eastwatch-By-the-Sea the defenders had to dig into their bags of tricks. Mors Usher ordered the use of his castle's supply of carefully hoarded alchemist's fire, which thankfully worked even better against the White Walkers than it had against the wildlings.

When it landed the wildfire spread quickly, engulfing several of the mastodons and the massive siege weapon they had been carrying between them. All of the mastodons who could see the fire and hear the screams of their fellows broke whatever control the White Walkers had on them, running away through and over some of the wights, and some of the White Walkers themselves.

The fire also destroyed the ice spiders or whatever they were. Even a little bit splashed on an ice spider was enough to break whatever spell that moved the massive ice and steel behemoths. In response the White Walkers swiftly pulled the ice spiders back, waiting to use them decisively rather than wasting them in penny packets.

The losses among the defenders on that first day were equal to the losses they had taken in that final push by the wildlings, and it got worse as day turned to night. The White Walkers, knowing now that the magic of the Wall was still active retreated somewhat sending in only sporadic assaults, feeling out the magic of the Wall and figuring out where it was weak. Those points were quickly reinforced from the areas that had such protection. The Order of Ardent defenders and the wildlings moved west and east respectively, doing so.

Yet despite this, every commander along the Wall knew that the attack from behind would be the true test of their mettle. Yet for days after the attacks from the north began, that assault had yet to appear.

OOOOOO

Lord Commander Jeor Mormont sighed, nodding his head to his second-in-command of Castle Black as the man once again took over command of their portion of the Wall allowing Lord Mormont to retire to his rooms in the tower to go over the losses for the day. Sporadic assaults along the Wall had been going on for over a week and a half now, and they were slowly but surely taking their toll on the men. Not in numbers so much any longer, the White Walkers refusal to commit their spiders to the attacks on the Walls meant that only the dragons and the few remaining birds could truly come within range of the defenders. But in morale and energy they certainly were taking a toll.

I need to find a way to somehow rest some of the men for longer than a few hours a day, I know the other commanders are in the same position, or worse. He thought to himself as he pushed open the door to his room sighing wearily. The last few weeks have been hard on his old bones, and Jeor now knew for certain that he would not see the end of this war.

I hope we can hold out. If they're able to get past us with the numbers we've seen out there then disburse all over the North... he shuddered. That would be the end. Even if the Dragonglass shipments the raven from Winterfell mentioned arrived there still wouldn't be enough weapons to go around, nor enough men to wield them to cover the entire North. It would be like trying to exterminate the rats in the city, a lost cause from the get go. Humanity would be forced to abandon everything north of the Moat, and even the Neck might not be enough to stop the White Walkers with their new tricks.

Jeor wearily sat in his chair, leaning back and closing his eyes for what he thought would be only a few moments but which turned out to be at least half the night. Truthfully his second-in-command should've woken him up at some point, but the man had decided to let the Old Bear sleep.

It wasn't his second-in-command that woke Lord Mormont in the middle of the night either. That was the warning horns from Castle Black itself, the horns which only should've been blown if Castle Black itself was under attack. Lord Mormont roused himself with difficulty, moving out of his room at a sort of shambling gait which was the closest he could come to running with his legs as old and battered as they were. That it almost made him resemble a bear was something more than one man had commented on, though there were no jokes and jeers now.

By the time Jeor reached the at entrance to the tower, the rest of the defenders, most of whom were comprised of Night's Watchmen, and the levy forces of the North who had previously been trying to create settlements out in the Gift. Most of them had been housed in Castle Black, which proved to be an excellent move now, hopefully giving them enough men to see off a wight assault from the lands south of them.

He raced over to one of the outer walls, which had been erected in place since Ranma Stark and his friends had arrived with word of the White Walkers being active once more. Jeor was a firm believer in planning ahead, and it served him well here. The wall was little more than two stories tall, and very rough, made of wood and stone thrown together haphazardly, but even so, with the all of it having been buried in ice which had hardened almost as hard as the Wall itself, it was a decent defensive position.

Taking the defenders by surprise, the wights had gotten to the foot of the wall thanks to the snow swirling around them. And while the defenders had rallied as well as could be expected several wights had reached the top of the makeshift wall, cutting down the defenders. Ascending to what amounted to the top of the manmade hill Jeor pulled Longclaw from its sheath, charging along the stone and frozen wood to meet the nearest breach, cutting down two wights in quick succession, the magic of his dragon-fire forged blade a match for the magic animating them.

Several men of the Night's Watch followed him, wielding dragonglass daggers and steel swords rather than swords and shields. Several of them died because of this, but the dragonglass daggers did their work, ending the lives of those wights that fell from the injuries given to them by the steel weapons in their other hands. Soon the breaches along the makeshift wall closed, and more of the levy forces moved up to defend it.

Jeor nodded at his men shouting, "Spread out! Then get a runner back to the tower and make sure that every dragonglass weapon we've got is brought out!"

"We don't have that many of them to begin with my Lord." cautioned one of them.

"It won't matter if we husband them, if we lose Castle Black doing it! Go!"

Several moments after Jeor had led another charge to reclaim a portion of the defenses shouts of welcome reached his ears from behind. Moving away from the top of the crude wall and letting several of the smallfolk take his place Jeor turned. He watched as men from the Ardent Defender and House Hornwood made their way towards him.

Tyrion was at their head, and he nodded at Lord Mormont. Around them this force moved forward to aid the less trained force of the smallfolk, taking the dragonglass daggers from many of them to put them to better use. "What magical forces have they brought against us here?"

"Naught but wights at the moment. I think this is some kind of softening up action, or perhaps simply a sign of the White Walkers power going ahead of their army." Lord Mormont said shaking his head and leaning wearily on his blade where he had grounded it into the stone of the walkway beneath him. "I'm very much afraid this is only the beginning."

OOOOOO

It had taken Jon and his army two days to loot and bury the dead. Given that the mercenaries had brought much of their spoils with them, the army was now almost too weighted down with such, despite many of the men thinking such a thing was impossible. Thanks to the barges however, there were still making good time along the river. A little over a week after the battle they saw the walls of Highgarden in the distance.

Highgarden's wharfs were protected by massive towers, which while looking very ornamental were also very tall and powerfully built. The walls to either side of the port leading inland from the Mander around the city were also well manned and maintained. Despite the castle of Highgarden being known more for its gardens and beauty, the defenses along the Mander had always been maintained.

Luckily Jon and his forces were welcomed with open arms. The men lining those walls and towers were cheering lustily as Ser Kevin Conklyn and Jon stood at the prow of the first barge, shaking his head and smiling slightly. "I can only hope that the rest of the Reach welcomes us as warmly," he quipped, smiling at the knight.

Kevin laughed, clapping him on the shoulder. A young man himself, Kevin had taken to Jon Stark quite well, better than he had anticipated if he was honest. Beyond that serious Stark face was an extremely intelligent mind and a good sense of humor. "There might be a few houses here and there that are not as welcoming my Lord, but I think the majority of the smallfolk at least have made their position plain."

Jon nodded, understanding they had done that for certain. Those people were shouting "The Targaryens, the Tyrells, the Seven's Champions, the Seven bless the King and Queen! The Seven bless lady Margaery!" It was very evident that Ranma and Daenerys's work to get the smallfolk and the faithful on their side had paid off handsomely here, as did their sending Jon at all to aid Margaery.

As the barges smacked against the wharfs Kevin tapped Jon on the shoulder, motioning his head towards a small party that were sitting by possibly the most magnificent horses that Jon had ever seen. "My lady Margaery Tyrell, the Rose of the Reach." he said simply.

Moments later, while Lord Dondarrion and Sir Piper joined Kevin in organizing the unloading of their troops and their booty Jon, Arya, Nymeria and Ghost made their way towards the waiting party. As they came closer Jon slowed, pausing to take in the vision before him.

Golden-brown hair cascaded down in ringlets to halfway down Margaery's chest, surrounding a gorgeous face highlighted by high cheekbones, a small but extremely warm smile composed of full lips, and dark brown, intelligent eyes. The body underneath that hair and the magnificent green and gold rose accented gown also looked to be one of the best he had ever seen. For some reason he suddenly wondered what that hair would feel like cascading through his fingers, a thought he quickly brushed off to one side.

Ranma was right, she is a rare beauty. "Lady Margaery, my brother's description of you did not do the true splendor justice."

For her part Margaery was struck by the serious dark gray eyes of Jon Stark. He looks much more like a Stark in truth than Ranma did, there is no hint of what House his mother came from. Not that this does him any injustice.

Lanky yet clean dark brown hair cascaded down Jon Stark's head to his shoulders, a handsome if stern face dominated by those deep gray eyes, though the lips were quirked into a faint smile, and there were lines along his face that indicated he was as used to smiling as frowning. Wide shoulders, wearing decent lizard lion armor, and tall, as tall as Ranma, so tall that Margaery had to look up at him slightly, not a lot, but just enough for it to be noticeable.

When she extended hers to be kissed his hand was calloused and very powerful feeling yet the grip of his hand on her fingers was gentle, and Margaery actually shivered a little as he brought her hand up to his lips to kiss. Everything about Jon screamed that he was Ranma's brother, and yet despite that and despite Ranma having set a tremendously high standard, Jon did not lose anything in that comparison. She had not expected that, or the impact of those gray eyes on hers. "Jon Stark, your brother told me much about you as well, though he did not say you were a flatterer by nature."

"Ranma also spoke about you of course, young Arya." she said turning to Arya. "Ranma said you were a little wild thing, as quick to fight as you were to run away from your lessons? Although given what's happened since, I think that attitude seems much more sensible than most noblewomen's. I could've done with some of your skill with a sword of late myself, remind me to tell you the story of the battle of Oldflowers, hopefully before you can hear the bard's version."

"Too late for that." Arya replied promptly, smiling up at taller girl who had gotten Arya on her side immediately with that little speech. She held out her hand and the two women shook hands smiling at one another. "I heard that version from the few bards we met on the road by Bitterbridge, but I'm eager to hear the real version."

"I'll tell you about it sometime tonight then." Margaery promised, smiling at the younger girl. Then she looked at the two direwolves to either side and held out her hand palm up for them to sniff before pulling it back slightly. She looked over at the two Starks and asked tentatively, "Neither of these have problems with honey-based fragrances do they? I remember Fenris having a tough time getting used to my scent because of an incident with a beehive."

Arya and Jon laughed, shaking their heads. "Don't worry my lady," Jon said. "Neither Ghost nor Nymeria have ever gone into attacking bears overmuch or hunting down honey."

With that assurance Margaery held out her hand, allowing first Ghost then Nymeria to sniff it. Ghost went further, nuzzling Margaery's hand for a moment she reached out with her other hand to rub it his ears just the way he liked it. Nymeria was a little more standoffish, but also allowed Margaery to play with her ears slightly. Both direwolves however backed away as the cheering rebounded as the men on the barges started to disembark, their ears flattening on their skulls.

Margaery noticed this, and motioned towards her entourage. "I suggest we get on our way, unless you can control your friends when the crowd really starts to get going?"

"You mean there's more of this?" Arya asked skeptically.

"Oh yes much more. Highgarden is flooded with refugees from further downriver and more than a few from along the Blue Byrn as well. Up until word of your coming reached us, all of these people were afraid that Oberyn's army would reach us before my brother's, despite my best efforts at convincing them otherwise. They see you and your army as saviors, despite the work I've put in creating a city militia." She shrugged philosophically. "Fear has a far greater hold on people's minds than we sometimes like to admit."

"It's always better to try to fight it anyway my lady." Jon said, moving forward to help her into her saddle. He blushed slightly as her front almost went into his face as he did so, before backing away, a flush on his face.

He looked away, while Margaery simply smirked wickedly at him. Unlike Theon or Ranma, Jon had never frequented whorehouses nor had lovers. His previous relationships with women were practically nonexistent, a stolen kiss here were there with various female servants back in Winterfell, and a short dalliance with a maid in Riverrun that didn't go further than heavy petting was the sum of his experiences. Thus Margaery's beauty and outgoing nature had a heavy impact on him.

"Let's be off then." Margaery said then she grimaced a little. "My grandmother and my mother are wishful to talk to you unfortunately."

Jon nodded, moving next to her horse and looking up at her as Ghost and Nymeria quickly moved into a trot along the rather nervous horses. But those horses were magnificent examples of Willas' touch with the breed, and they moved readily under Margaery and her retainer's control. "Should I bring my sword with me? I've heard stories about the Queen of Thorns."

"I so wish I could tell you to do that." Margaery said shaking her head. "Unfortunately, my grandmother is still useful despite her attitude."

That word held a lot of weight to it, and Jon frowned thoughtfully as he heard it. Arya rolled her eyes however. "Don't tell me we're going to be involved in political talk! I'll take Nymeria and head downriver right now with a small scouting force instead, how's that?"

"Not a bad idea, but I'm afraid you won't be able to get out of it." Margaery said with a shrug. "It would be extremely rude too. Not..." she laughed. "That I think that would stop you Arya, judging from some of the stories I've heard about you. Is it true you tried to stitch Sansa's sleeping cloth's to her bed while she was still in them?"

Arya looked embarrassed while Jon laughed, shaking his head as they continued down the streets. Luckily for the two direwolves Margaery's attempt to race them through the city to the castle before the rest of the troops began their march through it worked. Their speed was such that only a few hundred or so people began to cheer as they raced past, though as they continued the noise still added up. By the time they reached the castle both direwolves were looking very nervous and edgy, even the normally calm and composed Ghost.

Realizing this Margaery pointed to one side even as she jumped out of the saddle in front of the largest stable Jon had ever seen. "Our godswood is that way, we don't have many worshipers of the Old Gods in the Reach, so it's normally empty but it's well kept up, and it should feel somewhat like home."

Before she finished the two direwolves had taken off in that direction and she blinked. "I'm going to have to get used to that again aren't I? I know Fenris was able to understand most of what was said around him, but extending that impossible ability to other direwolves is going to take a bit."

Arya shrugged. "You'll get used to it, we did and it and everything that comes with it is fantastic!" She paused, frowning as she remembered the time when she had warged too often with Nymeria, losing some of herself to the instincts of her bonded. "Well, most of it anyway. They're a lot better than horses or dogs let me tell you."

"So says someone small enough to ride on them at need." Jon said, playfully rubbing Arya's head for a moment. Arya had put on weight in terms of muscle mass and in other areas, but had only grown a few inches since they had left Winterfell.

Arya growled batting his hand the side and Margaery shook her head with a laugh. "Siblings always do that to their sisters, trust me, you're lucky you only had two older brothers. Garlan and Loras especially used to mess up my hair all the time. The worse times was right before my coming of age feast, moments before I was to be introduced into the hall. Our father was so furious! I wasn't, I just thought it was funny at the time, but it has gotten rather old since."

Then she went on to say something that got Arya on her side permanently. "By the way Arya, while you're here could I impose on you to teach me some sword work? While you might be shorter than me I have no doubt that you're stronger as well, and we're alike enough in other ways that I think I'll have an easier time learning from you than I would from a normal man at arms. If I could convince any of them to go against my grandmothers wishes in the first place, I mean."

"I'll be happy to." Arya said happily, smiling up at the taller woman. "I'm always happy to find other ladies willing to rebel against what their menfolk demand of them."

"I wouldn't go that far." Margaery said dryly. "While I've learned that one should always be prepared to defend oneself, women can wield far more power behind the scenes than you may think."

That conversation went on for some time as they walked through the gardens of Highgarden and into the castle, though Margaery did not convince Arya that her way was better than Arya's, which would've been impossible. Soon Margaery showed the two of them to their rooms, where they found servants preparing hot baths for them, and even a few changes of clothing and dresses, along with tailors and seamstresses.

An entire corridor was set aside for Jon and his commanders, with the nearest room given to Arya and his own being the large suite on the far end. He stood staring out through an actual window, not a murder hole, a real window, something that would never have been even contemplated in the North (or even most of the Riverlands), noticing as he did so that the room had an excellent view of the gods wood.

"We actually have three weirwood trees here, we call them the Three Singers." Margaery said. "I have to be honest and say that of late I've been drawn to them myself. If you would like Jon, I can show them to you later."

"I think I would like that my lady." Jon said with a nod. It has been far too many months since he was able to make my respects to the Old Gods. He'd done so in Riverrun, but even that was a little over than four months ago.

Margaery nodded then looked at the servants waiting nearby. "If you two don't want new clothing I'll understand, that was my mother's idea. Between the two of us, I think she's trying to overaweyou barbarian Northerners with our civilized ways. I think my stories about Ranma might have primed her to try that, not that I think she'll have any luck really."

"Some new breeches and a shirt." Arya replied promptly. "I've outgrown my clothing so much, I'd really like a new entire wardrobe, but if you think I'm going to wear any kind of dress think again." The she-wolf growled those last few words at the seamstresses, who backed away hurriedly.

"For my part new pants and new boots would be a marvel milady, the last being an area I hope my men can also partake of in the city." Jon said turning on her with a warm smile that caused Margaery to smile back automatically.

He really is Ranma's brother, so warm under that exterior. I truly wish to meet Lady Catelyn. I was impressed by Edward, but the two of them have done a truly magnificent job with all of their children even if those children are so very different from one another.

"In that case my lords, I will leave you to it. A servant will be sent for you when you and your commanders are expected at dinner." She grimaced a little. "You should probably consider that as Ranma put it more than once in King's Landing, a command performance. My grandmother and mother, many of the important factors from the city and many ladies from the surrounding houses will be eager to see you, and unfortunately to judge you."

"So long as they judge us by our actions rather than predetermined notions my lady, I have no issue with that idea." Jon said, though by her face Arya did not agree.

Margaery did indeed leave them to it, though Jon interrupted his fitting for new boots when he heard Sir Piper, Edric and Lord Dondarrion arrive. Margaery was with them, guiding them to their rooms as a good hostess would, though it was her words that caught both Lord Dondarrion and Jon's attention. "When I heard word from Sir Kevin that you were indeed among the army marching along the Mander Beric, I immediately sent a raven to House Dayne. Your sister Lord Dayne, will be overjoyed to hear that both of you are still alive."

"It was a near run thing at times, my lady." Said the young voice of Edric. "But we came through in the end, not undamaged, but with new friends and allies at least whole."

Beric's voice was rough with emotion. "I, I cannot thank you enough for doing that Lady Margaery. But before any bath or fitting however, might I trouble you for a quill and parchment? And, and may I hope that particular raven has returned?"

"It hasn't yet I'm afraid." Margaery's voice said softly, and Jon stuck his head out the door in time to see her lay a gentle hand on the older man's shoulder. "Take all the time you want my friend, I've already prepared writing implements," she gestured to one side. "We should hear back from Starfall in around four, maybe six days."

Lord Beric looked in that direction, then nodded brusquely to Ser Piper, bowed formally to her and turned without another word entering the room and locking it behind him.

Edric however shook his head with a faint smile. "I think I'll just leave him to his work, thank you." He said sardonically. "I'm going to be heading home in any event, and I'm sure my Lord Beric has more important things to talk about with my aunt than me."

Margaery laughed tousling his hair before gesturing to the room next to Lord Beric's. "Then you can see the tailor first, young man! Don't think I didn't notice that most of your clothing is about 5 inches too short at the leg and arms!" Edric blushed but complied quickly and Jon smiled as Margaery turned to wink at him.

Later that evening Jon and his lords were indeed called to dinner. It wasn't the sumptuous affair that a feast of this nature would've been on one occasion, indeed it was very plebian fair for Highgarden. But even so the variety and amount matched what any noble house in the North would've put on for the Feast for the declaration of Autumn.

The meal was already in full swing by the time they arrived, a small insult to Jon's status as Hand. Margaery hadn't liked it, but had been overruled by the united front of her mother and Olenna. They both wanted to see how Jon would react, and Margaery had decided it wasn't worth alienating her mother further by arguing about it. But seeing as Jon didn't realize it, their little test was worthless.

"My daughter unfortunately has convinced the cooks and butlers that we need to start husbanding food," said Lay Tyrell, sighing in fond exasperation and some chagrin. "I couldn't even prevail upon her to open the larder especially for this meal."

"That was probably a good move my lady." said Jon bowing over her hand before looking at Margaery. She sat on one side of the table rather than at the head, and Jon frowned. "My lady, my brother and his wife made certain to tell me that you would be acting as Lord Paramount. Why are you not in your rightful chair?"

Margaery laughed quietly, shaking her head. "My brother's army is around three days out along the Golden River. That is his place, and I will not usurp it."

"Yes," said a faint crackling voice, causing Jon to turn to an elderly woman who sat right beside that noble place, almost on the corner but not quite. "That was a shrewd move on your brother's part, I'd not have thought of it from a northern wolf. Of course, he then did something remarkably stupid, elevating a baseborn, and naming him Hand? That sets a bad precedent, no matter how certain your loyalty to him might be."

Margaery stiffened noticeably, but Jon simply shrugged his shoulders. "It doesn't, not really. And my loyalty to my brother, to his wife, and to House Stark is not in question old woman, blood and loyalty is the most important thing in the North. I would've thought given that the Reach has always been known as the home of chivalry you would understand that."

The old woman barked a laugh, more of a cackle than a real laugh. "Well said, though I still say the precedent is a bad one."

Jon once again shrugged his shoulders as Arya sat down without preamble, reaching for the food. Compared to the fair they had had on the road, this was a feast of epic proportions. The chicken in particular was calling to Arya. Jon changed the subject quickly, waving to the others who stood beside him "May I introduce my sister Arya, Ser Piper, Lord Edric Dayne, and Lord Beric Dondarrion. They constitute the senior commanders of my force."

"Hardly an army." Olenna scoffed. "Judging by the numbers, you barely number what five thousand or so?"

"Our fighting prowess, organization and tactics allow us to have an impact far in proportion to our size." Jon replied coldly. "Oberyn learned that to his cost."

"Because of the archers and more importantly perhaps the arrows we sent to aid you." Olenna replied. "I'll not doubt your strong, or that your army's a good one, but don't think that you're the only power here."

Jon exchanged a glance with Margaery, who shook her head slightly almost unnoticeably. This was obviously one of the old woman's power plays, her need to show that the Reach was still a major power, and one worth respecting. So Jon replied blandly "As you say. Though if that is indeed the case, perhaps you should have kept some of that vaunted strength at home?"

For a moment the conversation around the hall paused, the ladies, knights, city factors, watching as Jon stared down the old woman, until she finally cracked a smile. "Hard and unyielding you Stark boys, just like your father. True enough, my idiot son was a buffoon in his later years." She waved Alerieto silence. "Oh be quiet Alerie, you know it's true. Even so, Lord Bastard Hand, remember the might of the Reach is not just in armies, but in food and manpower. Even now with the ravages we've faced that is still true."

"Indeed my lady, which is why I as Hand was sent down to aid you. Even Ranma would not have sent me along with this expedition just out of friendship's sake." He smiled widely at Margaery. "Even if he does count you as a friend my lady. He told me of the education you tried to give him in politics, and of your rivalry with the lady Merry. That made for interesting hearing, when Merry wasn't around anyway. He said it was the funniest thing he had ever seen, though he was thankful that neither of you were like Arya in how you would deal with such competition."

"Swish and stab." Arya muttered, chewing a bit of chicken quickly to get the words out. "Swish and stab." She glanced over at Edric, who smirked back blushing slightly as she did the same before looking away.

Margaery laughed, while Olenna asked quickly "You were raised with young Ranma, do you have any idea where his strength comes from? The tales of his destroying the Mountain that Road were very graphic, and there have been more and more tales of awe-inspiring deeds like that, not just his victories in this war."

Jon shrugged, feeling no inclination share Ranma's full story with this woman. Or even with Margaery frankly. "I am a Wolfsworn my lady, I trained with Ranma since we were five or six I think? A lot of the early training was in the form of games, so it's a little vague."

He laughed suddenly, shaking his head. "I remember the early weight training though, that was an experience. In any event, whatever his skills are they can be taught, but he'll only teach those who prove themselves loyal, like Edric here, or the other Wolfsworn."

"You've begun training in this strange new way of fighting?" Margaery asked looking at young Edric.

"I have my lady, and the training bore fruit already. I wasn't a very decent blade before this all began, and even after we formed the Brothers without Borders I was only reckoned a middling swordsman. Since then, well I met my distant relative the Darkstar Gerold Dayne, and I defeated him in sword to sword combat. He was marked as one of the best blades in Dorne, and I dealt with him easily."

"I dealt the killing blow though." Arya said smiling in a manner that showed all of her teeth in a way that sent the lady of the house to shiver and even Olenna to flinch backward slightly. "Didn't want Edric to become a kinslayer."

The conversation continued from there, delving into the campaign in the Riverlands from the beginning. The trials in particular were a fascinating subject to all of the gathered magnates and noble ladies, as well as the news that the Golden Tooth had fallen, something they had heard about before, though not the how.

Olenna however continued to needle Jon on his bastard status, staring at him thoughtfully as she did so, not looking away even once despite eating as much as any of the others.

Eventually even Jon's deep well of self-control began to run out, and at last he said, "My lady, if you have a problem with me, may you please speak it plainly? My status as a bastard is not in question, it is fact and this constant needling on that subject serves no purpose to my eyes. I am what I am, a loyal man of House Stark, a loyal brother of the king and the Royal couple's Hand, whatever my status at birth might have been."

"It is that status as Hand that makes your birth a point of contention." Olenna said simply. "Only once has a bastard been placed as Hand, Lord Brynden Rivers, and some say the Seven looks on in disfavor to the Hand being a bastard, given the number of natural disasters that occurred during Bloodraven's time at the position. Yet even though I'll admit he did not do too badly at the post, bastards as a whole have spelt the ruin of Houses weak and powerful more often than not! Surely you know enough history such as the Blackfyre Rebellions and the Ninepenny Kings War. Here in the Reach there were countless wars of succession for this or that House caused by bastards. And your brother simply hands you that amount of power, that amount of autonomy! Either he and his wife are fools or there's something more going on to it."

"Or, I am simply loyal and they know it." Jon said his voice suddenly as harsh as the stone of the North. "You are coming dangerously close to impugning on my personal honor, and even in the Reach you should know how such can be taken."

"I'm only impugning on it," she said silkily. "If there isn't really anything more behind it. So I ask you, what convinced Daenerys Targaryen to go along with the idea of legalizing your status?"

She knows Jon thought to himself suddenly. She fucking knows! "How?" he asked aloud. Staring hard at the old woman his voice a bare whisper which did not carry over the noise of the feast going on are all around them. "How?"

"I have been Queen of Thorns for a long time boy." Said the old woman, tapping her finger on the table in front of her. "And I've heard a lot of things over that time. Now tell me true, who are you?"

Jon looked at Margaery, who was looking back at him quizzically, staring between him and her grandmother, a fact which for some reason pleased Jon. She had no idea at least. Breathing deeply he shared a glance with Arya who shrugged her shoulders in him unconcerned. "At this point does it really matter?"

"No, no I don't suppose it does. So long as you realize my lady that whatever my birth, I have no wish for the crown, and I would rather slit my own throat than fight my brother. Get that through your head now. If this is some ploy to make me come out and admit to my heritage in a way for you to play kingmaker, to start another civil war so you can put me on the throne as some kind of puppet, get that out of your head now, because I will never agree with it. I would rather burn you alive at the stake as a witch then go along with it."

"I don't want another war, and such loyalty does you credit." Olenna said, her voice losing some of its edge for the first time in the meal. "And whatever your heritage, if it is indeed as I think I would not want that kind of blood on the throne in any event. Whatever the reality of their situation, their actions did break the kingdom after all."

"I'm utterly lost right now." Margaery said, "And I don't like it. Would someone's please fill me in on what's going on here?"

"I am Jon Targaryen nee Stark," Jon said slowly his eyes still locked with the old woman "son of Lyanna Stark and Prince Rhaegar, but only by blood. By birth and by inclination, by oath of fealty, by love and honor, I am a Stark my lady! And that is all will say on this matter. Are we clear?"

"Perfectly." Olenna said smiling slightly, as Margaery gaped at Jon and then her grandmother. "Welcome to Highgarden, Jon Stark. I'm sure our welcome will be worth a Hand's visit."

Later on that evening Jon met with Olenna and Margaery alone, passing on the tale about what had occurred between the two love-struck lovers which Eddard had shared with him and the others. It made for a longish tale, and Margaery was shaking her head in surprise at some bits of it, muttering about how the bards had been right, that it had been love which had broken the kingdom, not madness.

Yet after Jon finished Olenna stood by what she said earlier. "Whatever the emotions between them Lyanna and Rhaegar were fools, insane idiots! Your sister was besotted and blind, and Rhaegar should've known what would happen if he took her to wife, especially with the way she had to run off to meet him! That act started the rebellion, and cost thousands of lives, including his own! No, given how well your brother and Daenerys have done, I have no wish to make use of your real heritage as you fear. Nor will any others if it ever becomes public."

"I wish I had your confidence in your fellow lords," said Jon coldly. "You made me say that aloud where others might've heard, so if it does come back to bite us, it is on your head."

"I'm old boy, you think any threats you can make matter to me?" Olenna scoffed, shaking her head. "No, what's more important is that before that act Rhaegar was part of a small group of... powerful individuals who saw the Aery's dissent into insanity as the greatest threat to the kingdom in centuries. We wanted to put Rhaegar on the throne, and to that end we began to put in place a network of spies."

"Since Robert's Rebellion we have fractured badly, but most of those spies now answer to me. With King's Landing gone, Varys and others of the group either out of communication or simply dead I've been able to take command of most of it, certainly all of it in the Reach, the Stormlands and the Westerlands. Elsewhere of course war gets in the way of my abilities, but for now, you have access to, if I'm not immodest in saying so the greatest spy mistress in Westerosi history and her network."

Jon stared at her thoughtfully then nodded slowly. "My brother already employs two Masters of Whisperers, a setup which works on many levels. I'll pass on that you have your own network to them, though hopefully once Stannis has been defeated we won't face any overt threat for a while. Well, not mortal ones anyway.""

"What do you mean by that?" Margaery asked, frowning sharply.

Jon shrugged and filled them in on what he knew about the White Walkers and their gathering strength. He of course didn't know everything that had occurred of late, the raven sent from Winterfell to Highgarden was still in the air somewhere, but it was closing quickly.

That meeting seemed to drag on forever to Jon, while Margaery and her grandmother made him aware of the problems facing the Reach. Despite Margaery enforcing a very mild version of a rationing system, food itself was not an issue in Highgarden, at least not in the realm of crops. Her reasoning for doing so was in fear of having need to build up enough food which could then be sent to the other kingdoms of Westeros.

She would continue to keep the system going until she had a good read of three points: the damage caused by Oberyn, the time it would take to put the area around the Mander back under the plow, and how long it would be before winter arrived. That last point was hotly debated among the maesters at this point, with most believing the Reach had at best another two months before winter hit it's northernmost areas.

Yet even without those areas, and the lands of House Rowan and others ravaged by the swords of the Lannisters, the Reach was indeed building up the surplus Margaery wanted to see. The tales Jon had heard of crops coming in far faster than they should, of fallow fields suddenly bearing full vibrant crops once again were true. Every remaining Great House and even every remaining minor House had begun to build up a surplus.

Jon and Olenna haggled then about what to do with that food, and here Olenna found that Ranma hadn't been the only Stark youth to be taught economics and their importance. Jon insisted that the food be distributed to the Riverlands and to the Stormlands without recompense, aiding those smallfolk in those areas that could not feed themselves any longer. The Crownlands could once look after itself, without the massive drain on food King's Landing had been, and with much of its land untouched, as far as Jon knew, by war. The Westerlands too, despite the losses among their nobles, could at least feed its own population.

But Oberyn and her mercenaries had done a horrifically complete job in ruining the lands their army passed through, poisoning wells, burning houses, and leaving corpses to rot where they were slain. The smallfolk surviving in those areas would never be able to repair their lands in time for winter, not in the face of autumn's impact on the Stormlands.

And the areas south of the Red Fork which had felt the sting of Lannister occupation were just as badly ravaged. According to a message sent from Maester Vymanover a month ago, nearly all of the smallfolk who had attempted to return to their lands in those areas had returned quickly, bringing tales of horror.

Olenna however had no empathy for the plight of those lands. She argued that getting the food there would not be an easy task or a cheap one. Moreover, selling that food was some of the farmers only means of income. Highgarden and many of the other great Houses were already dealing with too many smallfolk which couldn't produce anything. Therefore it should be sold as it normally would in peacetime.

In the end they compromised. Both the shipping and payment for the food sent into the Stormlands would be covered by the Crown, while the Riverlands and the food sent there would be paid by those Houses which could afford it, or paid for by the crown if not. Since House Tully was dealing with the majority of those refugees, it would fall on Riverrun's coffers to pay for it, but with the Golden Tooth under Tully control, that could easily be borne. However, if the Seven-sent abundance continued for long enough, food would also be sent up to the North by ocean. That food would be sent free, with the cost of distribution being footed by the Reach.

However, in return Jon refused to merely aid in House Redwynes rebuilding or any of the other Houses, a task that was beyond even House Tyrells' deep coffers. They could pay for some of it, but not the entirety, especially the damage to the Arbor and the Shield Islands. Instead, the Royal House would pay for the rebuilding of the Redwyne fleet and its vineyards. In return they would become half-owner of that fleet, and be paid taxes directly of the profits from the vineyards rather than House Redwyne. This would be decent and rather steady source of income for the crown.

However on the matter of displaced smallfolk and their livelihoods Jon was much more sympathetic, saying that the Crown would cede to both aiding their return to their homes and rebuilding out of its own pocket. This was in keeping with his king and queen's past policies, so Jon knew they would back it along with the rest of his work here.

All in all, while Jon's haggling was harsh on the Great Houses, it was not so harsh that they could not meet his demands. House Tyrell in particular could do so easily enough, thanks to Highgarden not having been attacked and its own lands actually having been enlarged to House Oldflowers having been wiped out.

This brought the discussion to the real reason why Jon had been sent down to aid Margaery: the Ironborn raiders. Admittedly at the time that message had been sent those raiders were a much greater issue than they were now, but for some reason while the raiding along the Mander had mostly stopped, there were at least two crews worth of Ironborn raiders scattered along the river below Oldflowers.

"Why they're still around with the Arbor fallen and our fleet moving on the Shield Islands, we don't know." said Olenna tapping the map thoughtfully looking at her granddaughter. "They are acting more like brigands and rapists than seaborne raiders at this point. Simply mindless destruction and pillaging."

Jon nodded grimly. "Like Oberyn and the mercenaries, they've lost themselves to the joy of slaughter. Still, two crews won't be much of an issue, even if they are able to find a keep that's large enough to hold them all. But is that the only threat we face?"

"It is not." Olenna replied honestly. "Until word reaches us of the outcome of the war between Stannis and the King, Lord Bryce's army is still a threat. If Stannis prevails, we may be forced to fight him before fighting Stannis's own forces, which would be bad."

Jon smiled thinly, knowing that if Stannis won, which Jon doubted to put it mildly, Olenna at least would urge her granddaughter and grandson to abandon Jon. By that point he might well be in the field with his army they could close Highgarden against him upon his return. Caught between the walls of the city and the army under Bryce Jon would be hard-pressed to get away. But again Jon had no doubt that his brother would be Stannis. Possibly Stannis was a good strategist, a good tactician, but he doubted that he was a match for Rannar, or that the Shadow Walkers were a match for the Wolfsworn.

"Stranger still, are the Marcher Houses. While they are all moving separately, most of them seem to be moving up to meet with Bryce. One of them however is not. House Peake is marching its forces in a direction that will let them meet with forces from House Florent, which have moved from their own territory near the Honeywine down to the Roseroad." Margaery said. "I'm afraid I don't know Lord Titus Peake at all, and Lord Florent..."

Olenna sighed. "I don't have any idea what that incompetent's long term plans are either. Lord Florent might be attempting to simply enlarge his holdings, or make some other trouble hoping that we'll make concessions to him given what happened to his son up by King's Landing, and that we don't have the resources to deal with him in the field."

"What happened to his son?" Jon asked one eyebrow raised. "The last I'd heard, Selyse Florent was married to Stannis, so shouldn't they have sat out this war?"

"The Florent's hedged their bets." Margaery said dryly. "While I have no doubt that Selwyn backed Stannis, Lord Florent sent his son and heir with a small token force to join the Reach's muster. After the battle Stannis apparently executed him for gross incompetence. Unfortunately, this means their House retains much of its strength."

Olenka barked a caustic cackle. "I'd not expect anything brilliant on the battlefield from him, except possibly in how quickly he retreats from it! But they could handle most of the Houses on that side of the Mander one by one, at least until Willas returned. Frankly they might be the bigger threat in comparison to the remaining Ironborn."

"Show me where they are," Jon said thinking hard as he gestured to the map between the three of them. "And do you have any agents among House Florent his servants that can tell us anything?"

"I've a few, but they're unable to get messages to me that easily," Olenka replied, shrugging her shoulders. "And of course with Lord Florent and his people out in the field, I've lost all of those contact's usefulness. I only have one among his armstrongs, and he's not in a position to spy on his lord's thoughts."

Jon nodded, looking down at the map. Looking up however he noticed that Margaery seemed to be fighting back a yawn and smiled standing up. "I think we've done enough for one day. We'll go over the logistics and supplies for my forces tomorrow, I intend to let my man rest in the city at least until Willas arrives. Unless you think we need to set off quickly?"

Neither of the Tyrell women replied, simply nodding their heads. Jon smiled, then Tyrell, bowing from the waist towards Margaery. "Until tomorrow milady." With that he left, heading not back to his room as Margaery and her grandmother thought, but downstairs and out towards the godswood.

Behind him Olenka looked at her granddaughter, wagging her eyebrows conspiratorially. "My, he is a handsome fellow isn't he and heir to the throne for now."

Margaery rolled her eyes slapping her grandmother lightly on the hand. "Enough of that grandmother, you gave your word that you wouldn't push for such things, and you heard Jon, he'd rather slit his own throat than fight Ranma." If I was faced with that possibility I might do that too regardless of our relationship, Margaery thought to herself shaking her head. Ranma's physical abilities, and his string of victories in the war were hard to argue against.

"Just something to think about my dear, not the heir to the throne part you're right about that, but the handsome part. Something I think you've already noticed, haven't you?" Margaery did not deign to respond to that, which unfortunately was a response in itself. Instead she stood, kissed her grandmother lightly on the forehead and left, allowing a servant to enter and help with the old woman appear for bed.

OOOOOO

The two direwolves found Jon as he entered the godswood. With Ghost guiding him, the three of them moved through the, to Jon's mind, over civilized and fake woods, heading deep into them in search of the weirwood trees.

Soon enough Jon stood in front of the loose triangle of weirwood trees called the Three Singers. They weren't in the not center of the godswood for some reason, but off to one side, the first thing in the woods that made the godswood seem less than the constructed park that it seemed. The Three Singers themselves were much younger than the weirwood trees he was used to, or at least seemed that way. Their trunks were almost slender in comparison to the massive trunks of the tree in Riverrun or back in Winterfell. They had hundreds of willowy branches, all of them tipped with the red five pronged leaves of the breed.

The faces carved into their white trunks too reflected this, being of a trio of women, something Jon had never seen before. The detail on those faces was amazing, far more than the rough face on the tree in Riverrun, though not as natural seeming as the face on the tree in Winterfell.

And given Lady Margaery and her importance to Highgarden, plus her grandmother's undeniable influence, it's strangely appropriate for House Tyrell to have such. Jon thought, before stepping forward. He looked at them for a moment, before choosing the tree whose face seemed to give off the most stern, martial expression, bowing his head slightly and reaching forward with his hands to gently touch the weirwood tree trunk.

When they came to him the images were incredibly vague and very quick, so quick that he knew he was missing some. He saw Ranma running, and then armies clashing. One army was of men, the other of wights and worse things. He saw fleets moving. He saw holdfasts taken, keeps falling, and the dead rising but for these visions there were no hints as to where these battles were taking place or a sense of time, and they passed so quickly, their hold on his mind so thin he couldn't get anything from them. They faded, one after another, leaving no information he could act on save a sense of urgency, of cold and war.

Yet there was one image that did stay in his head, not for long, but just enough to give him some useful information. It showed dragons made of rotted flesh, dark black steel and ice, attacking a longhouse Jon had seen many times before.

Taking his hand away, Jon shook his head to clear of the effects of being touched by the Old God's power. Seven damn it, that was, that was odd. I suppose being so far south it shouldn't come as a surprise the visions weren't exactly clear, but still, it's obvious the Old Gods are calling me north. But... but I was sent into the Reach to aid it's people with the problems here, I can't just abandon that mission. Besides, I couldn't get any sense of time out of any of those visions. Are they from events happening now? Are they happening in a weeks' time, months? I can't tell!

The next day he confided what he had seen to Arya while the girl prowled the castles training room waiting for Edric to show up for their daily sparring session, it pouring down rain outside. The boy was getting much better, and he was sneaky, which against Arya was very important, and she enjoyed their spars, despite the fact Jon, Like Ranma, would always smirk whenever he saw the two of them together.

When he finished she frowned heavily. "I don't like this! I think we should head home right away. Who knows what's been going on elsewhere, if Ranma's still fighting the Red Witch, Stannis, and Viserys then we might be the only ones able to get away at all, whatever that one glimpse of our brother running might mean! It's our duty to head home and do what we can, leave these soft southerners to their own problems!"

"It would take us months to get there, Old God's damn me, it would take you and I running with our direwolves more than two months to even get to the Neck, then another month maybe to get to Winterfell. Which might not be where we're most needed! And as good as we are Arya, alone we can only do so much. No, I have a better idea. Oldtown still retains some of its navy, and there's the army under Garlan, and under Sir Bryce and Willas to consider. When we go north, I want us to go with the entire weight of the remaining Reach forces behind us. I even think I know where we need to go, too."

The two siblings however ran into a surprise when they confided what Jon had seen to Margaery later that day. The three of them met in her room, ostensibly to discuss her training, or at least working out, with Arya. When told of Jon's visions Margaery nodded, taking it at face value despite it flying in the face of traditional Seven doctrine to acknowledge the power of other faiths.

"The maesters are being strangely coy about it, but we know that the black candles have been lit. Further one of the Archmaesters, the only one willing to aid him against the Ironborn's own magical abilities, has convinced Garlan to head north. At least, he was doing so the last time I had communications with him. He wanted to take the Shield Islands, then turn his ships northward. We haven't heard from him yet about that."

"Would he have to resupply after taking back the Shield Islands?" Jon asked intently.

"Yes. This would force him to head back to the Whispering Sound at least. From there ships from Oldtown could go out to resupply them. Or he could use Bandallon without losing much time. But since we haven't heard from him yet, I think he didn't think about that one." Margaery shrugged. "My brother is smart and reckoned a decent swordsman, but in terms of strategy he's not very experienced."

"Ouch, such a ringing endorsement." Arya laughed. "Still, that might mean we could meet with his fleet in the Whispering Sound right?"

But Jon was shaking his head. "No, at least not yet. We need to know what happened in the Shield Islands first. If we've smashed the Ironborn's remaining strength, fine, but I don't want any surprises. I don't want to march off like Mace did with the remaining strength of the Reach only to have someone else sneak in behind us."

"This is good thinking." Margaery said with a thin smile. "Does that mean you'll still deal with the raiders that are still around the Mander?"

"Yes." Jon said nodding decisively. "Besides that, I wish to remain here in Highgarden long enough to talk to your brother. Between the three of us I think we can figure out the best forces to stay and what is to go."

"Maybe," Arya said with a shrug. "We can hope at least, though I heard an interesting phrase from some of the merchants in the city the other day." She waited until the other two were looking at her before speaking, trying to affect a smallfolk accent and failing miserably, which made the line all the more amusing. "Shit in one o' yer 'ands, hope in another, see which'n yer have ta empty first."

After they finished chuckling, Margaery shook her head, looking at the two siblings. "You two are very confident Ranma will win this war. Despite my hopes in backing him however, I have to admit to having some misgivings about it. Stannis has a reputation as a very good general."

"Not good enough." Jon said with a thin wolfish smile, one Arya shared, her hands clenched on the hilt of Fang. "Not nearly good enough."

OOOOOO

Willas arrived two days later ahead of schedule, and once again the city's streets rebounded with cheers and salutations. Jon and Margaery rode out to meet him, leaving behind both Arya and the two direwolves in the godswood. There, in the center of the city Willas and Jon met for the first time, shaking hands in full view of the watching smallfolk and the army behind Willas.

"My Lord Tyrell." Jon said gravely, clasping the other man's hand in a warrior's grip. "I have heard tell of the good work you've been doing on the western front. You ended a blight on the land when you tore down Clegane Keep and did as a Lord Paramount ought in defending your people. As Hand to Ranma and Daenerys Stargaryen, first of their names, I formally, and happily, acknowledge and approve of your resumption of the Lord Paramountcy of the Reach."

"I could not have done it alone, and I have heard tell of your battle against the Dornish mercenaries my Lord Hand. Without you and your men, their ravages would've continued nigh onto the walls of Highgarden itself." Willas replied smiling briefly at the younger man.

His message said (and heard by more than Willas) Jon moved his horse backwards slightly, allowing Margaery to come close flinging her arms around her brother, nearly falling out of her own saddle with her exuberance. It was of course not very decorous of her, but neither sibling cared as they clutched one another in a hug that was as heartfelt as it was strong.

Later that day the two army's commanders met in the castle's dining hall, and the men shared the details of their campaigns. Jon found Willas to be insightful, intelligent, thoughtful, calm and very droll at times. All things Jon felt were excellent to see in a Lord Paramount, especially in a realm that has faced so much turmoil.

In a small ceremony Jon handed over marks of nobility to Toulev Simthson, bequeathing him with, after talking about it to Margaery, the wiped out House Osgrey's former holding of Coldmoat. While Coldmoat itself was still a very large and well-built castle, the lands had fallen into disrepair and it would need a lot of work to flourish again. But Toulev didn't seem them kind of man to shirk from hard work, and the smiles on nearly everyone's faces as the former armymen accepted the mark of nobility was everything Jon could hope for.

Two Knightly Houses, House Conklyn and HouseWillumwere raised to Noble status thanks to the service they and their men had given in the War. They were awarded lands along the Mander which had formerly been held by House Graves, Dunn and Westbrook. All three had been wiped out by the Ironborn. Their lords had subsequently been killed elsewhere in the war either by Stannis or through their own treachery. Of course putting those lands back into working order would be a major undertaking, but House Tyrell and the crown via Jon had already pledged their support to it.

The last portion of these proceedings however was a surprise to everyone, even Margaery. "As Hand, it would not normally fall under my power to create new knighthoods," said Jon looking around at the ladies and men gathered in Highgarden's dining hall. "However, my brother, my King and his queen bade me do this, in their name. Ser Graceford, step forward."

Still wearing his full plate armor minus his helm Graceford did so, and when Jon gestured, he knelt. "Your House has long been known to worship the Mother specifically of the Seven, and to rarely take part in wars save when one side or another made war upon the Mother's children. The king and queen have no desire to change this, rather to see this used as a platform for a new knighthood."

"Ser Graceford, I award thee the commandership of the Order of the Mother's Fist. You will have a crown remit to welcome any and all into your ranks, from both nobility and smallfolk. Your order will receive funding from the crown, and you will be able to second any armymen or knight to your service. A suitable keep will be found to house the order in time, though for now we all obviously have better things to do with our time than go house hunting."

There were some laughs at Jon's small joke, but he went on seriously, staring down into Graceford's eyes. "Your purview will be to defend those who cannot defend themselves, the smallfolk, from the depredations of any who would prey upon them, regardless of where they hide, bandits, deserters, mercenary bands, Ironborn raiders, it matters not, it will be your task to hunt them down. Do you accept this burden before crown and god?"

"My Lord Hand, in the name of the Mother and their majesties, I do." Ser Graceford replied calmly.

"Then rise, Lord Commander Graceford." Jon said with a smile.

Later that evening as he and Jon shared a bottle of wine in Willas' personal office, Willas said. "That was well done, with both Toulev and Graceford. Appropriate, well-earned and I could not think of a better man to lead an Order with such a specific task."

While technically Willas could move into his father's rooms and his office, Willas had decided to wait until the office could be redecorated. Despite their estrangement he loved Mace and moving in when all of his things were still in there seemed a desecration. Besides, his own room was warm, familiar, and further from the wine cellar, a good thing in his opinion. Willas had no desire to fall into his father's bad habits.

"I only spoke the truth, the reports we saw of your deeds and those of your men were pretty complete as such things go. Besides which, the new knightly order will be a major aid in days to come." Considering that Knightly Orders like that could induct anyone into their ranks regardless of birth, it would be a way of getting more smallfolk into a military position, which could only aid in the knighthood's task of wiping out brigands and defending the smallfolk. And they could also serve as pointed reminders to nobles of all stripes to play nice. After this last war that might not be as necessary as it once was, but it was still a consideration.

Willas nodded, and the two of them continued to sip from the wine bottle and discuss the war and its causes, as well as what Jon felt was happening elsewhere. Rumors had begun to spread of some kind of battle that went on near the King's Road, which saw the Lannister's false king finally laid low, but no details had reached the Reach just yet.

They also of course talked about the future. Jon outlined what he and Margaery had already accomplished, with Willas adding his own points of view, before sending for a servant to bring in a map of the Reach. From there the two of them began to work on redrawing the map, working through the noble Houses which had, to their knowledge been wiped out root and branch. Dunn, Graves, Westbrook, Chester, Grimm, Risle, Hewett, Yleishire, Uffering, Kidwell, Inchfield, Redding, the list of dead Houses was long and depressing. Worse in a way was the list of Houses still alive but crippled militarily.

It made for grim work, but House Tyrell at least would come out of this war even stronger than it had been before, controlling large segments of the Mander on either side of its previous area of control. It now spread down to Oldflowers and the lands around it, and up towards House Fossoway's land. House Bushy, whose land had been between Fossoway and House Tyrell before, had been wiped out in the battle between the stags. Thanks to this, Tyrell's lands had increased by at least half again.

The other noble Houses, those that survived the coming clash between Stannis and Ranma, would also come out of it in a stronger position, at least in time. Right now however, several Houses had already proven themselves.

House Beesbury had suffered in war, but the House had many branching families and their lands had not suffered the sting of the Ironborn. While the extent of their losses in war could not be known until the War ended and the survivors came home, the House would survive, as would House Ambrose.

While most of that Houses forces were intact from last report, if they remained loyal to Stannis, that would probably cease, and the main house was small, so their long term fortunes were still in doubt. Their lands however, situated slightly southeast of where Willas had halted the Lannister reavers, had not been despoiled,. Lady Ambrose had also been open-handed in aiding the refugees that sought her lands despite sending no men to aid Willas in his efforts.

Oakheart would retain its lands and gain some more from its southern neighbors, the Kidwells and the Reddings all of whom were gone now. Rowan had been hammered badly, but while neither Jon nor Willas had any idea if Mathis Rowan was still alive, the House was still there, and it's castle still powerful and well maintained thanks to Lady Rowan, Mathis' wife they might even be awarded House Woodbright's land, since that House was also listed among the destroyed. House Crane would also enrich itself by taking command of former Westerlands land. And the Houses by Oldtown and in the Dornish Marches were still somewhat strong. House Blackbar, Bulwer, Cuy and Mullendore might have lost their lords and heirs to war, but retained their lands and some of their military strength. Frankly those houses were probably better off without the idiotic 'summer knights' that had previously led them.

Of the marcher House's only House Tarly had truly suffered in this war so far, it's lord dead with the majority of the men it had sent to war. But the Valyrian blade of the house was still in it's possession and the survivors had returned. The house would no doubt recover in time, though it would not receive any material aid in doing so. Instead, the young lord would need to present himself to the Royal House at some point in the future.

Several hours later the wine they had consumed began to mess with their thoughts enough that they had to leave off for the day, with Willas smiling slightly as they did. "By the way, I don't suppose I could interest you in letting me introduce Ghost to some of my dogs? I doubt I've any studs who'd pass muster for Nymeria, mores the pity. Still, I'd love to see what would happen if we could somehow breed a direwolf with some of my lines."

Jon laughed. "That actually might have already happened somewhere. Ranma told me about this time with Fenris when the two of them were travelling to King's Landing with Robert Baratheon and father. According to Ranma they stayed at an inn, and Fenris was forced to stay outside in the kennels where..."

OOOOOO

The siege of the Last Hearth had become a thing of sporadic raids and attritional warfare. Most of the time the White Walkers stayed as far out of arrow range as they could, sending in clumps of wight archers in their stead. Attacking mostly under the cover of darkness or when the sky was heavily overcast, they would attack one section of the wall with a few volleys before retreating. Occasionally they would send in large clumps of wights at this or that point along the wall, testing the defenders more severely. But there were enough defenders to rest in shifts, so those on watch were always well-rested.

It was the bitter cold more than anything that was beginning to dampen morale. The cold of this winter was sapping even to Northerners, and too few of them had enough warm clothing to truly cover themselves adequately. Dozens of men had lost fingers or noses, or ears to the cold, more so than they had lost men to the attacks of the enemy, since that first day anyway. And the lack of any real attacks or true targets was also sapping the defenders martial ardor.

Food at least isn't an issue, thought Hother as he cracked his neck explosively, moving into his personal quarters with a sigh of relief when the heat from the coal stoked fire met him. We also haven't used my final little surprise yet, and it doesn't look as if the White Walkers have any idea it's out there, which is good. Still, I can't help but feel that there's going to be worse to come. Much worse.

This alas was true. That first assault had been directed solely by warriors, White Walkers who did not use magic save that found in their armor and weapons. Cannon fodder, in other words. The next assault began nearly two weeks after the siege began, and the first sign that it was different came from a scream from the wall. "By the Old Gods, what is that?!"

Andrew Willowtree shot to his feet, quickly bundling himself up as much as possible before racing outside. It would do no good for his men if he died because of the cold or suffered any of the dozen ailments that came from not remembering to do so. Even so, he beat Hother to the parapet simply because he was younger and in better shape. So he was the first of the commanders to see the horror that was coming towards them over the snow.

It was a giant spider like those the defenders of the Wall had seen but rather than being ten stories or more tall, this one was only a 24 feet from the tip of its head down to its feet. Yet even so, it was altogether horrifying, made of ice and bodies thrown together rather than the steel of those being used further north. It had an incomplete, haphazard look to it, but even so it and the seven others following it were things of horror to the defenders. From above that monstrous force came birds, thousands of them. It was as if the avians of a forest had been hunted down and turned to the White Walkers purpose.

With these new terrors came old ones. The defenders had hoped against hope that the horde of wights they had dealt with that first day had been the totality of their enemy's forces, but it was obviously not the case. They had been reinforced somewhat, the horde strengthened back to its original size, and more White Walkers could be seen at the back of it horde. There were even White Walkers on top of the spiders, six on each.

For a moment this site of that magical horde drew Sir Andrew's breath out of his body. Then he shook himself, and bellowed "To arms! To arms!"

The defenders began the battle firing a fusillade of fire arrows at the oncoming horde, while the best archers among them coolly waited, there gloved hands working on their bow strings as they waited for the giant spiders to come within range. They did so far faster than the defenders had hoped, moving as fast as spiders of normal size could over the hard-packed snow.

The first few dragonglass arrowheads struck, but didn't do much, the spiders shrieked like the wights would when on fire, but didn't slow down. They didn't charge the castle yet however, preferring to stay back, allowing the wights time to force the defenders to spread their fire. A few White Walkers on the back of those beasts took the better angle to fire they allowed to fire at the defenders, causing death and injury everywhere around the wall. In return several White Walkers fell dead from dragonglass arrows. Even a nonlethal hit with one was enough to kill a White Walker, if slowly and a great deal of pain.

But it was the birds that caused the defenders the most grief. They zoomed down, far more numerous than the defenders fire could fight off. Hundreds of birds fell but thousands came on, overwhelming the defenders in places, pecking the men on the parapet or on the top of the towers to death.

Yet they didn't discriminate between the archers and the regular armymen, and attacking like this brought them within range of the swords and axes of the defenders. For every man they went down, hundreds of birds did as well. As the battle continued more of the defenders raced to the walls the attrition beginning to work in the defender's favor.

But after the last group of birds was seen off, Andrew turned and stared as the first of the wights reached the bottom of the wall. "Light the ropes! Do it now!"

To one side an armymen looked at him in surprise, while others simply raced off to carry out his orders. "Don't we want them to start climbing the outer wall first?"

Andrew shook his head grimly pointing with his sword at the spider creatures who were now circling ever closer despite what the archers with dragonglass could do to them. Worse, their own losses were beginning to mount. The White Walkers had a skill with the bow that had to be seen to be believed. "No, those things will be on us at the same time, and I don't think we want to face them both. "

"Surely the fire will scare the spiders off as well?"

"Maybe, maybe not," Andrew said shrugging philosophically. "Best to spread the word to start husbanding of the dragonglass arrows too, I don't think they're doing more than irritating those spiders."

It was well Andrew had thought of that, because the defenders had already gone through more than half their remaining dragonglass arrows, though they still retained a goodly number of dragonglass daggers. These had already seen work in this battle, dealing with the injured birds that had fallen within the confines of the Castle, as well as the dead among the defenders. It was gristly work, but necessary to keep them from rising as wights.

The battle continued for some time, with the fires of the trap on the wall lighting the evening for a time. The spiders continued to march around the castle searching for an opening where there wasn't any fire nets, but not finding any. But unlike the first day while the wights and the White Walkers kept their distance from the fire, they did not retreat entirely. Arrows continued to fly from both sides, and snow continued to fall.

Eventually the fire along the ropes went out, slowly but surely dissipating, and the horde charged forward. The spiders led the way now, but Andrew and Hother were ready. "Archers, fire at the ditches!"

With that phrase hundreds of archers all along the walls shifted targets, aiming not towards the attacking wights or spiders, but at the ditches filled with coal. Those ditches coverings had been smashed aside by the weight of the spiders leaving the coal, all of which had been soaked in vegetable oil before being placed out there open to their fire arrows.

The coal burst into flames and heat, turning the wood that had previously covered the ditches into fuel, putting up a wall of heat and fire here and there around the Last Hearth. One spider got caught directly in this trap and burned with a keening wail, along with the white walkers that had been riding it. Two others lost their front legs and fell backwards, tumbling their riders to the ground. Three more were badly burned, and only the first to attack had advanced far enough to be completely miss the trap.

It tried to ascend the walls, only to face hundreds of fire arrows, all of the defenders along that wall now retargeting on it. The magic that made it go simply couldn't protected from that number of fire arrows, and it began to collapse, allowing the defenders to retarget the rest of the injured spiders and their former riders before they could get out of range.

While their men were seeing to this, Andrew and Hother stood on top of the gatehouse frowning heavily. "I said to myself last night that we might be able to last out years if that first attack was the best they could throw at us. Now I'm afraid I might have inadvertently brought this fate upon us."

Andrew shook his head. "I don't really believe fate can be tempted like that. Although, you're right when you say we won't be lasting out years." He turned watching as man began to gather up the dead, quickly counting more than 200 bodies simply within his line of sight. "We won't last months if they can throw attacks like that at us. And worse, that coal out there won't last forever."

"Oh there's even worse than that boy." Hother growled, looking at one of the dead birds. "That there is the raven we've got trained for Winterfell. We can't even get the word out now."

Hother stared at the bird, then at Andrew, before turning to stare at the army outside their walls. Then he shrugged, threw back his shoulders and turned to organize a work party to dispose of the dead birds littering the parapet.

OOOOOO

Willas and Jon looked up from their conversation about logistics when the door to Jon's room, which they were using this evenings for their planning session, banged open. In the doorway stood Lord Dondarrion, smiling widely while behind him Edric stood, shaking his head yet still wearing an equally large smile. "She has been faithful! Allyria still wishes to marry me!" Lord Dondarrion blurted, then without another word rushing over to the wine bottle set on the table between Willas and Jon.

He poured himself a generous glass, raised it slightly to the two men still staring at him before downing it in one long gulp. When he put it down he was strangely enough sounding more sober than he had before. "We received a reason from House Dayne. They formally pledge allegiance to the new Royal House, and only ask that the Lord Dayne be allowed to return to home."

Then his smile was back, wider than ever. "She also asks specifically that I return him to the House, so that we may finally be married. She is looking forward to hearing my tales, and to seeing me again."

Willas smiled, standing up to clap the other man on the shoulder heartily. "I'm happy for you," he said simply. Then he smiled sardonically. "My own marriage doesn't seem to be on the horizon, alas."

"We'll have to look into that I suppose," Jon said with a faint smile his own. "Do you have any... preferences?"

"Bite your tongue." Willas spat back, shuddering a little. "Let me have another few years of bachelorhood before you and my grandmother conspired between the two of you to end that happy state, please."

The three men laughed, and Edric who had remained in the doorway shook his head closing the door, leaving them to it.

Smiles were remarkably absent the next evening however, when Maester Lomys and Margaery joined them. Margaery watched as Jon read the message from Winterfell, internally noting that this was yet another sign that Jon and Ranma were true brothers. Where other families would rage and shout, glare angrily, or strike out about them, the Starks did something much more terrifying. Something Ranma had shown her when he learned of the true depths of Gregor Clegane's crimes.

They stilled. Everything about them went hard cold and still, save for his grey eyes which seemed to snap with an inner fire, much like the lava in a volcano. What was more terrifying was that Arya, Ghost and Nymeria all went cold and quiet as well, despite not having actually read the message yet. They were simply reading Jon somehow, reacting as a pack would.

She exchanged a glance with Willas, who nodded back understanding what she had seen, before looking back at Jon. As Lord Paramount of the Castle Margaery had of course handed the message to him first, but he had immediately handed it over to Jon, not reading it. "What does it say?"

"The White Walkers have found a way around the Wall. They first took Skagos, pushed back a force my family had sent there to bring the Islanders to heel, and are now on the mainland. And this was weeks ago!" Jon replied before handing the message over to Willas. He turned to stare down at the map of the Reach, which the three of them had again been working on that evening. "How long would it take us to get Oldtown from here?"

"On a straight march 3 and 1/2 weeks... I think." Margaery said calculating quickly. "If you can march as quickly down the Roseroad as you did from the Blackwater to the Mander anyway." She looked at Arya, who nodded back having told Margaery how many days that portion of the journey had taken during one of their practice sessions. "But you can't simply head down to Oldtown immediately, there are still questions that need to be answered here in the Reach. Lord Bryce, the raiders along the Mander, House Florent and Peake in particular. Also remember what you said, you don't want to take all of the Reach's defenders with you."

Jon's hands clenched and unclenched, but he wasn't looking at her, instead looking out the window. "Those visions I told you about were real. I can't imagine my brother leaving Stannis intact behind him, which means he's won this war. The Army is on its way back, my brothers already probably in the North somewhere, and I'm stuck here in the Reach!"

"I told you then, the Reach matters more than its men-at-arms!" Margaery said sharply, smacking her hand down on Jon's making him turn his gaze to her his eyes wide for a moment as he came back from that dark angry place. "We have to put the Reach to order, we have to get food moving into the Riverlands and the Stormlands, or else we will face famine in those places all too soon, and the chaos will spread! And to do that we need to deal with the remaining threats here. Do you think Ranma would thank you for running off and leaving those problems to fester?"

"I understand that up here but not here." Jon said after a moment staring into her eyes and tapping his forehead before tapping his chest. "Still you're right, and regardless of how slow Bryce's moving, I think it's time that we start dealing with some of these issues."

"I've already sent a messenger demanding to know his intentions to Lord Floret." said Willas. "Your men have been training ours, and both our forces are decently rested, though I think some of your horses still need some more rest. You drove them hard on the march. Still, if aren't going to wait for the pike regiments to be ready, we can march any day."

At Arya's feet Nymeria sniffed audibly, turning her nose up, as if saying that discussions about horses were beneath her dignity, causing Ghost to chuff in the laughter of his kind. Arya smirked at the two direwolves, tuning out the following discussion first time as she played with Nymeria's ears.

Jon nodded, then moved over to a larger map of Westeros. Unlike the map of the Reach this one wasn't well detailed. It had no lines denoting the borders of the various Great House's lands, only major castles were showed at all and a few scattered landmarks. "Tell me good maester, do you know if Maidenpool, Harrenhal, Harroway or Duskendale have ravens trained for Highgarden? And if so, how long would it take to get a message from them to here?"

Maester Lomys was an old man, a distant cousin of the House whose loyalty to them was unquestionable. He frowned in thought, then shook his head slowly. "I do not think Harrenhal, Harroway or Maidenpool would. At least, I have not seen any ravens from those places since before Robert's Rebellion. Duskendale might, however. If a raven comes from that city it would take possibly nine or ten days to get here."

Jon nodded, estimating times and distances in his head. "What are you thinking of?" Margaery asked, though she already had a good idea.

"I'm thinking of how quickly my brother and Daenerys could get word to us of their victory, and by my calculations it should be arriving here any day now." Any small doubt about that victory he might've had disappeared when he initially had his visions. There was no chance Ranma or Daenerys would have left any cohesive enemy behind them to take to sea or run off, which meant the war was over. I just have to get word of that to Bryce somehow, and one of my problems at least will go away.

He turned back to stare at the map, which denoted where Bryce Caron's army was. They were marching at a okay pace for a normal army of this time, which meant a hell of a lot slower than any army Ranma and Jon had involved with. There were still at least two days out from Highgarden, and what Bryce would do when he arrived was still a question. "I have no idea where that battle occurred between Ranma and Stannis but..."

"it wasn't just your brother and Stannis," said a familiar crackling voice from the doorway, and they all turned to see Olenna being helped in by two maids. She held up a message of her own, smirking slightly. "There was also Viserys' army coming down from Maidenpool. One of my factors, the only one I have in that town got word to me. Does that change the equation young Wolf?"

"Not at all." Jon said with a shrug. "Viserys might have a decent sized force, but it would be an untried one, and frankly there is no general in the world to match my brother. As for his dragon, it could be a problem I suppose but one Daenerys could match."

"The Red Witch could give him problems though," Margaery reposted shaking her head. "Magic on one side, a dragon on the other, I don't know Jon, Ranma is good, but it is he that good as a general?"

Jon and Arya exchanged a complacent smile. "Yes..." Arya said finally looking up from where she had been playing with Nymeria's ears. "Yes he is."

Bryce's army arrived at the gates of Highgarden two days later, by which time a message had indeed arrived from Duskendale by raven wing, beating any message Olenna's spies could send easily. It was a short message declaring victory and Stannis's death, as well as the surprising appearance of the Golden Company under another Targaryen pretender. Olenna had looked aghast at that, shaking her head and muttering about old plans that should never have seen the light of day, but Jon frankly didn't care to question her about it. He had other fish to fry.

When informed of this message Lord Caron was relieved and immediately placed his army at Jon and Willas' service. Even though many of his commanders urged him to wait and make certain that this message was real, Bryce knew Willas, and the Starks in particular were not at home with such subterfuge.

Jon and Willas promptly began to break that force up, adding a few thousand horsemen to the force that Jon would take along the Mander to clear out the remaining Ironborn. Ser Graceford became Jon's second in command on this mission.

Willas would lead another, larger force straight to Oldtown along the Rose road for now, before the force would split in two. Lord Caron and the majority of his army would go with Lord Dondarrion, marching straight down to the southern marches to meet the Marcher Houses. Most of those Houses had stopped and turned around once word reached them through the smallfolk that the army under Oberyn had been smashed, but House Peake was still moving, heading towards a meeting with House Floret's forces. The other half of the force would continue the march to Oldtown under Willas.

At the same time Willas also send a message down to Oldtown, ordering House Hightower to prepare enough ships to embark a further 7,000 men, which was as much as Willas, Jon and Margaery could agree to add to Garlan's force, which itself would lose at least it's remaining cavalry arm. This would allow the Reach to retain a decent sized force at home.

It would leave them with enough infantry to reinvest several of the keeps along the Mander and send a force up to the Shield Islands to do the same with them. The cavalry, which would make up the larger portion of the army, would also keep up the anti-bandit activities and back up Lord Dondarrion down in the Passes. In the same vein, several of the war galleys which currently served under Garlan would also be left behind to patrol the Reach coastline and the islands.

The reason for this was because a message from Garlan had reached Highgarden about a week ago from Oldtown. In it, Garlan gave an account of the battle of the Arbor, and the aborted invasion of the Shield Islands. The fact that five or six crews worth of Ironborn that should have been in those islands were now unaccounted for was disturbing in the extreme.

They needn't have bothered worrying about them however. While he was a rapist, a murderer, a sociopath, a torturer without conscious and practically anything else anyone could think of, one thing that Euron Greyjoy was not was stupid. Nor was he interested in glory, holding lands, or proving the worth of the Old Way.

Euron was interested in power, and had come back thinking that he could gain such power through the throne of the Iron Islands. With the destruction of much of the Iron Island's military capacity, the news that the Islands themselves were being invaded, and that every hand was now turned against them, Euron had decided not to attempt anything.

Instead, he had slipped past Garlan's fleet in the night, heading to the Shield Islands. There he convinced the captains of the crews still there through violence or words to follow him now that his brothers were both dead. And instead of heading home to the Iron Islands, he had taken them on a roundabout course further south. The Summer Islands beckoned with easy spoils, easy life, slaves and women aplenty. Especially since pirates had already attacked the only town in the Summer Islands and heavily damaged its defenses in the battle.

The very next day Jon marched out at the head of his army, which did not include Arya. She had opted to go with Eddic and Lord Dondarrion, saying something about protecting her stake. Why that set Margaery into gales of laughter Jon didn't know, though the fact that the two women were grinning at one another as Arya said it made Eddic blush and stammer, something Jon found telling.

The fact those two got on so well together was a surprise Jon mused as he trotted at the head of the Army. Despite Willas offering him one of the finest horses Jon had ever seen as his own, he had declined to ride. Thanks to Ranma's training Jon could race any horse into the ground over a distance, and there was no point to having one simply for show at this point, everyone who mattered knew not to judge Jon by the fact he was an infantryman. If the two of them hadn't gotten along it would've been a disaster, but they seem to have certain similar interests.

Margaery had yearned for years to learn about anything that pointed and stabbed, a predilection that Arya was happy to cultivate. In turn Arya was interested in history, and surprisingly land management. While she wasn't interested in all of the normal womanly duties, she certainly was interested in knowing whether or not her future husband was doing his job properly. An interest that Margaery in turn cultivated in her.

There were still some differences of course. Margaery was certain that women could wield greater power hidden behind the shadow of a man than could ever be the case in this day and age by themselves. Law, custom society, even religion did not allow for women to truly be seen the equal of men save possibly at the Royal level. Arya however was wedded to the power of combat.

He paused at the gate of Highgarden seeing lady Margaery waiting there astride a horse along with several dozen men, only two of whom looked like men at arms. "My lady, it's kind of you to see us off yourself but..."

"I am not seeing you off, my Lord Hand." Margaery said, falling in next to him smiling down at him from the saddle as she languidly reached out to pet Ghost on the back of the head. Like Fenris, Ghost was a monster of his breed, his head equal to the withers of her horse and broader across in the body. The direwolf rumbled happily under her scratching, smirking as only a wolf could at Jon's confused expression.

"I am coming along to personally survey the lands damaged by the Ironborn," Margaery went on gesturing to the men behind her, most of whom looked as if they roared just as well as a sack of potatoes. "These gentlemen are cartographers, masons, woodworkers and good men Roger and Morris who you already know. They will be able to tell me how long it will take to bring the lands that have been devastated by the Ironborn back to production and livability."

Jon looked at the two men and nodded, recognizing them now. They were the leaders of the refugees in the city, and he had met with the two of them twice before this, albeit in a more formal setting. They were farmers of some reputation, tough men who knew everything there was about farming.

"I see." Jon said with a moment. "That is useful. And now might I ask the real reason why you're coming along with us milady?"

"I no longer wish to remain behind when those I care about going to battle Jon Stark." Margaery said quietly, shaking her head. "Of those I care about marching out this day, you are most likely to face actual combat, ergo I will go with you." She smiled slightly, staring into his eyes in such a manner that Jon actually found himself blushing despite his normal self-control.

This was of course not missed by lady Margaery, who's smile widened into something almost wicked. "And, I suppose you could say that Arya and I have one thing in common, neither of us wishes to let our 'investment' out of our gaze."

Jon coughed again, ignoring Ghost's chuffing laughter and turned again towards the road, marching off without another word as Margaery fell in beside him giggling with the sound of tinkling bells.

OOOOOO

When Sansa rode into Riverrun at last the crowd of smallfolk who had gathered to see her arrive paused in their cheering for a moment. Many of these men and women were old enough to remember Lady Catelyn, and to them it was as if she had come again, only this time to stay. Sansa sat proudly on her horse, her red hair flowing in the breeze, her face unmarked by any blemish without a hint of her Stark heritage in it, though the clothing she wore certainly gave that the lie. Her gaze was regal as it surveyed the crowd, but there was a hint of a smile on her face which indicated that she was happy to be there, and happy to see them all, somehow conveying the impression that it was a thought she had about all of them in turn.

The direwolf she rode also showed what family she came from. Fenris had refused to allow Sansa to ride a horse, and had equally refused to head off to meet up with his bonded until the red-haired packmate was safely in the southern den, something which Eddie wholeheartedly agreed with. Though as a mere human he of course missed most of the nuances.

Now however Fenris began to regret it as the cheers for 'Lady Sansa' rebounded all around him. Only Sansa clapping her hands over his ears prevented him from growling and snarling at the crowd.

They moved through the city quickly, heading to the castle while Sansa nodded cordially at the crowd to either side of her, shrugging apologetically occasionally to indicate that she couldn't actually wave at present. The sight of the young lady riding the direwolf with her hands clasped over his ears sent many a man or woman into fits of laughter, though the guards following Sansa did not take part in the pleasure. Instead all of them from Edd on down scanned the crowd and the roofs all around them as they marched watching out for anything dangerous. They've been caught flat-footed once, it would not happen again.

They were met in the courtyard of the castle by the steward Utherydes, who bowed to Sansa when she got off Fenris' back. The direwolf stood beside her, a monstrous shadow to the somewhat slight Sansa, as she smiled winsomely. "My Lord, is my castle and city ready for me?"

"It is my lady," said the elderly man. "May I present the maester of the castle, and the head maid?"

"You may." If Utherydes was uncomfortable about handing over control of the castle to what amounted to a complete stranger and a woman to boot he did not show it.

Sansa mentally put a checkmark next to the man's name for that while smiling politely at the servants when they were introduced. Yet when she was asked if she wanted to retire for the day she declined quickly. "No, I wish to meet with the town Council, the head of the city guard, and the bursar. Especially I wish to meet with any head of the refugees that have been formed."

The steward's eyebrows went up, but he nodded his head and gestured for her to follow him inside. Over the next few hours Sansa did meet with those worthies, laying out what she wanted to know about the town and what was going to happen in the future. First she installed the Stark men who had come with her in command of the city watches patrols, not the entire watch but the various small guard outposts. Those men wouldn't have been very good at organizing or leading the entire watch, but they would make excellent trainers and leaders at the squad level.

She also informed the townspeople of her plans for the refugees who were still within the town and on the western bank of the Red Fork. Sansa was happy to see that much of the work on their temporary homesteads was proceeding apace, and she opened the coffers of the castle to pay for some more housing, and more wood and coal to be brought in since winter's cold had followed her down from the Neck.

This fact dominated the discussion from start to finish. Food, preparation for, storage of, and the need to stay warm were therefore the main topics of discussion. Sansa had several ideas in particular when it came to storing wood and coal that the Riverrun natives hadn't thought of, though she was happy to hear they had heard back from Myr about the glass for the glass garden designed by Vincent Ryger. Work had already begun on that project's foundations, but it would be at least another two months before the needed glass arrived.

The idea of turning the entire courtyard into a storage area for coal and wood made the castellan and head maid nearly scream in horror, but Sansa stood firm. "It's a giant storage area gentleman, cover it with tarps here and there, and you can use it to store coal or wood or anything. Trust me, warmth will be the main issue if it gets as cold as I fear."

It was well into the evening when Sansa was finished her first day's work and meet up with Edd and Ben for an evening meal. Despite the fact he should've been happy that they had finally arrived at their destination however Edd looked anything but. "Sansa, have you talked with maester Vyman yet?"

Sansa frowned at him, dabbing at some soup with a piece of bread before chewing on it with relish. They did something to the bread here in Riverrun, added some hint of rosemary to it that just enhanced the flavor. "No, I haven't yet. I wanted to set aside an entire day to go over the plans for the Healing Hall that you mentioned, as well as anything we've heard from my siblings and Daenerys. Why?"

"That makes sense I suppose," Edd said somewhat grudgingly. "But the news from the North shouldn't wait, I'm astonished he didn't seek you out, but I suppose he doesn't want to start a panic here." He breathed in deeply then simply decided to blurt it out without trying to soften it. "The Wight Walkers really have found a way around the Wall. Lord Eddard sent a message here for Ranma detailing everything. The White Walkers are busy attacking the Bay of Seals, pushing even further south."

"You were right," he went shaking his head as Sansa stared at him in astonishment and not a little fear. "I should've left you at Crannogtown and headed back north."

"But you didn't, and despite the fact that I urged you not to, you were right." Sansa said sternly while Ben nodded in agreement.

"You can't blame yourself for something you didn't know Edd, not when you were acting in faith and honor. I take it however that you aren't going to wait around here for news of the army? You're just going to turn around?"

Sansa had already heard a broad description of the end of the war. A victory for her brother and his wife, a complete one over three different enemies which solidified their right to rule Westeros.

"I hope that Ranma's already responded to the news from the North, but even if they haven't my duty is clear. I need to get North as fast as I can, which means unfortunately I need to leave here as quickly as possible." Edd replied affirmatively.

"You leave tomorrow?"

"Tomorrow." Edd replied with a nod. "I will rest here tonight, gather what supplies I can, grab a few dozen spare horses then I'm off." He smiled wanly. "Sorry to bring that up during the meal, but it had to be said."

Sansa nodded, wolfing down her soup quickly in an unladylike matter which caused both the young men to chuckle before standing up abruptly. "I'll meet with the maester now then we'll see what aid we can send. I doubt we'll be able to send much in the way of men, but tents, braziers, warm clothing maybe other supplies if we get them on the road now would be a major boon in the north..." Her voice faded to a mumble as she strode out waving absentmindedly to the young man she had left behind.

"She will make a magnificent Lady Tully," Ben said admiringly shaking his head. "This city and this castle will become far greater than it has ever been before with her at the helm."

"I hope so," Edd said with a smile, not bringing up any thoughts about how that might not happen if they didn't survive the winter. "I also hope she's happy here."

His eyes bore into Ben's for a second, and his smile disappeared. "You will have something to do with that happiness. You and I both know you won this little battle between the two of us long since, hells I admitted that much back in Crannogtown, but that does not mean that I do not care for her. I do."

"Remember what Ranma said, Sansa needs no strong arm, she already has his and mine. Be whatever Sansa needs you to be, her husband, her confidant, her aid, her friend more than anything. Do not try to usurp her power, or take over for her. And if you harm Sansa, I will find out. Then I will challenge and kill you. Do not doubt it, not the challenge, nor the killing."

All this was deliberate in the same even called tone, making the words all the more frightening, though Ben did not flinch from them. He simply smiled faintly. "If I was the type to usurp her power or harm Sansa in any way I would not have won her heart, nor given her mine. I love lady Sansa, and I will not harm her, not with word or deed. You have my promise."

Edd nodded, and the two men young man returned to their meal without another word.

Edd was gone the next day as dawn broke, pausing only to bid farewell to Sansa, kissing her on the forehead before admonishing her to look after herself. He exchanged nods with Ben and the Stark and Tully men that had made the trip with them, before hopping into the saddle riding out of the castle and then Riverrun the town without another word. Behind him he lead a string of a dozen of the best horses in the castle. He would need them all if he was to make up for lost time.

Later that same day Sansa announced her upcoming marriage to Ben Blackwood and immediately began to plan out their wedding. Unlike in her dreams when she had pined for Joffrey, this ceremony however was not going to be a grandiose affair. Over the next few days it coalesced into a small service in the godswood, much to the chagrin of many of her new smallfolk, and in particular the septon assigned to Riverrun. "I am of the North, and I was raised in both faiths. When I am thinking about it, I look to the Seven, but my instincts are to the Old Gods, and my spouse too believes in them."

Ben nodded at that, and added, "Besides which, with the fact that the Seven have hailed Ranma and Daenerys their champions does it really matter which religion you worship?"

At Sansa's heels Fenris chuffed in laughter, and the septon and the other objectors among her counsel subsided quickly. Two days later, the ceremony began in the godswood, with only one real surprise. Where the bride was supposed to be walked to her new Lord by her father, Fenris stood instead, walking beside her as a visible expression of House Stark's power. It caused some consternation among the onlookers, and more than one rumor was started because of it, but Sansa and Ben didn't care. They only had eyes for one another, as she moved to stand with him in front of the ancient weirwood tree.

After the ceremony ended came the feast with Ben and Sansa sitting at the lord's table in front of a bed brought out for their first night together, smiling politely at all the cheers and well-wishers. At the same time they were trying hard not to glance into one another's eyes for too long, blushing and stuttering every time they caught one another's expression. That this caused the crowd of guests to laugh did nothing to help their composure.

Soon enough however it was time for the portion of the ceremony this Sansa had dreaded: the bedding. Even if she had married under the Faith of the Seven this portion of the marriage would not have been any better. It was important to see the proof that the woman's maidenhead was still intact, no matter how demeaning it was. And despite the fact that she had ordered the wine spiked as Ranma had for his marriage, there were more than a few men who were still awake and moving about.

"And now for the bedding!" Shouted one of them, and two others seized Ben from behind, while two more began to pull off his clothing. Four others grabbed Sansa in turn, starting to rip off her dress.

Their hands flinched away from her however at a very loud and very deep growl from Fenris. Suddenly he wasn't simply lounging around behind Sansa, no he was standing, staring at the crowd, his fangs bared. The man all around Sansa quickly retreated, staring at the Wolf. "M-My lady, can't you send it..."

At that point Fenris bounded forward, head-butting one man into another and then smacking them both into a third with a paw that didn't have any of its claws out. All three men went down with a cry and several curses, while Fenris moved through the crowd, smacking and pushing them, never drawing blood but making it clear that they were not welcome here any longer.

"HAHAHAHAHHAHA!" Sansa knew she should have been incensed at Fenris's unilateral act, but all she felt was relief. Relief, and a sort of bubbling laughter welling up from inside as she laughed and laughed.

Ben too laughed, taking her arm in his as he looked away from her body, much of which was on display now thanks to the men's efforts before Fenris had acted. "I had not been looking forward to having an audience in any event my lady, the sheets will have to do for those old biddies and men who wish to stick their noses where they do not belong."

"My thoughts exactly my Lord husband." Sansa said with a curtsy, which looked very odd indeed considering she was only wearing her silk chemise. She flushed as she felt the heat of Ben's gaze on her, staring over at Fenris who was now making his way back towards them, his entire body signifying extreme satisfaction. "Good Wolf..." she said reaching out a hand to rub his ears. "Good Wolf. And could you make certain were not disturbed?"

Fenris chuffed in laughter, licked her face once, causing her to back away gagging a little and for Ben to roll his eyes muttering something about "Oh joy, she's going to taste like a direwolf now" causing Sansa to blush, before he turned away. Moments later the two young people were staring at one another in a hall that was devoid of other people.

The rest of that night the two of them explored one another as married couples should. While it was very painful for Sansa at first pleasure soon overrode that pain and the two of them continued to explore throughout the night.

The next morning two maids entered while Fenris padded in beside them. They took the bed sheets out to show the crowd which had gathered in the hallways. Sansa was awake and sipping something from a cup as she sat at the table, while Ben was gone, heading for a bath. She put down her cup as Fenris approached, smiling as he nuzzled into her shoulder then looked her in the eyes.

For some reason Sansa understood what the Wolf was trying to say. "You need to go don't you?" She said, scratching at his neck and shoulders. "You hear the call north just like Edd..."

Fenris nodded his head, pushing it against her shoulder for a moment and Sansa smiled. "Go then, my brother will have more need of you than I for certain. Thank you for all you've done for me and my family." she said throwing her arms around him in a sudden hug and whispering the words into his ear. "Thank you, and please keep them all safe as you did me."

Fenris huffed again, rubbing his head against the side of hers for a moment before pulling away licking her face once and then racing out of the room, out of the castle past several startled and frightened courtiers, and out into the town then beyond. He was heading home at last.

OOOOOO

"They can't be serious, can they?" Asha asked caustically, staring at the small fleet of single-masted vessels swarming towards the southernmost cape of Harlaw. "I wonder how many of those ships capsized in the crossing? With the weather like it's been these days I wouldn't want to put it to sea in any of those."

"Ironic since you spent several days at sea in a similar boat." Rodrick said from next to her, where he too stood watching from a parapet of one of the four towers set to defend this small cape. They were very big towers, more a series of expanded caverns and murder holes hewn out of the rock of the surrounding cliff faces than man-made. They were very strong defensive positions, and if the cove they protected was bigger, this place would've been the center of House Harlaw's control rather than Ten Towers.

It wasn't however, moreover the seas were routinely choppy, no river fed into the cape allowing for faster travel deeper into Harlaw, and the surrounding land was scraggly at best, and stone at worst. The sea near the island was heavily dotted with rocks and shoals, many of which routinely sank beneath the waves only to rise later on, and no Ironborn had ever been able to correctly map fallout. In some ways it was like the Banefort, only much smaller and with slightly more treacherous seas, but without the inland farmland that made House Banefortself-sustaining.

The cove supported a small community of about 100 souls, mostly serfs with very few true Ironborn among them. It would normally have been completely ignored despite the defenses, except it was the closest cape in a straight line from the shores of Pyke, which had made the best place for any attacker to aim for if they wish to create a beachhead.

And if the greenlanders were facing any other Ironborn Lord that might well have worked, the speed advantage and the fact Ironborn don't think like that would have worked for them. Asha thought somewhat grimly. But against Rodrick the Reader, it's too obvious a move. And he doesn't respond like other Ironborn do either: he doesn't simply attack their attackers at sea, he's perfectly happy to sit on the defensive. And this time, well he's got me and my little toy on hand too.

"I would assume that this entire assault was pushed by the thralls rather than by the Lannister forces." Rodrick went on musingly. "They've been far too cagey about their own lives to throw them like this, but I could assume that someone among the thralls convinced them that this had a chance of working."

"And possibly tying any Ironborn response up here rather than where they're really attacking?"

"I don't suppose that they're actually attacking just yet, but it's a good idea. They might attack Great Wyk next. If they can liberate the mines of House Goodbrother, that would give them a far greater number of thralls than Saltcliffe or even a successful 'liberation' of Harlaw. And I doubt they realize we, the Ironborn as a whole, are no longer united."

Several weeks later Rodrick's guess word reached them that this was indeed the case. The Lannisters had used this attack like a diversion, not realizing they needn't have bothered, and attacked Great Wyk a few days after the battle. Unlike Rodrick's lighter touch the Great Wyk Houses never spared the rod, and had dozens of iron mines were they used thralls as their main workforce. Once a beachhead had been secured on Great Wyk and one of Goodbrother's mines secured giving the attackers more manpower, the outcome was pretty much assured.

Here and now however, Asha was going to show them that it wasn't going to go to that way with Harlaw. "What do you think old man, a little wind to start off with?"

Rodrick stared at her then down at the gauntlet she wore. It looked like a bronze gauntlet for the most with a very simple design. But along the forefinger and at each of the knuckles where extremely small etchings of lightning bolts, ships at sea, swords, and other images were carved, all immensely detailed. And on the palm of the gauntlet was a small, yellow gem stone. "You're the one with the God's Gift my dear, I believe it would behoove you to choose."

Asha laughed, then left the room heading up out onto the top of the cliff. A few archers were scattered around here and there on the cliff face, but most of them were down below where they were protected from wind and rain. These were merely spotters, whose task it was to use their higher and less obscured vantage point to spot any of the ships attacking getting too close and call in the fire of their fellows down below.

That wasn't going to happen now. Closing her eyes Asha brought the gauntlet up above her head, splaying her fingers out as if she was gripping the sky. As she did, Asha remembered what had happened in that cave, the vision she'd had. It hadn't been of the future or of events occurring at that time like Melisandre used. No this was from the past, an event that forever altered the history of the Ironborn. It showed the war in which the Storm God and the monster that was the Drowned God fought, when the Drowned God won supporters among the Storm God's followers through sweet words and a simple message.

'Whatever you do, the consequences will not matter. No consequences, no fear. Drown your enemies, drown your selves, feed the Drowned God and sailed the seas without fear or equal. Live on in song, story and above all the fear you cause in your enemies. And live on in my halls down below, fed by the deaths you cause.'

In comparison to the Storm God's message, which was of perseverance, teamwork, and toil bringing with them reward, it was a seductive message. And it, plus the magics the Drowned God had been able to give its followers, had won the support of the Ironborn. Without that support the Storm God's power had waned dramatically until only a few Houses still called to it, like Kenning, keeping it secret even from their own members at times. But that did not mean that its artifacts had lost their power when used by one whose will was up to the task.

At Asha's gesture a monstrous wind picked up all around her, ruffling her hair and her breaches before heading out to sea, gathering power all along the way until it was a gale. Slamming down into the sea it joined the torrential downpour that was already occurring out there. Suddenly faced with far faster, more powerful winds, only one or two boats out there were skilled enough to weather those first few moments. Others relying on their oars rather than sails lasted a few seconds longer before capsizing as the wind beat at their sides, smashing them into the rocks out there or simply pushing them under the waves, letting the ocean's power do the rest.

Each of those boats probably only had ten people or so on them, but they were a little over fifteen boats out there. A lot of thralls had just lost their lives in an attack they must've known was almost doomed to failure anyway. I wonder what that will do for the loyalty of their new subjects to their Lannister overlords? Or did they volunteer for this? DO they hate us that much?

Asha wasn't done just yet though. There was one more thing she had to do, a sort of a signature move of the Storm God. Clenching her gauntleted hand Asha ground her teeth at the sudden exhaustion, the magic she was working feeding off her body's energy, the yellow gem began to hum. After a brief second, Asha pointed her forefinger at the single war galley out there. It had stayed far back from the invasion force, ostensibly guarding the smaller ships as they made their way from Pike to Harlaw. Really it was there to see if anything actually happened in the attack, though it was also possibly carrying a load of weapons for any locals that could be turned to their cause.

She closed her eyes, concentrating and the small gem glowed fitfully before burning into life, a bright hard yellow light shining through her fingers. A second later, a single massive bolt of lightning came out of the sky directly above the war galley, smashing into the ship's main mast, setting it and the sails alight along with the deck directly beneath. Even in pouring rain, a ship simply had too much tar, rope and canvas, even wet could be set alight by lightning such as Asha's attack. Fire bloomed everywhere and screams abounded, though from this far away Asha couldn't hear them.

Smiling grimly as the crew of the war galley got to work trying to save the ship Asha nearly collapsed as she tried to move back towards the stairwell leading down. Rodrick however was there, catching her arm under his own. "A most impressive performance, I think they'll try twice or perhaps even four or five times before taking us on here."

In fact, the Lannisters didn't even try to attack Harlaw after that. Instead, they waited, waited until the Wyks islands had both fallen to them along with Pyke and Saltcliffe. Then they did the one thing Rodrick would never have guessed they would do: they offered a truce.

OOOOOO

Despite his concern about running into White Walkers or their undead soldiers Ranma reached Castle Cerwyn without incident. He was greeted in the castle's gatehouse by Lord Medger Cerwyn, who clapped him hard on the shoulder. "When word reached our ears here of a rumor saying that you were literally running up from the Riverlands Ranma I didn't believe them! Yet here you are."

He went on more seriously frowning slightly. "But you're alone. That same rumor said you would be, and that the war in the south was done with, but when can we expect the rest of the army back?"

"The Cerwyn Pike regiment and a few thousand Northern cavalry should be passing through the Neck at this point. The rest of the Army will've taken to sea at Maidenpool, and be making for White Harbor. That was about a week and a half ago, but we were told that the voyage to White Harbor would probably take a month at best. Have you ever had any trouble here?" Ranma asked.

"Not much just yet. A few sightings of wights, but everyone among my smallfolk and lords know that the wights can be seen off by fire. I've gathered as much of them that as would come, and we have enough supplies for now. But we've been hearing word of an undead horde marching toward Winterfell, and the past two days we've seen sightings of more wights in the Wolfswood than I care for."

Medger barked a laugh, but there was no humor in it. "It was those sightings that finally forced a few of my more rock-hard minor lords to pull up stake and join me here,. I have to say it's been... interesting... living in such close quarters with them. Thank god for my daughter and son-in-law's diplomacy, that's all I'll say."

Ranma frowned. I'd hoped to rest here for a day before heading on to Winterfell, but if they're that close, should I push on now?

His thoughts juddered to a halt as the interior door to the gatehouse slammed open. Jonelle stood there, her smile warm and inviting, but there was something in the depths of her eyes which made Ranma want to run away, or perhaps just roll on the floor and present his belly like a wolf would in submission. "Why hello there Ranma, the guards said you'd arrived. And where's my little boy? Is he a few days behind you?"

"I, um, no my lady, Cley remains with the main army." Ranma said cautiously, bowing to her slightly while her father quickly exited the gatehouse, causing Ranma to growl slightly. Traitor.

"I see, and the reason he isn't with you is... what? After all, you did promise to keep him safe didn't you, and it would be very hard to do that if he's not actually with you!" Jonelle said, the final words a snap.

But Ranma didn't take offense to them. He was in no hurry to tell the woman of the fights Cley had participated in, but he knew she was just acting like a concerned mother. And frankly, Ranma could remember all too easily looking up to her as young aunt figure, and had no wish for her or anyone else to start treating him differently.

He answered honestly, holding up his hands placatingly. "That would only be true if I wasn't anticipating running into trouble my lady, and I do, that is, I anticipate trouble soon. Cley's far safer at sea with my wife and the rest of the Wolfsworn not to mention the entire army to look after him."

"I suppose," Jonelle replied, growling slightly under her breath. She really did want to blame Ranma for not having her son with him. She wanted so desperately to see Cley again to make sure he was all right, after all, it had been nearly a year since Ranma had taken him away to war. But she couldn't argue the facts. "And how goes his training?"

"We both sort of decided that he really doesn't have the right aptitude for warrior my lady," Ranma said. "Instead he's been serving as the royal page for some months now."

Jonelle's eyes widened. "My baby boy, a page to the new Royal family? That sounds wonderful, and I think he'll be a much better fit for that role, possibly as advisor later on than he would ever have been as a warrior, no matter how skilled he could have become under your tutelage." She then smiled, reaching out to hug Ranma, who returned the gesture. "You are welcome back to the North Your Majesty, now come inside, break bread with us in our hall! Even in these dark times, we still have food and warmth aplenty for guests, especially important ones."

Ranma sighed in relief, and nodded allowing Jonelle to pull him forward, smiling happily at the welcome. Later that night, he took dinner with Lord Cerwyn and his minor lords, filling them in on the details of the war in the south, and getting some more information about what happened here in the North.

Leaning back and patting the first full stomach he'd had since Harrenhal, Ranma smiled, but his tone was all business when he spoke. "I'm glad to hear that the dragonglass already arrived and even more glad that Lord Manderly was able to get it up to Winterfell and to here. Though I'm afraid I'll be taking as much of that Dragonglass off you when Lord Reed and the expeditionary force arrives."

"Do you mean to take the White Walkers on in the field your Majesty?" said one of Lord Cerwyn's minor lords. Ranma had never met the man, who looked like a woodsman by his build, but the question was a good one.

"I intend to force them to concentrate on me, pulling some of the pressure off castles like Cerwyn and elsewhere. If I have to do that in the open field, or daring them to come at me in Winterfell, that's up to them. But I mean my army to be supplied with dragonglass weapons en masse regardless. I've already got some ideas of how to modify the pike tactics to deal with the wights, and the White Walkers themselves too."

They tried to ambush me once and I think they are serious about eliminating me. They have to know have realized why the old gods brought me here, which makes me a target. And I bet that Winterfell already has a target painted on it. "Any other news?"

Medger sighed. "Judging by the amount of time it took the dragonglass to reach Winterfell, we doubt it will have reached Karhold with enough time to help them. Nor was the Last Hearth, Deepwood, or Bear Island sent any. Both Karhold and Last Hearth might've been lost by this point, we just don't know. Other than that, no news has reached us here. Your father might know more of course."

'Have you lost any men yourselves?'

"About 20 all told in the past 2 and 1/2 weeks. The White Walkers themselves might still be a few days away from us here at Cerwyn, but they are within striking distance of Winterfell, and their power has gone before them. Several dozen graves have been disturbed, and I've lost men burning them out. I don't know how far their power of that sort spreads just yet south of us though, did you see any evidence of it?"

"One or two undead walking around last night but nothing major. Which should be a good sign, considering the Barrows were ancient burial sites," Ranma replied dryly.

"Ancient yes, I would bet that most of those Barrows have something within them that will stop the White Walkers from controlling their inhabitants. Much like the weirwood trees."

Ranma cocked his head and Medger smiled grimly. "Our own mausoleum here in the Castle hasn't been disturbed, and certainly Winterfell's hasn't either. That tells me that any graveyard built near weirwood trees is probably safe. For now at least. If the North falls entirely, I doubt that the old gods will have enough strength to keep it so."

Scowling at the idea Ranma nodded, and the conversation turned once again to events in the south, specifically what action Cley had seen, and other more personal matters. Neither Lord Cerwyn nor Jonelle were happy to hear that Cley might've taken up with a young lady whose House had been struck from the rules of nobility and wiped out for its treachery, but thankfully Ranma said it didn't look to be anything serious, simply puppy love. The fact the young woman in question had been sent to Riverrun after Darry's betrayal was also a factor.

Later that night before going to sleep Ranma met Katarina Cerwyn for the first time. The toddler was asleep of course, rocking slightly in her cradle thanks to a maid who sat next to the toddler in a rocking chair of her own working on some needlework.

"There she is, my little bundle of energy. I'd forgotten how inquisitive babies can be at this age," said Jonelle, smirking slightly as she reached into the crib to touch the baby's cheek gently. The baby mumbled, turning away from her touch slightly and she smiled wider. "Yet still she is beautiful."

Ranma nodded, his face showing a mixture of emotions, one of which was trepidation. Jonelle caught it, and smiled slightly. "You wonder about when you and your Daenerys will have children?"

"We've talked about it, and I know she was planning to stop taking moontea, though I don't know if she went through with that before I left. My departure was rather abrupt unfortunately."

"Your lady mother will be pleased." Jonelle said with a faint smile. "And seeing to the succession right now is probably an excellent idea. Even with winter now upon us and the troubles raising a baby in winter, it is something that needs to be seen to."

Ranma nodded but the trepidation didn't go away from his expression and her smile widened slightly. "Don't worry Ranma, you'll be an excellent father."

"Was I that transparent?" Ranma asked smiling whimsically back at her.

"To me certainly, I've known you since you were a little boy coming here with your father, who always had to be chased out of the kitchen for stealing sweetmeats. Don't worry as I said you'll be an excellent father, you've already shown that with Cley, Arya, and I have no doubt with other children. You won't ever be as stern as your own father, or as strict but you'll still be a good father nonetheless. Just let your wife handle disciplining your children for anything outside the training area? I really doubt you could be a disciplinarian you if your life depended upon it."

Ranma laughed quietly, enjoying this moment of peace and levity as the world around them continued to turn dark and cold.

OOOOOO

The next day Ranma raced on, wearing new boots thanks to Lord Cerwyn, since his old ones had been worn practically down to their soles. In only a turn of a candle he was within sight of Winterfell, which already looked to be under sporadic attack. But it was a very odd sort of sporadic attack. The town around Winterfell had been abandoned, and there were a few archers on roofs here and there which had not been torn down, firing up at the walls from where Ranma hid in the brush by the roadside, cloaked in the Umi-Sen-Ken.

But the main attack seemed to be two undead dragons, the sight of which had made Ranma stop and stare in shock before he ducked into cover. They were large, larger by far than either of Daenerys', and he finally realized why Daenerys kept on insisting on calling the dragons 'little ones' even now when they looked anything but little. Damn, I didn't realize how big dragons could grow.

But even from where he hid, Ranma could tell that these were not normal dragons. They had holes in their wings, their scales were splotchy here and there, and most telling their breath attack wasn't fire. From what he could see from this far away it seemed to be some kind of steam. Or maybe it's like that cone of cold spell from that weird game the otaku kids sometimes played at Furinkan? Freezing stuff it touches?

Even so, it didn't seem to be doing much to the defenders. Most of the wall had been abandoned, but fire arrows and what looked like regular arrows but were probably dragonglass tipped arrows were streaking out from every tower murder hole. None of the arrows were in danger of putting the dragons down alone, but the amount coming at them seemed to deter the dragons from coming too close, and with no one on the walls, their breath weapon didn't seem as devastating as a real dragon's would be.

Though Ranma couldn't see it, this was because like the Wall itself, Winterfell had some magical defenses built into its very stone. Small dark crystals scattered here and there along the parapets and towers of Winterfell, unseen for millennia had erupted in yellow energy, protecting the castle from the White Walkers assault. It didn't do anything against the cold, but the White Walkers creations could not touch down on those stones without being destroyed. The fact that the White Walkers were still attacking seemed to indicate they felt they had a chance of bypassing those defenses, but what that could be other than sheer numbers was something Ranma couldn't discern.

Despite the surprise of the undead dragons, Ranma quickly realized that Winterfell wasn't in any real danger just yet. With that in mind, still hidden underneath the Umi-Sen-Ken Ranma moved around the castle, to get an idea of what the attacking forces looked like.

Soon Ranma found that the dragons and the scouts of the army had outdistanced the majority of the White Walkers and their wights by a several leagues. The main horde was just coming within sight of the wall as he approached directly north. And it was a horde, consisting of thousands of wights, their condition ranging from practically new to near skeletal cadavers, all marching forward powered by the will of the White Walkers.

There has to be as many undead in that army as the entire Vale army! They must've scoured every battlefield and cemetery they could to put those numbers together. Or have we lost that many people already?!

But it wasn't only the numbers which were staggering, because mixed in with the horde were beasts, beasts out of legend. Undead unicorns, massive sabretooth tigers, who unlike the unicorns weren't obviously undead, causing Ranma to wonder how the White Walkers controlled them. Huge polar bears, covered with armor on their shoulders and heads. Several dozen undead giants, like the ones Ranma and the Wolfsworn had run into before.

And here and there scattered among the horde were the White Walkers themselves. They looked like elves almost to Ranma's eyes, taller and thinner than man, with sort of foxy faces. Cold eyes blazed blue in those faces but not the blue of ki or sky, this was a dead kind of blue somehow, though Ranma would be hard pressed to say how. They wore heavy plate armor for the most part, marked with cruel spikes and hooks here and there, and looked to wear little else. They wielded blades of what looked like metal or the ice of a glacier, Ranma couldn't honestly tell what the blades were made of from here. More than one of them had metal bows over their shoulders while at their sides short arrows were kept in quivers.

Ranma couldn't at first see any women among them, but when he did he shook his head slightly. They were beautiful, beautiful but fell. They wore armor just like the men but only wielding staffs rather than swords, with wickedly curved blades at the end of both ends. Where the men were bald the women all had long blonde hair falling down their backs, almost as pale as that of Daenerys, though to Ranma's eyes it looked more sickly than vibrant. Even their faces were not nearly as alien looking as the man.

I wonder if these women were chosen or maybe even bred to look appealing to normal men. It'd make sense given their tactics of using seduction with the Night's Watch King, and on Skagos according to what information my father sent us. For just a moment Ranma smirked. I wonder if you thought it was worth it Theon. The first human to ever screw a White Walker and still retain your soul!

Using as much of the forest as he could to cover his movement while still being hidden under the Umi-Sen-Ken of course Ranma counted about 620 actual White Walkers scattered through the horde, only twelve of whom were female. Is that normal? That there are that many males to females, or were just the women that could possibly pass for human sent on this campaign?

Of more interest to Ranma however were the few that didn't look like warriors. Their genders were indeterminate since they wore heavy cloaks. But instead of being cloth like a normal cloak would be, these cloaks looked to be made of steel scales, or possibly simply had steel scales sewn everywhere. They seemed to shine like glass or metal anyway and covered their features from head to toe. Here and there on the cloaks were bits and pieces of what looks like ice, glowing with the fell blue power that came from all of the White Walker's eyes.

There are only about five of these, maybe six because they weren't ever in the same place all at once, and they were always surrounded by dozens of the warriors, who in turn were surrounded by dozens of the White Walker warrior types. Are those their wizards, they damn sure look the part. I wonder how many of that type are on this side of the wall, they sure look to be damn rare if this army's makeup is any indication. But if so, why are they here at all? I'd thought they'd keep their wizards well back from any fighting.

After contemplating that moment from where he hid behind a large pile of snow, pressing his body against an oak tree on one side while a mountain of snow hid most of his body from view Ranma frowned. Maybe their power over those animals or the, er, more dead undead has some kind of range limiter? Or maybe the Wall is interfering with their power source so that they have to power their spells from up close? In any case, it's a good sign, a weakness we can make use of.

Ranma continued to watch as the army finished marching on Winterfell, slowly encompassing the castle. Normally he would have already attacked hoping to disrupt their assault, but given the number of arrows coming out of the towers it was obvious Winterfell knew they were coming. So the best way he could help now, was wait for an opportunity to strike at the most viable target. If those wizards are as important as I think they are, taking them out of the game would defang this entire army as a strategic force.

The battle for Winterfell began in front of Ranma, and it went as well as he had thought it would. The dragons, both of whom looked much the worse for wear from the towers defenses, had retreated, allowing the defenders to rush out and man the wall. The defenders were heavily armed with fire arrows and dragonglass tipped arrows, enough so that they were using both equally. Ranma was a little concerned about that, but figured that Winterfell probably already had a supply of dragonglass arrowheads before the pirate prince and his fleet arrived with more.

It didn't seem to startle the White Walkers however, they had obviously planned for this assault for some time. Ranma watched as thousands of wights were pushed forward, all of them armed with bows and arrows, enough to overwhelm the defenders if they had any kind of height equivalent. But they didn't. The defenders had the walls and the towers, and much of the Winter Town had been knocked down, the homes demolished to create a clear zone around the Castle. Only a few of the most distant buildings remained, giving the attackers no place to put their own archers where they could try to overcome the height advantage.

Good job father, Ranma thought, smiling grimly.

Of course the defenders weren't having it all their own way. Some men had already fallen from the parapets, the sheer number of arrows streaking up at them making that a certainty. And the dragons had destroyed two of the catapults stationed on the towers on either side of the northern facing wall before they had been forced to retreat.

The siege seemed ready to slip into a thing of archery duels rather than anything else. The attackers didn't have any siege equipment that Ranma could see, and didn't seem to have any plan other than throwing their wights at the walls at this point. And the animals, for all their strange appearance, seemed less than useless against stone walls like Winterfell's.

Or at least it looked that way if Ranma didn't count the group of magic users. They had finally come together, and were now moving towards one of the few remaining buildings from the Winter Town. It was a farmstead on the edge of the town, one Ranma remembered as having raised sheep at one point. As Ranma watched a group of the warriors quickly went to work dismantling one of its walls, letting in the winter air.

Then Ranma spotted something he hadn't noticed before, a large palanquin carried by several warriors which had been hidden in among the mass of wights. It was covered by another strange metal looking piece of cloth, like the outfits the magic users wore. And whatever was underneath it was something of great importance to the White Walkers, judging by how the White Walkers made certain that no one from the walls of Winterfell could see it.

Inching closer Ranma continued to use both the Umi-Sen-Ken and what cover there was to get as close as possible to watch the proceedings. He watched as the cover was taken off, revealing a giant ice crystal of some kind, which was a mix of dark blue and black, looking almost like a gem but not quite. It was set reverentially on the floor, and Ranma watched as the floor of the House underneath it began to freeze quickly, covered by a thin veneer of frost.

The ones who Ranma took to be the White Walkers wizards anyway congregated around the crystal quickly. Sitting down in a semi-circle they held out their hands towards the crystal. The crystal began to glow with the fell blue light that Ranma was quickly realizing was the symbol of the White Walkers influence. At the same time even from where he was hiding several hundred feet away Ranma felt the temperature begin to drop. Nearby snowdrifts also began to change color almost, the snow somehow turning into ice.

Yeah, I think it's time to interrupt them now. Ranma thought to himself grimly amused. Pulling out Ice he held it in one hand as he raced forward. Leaving behind the last of the cover he continued to use the Umi-Sen-Ken as he closed, feeling that the slight drain on his ki that technique caused was well worth what he was about to attempt.

Unfortunately, while the Umi-Sen-Ken might hide him from most mortal senses, it didn't do anything to cover his tracks. This would've been bad enough but a second after he left the last of the cover behind him, Ranma learned that the Umi-Sen-Ken didn't work at all against the White Walkers.

Shouts of what had to be surprise went out from the group of a hundred or so guards clustered around the farmhouse, and all of them turned, their long bows coming up to face towards him. Arrows flew towards Ranma before he realized that he had been spotted, but his reflexes were such that he was able to use Ice to smack away several of them, before jumping into a roll to one side avoiding several more. Two smashed into his side and shoulder, shattering on his lizard lion armor, which for some reason gave him more protection than plate had proven elsewhere to be against those arrows. Though of course Ranma didn't know that yet, he simply put it down to his armor's durability.

Rolling along the snow laden ground Ranma came up and continued moving forward, throwing Ice into the air for a moment as he concentrated bringing his hands down to his side. "Direwolf's Claws!" With that he brought his hands forward, shooting out his vorpal blade attack. They sliced through several dozen White Walkers, then he grabbed Ice as it fell back out of the sky, leaping over several more arrows and was in among them before any of the White Walkers could get off another shot.

Almost as one of the White Walkers pulled out long thin and very ugly looking daggers, not ugly like they were poorly made, but ugly as in vile-looking. They had little tines sticking out of the blades, their points were curved, overall they looked designed to cause as much pain as possible rather than just kill.

Ice in contrast was simply a greatsword, 7 and 1/2 feet of pure gleaming steel, without anything in the way of fancy fiddly bits, save for the fact it was a Valyrian blade. The family blade of the Starks smashed into the weapons of the White Walkers, powered by all the strength and Ranma's arm, and shattered more than one sword with every blow.

Internally gasping from the effort firing off that the Direwolf's Claw had taken Ranma dueled with a dozen White Walkers, hacking them down, punching, kicking, moving constantly despite being surrounded. He did not take to the air as was his wont, since this would have allowed the White Walkers beyond his immediate vicinity to target him with their bows. He instead stayed ground-bound, cutting them down as he forged his way towards the wizards. "Winter is Coming for you, you soulless bastards!"

In response to that hated wacry the White Walkers all around him shrieked in wordless rage, their voices sounding like glass grating on glass. Whatever they yelled there it wasn't a comprehensible word, but there damn sure was a lot of feeling behind it.

Ice stuck for a second in the rib cage of one White Walker, having punched through the creature's armor as if it wasn't there. The blades of other White Walkers smashed down onto Ranma's back, causing several cuts and slashes but his lizard lion armor held, opening in places but not giving way. One blade cut into his helmet, but that White Walker died from a sideways punch that caught it right in the neck, crushing his jugular and flinging his body back into two more.

By this point the rest of the White Walkers in the attacking army knew there was something going on in the back of the actual battle. As one they had turned away from directing the wights, racing backwards. Those with bows began to fire at Ranma despite their fellows surrounding him. Their arrows didn't seem to bother their fellows, but more than one-hit Ranma despite the crowd around him, and he winced as one in particular smacked into his elbow, catching him through the joint of his armor.

"RARRGHRAA!" rattling sort of roar from above signaled a far greater threat however. Ranma pulled out Ice, swinging it around in a two-handed grip to catch another White Walker, cutting him in twain. He continued hacking and slashing, punching and kicking at the crowd around of White Walkers around him, slaying dozens before suddenly one of the armored polar bears burst through the crowd roaring. At the same time a Sabertooth tiger tried to take him from the other side.

Ranma whirled, kicking off the Sabertooth tiger's head, thrusting Ice forward in a savage lunge which caught the armored polar bear in the head, smashing through its armor and deep into its brain. Then one of the dragons which had retreated from the battle around Winterfell attacked him from above, its icy breath striking at where Ranma had been a moment before, engulfing the Sabertooth in its breath. The Sabertooth howled in agony for just a second before freezing solid.

Grounding Ice in another White Walker Ranma turned, bringing his hands backwards and shouting "Direwolf's claw!" The vorpal blades of the Yami-sen-ken shot out, slicing the dragon from head to tail into flinders, its bits scattering into the horde of White Walkers around Ranma. This caused them to scatter slightly, allowing Ranma a few seconds of breathing space, which he desperately needed. Using that attack for a second time had really taken a lot out of him. Why the hell is that taking more out of me every time! Or is it because I haven't recovered from my run up here?

Regardless, Ranma now knew he had maybe one more such attack in him. Any more than that and I won't have enough energy to keep fighting. Considering that even the wights in the army were turning toward him now, away from their assault on Winterfell, that would be a death sentence.

As he thought that Ranma ducked under the swipe of a giant, one of the few near enough to have gotten to him thanks to how slow they were from the main wight horde, returning a punch that caved in the thing's head, at the same time Ice slashed one of its legs clean off at the hip. Another Sabertooth leaped at him its fangs seeking his neck but Ranma grabbed its jaws, and with a roar and wrench of his arms in either direction, ripped it apart. It collapsed to one side, allowing Ranma to quickly run forward, getting closer to the wizards.

The White Walkers of course were able to tell where he was going, and at a sudden shouted command in that tongue that sounded like pieces of uneven glass shrieking against one another some of the wizards shouted commands to the warriors.

Two of them tried to get Ranma's way again, only to be barreled aside, while others attacked with more fervor. But Ranma was now close enough, and he halted smashing aside several more White Walkers with Ice before another giant was in his way. Dodging its monstrous blow Ranma buried Ice in the thing's chest before dodging around it, bring his hands back to his sides and forward for one final ki assault, his target the clump of wizards and the crystal they were using as a conduit for their power. "Direwolf's claw!"

But just as he fired that, a punch from the Giant, which had not died, his thrust having missed its heart, slammed into his side. He rolled with it and was relatively uninjured, but the damage was already done. His assault missed the crystal, smashing into and through five of the six wizards instead, missing the last one entirely but shredding three of them into bits of offal, the last two merely being cut into pieces.

As he rolled more White Walkers attacked, but Ranma punched out to every side, dodging another blow, staggering for a moment from the loss of his energy from that salt. Dammit! I can't do another one! I need to retreat for now.

Retreat however did not look to be an option. The horde had pulled back from this section of the assault on Winterfell to completely enclose Ranma, and now anyway he went he'd have to fight his way through a large portion of the horde to get out. Ironically enough, the quickest or at least weakest section was directly in front of Ranma between him and Winterfell because the White Walkers had tried to block him from running away everywhere else with their own people, the giants and the animals, and the wights coming back from attacking the Castle made up the numbers of the people on that side.

All of this action had not gone unnoticed by the defenders of Winterfell. Now they responded to it. Heavy stones, burning barrels full of cooking oil and other things began to smash down among the wights. They would have been husbanded for the first real assault against the outer wall, but now the defenders put forth their effort as a shout of "Winter is coming!" Went up from the wall, so loud it carried over the tumult of battle to Ranma.

Ranma ripped Ice up and out of the giant's chest, finally bisecting the thing's heart putting it down for good. He turned using Ice to catch a scythe swung at him by a wight then ducked under a blow from a mace, wincing as another blow got through his defenses to smash on his vambrace before he could pull Ice back.

Struck by a sudden inspiration and with a grunt of effort Ranma slipped into the Umi-Sen-Ken again, racing forward into the horde of wights, putting them between him and the White Walkers. For a moment this seemed to work. The White Walkers might be able to see him in the Umi-Sen-Kens, but their undead servants, as Ranma had hoped, could not, their senses were still that of humans for the most part. Therefore rather than becoming more enemies he had to deal with, the wights became meat shields against the White Walker arrows.

More of the catapults fiery burdens slammed into the ground in front of him. Ranma dodged several of them, but the fire did its work, scaring the wights away from him enough that he had a somewhat clear run towards the castle.

The White Walkers tried to rally, several of them hissing out commands in that glass on crackling glass language of theirs. More than 100 White Walkers once again targeted Ranma with their bows, and Ranma felt the sting of their arrows slam into the back of his lizard lion armor.

For the most part it held, the arrows penetrating only rarely at the joints in particular right behind one shoulder, and right where the armor allowed for movement at the side. Ranma nearly stumbled from the pain of that, feeling the cold of whatever spell was on the ice grip him. But he reached down and pulled the arrows out, hobbling on while more arrows shattered all around him. Even so he did bleed, and the blood left a trail on the snow that the wights could see. Despite the little fires all around them, they began to close in once more.

Even though they couldn't see his body the defenders knew where Ranma was thanks to their enemy's fire and shouts of encouragement came from Winterfell. Now Ranma was close enough that the White Walkers and wights trying to follow him came under fire from the arrows of the defenders. Along with several hundred wights the White Walkers lost more than two dozen more warriors, including two of their women surprisingly, none of which had been close engage Ranma before this.

This forced the front-runners who had tried to cut Ranma off from entering Winterfell back in disarray, with many more wights dying there. Ranma concentrated on healing himself for a moment, sending what little remaining ki he had towards the wound in his leg. It closed quickly, and he raced on with renewed purpose, grimacing as he felt another arrow slam right between his shoulder blades. It didn't penetrate, but it did stick there, and he reached back pulling it out before it could start to send whenever cold spell was a part of it into his armor.

A long piece of rope was thrown over the side of the wall, the defenders unwilling to unbar the main gates to let him in that way. It was a good move Ranma thought, as he grabbed the rope and quickly began to haul himself up the wall to hails of "The Wolf King, the Winter King! Ranma, Ranma Stark!"

Pulling himself upwards towards the parapet Ranma felt several hands grabbed him and haul him up the last few feet, where he was met with shouts and cheers, backslaps and roars of greeting from every throat, from men he had known all his life as armsmen here in Winterfell and near strangers from the minor houses nearby alike. Then two of the men were smacked aside, and he was hauled into a bearhug looking up into his father's face. "You did not arrive in the manner I expected my son but you certainly arrived with a certain amount of fanfare!"

"Heh, well you know me father, I always like to make a good impression." Ranma laughed, hugging his father to him hard.

Eddard chuckled, turning with Ranma still in a one armed hug as he marched him along the wall towards the nearest tower, as the cheers of "the winter king! Winter is coming!" abounded all around them. As they were walking however Eddard questioned his son closely. "What did you attack out there, we saw you appear suddenly, and I know you wouldn't have just attacked randomly."

"I tried to kill all of the well, I call them wizards of the White Walkers that seem to be with this army of theirs. I think I only managed to kill five of them, not certain. Worse, I didn't destroy what looked like some kind of, of focus I suppose, would master Luwin know about such things? Anyway, hopefully the loss in numbers will keep them from using their magics against us for a while."

"And is there a reason why you're here alone?" Eddard asked setting that aside for now as Catelyn, who must've heard the commotion, raced out of the keep towards them, her arms flung open as she saw her eldest son. Behind her Bran and Rickon and their direwolves boiled out of the keep was well, clad in their normal indoor clothing, unmindful of the cold for a moment.

"I'll tell you in a moment father." Ranma said grinning happily as his mother came near. "Right now we have something more important to deal with."

His mother reached him, and Ranma put his arms around her waist lifting her into a hug and whirling her around to the cheers and jubilation of the people watchers on the wall, before putting her down and picking up little Rickon, pulling Bran into a hug as he nodded at their direwolves. Shaggydog had taken to his training with Hodor very well, and sat watching happily as the family was reunited with the alpha while Summer set up a happy yipping noise.

Later that night the family dined with their closest advisors at the head table, where Ranma regaled them and all of the others in the dining hall with the tale of the war in the south. The war was already beginning to be called the War of Reformation thanks to the sweeping changes that had already occurred to the power structure of Westeros. The breaking of the Westerlands brought many a smile.

The fate of the Stormlands brought a frown to Eddard's face, though he could not truly argue with the fact it had to be done, disgusted both by the ferocity of the battles between the Stormlands forces and how quickly the losers had turned their coats from one Baratheon to the other. The retelling of the battle between Viserys, Stannis, the new Royal Army, and the Golden Company brought exclamations of shock from the listeners, both from the noble table and those listening from the other tables.

Ranma's last bit of news, the fact that the Vale had already put an army into the field which was marching to the North's aid before word reached them brought shouts of joy and happiness from many a throat. Eddard nodded grimly satisfied at that and nodding approval at the plans Ranma had put in place there. Ranma looked at his mother however, shaking his head. "I'm sorry, but everything we've learned about aunt Lysa said she was insane, and going crazier all the time. I, I could not in conscience leave her in charge of the Vale. And given the rumors we heard about her son, even having him in power in the Vale was just not going to happen." Ranma left his speculations about her relationship, whatever it had been, with Petyr to one side, not wanting to cloud the issue.

"I understand." Catelyn said with a sigh. "I sometimes wonder what would've happened if she could have married someone closer to her own age, someone she could have more in common with than merely the marriage oath. But such wanderings are fruitless, and serve no purpose at this point." She smiled slightly at her son, before reaching forward to hug him with one arm. "You did well, as far as I can tell you did well in all of it, not as I would have done, or as your father would've done I don't think." Here Eddard nodded his head, indicating that she was speaking nothing but the truth. "But I think better than either of us could have contrived."

"Breaking the Westerlands and the Stormlands might keep similar wars from occurring later as well." Eddard amused. "Perhaps a stronger Royal House will truly unite Westeros into one nation rather than several disparate countries."

"I hope so, I think that this winter is going to be hard enough without needing to defend our backs from the knives of our own people." Ranma smiled grimly as he paraphrased something he had said once to Daenerys, even as he felt a pang of pain, missing her and Merry terribly. Their absence and Jon's kept this from being a true family reunion in his mind.

He shook off his maudlin mood quickly however. "But as I said, the rest of the army should be here within a month and a half or at least at White Harbor by that point. And the Vale troops should be here in about a month at the most. I think the troops under Lord Reed will take around three weeks to get here to Winterfell. Can you tell me anything more about what's been going on elsewhere in the North?"

"Somewhat." Eddard said with a nod which was rather more grim than Ranma had hoped. "The last raven we had from the Wall said that the Bay of Seals was almost entirely frozen, though not deeply just yet, though it was certainly enough to stop ships from getting to Eastwatch-By-the-Sea. We have had no word from Karhold since that first message from them about Theon's misadventure, and I fear the worst."

Ranma grimaced, his teeth clenched angrily at the thought of losing a friend to the White Walkers. "Theon's a tough son of a bitch, until I hear point blank that he's dead I'll hold out hope that he still alive somewhere. Elsewhere?"

"Bear Island has come under attack, and has for the most part fallen. Maege is holding her longhouse however, and says she can hold out for a long time so long as they don't bring any more of a force against her, but she lacks the dragonglass to fight the White Walkers directly. Her losses were heavy when she met them on the beach apparently, but they haven't tried to go around their island to the rest of the western shores. At least not so far as we have heard. Of course our communications with the mountain clans isn't the best, but most of them pulled their people back here, only the Norrey stayed put, and even then most of them I think moved up to join the Wall's defenders. At least I hope so."

Eddard sighed again, showing a weariness that frankly alarmed Ranma a little, and he reached over to grab his father's shoulder and a hard grip. Eddard smiled, patting his son's hand for a moment. But then he went on. "We've had word from Hornwood and Ramsgate that they've come under assault, as well as Widows Watch, though the assault there is small and more in the way of keeping the defenders from sortieing out than anything else. The Last Hearth is under siege as we are here yet it had a number of dragonglass arrowheads and knives so it can hold out. White Harbor has not been attacked yet, nor has Oldcastle or any place south of Winterfell."

"I stopped in at Castle Cerwyn." Ranma said with a nod. "They're as prepared as they can be, but I don't think they'll be under attack until Winterfell falls. Hopefully they'll concentrate here."

"Hopefully?" Catelyn asked, though something in Eddard's face showed that he understood what his son was hinting at.

"Hopefully," Ranma replied with a nod. "Let them sit out there, hell, let them bring as much of their army against us here as they can, add to the forces already out there. If they concentrate that much it'll just make it easier to smash their forward force. What I would hate to do is to face skirmishes and small assaults spread out across the entirety of the North. That'd bleed us dry far faster than larger set battles. But until the Army arrives, we will have to sit on the defensive."

"Now," Ranma said turning to his brother and ruffling his hair affectionately. "Tell me more about your inventions Bran, and is it true that you actually trained up some reindeer to pull carts? I understand that you also figured out a system to change barges for the White Harbor over to sleds?"

OOOOOO

Jon and his army had caught one of the two Ironborn crews still hunting along the Mander in the open. They had caught and tortured several families who had not run away quickly enough several leagues distance from the Mander itself, and were on their way back from that plunder to their temporary base when Jon and his army fell upon them. No quarter was asked and none given, and not a single Ironborn had survived for more than a turn of the candle after the battle began.

The other group of Ironborn however, must have somehow heard that they were coming, because they stopped their depredations and pulled back to House Westbrook's keep. There they had gathered several hundred women, their so-called salt wives, and when the army came within sight threaten them all with death if they were attacked. It was a tactic Jon hadn't seen before, but not one that he was going to let dissuade him.

"Those women have been through hell already, and no doubt that at least some of them are already dead up here," said Jon said tapping his head, his eyes like steel. "No, I'm not going to let be Ironborn remain in charge of even a single keep."

Margaery who had actually been working with the people she brought along to look over the lands that the Ironborn had despoiled shook her head sadly. "True, but how are you going to go about getting them out of their then?"

"Milady, I am a Wolfsworn, and trust me, my brother and the rest of us have come up with numerous ways of taking castles and keeps beyond a full frontal assault. Let me survey that place, and I'll find a way in." Jon smiled, though inwardly he shuddered, knowing he'd probably have to do some climbing at some point.

The keep was a small one, but moderately well-built a four-story tall edifice of stone shaped like a circle, with only a single entranceway, which had several portcullises barring the way inside, and no doubt a sufficient number of murder holes and other nasty surprises in the gate tunnel.

But that didn't matter to Jon, he wasn't going to go through the main doorway anyway. That night Jon made his way forwards, as silent as a shadow with Ghost beside him. He might not have his brother's Umi-Sen-Ken, but Jon could move almost as quietly as Ghost over any kind of terrain, and was quickly at the side of the wall, moving around it cautiously staring up and looking for a ready murder hole, while his hand gently ran over the stone, looking for handholds.

He found enough, and began to climb, while all the time saying a mantra in his head, I don't like this, I don't like this, I don't like this! But Jon wasn't about to let his fear of falling, he was not afraid of heights, it was falling that bothered him he was quick to point out, stop him tonight. Quickly ascending the wall Jon was right below one of the murder holes mere moments later.

Pulling himself up to look inside he saw four Ironborn, three of whom were busy rutting away with a woman who simply laid there, her head lolling back and her eyes, from what Jon could see in the light of the room's one torch, dead. What horrors that woman had seen over the past few months Jon didn't know, but it made his blood boil to think about it. The fourth Ironborn was asleep on another bad, snoring loud enough to wake the dead.

If he had been any less filled with rage Jon would have shaking his head at this. The Ironborn were so arrogant, so undisciplined! Even knowing that there was an enemy army surrounding them they couldn't pull themselves away from their fun to even set a watch. Oh, there were no doubt a few Ironborn up on the roof of the keep. But there at least half the crew should have been awake at all times, given how badly outnumbered they were.

Stop looking a gift horse in the mouth Jon, and get on with it, Jon thought angrily, pulling himself over the murder hole's sill as quietly as possible. The first the four Ironborn knew of his presence was when his dagger took one of them in the kidney from behind.

The man groaned aloud, causing the other two men, who were busy fondling and forcing the comatose woman to move as they thrust into her from above and below looked up. Before either could speak Jon's swords were out, cutting forward economically. Each blade took one of them along the throat and both of them fell to one side, gasping as their life's blood trickled out. The fourth never even had a chance to wake up, Jon's blade took him through the eye and into the brain.

With that done Jon moved over to the woman, staring down at her while feeling for a pulse staring into her eyes. There was nothing there, no mind left, the horrors she had endured had broken her. Kneeling next to her body uncaring of the blood from one of his victims still dripping onto the floor from underneath the woman he murmured a prayer to the Old Gods for her soul, then gave what mercy he could before standing up, his face a stony mask of fury.

From there Jon made his way out into the corridor, all of his senses stretched to the max as he searched for any up hint that the Ironborn realized they had been invaded. There was none, and Jon made his way towards one end of the corridor, luckily finding the staircase down on the first try.

He ran into several Ironborn on the way, killing them quickly, efficiently and above all silently. More than once upon seeing the Ironborn at their fun he couldn't stop himself from entering a room and dealing with the Ironborn within, before doing what he could for the women, which alas was not much. He was a wraith in the night, a thing of vengeance and silent justice come upon them. Then he was in the gatehouse, finding within it five more Ironborn, only two of whom were awake.

Those two were near the doorway. One shouted "'Ere who are", before Jon ran forward, thrusting out his blades to both sides. One blade struck true, punching through a Ironborn's chain mail straight into his chest, but the other only skittered across one of the second Ironborn's chain mail, and Jon cursed before kicking out hard catching that man in the chest and throwing him backwards.

The remaining three Ironborn came awake at the man's cursing, but Jon was on them in a second, his short swords slashing out killing two of them before they could shout. But the other two did get shouts off before they joined their fellows, falling to the floor of the gatehouse. Shouts began to abound all through the keep, but Jon quickly dropped his twin swords and began to operate the controls on the trio of portcullises that defended the keep, opening the keep to his army.

Locking them in place he ran back to the doorway, as his army, warned by the howl of Ghost charged forward. In the lead was Ser Thomas Graceford and the men of his house, all of whom had agreed to join him becoming the heart of the new order. While they had yet to come up with their own battle-cry, their family's old one still worked just as well. "Work Her Will! Slay every last godless bastard!"

After the battle Margaery found Jon still in the gatehouse, cleaning his weapons and staring off out of one of the murder holes out into the dark. "Jon, are you all right?" she asked softly.

"I am unhurt." he said, but his voice was a faraway one.

"You don't sound all right," Margaery said, coming over and placing a hand on his shoulder. It moved to his chin and she gently turned his face to look at her. "Are you well?" she asked again.

"I've killed before this, this is not my first battle, or even my tenth. And the death of the Ironborn mattered not at all to me. I would've felt more compassion for butchering so many animals. That was what they were, animals." Staring up at her he described the scene he had come upon first entering into the keep, and the fact he had given what mercy could to that woman and several others as he made his way through the keep.

Margaery listened without reproach, simply gently running her fingers through his hair soothingly before saying, "Many of the women here are comatose like that, and I'm afraid that they are beyond our power to heal. Giving mercy as you did is possibly the kindest thing you could've done. Jon, you did what you had to, what you had to. Let the Ironborn who used my people so harshly answer to the Stranger or their foul Drowned creature for their actions, don't carry it with you."

Jon looked at her, then slowly nodded, his shoulders straightening slightly as he did so. Then he smirked suddenly. "You're quite wiser than your years should allow for my lady, how did that come about?"

"Allow me to keep some secrets my lord Hand." Margaery laughed, taking his hand and gently leading them away. By the time dawn broke, the keep was fully cleansed of the Ironborn, and the women those that responded to their change in circumstances, were on their way towards Highgarden under heavy escort led by Ser Graceford. The army however did not camp there, the stench of the place and the horrors that had been committed upon the women and the other folk in that keep was too pervasive. No, they marched through the night and well into the other day, heading down towards Oldtown, where they would meet up with Willas and the others.

A week later they did so on the Rose Road to learn that Willas and Bryce had much easier time of it. "Lord Florent was rattling his saber, but when confronted with a larger army lost heart." Willas reported, his lips twitching as he tried to suppress a smirk. "The same went for Titus Peake. With the other marcher Houses moving up behind it and our own army in front of it they capitulated quickly, merely saying they had been moving to link up with Lord Florent and battle Oberyne themselves."

He pulled his horse around, moving in step with Jon, showing no discomfort to address Jon where he was marching along on foot. "We still have no idea what they planned, and since they didn't actually fight us or ravage the lands we don't have any reason to remove them from power. But I remain very leery of them and Florent. I've already sent a message back to Highgarden asking my grandmother to suborn more of their households to pass on information just in case."

Jon nodded, grimly satisfied and after relaying what he and his army had accomplished asked, "I don't see Lord Dondarrion Edric or Arya with you though. Where are they?"

"They continued down to the Dornish Passes, I think they intend to head to Starfall."

Jon winced. "There's no way they'll get there and back in time to join me to head north is there?"

"Possibly, remember my men and Bryce's can't move as fast as yours. It will take us at least another three weeks to get to Oldtown, whereas they are traveling light and with several horses each." Willas smirked. "They're very good horses, I should know. I'd estimate they could meet us in Oldtown if we waited a few days. Which we might have to, considering how we'll need to replenish the supplies for the fleet, make certain the fleet has enough ships and supplies for you along with Garlan's forces, then decide which way you're going to go from Oldtown."

Willas had to stay behind of course to rule the Reach, and to become one of the Royal House's voice here in the south as they dealt with the White Walkers. But he came along to organize the logistics for the fleet, as well as to introduce Jon to Garlan, so that between the three of them they could hammer out the command structure for the fleet as it went north.

And while Arya and possibly Edric might meet up with them in Oldtown, Lord Dondarrion would not. He would instead be taking formal command of his lands and the Lands of House Dayne, combining them into the new Duchy of the Passes. That would probably not be a simple task, depending on if the Dornish wanted to try and fight the annexation of the Prince's Pass and the Boneway, but regardless it would happen, especially with House Dayne enthusiastically on Lord Dondarrion's side. Dorne could no longer remain aloof and apart from the rest of Westeros.

Jon nodded. "I've been wondering about that, at first I thought we should head around the Summer Sea and up the Narrow Sea to White Harbor. That way we could stop at Planky Town, intimidate Prince Doran some more, and then stop at Dragonstone to load up on dragonglass on our own. But how long would that take us out of our way?"

"I think we'll have to go that route with at least a small portion of our forces, to meet with the Prince anyway." Willas said shrugging philosophically. "However, I can handle that, and it would indeed add at least two months, maybe more to the journey north if we went to the east rather than west. On the other hand, the Iron Islands are embroiled in a war, and I doubt Lannisport would be happy about being forced to resupply the fleet. It depends, I think on where you think you're needed most."

Jon nodded once more, though inside he knew he should go west. The vision of Bear Island, the only clear vision he had seen, pointed to that. But if we go that way, I won't be able to arm my troops with dragonglass. Against wights numbers and discipline can tell, but against White Walkers? Is holding Bear Island worth the loss of life we'll face without being properly armed?

The two men fell silent, simply riding or marching on as they thought of the problem. Neither noticed Margaery, riding alongside her brother, staring at the two men thoughtfully as she made her own plans.

OOOOOO

After sending off his prisoners to Crannogtown under guard to be placed on a ship for White Harbor, Timot Hammerhand pressed his men hard. After only four days they passed through the Neck to Moat Cailin, where Timot happily handed over control of his force to Lord Reed then set about organizing the army's supply train with his normal brisk efficiency with Lord Reed's men while his army rested for several days. The horses and carts sent from Barrowton sped their army up enormously. They had been sent without a whimper from Lady Dustin, who despite her hatred of Eddard knew her duty and had no wish to see the White Walkers on her doorstep. Even so, Timot had pushed his army hard, so now their pace was slowed slightly.

Two weeks marching passed quickly in this manner. They were deep into the Barrowlands when a shout went up from the scouts guarding the back trail. "Wolf approaching down the road!"

A moment later a cry of "The Wolf" went up from more than one man, and Timot looked to the side to see a giant direwolf loping along the ground racing north. "Is that...?"

Lord Reed nodded, smiling faintly. "Yes, I was wondering where he was anyway."

Moments later another shout went up, "Horsemen, running up behind hell for leather!"

Lord Reed and Timot turned their horses, racing towards the back of the column. There they found Edd leading several horses, all of whom looked to be on their last legs, while he stood on his own, glassy eyed, his hair matted to his head and his legs wobbling, heat rising from his body to create steam in the cold air around him. "L-lord Reed?"

"Edd Karstark!" Lord Reed said reaching down to grab the younger yet far taller man by the shoulders steadying him as he let go of the reins. The horses looked as if they wanted to bolt, but were simply too tired. Instead they just moved away from the crazy human that had run them all into the ground one after another then himself covering in 3 1/2 weeks the distance between Riverrun and the army's current position. It was a feat that many would have thought impossible. They didn't know about horses that Edd had left behind at Fairmarket, or the other four he left behind at Crannogtown. All of whom he had ridden to death or near it. Or the sours, the blisters that had opened and been ignored on his ass, or the fact his feet's sole's had opened and bled so badly his boots had to be cut off him. .

"Did you try to keep up with Fenris?" Lord Reed asked incredulously.

"Not at first." Edd gasped shaking his head. "Met up with him near the Twins. Stayed with him since, though he could have left me in the dust. Damn direwolf!" He grinned suddenly, wobbly legs and all. "But my duty is in the North with my king, and by the Old Gods my witness I will be there!"

"Aye, but if you don't get any rest you won't of any use." Lord Reed said, gesturing two of his men over who helped Eddie away, moving him towards an empty cart. "Get some rest lad, will be at Cerwyn within another week, and after that, I have no doubt you'll find battle worth your mettle."

OOOOOO

Leaving the army of humans and the pack friend behind Fenris ran on, stopping only occasionally to hunt. A single bear fed him enough for the run through the Neck, and a moose made for good eating two days after he had left the Army behind him, but he began to see undead about then. They were strange, the stench of death yet the site of them moving spooked Fenris, making his hackles rise at the unnaturalness of it all. Every time he saw these undead creatures his instincts forced Fenris to stop long enough to rip them apart, slowing him somewhat.

And he did have to rip them apart. The magic that made the wights move could not be undone by his ki attacks for some reason unless he got their heads or hearts. He learned this the hard way, when a wight whose stomach he'd had torn apart rose behind him and bit his tail!

Fighting wights was altogether a disgusting experience. They smelled disgusting, they tasted disgusting, worse than anything he'd ever tried to actually eat, let alone simply fought. Worse, parts of your meal should not be trying to attack you after you rip out its throat!

Despite these frequent stops, Fenris quickly came on Cerwyn, passing it at midday to the shouts and cheers of the defenders. He paused, circling back and sitting on his haunches for a moment, answered this cheer with a howl of his own. That howl reverberated for leagues around, answered by the howls of wolves in the Wolf's Wood. It was a howl that echoed and reechoed again and again deep into the mountains, a trumpet of war. The howl went on and on for several moments, as the cheers of the defenders of House Cerwyn rebounded, shouts of the "Winter King, the wolf, the wolf for the king!" Making themselves heard before he turned again, racing on.

That howl had also been heard by the defenders of Winterfell, and by the time Fenris was within sight, Ranma had organized them to be ready.

The White Walkers were also ready for Fenris, and sent many of their magically domesticated beasts against him. Two polar bears and four sabretooth tigers along with a single giant waited on the road itself for Fenris, and howled as they caught sight of the massive direwolf, while the White Walkers took aim at him with their bows. They kept the wights back for now, surrounding Winterfell to keep the defenders from sortieing in support.

"AROOOOOOOO!" With another blood-chilling howl Fenris met them, his fangs and claws glowing blue with ki light. A single swipe put down a sabretooth tiger, but Fenris was smashed backwards by an overhand blow from a polar bear. He rolled with it however, coming up and lunging forward to bury his fangs deep into the polar bears stomach as it had reared for another blow.

Bearing that polar bear to the Earth Fenris lunged to one side, dodging several arrows from nearby White Walkers, using another polar bear as inadvertent armor against them. Smashing his head to flinders almost absentmindedly, he dodged under a powerful punch from a giant, taking the thing in the throat with his fangs and ripping off his head. The giant kept moving, and its next blow took Fenris in the side, but the direwolf shrugged it off.

He felt a bite on his side, and turned snarling, rolling around in the snow with another sabretooth pitting claw against claw. He won quickly, Fenris' ki armor seeing him through without much injury, but now the nearby wights were all around him. Not a single White Walker closed with him however, Ranma's assault on them had slaughtered more than half their starting number, and they had not been reinforced unlike the wights. They couldn't afford to lose more, which was a bad thing.

Suddenly the gates of Winterfell opened, and 400 men charged out armed with long spears tipped with Dragonglass spearheads, while above them the catapults and defenders went to work. The rest of the defense was left with only token watchers, as every man and archer they could fit lined this portion of the battlements and manned the towers facing the battle around Fenris.

The first rank of attackers held tower shields which covered them from head to toe and spread to either side of their bodies almost interlinking with their fellows on either side of them. They allowed just enough room for the second rank's long spears, almost as long as the Golden Company's, to thrust between them.

These men were not as well trained as the pikemen however, and as they rushed forward into the ranks of the wights trying to surround Fenris, they lost some of their careful spacing. They slammed into the wights, but got bogged down quickly, several of the shields being smashed aside by the wights and the formation collapsing backwards, the spear proving unwieldy at close range. However the third rank was armed with dragonglass daggers, and when they went for a kill shot on the wights they put them down, thankfully.

Ranma was with them too, bounding over the shield wall and into the wights, hacking and slashing out to either side as Fenris forged his own way through the portion of the wights between them. Moments later the two stood together, the beleaguered square of pike behind them.

"Welcome home Fenris!" Ranma shouted aloud laughing as he hacked White Walkers apart, putting them down permanently before falling back. "Back! Back to the castle!"

Above them the archers fired as many fire arrows and dragonglass arrows as they could, unfortunately depleting their stores somewhat more than Ranma could've hoped. Yet this did the job, both clearing their route and covering their retreat, more thanks to the fact the wights could not overcome their fear of fire than anything else. But moments later they were back inside the gate's tunnel, the portcullis slamming down behind them than the gate behind that.

Then Ranma was laughing as he hugged Fenris to him while his siblings and their bonded crowded around him as well. Fenris was home, and he was but the first ally to arrive.

OOOOOO

After leaving the Bay of Crabs behind, the Royal fleet made good time traveling north, skirting around the Fingers as much as they could, the wind usually behind them. They had to stop twice for food, taking on as much provisions as they could for the sailors and the army. They also met Salladhor Saan's fleet going the other way, both fleets doing what they could to stay within sight of land given the horrendous storms that came out of nowhere at times in the Narrow Sea in Autumn.

The pirate prince was of course brought aboard, and met Daenerys and her advisers. He came away somewhat impressed by the young queen, and more than a little frightened of her dragons. They were so much more real in real life than they were in pictures, paintings or old tales.

Daenerys in turn was quick to affirm the crowns backing of the deal Salladhor had struck with Lord Manderly then took it a step forward. "If you can keep up the supply of dragonglass, I will pay you your weight in gold Salladhor Saan. And if feet you or any of your man can figure out a way to speed the process up somehow, be it the trip up from Dragonstone, getting the dragonglass out of the ground, carving it up appropriately, I don't care, if you or they have any idea that works to speed it up, we will award you a noble title, and the island of Driftmark."

"With such an incentive my lady, I will of course place all of my considerable acumen against the task."

Daenerys nodded, then looked down at the map trying to figure out where they were. But she didn't have as good a grasp of distances when at sea as she did on land. She asked Sahn and Davos for their take on where they were, and how long it would take them to get to White Harbor from there.

"We've made better time than I expected my lady, far better if I'm honest. Not all of that can be explained away by my resupply idea, we've simply had favorable winds the entire way." He caught septon Ehhric's smiling expression for a moment and rolled his eyes. "I know that some of my men think it is a Seven sent miracle father, but I'm not one of them. I've been at sea for too long to have any remaining misconceptions about it, the sea is a cold stone bitch which will kill if given half the chance. It's just that it's playing nice right now, lulling us into a false sense of security."

Davos was as God-fearing as the next man, and firmly believed in the Seven, it wasn't only his code of honor which made him hate Melisandre. But he also believed that the Seven helped those that helped themselves, miracles were all too often simply charlatans' tricks, or the workings of madmen or mad women like Melisandre.

"That isn't what I asked Ser Seaworth. How long will it take to get to White Harbor?" Daenerys asked implacably, ignoring the small bit of byplay.

"Another week and a half or so to get to the entrance to the Bite, then another 2 and 1/2 weeks at best." Davos said promptly. "It depends on if the Bite has begun to freeze. It may well have by this point."

He looked over at Salladhor who nodded. "There were indeed several icebergs visible to my ships along our route both to and from White Harbor, though I didn't notice any significant difference from one leg of the trip to the other." He stroked the large and very warm fur coat that had been part of the deal between himself and Lord Manderly for clothing his sailors against the cold for a moment before going on. "I do know however, that I would not wish to travel further north than the northernmost edge of the Bite. The seas in the Bite are relatively calm, but the entrance to it, in particular near its northernmost edge, was extremely rough.

"The best idea when dealing with such cold conditions my lady is to have several of the ships out in front of the rest of the fleet. We then force the fleet to travel as closely fit together as possible, with the ships in front going extra slowly to do soundings. Ice can often hide underneath the waves, and an iceberg can rip the keel out of a ship just as easily as rock or reef." Davos said.

"Which will slow us down even more." Rickard growled. He and Greatjon exchanged glances, knowing their Family's seats would be primary targets for the White Walkers if they had indeed gotten around the Wall. While he had continued to profess his trust in his son's judgment, and the defenses of Karhold, that was a vastly different thing from being happy with the situation.

Daenerys scowled, then noticing a small mark on the map near one of the Fingers her scowl dissipated into a thoughtful stare. Tapping it she asked, "Tell me, does anyone know how close Baelish Keep is to the ocean? I didn't realize it was on one of the Fingers until just now, but if it's close enough it might behoove us to swing by and see what we can find..."

That one some particularly piratical grins from her listeners, and Davos responded for them all. "Actually, Baelish Keep is right on the water your Majesty. And it's not much of a keep either, being more of a simple enlarged holdfast with an outer wall along the approaches from further inland. At least that was the way was the last time I sailed these waters. It could've changed I suppose."

"Probably not." Merry said shaking her head. "Petyr never relied on an overt show of force, he always liked to hide as much as he could get away with. The exterior at least won't have changed much I don't think."

"In that case, I think we should take six or seven ships and head in that direction when we're close enough Ser Seaworth. My dragons could use a bit more exercise than they have been getting simply fishing anyway." Daenerys smiled thinly.

About a four days after that they came within sight of the Finger where Baelish Keep was placed, and the flagship along with six other Royal war galleys peeled off from the rest of the fleet, moving towards the Finger. They didn't bother hiding their coming, simply sailing on certain in their power. And the dragons flew before them.

The sight of Rhaegon and Sunfyre won them the keep without a fight. Not, Daenerys reflected as she allowed Smalljon to aid her up onto the tiny wharf that served the keep that they could've put up much of a fight in the first place. There'd only been 50 armymen within the keep, a decent amount for a keep of the size, but not enough to defend it against six war galleys worth of Royal troops. Let alone the dragons.

She took a moment to look over to where Rhaegon and Sunfyre were cavorting in the ocean right by the keep. It turned out that this place was a home for crabs much like Harroway, and the two of them were guzzling the delicacy eagerly. They're going to spoil their dinner, she thought to himself herself, chuckling before following the Wolfsworn into the keep.

The Wolfsworn moved around her like the old Kingsguard, and Smalljon in particular growled at any of the prisoners looked at her way, keeping her far away from them. It only been a few weeks since Merry had confirmed that Daenerys was pregnant, though thankfully she hadn't begun to have morning sickness, nor had it begun to affect her figure much. Still, the news had been received jubilantly from the entire army, with the Lords in particular breathing sighs of relief at the sign that the succession would soon be made clear.

"Will you look at that your Majesty?" said Davos, staring up into the ceiling of the keep's main Hall.

Daenerys followed his gaze, and saw what looked like some pieces of a ship taken apart and hanging there in the dark. "What is it?"

"Pieces of a cutter. I wonder..." Davos frowned, and waved his hand and moved off intent on searching the property.

Daenerys let him go because Lord Blackwood came trooping in then, smirking widely. "Your Majesty, we found something you might want to see."

What the men of House Blackwood had found were several dozen large chests of gold. All told Daenerys would later find that it amounted to practically a million gold dragons. Not even half the amount that Petyr had diverted from the crown coffers to his own needs, but more than enough to be a kind of emergency nest egg for him.

Once he learned of that Davos simply nodded. "That makes sense when added to the boat we found hidden here my lady. It would take a skilled crew of workmen only a few days to put it together, all the pieces are here and in excellent condition. I would say that Petyr was a rat with a ship ready to leave a sinking situation."

The Wolfsworn all rolled their eyes, with Meera going so far as to shout 'Booooo' at the horrible turn of phrase, while Daenerys merely shook her head sadly at the man. "Pray do leave the quips to other men Ser Seaworth you are an excellent ship captain and admiral, you have no need to be a master jongleur."

Then she smiled, patting him on the shoulder. "Load it up. Set aside a single casket, share it out between you and the other Lords in the army then set aside two more to split up among the men. After the war they've already fought, they all deserve a bit of a bonus in beyond what they'll be paid when this is all over."

"Any plans for the rest?" Davos asked only semi-whimsically. That was a lot of gold after all.

"No, but gold is as important to kings as victory." Daenerys said with a faint smile. "I'm certain my husband and I will find some use for it soon enough. Though it is not as important as loyalty." She said smiling faintly at the Wolfsworn and Davos, who all straightened their shoulders at her words. "Now, we have a journey to get back to, and a war awaiting us at our destination. Let us be about it."

OOOOOO

Besides the small skirmishing parties spreading everywhere slowly, the only major White Walker Army on the move at this moment was the one that had taken Karhold. The White Walkers forces were not infinite, nor could even a large percentage of their forces be sent around the Wall on their icebergs. Even worse, reinforcing those sent was a slow laborious process. Whatever their magics, the icebergs moved incredibly slowly after all, the White Walkers had no power over moving water. Even from a distance from the Frozen Shore to Bear Island had taken more than three months.

Ranma had hurt the White Walkers badly when he killed the wizards with the army surrounding Winterfell, but there were still over a dozen wizards on this side of the Wall, their will slowly spreading through the very ground. And more than half of them were with the army that had taken Karhold. It had been the White Walker's greatest victory so far since taking Skagos. They had killed hundreds, taken dozens of small holdfasts, families that had refused to leave, even small keeps here and there. But only Karhold of the Great Houses had fallen to them.

Gathering more and more wights to them as it went, the army marched on its next target, passing the Weeping Water and marching on. Their target, Hornwood.

OOOOOO

2 and 1/2 weeks after Fenris had passed them the expeditionary force under Lord Reed finally arrived at Castle Cerwyn. They were greeted warmly by the defenders, and to their astonishment Ranma himself. "I would've thought you'd be in Winterfell lad." Lord Reed said looking at the younger man in astonishment.

"I've been able to sneak in and out of Winterfell since the siege began. The wights, whatever they use to replace their senses don't work very well," Ranma said with a shrug, not wanting to explain the cloaking technique that he used, but also unwilling to outright lie. "They don't have enough White Walkers left to ring the entire castle, there's always some way through their cordon."

"I see you've been busy then." Lord Reed said frowning thoughtfully. "What are we actually facing here, and what's already been done?"

Ranma smiled, one arm still around Edd's shoulders. "Yeah, we were kind of busy right as I arrived. Since then it's calmed down, out of a bit of excitement when Fenris arrived. But right now, let's talk tactics."

The siege had fallen into a state of semi-constant small skirmishes. The defenders lacked the numbers to truly battle against the wights, but the animals were useless in the siege. The last remaining dragon had gotten too close at one point, and Ranma had destroyed it with a 'Direwolf Claw'. Without it, and with the defenders protected by their positions, the White Walkers were forced to begin work on siege weapons. But while they could use the giants and wights for simple fetch, hack and carry tasks, the real work on these weapons had to be done by the White Walkers personally, and it was very slow work. But thanks to the ongoing siege, the White Walkers had yet to send any organized attacks beyond Winterfell.

The siege at Winterfell had actually dragged in many of the smaller bands of wights that had been raised by the White Walker's power, and House Cerwyn's land actually hadn't seen any depredations from them for over a week by this point. This convinced Lord Cerwyn to add 700 more men of his own House and a further 420 men from his minor Houses to Ranma's expeditionary force. This impacted his own defenses cutting into the number of trained men, but Medger felt it was worth the risk.

The expeditionary force had also added light Cavalry from House Ryswell long before this, and even a force of 400 pike out from Torrhen's Square. They weren't very well trained in comparison to the Cerwyn Regiment, and most of them were un-blooded, but the inclusion of them gave Ranma around 6,300 men.

"Tell me, did you hear anything from the other side of the Neck about the Vale army arriving at Crannogtown?" Ranma asked looking at Lord Reed. Around them their men slowly progressed through Cerwyn's armory. Dragonglass arrows, spear tips and daggers depending on their place in the battlefield were handed out, along with some directions on their upkeep, since the weapons were so brittle.

"We'd heard sightings of them from my scouts before we were too far from the Neck, but I'm sorry that's about all I can tell you." Lord Reed said shrugging. However most of Lord Reed's attention was on the men around them, more importantly the looks that most of the soldiers wore. There was a lot of fear there, anger yes, and worry, which was normal enough going into battle, but there was far too much fear for his liking. He nodded around at them nudging Ranma sharply in the ribs. "You should give a speech lad."

"What?" Ranma asked looking a little confused. Then he too noticed the men's faces and sighed, nodding. "I understand. This enemy isn't like any other they faced, and they all know it too. We need to put some spine and them. Get them bedded down, we'll spend two nights here and march out before dawn on the third day. I'll give a speech then, but I'll also hold some training seminars on how to fight wights between now and then. That should show them the wights and White Walkers can be beaten, you just have to be careful about it."

"Yes, but tonight Ranma, you and I need to talk. I need to tell you about what nearly happened to Sansa." Edd scowled, his face bitter, more bitter than his run north could explain. "I nearly failed you my friend."

Ranma looked at him, then nodded. "We'll talk in a bit then."

When they did, Edd explained how Petyr had nearly kidnapped Sansa, saved only by Fenris coming on him at the right time. After he finished Ranma leaned back in the bed he had been assigned for the night, staring over at Edd who sat on his own. "I thought Fenris was trying to tell me about Sansa a time or two, but direwolves don't remember things like humans do or for as long. I'm going to have to think of something special to do for him, maybe a whole roasted brown bear or something."

He shook his head at his friend. "Don't worry Edd, I don't blame you for what almost happened. Petyr was a crafty bastard, he tricked me and my father a time or two in King's Landing, it'd be stupid to think he couldn't do the same to you for at least a little while."

"But..."

"No buts!" Ranma interrupted, smiling grimly. "You did your duty despite not having won her heart and transported Sansa to Riverrun. You did all you could there, now I need your mind and your spear here with me. Do I have it?"

Edd nodded, reaching across to clasp Ranma's forearm with his. "You have it."

The beds of Cerwyn were comfy, especially to those portions of the Army that had been on the march from Harroway nonstop for over two months now. They slept soundly that night before enjoying the down time, and many a man took heart from Ranma's lessons over the next two days. Yet the fear still lingered.

One the dawn of the third day after their when roused by their commanders and troop leaders the next morning arrival the expeditionary force mustered quickly. They ate a hot breakfast of meaty stew and bread, knowing that some of them at least would never see the like again. But despite that certain knowledge and the fear of the enemy they were to face, they marched out into Cerwyn's courtyard, grim of face and purpose.

When he spoke however, Ranma finished what his lessons had begun, replacing their fear with a will of pure steel. Ice held above his head Ranma stood between the army and the entrance to the gate tunnel out of the castle. And when he spoke his voice was almost calm at first, but every man in the army heard it with almost unnatural clarity.

"All we have done, all the North has done up until this point is hold on, defend, fall back. What else could we expect? The White Walkers attacked when most of the North was away, when you were away because they feared you! The White Walkers fear humanity, they fear you and the strength of your arms, because they know that your ancestors banished them beyond the wall millennia ago!"

The North has been holding on, but we are now done giving up territory for lives. We are back, I am back, you are back, and the rest of the army will joining us here in the North soon enough. But before they do, we will begin! We will begin the liberation of the North, the liberation of our homes!"

There was a cheer at that, and Ranma let it go on for a moment before he and continued to speak. "We liberate Winterfell and we start pushing them back! This land is ours, and no undead horde, no race from the past, no foreign army, no invader whatever he looks like whatever his magics whatever his gods! No one is going to take it from us! The White Walkers think the cold and the winter give them power, but I am the Winter King, you are my army, and we are going to show them what true strength, what true courage is! Who is with me!?"

Ranma was answered with a roar from every man there, and the Army shouted "The Winter King, the Winter King! The King in the North! Death to the White Walkers, death to the White Walkers!"

"Now we march!" Ranma said, sheathing Ice on his back and pointing out of the gate before trooping to the front of the army joining Edd at the front of the pike regiment, his spear having been replaced with one with a dragonglass tip. The army marched out of Cerwyn, their eyes no longer afraid but grim and determined.

Thanks to Ranma's killing five of the six mages with the army around Winterfell, the White Walkers didn't know that human reinforcements had already arrived. Worse, the single mage had been so busy pulling in more wights, hoping to gather a large enough force to simply overwhelm Winterfell in a rush, that they didn't have many scouts out. Those they had out Ranma and Edd had seen to the night before. Ranma would have normally set Fenris on that task, but Fenris could not get in and out of Winterfell as easily as Ranma. Instead he had been the one to communicate with the wolf pack's further south, keeping a tab on the army's progress so that Ranma knew when to head to Cerwyn.

Even so, and despite the fact that it was only a morning's journey from Winterfell to Cerwyn, the White Walkers were ready for them. They pulled much of their army out from around Winterfell, gathering to the south at the edge of the Winter Town in the fields which had once been Catelyn's special pride and joy, her system of crop rotation having made it the most profitable farmland in the North beyond that situated around White Harbor. .

Even with his concentration on gathering more wights, the wizard had created two ice spiders, like the ones that had attacked the Last Hearth only even more haphazardly made, with none of the black metal in their makeup. They, the undead giants and the remaining beasts from Skagos added a whole new level of fear to the army. The two spiders stayed behind guarding the wizard, but the center of the army's ragged line was centered on the giants. The beasts were held in the back, ready to be sent forward to exploit any weakness.

Yet almost worse than that was the sheer number of wights which his magics had pulled from the ground and gathered into the army. They had started out with thousands of them, and had simply added more as the siege continued, making good the losses among the White Walkers 12 to 15 times over. Indeed, it was the sheer number that they had gathered since his arrival that had convinced Ranma not to wait for the Vale forces to arrive from White Harbor but to attempt to break the siege now. Their appearance varied of course, not just in how long they had been dead but age of the individual. More than one man swore, seeing skeletons and more recent wights that had been children at one point. All told, Ranma estimated they had around 18,000 undead warriors facing his expeditionary force.

Ranma took a moment to dress his lines beyond bow range, watching as thousands of wights archers put arrows to string as his own archers did the same behind his line. The spear regiment held the center of the line, with the men of House Cerwyn and Reed spreading out to either side in a loose wing formation bent somewhat backwards. House Ryswell's cavalry remained hidden in the trees behind the army, moving forward slowly but not entering the fields where the White Walkers had opted to meet the expeditionary force. Your first mistake bastards, you should've attacked us along the route, caught us where I couldn't fully deploy my pike thanks to the woods.

With a final nod to Edd Ranma raced forward, as he raced towards where the giants and the beasts anchored the center of the hordes. "Winter has come for you, bastards!" The White Walkers turned their bows on him, but Ranma was too fast, rushing forward right into the giants faces before roaring "Direwolf's Claw!" The vorpal blades lashed out in every direction, gutting the giants all around and in front of Ranma, opening up a weakness in the army where before there had been a strength. Several of them survived, but Ice came quickly off Ranma's shoulder and he began to butcher them before the nearest wights could close on him.

Behind Ranma, Edd held a long dragonglass tipped spear just like all the men around him, leading the spear formation. This formation lacked the tower shields of the small band that Ranma had taken out to clear a path for Fenris, Cerwyn simply didn't have the ability to create such and Ranma couldn't have gotten enough of them out of Winterfell to do any good.

Instead, they were going to use the pike regiment's emphasis on depth in conjunction with the dragonglass spears. Every man in the pike regiment was now armed with a dragonglass tipped spear, as well as a dagger at their belts. Arming this force had completely wiped out the supplies Cerwyn had of dragonglass, but if they won this battle it would've been worth it. "All right boys, this is it! For the old gods and the North, for humanity, for your homes, charge!"

"Honor above all! Winter is Coming!" The Army shouted as one, and even as the wights archers continued to fire on them the pike Regiment charged, with the rest of the Army racing along behind it. The archers continued to fire, with the dragonglass arrows doing their work, though only hits to the head or chest registered with the wights of course. But Ranma's mad assault had done its work, breaking the center of the White Walker's line before the pike regiment slammed into its guts like an auger.

The spears thrust forward and Edd roared bearing one wight back on the tip of his spear slamming it into another, thrusting the spear all the way through their bodies watching as the light of the magic that empowered them faded in their eyes one after another.

All around Edd the Cerwyn regiment smashed into the army that outnumbered it several times over. Their flanks were defended by the armymen of House Cerwyn, and the Trident of Lord Reed's men, every third man carrying a dragonglass dagger. While their fellows hacked and crushed the bodies of the wights, these men went about purposefully performing death blows on them, stabbing down bodies in the head or heart. Even if the body had been cut into pieces before this death blow was delivered the Dragonglass dagger did its work, somehow destroying the magic that powered the undead corpse.

The archers too did their part, continually firing as fast as possible. Not aiming of course, simply trying to overpower their opposite numbers through sheer weight of fire. Wights could not fire anywhere near as fast as living people or as strongly, and there weren't enough White Walkers left in the army to make up the difference. Thousands of wights fell in that first ferocious clash, and the entire undead horde flinched back at the dragonglass weapons and the ferocity of their attackers. Then several archers changed to fire arrows, aiming at the outskirts of the horde, away from their own infantry, and the carnage spread.

But there were so many wights! After only a few moments the depth of their formation soaked up the initial charge of the expeditionary force, halting it in place. Then the wights began to pour around the Cerwyn Regiment, attacking the weaker sides and trying to get at the archers behind them.

But the White Walkers numbers also worked against them, keeping the beasts which could have broken the pike line for them from actually reaching the attackers. The wights were simply to clumped together to allow them through, and whatever control the White Walkers had over their servants did not extend to find maneuvers like that.

Even better, the fire arrows now killed several wights with every hit, something the archers under Jonothor Flint, Jonelle's husband, noticed. He quickly expanded the number of archers using fire arrows, ordering them to aim exclusively for the outskirts of the horde away from their fellows and for any groups which tried to close with them.

As the battle teetered in the balance, and the casualties mounted among the Northerners there was a shout from Winterfell, the sound of horns and Winterfell's gates rose. "Winter is coming!"

With that shout that defenders of Winterfell, every single man in the castle who could carry a weapon charged out, with Eddard and his House's armymen in the lead, riding on horses who had been carefully husbanded since winter began. At Eddard's side ran Shaggydog, Summer, and Fenris. The giant pack leader's fangs, paws, even his fur glowed blue, and his howl was a warcry fit to shake the heavens, joined by his brothers.

Hearing that sound the beasts at the back of the horde, whose minds had been completely taken over by the White Walkers, broke from that control for a moment, pure fear or answering battle fury overriding it. But it didn't save them.

Fenris and his brothers slammed into them like the wrath of the Old Gods themselves, bowling the armored polar bears over, smashing the sabretooth tigers to either side, snarling and killing as they broke the back of the army wide open for the humans following after.

Hearing Fenris' howl and the warcry from in front of him over the silent undead Ranma knew the time had come to throw in his own reserves. Pulling a horn from his belt he took it to his lips, sheathing Ice and jumping forward at the same time, landing with his feet on one wight. Standing on top of that wight he blew on the horn as loudly as he could, the sound echoing over the clamor of battle for a moment.

From behind the archers hidden in the Woodlands to either side of the Kingsroad galloped the light cavalry of Ryswell, shouting their battle cry "Riding Free! For the Winter King!"

They slammed into the wights assaulting Lord Reed and Lord Cerwyn's men holding the sides of the Cerwyn regiment. Though their lances were not tipped with dragonglass, there not being enough to go around, the sheer impact of their charge brought their fellows time. They recovered, and the men with the dragonglass daggers went to work once again.

With that signal given Ranma let the horn fall, pulling out Ice and howling as he hacked, slashed, and moved through the battlefield, cutting any wight or White Walker within his reach down searching for where the last Wizard and the Crystal could possibly be hidden.

Despite the pincer movement, despite the impetus of the last reserves arriving, the fact remained that the wights, even without the help of their animals most of which were now dead thanks to Fenris and his brothers, the battle was still very much in doubt. The wights simply outnumbered their attackers too much for even Ranma and his ki techniques to turn the tide. Men died, and if they were not quickly 'killed' by one of the people with Dragonglass daggers rose again to attack their friends. The pike regiment slowly began to give way, the men in the front rank going down to be killed permanently by their fellows with tears in their eyes, much of which froze in place, further hampering their effectiveness.

Yet many of the White Walkers had been at the back of the formation facing the oncoming expeditionary force, and most of them had died under the arrow onslaught from Eddard's men, the dragonglass arrowheads punching straight through their black metal armor. Without them, the wights could not coordinate very well, simply standing where they were and fighting as they could. The northerners had a chance, slim as it was.

Cutting through several wights who looked more like skeletons than anything that should be able to move let alone fight Ranma saw a glimpse of something so startlingly blue that it put the summer sky to shame. That's it!

Thrusting Ice forward he caught a wight slamming him back down onto the ground before bringing his hands back and ripping a dire wolf claw out. This cleared his way, and grabbing up Ice again Ranma charged forward towards the glimmer of the crystal he had just seen.

The wizard saw him coming, and gestured, sending his two quickly and not very well created spiders towards Ranma shrieking in that grating glass on glass language of the White Walkers. But there were no more White Walker warriors to aid him, and if he thought the spiders would gain him much time he was sadly mistaken.

One spider died as it lunged forward, Ice thrusting into his mouth and bearing it backwards before Ranma leaped up using Ice's hilt as a springboard and ripping the Valyrian blade up out of the spider as he kicked out at the other one, shattering the top of its carapace before landing and rolling, bringing ice around in a whirling arc that caught the Wizard in the side, cutting him in two.

With the Wizard dead, Ranma turned to the crystal which was still glowing blue despite not having any further magic users to power it. Ranma didn't honestly understand what it was, or what it was doing, but he hoped that it was important. And he didn't need to know what it was to break it. When in doubt destroy something, I like that. With that he raised Ice and brought it down with a roar. "Honor above all!"

The crystal shattered, sending thousands of shards in every direction cutting down dozens of wights who had turned in Ranma's direction that too slowly to stop him from killing the Wizard or destroying the crystal. It also peppered Ranma, piercing his lizard lion armor in places and even his body beneath it, cutting and gashing him. He gasped in agony as he was flung away from by the explosion of the crystal, rolling as he hit the snow and wincing at the pain of his new injuries, but he was still game as he pulled Ice up and around him again staring at the battle.

Without the crystal, the White Walkers didn't have enough power concentrated to keep the more ancient and decrepit wights, the skeletons and the like which had been pulled from the Earth going. They were a much more power intensive sort of wight than those newly killed. And thankfully for Ranma and his men and family, they made up more than half of the horde here attacking Winterfell.

With the crystal destroyed, all of those wights collapsed to the ground dead for real at last.

The battle didn't end there of course, there were more than enough of the wights remaining to keep fighting, but without the massive numbers advantage they had, the outcome wasn't in doubt any longer. Fire, confusion, the lack of orders, and the human's sheer determination won the day.

But the death toll was high. The Cerwyn pike formation had lost nearly half of its strength, the men of the Neck and House Cerwyn were down to less than a third of their number. This was something they shared with the man of House Stark, it's minor Houses and mountain clans allies. All of them had paid a horrendous price for their courage in attacking out from Winterfell, though thankfully none of the minor lords or their heirs had perished.

The archers on the other hand had taken few losses, most of those losses coming from the arrow duel during Ranma's charge. The light cavalry of Ryswell had taken several hundred casualties. The pikemen from Torrhen's Square however hadn't taken many casualties either, and Ranma quickly placed them under Edd's command, allowing him to incorporate them into the Cerwyn pike. They didn't have the training to be on the front lines, but they could at least follow along.

Ranma rubbed his face tiredly looking over at his father, who was nursing a broken arm, where he had taken a blow from a mace one of the wights and wielded in the final few moments of the battle. Lame leg and ruined shoulder Eddard had refused to stay behind as his men went to battle. He'd also of course been chewed out about it both before and after by his wife, but the searing kiss he had given her when he returned had silenced her for at least a few moments.

"The price was higher than I had hoped, lower than I feared. Dragonglass weapons can only do so much against that these kinds of numbers. I think we'll find that most of our losses were caused by wights which had already been cut apart, pulling our men down then making them easier meat for the others. There's nothing we can do to fight that kind of tactic, except use lot and lots of fire."

Ranma had been cautious in apportioning out fire arrows to his troops because he knew he wanted to use the cavalry, and no matter their level of training no horse would willingly come near fire. This had limited the fire arrow's effectiveness to those wights attacking the archers directly and the edge of the battle.

But now Ranma had to make a choice. "I think from now on that cavalry isn't going to be the way to go against the use wights except maybe as scouts," he said looking at Lord Ryswell, who had personally led his men north to meet with Lord Reed and the expeditionary force. "Worse, the cold is going to effect even northern horses before too long as will the depth of the snow. We also got lucky that the wights were so arrogant as to fight us here in the fields rather than the woods." Even the spears are going to be of little use in dense woodland, horses would be even worse.

The older man nodded his head gravely. "Agreed, until we have enough Dragonglass to give my men daggers and points for our lances, enough points to replace our lances six or seven times over a battle, we won't be able to use normal light cavalry slash and retreat tactics against these wights. They just don't feel it, they don't react, their formations will simply absorb or assaults and tie us down!"

All around them in the dining hall of Winterfell the mood was boisterous, but Ranma knew that wouldn't last. The battle been so hard-fought there could be no other response for now. But the people now cheering and laughing at the victory would soon remember the friends that weren't sitting next to them, the brothers or husbands that would never see home again. And more than one would remember how they'd been forced to stab said loved one to make certain he did not rise again as an abomination.

Looking around Ranma knew this, and he sighed. "We'll rest the army here. Portions of it have been on the road for months, and just fought one of the hardest battles I've ever been in. We'll rest the army here, retrain and wait for news that the Vale army has reached White Harbor. I'll send orders down to Lord Manderly telling him to outfit them with dragonglass weapons and send them up the White Knife. I understand he's got a few of Bran's special barges?"

"He does," Bran said, sitting next to his brother. Two years ago he might have been morose at being forced to not take part in a battle, now he was simply happy he had contributed in some fashion. "We sent them down there for safekeeping, since of course we couldn't keep them out in the open by HouseWells with no one to defend it. But there certainly weren't enough of them to transport an entire army."

"Not the Army, but it supplies yes." Ranma said a faint smile his brother. "We'll meet them where the White Knife forks and march overland with them from there to Hornwood. With no word from Karhold, I'm afraid that Hornwood will be their next logical target. And let's face facts, the Last Hearth can probably hold, Hornwood isn't that strong the castle in comparison to the Last Hearth, despite its moat especially since that moat's probably frozen solid. Hopefully by the time we liberate Hornwood, the rest of the royal army will have arrived, and we'll be able to really start pushing the White Walkers back."

"There's one thing you should worry about Ranma," Eddard said cautiously. "I haven't heard anything from the Wall in over a month now. I doubt it's fallen, even if attacked from both sides the Wall is an incredibly dangerous defensive position. But what if the hordes we've been facing, all of the White Walkers we faced so far on this side of the Wall, were but the equivalent of your expeditionary force, merely the first into the fray?"

"I've thought of that already father," Ranma replied said with a faint sigh. "That's why, when the rest of the Royal Army arrives and we meet up with it, we'll march straight up towards Eastwatch-by-the-Sea and liberate it. From there we'll be able to both reinforce the rest of the wall, and move on Skagos. I'm afraid Bear Island will have to fend for itself right now, as will the mountains."

The Wull nodded grunting agreement, knowing how few men the other mountain clans had left in those mountains. While the White Walkers influence might have raised wights there, there was simply no reason to try to sweep through them just yet. It would be hard, dangerous going, and would play to the White Walker's strengths anyway. Best to leave it until the Wall was reinforced and the rest of the North liberated.

"In that case, I'd urge you to head up the White Knife to liberate the Last Hearth." Eddard replied. "With it and our logistics back in action, it will make an excellent forward position for the rest of the march to the Wall."

"I would if I had the Vale Army here in Winterfell." Ranma said ruefully. "But I think we'll need to throw them into the battle at Hornwood before that. We'll see."

Two weeks passed with Ranma and the rest of the army recovering in Winterfell, but the Vale army did at last arrive. Lord Manderly outfitted it as quickly as possible, allowing the army to rest in his city for several days before sending them on their way up the White Knife. That this completely emptied his city of dragonglass weapons was a problem, but given the city's defenses and not knowing where the rest of the Royal army was, Manderly agreed it was a worthwhile investment.

When he received word of that, Ranma and the expeditionary force headed off down the White Knife to meet them. Lord Hornwood had proven to be made of rather stern stuff, and had kept his men patrolling his lands in large numbers armed with dragonglass weapons ever since his shipment had arrived, thanks in part to his numbers being buoyed by the force sent to deliver those weapons. Because of this, he was able to retreat in good order with the information that another White Walker army was indeed marching towards his Castle.

It took another three weeks, but the two forces finally met up and began their march toward Hornwood. And by that point, more good news had arrived. Daenerys and the rest of the Royal Army had reached the Bite.

OOOOOO

Daenerys stood at the prow of her flagship staring forward. It was a view she had seen before, but the giant mountains of ice scattered across the ocean's top were definitely different. Last time there had been only a few such, and they had been small barely discernible among the waves. Now there were dozens, and they were a danger she and her fleet had to respect.

Following Seaworth's suggestion several of the war galleys and all of the remaining cutters had been sent ahead of the transport ships, making their way slowly through the waters the rest of the fleet would have to traverse. In this manner they were able to steer the fleet through the ice with relatively few problems. One ship was struck prow on by an iceberg, but it was a relatively small one and the rent in the hull quickly patched. Another ship lost its rudder, but the sailors and soldiers on board were quickly taken off safely with only a few falling into the ocean during the transfer to freeze.

That wasn't the only problem they were facing. Here in the frigid north the dragons were now having serious issues with the cold. They could fly for several hours, but then they desperately needed to rest somewhere warm. The flagships supply of coal was quickly being used up now thanks to them, which was something Daenerys needed to remember when they took to the field.

But even that was secondary to the news the man standing next to her had brought. "I'd hope to see you again Theon." She said softly, turning and reaching out to touch his shoulder gently. "But I wish you had brought better news than this. Lord Rickard, I am sorry for your loss, and I know my husband will be as well. Our words cannot bring your son back, but I pledge to you that our House will do all we can to retake Karhold with you."

Rickard nodded, his face a mask against a grief so deep Daenerys couldn't even contemplate it without tears springing to her eyes. No father should have to bury his son. "I thank you your Majesty, your words mean much to me. But I must ask, what aid will that constitute?"

Daenerys frowned, turning her back on him for a moment before motioning to Theon to join them, making her way back to the large tent her dragons, she and Merry had been using on this journey. "How many days did it take you to get here from Karhold?"

"About a month, maybe three and a half months your majesty if you're counting the time since we set out from Karhold." Theon's voice was raspy, and his hands shook slightly. The barges had not been the best seagoing vessels, but thankfully halfway through their trip down the coast they had met with the small convoy heading up to Karhold with the dragonglass weapons. Even so, those few weeks aboard river barges put to sea during the winter would forever remain as one of the most horrifying memories in Theon's life, right up there with watching Torren Karstark die. "But I think we could possibly half that if we took actual war galleys and galleons instead of river barges."

"You're thinking of sending Rickard and a large force armed with dragonglass up to retake Karhold immediately?" Roger asked, stroking his beard thoughtfully.

"Not quite." Daenerys said shaking her head. "Without knowing how the White Walkers may have reinforced it, or indeed the disposition of their total army that would put too much of our strength in a position where the rest of us could not come to aid them. No, we'll aim for a closer target but one which still will put a strong offensive force on their flank."

"Ramsgate or Widow's Watch." Greatjon replied, nodding his head. "Makes sense. But who's going to go?"

"Ramsgate, its position is more central to the rest of the North. Dacey, you and Meera will stay with me, Daryn you'll take the rest of the Wolfsworn with Theon, Lord Rickard and as many men as you can place on eight war galleys. We'll send four other war galleys along with you, just in case. Move to Ramsgate, if they're under siege relieve them. Then add any force there and the dragonglass shipment they've been sent to your stores. March along the coast from there as much as possible, add House Flint's men to yours. That will allow the war galleys to keep resupplying you with food and eventually more dragonglass weapons in the future."

"We'll retake Karhold, then move on to the Bay of Seals." Rickard said, his eyes burning with deadly light. He would have vengeance for his family, for his House, and for the North as a whole.

"The rest of the fleet will remain with me, and we will move to White Harbor. I'm afraid we'll probably have to strip the city of its own supply of dragonglass weapons, and even then we won't be able to put a dragonglass weapon into every man's hand. And I refuse to set off overland until we do." Daenerys replied, frowning. "Fire arrows and my dragons are well enough, but dragonglass is even more important. If we have to I'll order the majority of the army to wait in White Harbor until the next shipment of dragonglass arrives. Though my little ones and myself will move on as we can."

Greatjon and Smalljon both looked as if they would object, but seeing the look on their queen's face decided against it. While it was true enough men could overwhelm wights or possibly even White Walkers in time, the cost would truly be high. And according to Theon even fire arrows didn't work well on White Walkers. Though Daenerys was almost eager to see what their reaction to her little one's will be.

"If I may your majesty," Dacey began. "I think the ideas you've outlined so far are good, but don't get wedded to anything for the main army until we arrive in White Harbor. Besides Theon's tale, we haven't heard anything from the North since we left Maidenpool. We need new information to really decide what to do next."

Daenerys nodded, and with that the meeting ended, with all of the Lords returning to their own ships, and the fleet splitting. Theon and several local guides took command of the portion of the fleet under Rickard, and they moved north, while the rest of the fleet continued on their way into the Bite. White Harbor was still two weeks away, but the end of their voyage was at last in sight.

OOOOOO

The tide had begun to turn. With a large portion of their initial forces sent around the Wall destroyed, and the influence they could push into the North thus greatly decreased, the odds of the White Walkers now winning the North without first taking the Wall was decreasing day by day. The war at the Wall had become a stalemate, the White Walker's main army unable to make any significant headway against the defenders, the design of the Wall such that it stymied all they could do.

The assaults from behind came in too small a strength to break the defenders. This was the biggest mistake the White Walkers had made up to this point in the war, though thanks to communication lag none on either side knew it. If the White Walkers had turned their attention on Eastwatch-By-the-Sea the moment they landed on shore of the Bay of Seal's, the Wall would have fallen, and with it the North and possibly all of Westeros. But they hadn't, so blinded by the need to crush the heart of their old enemies they had neglected to think what could happen if they failed.

Yet even so, the assaults from the south had an effect. Every week that passed the defenders of the Wall were slowly cut off from even hunting south of the Wall. Every force sent out came under constant, small-scale attacks. The defenders had gathered a large amount of provisions in their castles, but they also had many mouths to feed. So siege might make the Wall fall, but that would take time.

Nor were the White Walkers yet without cards they could play south of the Wall. The two dragons and the ten giant spiders moving across the Frozen Shore, and the even larger force slowly assembling on Skagos showed that very well indeed.

The tide had begun to turn, but winter's might could still win the day.

End chapter

---

Trying to make up forces for the White Walkers is sort of tough, but I think I've done a good job here. The humans have won a tremendous victory, but the war is far from over. The lack of dragonglass is going to hurt, I can tell you that.

Just so you all know and won't be disappointed later, I am not going to show every step of Jon and Margaery's courtship or anything but a couple scenes of their trip north, as I did Daenerys and her journey here. Nor, again, will this story end with all the problems solved entirely. Real life isn't that neat, and I mean for this story to, in some ways, be open ended like that. And frankly I am right on the edge of burnout with the AsolaF universe. There just aren't enough good fics out there that emphasize what I like - warfare, the Starks, warfare, comedy, warfare lewd humor, warfare in that order - if you know any tell me - to help me feed my muse, and it's such a huge world and all the differing POV's, and ugh!

As always, hope you all enjoyed, and please leave a review.

*Chapter 21*: Chapter 21

I don't own Ranma or A Song of Ice and Fire. See, look, my story actually has an ending!

It's been a long, bloody path my friends, but we have at last come to the end. As always I would like to thank Anthony444 for his aid in plot points and ASolaF facts.

This has also now been betaed by my minor mistakes man Ultimaflare. Please give him your thanks, as there were dozens of small mistakes here that no doubt messed with the flow of the story.

Now without further ado, let us begin the final chapter of this saga.

---

Chapter 21: War Ends, a Royal Line Begins

Traveling down the Torentine had been an exhilarating experience for Arya, by far the best part of the trip to her. Arya had never been anywhere before that had demanded such stringent water control as the Prince's Pass had. The horses, Nymeria, and the humans had all been forced to conserve water, and the pace the animals could go had suffered accordingly. By the time they were a bare five days into the pass Arya knew that any army marching through the pass would've had to carry its own weight in water to get this far.

The idea that this Pass was supposedly the easier way into Dorne was astonishing and showed Arya how Dorne had kept its semi-independence for so long. Though even so, the journey wasn't as bad as it could have been. While there was no autumnal rain here, the heat that should have hammered them during the day was markedly absent a sign that winter would have an impact even here and further south. Arya and Nymeria could feel it in the wind, winter was making its way south and even if the White Walkers were stopped it was going to be both long and bad.

During the night it was so cold that the guides House Dayne sent up to meet their lord at Nightsong, House Caron's castle, were seen to shiver in their tents despite being prepared for it. More than one man commented on it, and was fearful about what it might mean for Dorne, especially given the events of the war so far.

They didn't even go more than a fourth of the way down the Pass before their local guides led them off into a small culvert of the pass. From there they followed a trail into the Red Mountains that no army, no matter how organized or disciplined, could have followed let alone survived. The Red Mountains were as dry as the Pass, and moving through them was even more debilitating, plus the narrowness of the passage itself made it impossible.

Arya knew that without the locals leading them they would have become hopelessly lost in the passes, and then would probably have died from thirst or exposure to the elements. Hearty Wolfsworn she might have been, but Arya knew she would have died eventually all the same and wasn't afraid to admit it. Of course, Nymeria wouldn't have had as much trouble and could have gotten them both back the way they came easily enough, something she didn't even mention to Eddic.

Several days journey away from the pass found them coming out into the deep valley that the Torentine had created over millennia. It was a wild place of deep crags, rocks, and a few sparse trees, but even so, the party made their way down to the river quickly. And from there, they took the Torentine down further south.

But the Torentine was no Mander, or even the Green Fork. It was barely wide enough for two canoes to go abreast for much of its course and even when they came near Blackmont, the river was more rapids and small waterfalls than anything else. Those were a lot of fun, at least to Arya and Eddic, and they had thrown their strength into fighting the river with the guides. After High Hermitage, the seat of the now-defunct (if Eddic had anything to say about it, and as Lord Dayne he did) cadet branch of House Dayne, it became much smoother.

Yet now that their trip was smoother, Arya and Eddic were forced to sit and take lessons from Lord Dondarrion. The first few days were history lessons, then etiquette, which Arya was unable to get away from since they were all still stuck in canoes. Now, as they were nearing their destination of Starfall, it was current events and economics.

"The first thing you must understand is that economics and geography are closely linked. While Dorne produces several luxury foodstuffs, citrus fruits, olives, and other such, most Dornish lords rely on trade with the Reach and Essos to bring in bulk foods. It's taxing the trade both coming and going that allowed House Martell to build up so much liquid capital, since their land sits directly on the mouth of the Greenblood, the most important river in Dorne."

Lord Dondarrion paused, smiling grimly. "Yet even with the Greenblood, food can't be transported to enough of the land by river, and trade from Essos is expensive at the best of times, in autumn and winter that price is going to go up far more. With their military strength gone, Prince Martell will have to sue for peace in some fashion because Dorne can't survive without its landward trade."

"Couldn't they just abandon the deeper desert? And as for bringing in food, I'm not so well up on my geography this side of the Neck, but aren't there those islands between here and Essos? Surely trading with them would be less expensive." Arya asked. She wasn't really interested, but this tied into the war, and that she was interested in.

"No, those Houses in the deep desert won't simply up and move, smashed though their militaries might have been they are too proud for that. As for those islands, most of them are controlled by pirates, and very few of them have any farmland to speak of. And while Dorne has a small merchant fleet, if House Redwyne retains even a small portion of its own fleet then our allies will be able to blockade the few ports Dorne has easily enough."

Arya shrugged her shoulders. "So they'll try to nip in fast and dirty with whatever they've got left before you and Edric's house get yourselves situated, smash your new duchy before you can get your feet under you."

"They're welcome to try, though I'd have thought you'd noticed that House Blackmont didn't try anything when we passed through their lands." Edric said the laugh. "As for any Martell supporters, they could probably burn a few of our smallfolk's out, but..." he smiled as they passed a final bend in the river, and stopped, pointing. "I don't think they'd have much luck trying to take Starfall at least."

Ahead of them the Torentine finally widened, becoming one with the sea. On a smallish island set in the center of the Torentine sat Starfall. The castle was not as imposing as others Arya had seen, but its walls rose out of the rock of the island directly on the shoreline. It had a small dock leading up to its gates, over which the main gatehouse loomed with dozens of murder holes. Its walls stood at least five stories tall, with the towers set into the walls being another two stories. The central keep was not a keep so much as another tower, which loomed even larger, possibly as tall as fourteen stories. Several of those towers had ballista or catapults on their parapets.

"Okay..." Arya said after a moment's silent contemplation of the castle. "Suddenly this whole duchy idea sounds a lot easier to make stick." Ahead of them the castle's bugles sounded a joyful note signaling they had been spotted, and more importantly the two banners they were currently flying.

Moments later the group left behind their canoes, entering the castle. Inside, they were greeted by raucous cheers. "Lord Dayne! Glory to Lord Dayne! Glory to Lord Dayne the Brave!" These cheers were for Edric, but at least one in that crowd was just as happy to see Beric as she was to see her nephew.

Lady Allyria of House Dayne was a tall woman with a somewhat thin frame, elegant features, long light blond hair and almost violet eyes like her nephew's. Her lips were full and curved into a smile as she watched the servants move to take the traveler's packs and horses, though she twitched a little at the sight of the monstrous direwolf sitting there patiently as a well-trained hound.

For now however, her curiosity was secondary to another emotion. She waited patiently until they had all handed their horses and packs over to her servants then moved forward quickly. Beric turned to her saying softly "my lady I have ridden..." but Allyria interrupted him by grabbing him by his ears and pulling him down into a kiss.

This went on for some time, until it prompted Arya to turn to Edric and say "You think they'll notice if we head off to our rooms, or should we find some way to guide them to theirs?"

That seemed to break the two lovers out of their personal world for a moment, and Beric coughed apologetically while Allyria simply pushed him away slightly reaching for Edric and pulling the young boy turned man into a hug. "And you are welcome home as well my Lord." she murmured, speaking into his hair as he came up to her chin at present. Despite his growth since joining the Royal Army Edric still had some growing to do, something Arya hoped could also be said about her.

"It's good to be home Aunt Allyria." Edric said was what dignity he could muster, which frankly wasn't a lot. "Even if for Arya and I it will be a brief visit."

Above Edric, his aunt's eyes narrowed, flicking over to Arya. Standing there in her worn travel pantaloons, her breastplate of lizard lion armor, Fang at her side and short cropped, dirty hair, Arya looked more like a simple soldier than the daughter of a Great House.

"And who is this?" she asked, trying and actually succeeding in keeping a sneer out of her voice. In comparison to the lovelies of Dorne, or even the Reach this girl looks like a jumped up street urchin...

Allyria's thoughts juddered to a halt as Nymeria moved from the gate, the crowd of servants, armsmen, and horses parting quickly. Arya smirked, rising to the hidden challenge in the older woman's eyes as Nymeria moved to sit beside her bonded human. "Arya Stark, Wolfsworn and sister to the king and the Hand."

Later on the three of them and Allyria met in her study, a well-appointed room with several soft fluffy Dornish style divans scattered around it with small writing desks set next to each. Scrolls and books lined two of the walls with the fourth facing a large open balcony.

They drank water infused with a hint of lemon, the common drink in this part of Dorne. Even to great Houses like Dayne, water was still a precious resource, and sharing it like this was the Dornish equivalent of breaking bread in the North.

It'd taken several hours to catch Allyria up on all of the news the three had to share with her, and even that didn't tell her everything. While the Reach had learned of Ranna and Daenerys' victory in the war, how that victory had come about had yet to reach them by the time Willas and Jon marched. And unlike House Martell, House Dayne had nothing in the way of a spy network.

But there was nothing wrong with Allyria's mind, and she sat and listened to the news of the war, what was going on in the North, and how Arya was intent to head southeast to Oldtown to join the fleet being sent north. She listened, asked questions, and took it in, never relinquishing her grip on her fiancé's hand, staring at Arya and Edric in turn.

When they finished their tails, she sat silent for a moment then looked at Beric. "You returned my nephew and Lord to me, only to have already agreed that he can simply walk off?" The question could have come out with quite a bit of bite to it, but it was more whimsical than anything else. "And what will you run off for, the love of this young rascalion? You say you are Arya Stark, and with the direwolf at your side none will believe otherwise. But even so, you are not the sort of young the lady I would choose for my nephew."

"I have chosen of my own free will, Aunt Allyria," said Edric quickly. "Arya and I have come far together, gotten to know one another in good times and trying, faced things that would have broken any normal highborn lady. And there is something to be said about a woman who can stand beside you not only in managing your lands but defending it at need."

Arya simply smirked. She knew she wasn't exactly normal fiancé material, and didn't care a whit. Ranna had told her years before all of this began to be herself, that someone who could love her as herself would come along eventually. She was somewhat surprised that it had come so quickly, but she liked Edric, and was interested to see if this whole relationship thing was as interesting as so many people made out to be.

"Very well," said Allyria smiling slightly at that response. "I know better than anyone what can happen if young love becomes unrequited. I'll give my blessing to this union, so long as we can formalize it right now. I will send you a note via raven to Highgarden for relay up to Winterfell for your mother and father, accepting their offer of your hand in marriage, in my Lord's name and my own as his regent. That should do for the proprieties."

She smirked suddenly looking at Arya and Edric with a gleam in her eyes. "However, while we here in the Dorne are very liberal when it comes to what is allowable between affianced, or even between single men and women, I don't want to become a great aunt anytime soon. Do I make myself clear?"

Both youngsters blushed, not looking at one another now as they stared in completely different directions and she laughed. But then she went on brusquely. "However, while the bulk of your news was new to me, some of it had already reached my ears, if in a roundabout way. And I have news for you to convey to your brother the hand."

Arya cocked her eyebrow and Allyria went on. "Lord Doran Martell is dead." Beric and Edric both nearly choked on their drinks at that, and she smiled thinly. "House Martell's ravens arrived with that news several days ago. He was poisoned apparently by a guest in his House, a Magister Illyrio, who has since disappeared. No one knows why the two of them had a falling out, but rumor is that Doran wanted to offer Illyrio to your brother and Daenerys if things went wrong. Areo Hotah, the Sunspear's captain of the Guard has gone in pursuit of him.

"Doran's son Quentyn is now trying to rally the great Houses to him, but the news of his father's death, and the murderer, forced many of us to think that things had gone awry with our armies. Needless to say, Quentyn is not having much luck, though that could change one way or the other if news of the disaster Martell led Dorne into spreads."

Frowning thoughtfully, Beric nodded. "So we might be able to convince the Houses between here and Blackhaven to side with us with little in the way of military action. Stability, increased trade with my own House and the other Marcher Houses, and of course the new Royal House's approval for our actions will make for a very tasty carrot if the power of the stick becomes known."

"Indeed. Quentyn is well-thought of by some, but he doesn't have his father's diplomatic skills, or his decades of experience. House Blackmont and Manwoody have communicated via raven with us here that they will 'wait until the situation clarifies itself' before taking action. That is diplomatic speech for not wanting to take any action either way. If we can guarantee that food from the Reach will still flow into their lands we can bring both of them to our side. Manwoody in particular is dependent on that trade, and Blackmont has always been an ally of Dayne, though it must be said that is because they rely on trade up the Torentine, which we control."

"But that is enough serious talk for now." Allyria smiled, tugging Beric to his feet. "We can continue such discussion later; in particular which castle will serve our new duchy as its capital. Yet it has been a very long time since my fiancé and I were up alone together, and we have a wedding to plan. You know where Dawn is stored Edric, show your fiancé the Sword of Morning, and tomorrow we will hold a ceremony to formally pass it on to you."

The two youngsters couldn't get out of the room fast enough that after that, and spent several moments staring off in different directions outside the room, before Edric sighed, tapping his hand against Arya's but not taking it. "Come on, I'll show you Dawn. Trust me, it's a sight to see. "

They walked through the castle up several flights of stairs, Edric exchanging greetings with those servants he knew, which were most of them, while Arya smirked at the odd looks she was getting. Evidently despite knowing who she was and what her standing was, her looks still drew some disapproving looks from these soft southerners.

All of her amusement faded into nothing when they walked through a specially sealed and guarded door to stare at Dawn. It was a greatsword, not unlike Ice, though the blade was somewhat thinner along its body. The blade was a pale white almost like milkglass, the edges of it gleaming sharp in the light of the fading rays of the sun coming through a high window behind it. The hilt was long enough for the blade to be wielded two-handed, with a small tourmaline stone set in the pommel. The crossbar, much the same size of Ice's, was marked in its center by a five pointed star. It was both beautiful and deadly, conveying both majesty and danger in one.

"So, so that is Dawn." Arya said reverently. She remembered the story of how her father had fought the Sword of Morning at the Tower of Joy, how Lord Reed's intervention was the only reason the two of them had returned from that expedition. Yet what had always struck her was how even after crossing blades with him, her father, the most honorable man that ever existed, would never hear a word against Arthur Dayne. "The finest knight, the finest man in the realm," he had often said, "they often say that sometimes the sword makes the warrior, but in his case it worked both ways. His legend became its legend, and the glory of Dawn reflected his own."

"Yes." Edric said gently, reaching forward to touch the sword reverentially. "This was why I was sent away to squire with milord Beric, above his relationship with my aunt. Beric is known as a very good blade and a knight of valor, I needed someone who could teach me both honor and the blade. There are better blades, more valorous or seemingly valorous people, but he was the best when it came to possessing both qualities."

The two of them fell silent for a moment, simply walking around the sword where it hung in its case wondering about it, about the legends and the truths behind them. "It's said that only dragonglass or Valyrian steel can see off White Walkers," Arya said at last. "Somehow, I think a third name's just been added to that list."

"Yes." Edric said, smiling grimly. "Every man who has wielded this blade has added to its legend. I hope, when we face the White Walkers, that I will do half as well."

Edric remained up all night in silent vigil in front of Dawn, kneeling in front of it in full plate armor, taking no food or drink and without even Arya for company while four sworn knights of House Dayne and Lord Dondarrion watched from the five points of the room. He recited the names of those who had wielded Dawn before him, their deeds and legends, from a long scroll, committing them to memory, though he had known most of them long before this. Every time he made a mistake one of the knights would stride forward and smash him on the shoulders of his armor with the flat of the blade, and he would have to begin again. This happened only a few times, a good omen, it was said.

Then, as the light of the sun began to peak over the horizon, Allyria, Arya, and several other witnesses came into the room silently taking up places along the walls facing Edric and the raised dais which held the sword and its case. They stood there silently while tinkling chimes sounded from every tower of the castle.

The light of the sun was crawling up the side of the tower when they were joined by a sixth knight. His armor was white from the tip of his ancient, closed helmet to his feet, with a large star carved out of the chest piece. This man should have been the previous Sword of Morning, here to pass on the title and sword to his replacement. But Arthur Dayne was not the first Sword of Morning to die without choosing his own successor.

At such times five oldest knights in residence in the castle played a game of bones to choose who took over the duty. After all, luck played a part in battle, so it seemed fitting for luck to play a role in the ceremony if needed. Afterwards none of them would speak of who had won the right, and he would fade into anonymity, a voice of the past passing on a sacred trust.

The knight strode forward to stand to one side of Dawn, staring down at Eddric. When he spoke, his voice was sepulchral in his helm, and even those who knew all the knights who had been eligible for this duty could not say for certain who it was. "Who comes before the Dawn?"

"I, Ser Eddric Dayne of House Dayne, knighted by Ser Dondarrion for actions taken in times of war, do stand before you."

"Knighthood alone does not make you of the Morning. For what reason will you bear the Dawn?"

"I will bear Dawn not for myself, but for those who come after me and for those who cannot defend themselves. Not for glory, but justice."

"Why do you think yourself worthy of the Dawn?"

"No one is worthy of Dawn if they think themselves so, but those who bear it can become worthy through their actions before and after. Through oath action and service will I honor Dawn, adding to its legend as those before me have."

"Finally, where will you bear the Dawn?"

"I will bear Dawn into darkness, lighting the way. From now until my dying days or until someone proves worthy to succeed me."

At that moment the sun's rays at last hit the windows of the room, filling it with reflected light. "Then rise Eddric Dayne, and take your sword!"

Eddric stood, reaching forward with both hands to the hilt of the greatsword in its case, lifting it out easily. It was light in his grip, lighter even than a Valyrian sword of similar size, almost as light as a longsword but not quite. This close the whiteness of the blade was even more apparent, reflecting the sun's rays like glass. Yet even so, Eddric could tell the edge was as sharp as a razor, and for all its beauty the sword was still a deadly weapon.

He held it up above his head as all of the knights in the room intoned as one. "Let the darkness and those who would do dark deeds tremble, for the Morning once more has a Sword!"

Eddric and Arya stayed the rest of the day in Starfall, taking part in the wedding between Beric and Allyria, before leaving early the next day. Beric's war was over, but the two of them still had a job to do in the North.

As the two of them and a few guards took ship out to sea, a man stood hidden in a small shadow cast by Starfall's outer wall. His face seemed to shimmer for a moment, and he sighed shaking his head irritably at his inability to join the crew of the small cutter. This chase is not going very well.

OOOOOO

"You know, if you clench your teeth any harder you're going to shatter something." Edd mused, as he slowly pulled at a flagon of watered down wine. The Vale Army didn't believe in the same rigorous strictures against drink that Ranma enforced in his own army, but at least with all the snow nearby water was easy to come by. If only all the other problems the Vale army has could be so easily rectified, which, Edd thought as he looked at his friend, is why Ranma looks fit to eat rocks.

Ranma glared at him, but the glare had no heat, and it subsided after a brief moment. Around them the army moved on, its pace laggardly in Ranma's opinion, but it was the best the Vale troops could do, and Ranma shook his head as he looked around them. "I should've stayed with the Vale army for a day or two when I was running up north, gotten a feel for them. If I had done that, I might've been able to force the Vale lords to start changing how they did things then, which would've given them more time to settle into the changes instead of now."

"And if you had, Winterfell might've fallen at the first assault given the numbers of White Walkers and mages you told me that army initially had." Edd rebuked quietly. "Don't second-guess yourself like that. That way lies madness, and too much regret will force you into stasis when you have to move."

"When the hell did you get so wise and worldly Eddy?" Ranma laughed, smacking Edd on the shoulder before becoming serious once more. "Still, I can't believe that Lord Manderly let the Vale Lords march out with so little in the way of logistical training! If Jon or Timot were here, both of them would be screaming right now. And as for Merry..." Ranma actually shuddered a little at how his blonde lover would react to how little the Vale had in terms of trained healers or medical supplies.

"You're a little biased my friend, are perhaps the word I'm looking for is spoiled." Edd laughed. "The truth is the Vale Army is moving at a decent clip for these conditions." By these conditions Ed meant the foot and a half of snow that covered the ground here in the North at this point. It had snowed practically every other day, and was of course staying on the ground. There was less snow underneath the trees of course, which allowed the Army to make its way through the forest at an okay rate for any non-Ranma trained army, but even so it definitely hampered movement.

"And at least all of the Vale troops have enough warm weather to see them through. Why I can only think about 12 instances of frostbite since we met up with them."

"It feels as if we've only covered 12 leagues since we met up with them." Ranma retorted. "But even so it's not just the speed we're moving that bothers me, it's the lack of weapons."

Ed winced. "Yeeess, there I can agree with you."

It turned out that Lord Manderly hadn't had enough dragonglass weapons on hand to fully equip the Vale Army. But rather than leave some of their troops behind, they had simply taken all he had and distributed them evenly to each of the lord's forces. Only one man in five had a dragonglass weapon, worse in terms of arrows, and even fire arrows were at a premium. While each archer Ranma had taken from Winterfell had three full quivers of fire arrows and another two of dragonglass, the Vale men barely had ten fire arrows each and a half a quiver worth of dragonglass.

"I'm glad you thought of bringing as much fire arrows and Dragonglass weapons as you did Ranma, even if we've left Winterfell badly understrength in terms of those weapons behind us." They left enough dragonglass arrows behind to arm the defenders, a group of around 600 men of the mountain clans and House Stark, but not a single spearhead or dagger of dragonglass remained in either Cerwyn or Winterfell.

Ranma shook his head again then deliberately changed the subject slightly. "How is morale among our own men?"

"They're about as irritated by the slow pace as you are," Edd reported smirking a little. "But they're holding up well enough. They aren't eager to face the White Walkers or wights again, but I think the term grim determination fits their feelings well enough."

"Good," Ranma nodded. "I'm afraid that when battle begins, the brunt of it will still fall on us."

"Wish I could argue," Edd replied with a shrug.

"We're running out of time!" Ranma growled suddenly, slamming a fist into an open palm, the crack of leather on leather audible to the men around them causing many to turn to look at their liege before looking away quickly at the anger on his face. Edd grimaced but nodded, understanding once again what worried Ranma.

The last they had heard from Hornwood was that Lord Hornwood had pulled his people out of the field, retreating into his castle. But that castle's main defense was the moat that surrounded it, and in that same report Lord Hornwood had passed on that the moat had frozen solid. He had sufficient weapons of dragonglass to see off any White Walker assault and to give them an edge against the wights but despite that and his troops being reinforced, Hornwood itself wasn't that good a castle. It could fall if the White Walkers were prepared to throw enough wights at the problem.

"I know," Edd said soberly. "But unless you want to break off our own forces and leave the Vale Lords behind, there's nothing we can do about it. Or we could stop halting the march with enough daylight left to start digging entrenchments?"

Ranma shook his head firmly. "No. I know the Vale Lords think that it's stupid and a waste of time, and I wish we could ignore it, but I don't think we can. If I were the White Walkers I'd change my tactics after what happened at Winterfell, and I'm not willing to bet that they're idiots or incompetent."

Edd nodded, but he knew that those entrenchments were a sore point between Ranma and the Vale Lords, even Lord Royce who had proven to be Ranma's greatest ally among them thanks to his friendship with Eddard. Ranma had taken the Vale Lords to task about practically everything in terms of their army's logistics, and had ordered their army to start building entrenchments every night. Those entrenchments took enough daylight, which was of course short because of it being winter that it cut off about a third of the time they could march on a daily basis. And it hampered the army's morale, being hard, dirty work fit more for peasants than armymen. That it also highlighted the difference in the training and endurance of the Northern and Vale forces was also a sore point.

As if summoned by the discussion, two of the Vale lords, Lord Elesham and Tollett moved up out of the army to speak to Ranma again about that very issue. "Your grace, we have yet to see a single sign of a wight or White Walker. Surely that means we can stop throwing up those entrenchments every day. We could be covering more ground per day if you stopped insisting on us stopping the march so quickly."

"Lord Elesham," Ranma said, his tone such that the man flushed angrily, "in comparison to what my army could be doing even in conditions like this your army is going at a snail's pace! Adding a few more hours to that won't matter, but those entrenchments could matter a great deal. We will keep building them every night, and I will continue to personally inspect them every night to make certain that they are built just like the latrines."

The two older men glared at their young king but Ranma ignored it and went on. "We could send more men forward to clear the trail in front of us, if we can stamp the snow down in a wider area for the main army we can press forward faster, and we could also bring in more game for the army at the same time, cutting into the time needed for that every morning."

So the march went, marching through the scattered forest and rocky terrain that made up most of the North. By Ranma's estimate the army only made around six leagues a day, then they would stop and throw up what defenses they could for the night. Those defenses were decent enough, mostly fighting steps facing four feet deep trenches with stakes inside of them. But there was a lot of grumbling about them, and more than one Vale Lord was blaming the need for those defenses on their slow pace, rather than their lack of organization, their constant need to forage, and the slow pace their own troops could march. Murmurs of dissent began in more than one quarter against Ranma, and even fights between the Northern and Vale troops, but Ranma remained adamant.

A month out from where the armies had left the White Knife, those entrenchments proved their worth, as Ranma had feared they might. But the White Walkers had learned more than Ranma had feared, because they also targeted Fenris, who was on patrol at night making a circuit well around the army.

OOOOOO

Fenris prowled through the night, moving through the snow and terrain of the North as easily as a man would across an open plain. This was his home, his territory, the entire North was his in a way that it would never belong to any human. His ancestors had lived here and further north for millennia, long before the First Men had come to this section of the world. Now he used that knowledge, patrolling around the army his bonded lead.

He paused suddenly, crouching down, making his body profile almost vanish into the snow between two trees, crouching behind where a third tree had recently collapsed. There was a smell in the air, a smell of death and decay. Lips peeled back in a fierce rumbling growl Fenris rose lightly onto his feet, golden eyes staring out into the dark as he made his way forward.

Before he could reach where he felt the smell was coming from however, he paused between one step and another, then backed away slightly, bringing his eyesight down towards where his foot would've been. Where he had just been about to step was a trap. It was not a human one there was no normal iron in it merely wood and ice and one black metal spike, the same kind of metal the White Walkers wore in their armor. He snarled slightly, then backed away further and made to go around it.

Arrows suddenly flew from among the trees all around him, and Fenris snarled, ducking behind one tree for a moment before bringing up his ki to protect himself.

Then there were dozens of White Walkers all around him, thrusting forward with very oddly shaped spears. The tips of these spears were continually barbed all along their length, and it looked as if someone had wrapped the first two feet of the shaft with some kind of thorny vine.

Fenris dodged the first two that tried to spear him, paw lashing out to catch one White Walker in the leg as he lunged at the other one smashing his head into it and ripping out the White Walkers gut's with a wrench of his jaws. Then he leaped wildly away, snarling.

From the spear of the downed White Walker the thorny vine around its tip had unraveled with all the speed of a cracking whip, catching him along his side. Fenris turned, biting it in two, his teeth glowing blue gold as he ripped it apart, but by that point the others were on him.

They pressed him hard, so hard that Fenris couldn't even get a howl off, and the direwolf spent a brief moment to fear for the pack, for the army he was defending, before concentrating on his own battle.

OOOOOO

Torches glimmered in the night here and there all along the ditches, each light separated from by several yards, five archers on watch so that the men retained their night vision enough to see out into the forest around them. Most of those archers however did not expect an attack. There were guards patrolling out in the darkness after all, tramping through the snow and underbrush all around the camp to make certain they weren't surprised by a nighttime raid.

Unfortunately one thing that Ranma had never really realized was that the White Walkers had exceptional night vision, and even though their eyes glowed with that eerie blue light, they were exceptionally good at sneaking up on people at night. Two-thirds of the patrolmen died without a single warning sounded in return, and the first warning of the danger to the main army was a hail of arrows coming out of the darkness. More than a hundred archers died in that first assault, then their fellows quickly raised the alarm.

Screams abounded in the night, and Ranma rushed out of his tent looking around wildly. Closing his eyes for a brief moment he reached out through their mental connection to Fenris, only to get a brief mental impression of fierce combat against a weapon that Fenris hadn't seen before. Dammit Ranma, let this be a lesson, the White Walkers can adapt and plan just as well as humans! They must've somehow drawn Fenris off then ambushed him. But I can't help Fenris right now, the army's going to be in a bad way. Night attacks like this are bad, especially against an opponent like this!

"Form up! Form up on your banners!" He shouted at the top of his lungs, his voice heard vaguely over the shouts and screams coming from the camps outer edges.

Edd pulled him himself out of their tent quickly, pulling on more clothing and looking askance at Ranma who haven't bothered. "You're going to freeze." Edd commented smacking Ranma on his shoulder.

"I've got no time to freeze," Ranma said shaking his head. "Get the archers and tell them to reinforce anywhere their company commanders want along the camp's edge. Form up the spearmen in the center of the camp, do it quickly but organized you understand? So long as the army sees that someone is doing something they won't panic. That and our camps defenses should be able to keep most of the army intact whatever happens. Then send the Wull and his men after me!"

Edd nodded, and raced off quickly followed by several of the company commanders. By that point however, the rest of the Vale Lords had come out of their tents, looking confused, worried, and though most would never admit it, frightened. Lord Royce and Ser Symond Templeton however were made of sterner stuff, and they rallied the others with a few sharp words before turning to Ranma. "What would you have us do?"

"Rally your men and gather your archers, but keep them back for now. Push swordsman and spearmen forward to help defend the earthworks." Ranma said crisply.

The Wull then pushed forward out of the crowd of soft southerners, he and his men all bearing greatswords or battleaxes along with the steel armor House Stark had gifted them with. At their belts each wore a dragonglass dagger. "What'd you have us do, Young Wolf?"

"With me Wull, we have monsters to slay!" Ranma laughed, his voice more a howl than a sign of humor, and the Wull and mountain men with him barked their own laughs as Ranma turned back to Lord Royce and the Valemen. Pulling out Ice from its sheath, he pointing it where he felt the noise of combat was the loudest. "I'll be over there, get your man moving my lords!"

Lord Royce nodded, slapping his chest plate with one armor plated fist then nodding at the others. They all raced off in different directions, shouting orders and Ranma winced. Their hearts were in the right places, but that many people shouting commands all at once was going to have a bad effect on organization, and in an action like this an organized response was one of the most important things.

Too late to change it now, he thought, by which point he was already on the earthworks, staring at a small horde of wights which were charging the camp. Behind him the Wull and his men raced into position, having been unable to keep up with Ranma.

The White Walkers arrows however were still falling among the men, and those were the more dangerous threat. However, the men posted around the edge of the camp had already responded, archer and swordsman alike, rushing to their designated positions. Yes! Ranma thought, ecstatic. The training I forced them into has taken control thank the Old Gods!

"Get your heads down!" He shouted. "Keep your heads down and wait until the wights get up here to engage! Anyone who has a Dragonglass dagger or spear, remember aim for the chest or head. Anyone else, chop limbs off! The dead fuckers aren't as hard to deal with if they're in pieces!"

With that Ranma put some steel into his words as he jumped back up onto the wall hacking downwards at the first few wights to try and climb the side of the ditch. Several of them fell, hacked into pieces and dead for real thanks to the Valyrian blade, but Ranma was forced to duck back under cover rather more quickly than he would've liked when several dozen White Walker arrows sought his death.

They impacted all around him, and one actually arced over the earthwork and almost took him in the side despite his rolling around, nearly smacking into the Wull's side, who laughed. He looked up to see several hundred archers already assembled, wearing two Vale House colors, Elesham and Redfort. They also all had fire arrows on their bows and he nodded grimly. Fire in a wood like this might normally have been a very bad idea to tempt fate with, but given how heavy the snow was on the ground and how cold it was out, Ranma was prepared to chance it. "Men of House Elesham, fire out into the wild to my left! Men of House Redfort, wait for targets, and if you see any White Walkers trying to gain the earthworks, target them with dragonglass arrows!"

The man all roared back in reply, and Ranma turned quickly bringing up Ice to block a farmer's hoe coming towards his face. Ice cut through the weapon, taking the man in the chest and sending him back to the grave. But there were other wights already on the earthworks and Ranma shouted, "Up and at them!"

The swordsmen, and spearmen and mountain men all around him obeyed with alacrity, regaining the small step that was on the interior of the small dike, hacking and slashing at the wights coming over the makeshift barricade. Above them they heard the thrum of arrows as the fire arrows sang past them, impacting into the woods randomly. Here and there they stuck into the trees, and slowly the woods began to burn slightly, but thanks to the snow as Ranma had predicted it didn't spread often. Here and there when the arrows impacted pine needles or large piles of leaves that for some reason weren't covered by snow it did, but those instances were very few and far between, and quickly snuffed by the snow turned into water around them.

But the fires did have an effect on the attackers. Whatever their control over them, the White Walkers could not force the wights to come anywhere near fire. The attack faltered at least here, and Ranma nodded at the Wull, who was cleaning his massive battleaxe of ichor as two of his men made certain if the wights on the ground by knifing their chest and tossing their hacked apart bodies onto the nearest fire. "Well done my Lord, can I leave this area of the wall to you?"

"Go on Young Wolf!" Said the man nodding his head. "I think that the fight to our left is goin' poorly, they'll need ya more'n me an' mine."

Ranma nodded, clapped the man hard on the shoulder and ran off in that direction.

The battle continued, but thanks to the earthworks and the training of the Northerners backing up the Valemen, the wights and their accompanying White Walkers couldn't break the army's morale or defenses. The attack cost them, far more dearly than what Ranma supposed the size of their force equated to, but they could not quite break through the earthworks.

Fenris showed up after Ranma had moved almost halfway around the camp. His fur was covered with slashes here and there, but nothing life threatening. He howled coming in on the attackers from one side, bowling several White Walkers who were busy aiming towards the defenders over before they knew he was there.

Seeing this Ranma rallied the men around him, men of House Tollett to charge over the earthworks, getting in close with a White Walkers and their wights before they could retreat. "Charge, charge and we can break them now!"

Lord Tollett had been among those who had most disdained Ranma's input on the running of the army, both his 'suggestions' (read orders or diatribes) on logistics and his insistence on the fortifications. Now however he was a believer, and he took up the shout. "You heard his Majesty, charge you sons of whores!"

Soon after that, the battle was over. The remaining White Walkers faded back into the dark of the night and were gone. Ranma scowled as he stared down at the bodies of four of them, wishing he could convince himself that they had cost the White Walkers more than 15 or 20 of their own number in this battle. But he couldn't. Still, if I can come up with a way to stymie this sort of assault, I can start to really do damage to their numbers...

Shaking that thought out for now he grabbed up a horn from his side, blowing into it twice, before shouting out orders. "All unit commanders report to your lords with your wounded! Lord Wull, Edd, take command of the defenses for now!" He shouted that several times, then grabbed some men nearby and used them as runners to carry his orders throughout the army.

Of course it wasn't that easy, the Vale Army wasn't organized anywhere near to the Royal Army's standard, and now with wounded to care for, that came to the fore again. Where is Merry when I need her, Ranma thought, shaking his head. We'll need her skills, though I'd like to keep her and Dae close for more selfish reasons. On the other hand, I think I'm actually happy she wasn't here. She and Daenerys have been in danger too often as it is.

As dawn broke, the various Vale lords came together with Ranma once again looking grim. "We've lost a little over 1,300 men my Lord, and we've got a fourth that number again in wounded. Caring for them is going to cut into our supply medical supplies badly," said Lord Royce, shaking his head. The glow of his bronze armor's runes had slowly faded since the battle, but more than one of his fellow lords were still shooting glances of awe in his direction.

He looked over at Lord Redfort, who grunted then bit the arrowhead. "You were right Your Majesty," he said bowing his head to Ranma. "You were right, and we were wrong. Building those earthworks saved this army, and it's clear by how your own the men did in that assault that your ideas of organization and training are also effective."

Ranma could have decided to grind the man's intransigence into his face, but he didn't. "An organized and disciplined army is never outnumbered my lords. I will not say that organization or discipline is of the most important things in an army, but they are high up the list. Therefore, we will leave the remaining wagons here with the wounded and say, four hundred men or so. Lord Royce, I noticed that your eldest son is not here, was he injured?"

"Slightly Your Majesty, Andar took a glancing blow from a mace to his helmet. His life is not in any danger, but it has certainly had an effect on his ability to walk and think for the moment."

"Very well, we'll leave him in charge of the wounded. They're to retrace our steps back towards the White Knife, then make their way back down to White Harbor."

"What if some of the White Walkers move around our army and attack them Your Majesty?" asked one of the other Vale lords respectfully.

"I don't intend to give them the chance. Starting tomorrow, we are going to double march this army. My own men will start clearing the path ahead of us, Fenris and I will go ahead of them, with enough of a distance between us to hopefully draw any White Walkers we can down on ourselves."

He looked over at Edd who nodded, already understanding what Ranma would have him do. "Ed, you'll be in charge of our men, keep them breaking trail for the rest of the army but don't let them separate too much in the Woodlands."

"I have done this before you know" Edd replied mildly, though his eyes glinted slightly and Ranma nodded holding up a hand. Edd nodded at the apology, and Ranma went on. "We'll want the wounded and the dead stripped of their dragonglass, those weapons are to be distributed among the men. Howland, Wull, I'll want you to start combing the Valemen for scouts, train them on the march as you would your own to move through these conditions as best you can. You'll be needed at night."

Howland Reed bowed his head, exchanging glances with the much larger Mountain chieftain. Howland and a portion of his men had been caught outside the camp during the attack having been on patrol. He and his men had evaded a group of White Walkers, ambushing them in turn before joining the battle by charging the assault from the southeast.

Ranma looked around the lords grimly. "Understand me, this was but a first round against the White Walkers between us and Hornwood. They've learned from the battle up at Winterfell somehow, and it's obvious they don't have the beasts or the magical creatures to face us in an open battle. But that might not always be the case, and we need to be prepared for it. This will be the way they fight us for now, skirmish, night assault and small scale attacks, but they cannot defeat us like this, not if we're smart."

The men around him all nodded grim agreement, and Lord Elesham gave voice to their thoughts. "We are yours your Majesty, you will hear no further complaints or arguments from us."

"Good." Ranma said briskly. "Then be about your business my lords, I expect this army on its way by midday."

OOOOOO

Merry and Daenerys both sneezed as one slamming their heads into one another as they laughingly pulled out of a hug brought about by a comment from Daenerys. Daenerys was about to ride Rhaegon over to New Castle with Sunfyre following. The dragons were now so large that the idea of them following along on foot through the city with the rest of the army was simply untenable, and they might react badly to the noise of the cheering crowd. This plan had been worked out in advanced with Lord Manderly via his son Wylis, who controlled the Three Sisters.

Up in the air Daenerys and her dragons would still be visible, but well out of range of the shouts and cheers of the crowd. Merry, Greatjon, and the other lords would then march the Royal Army through the city.

"That hurt," Merry whined, shaking her head. She glared over at Dacey who had burst into laughter at the sight of the two younger women slamming their heads together like that. "It's not funny from this end Dacey!"

"Someone must be talking about you two." Dacey said with a laugh. "That's a superstition here in the North anyway. Nonetheless, I think we should be going Your Majesty."

The two women nodded, and followed Meera and Dacey out of the large tent, the two dragons moving to follow their queen. They could only do so one at a time given the size of the tent flap, and they were noticeably reluctant to leave the warmth of the tent, but they could bear the cold. Both dragons were already saddled as well, and knew what that meant and were looking forward to it. Flying with their queen was always more fun than flying solo for some reason.

Even on the deck of the flagship the cheering of the smallfolk of the city could be easily heard over the shouts of Ser Davos ordering his crew around or any of the myriad other sounds of the army disembarking. Much of the work on those docks had stopped, and the men on them were cheering lustily at the sight of the Royal Army returned, and of course Daenerys and her two dragons.

The dragons in particular were being cheered lustily, and Daenerys heard many a man or woman shouting her own name. "Daenerys, the Seven bless Daenerys the Just, the Old Gods bless your marriage!"

It wasn't just the fact that the dragons could be seen as the ultimate enemy of winter however, no there was more to those cheers, more to the fierce pride those cheers conveyed in every shout of "The Stark, the Stark, the North for the King and Queen! White Harbor for the King and Queen!"

That was because tales of the War of Reformation had gone before the Royal Army on the whisper of rumor, bard's songs and raven's wings. The men and women cheering Daenerys and her absent husband knew what the northern army had accomplished, the price it had paid and the tremendous victories it had won. And they knew now, that whatever else happened the North would never again be seen as a backwater to be ignored or labeled as unimportant in the great game. Through fire, blood, courage and skill the North had made itself heard, and it would never again be silenced.

Daenerys took a few moments to wave at the crowd before moving over to Rhaegon, quickly flinging herself up into the saddle behind his neck. A mental command was sent out, Fly, my dear one!

Rhaegon pushed himself off the deck and out to the side further than any would credit given his bulk, which was now the size of four warhorses tail to jaw. A single beat of his wings held him there above the water, then another sent him a little higher and then a third, his muscles straining. Dragons were made more to drop from a height first to gain some momentum, and flying like this was hard on them, but both dragons had trained for it from the beginning and soon enough Daenerys and Rhaegon were in the air.

They circled the fleet in the harbor once then Daenerys sent out another mental command, ordering Sunfyre up into the air to join them. Much to the delight of the crowd the two dragons began to dance in the air, rolling and twirling up and around one another then they were moving off away from the harbor deeper into the city towards House Manderly's seat.

Moments later, they were spiraling down, the courtyard of the castle purposefully cleared for them. Several local lords minor waited there along with Lord Manderly himself, sitting on a palanquin at first but as Daenerys flung herself out of the saddle he lifted himself onto his feet before bowing to her floridly. "Your Majesty, White Harbor is yours as always. And though I doubt that at this late a date I will be the first, let me add my congratulations on your pregnancy to those that have gone before me."

"Your congratulations are welcome Lord Manderly, as is your hospitality." She looked at the crowd of city delegates and minor lords then made the next words she spoke loud enough for every ear to hear. "Since leaving your lovely city, we have heard reports of how you have served my husband and I, and I thank you for that service in both our names. You have shown intelligence, probity, and above all loyalty, all things that we could wish all of our vassals both noble and not shared."

With that she moved forward, taking the man's hands when he made to bow again, leaning forward to kiss his fat cheek. "It is good to be home." she said leaning back. "Home in the North."

The two of them moved inside after sending the two dragons off to a prepared stable for them, both dragons now too large to follow Daenerys into the keep itself. They probably could still fit through the hallways, but Daenerys was worried that the close confines would make them panicky, and dragons panicking was never a good thing to contemplate.

They soon sat in Lord Manderly's conference room exchanging tales. Lord Manderly was astonished at how much his young king and queen had accomplished in the south. The breaking of the Westerlands had reached his ears but the creation of the duchies or the final battle against Stannis and Viserys had not, and learning that the Stormlands in their turn would be broken was astonishing.

Their diplomacy and mercantile endeavors also impressed him, and he shook his head smiling faintly. The only problem he had with everything that they had accomplished was the fact that the Iron Bank would almost certainly see them as enemies now. That and the fact that all of his work in trying to set up a currency based on silver had gone out the door the moment they had taken the Golden Tooth.

"I do apologize for that," Daenerys said shaking her head. "If we had known when we set off that we could take the Golden Tooth, we would not have asked you to devote so much of your time to try to come up with a new system of currency."

Lord Manderly shrugged. "It is not an issue your Majesty, it's not the first project I've done that went unneeded. The Iron Bank however, that disturbs me. While right now their influence in Westeros is limited, in time they might be able to put a lot of pressure on Westeros economically."

"I realize that, and I'm willing to let bygones be bygones with them despite the fact that they backed that, that pretender and the former Master of Whisperers." Daenerys replied. The Golden Company survivors were very forthcoming about who would pay them, hoping for leniency. They hadn't gotten it, Ranna and Daenerys were death on any mercenaries or lords who preyed upon the smallfolk as the Golden Company had in Duskenale and on the march.

"If we are able to hunt down any more of Littlefinger's caches I'm even willing to turn those monies back over to the bank. But my husband and I will never allow them to dictate terms to us. Furthermore, the Royal Bank will be taking a far larger role in the economy from now on."

"I have some ideas about that, mostly based around investment ideas and the concept of ownerships in various businesses." Wyman said, looking at the young woman closely.

Daenerys waved one hand, and the older lord went on. That conversation continued until the rest of the army arrived in the keep and the barracks surrounding the city's walls. Merry, Greatjon, Jason and the others came in joining them, with Merry quickly making her way over to sit beside Daenerys. She nodded her head at Lord Manderly, curtsying prettily despite wearing pants.

Lord Manderly laughed, shaking his head. "You too are welcome Princess Baratheon, or should I call you the Maiden of Healing? I've prepared plans for a Healing Hall here in the city, and have gathered as many medical supplies as I could for the army, if you are willing to look over them."

"Of course!" Merry said happily. "In fact, if my lady and the rest of you don't need any medical advice for this meeting, I can go now."

The other lords who had come in with her shook their heads while Daenerys frowned faintly, tapping her stomach, which was just beginning to show her pregnancy, something Wyman had noticed earlier. "I'll need to ask you some questions later about this little issue that I just thought of as I was flying with my Rhaegon, but that can wait until tonight."

Daenerys looked over at Wyman who nodded, gesturing to one of the footmen waiting by the doorway. "Young Eustace here will show you around the city your Majesty, I understand you have a bodyguard?"

"I do indeed, Eric's outside with Dacey and Meera."

"In that case, as I said Eustace will show you around. But... we have already prepared a place for your mother, who arrived here along with the other prisoners that were supposed to go to the wall are here in the city."

At those words Merry's face blanked and Wyman went on delicately. "It's in one of the towers here the castle, rather away from them normal hubbub of castle life, something we felt was appropriate. We've spread the other prisoners out and have only retained the Queen and the Kingslayer here in the Castle. If you wish to check up on them Eustace can show you where they are today, and you can begin your tour of the healing hall and the warehouses I've turned over for medical supplies tomorrow morning."

"I think I will do that and..." Merry paused looking at Daenerys. "Should I also take the opportunity to introduce Arianne to her new charge?"

Greatjon guffawed and more than one Lord had a wide vicious smile on their face as Daenerys laughed, nodding her head. "Please do. I've already discussed with Lord Manderly what we plan to do with the princess of Dorne and he's given me assurances that Arianne will be watched both by the Silent Sisters and by his own people."

Lord Manderly nodded, Merry curtsied once again and left the room.

After her friend/lover departed Daenerys turned back to the others, beginning the strategy meeting brusquely. "My lords, Lord Manderly and I discussed many things before you joined us, but one thing in particular impacts our plans going forward tremendously. It turns out that the Vale has decided to break its isolation. Under Lord Royce and Lord Redfort the Vale put forth an army composed of around 11,000 men. But they did not decide to join the war in the South, rather Lord Royce apparently..."

That took some while to explain, with Wyman interjecting here and there to elaborate on what the Vale lords and he had discussed, but by the end of it none of the lords with Daenerys were looking very happy. Jason put their thoughts into words, frowning angrily. "Are you telling me that there aren't any dragonglass weapons in the city? That we're stuck here until that pirate and his fleet returns on their second run?"

"I'm afraid so Jason," Wyman replied, shrugging his shoulders which set his body to jiggle. "We had no way of knowing where you were along your journeys and Ranma wanted more aid to be sent towards Hornwood as soon as possible."

Daenerys looked at Greatjon, gesturing at the massive map on the table in front of them all. "Greatjon, you and Dacey have the most experience in moving overland in the North, could you show me where on this map you think the Vale could be by this point?"

Dacey moved over from the where she had been guarding the doorway to lean over Greatjon's massive shoulder, and the both of them talked for a moment in low tones, while Jason and his son Patek quickly engaged Lord Manderly in a discussion about logistics and the defense of the city. Eventually the two looked up.

"This is the route I'd take if I was heading from White Harbor to Hornwood," he said tapping it out with his finger on the map, following the White Knife for a bit and then splitting off and making a relatively straight line towards Hornwood. "At least if I had an army anyway."

Dacey nodded agreement. "They couldn't be further than that, not if they're matching any kind of normal army's speed. What kind of baggage train did the Vale lords have?"

"They initially arrived with both horses and mules drawing carts. We were able to exchange those animals with local horses, but they refused to part from their carts. It's doubtful though that..."

"Bah, wagons'll be next to useless in the North at this time of year." Greatjon interrupted, scoffing. "The snow'll be too thick, and along that route there aren't any trails a wagon could follow, no matter how small. They'll be carrying all their foodstuffs and other supplies by this point on their horses or their own damn backs if they don't know how to care for their horses at night." Even Northern-bred horses needed blankets to cover their legs and bodies at night, or the temperature would give them frostbite as surely as a human.

"Lord Manderly you said that my husband intended to meet with the Vale army and command it along its march to Hornwood?" Lord Manderly nodded, and the queen frowned thinking as she looked at the map. "If that is the case, then my lords I believe we can leave Hornwood and the Vale army to my husband."

"We're not going to reinforce them?" Tytos asked.

"Reinforce them, with what?" Jason shook his head. "We don't have any dragonglass weapons remember?"

"Fire arrows we still have in plenty." Greatjon said looking over at Lord Manderly who nodded. "Dragonglass weapons aren't the only ways to kill wights or White Walkers. Enough fire can do it, and remember we have the dragons."

"Dragons can't do it all, but we might be able to do enough. But I will not throw away the lives of our men by sending them into battle against the White Walkers and their undead minions without the proper weaponry."

"I say we should march upriver along to Long Lake and from there over to the Last Hearth Daenerys," Greatjon said, addressing her as she would Ranna, something which made Daenerys smile despite the lack of propriety. "I've no doubt my castle's been attacked since this began. If we relieve it, it'll make a good starting point for our march up towards the Wall, I promise ya!"

"I don't like it your Majesty." said Tytos Blackwood shaking his head. "I agree that marching to the aid of the Last Hearth makes sense, but shouldn't we concentrate on driving back the White Walkers along the coast it in aiding Lord Rickard?"

"Lord Rickard will reinforce his forces twice over at Ramsgate and Widow's Watch," Jason said, shaking his head. "And those places were already supplied with dragonglass, remember?" He directed that question Lord Manderly, who nodded his head quickly. "I agree with Tytos, without dragonglass of our own, our numbers can all too easily be turned against us."

"In fact," Lord Manderly said shaking his head. "The Vale forces marched out of here with only one dragonglass knife or spear point for every five men."

Daenerys let them argue for a moment, staring at the map. She was calculating distances, thinking of plans, and most importantly what Ranna could have known when he marched out. She was also thinking of the quality of the men with him, Rickard, and the Wolfsworn. We have the best we could possibly send reinforcing Hornwood and the eastern coast. The western coast is too far removed for us to do aught about. That leaves the Last Hearth and the straight path up to the Wall to us. That siege has been going on too long as it is, we must move to relieve it as fast as possible. Which means Greatjon is right, even if his opinion is rather biased.

"This is what we will do." Daenerys said softly, yet even so her voice cut through that of the men around the table easily. "Lord Blackwood, Lord Jason, you will remain here in command of the army. You will keep training the men, and hopefully after he retakes Hornwood, my husband will send out word of that. If he does, we can learn more about what fighting the wights and White Walkers is like and you can take that into account."

"You make it sound as if you won't be here your Majesty." Jason said looking at her with a frown.

"I won't be. Instead myself, Greatjon, the forces of his House and say 3000 extra scouts and archers will move up the White Knife with my dragons. If my husband hasn't cleared out Winterfell and Cerwyn of their dragonglass weapons, we can supply ourselves further from them at House Wells. But since Winterfell has been cleared of enemies, and my husband is busy marching to Hornwood's aid, we probably won't see much in the way of threats until we get past Winterfell. I aim to relieve the Last Hearth, then begin to clear the Kingsroad for traffic up to the Wall."

"That's a very dangerous gamble you're making." Tytos said, though there was more approval than disapproval in his voice while Greatjon's opinion on the matter need not be said. He was anxious to go to his seat's aid, especially since the Last Hearth had not been heard from via raven for far too long.

"You'll find travel up the White Knife relatively quick your Majesty." Wyman said smiling faintly. "Young Bran's idea of putting the barges on what he calls skates makes them go like blazes over the ice of the river. And at last report the winch and pulley systems at the various waterfalls were still in working order. Your dragons though, they will require a special barge made just for them. I had commissioned one such already, but I did not realize how large they had grown until today. It should still be ready in a week however."

Daenerys frowned, then pointed to Winterfell. "Can we get a message via raven to Winterfell and back before then?"

"Possibly, given favorable winds for the raven."

"Do so, I wish to know if we should stop there, and if they have any armor for those among our archer force that still need such. I'll also want all of our archers armed with every fire arrow you can give us."

Wyman nodded complacently. Fire arrows were relatively easy to make here in a city like White Harbor, unlike in castles, where they would quickly run out of flammables.

Daenerys suddenly looked up as a feeling of disgust and irritation came through her connection to dragons. Seeing through their eyes she saw that they had been given some odd looking meat that they had never tried before, though the carcass of the animal looked familiar to her. Is that a seal or a walrus? Regardless of what they were, their meat did not please the two dragons.

"I believe we have done enough for now my lords, rest yourselves for the rest of the day, then get back to work tomorrow morning on preparing the logistics for the mission to Last Hearth. I'll also want to go over the numbers for food and clothing production Lord Manderly, though we might need to talk to Davos to organize shipments of food from the Reach if possible, as well as talk to you Greatjon about how quickly your lands can get started on shipping coal elsewhere after we liberate your seat. But right now I believe I should go and make sure my dragons are settling down in their manger. Until tomorrow my lords."

With that she rose, and every lord there rose in turn bowing formally as she left the room. Lord Manderly too had stood up, and he smiled at his fellow lords. Daenerys might have started out with nearly all her power and influence coming from her marriage to Ranma, but now, now she had become a queen in truth, and Lord Manderly, for one, knew now that if they got through this winter, the future was bright indeed with her and Ranma at the helm of the nation. Although, getting through the winter is going to be our sternest test by far...

OOOOOO

Deciding to get the easier meeting over with first Merry had Eustace escort her and Eric to where Jaime was being kept in the basement of the castle. Staring through the bars she shook her head, rather bemused. She had thought that the loss of his dominant hand would have broken Jaime, but despite that and several months of captivity, her uncle didn't look much the worse for wear. He was standing in the center of his cell working out with a long piece of wood that one of the guards must have given him, working through several sword forms trying to get used to using his remaining hand as well as he had his dominant one.

He stopped as he caught sight of Merry, bowing sardonically. "You're looking well for a princess of a defunct dynasty, Myrcella."

"They see me as friend first, Baratheon second, and Lannister a distant third, so my looks don't count against me when it comes to Daenerys and Ranma, or indeed any of their men and lords." Merry replied dryly. "You're looking better than I expected uncle, I thought you would be either broken or angry yet you seem to be neither."

"I'm not truthfully. Oh, I was at first though, believe you me. I wanted to kill your 'friend' Ranma more than I wanted nearly anything before." Jaime replied with a shrug. "But since arriving in White Harbor most of the news has been about the White Walkers and their undead hordes. I know I'm to be sent to the Wall eventually, and if those are the kinds of threats I'll likely meet, well..."

Jaime shrugged his shoulders, his ever-present smirk on his face, but when he spoke he was deadly serious, perhaps for the first time ever in Merry's presence. "I've done a lot of things I'm not proud of in my life Merry, things that Arthur Dayne, Oswell Whent and Jonothor Darry would have struck me dead for. And a lot of things I am proud of, things they would never have done yet needed doing. But standing against such as that, that will definitely top the list. And maybe, just maybe wipe the slate clean so that when I die, my old brothers, my true brothers not the scum that replaced them in the white, will welcome me among their number. I mean to be at top form when I face them, whenever that may be."

Merry cocked her head staring at him thoughtfully. "I'm happy for you then and wish you luck. This will probably be the last time I see you uncle, so I wanted to say farewell. You weren't ever much of an uncle to me, but you at least were there for Tommy and I as we grew up, and I can't blame you for the acts of my mother or older brother. Your loyalties give you credit, even if the people you gave it to weren't worth it. I'm glad you found a cause that's actually worth your skill and I hope you find some measure of happiness in the future."

She laughed suddenly. "Especially since Tyrion is up there already with his new knightly order. I imagine the two of you will have a lot to talk about."

"I imagine we will!" Jaime laughed, and Merry turned to leave when his voice stopped her. "Myrcella, Merry, are you happy?" Merry turned to look at him and he went on. "I mean..." he faltered, seemingly at a loss for what he really wanted to say. "Are you happy with the way things are?"

Merry could tell that wasn't the question Jaime really wanted to ask, and she wondered if he wanted to tell her about her real parentage. After a moment's reflection she decided she didn't want to know. Either way that went it was nothing she was interested in now. So she simply nodded addressing the question he had it asked. "I am happy yes. I have a dream for the future, my healing halls and bettering my skills in that area, and as for my personal life..." she smiled. "That is as good as it's going to get."

Despite her rather tart words there was a happy light in her eyes, a gleam of a woman in love. Seeing it Jaime frowned but nodded. Despite the fact that he was her real father, he had never acted that way, even when he could act so as an uncle rather than a bodyguard. He'd simply never really cared for any of his three children, doing so was always Cersei's joy, not his. He always cared for Cersei and her alone, and now he realized how empty that made his life. One child of the three alive, one of the two whose character I could have grown to love and I can't do it, he thought morbidly. It would wreck her life, and what point would it serve, a base attempt to get her to acknowledge me, for what? Too late now, too late for everything.

After a moment Jaime simply nodded. "I'm glad you found a profession that you can be happy in I suppose. Stay safe Merry."

Merry simply nodded again and left without another word. She had one more stop to make before she could put the last of her past life behind her, and she was eager to be about it. Behind her Jaime stared after her for a time frowning and thinking of what might have been an old mistakes before shaking his head, and once more moving through his sword forms.

With the easier meeting over with, Merry followed Eustace through the castle up to a tall tower the only entrance of which was a single stairwell barred by a relatively new looking heavy door. There she found Arianne and the two men assigned to watch her, and she smiled thinly. "Are you ready to meet your charge, Arianne?"

The Dornish princess glared angrily at the stag who she knew wasn't one but words failed her. She had no friends left, no allies, no standing. Even the Sand Snakes, her own cousins, had told her to simply deal with it and then proceeded to distance themselves, getting on with their own tasks, with Dacey and Alayaya. She had made her bed, she brought a murderer and a psychopath into Westeros with a Dragon as his call, and it cost Dorne nearly all of its military strength and more than a few lords. Indeed because of her actions it would be all her brother could do to keep House Martell in power at all in Dorne, not that she knew it at the moment.

Without waiting for a reply Merry moved past Arianne, pushing the door open and leading the way up the staircase. At the top of the tower they found the suite where the former Queen had been ensconced. They also found the helper that Merry had assigned to the woman during her trip north, a northern man by the name of Robillard who had lost his arm at the elbow during the battle of Darry, one of the few casualties the rest of the army had taken in that battle. He was calm, conscientious and both elderly and happily married, so Merry had no fears that her comatose mother had been taken advantage of under his watch. At the time that had seemed much more important than it was now.

Her mother had not improved, she was still comatose. She could eat and her body was still working, but the mind behind her eyes was still not there. But thanks to the servant women here in the castle, at least she didn't look as bad as she had on the trip up, Robillard not being willing to try to bathe her or ask others to.

"There has been no change in her?" She asked.

"There've been a few moments where Cersei's woken up lady Merry, but they've been brief." said Robillard bowing deeply to her. "During those times she cried for you, for yer brothers, and her own brother a time or two." Once Cersei even cried out for her own mother, but that, Robillard would not share with Merry or anyone else. He had been the only one in the room to hear it, and that cry, that desperate, fearful, childlike cry, had struck him to the quick. For some reason sharing that with anyone seemed like an invasion of the once-powerful woman's privacy as bad as raping her would have been and he would not do it. "Yet most of the time she's been like this..."

Arianne was staring at the woman on the bed in mixed horror and fury. "Is, is taking care of this, this broken thing to be my fate?" She asked, anger in her voice but her face was trembling fit to break as she spoke. "Killing me would have been a kinder fate."

Merry whirled on her angrily. "I don't know why you're complaining, to my mind you and my mother have quite a bit in common! My mother broke Westeros for her son's sake, you broke it for vengeance! You brought back Viserys Targaryen, you made him a threat he could never have been on his own, and thousands paid for it in Duskenale, in Gulltown, in Dragonstone, in the battle of the Shadow's Fall and even on your own side! I think you two deserve one another."

The older woman made to reach forward Merry hands grasping angrily, but her two guards pulled on her chains holding her back.

"Remember, my mother's well-being is directly connected to yours." Merry went on staring Arianne in the eyes, her own eyes chips of unrelenting emerald. "If anything should happen under your watch, you will pay for it with your life."

With that Merry turned away visibly dismissing Arianne from her thoughts as she moved over to the bed leaning forward. She gently kissed Cersei's forehead, saying nothing. There was too much and too many emotions going through her right now to let her speak. She then stood up, staring at her mother for a few more moments before turning away exiting the room.

OOOOOO

Lord Leyton Hightower was an elderly man with a craggy face hidden by a bushy but well-trimmed and cared for beard which showed more than a hint of gray. Sharp, intelligent brown eyes deep set into his skull stared out at the world from above the beard, and wide shoulders fading under the weight of age. He wore good, expensive but above all comfortable clothing. He was a man who had lived long enough to not care what people thought of him and was secure in his own power, especially here in the center of his family's power.

He greeted Willas and Jon in Hightower's main hall, quickly ushering them, lady Margaery and their advisors into the drawing room where a meal had been placed around a table. Three men already waited them there, all three clad in the plate and tabards of warriors, though none of them had weapons at their sides for this meeting. "Please help yourself my Lords, we have much to talk about. And Lord Hand, may I present my son Garth, Ser Jon Fossoway of the Green Apple Fossoways and of course Garlan Tyrell."

Jon nodded, but quickly moved to the side when Willas moved forward, the two brothers exchanging a powerful hug before Margaery moved forward at just as quickly, throwing her arms around her brother. As the family reunion continued, including an exchange of news which included the deaths of Loras and their father, Jon moved over to the table, looking over at Lord Hightower who made a motion towards one carafe in particular.

Jon took it, poured a small amount into a goblet, sniffed and drank a sip. He nodded approval, but then set the goblet down firmly moving over to the table. They all had a lot to do, and being drunk would help no one. He looked over at the man who was inarguably the second most powerful lord in the Reach Lord, and smiled thinly. "So, how much work have you been able to do on the logistics side of things for the fleet?"

"That will depend on which direction you have decided to send the fleet my Lord Hand, as well as the size of the force." The older man replied smiling faintly. "We've gathered enough food, we think, to get your fleet to say Greenstone, but if you're going West, there's no place along the route you can be certain to be resupply until you get to Seagard."

"What of winter gear? Food is important on the voyage, but it won't matter if our men freeze before we even get to the battlefield."

"We prepared some 2040 coats gloves and hats all told, not enough for your full army of course, but..." Leyton shrugged his shoulders. "How many men are we actually sending?"

"That remains to be seen. In the North your horsemen won't be worth anything. By this point the snow is deep on the ground, and the cold will kill most of your southern horses quickly."

"I'd disagree on that, but I haven't seen a true winter, and it's true that horses take more fodder than men" Willas said with a shrug, sitting next to Jon as Margaery and Garlan made their way over behind him. "I've also heard that much of the North is covered by forest or rocky terrain, and in that kind of environment horses are more of a hindrance than an aid."

"Exactly." Jon replied with a nod. "Especially in the area of the North where we're going."

"I take it by that you've decided on your direction." Margaery asked, sitting down next to him on his other side with a salad on her plate, a sharp contrast to the heavy meats and cuts of fowl that the men had on their own. She did however steal several such cuts from her brother Garlan, who sat across from them, staring at Jon thoughtfully.

"First, Garlan I'd like you to tell us about the campaign against the Ironborn. More importantly, do you have any idea where the Ironborn ships which should've been defending the Shield Islands went? And, how much damage did they do?"

Garlan nodded, looking at Jon Fossoway, who had arrived in the city only a few days before the force under Willas and who was just as interested in Garlan's campaign. He took a long from his wine glass before putting it down. "We set off from here with around..."

"And so we returned here, receiving word from a patrol boat out from Oldtown that we were to come in to meet with you and Willas. I have to say that Archmaester Martyn isn't pleased with the wait, though he understood when it was explained to them. He would like to talk to you by the way." Garlan concluded.

Everyone's plates had been cleared by this point and while Garth and the others had all been dismissed, Margaery, Leyton, Jon, Willas, and Garlan sat around the small fireplace. Lord Hightower and Garlan held small snifters, while Margaery, Jon and Willas both sipped from their wine glasses.

"I would like to speak to him as well, in fact I would love to have the time to go to the Citadel and talk to all the Archmaesters there. But frankly we don't have time, and I'm afraid if I do head to the Citadel, I'm likely to be embroiled in some of their politicking. Or at least so lady Margaery has so advised me."

"Lady Margaery is most wise," Leyton smiled thinly. "The Council of the Citadel plays its games with far more energy and vigor than many lords ever realize. I think they're still debating what to decide to do about the coming of the dragons and magic, but I'm getting a distinct impression that they might stick their heads in the sand and try to ignore it frankly."

"In that case I should definitely speak to them." Jon said smiling thinly. "Myself and Ghost will convince them otherwise."

"More importantly," Garlan said looking at him, his gaze direct. "Which direction are we going to go, and how many men are we taking? There have been some rumblings from many of my own men they wish to head home, especially the levy forces. They need to get out into the fields to help their fellows bring in the last harvest before winter closes in. Whatever the Seven's power, it still takes men and their hands to bring in the harvest."

Jon nodded crisply. "Agreed, any levy forces are to be sent home immediately, with full pay of course, and provisions to see them home."

"Oh?" Lord Hightower said leaning forward and with one eyebrow raised. "And where exactly will this pay be coming from, and how much are we talking about?"

"From you for now Lord Hightower, and the pay is to be two silver stags for every day they spent under arms, minus the cost of any equipment." As Leyton began to cough on the spirits in his snifter Jon went on. "I will write out a letter of credit in the name of the king that it will be paid back once we are certain the roads between here and the Golden Tooth are free of bandit activity."

"So it's true then you did take the Golden Tooth." Leyton, chuckled quietly, leaning back. So long as the young Hand wasn't intending to simply force him to pay out of the goodness of his heart he had no issue with the idea of paying the smallfolk forming the core of the levy forces, though it would cut into his family's liquid capital.

"Yes we did, not, admittedly my most favorite memory." Jon shuddered a little and the three men looked at him quizzically while Margaery chuckled. She knew that Jon was 'wary' of heights and had actually breathed a sigh of relief that the room they were meeting in didn't have any windows. Given the height of Hightower which was one of the wonders of the known world, that was definitely a good thing in Jon's opinion.

Waving aside their interest Jon went on. "Garlan, let's talk about the composition of the force we should take further, and the way the Houses under you preformed, or didn't as the case may be. House Mullendore and House Cuy in particular..."

Garlan nodded and the two began a discussion on that point, while Willas engaged Hightower in a talk about the various logistical aspects of the journey. It turned out that the levy forces of those houses had been badly hit in the battle against Balon's forces at sea, but they had served him well. The other two houses, besides Hightower whose men had served under Garlan however, Blackbar and Bulwer, had performed admirably from the get-go.

"If we send your levy forces home along with your cavalry, how much will that leave us. And Lord Leyton, could we see a map of the Reach?" Jon asked.

Leyton nodded and waved his hand to a servant. The man quickly moved over pulling out a large, detailed map from a wide drawer while Leyton and Willas moved over to join the discussion, along with Margaery. "Loyalty needs to be rewarded, and incompetence or arrogance punished..."

"Are we talking about House Florent now?" Margaery asked archly, causing the men to laugh. "But you're right Jon, and in this case it is easy enough. House Mullendore's military strength is gone, their lord, heir and cousins dead. Lady Mullendore is a... a former Crane I think, but there's no way she can hold Uplands and the lands of the House. I would recommend we send a knight, whoever you and Garlan suggest brother, to take over the running of the House for now. But the House itself should be removed from the Great House status, and made into a House minor."

"Agreed, and I know just the man. Ser Hugh Blackbar, a cousin of that house. An older man, he served with distinction in both the battle of Oldflowers and again against Balon. But he was injured badly in that battle, and his strength is not what it was. This would be a fine way to reward him." Garlan said enthusiastically, looking at Jon.

Jon laughed. "These are your people my lords, I will not argue. Very well that was simple enough, the lands of the House will be divided in half, half falling under Hightower control, as part of your recompense for your loyalty."

Leyton's eyes widened, but Willas and Margaery merely nodded. Hightower was powerful already, adding that land, all decent farmland but nothing special, wouldn't matter in the long run. Especially since House Tyrell's own land had grown so much itself.

"House Cuy I think is in the same position as Mullendore, correct?" Jon asked, and Jon and her brothers all nodded. Like Martyn Mullendore, Branston Cuy had handed their levy forces over to Garlan before leading their trained armsmen and knights north to join Renly, only to die under one Baratheon or the other. "But Sunflower Hall's position makes it important, and an interesting strategic position not only for us, but for the new Duchy of the Passes."

At that Garlan cocked his head quizzically, and Willas cut in to tell him and Leyton the plans there. Both were astonished at the idea, but after a few moments understood the why of it, as well as why the Royal House had no worries about instigating another time of many kings. The Royal pikes and the training which had produced the Wolfsworn and to a lesser extent Edric Dayne and even Patrek, was a very big stick indeed. That was not even considering the fierce, passionate loyalty Ranma and Daenerys had been able to invoke in their subjects, lords and smallfolk alike.

When Jon spoke again however, Garlan smiled widely. "I think that because of that, and the fact it is on the sea as it is, it should be gifted to Desmond Redwyne."

"An excellent idea! I think that Desmera will do well enough as lady Redwyne, so long as someone else can handle the military side of things, and she has someone helping her with the numbers aspect of rebuilding the Arbor. But Desmond showed true grit, intelligence and loyalty from the beginning of this war, and truly deserves to be rewarded for it above what he could expect as a cousin of the main Redwyne line." Garlan enthused. "And of course taking Sunflower Hall might be hard, which will give my cavalry and the Redwyne forces with us here in Oldtown something to do while the rest of us head north."

The meeting went on from there, as Willas and Leyton, under Jon's direction began to redraw the borders of the Great Houses around Oldtown. Blackbar and Bulwer were formally given Great House status, removing them from being under Hightower's control, though Beesbury and Honeyholt were gifted to Gunthor Hightower for his role in the war effort, and that house removed from the rolls of Great Houses, placed under Hightower as Mullendore remained. So despite losing the taxes those two houses, along with Cuy, would have paid into his house's coffers, Leyton was well-pleased by what they had gained instead.

With that discussion done, Jon and Garlan got to grips with the force that would be sent north. Garlan would remain behind in Oldtown with Willas to provide another proven field commander to his brother, just in case. Garth, the older of the Hightower brothers, would travel north with Vigilance, the House's Valyrian sword, and their men.

The total force sent would be a little over 5,100 men, coming from Tyrell, Bulwer, and Blackbar for the most part, with a bit under a thousand pulled from Florent and Peake, though they would not include any of the lords or knights of those houses. Jon and Willas wanted to remove some of the men from Lord Florent and Peake, hoping that would curtail any trouble from that quarter in the future.

That this would leave Willas and Garlan with more than enough men to smash any lord with delusions of grandeur were not lost on any of them. Especially after Margaery, in a clear, concise tone, enunciated the lords who might cause trouble in the future given their losses in the war, inclination, or, as she put it 'gross stupidity'. That Florent and Peake fell into two out of three of those categories was a given.

Instead of providing men Hightower would provide supplies, including both new weapons and shields, not just food or winter apparel. After Jon explained this, Leyton frowned. "Those men already carry weapons my Lord Hand. Why do you then talk about new weapons being supplied by my city?"

"I've been thinking about this for a while, and I've decided that the spear phalanx or pike regiment tactics isn't going to work against wights as well as it does against humans. Yes the pike does a lot of damage, but wights don't feel pain, so killing blows to them are meaningless save with dragonglass. So instead, we should think about maiming them." Jon stood up, moving towards the door "I'll be right back."

As the door closed behind Jon, Leyton turned to look at Willas and Margaery. "I am impressed, I didn't expect to be, but he's a most intelligent young man despite his northern upbringing. He listens, he's insightful and quick, as well as very dangerous. I thought he had been given the status as Hand simply so the new king wouldn't need to appoint anyone whose loyalty he was not utterly certain of to the post, but now..."

"You should meet his brother sometime, the two of them are so alike in many ways it's almost scary." Margaery laughed, cuddling under her brother Willas' arm on the couch the two of them were sharing. "He even impressed my grandmother, and you know how hard that can be."

A moment later Jon returned, holding in one hand a pike, and in the other another kind of polearm. Garlan and Willas looked at it shrewdly, noting that the blade made for half the length of the entire weapon, and that the blade was curved slightly and sharp on both edges. The length of the pole itself was about six feet rather than the fifteen feet of the pike. "The overall weight looks to be similar to a pike," Garlan murmured, moving to take the blade.

Jon handed it over equably then moved over into a clear space. "A normal pike is thrust forward like so," he said demonstrating with the pike he still held. "This causes tremendous wounds of course, and can kill or maim even through plate given enough strength behind the thrust."

Margaery giggled suddenly, and Jon realized what he had said. Both of the girl's brothers looked at her askance, and Garlan shook his head while Leyton looked astonished and appalled. "You still haven't grown out of that dirty little mind of yours, have you sister?"

"Nope." Margaery said with a chuckle. "Not even a little."

"If I could have your attention over here." Jon said, his face a little red at the smirk Margaery was giving him. "As I was saying, that's fine for living opponents, but wights don't feel pain, and can keep coming regardless of wounds like that. Indeed, from what Dacey told me even Dragonglass can only put them down if they take out the heart or brain."

Garlan turned back from looking at his sister, hefting up the other polearm that Jon had brought in. "This looks more for slashing attack, is that so?"

"Garlan has the right of it." Jon said, exchanging pole arms with the slightly older man. Instead of thrusting as he did with pike, Jon brought this polearm down in a slash. "Again, this can cause tremendous wounds but the main objective is to cripple by taking off arms or hacking off legs."

Lord Hightower looked over at Margaery, expecting to see the girl looking a little pale at the rather bland explanation of the weapon's purpose, but she was simply looking on interestedly. Next to her Willas frowned thoughtfully tapping one finger against his lips. "How do you see this playing out in a mass attack?"

"The front line will be divided into two groups, spaced one to one in the formation. One group will hold shields, large tower shields big enough to cover themselves and the person directly to their right. That person will in turn wield a glaive like this. It won't be perfect especially given the time we have to train the men, and we'll be doing most of that training on the ships, but it should be easier to learn than the pike anyway."

"How many of these do you think your city could make in around two weeks milord?" He asked Leyton.

Hightower frowned then moved over to a small desk to ring a bell. Moments later a servant man appeared, and Willas and Lord Hightower talked to the man quickly. "I'll have a blacksmith here momentarily I don't know enough about the art myself to give you an answer."

Jon nodded then went on, moving over to the table where Willas and Leyton had been working earlier. "The next question is tents, and braziers, you cannot understand how important it will be to keep warm at night on the march."

"You still haven't told us which direction you'll go. And you're planning this out is if you don't expect us to stop for dragonglass." Garlan objected.

"We're going west." Jon replied bluntly. "You have heard about the miracles occurring here in the Reach which are credited to the Seven? I tell you now that they are not the only gods who have risen to fight the White Walkers. In front of the Three Singers in Highgarden I received a vision. That vision told me that I personally need to be on Bear Island or the island will fall, and with it the western defense of the North and eventually the Wall."

"I can't bring it to mind." Garlan muttered looking over at Lord Hightower who shook his head.

Leyton shook his head. "I'm afraid I don't have any map of the North that I would rely upon. I have one which shows the coastlines of course, but not in enough detail to matter."

"My map is up here." Jon laughed, tapping his forehead. "If the White Walkers can take Bear Island, they can move against Deepwood Motte, a small town set on the shores of the Bay of Ice. Worse, they'll be able to march inland into the Wolfswood and up into the mountains. The Wolfswood is..." he paused trying to think of the words that would get across the true impact of that woodland. "Ancient, immense, deep. No army could move through it with any kind of organization no matter how well trained or led, and even making camp would take hours at best, be impossible at worst for an army of any size. In that kind of environment it'll come down to individual skill and weapons. Worse, it might force us to fall back out of the Wolfswood to try and defend its borders, and given the size of it, that's impossible."

"All good solid strategic reasons my Lord, but without Dragonglass, we have nothing that can kill the White Walkers." Willas objected.

"Fire, Valerian steel, Ghost, Nymeria, myself, Arya, and anyone wielding a Valyrian blade," Jon said, listing the people on his fingers.

Garlan sat back down, frowning thoughtfully. "We don't have many Valyrian blades you know, they don't exactly grow on trees even here in the Reach. Indeed throughout the Reach I don't think there are more than ten of them. Other than House Tarly's and Hightower's blade, the other three are all with the army your brother apparently smashed."

"As I said, there is myself and Arya when she arrives. Besides, I don't think it's ever been proven that regular weapons can't kill White Walkers if you get in a killing blow that ignores their armor. It will be costly, but more costly than trying to fight them in the Wolfswood, no."

Garlan tried another tack. "Surely the North has enough resources left to send to Bear Island itself?"

"Again the Wolfswood blocks most of the Northern forces from getting there easily, and we haven't heard anything recently from the North at all. Certainly they wouldn't be able to send dragonglass to the Island before this, and the mainland probably is facing its own issues."

"But surely that's another indication that we should go the other way and pick up dragonglass weapons." Garlan objected.

"There is another consideration here to think about." Lord Hightower broke in reluctantly. "Braziers and tents. Braziers will call upon my blacksmiths' time and skill, just like your glaives will. We might be able to meet one area of demand, but not the other. The same issue faces us when talking about clothing and tents."

"And Seagard isn't that large a town, it could maybe make braziers for us but tents? As far as I know it doesn't have that larger a tanning industry does it?" Garlan asked.

"It doesn't, but Lannisport does." Jon said, smiling thinly. "Could you gather enough food to get the fleet to Lannisport in two weeks Lord Hightower?"

"Yes I believe so..." Leyton said, looking at Jon shrewdly.

"You would trust the Lannisters?" Willas asked, not condemning just questioning, though his brother was looking rather angry at the very idea.

"We're not trusting them, we're not asking them for men, but for goods." Margaery said thoughtfully. "I'm uncertain that we should trust any food Lannisport could give us, but tents are easy enough to check the quality of, as is clothing and braziers."

"Have any of you ever met Kevan Lannister?" Jon asked.

"I met him once at a tournament at the Rock." Garlan said musingly. "He is an intelligent man who likes to work in the background. He never pushed himself forward, but I think he'll be an effective ruler for the Rock and Lannisport. If you're asking if he's trustworthy I think he is so long as he remembers that Westerland's no longer has an army, and has no desire to seek vengeance in a way that could bring on more pain for his family."

"We have two of his sons as captives along with Daven Lannister in Riverrun, I think that is enough of an incentive."

"I liked Daven." Garlan said suddenly looking over at Jon. "He was a decent enough blade, and wasn't anywhere near as arrogant as most Lannisters. He was arrogant of course, most lords are, but not so unthinking or cold."

Jon shrugged. "He acquitted himself honorably in the Riverlands and has been treated as such, but he's still a hostage, at least for now. Right now however, let's talk with your smithy expert Lord Hightower, that'll give us an idea of the numbers we need, then we'll talk about the number of ships we can afford to send, and what else we might need House Redwyne's naval power for..."

As the four men put their heads together, Margaery leaned back. She didn't have much of a head for numbers, and so had little to offer to this portion of the discussion. So instead, she thought, and wondered, and made her own plans.

It turned out that Lord Hightower's initial impression was correct, Oldtown could produce enough glaives for the infantry portion of the army, or enough braziers. If they tried to concentrate on both, even if they used simple iron for the braziers, it would cut dramatically into the numbers they could produce. The tower shields too would take time to build up in sufficient numbers, and their rims too would take time away from the blacksmith's other tasks. And the tanners and clothing merchants couldn't supply both winter clothing and tents in sufficient quantities before Jon's deadline. Indeed, even the raw resources needed for all these tasks became a bottleneck.

With that in mind Jon asked Lord Hightower to concentrate on the weapons rather than the braziers, and wrote out a message for Lannisport and Riverrun, which would send it on to Seagard. Lannisport would be able to supply the brazier's and the tents Oldtown could not, and Seagard could make up the numbers in terms of their shields and arrowheads.

Seven ships would be left behind to guard the Shield Islands, with seven more to guard the Straits into Oldtown. Five others were sent down to 'show the banners' in Dorne then head further north to start shipping up dragonglass to White Harbor with Saan. Further, Jon extended his promissory note to Lord Hightower to begin building more six ships, which would join those five in transporting dragonglass up to White Harbor.

Several days later Edric, Arya, and their men arrived at the city's wharfs having taken a ship from Starfall. They were immediately ushered through the city and up to the massive Hightower, where they found Jon and the others. Jon got to his feet, moving over and pulling his younger sister into a hug smiling and waving a raven message. "We received a new message from Riverrun. They passed it down to here from Highgarden, and it details Ranna and Daenerys' victory. They're calling it the Battle of the Shadow's Fall! It makes for some interesting reading, especially since there was another enemy, an army called the Golden Company, we didn't even expect."

Arya quickly grabbed the note out of his hand, rushing over to a chair and plopping herself into it without another word. Jon laughed, and turned to Edric. "And how went to your own mission?"

Without a word Edric pulled out Dawn, holding it up in both of his hands one hand underneath the blade. "Dawn." He said simply. "I am now the Sword of Morning."

Jon chuckled and nodded. "Good, we might need you and that sword on Bear Island when we get there."

OOOOOO

"My Lord, I can't find lady Margaery, do you know where she is?" Asked Domic Wythers.

Willas looked up from where he and Lord Hightower were going over the numbers for the construction yards. Simple affairs in comparison to war galleys, galleons still cost quite a bit, almost as much as the rest of the work that had been put into providing for the army sent north that morning. "I have no idea where my sister could be, she finished a write up on Lord Peake for me yesterday, and left it on my desk. Why, did you need her for something?"

"We were supposed to return to Highgarden today as soon as the fleet left, your grandmother was most specific, my lord, so I..."

Willas turned a little frosty. "Really, and what if I had told you I needed my sister's aid here?" The man stuttered a little, and Willas went in for the kill. "Understand me Ser, I am Lord Paramount of the Reach and Lord Tyrell. I rule my House, not my grandmother. Any orders that do not come from me should at the very least be brought to my attention. Do I make myself clear?"

The man stuttered and Willas nodded. "Now, find a few of the others knights, and search my sister. If she is not found anywhere in the Castle, then feel free to barge in on me again, understood?"

The man nodded quickly and left, and Lord Hightower looked at Willas. "You do a very good Tywin impression my Lord."

"Thank you," Willas said with a nod, then he began to laugh. Lord Hightower looked at him in surprise, and Willas tried to compose his features only succeeding after several moments. He held his hand to his face, moaning dramatically. "Oh no, my sister is missing oh no, whatever will I do. Just as the fleet carrying Jon and the army departed too. But I suppose that's just a coincidence..."

"You think she hid away on one of the ships?" Lord Hightower asked in surprise. Then he frowned. That could be dangerous they are going into a war zone after all, and sailors are not the most controlled bunch at the best of times."

"My sister has that wild wolf girl to look after her, and Jon as well. I doubt anything will happen to her, though my grandmother and mother will both probably be put out about it."

Lord Hightower shook his head. "She was always a willful girl, but I didn't think she was so precipitous, to go haring off like that. I pity the man who'll have to put up with her."

"Jon at least has some practice in that area." Willas replied then burst into laughter again.

OOOOOO

The White Walker commander of the army marching on Hornwood was a wily man, and older for his race than most sent on the expedition to Skagos. He was one who had first looked askance at the very idea of sending an iceberg out to sea but since Skagos fell he'd become a believer, and had begun to modify his own tactics. With no news coming from Winterfell, he knew that the assault on their Old Enemy had failed, and Hornwood and the ancient keep of the giant lovers would be reinforced quickly.

When one of his small patrols and the wights it could gather did not report back, the man knew that the Old Enemy would be coming after him and planned accordingly. He sent several thousand wights to invest Hornwood, more to keep the defenders inside than anything else, along with several White Walkers from his own band, a force 200 strong. Then the rest of the army kept marching determined to catch the force under the Old Enemy out in the woods where his men's better individual abilities would come into play. Above the army, flew the one dragon they still had.

OOOOOO

While the White Walkers came with winter and could in some small fashion control the temperature around their influence, they did not control the full power of it. No one could control the seasons like that, not even the gods.

Winter passed through the Neck heading south bringing far colder temperatures, sleet and even snow. Harvests ended in the Riverlands and in the Vale, which was already having issues.

The Vale mountain clans, having grown bold in recent years, now were forced down into the lowlands in ever greater numbers. Despite the war now going against them thanks to the forces under Silas attacking one mountain clan after another, they were a growing problem, along with the weather itself.

But that wasn't the only sign of winter, others could be seen floating in the ocean. Watching one such near the last of the fingers Salladhor Saan frowned. And when he spoke, he voiced the thought of thousands, millions spread out around Westeros. "Even if you don't count the undead and their masters, this winter is going to be truly foul."

OOOOOO

Rickard and those with him would have possibly responded to that phrase rather coarsely considering that while winter was still extending its grip elsewhere, here in the Narrow sea between the Bite and the Bay of Seals, it had already clenched its fists around the land and ocean. Floating ice was everywhere in large quantities, and the winds and waves were tumultuous at the best of times. They had lost two ships outright and three more had been forced to turn back with damages before they reached Ramsgate.

Transferring the men two of them carried, the last having been a war galley out of White Harbor, had been a nightmare, costing hundreds of lives. Luckily of the two ships that had sunk, only one had been a transport strip. Yet even so 500 plus men going down in a nighttime squall was a bad blow to morale, made worse by the ships which had been forced to turn around. In all the expedition had lost a little over eight hundred and forty men, leaving them with a little over 3000, mostly Karstark and Riverlands men.

Their destination, Ramsgate, was somewhat like Karhold, only smaller. It had a small dock at the back leading out onto the Broken Branch river, with a small two-story tall wall around a central keep, which was circular in nature and only about six stories tall. Across from the castle along the river was another tower guarding the other side of the river, but that tower had fallen into disrepair over the centuries. The men of House Woolfield had tried their best to put it back into working order since the war began, but their best hadn't done much.

Lord Woolfield was a short man coming up only to Rickard's chest, but he was wide across the shoulders, and had a sort of ram-like approach to life in general, yet in many ways more resembled a dew than a ram. "I can spare some 600 men," he said to Rickard bluntly. "And I'll give you two-thirds of our store of dragonglass weapons but I and the rest of my House will remain here."

He shook his head sadly. "We've lost several minor Houses. Too many of my folk refused to evacuate their homes, only those closest to my seat were willing to do so really. But we've got too many people here, we're too good a target if we just let you take all of my fighting men."

Rickard shrugged. "So long as those men of yours know the lay of the land between here and Widow's Watch, I don't care. What about food?"

"None to spare. We can give you a few deer, a few loaves of bread but that's about it. Like I said, we've got a lot of mouths to feed here."

Rickard walked off looking over at Daryn who shook his head. "A lot of mouths to feed is a matter of perspective I suppose. I guess they've got around eight or nine hundred smallfolk, including women and children here, plus the House's own population. I'd bet Hornwood has double that or more. Roger and Hathan are checking the stores now, we'll see if we can convince Lord Woolfield to be a slightly more honest with us if need be."

That was in fact the case the man had badly exaggerated how low on food they were, nor were they actually in a siege situation just yet either, which allowed the hunters to keep bringing in food. Using both of those facts Rickard browbeat the man into giving him several horse-loads worth of food, mostly salted meat and bread, simple fare which would last for a long while. With that and the supplies they had brought with them, Rickard and his men marched out.

Luckily, Gustav Woolfield was made from a different cloth than his uncle. The head of the scouts which had been seconded to the army was a middle-aged but still vigorous man, a widower who had recently lost his wife to a cold. He understood his duty and was aggressive and the pursuit of it.

Looking around at Rickard and the Wolfsworn, Gustav gestured at a map of the area. This map wasn't quite as good as House Stark, Manderly or Cerwyn could produce of their own lands, but it was decent enough. He placed small pebbles here and there around the map saying, "These are the places where we have seen or heard of White Walkers attacking, mostly wights up to this point." He pointed to five stones in particular. "My uncle probably told you we've lost several minor Houses, and he's right about that, in fact we've lost all of them to our north and northwest. Keeps and holdfasts can only slow the wights, they can't stop them."

"How large a force do you think we're dealing with?" Smalljon asked.

"Depends on what you're talking about. Thousands of wights at least but there's been no sight of the White Walkers." Gustav said with a shrug. "As to where, I think they've moved west. They took these Houses going that way anyway, here, here and there." he said drawing a very crooked line, but one that led westward along the isthmus point towards Widow's Watch.

Rickard scowled. "House Flint of Widow's Watch might not be the most powerful Great House, but it's still a Great House, and one that didn't commit any forces to the war in the south. Why would they attack such a strong position?"

"That I don't know, but if I had to guess I'd say it's because House Flint did a lot better at the job than my own house did in forcing its people to pull back to the castle. Think of all those people there, if they can get inside its might double or even triple their numbers."

"Widow's Watch doesn't have that good a defense either," Daryn said, frowning. "I've been there, it was a good, solid castle when it was built, but it's rather run down in several areas these days. I don't think it could withstand a long siege. It also can't be supplied by sea, since it sits on top of a bluff."

With the sea the way it is we couldn't supply them from the ocean anyway." Theon said shaking his head. "Frankly I'm astonished we didn't lose more ships than we did."

"That brings up an interesting question." Roger said thoughtfully. "Will we even be able to attack Skagos if we push the White Walkers back that far?"

"The Bay of Ice has probably already frozen solid. Moving over it won't be easy, but we could do it, there's a trick to moving over ice like that." Rickard said frowning. "But we'll cross that bridge when we have to, right now there's a force of White Walkers out there, and I mean to destroy it."

The Wolfsworn all smiled, showing their teeth and nodded as one.

While White Walkers could move quickly, wights, while of course not needing to stop to eat, drink, shit or sleep, didn't move very quickly as a large group. They just weren't maneuverable enough to move through heavy snow quickly, and their passage tamped it down just as much as any human army.

The force of the Royal Army however had marched and fought for months now, and had gotten very good at it. Even without Merry and Ranma around to organize their camps, Rickard and the others were easily up to the task of organizing them. Every man carried either a small brazier, a tent, or food, and they marched from right before dawn to evening before throwing up simple earthworks around their camp. So unlike the Valemen, they made excellent time.

But they could not catch up to the force of wights marching on Widow's Watch since that army was marching away from them, forcing them into a chase. Marching after them, they came upon several holdfasts which had been either deserted or taken, their people wiped out. Searching these ruins augmented the army's own stores slightly, though Rickard and the Wolfsworn were quick to point out that at the moment any riches would have to be carried by the people who purloined them. That stopped any looting in its tracks, and the march quickly continued.

Daryn and the rest of the Wolfsworn moved out in front of the army, racing along both before and to the sides of the army's route of march to find and hopefully trigger any ambushes before the rest of the army arrived. They didn't run into anything however, but they did spot some signs of the White Walkers and their wights passing by.

Rickard looked up spotting Roger waiting in sight of where he led the army. It wasn't long Rickard was beside the younger man and he looked at him quizzically. "I thought Daryn was the one who normally stopped by."

"Daryn and I found something out there, he's busy burying it."

"What did you find?" Rickard asked cautiously.

"Evidence that the White Walkers don't want to just kill us, they want to take their time about it." Roger's voice could've been made of beaten metal, and his face behind the beard was set in a rictus snarl. "They don't have any place for babies or children too young to be of use in their armies."

"Children..." Rickard said slowly "they use children in their armies?"

"Above a certain age, possibly. We came upon a farmstead, it looked pretty well designed, a decent enough place built on top of a tiny hill. But it didn't save the people there, and a babe and two young children were there. If the White Walkers can't turn you into something useful for them, they... play with you."

Rickard's jaw clenched imagining the twelve or so children who worked or lived in Karhold, thankful that almost all of his people including the servants had gotten out. "We will avenge them." He said simply.

"Oh yes," Roger nodded, slowly, calmly the calm before a storm. "That I can promise."

Four days later the scattered forest and farmsteads began to give way to rocky clearings, too rocky for horses to live on, but there were still a few scattered farms here and there. Covered in snow now of course, as all the land was. Despite it being clearer now, thanks to the snow it was actually tougher going. But here the White Walkers and their wights had done the humans a favor, beating down a path in the snow they could use to follow the undead horde.

Even so, Rickard knew they were coming within another day or so march of Widow's Watch, and wasn't about to trust to the trail of the wights to tell them where they were. He ordered the army to rest, sending the Wolfsworn further out to find the White Walkers.

He had just sat down to dinner when Daryn ran into the camp, skidding in the snow and frozen mud of the ground of the camp. "We found them," He said quickly.

Kneeling down next to the fiery pot Daryn poured himself some of the stew nodding his head respectfully towards Rickard who nodded back, handing over some utensils quickly. "Where away?"

"They might be within a half days march of Widow's Watch, maybe the same for us if we double time it."

Rickard frowned thoughtfully. "Tell me, have you seen any sign that the White Walkers have killed or turned any of the animals? Theon said something about that, didn't he?"

"He did, but we haven't seen any sign that they've continued that trend. I, I don't think this is the army that took Karhold, at least not all of it."

Rickard frowned. He wasn't the strategist that Ranma was, or even the tactician. He had never led a full army like this, portions certainly and done it well but planning out an entire battle was something he had never had to do except for in the Saltpans, which was rather an easy one. Yet he was not afraid to ask advice. "What do you think we should do?"

Daryn smiled a wolfish expression on his face. "I think the White Walkers need a lesson in always looking around them rather than concentrating on one target. What I suggest we do is march through the night, then rest without cook fires and when they attack Widow's Watch, attack them in turn from behind. We'll pin them in place against the walls of the castle, and wipe them out."

"Get the rest of the Wolfsworn here," Rickard said after a moment. "I want their opinions."

The sun was starting to go down by the time the Wolfsworn returned to the army. By the time they did arrive however, the Army had thrown up its normal defenses, and every man had gotten some hot food inside of them. Rickard wanted all of his men to have a good meal if they were going into battle tomorrow.

When the Wolfsworn assembled Rickard began to outline the plan. "Daryn has a suggestion, and I think it's a workable, but I want your opinions."

After he finished Roger shook his head as did Hathan while Theon simply looked irritated. "It'd be a good plan, if our men could charge through snow as they can down the cleared trail the White Walkers left. They can't. Sorry Daryn, but the idea of enveloping them like that isn't going to work. Not unless House Flint's kept the snow off the ground somehow in a wide area around its castle anyway.

"In this kind of terrain, with the amount of snow on the ground we just have to charge into them." Hathan said with a shrug. He and Roger were the best trained cavalymen among them, and had been most irritated by the need to leave their horses behind when coming on this expedition, the calculation being one horse for six men in terms of room and eight in terms of space for food making them too expensive. "I think we might have a numbers advantage against this force, I say we use it."

After a moment Rickard nodded. "Very well, I've already given orders for the army to rest. We'll rest for several turns of the glass, then march through the night, camp closer to the Widow's Watch and then fall upon the White Walkers as they attack the castle. That's the best plan we're going to make."

"Prior planning might prevent poor performance, but trying to plan ahead can often times lead to indecision." Theon said, mangling together two phrases that Ranma had said occasionally. "Let's get it stuck in, wipe these bastards out and move on."

The first part of the plan such as it was worked well enough. The White Walkers had no scouts out behind them or even to their sides, intent on attacking and taking Widow's Watch and turning every human in it into their thralls. The army was therefore able to march through the night unmolested, camping within three leagues of Widow's Watch.

In the distance the Army could hear the attack began, but Rickard was not about to order their own attack until the morning. He instinctively felt that attacking the White Walkers out in the open at night was a recipe for disaster and so long as the White Walkers could not bring a dragon against the castle, it should stand for at least a day or so.

The next morning commanders and sub-commanders relayed orders through gestures and low hisses as men prepared for battle. The Stark Pike-now spear regiment formed up in the center of the formation, with the men of House Karstark to either side, and the archers and scouts forming up behind them. In front of this force Theon and the rest of the Wolfsworn moved forward rapidly.

Rickard a given them specific orders: get in close unseen, and take out the White Walkers before retreating. All of them held Valyrian blades, even Theon had a Valyrian dagger, a stiletto about eight inches long with a wickedly sharp point that Roger had picked up for him.

Once they came within sight of Widow's Watch they spread out, with Theon going down to one knee and pulling out his bow fitting a dragonglass tipped arrow to it as he stared at the castle. The White Walkers were throwing their wights against the castle walls indiscriminately. He watched as dozens possibly more than 100 siege ladders being carried forward by those wights. The White Walkers however were well back of their army, spread out in a line, firing up at the castle occasionally, but not hitting anything. They think themselves safe out of bow range, and they might be from though Castle, but damn sure not from me.

Daryn and the rest of the Wolfsworn however couldn't get close. As they had feared, outside of the direct route the wights had trampled down, the snow was too thick on the ground to allow for a fast passage. Worse it would make their movements too loud.

Quickly realizing this, they moved in front of Theon. "No chance of subtlety working here, we'll just have to charge!" Roger actually sounded happy as he lifted his Valyrian longsword, which he had named Sunset.

Theon nodded. Hathan wasn't looking forward to this, much preferring to fight on horse. Still, it wasn't the first or even fifth time he'd have to go into battle on his own two hooves. He lifted the longsword he had been given from the treasures taken from the Golden Company, which he had named Oathkeeper.

"As soon as they spot you, I can have arrows in the air." Theon said, still staring down the length of his arrow at the distant targets. "But a lot of them are archers too, and I told you what those arrowheads could do."

"Well, Ranma dodged arrows sometimes, how hard can it be?" Daryn asked, smiling weakly. Yet even so he too held up his own Valyrian blade, Woodhart.

Smalljon grinned cracking his neck and hefting up the Giant Cleaver, a Valyrian claymore he had taken from among the wreckage of the Golden Company's elephant charge. "Did you decide on a name for that little prick of yours Theon?"

"Iron Thrust." Theon said, smirking evilly but not looking away from his targets. "Heh, innuendo, boast and threat all in one."

"No." Said all the others around him, shaking their heads, but it was Daryn who spoke up. "Just no, even Valyrian daggers need better names than that. How about Archer's Kiss?"

"Feh, sounds too feminine for my tastes. We can talk about this later I suppose, but right now boys, we've got a battle to win."

With a final nod at their friend the others moved off, each went slapping Theon on the shoulder as they went. Even Smalljon gripped Theon's shoulder once before joining the others, their differences forgotten.

Between one step and the next the Wolfsworn charged. Giving up any pretense of trying to sneak up on the White Walkers they raced forward covering the distance between them, 50 yards or so, in seconds.

Even so the White Walkers heard them coming through the mud and frozen ground and turned. The first two to race bows to shoulders died swiftly. One of Theon's dragonglass tipped arrows took one through an eyeball. The second died from an arrow slamming into and through his chest plate.

For a moment the White Walkers were torn by indecision, most of them going for their swords, while a few fell back away from this unexpected assault lifting up their bows and arrows. Those men died, Theon cutting them down with a speed and accuracy that was astonishing.

Daryn it was the first to reach them, his lizard lion armor, like that of Edd, Ranma, and Jon, lighter than even the chain mail the others wore. "Righteous in wrath!" He howled, bringing his sword up and around smashing a White Walker blade so hard the man lost his grip on it, and could only stare in stupefaction as Daryn's return blow caught him in the neck severing his head and sending it flying through the air in the spray of yellow blood.

Then Smalljon hit them like a rather small but very concentrated avalanche, bearing four of the White Walkers who had grouped together to the ground, his Claymore stabbing into them repeatedly as he laughed, smashing their own blades aside with his gauntleted fists pummeling and ripping them apart with his bare hands.

The others too smashed heavily into the White Walkers, killing and scattering them. Those that scattered too widely died under Theon's fire. But their luck against any of the Wolfsworn one on one was very bad, and they had lost too many in that initial charge to regain any equilibrium. Before the horde of wights could turn to attack them, the last White Walker died under a blow from Hathan.

There was a roar behind Theon, and he turned. "The Sun of Winter!"

The army marched up behind him. Then halfway between him and the Wolfsworn, who had begun to fall back now that the White Walkers were dead and the wights attacking, the spears came down, and that march became a charge. "Honor above all, for the king and Queen of the North!" At the same time the archers on the wall redoubled their assaults, and the gate gave down, allowing the men within to sortie.

Leaderless, being attacked from both sides by weapons that could kill them, the wights had no chance. Worse, they were almost evenly matched in numbers for the first and possibly only time in this entire war. All told the wights attacking Widow's Watch numbered around 6000, which meant the humans, with their combined forces, almost matched them.

Lord Flint and Rickard met in the battle, nodding into one another as the cleanup went up all around them. "Your intervention was most timely Rickard," said the older man, wheezing slightly as he leaned on his sword. Nearby Robin Flint waved his own longsword in the air in a salute to the two older men then reached down and picked up a still weekly hand tossing it into a nearby bonfire. "My stores are yours, and my men if you need them."

OOOOOO

About a week after their ships left the Whispering Sound Jon and Arya finished practicing for the day, and he smiled at her, ruffling her hair. "I think it's about time that you let Margaery out of your room don't you think? She must be going stir crazy confined in there."

His younger sister gaped up at him for a moment then shook her head looking over at Ghost. "Let me guess, Ghost smelled her?"

Jon nodded, and Arya laughed before heading down below. She came back a moment later with Margaery dressed as a pageboy, rather badly if Jon was honest. Some women might be able to wear clothing like that and play the part of a man, but not one like Margaery. You can't hide those hips whatever you do Jon thought to himself, trying not to stare at said hips, though I'm surprised that she was able to tie a breast band so tight as to not make those obvious as well.

"So my game was up from the moment it started." Margaery said with a theatrical sigh, before cocking her head at Jon. "Why then did you let me aboard at all?" Around them several dozen of the Reach knights and armsmen were gaping at her, while Garth was looking both amused and shocked.

"Ghost smelled you the moment you boarded, though I will say that I was surprised that he decided to keep it to himself for so long. I get the impression that Nymeria actually sat on him at one point to enforce that." The idea of the smaller Nymeria sitting on the larger Ghost caused Arya and Margaery to laugh, but Jon was actually serious. Ghost was a much more laid-back, calm sort of fellow than Nymeria, who was extremely bossy at times.

"I noticed that you are making no attempt to turn the ship around Jon Stark." Margaery said, moving forward to place a hand on Jon's chest. Jon was bare to the waist at the moment, having exercised with both Garth and Arya and Edric one after another. He was rather sweaty despite the cold ocean air, but something told him not to try to clean himself up, indeed Margaery's eyes were roving his body in a way that made him want to blush.

"It would set us back at least a week and a half, more like a month to get back to this point. That would serve no purpose, and I like having you around my lady." Jon said, before coughing and looking away blushing lightly. "Your, your um, diplomatic skills have proven themselves useful in the past, and I might need them when we get near Lannisport."

"I am so glad that my 'diplomatic skills' will be of use on this trip my Lord Hand." Margaery said curtsying mockingly, her eyes laughing at him before she turned to head back below with Arya. Now that the jig was up, she could get out of these irritating breast bands and put on a comfortable blouse instead.

Jon sent Ghost with her, ordering the direwolf to guard her door from now on whenever she was present and Nymeria wasn't, a job that Ghost took to readily enough, huffing in amusement to himself at the human mating rituals. Direwolves had it so much simpler, not, mind you, that Ghost had found a lifemate of his own just yet. The quiet stalker made a mental note to look into that issue when they returned to the home range, and followed the honeysuckle smelling female down one into the large wooden thing.

Behind them Garth shook his head. "Now she's an interesting one isn't she? I'd heard tales of Margaery, and I know roses are supposed to have thorns one and all. But they aren't supposed to latch onto and follow you no matter where you go."

"No woman likes to have her investment get away from her my Lord." Arya said, laughing and following the other older woman, while Eddric and Jon just shared a look shaking their heads before pointedly ignoring that comment.

OOOOOOO

Since the Vale lords had lost their last bits of intransigence against the way Ranma and Edd did things and they had at last gotten rid of the last of the carts along with the wounded, they had made a much better time. Even so, this area of the North was dense woodland and scattered rocky plains with the occasional cleared farm or holdfast scattered seemingly at random. There were a few trails here and there, but nothing anyone in their right mind would call a road, which made marching across it difficult at the best of times.

Winter was not the best of times. There was a reason, Ranma reflected, that most armies in medieval times did not move during winter. It was the next best thing to a frozen hell. Keeping warm was a trial, keeping the army moving was a trial, staving off sickness, frostbite and keeping your horse warm, all of these were trials which slowed the army's march to a crawl. Even Ranma's northern troops had problems, though frostbite and keeping the horses warm were not among them.

But against the White Walkers humanity could not afford to bivouac somewhere safe until winter was over. Especially given how long winter could last in this weird world.

Because of the terrain the Army column had slowly begun to get strung out. Howland watched their back trail while the Wull and his men, used to moving in these conditions to a degree even the other northerners couldn't match, watched the flanks. The northern contingent under Edd continued to break trail for the rest of the Army, stamping down the snow when they had to, finding the best route forward, and generally making it easier for the Vale troops behind them.

They even chopped down wood for the nighttime fires which were the difference between life and death for the Army. It became so cold at night, that if your tent ran out of wood to burn on the brazier you were very unlikely to wake up the next day. Even during the march there were still cases of frostbite. No amount of organization or discipline about always covering up or making certain you wore your gloves at all times could hold up against the little mistakes that sometimes crept into the men.

And the northerners hadn't brought enough min-heaters, as Ranma called Bran's small iron heaters, to go around. Worse, they didn't work as long or as well with wood instead of coal. The Vale Lords, their sons and commanders got a few, but the majority of the men had to do without.

Since that first attack however they had only seen a scattering of wights. Those scattered sightings were dealt with by the scouts, all of whom had a few dragonglass arrows and knives. Only twice did the wights amass in large enough numbers to pose a threat, and both times Fenris and Ranma saw them coming.

The two of them also changed how they were acting, leaving Edd and the other lords to follow Ranma's orders with the army the two of them went out day by day, scouring the woods around the army well beyond even the scouts. Because of that, the White Walkers were unable to ambush the army, and began to lose numbers in small penny packets themselves, both wights and their masters.

At night while Ranma rested Fenris would use his mental domination to control nearby wolf packs and send them searching for wights or White Walkers. They ambushed them several times, though the wolves of course paid for this, except for the times when Fenris was able to home in on them before the battle began. The scouts still lost men, and occasionally a trap caught portions of the army, but the losses so far were under control.

At times instead of attacking the main army, the White Walkers attempted to ambush Ranma and Fenris. It didn't work, costing them nearly fifty warriors in one battle. But that, and the fact they saw so few wights gave Ranma a clue as to how the next battle would go. When they broke out of the wildlands southwest of Hornwood's main holdings, Ranma called Edd aside.

As the hustle and bustle of the army making camp went on around them, Ranma confided his plans with Edd. "The White Walkers are cuing in on me." He said without preamble. "They're learning, and they know I am a primary target, they've tried several times over the past few weeks to attack Fenris and I in isolation, and I don't see that changing anytime soon."

Edd nodded, turning from where he had just rolled out his bedroll on the floor of the tent the two of them shared.

There weren't enough small camp beds to go around, and both young men had volunteered theirs for some of the older Vale lords who needed the extra comfort. "It makes sense, if they can communicate over distances the same way they spread their influence, if I was them I'd damn make you my primary target."

"Agreed. I think they'll try for another battle, but it will be a night battle instead of a daytime one. Something that can allow them to cause a lot of chaos and confusion, and take advantage of the fact Fenris or I are often outside the camp, isolated."

"Even after the drubbing they took last time when they tried to attack the army when it was in encamped?" Edd asked skeptically. "I'd think they'd try to attack us while we're on the move."

"No, they know they've got a big advantage at night over our troops, they'll think that'll allow them to overwhelm the guard, and once the perimeter breaks, chaos and confusion will do some of their work for them, especially if I can be 'caught' outside the camp. But that's given me an idea. Do you remember me talking about that giant crystal that the White Walker mages were using as some kind of focus?"

"I remember, almost as big as a man and twice as fat, made of something that looked like blue quartz? I remember its effect much better though, if we'd had to fight all of the wights in that army..." Edd shuddered a little. "I don't think more than one in forty of our men would've gotten out of that alive. But still, why would they change back to open combat rather than continuing their hit-and-run tactics?"

"Because they're losing troops too." Ranma said grimly. "The wights aren't smart enough to be used on hit-and-run tactics, they're barely up to ambushing regular patrols, and even there they aren't a big threat. I know they are still taking a toll, and morale sinks like a stone every time they appear, but they aren't going to stop us like that."

"The White Walkers are good enough to be used in that fashion, and their assaults, when they get past Fenris and I, are bad, but I think they're susceptible to casualties. We've not seen any of them for five days, and they weren't able to bring up reinforcements in that army outside Winterfell."

Edd nodded. "So what is your plan?"

"Tonight I'm going to switch up with Fenris." Ranma said. "I'm going to keep doing that until we reach Hornwood. Hopefully that change will draw the wights and their masters in where we can crush them on our defense. I don't want to face another army of the size they had attacking Winterfell in the open field." Ranma finished feelingly.

"You're going to try to draw them into attack you personally?"

"Lord Royce the others have absorbed enough about how I do things I think, and really once the battle actually begins they're decent enough commanders. But I don't think I'll be able to draw in all of the White Walkers, and damn sure not enough of the wights. That leaves me to what I wanted to talk to you about."

Edd cocked his head thoughtfully staring at Ranma then out the tent flaps into the darkening night, and when he spoke it was a flat statement rather than a question. "You want me to hunt up that crystal. You think it has to be nearby?"

"I think that distance really effects how much influence they can bring to bear, we saw that with the army attacking Winterfell." Ranma said with a shrug. "I won't deny that they've probably scrounged up several thousand new corpses, but I'm betting that most of their numbers come from older corpses looted from old battlefields. So if we take out that crystal, we shut down another White Walker army, or at least remove a lot of their numbers."

"Their mages will be with the Crystal." Edd said, another simple statement of fact. "Those giant spider things, possibly some bodyguards. Any direct magic?"

"None that I saw, though they can definitely do something with the temperature around them, you might have to be careful about that. And remember, those arrows of theirs are deadly if they stick you with enough of them." Even Ranma had been weakened badly for a few days after the first battle of Winterfell, and Edd didn't have the excess ki he did.

Ranma looked at his friend, wondering if he was sentencing Edd to die, but knowing that if he wanted to bring the White Walkers into a decisive battle, he had to offer them an irresistible carrot. That was himself, and the army without him or Fenris with it. That meant that Edd had to be the one to hunt up the crystal.

"How am I going to find that Crystal?" Edd asked.

"Fenris and the wolves. Fenris can control the local wolf packs but instead of attacking they'll search for the crystal. Even White Walkers have trouble spotting them moving around at night."

Edd looked off into the distance again then nodded slowly. "All right then, it sounds like we have a plan."

Needless to say the Vale lords were not very happy about their Army being offered as half of the bait for this trap. That was until Ranma described how they were going to bait the trap. While they wouldn't be throwing up any of the normal fortifications they did every night, there would be fortifications deeper into the camp hidden by the bulk of the tents and horses. With that bit of surprise and a few other surprises thrown in, they would seem an easy target without actually being one

They were still two days away from breaking out of this piece of woodland when the attacks stepped up as Ranma had feared. Wights were seen once again, and several normal patrols both during the day and night were lost, their men killed, their dragonglass weapons destroyed and ground to powder. Ranma and Fenris in turn trapped and wiped out a White Walker force of twenty. This convinced the Vale lords that Ranma's plan had merit, and they withdrew their objections.

Several days after that battle they reached the spot Ranma had thought they were heading towards: the ruins of a small keep, which had a single outer wall still standing, the ground of the keep itself creating a large mound of uneven stone directly next to the wall. This mound and the wall centered one corner of the camp's defenses.

More importantly, there was a riverbed nearby that made for a Reedy ditch, covering another portion of the camp. The riverbed was filled with stakes, but there was no bulwark added to it back it up, and other than posting more than the average number of guards on top of the mound of stones that marked the keep there weren't any defenses there either.

Unless one could look deeper into the camp, where they would notice that the Northerners, who normally were camped in small lots scattered throughout the camp in order to be able to bolster the defenses quickly had concentrated right behind the mound. Lord Royce's men also backed up the empty riverbed, with the archers of House Elesham well back from the guards on the riverbed directly behind tents set up touching one another in a long u-shape. They were the most disciplined among the Vale troops, with House Templeton coming a close second.

That House however had its men spread throughout the defensive perimeter, not on it, but backing it up in several places. They would work as small reserve forces in the battle to come, along with the mountain clan troops.

After taking one final look around the camp, Ranma nodded over to Edd, who nodded back before heading out with the patrol which he would ditch quickly, going to ground before full night hit. Once he did, he would have to wait for Fenris to find him then direct him where he needed to go. That would be the chanciest time, if Edd was spotted, the game was up. But the White Walkers weren't nearly as adept at ambushes during the day, and so long as he was well hidden behind snow and rock before night came, he would be fine.

He turned to Lord Royce nodded his head. Ranma had wanted to put Howland in charge, but that was politically impossible, and Ranma had merely named him to command the northern men, his own, the Stark archers and the Cerwyn/Tallhart spearmen. "You have control of the army my Lord, fight well."

The older man nodded grimly, clapping Ranma on the shoulder and Ranma nodded back before turning and running off, heading out into the woodland beyond the camp. Fenris was already gone, having left the army around midday.

Ranma patrolled around the camp for several turns of the glass watching as the moon rose higher and higher into the sky, frowning and wondering if he had been wrong. That maybe the White Walkers would be willing to continue trading troops as they had been.

Or maybe they just aren't able to get a large enough force of wights in position. No, that makes no sense, we've been heading for this spot for more than a week, they had to know it was my target, and in that time they should've been able to concentrate their forces.

As the moon above the forest disappeared behind a heavy cloud cover, Ranma found out he was correct. Arrows suddenly flew at him from out of the darkness all around him and eyes which had been closed or narrowed into slits so that the light in them could not be seen opened.

Ranma dodged those first few arrows more by luck than anything else, his night vision was good but not up to spotting arrows in the dark with no moonlight. Even so he was able to take cover behind a log, a flung rock killing the only White Walker that could train on him from that position, taking the creature in the eye with enough force to fling him back, his neck broken if his skull and eyeball hadn't.

Two warriors charged from both sides at Ranma while the archers continued to try to pin him down. Ranma waited until they were right on him, then whipped out Ice from over his shoulder, cutting down one before jumping up over the other's spear thrust, grabbing his head in passing, before landing and twisting him around to use him as a shield against several arrows from the others. The White Walker screamed and shrieked in his own tongue for a moment then Ranma snapped his neck, the arrows not doing anything against him.

"Interestin', these bastards really are immune to their own weapons. I wonder if that kind of thing can be overcome with numbers. Though it's doubtful seeing as this guy looks like a pincushion," Ranma muttered, tossing the body aside and leaping for nearby tree. He trusted his lizard lion armor, but it had really taken a pounding in the second battle of Winterfell, and Ranma had no wish to join his former shield in looking more like a hedgehog than a human.

The White Walkers numbered around ninety, gathered in from practically every hunting party or skirmishing group which heard the call from Hornwood. From down deep into House Manderly lands or up into the mountains they came for this assault. Yet despite their numbers they were cautious as they approached the area where Ranma had gone to ground, murmuring to one another in their harsh, grating language. What they were saying Ranma couldn't tell, but they obviously realized the ambush had already gone awry. Boys, ya don't know the half of it.

Several of them dropped bows and pulled out swords, moving forward cautiously to where Ranma was hiding. Behind them came six others, and as the four in front White Walkers charged over the small stump, the ones with bows raced forward to either side, peppering the area where Ranma should've been with arrows.

But he wasn't there. Ice was, the point of which had been sticking up out of the position, which was why they had thought he was still there. But not Ranma.

For a moment that they all shouted and argued, then turned as one as shrieks abounded from further away. Ranma dropped out of the treetops, slamming into a group of White Walker archers, kicking and punching. He sent several of them flying away their bodies broken before being forced to dive for more cover from other White Walkers, who had turned quickly and fired without any hesitation into their fellows.

Ranma took to the treetops again, only to stop as several of the White Walkers pointed up at him. Their night vision was almost as good as cats, and they reacted quickly to the fact that he could travel the treetops, far faster than humans would've been able to. Damnit but they adapt quickly!

With that thought Ranma threw himself out of the tree, having to use his hands to block several arrows coming at him in midair. But his mastery of the aerial style stood him in good stead as always, allowing him to change his direction quickly enough to get by them, then using a slim tree trunk to pull himself into a different direction, going to ground with a roll that surprised the few archers that could still accurately train on him. This is going to be tougher than I hoped.

OOOOOO

While the force of White Walkers tried to pin Ranma down the wights they had assembled attacked the Army coming at it from two directions. Just as Ranma had predicted, they didn't try to attack the stronger seeming earthworks to the east and west of the camp, knowing that they would've faced greater casualties that way.

Instead, they came at the bivouacked army over the hump or stone from the old keep and through the riverbed. The suddenness of the attack took the defenders aback, allowing the wight's archers to kill several dozen of the men on watch, but their deaths brought the rest of the army the warning it needed.

Under Howland the men of the North quickly readied themselves, half of their number having simply been waiting in their tents for the call up. They rushed to their position at the base of the small mound of stone the spearmen to the fore the archers behind them and Howland's men spreading out to either side, covering the area near the end of the wall and the undefended flank.

The horde of undead clambered down the hill towards them, met by a hail of arrows. But that didn't slow them, and they were thousands strong. Much like the horde up in Winterfell these wights came in all states of decay, ages and gender, and more than one man blanched at seeing women or teens among them.

Elsewhere the defenders began to stir. The Valemens under Lord Tollett and Rothermont rushed to attack the horde coming down the small hill with their arrows from all directions, fire arrows and dragonglass, killing the wights in their hundreds. The fires did better than the dragonglass here, breaking up the assault so that when it rammed into the modified pike line, they didn't break through that first line of defenders.

"Hold!" shouted Howland, his voice even coarser sounding than normal. "Hold!"

Elsewhere, the wights had pushed their way through the riverbed and up into the camp, only to run into the surprise that Ranma and Lord Royce had designed. Facing the riverbed was several dozen tents set in a half circle around it. These had been placed in such a way to cover small four foot tall bulwarks complete with a fighting step made of the hard earth behind them and logs from nearby trees.

This allowed the men to have a reach advantage, which the spearmen and swordsmen used ruthlessly. The archers on this flank too began to have a field day, but most of their arrows were fire arrows rather than dragonglass. Thanks to the fires they caused this attack became even more broken than the one of the other flank.

Nonetheless, the sheer weight of numbers was telling, and none of the fires survived for long, snuffed out by snow and a cold that began to drag at the men's bodies and even their minds. More and more of the rest of defenders facing the normal earthworks to either flank of the camp were called in, and casualties began to mount quickly.

The heavy armor and reach of the spears allowed the Northerners to keep their losses down, but it was their discipline that truly allowed them to hold the line, as well as the depth of their line. The Vale men however were being pressed and pressed hard despite having more numbers and more archers.

Lord Royce observed all this from a small makeshift platform made of a large log cut flat that allowed him a few extra feet in height, enough to see the battle from the thousands of torches and fires scattered everywhere. He shook his head grimly, turning to Ser Templeton. "Signal your men, pull at least two companies back from backing up the rest of the earthworks. My men need more aid."

"Done." said the Head of the powerful Knightly House replied grimly.

Lord Royce quickly turned away from him, nodding to another man. "Pull back a few hundred of your own, but make sure they're all armed with dragonglass daggers then send them to reinforce the Northerners. They're holding now, but Howland's men on the east might soon find themselves pressed hard.

Overall the battle seemed to be at a stalemate, but all the lords knew that would only last until the White Walkers decided to switch some of their wights from attacking the two obvious weaknesses in their defenses. Once they did, the defenders would lose the ability to concentrate their numbers, and would quickly be overwhelmed.

Unfortunately the White Walkers were actually quite quick at such things, as Ranma had discovered. And the nature of their next gambit also came as a nasty surprise. A shout from the eastern edge of camp when up, more of a scream than a shout really. "Spiders! Giant spiders!"

Lord Royce quickly turned in that direction, staring through the torch lit night to see several spiders like Ranma had described facing up in the second battle of Winterfell. Though he didn't know it these spiders were not nearly as large as the ones that had been sent against the Last Hearth, but nor were they as impromptu looking as the ones Ranma had faced up at Winterfell. They lacked the metal portions of their construction and were small, only about twelve feet high, thus able to move through the woodlands without being seen or causing much commotion even during the day. But there were dozens of them, and they raced towards the ditches facing them with disturbing speed.

He turned to the Lord who commanded that section of the camp, Lord Redfort, ordering briskly "fire arrows! Order your archers to concentrate their fire arrows on those things! Don't let them pass the ditch!"

The man nodded warily and moved off to take personal command of his troops reluctantly, but his men didn't need to be told. They had already begun to rain fire down on the creatures, but they weren't having much success in actually downing them. The spiders hit the ditch, smashing aside several of the stakes set into it, before facing dragonglass armed spearmen. Though spread out, the spearmen were able to halt the advance of the spiders. Spiders didn't have any weapons they could use against someone facing them from above like that.

But the damage was done. Where the spiders died, the snow and ice that made them started to fill in the ditch. This allowed the wights amassed behind them road into the defenders. And worse was waiting, high up in the nighttime air, its presence an unseen shadow.

"Ordering the reserves," Lord Royce bellowed gesturing at another Lord who nodded and raced off. But that was it, almost all of their forces were committed now, either at the two prepared defensive zones, or at the new breakthrough.

Lord Royce realized this was it if they could hold, then maybe they could win this battle. But it all depended not on them, but on Edd, Fenris, and Ranma's ability to keep the White Walkers themselves from joining the battle. He spared a brief moment to send a prayer their way before hopping down from his vantage and rallying his bodyguard. "Time to get it stuck in boys, who's with me?!"

OOOOOO

Though almost buried underneath the snow in his little hideaway Edd could still hear the battle going on at least a league away through the trees. Sound carried on a night like this, and the trees didn't so much muffle as amplify the sounds of battle. I hope this works, it sounds like it's getting close over there.

He stayed as still as he could, slowly starting to lose feeling in some of his toes and his fingers because of the cold. But just as he was wondering if Fenris had somehow have been intercepted, he heard a faint growl, and something began to dig him out from his little hideaway.

Pushing himself out of the snow quickly, Edd came face to snout with Fenris, something that no sane person would enjoy. But Edd had no fear of Fenris and he was all business as he whispered, "Did you find it?"

Fenris nodded huffing slightly in response, and Edd breathed a sigh of relief. "Lead me to them. Then it'll be up to you to decide what you should do, join me in the attack on them, or join the rest of the battle. Do you know how Ranma's doing?"

Fenris shrugged his shoulders in a very odd move for a direwolf, then pulled at Edd's sleeve again, motioning him to follow. Edd followed Fenris for what seemed like hours through the woods, but was only a bare half turn of the moon hidden high above them, the two of them moving quickly and silently through the woods.

Suddenly Fenris stopped, whipping his head around to block Edd's progress through the hard-packed snow. From there they moved forward much slower, until over the next slight rise in the ground Edd finally spotted what had caused Fenris to stop. It was a slight dip in the ground on the other side, and therein lay the crystal he was seeking. It was surrounded by three White Walkers mages and four guards. More than I'd hoped but less than I figured. If I can get close, I think I can take them.

The warrior types seemed to be alert at their posts though, which wasn't so good. Edd turned to look at Fenris, the direwolf's breath wafting into his face. At any other moment he would've made a joke about it, but not right now.

Before he could speak however, Fenris twitched his head, looking back towards the battle and letting loose a very low whine. "It's that bad?" Edd asked quietly, so quietly you couldn't have heard him even if you were standing within inches of his face.

But the direwolf heard, and again nodded his head. Indeed, that moment had been the one where the spiders had appeared, with the second wave of attackers smashing into the eastern defenses. Several wolves hidden nearby had seen it, and set up a howl, which none of the army could hear over the din of battle but which carried easily to Fenris.

"No time for subtlety then," Edd grunted standing up and charging from their hiding place. "The Sun of Winter!"

For a moment his sudden assaults took even Fenris by surprise, but then the direwolf howled and charged with him.

Despite their element of surprise, the first two warriors on guard turned to them quickly, moving as one to engage Edd. Edd locked their blades together with his spear, forcing them backwards and to one side through sheer strength, while Fenris raced on. Two more turned to engage Edd, but Edd killed one of his opponents with a neat lunge before coming back to block their blades, knocking one off balance and then catching him with a kick to the head that snapped his neck.

But they hadn't seen all the defenders the mages had. Four other warriors quickly made themselves known, bursting out of the trees around them where they had been hiding so well even Fenris hadn't smelled them. These four were armed with spears, and they engaged the direwolf forcing him back and further back, this strange vine-like steel whips around their weapons smacking out forcing Fenris to dodge and retreat, unable to close with the mages.

The mages quickly turned their attention on their attackers. Elsewhere in the battle this caused a brief moment of hesitation among the wights, or at least those wights that were of more ancient stock. Their commands faltered for a brief moment, before starting up once more.

In that small clearing however the mages made their power felt directly. Stalactites of ice appeared from the snow covering the ground, trying to impale both direwolf and man. Fenris was able to dodge easily, but Edd, locked with the two White Walkers in close combat was nearly hit.

He was forced to dodge at the last moment to one side and one of the White Walkers nearly skewered him while he was off balance, the warrior's ice blade skittering off his gorget with punishing force but not penetrating. His return thrust however caught the White Walker in the center, of his chest plate, punching through easily.

The last warrior pressed Edd hard, pushing his spear out of position before Edd could recover from his thrust. But Edd let go of his spear with one hand, punching out hard and catching the warrior on the jaw. A normal human wouldn't have been able to put much power into that kind of a punch against a White Walker to matter.

But Edd was a Wolfsworn, not the strongest of them, but he was strong enough. The White Walker screamed and flew backwards, it's jaw shattered, and it's odd yellow blood dribbling from gums cut by splinter's of its teeth. Before it could gather itself Edd had come back, twirling his spear around like a staff, the end slamming with bone-crushing force into the White Walker's skull.

With Fenris fully occupied with the four spear wielders, Edd quickly dodged still more stalactites, moving toward the three mages purposefully. One of them was taller than the others and was dressed more like a warrior than a mage, black steel armor rather than the flowing steel cloaks that the mages wore. He turned away from the crystal quickly, bringing out a sword that was slightly larger than the normal White Walker blade as well. He seems to sneer at Edd, and then glided forward with the preternatural speed of his kind.

Edd engaged him, knocking his sword to one side and trying to go for a quick kill, but the warrior recovered quickly, bringing his sword around faster than any of the others had moved. Edd was forced to dodge way, and the two circled one another, dragonglass against whatever fell amalgamation of ice and steel made the White Walker blades.

Despite Edd's reach advantage the White Walker was faster and a deadly swordsman besides, far better than the others had been. Edd winced as his cauldron received a cut, feeling the strange ice-deadness that the White Walkers weapons could cause seeping into his system for a moment before disappearing. He gritted his teeth and fought on, bringing the butt of his spear around almost catching the White Walker before he could move back. But then his sword flashed, and Edd's spear was cut into.

But that didn't dissuade Edd. Instead he came on, using the blunt end as a makeshift club, changing his grip on the other to use it like a short stabbing spear instead.

By this time Fenris had killed three of his four opponents, but he was limping. One of the men had caught him on the front paw, and the weird metal whip from another spear had raked his side despite his ki strengthening his fur. All three were dead however, forcing the last two mages to turn their attention entirely to Fenris rather than Edd or the main battle. Stalactites and even faster spears of ice shot up from the ground, trying to aid the last warrior facing Fenris.

Just like before this caused a loll in the battle though this time it lasted long enough to be noticed. Lord Royce was quick to take advantage of it, and at the same time Ranma had finished with the rest of the White Walker warriors, racing back to take part in the battle, crashing into the attackers attacking Lord Royce's men by the riverbed.

The White Walker facing Edd quickly compensated for his new style, smashing the club to flinders with one blow, before dodging Edd's spear. His sword then came back slicing into Edd's shoulder before Edd could dodge in turn.

He grimaced, feeling the cold of the weapons of the White Walkers slowly seeping into his system. But he was a Wolfsworn, unlike anyone else he and his brethren more life energy than the White Walker's weapons could suck away.

Another slice to his thigh made Edd realize something however. I can't beat him. Not with my spear like it is, and not with me wounded already. Not without taking a risk...

So thinking Edd pushed hard when next he locked his short spear against the White Walker's sword pushing the man off-balance. Then he stepped back quickly, grabbing his belt and the dragonglass dagger there. As he had expected, the White Walker didn't give him a chance to pull it out. He recovered from being off balance quickly, and thrust hard.

Edd dodged just enough for the blow to not be an immediately killing one, letting it penetrate his side rather than his chest full on. He grimaced, but his free hand rose from the hilt of his dragonglass dagger. Quick as a striking snake that hand lashed out, grabbing the White Walkers hand, holding him in place. The White Walker had only a moment to realize that he was dead, before Edd brought his spear up, thrusting it into the thing's chest.

Edd then collapsed to his knees, gasping as he wrenched the warrior's blade out of his side, breathing in deeply and trying to force the cold out of his body with willpower alone. It didn't work very well.

He looked up as Fenris moved to his side, wining a little. Behind the wolf the bodies of the mages and the last spear-wielding warrior was scattered around, their yellow blood splattering the snow and ground, but strangely not steaming. The direwolf pressed into Edd's shoulder gently, motioning with his head over to the crystal.

Fenris' ki was somewhat depleted at the moment, and he remembered what Ranma's armor had looked like after he was near a crystal when it exploded. The direwolf had no wish to see what would happen to him ki strengthening technique or no if he was that close to the crystal when it blew.

Realizing what Fenris was trying to tell him, Edd groaned, but threw one of his arms over the direwolf's neck. "Just get me away from the fucking thing."

Complying quickly Fenris dragged Edd about twenty feet before stopping, placing his bulk between Edd and the crystal. Still propping himself up Edd reared back holding his short spear. He faltered for a moment, his free hand fisting in Fenris' fur to hold him upright as the cold of the last warrior's blade began to eat at his vitality, combined with the feel of the cold night creeping into the openings in his armor and clothing.

He stood there for a moment, then gathered himself and hurled his spear forward. "The Sun of Winter!"

The spear flew straight and true, the dragonglass tip impacting the crystal dead on. Unlike when Ranma used ice however, the crystal didn't explode. Rather it simply shattered, fragments going everywhere, but not with concussive force.

Edd saw nothing of this having slumped against Fenris' side in a dead faint. The direwolf took a brief moment to stare hard at the crystal, watching as the light which had imbued it went out between one blink and the next. Then he began to howl, at the same time opening up his mental connection to his bonded.

OOOOOOO

Ranma had gained the hidden palisade, standing on top of it with Ice hacking and slashing while Lord Royce and a few others stood on either side. Lord Royce's rune-encrusted weapon did almost as well as Ice against the wights, something the older man was thankful for. Though it made Ranma wonder in an odd moment between swings, if Royce should've brought along all of the runic weapons that his family was supposed to have in their vaults.

Just as quickly as he had gained the outer earthworks however, Ranma was forced to defend them against an attack from above. An undead dragon flew out of the sky, it's ice breath attack impacting one of the weakened areas of the southern flank, killing dozens of men and breaking the morale of those who remained.

Men began to run, throwing down their weapons and fleeing from the horror of fighting wights and the undead dragon, but before the rout could become total Ranma was there. "Direwolf's Claws!"

The vorpal blades sliced out, turning the undead dragon into so much slurry and Ranma stood there in the break, Ice whirling, cutting and slaying. "Rally to me, rally to me!"

Despite their best efforts however the battle was slowly turning against the defenders. There were just too many wights and if a human went down and wasn't stabbed with a Dragonglass dagger through the heart, he quickly rose and attacked his fellows. This had happened dozens of times that night and the morale of the Vale forces was close to breaking because of it and the sheer number of corpses coming at them.

Suddenly more than two-thirds of the wights shuddered in place, then collapsed. Seeing this Ranma howled his victory to the nighttime sky, joining his voice to practically every other soldier in the army. "Edd and Fenris did it!"

Then he heard Fenris's howl in the distance, and Ranma quickly turned to Lord Royce. "You're in charge here, I'll be back." With that Ranma raced off, hoping that that howl didn't mean that his friend had paid for his victory with his life.

OOOOOOO

The losses among the Vale army were heavy. Of the bare 10,000 or so Vale men that had taken part in this battle, fully a third were either dead or wounded. Worse, they just didn't have anyone to equal Merry and her helpers' ability to aid those badly injured. The best they could do was make them somewhat comfortable as they died. The numbers of dead would therefore go up over the next few days.

The Northerners had come through it relatively well. With the uneven terrain slowing the White Walkers attacking them down, the spear regiment had been able to withstand the constant pressing of the White Walkers, never breaking its line. They had lost 226 men, though half of those were wounded.

But despite the White Walkers concentrating what they saw as weaknesses in the defenses of the entire camp their flanks, particularly the section guarded by the wall for a portion of its length, had come under attack several times. Howland's men had paid a price for the victory, as had the Wull's. Of the men Howland had left the Neck with, he had barely a fourth remaining.

Sitting outside the tent housing Edd, Ranma shook his head at Howland. "You and your men have done enough my friend. I think we've destroyed the White Walker's presence in this area, and maybe even further North. You've done your part, take your men and head for home."

Howland gritted his teeth but nodded. Child mortality among the crannogmen was heavy, and the losses of so many men would be felt by every house in the Neck for decades to come. He had no choice if he was to retain enough hunters to keep the lizard lion population from growing but to retreat. "I am sorry we could not do more my Lord."

"More?" Ranma laughed, clapping the shorter man on both shoulders and shaking him lightly. "Howland, you just took part in two victories against the Great Enemy! Do you have any idea the numbers of wights they just through at us? I don't, they're still burning bodies, but the new ones, the ones they made from the former Bolton lands, number in the thousands! And that was a bare portion of the whole they through at us! Do not belittle yourself or your aid to this war my friend."

Howland stared into Ranma's face then nodded. "Thank you Ranma. May the Old Gods bless your way." With that he turned, heading off to find his men and begin the preparations to break camp.

Ranma leaned back on his camp chair set against the outside of Edd's tent, rubbing at his face wearily. The battle hadn't wearied him out so much as dealing with the dead and wounded, and organizing the pyres. Those were always emotionally exhausting for all concerned. "Lord Royce, how is morale among the men of the Vale?"

"The men are in shock your majesty." Royce answered bluntly. "The veterans are shocked by the sheer amount of carnage this one battle showed them, while the youngsters are appalled and afraid by the same. Fighting the White Walkers and wights is like fighting no human enemy. Wounds that would kill a man they just ignore and even hacked to pieces they simply come back! I saw at least four men go down when hands that had been cut off wights grabbed them around the ankles and pulled them down to make them easy meat for others. I thought we were prepared for this after that first clash, but the sheer scale of this battle and how many of them there were..."

"It does take some getting used to." Ranma said grimly. His lips twisted into a smirk but there was no humor in the expression. "I could wish we wouldn't have to. But this was only the second battle in this campaign my Lord. I have no information about where my wife is with the rest of the army, or what's going on at the Wall, but I fear the worst when it comes to the Wall. I mean to move on to Hornwood, then further north. Now tell me true, how many of you and your fellow lords have the stomach to come with me? I don't want men who will break, I want men who realize what they are facing and are willing to do what they must to beat back this enemy."

Lord Royce thought for a moment. "Lord Elesham and Lyn Corbray were both wounded in the battle. One had his leg amputated, the other took an arrow in the eye but lives. I would recommend that we send them and their men back with the wounded. That will leave us with somewhere a little over 6,000 men plus your own that'll give us something like six."

"How many able-bodied men will they have?"

"Around seven hundred or so."

"Not enough." Ranma said with a sharp shake of his head. "Which of your other lords was most shell-shocked by last night?"

Lord Royce didn't understand the word 'shell-shocked', but he understood the gist of it. "I think young Eustace Hunter and old Lord Redfort. One is feeling his mortality, the other was untried until this war began. I could wish his older brother had been sent to serve with us, but that was Old Eon's decision."

"Sent another 400 men back with the two of them, men of the young Lord's house I think. Have Lord Redfort transfer leadership of his men to you. After all," he smiled, and there was some humor in this one, "your houses will soon be joined in marriage anyway."

"So long as we survive this war, Your Majesty." Royce said with a barking laugh of his own. Then he looked at the tent behind Ranma. "Young Edd?"

"He'll pull through I got to him in time I think. But we might be leaving him at Hornwood. Until then, I've ordered the men to rig up palanquins for the wounded. We'll rest here for the rest of today and tomorrow, then march the day after."

With a nod Ranma dismissed the older man, leaning back in the tent chair and closing his eyes tiredly. They he turned to look at the tent. You will pull through won't you, Edd? I don't want to become a liar, and I damn sure don't want to lose a friend. Pull through or I swear to the Old Gods I'm going to find a way to come after your ass in heaven or hell!

OOOOOO

Surprisingly Kevan Lannister actually came out to meet the fleet which had anchored well out of range of Lannisport's defenses. He was a somewhat tall spare man, whose hair had obviously seen better days, quickly receding on his hairline due to recent worries.

As his people began to transfer the goods he had promised to the Royal Army from several barges Kevan asked Jon about his sons. "I realize that you hold two of my sons in Riverrun my Lord Hand, along with my cousin Daven. But my son Tyrek is still unaccounted for, he should've been with Cersei and Loras. Do you know aught of him?"

Jon and Margaery exchanged a glance, and Jon finally shrugged. "I'm afraid not my Lord. I was not with the Royal Army when they captured the Queen-Regent Cersei and her baseborn son. They didn't communicate any messages about any other special prisoners via raven did they?"

That last query was aimed at Margaery, who shook her head. "None of the ravens I've seen mentioned anything about another Lannister being captured, Jaime and Cersei were the only two in the army apparently. Jaime was sent to the Wall, though if he's arrived or can even reach it these days is beyond me. And Cersei... by all reports her mind broke when the truth about her oldest son's activities came out."

"What do you mean?" Kevan asked, his concern for his son derailed for a moment.

Margaery coughed delicately. Most of what she had heard about the Vile One did not come from ravens but from rumors and stories passed on by her grandmother's agents. Nevertheless, much of it was solid, and she knew for a fact that some bards in Highgarden were trying to compose a song about the fall of the false king. After exchanging a glance with Jon who nodded, Margaery replied telling Kevan about what had been found out about the Joffrey and how he had been executed for that and for kinslaying, which he had actually admitted to openly.

Kevan rubbed his eyes, frowning heavily. "I could wish I had some neutral confirmation of this, and yet, and yet it doesn't surprise me." And I am going to stay silent about who Joffrey's father might be. He thought grimly. My family has suffered enough for their actions, I'll not drag our name through the mud even further. "Yet that's still doesn't answer my question, where is Lancel?"

"My Lord, if he had been with the force out of King's Landing when the Royal Army captured Jaime and Cersei he would have been captured, and we would've heard of it. But there were two battles before that between the Lannister and forces, and Reach forces under my brother Loras. The king told us via raven that my brother had died." Margaery said, smiling sadly though calmly, having had time to grieve in Highgarden with her mother and grandmother after that news had reached them. "It's possible he might have escaped there, and simply gone to ground, or..."

"Or he's dead." Kevan said harshly, turning and glaring out to sea. "My son dead in an unnoticed, unmarked grave. Because of the perfidy of my niece and nephew, because of my nephew and his idiocy!"

Jon looked at the man, and decided that he had suffered enough. "My Lord, if you have parchment and ink on you, let me write out a message. I will fix the Royal seal to it, and I will send it to Riverrun." Further, Jon would add something that would tell his sister that it was definitely coming from him, some small secret that only family could've known.

"For your aid in supplying the army my Lord, I will order my sister to release one of your son's. It will still be some months before he can arrive at the Rock of course, but he will be released. Further, I will agree now to also have Sansa release your other son in five years' time. Daven will be released five years after that, unless he agrees to a deal in the future." Daven, Jon new could be sent north to serve with the Royal Army for a time, though he didn't know for certain just yet under what capacity.

"I thank you for that my Lord Hand." Kevan said bowing his head in thanks. "And for what it is worth, I was against this whole war in the first place. My brother could never really understand how any other lord could think differently than he himself, and that always colored his actions when dealing with other lords. The initial accusations against your father should never have gone as far as they did."

"On that we will agree my Lord," Jon said coldly. "My brother has said occasionally that the only true victors in war are the carrion birds. We might have won, but we paid for it in blood, and we may yet lose another war, costing not just the North but all humanity dear."

Kevan looked at him hard in the face then nodded not commenting on whether or not he believed that there was some threat beyond the Wall. He wasn't certain, and he never spoke up when he wasn't certain. "Then I wish you good luck my Lord." With that Kevan turned, and crossed the plank back over onto his own ship. Moments later, a clerk came out with the writing implements Jon had asked for, and he sat down on a crate and wrote out the message he wanted.

Margaery moved over to him quietly. "Don't you think you're being up bit precipitous?"

"Not really," Jon said with a faint smile. "Or are you worried he might act up once he has his sons?"

"His sons don't bother me, for all reports neither of them exactly covered themselves with glory, true?"

Jon nodded, that was very true indeed. Neither of the two youths had impressed anyone with their general intelligence let alone their martial ability. Margaery went on quickly. "No, I'm speaking about whether or not it will embolden him, make him think you're soft?"

"I don't think we have to worry about it. For one thing, I asked your grandmother to start investing more heavily in spies in Lannisport, which is the only remaining avenue of power for the Lannisters. Yes, the Rock is impressive, and their lands could raise a smallish force, but without the Golden Tooth it's the ports that can keep them rich. And for another, we'll release the younger brother first, which would mean we still hold his heir under our thumb for another five year." Jon didn't mention how most of those ideas had come from Alayaya and Daenerys who understood spying and commerce to a degree he couldn't match.

"A shrewd move." Margaery murmured. "Resentment of past wrongs can fester my lord, and while Kevan is a reasonable man who is to say the next lord of the Rock or the lord after that will be as reasonable? Best to keep an eye on them indeed, and to be ready to slap them down again."

"Of that you may be certain." Jon said with a faint smile. "Hence why House Tully controls the Golden Tooth directly."

To one side Garth and a few of the others had been checking over the goods being brought onto the ships, communicating with the other ships via small white flags, white for good, black for good that hadn't passed inspection. So far Garth hadn't seen a single black flag, and eventually he nodded over at Jon.

Jon nodded back, and turned to Margaery. "You know," he said rather whimsically, "This was the point I thought I'd need your diplomatic skills for, and you were definitely a help with Kevan, but we are going into a war zone from now on. The Iron Islands aren't exactly peaceful at the moment, the storms and seas are going to get much rougher, and that doesn't even consider what we might face on Bear Island or in the Bay of ice if we're very unlucky. You don't have to come with us Margaery."

He looked away blushing slightly. "I should not have to say that I care for your welfare, and would wish you safely home rather than seeing you risk yourself like some silly maiden out of a fairytale."

While he hadn't inherited much of his father's stern expression or cold nature, he had unfortunately gotten some of his father's inability to get himself across me emotionally, but thankfully Margaery was able to discern what he was really saying. She looked at him, then leaned up and kissed his cheek, smiling faintly. Jon kept a very neat trimmed goatee, which made him look somewhat more dashing and simply older than Ranma which she rather liked, though she had never enjoyed the full wild beards that so many men thought defined how manly they were. Jon was more than manly enough without such affectations. "Your sweet, but stupid. I have come this far, I'm going all the way."

Jon frowned, then sighed and turned to the captain of the ship, ordering him to weigh anchor.

OOOOOO

Several days after Ranma's victory against the second White Walker horde Daenerys and her small force had stopped their progress along the White Knife. Like Lord Manderly had said, the skate and wind driven river barges Bran had developed were extremely fast. They moved as far in a single day upriver as a barge could have in two down river.

They were huge though, the normal ice barges were twice as large as normal river barges. They needed to be to house both goods and the oxen that powered the wipers which pushed the barge's sails, powering the barge forward. Daenerys' barge was even larger, and had two extra oxen on the wheels to power it forward at the same speed as its fellows.

Daenerys stared at Shireen Baratheon, who would be set ashore today to head to Winterfell. Daenerys had come to somewhat approve of the younger girl, there did seem to be some intelligence under that meek exterior. But frankly she had not responded well to Daenerys or even Merry's attempt to bring her out of her timidity. There were flashes like in that meeting with her after Merry had arrived by Maidenpool, but not enough.

I hope that Eddard and Catelyn will have better luck than we did, hopefully she will be able to look past Ranna's marriage to me and remember the friendship between their houses. After all, they've done such a magnificent job with all of their children already, what is one more ward to that?

In command of Shireen's defenders went Lord Blackwood's fourth son Hoster who seemed the most susceptible to colds among the Riverlands contingent, and who had come with them originally as second in command of the archers. He also took Cley Cerwyn with him, intent on returning the young page home.

But not, Lady Cerwyn would be pleased to find, young Bess. She had been sent to Riverrun after Lord Darry's attempted betrayal, and remained there still. The infatuation between the two of them had been based more on friendship with Arya than any real feelings between the two of them, and Cley and she had both been happy to part as merely friends.

"You will like Winterfell," Daenerys said at last, smiling at the younger girl. "Trust me, the Starks are some of the nicest people you'll ever meet. Even Lord Stark is rather warm underneath that stone exterior of his."

Shireen nodded, but even now she looked away as she spoke to Daenerys. Is that because of my family's past, or that Ranna and I defeated and killed her father? The first could be overcome, the second that might be dangerous down the line if we install her in Storm's End as Lady Baratheon.

That was a thought that had often come to Daenerys since this journey began, but at present it was just a thought, something to make a note of in the future not right now. Right now, Shireen was not a threat, merely a young woman who had been torn this way and that by the vagaries of other people's ambitions and hates.

"My father, he spoke well of Lord Stark, one of few people he did. I, I hope that he is not as cold as he is reputed to be, but I've never heard anything about lady Catelyn that speaks against her."

"Exactly, just keep an open mind and learn from the two of them, and you will find Winterfell a welcoming place." Daenerys smiled again encouragingly then bid her farewell, watching as she descended the ramp and joined her honor guard and Cley.

Moments later, Daenerys turned aside, making for the large cargo hold that contained her dragons. Dacey and Meera stood at the entrance, having left her alone as she bid farewell to Shireen. Dacey nodded at her, reaching forward to grasp the queen's shoulder and squeezing it hard. The Mormont woman knew that while this mission was necessary, it was taking a toll on Daenerys.

Her pregnancy was entering its third month, and she was showing clearly now. But that, the awkwardness this added to her normal controlled movements and her odd mood swings was just part of the problem. The other half was that Merry wasn't with them. She and Daenerys had argued about it, but Merry had eventually made the queen realize Merry could do more good with the larger portion of the army and in White Harbor than marching with the smaller force Daenerys currently led, a force of a little under 3000 in comparison to the main army's 14,000.

Nor was she the only one of Daenerys' normal entourage missing now. Alayaya and her two protégés-cum-prisoners had remained in White Harbor as well, to help set up a spy network there. Or rather, to make the city a gathering place for the spy networks that Nymeria had access to and which Alayaya had already created in the course of the war.

In response Daenerys smiled wanly at Dacey and Meera then entered the cargo hold. Her two dragons raised their heads to her, and Daenerys smiled, moving forward to scratch their eye ridges and whisper softly to them.

A few days after bidding farewell to Shireen Dacey opened the door to the hold abruptly. Daenerys looked up from where she was helping Rhaegon pull off bits and pieces of his shed scales scowling angrily. "I thought I said to keep that door closed! Before their scales re-harden is when my little ones are most vulnerable to cold." Luckily Sunfyre hadn't molted at the same time as Rhaegon, but even so it was still a threat.

Dacey shrugged off her queen's ill-temper, knowing it was only partly because of concern for Rhaegon, with the other part of it being her pregnancy messing with her mind. Old Gods save me from ever getting pregnant, how did my sisters put up with it?

"You wanted to be told when we start to recognize markers, well I just saw some I recognize, we're nearly to the Long Lake. I'll give it another hour and a half or so before we reach it at this speed."

Daenerys stood up purposefully and nodded. "Get Greatjon, I want to talk to him immediately."

Moments later Daenerys, covered in her lizard lion armor and a heavy fur coat, cloak and gloves stood next to Greatjon on the prow of the barge. "The Long Lake will be frozen solid by this point just like the river," Greatjon said authoritatively. "We can follow it and the canal to get closer to the Last Hearth. Once we're out on the lake there isn't any way we can be ambushed but the canal itself, that might be a little tricky if the White Walkers have really attacked my home and have enough men to send out patrols."

"How likely is it that your home still holds out Greatjon?" Daenerys asked softly.

"Against any normal enemy, I'd say my men could hope hold out for years! We've always been careful about stocking food and kept strong watch out. Last Hearth isn't nearly as strong as Winterfell, but its strong enough and the walls are thick such that even the strongest of catapults won't break them." Greatjon said proudly.

"We also kept a lot of older weapons, dragonglass weapons that will serve my men well against the White Walkers. And Hother is a dangerously sneaky sort of man. He'll have come up with something to irritate any attackers, trust me." At his own words Greatjon guffawed, but there was a certain brittle quality to it. Lord Manderly had been explicit about what Ranma had faced at Winterfell, and if a horde of similar magnitude had attacked the Last Hearth, then his home might well of fallen long before this.

"Do not worry my Lord," Daenerys said smoothly. "Remember, Winterfell heard from them several times after the siege began and as you yourself said, your men were prepared and your minor nobles pulled back from their holdfasts to your castle quickly. That would give your uncle enough men to man the defenses."

Greatjon nodded, then asked "how far away do you think you should fly your dragons my lady?"

"You said that the canal will be a dangerous place so Sunfyre and I will remain with the rest of the army until we clear the head of the canal. After that we will make for the Last Hearth."

From her position nearby Dacey frowned. "I still don't like that idea. You'll be unsupported, and neither of your little ones have proven that they can stand up against regular archers, let alone the fell magics that are seemingly imbued in the arrows of the White Walkers."

"True, however, their flames have grown much stronger. Why did you think I had them practicing it every day while we were at sea? We can shoot fire down farther then they'll be able to shoot arrows up. Unless they can shoot them far beyond human range, and we haven't heard anything about that, then my little ones will show that fire can always melt the toughest ice." Daenerys smiled, and it wasn't a nice expression.

OOOOOO

Andrew Willowtree stared over the wall, shaking his head. The castle of Last Hearth was on its last legs, and though the words might have seemed funny given the wording his mind had come up with, this had not been an amusing series of events. Though the White Walkers have been unable to breach the defenses, they had come close several dozen times, and there were still thousands of wights out there.

They were running low on dragonglass arrows, and the last time they used the coal trap, it hadn't worked. The coal in the trap, which they had been able to renew twice astonishingly enough, simply had no more fuel to give. The wood piled on top of it burned somewhat, but not nearly long enough. Now was only a matter of time, and even now he could see more spiders, far more haphazard ones than the originals being slowly assembled by what could only be the mages among the White Walkers.

"We gave them a good run, but I think we're coming to the end." He said sadly, Looking over at Hother.

"What would you have us do?" Hother scoffed, spitting to one side. "Run for it? They'll run us to earth no matter where we go. Wights don't need to rest, don't need to sleep, don't need to eat or crap! No, best to stay and fight, least that way our end will be worth a bard's tale or two."

"I know that, I'm just wishing there was something we could do for the womenfolk and the children!" The younger man barked back angrily. "The women, they'll share our fate, but the children? The ones that are too young to be of use?"

Both men had seen more than one example of women and children among the wights sent against the walls, but there was a definite cut off, 12 maybe 13, young teenage years at any rate, were useful anything below that was not.

Suddenly one of the men nearby shouted at them "My Lords, I think you need to see this."

Both men turned back to look out from the gatehouse and immediately spotted what had caused the man to shout. Half the army out there was marching off, heading to the southwest from the looks of it. "What the?" The rest however continued to form up for an attack, including the spiders. "What do you think is going on?"

The older man grinned suddenly. "I think that our prayers to the Old Gods have been answered, I think my Lord has returned, and now we just have to hold."

OOOOOO

Daenerys and her forces did indeed pass across the Long Lake without incident, but the canal which carried them from there to the Last River where it moved through Umber land was another matter entirely. The canal itself, about thirty feet across was clear, but this area of the North was dominated by an offshoot of the Wolfswood. In places despite the area of the canal being cleared that woodland came close enough to the canal to give archers good cover for ambushes.

This was proven quickly a bare few hours after the first barges entered the canal. Arrows flew from those woods, impacting several of the men on guard on the lead barge. "Ambush!" Greatjon bellowed. "Archers to the fore, Meera, Dacey, get your scouts lazy carcasses out there now!"

The archers quickly grabbed up their weapons, but the shadows beneath the trees was such few of them could see anything to aim at. They fired blindly, and several of them died from the White Walker arrows that came their way in turn.

But they had given Meera and Dacey enough cover to get over the side of the dragon barge and head into the woods along with Meera's scouts, a force of fifty men who she had trained to her exacting standard since Riverrun. All of them were armed with dragonglass knives, though their arrows were not.

Dacey was the first to encounter the White Walkers. Her claymore, a Valyrian blade she like the other Wolfsworn had taken from the wreckage of the Golden Company which she had named Kodiak hacked towards two White Walkers who were attacking the lead barge. One of them died, his side sliced open despite his plate armor, while the other scrambled backwards, dropping his bow and grabbing at a longsword at his side.

That White Walker stabbed forward, his sword smaller and much quicker than Kodiak. But for all of that, Dacey was just as fast, bringing Kodiak back into a guard position which blocked the first blow before turning the second.

The third nearly caught Dacey as she stumbled over a root, but before the White Walker could recover, Dacey's flailing fist caught him in the knee. The White Walker screamed, falling sideways as his leg gave out, before a stab from Kodiak ended his screaming.

More screams abounded throughout the woodland then as Meera and the others, who had ambushed several White Walkers, were ambushed in turn by wights. Dacey charged through the woods towards the nearest sounds of combat, and found several scouts facing three times their number of wights, which had come out of the woods to surround them.

"Fall back, fall back to the barges!" She shouted, moving forward to hack at a few of the wights. Others turned their attention to her, easing the pressure on this group of scouts, and they moved back, several of them lighting up fire arrows and firing them into the wights all around them. The snow and ice piled up here and there and the frigid weather kept the fires from spreading for now, and wights began to die even as the men around Dacey continued to fall back.

"Over the sides and at them lads! If ya can't kill 'em, hack 'em apart! If you've got the dragonglass weapons, stab the undead fuckers through the heart of their Old God's damned brain!" Greatjon bellowed, leaping from the barge out onto the edge of the canal and into the woods. The men of his house followed, as the archers, no longer under fire from the White Walkers, began to fire into the forest once again.

Greatjon hammered into a large force of wights armed with farm equipment, howling and laughing as he bellowed his warcry. "The Giant's Fury, the Giant's Fury has come for you, you soulless fuckers! HAHAAAA!"

His Valyrian greatsword hacked and slashed to either side, as light in his hand as a longsword, sending the hacked bodies of wights this way and that. The sheer power of his assault and his own bellowing fury brought more wights down on him, giving the archers behind him cover fire.

While Greatjon and the others secured the area around the stalled barges, Daenerys closed her eyes, and then sent Sunfyre out into the air. As usual the takeoff was rather awkward but when Sunfyre was in the air he regained his kind's normal grace.

For a moment Daenerys was tempted to send Sunfyre down against the attackers all around them, but decided against it. They are too close to my own men, I can't take the risk. So instead Sunfyre began to circle the area, looking for any groups of wights or their masters to attack before they could come forward. He spotted some of them, and at the first sight of a White Walker Daenerys nearly lost control of their link thanks to the strength of the emotions they evoked in him.

Rage, wrongness, vile, ancient evil, does not belong, does not belong! While neither dragon could communicate with words, Daenerys had become very good at putting words to the emotions she felt through their link, and that was as close as she could get to explaining what Sunfyre felt at that moment.

Sunfyre dove, flame already boiling out of his mouth as the normally placid dragon attacked without being ordered to. His flame, far stronger and longer ranged than it had been in the past smashed down, igniting the White Walkers and several trees around them turning the snow and ice in the area to steam in a brief second. The White Walkers didn't even have time to scream before they were immolated, and Sunfyre pulled out of his dive, his voice raised into a scream of victory.

Despite her surprise, Daenerys got over her shock at Sunfyre's response to the things from the far North and quickly took command of the link once more, overriding Sunfyre's mind, which was trying to force the dragon down again to hunt more of them, sending a burst of deep love and approval through their link as well as orders. You'll find more of those things where I direct you dear one, don't worry. Go east, fly east, and you will see.

Rhaegon might have fought her despite his love for her at that point, being denied the kills in the area around them just then, but Sunfyre did not. Sunfyre turned obediently away leaving Greatjon and his men to face the wights, who had just lost the last bit of White Walker support they had as the dragon flew on.

It took a turn of the glass, or perhaps a little longer before Daenerys, gazing through Sunfyre's eyes, saw the Last Hearth. More importantly she saw it was under attack. Several giant things like giant spiders but not quite, they looked like ice and metal combined into a spider shape were attacking the castle, with several dozen White Walkers on their backs.

Several of them had reached the outer parapet of the castle and now an army of wights was climbing up them while the White Walkers on their backs rained down arrows on the defenders. Elsewhere on the battlefield several mages sat around a giant blue crystal, while some kind of creature began to rise out of the ice and snow around them.

The attackers were not having it all their own way. The White Walkers had lost hundreds of wights, their corpses burning everywhere around the castle. And several White Walkers had also been slain, both by dragonglass arrows and up close. But up close White Walkers were stronger and far faster than most humans, and even without the wights it was obvious the White Walkers were winning this battle.

Or they were, Daenerys thought grimly, then without another word, sent Sunfyre down at the army of undead and their masters, starting with the magic users. Not even a turn of the glass later, it was all over, and the way to the Last Hearth was clear.

OOOOOO

The fleet had made excellent time since leaving Lannisport. Yes there had been storms, but even the worst of winds from the storms seemed to be speeding them on their way. They hadn't lost any ships either. Several dozen men had died from storm related injuries, but even so they made excellent time into the Iron Islands. Jon had ordered the fleet to remain near the shore, passing between the Cape of Storms shore and the Iron Islands. That wasn't the fastest way through, but it was the safest in terms of the sea, and would hopefully let them steer clear of the war going on in the Islands.

Even so, they saw a ship coming towards them. As it neared the lookout shouted down to the waiting commanders. "It's flying three flags my lords, can't make them out just yet!"

A few moments later he amended that statement. "One flags the Kraken, I can't recognize the other two." He shouted the descriptions down, and Garth and the others all looked at one another. "That is a very odd group, House Marbrand, House Banefort and House Greyjoy, all represented by one ship?"

Jon looked at Margaery. "I might have fought the man, but that didn't tell me much of how he acts. Will Addam Marbrand try to break the peace accords for his loyalty to House Lannister?"

"No," Margaery said shaking her head firmly. She looked over at Garth who frowned for a moment then nodded in agreement. "He's not a political animal at all, nor is he one to seek personal gain in terms of power my Lord, it is skill with the blade he cares most about, indeed, I've heard rumors that his Lord father was actually thinking of passing him over, because he's a complete incompetent at managing land. But he is an honorable fellow, by all reports."

"Jaime in miniature." Garth added bluntly. "A warrior through and through who cares nothing for aught but skill with the blade. If you beat him, he'll listen to you regardless of anything else."

"Then your recommendation?"

"If it was just House Marbrand's flag, I'd think that he might've heard rumors what's going on in the North, and wish to join us. The others though, it's evident that something odd has happened here in the Iron Islands, or at least unsuspected."

"Something that hadn't been reported back to Lannisport yet," Jon mused, causing Margaery to start in surprise and nod agreement quickly. "Kevan didn't warn us about it. I think then, we should wait for them. Signal The Seven's Wind to take over flagship position, we'll let the rest of the fleet keep going, while we remain here with three war galleys to await them."

Several hours later the ship was close enough to hail one another, and a small dinghy was sent across.

Addam Marbrand hadn't changed much since he'd crossed blades with Jon, a little older, a little thinner, with a rather neat scar running along one temple right before his ear, but that was all. He and Jon exchanged wary nods, but the others with him much more interesting.

Lord Banefort was a tall saturnine man, who looked much like Jon remembered Lord Bolton looking, only not nearly so sickly in appearance, or intelligent if Jon was blunt about it. Even his greatest detractors could never say that Lord Bolton was anything but intelligent and energetic. Lord Banefort had the look of him, but not the intensity.

The third man in the group however was just Jon had imagined him upon hearing about Rodrick the Reader. He looked a strange cross between a maester, and an Ironborn warrior. His face was lively with intelligent eyes behind wire rim glasses, but his hands showed the calluses of a warrior, and he carried himself like one too.

But it was the fourth person that came on board the flagship whose appearance startled Jon. He'd heard tales of Asha and her exploits from Olenna, and had built a picture of her in his mind. And while he'd gotten her general build correct, it was very obvious that Asha was sick at present. It looked as if she could barely stand, her eyes were bloodshot, she wavered on her feet, and her skin looked white clammy to the touch.

Yet it was Asha who spoke first. "You are going North, I will go with you."

Jon and Margaery looked at one another, that over at Garth who shrugged in comprehension. "Why?" Jon asked eloquently.

"Now comes the price," she said, her voice falling into a strange cadence. "All must stand together, or all will fall separate, gods and men, all fall into the Cold Times." She held up her hand, and only now did Jon notice that she was wearing a gauntlet on one hand, while the other was uncovered. Jon stared at it, seeing the gem and the intricate carving on its fingers and knuckles, while Asha went on in that same tone. "Thou who didst agree to be mine servant, to wield mine power, now must stand against the Great Enemy."

"Perhaps," Rodrick said quickly, stepping forward as Asha looked to almost collapse, overcome by the effort of raising her gauntlet. "I should explain a little more. You see, it all started several thousand years ago, when the Storm God and the Drowned God were in contest for the souls of the Ironborn..."

That tale took some time, but Jon and Margaery were both interested, interrupting occasionally to ask questions or to clarify certain points which the Reader, who evidently had a bit of a bard in him, dealt with easily. Rodrick finished by saying "and almost ever since she used her gauntlet to see off that first feint against our shores, Asha's been having visions, which have grown more powerful over time. There is a price to be paid for using that weapon, and these visions of hers apparently are calling her to pay for that and for the finding of it as well."

Jon nodded. "That makes some sense I suppose, but why are all four of you. Why are you here Addam?"

"We've heard tell of your creation of duchies in the Westerlands" Addam said bluntly. "I have conquered the Iron Islands, every single one save Harlaw. And that one, in return for ensuring its independence, Harlaw surrendered to me.

"We agreed to not attack your ships, or to go to the aid of the other islands, that does not mean we surrendered to you." Rodrick mildly, though his eyes flashed at the younger man.

Addam smirked at him, and palmed his sword with one hand for a moment. Whatever the peace and between these forces might be, it was obvious that it wasn't very deep at the moment.

"My Lords," said Margaery quickly, "this is a parlay on neutral territory. Whatever your grievances with one another, please be mindful of how you speak or address one another. Is this a permanent thing? Your two forces together? Or is it something that will fall apart the moment Asha leaves the islands?"

"It is not entirely based upon her no." said Addam, frowning heavily. "While my forces brought along weapons for the thralls in our attempt to arm them, we did not bring along enough food to feed them, and we had not realized how dependent the other islands are on Harlaw for that food." He glared at Rodrick who simply smiled back affably.

"Apparently Harlaw is the only island that has significant farmland, and exports food to the other islands. But even that is failing thanks to the weather lately." He shivered, because it was quite cold out, not cold enough yet to make man in danger of frostbite during the day, but certainly cold enough to harden the ground and make any attempts at farming go from difficult to impossible.

"Which is where you come in my Lord?" Margaery asked looking over at Lord Banefort.

"Indeed milady, my House supplied the invasion army with food and other goods as was my duty to House Lannister. But since the House has fallen from its position as Lord Paramount, any agreements based on that are no longer viable. We are willing to do so, but we require more in the way of payment, which the Iron Islands alone cannot supply and which House Marbrand has refused to."

Politics, Jon groaned internally, nodding his head. He wasn't happy, he did not like the idea of the Iron Islands staying a single unit no matter who ruled it, but nor did he like the idea of their people starving to death. Besides, at the moment I have bigger giants to slay. "Perhaps my lords we should head to my cabin and get some water? I have a feeling this discussion is going to take a long time..."

OOOOOO

"To tell the truth Ranma if your army hadn't forced the White Walkers to bypass us I don't know if my castle would've held. As it is, we barely held the walls. The White Walkers strafed our walls with their cursed arrows near constantly for over a week, with us not seeing hide nor hair of any of their wights. Then they threw all of their men at us one night, it was the surprise of the sudden assault that nearly broke us."

Ranma nodded as he looked over at the courtyard of Hornwood, while Lord Hornwood's lady Donella directed her servants to bring out packs of supplies, mostly hard bread, jerky, leather strips for mending shoes and gloves, and some medical supplies. Though Ranma knew there wouldn't be near enough of that to replace a bare tithe of what the Vale army had already used.

Not that Hornwood had it easy either. The damage to the exterior of the castle wasn't much of course you couldn't really damage stone with arrows after all. But there were at least 230 covered bodies, possibly more lying along the stable wall, and smoke from the pyres that Lord Hornwood had set outside the Castle for the wights was visible from leagues around.

Lord Hornwood himself was sporting a gash across his face that hadn't been there before, and had a one of his arms done up in a splint. Most of the armymen in Ranma's line of sight were injured as well. Yet despite that Hornwood had already pledged to add a further 1,530 men to Ranma's force. This included the cavalry force sent to Hornwood by Lord Manderly to guard the shipment of dragonglass. Their horses were surviving the winter well enough, and all of them brought along enough blankets for the horses at night as well.

"You're right about that Lord Hornwood. Judging from the force that struck us out in the woods I don't think you would've lasted very long, that's not even including the undead dragon I was forced to kill."

The older man shook his head. "How you did that I've no idea Ranma, I'm just grateful you did. Me and mine will do whatever we can to aid your army both now and on your way, never fear." His smile however went away quickly as he spotted Edd Karstark leaning heavily on a spear whose head had been removed. He was pale and weak looking, and was limping badly, but refused all offers from aid from those around him. "I heard young Edd was injured sore, will he recover fully?"

"He's lived this long." Ranma said with a laugh nodding at the man as everyone else made way for his slow plod towards the keep. "I'd originally intended to leave him here with the other walking wounded and then send him down to White Harbor to meet up with my queen and the main army when it arrives. But he cursed me so much when I brought it up I think he's faking it now."

"About that, I've had news you should hear." Gesturing Ranma to follow him, the older man made his way through the busy courtyard towards his keep, describing at the same time the news that the Royal Army had arrived but that most of it had been left in White Harbor due to not having enough dragonglass weapons. At that Ranma simply nodded, understanding why his wife had made that decision.

And unless the White Walkers are willing to face us with their own numbers, I think we've turned the tide with the destruction of the army that would've attacked here. With my father's order of digging up and cremating all the major cemeteries and the numbers of wights we've faced so far I have to believe that they are sorely pressed in terms numbers of undead. If they aren't, our attempts to take the offensive might well fail, and with it any chance of reaching the Wall before it falls.

"I agree with my wife's decision, but it does put us in a hard position." Ranma said aloud. "I'd hoped to rest my army here for a few weeks, but I'm not certain any longer. You say she and Greatjon moved up the White Knife to relieve the Last Hearth?"

"Indeed, it was a bold move, but with the dragons she might well succeed. I've had time to look at my House's old records, what few of them there are." He barked a short laugh shaking his head. "My family's never been the most well-read lot and our old records aren't very good. But I found one stone tablet with old tongue runes on it that I eventually deciphered. It mentions dragons being a force to be reckoned with against the White Walkers."

"I hope so, because if she has liberated the Last Hearth..." Ranma frowned, thinking hard, calculating travel times, going over a mental map of the North, and thinking about Daenerys. He pushed past his concern for her, his longing for her and Merry in order to analyze what she would do next. Daenerys knows the strategic goal as well as I do, so...

"I'm going to assume Daenerys'll keep on going up to the Wall to break the siege there. If that's the case, my Army and I might be needed more on the shore of the Bay of Seals then marching up to the Kingsroad. If I were the White Walkers, I'd be doing everything I could to throw another assault around the Wall right then directly at it." He said grimly, not even noticing that Lord Hornwood had guided the two of them through the keep up to the second floor as he was thinking.

"My son is with the force under Lord Karstark who was sent to liberate or reinforce Ramsgate and Widow's Watch." Lord Hornwood said, smiling at his daughter-in-law Alys, who was walking down the hallway towards them carrying a small bundle from which loud gurgles could be heard. "But on a happier thought, may I present my grandson, Torrhen."

Ranma laughed, moving forward and forgetting for a few moments that he was a king embroiled in possibly the deadliest war Westeros had seen in millennia. He put his arms gently around Alys and her babe, smiling down at them both. "Hello little cousin, you're looking well, as is your child."

"I would be even better if my husband were here with me Ranma." Alys said tartly, though she leaned against his shoulder for a moment. "Is there any chance of that happening anytime soon?"

"If we can leave lift the siege of the Wall, I'll send him back to you I promise." Ranma said placing one hand over his heart. "I promise. In fact, after nearly two years of war, I think all of the Wolfsworn and my northern forces deserve a break. But we won't get it yet, because if we rest now, Torrhen here won't be able to grow up."

Alys stared at him for a moment, then nodded, holding her baby to her chest and smiling.

Thanks to Lord Hornwood and his lady's efficiency the army was resupplied. Some of its broken and damaged equipment repaired, and even some of its torn tents replaced within the four days Ranma allowed them to rest. Their medical supplies however simply could not be brought back up to the level they had been when the Vale army left White Harbor.

Ranma had taken that time to train with the Vale men more, forcing them to get used to his way of fighting and marching as well as working with the men from the White Harbor and Hornwood. Though they at least had heard reports of how he operated, and knew that discipline and organization was paramount in how Ranma led his men.

Because of this and because Ranma took nearly every horse, all northern bred, that Hornwood had, adding about eighty or so mounts to his supply train, they made much better time leaving Hornwood than they had going towards it. Within another week they had left Hornwood land, marching into the semi-unclaimed territory formerly ruled by House Bolton. Fenris, Ranma, and the remaining mountain clansmen continually scouted around the Army but they didn't see any more White Walkers.

After another two week's march they reached the Weeping Water, crossing the frozen river quickly. Here they began to come under attacks from scattered forces of wights. The scouts, all old hands at this now, dealt with the wights using fire arrows on the wights before the wights could use what limited intelligence they had to turn on them.

But despite the vast territory of House Bolton being completely open to them, there were no other White Walkers sightings. Not even Fenris could detect any hint of them, which told Ranma they really had concentrated in the forces which Ranma and his allies had already destroyed. They really are susceptible to casualties, Ranma thought as he stared to the west towards where the skeleton of the Dreadfort still stood. That's good.

Another week and a half's journey brought them to the Last River, the same river that was connected via a canal to the Long Lake and which past within a few days journey of the Last Hearth. Here Fenris began to smell the passage of another human army. With the local wolves help they began to trail that army, which Fenris could tell contained the Wolfsworn, discerning their familiar scents from the scents of the army even days after its passage.

Gathering Edd, the Wull and his remaining Vale lords to him Ranma explained matters, saying that the Wolfsworn had left behind tokens that he and Edd had noticed rather than trying to explain that Fenris had been the one to find out who they were trailing. "I think we're only a bare few days behind them, so I'm going ahead alone to see if I can find them. If I can we'll join together before marching on the Bay of Seals. I don't think we want to be strung out once we hit that shoreline."

Lord Royce frowned, fingering his runic encrusted longsword for moment. "You expect that we'll be hit again Your Majesty?"

"I think it'll be a minor miracle if we aren't. It's been more than three months since I arrived in Winterfell. That's more than enough for them to have sent forces from Starhold's Point across the water to Skagos, and then from there to the Bay of Seals."

"With normal ships for certain but I've never heard tell that the White Walkers can sail." The older man objected. "Stubborn sailors possibly, but would they be intelligent enough to keep such around, or would they have simply thrown them at us already?"

"And we hadn't heard anything from Hornwood or in White Harbor to explain how they got to Skagos in the first place." Ranma said with a shrug. "They could very well've done that, or done something else entirely, something we can't even imagine. Regardless, I am not willing to hope they'll be so stupid as to not reinforce their initial assault around the Wall. And that is the other matter my Lords: the Wall must be liberated!"

"But will taking Eastwatch-by-the-Sea and liberating it do much Your Majesty?" asked one of the other Vale lords, frowning not in censure but in thought. "The Bay of Seals is certain to be frozen solid, which would stop us from using ships to bring up supplies to the Wall, to say nothing of making it easier for the wights to send forces from Skagos into the North."

"I don't know," Ranma said honestly. "I just don't know. But I doubt it's frozen entirely... the Bay of Seals goes around the Wall, touching at the Haunted Forest's shoreline on the other side. If it was frozen entirely, then we would've already lost, the White Walkers could march their entire army around that way."

"Frightening thought," muttered Robar, a sentiment more than one man their shared. Up to this point, Ranma and his Northerners had faced far more of the White Walker's actual magics and beasts than the Vale army as a whole had, but even that little bit was enough. The Dragon alone had almost broken them in the brief seconds it had to attack them before Ranma arrived, and they had no wish to see the giant spiders, giants or enthralled beasts that the Northerners spoke of seeing in the battle at Winterfell.

Edd suddenly laughed, shaking his head. His face as still pale, and he complained of his side twinging occasionally, but he was well on the way to a full recovery. "You people are missing the forest for the trees, and it's rather amusing."

"Would you like to share with the group, oh sharp one?" Ranma said, smiling at his friend as he reached over to squeeze his shoulder.

"Well, the White Walkers have always come with winter correct? So it stands to reason that when the Wall was put in place, it was also winter. I don't think that Bran the Builder would have put such a magnificent defense in place if it wasn't up to the task of stopping them. So it stands to reason that the Bay of Seals won't be totally frozen, or at least won't be frozen enough to let them send armies around his Wall."

There was some murmuring about that and Lord Royce, who was a bit of a scholar of the Heroic Age, nodded. "Makes sense to me, though if that's natural or something based on magic could be a question."

"For now we're wasting daylight." Ranma said, though he inwardly agreed with Edd's observation. "I mean to head for the Bay's shore anyway, we'll see what conditions are when we get there. I'll see you in a few hours." Ranma said, nodding to Edd and then turning and racing off. The Lords all looked at one another, shrugged their shoulders and began to bellow commands to their men to get the army moving once again.

OOOOOO

The Karstark/Flint/Woolfield army had been marching for weeks now mostly dealing with small skirmishes here and there, most of which the Wolfsworn handled. There had only been one pitched battle at a small holdfast on the edge of House Karstark land, which several White Walkers had filled up with a force of new wights of all ages, young and old. Rickard had led his House's men in against him with the Wolfsworn and slaughtered them all, though had lost forty-three of his own men in the doing.

The Wolfsworn all knew that demons were riding Rickard at this point. Being so close to his fallen seat and the sight of his eldest son and heir's death was effecting him greatly. It took all of Daryn and Roger's diplomatic skills to convince Rickard not to march to Karhold, throwing off the plans he'd made when given command of this army. Now as they were a few days away from the woods that made up most of the House Karstark's land that need had subsided, but a brimming fury was visible in the older man, just waiting for a target.

Patrolling the army's back trail Smalljon was contemplating this and wondering if that anger would see them all doomed in the next large clash when he began to hear wolves howling. This wasn't exactly unusual, the wolves were constantly howling these days well out of sight of any of the scouts around the army, but an almost constant presence. This one however was from quite a bit closer and with an odd timbre to it. Frowning, Smalljon turned almost thinking he' be able to see the wolf in question, only to see a man racing towards him on foot from behind, a large greatsword slung over his back.

A few moments later the man was close enough for Smalljon to make out some of his features. An instant later Smalljon began to bellow with laughter, a sound that caused those men marching nearby to turn to him, then stare in the direction he did. Laughing and shouting however Smalljon ignored them, striding back down the muddy, icy path, his breath making great gusts in the cold air as he shouted and halloed in welcome to his kind and friend.

A bare turn of the glass later Ranma was reunited with the Wolfsworn along with Rickard and all of them had tales to tell. The liberation of Hornwood, the destruction of not one but two White Walker Army's, and Edd's valor all made the Wolfsworn and Rickard in particular smile proudly, while Ranma heard their own tales gleefully. Around them the Army began to throw up its nighttime entrenchments, larger this time by twice again for the Vale Army coming up behind them.

After the exchange ended, Rickard stared hard at Ranma. "What would you have us do Ranma?"

"Have you sent scouts forward to the shoreline yet?"

"No, I've been using the Wolfsworn as my main scouts, but even then I don't let them go more than six leagues in any direction away from the army. I felt that their ability to spring traps would be wasted if they could also be pulled out of position." Rickard replied. He didn't mention that had been an idea he'd gotten from overhearing Roger and Daryn discuss that very possibility.

"Can you guarantee that none of the White Walkers you've seen were mages? Edd and I came up with the idea that it was their mages that allowed them to pass on information over long distances." The Wolfsworn nodded grimly, and Ranma smiled grimly.

"Good. If it is just their mages being able to pass messages or something to do with their main forces, then they won't know about the men that Lord Hornwood added to my army or about all of you. So we might have an advantage there. Our force composition is different from the army that faced the White Walkers near Hornwood, we're better trained now, better lead, and we have you my friends, an irregular infantry force that they cannot match.

As his friends smiled, with even Rickard assaying a wintry sort of smirk, Ranma went on. "If they've sent forces to reinforce Skagos, or have already sent forces from there to the shoreline, I mean to use those advantages if we have to. Until then, I'll want the Wolfsworn and I to head forward and scout the shoreline, just in case."

The two armies joined together that evening without much fanfare, though the Vale forces were particularly happy to note that they wouldn't have to work on that evening's entrenchments which was always hard work given the frozen nature of the ground. Noticing this, the men of the North responded to with ribald jeers.

Early the next morning their good humor continued, the men taking their cue from Ranma and his friends, who were all as boisterous as wolf cubs. Even while the now combined army more marched forward, with Ranma and the Wolfsworn going ahead, that good humor continued unabated.

Several days later however, when the wolfsworn came within sight of the shore all jokes and good humor died. The Wolfsworn went to ground, while Ranma pulled out Myrish glass, staring through it at the shoreline, though normally calling it a shoreline was sort of a misnomer, because like much of the Narrow Sea's shore here in the North, the Bay was mostly craggy hill or sheer cliff for most of its length.

But right here that was not the case. About two leagues in every direction from Ranma's position the shore was a gentle one, sea giving way to small rocks, clumps of bushes and sand. Of course the sea itself was also frozen to several dozen yards out to sea.

And it was crawling with White Walkers and their forces. There looked to be somewhere around 2000 wights down there. Most looked like long dead wildlings for the most part. Here and there were scattered forces of White Walkers, almost as much as Ranma had seen in the army that attacked Winterfell, and ten giant spiders spaced around the perimeter of what was obviously an army camp. These spiders were far larger and more complete looking than the ones Ranma had seen at Winterfell.

That means there are mages down there, even if I can't see them from here, Ranma thought frowning angrily as he pulled the spyglass down for a moment, careful that the faint sunlight didn't reflect the lands and give his position away. Behind the Army he could see three ships, and when Ranma trained his glass on them he could see several groups of men moving around them, their movements clumsy but seemingly sure. Well it looks like Lord Royce was wrong, they are smart enough to keep some of their captured people alive.

"I'm just glad that the Bay isn't totally frozen, if it was I doubt we'd be able to survive the army they could send at us." Hathan murmured from behind him. His horse, a Hornwood horse he'd commandeered, was several hundred feet behind their current position, grazing on a bit of grass sticking up from the rocks that dominated this area of the North.

"Would you think we should do?" Roger asked, whose own horse was back with Hathan's. "I don't know about you but that looks..."

He stopped talking as two of the ships turned away from the shoreline ponderously, pushed out into the water by several of the spiders leaning against the ships until they finally were beached no longer. The third ship moved in, taking the other two's place and began to disgorge more troop in the form of a few giants.

"That looks like a landing force securing a beachhead for a larger army." Ranma said grimly nodding his head sideways toward Roger. He frowned studying both the Army and the terrain. The terrain was rocky in the extreme away from the shoreline, and the snow of this area of the North was heavy and hard-packed stuff, easy to walk along. There were also several dozen large boulders ranging from human sized to four or even five stories here and there scattered randomly here and there.

He frowned scratching at his beard, making a note to shave it before either of his loves saw him with it, before turning to more immediate matters. "Daryn, Smalljon, spread out to either side, out of sight of those bastards. I want to know if this is the only landing point they're using, and what the rest of the Bay of Seals looks like."

"How far out you want us to go?" Smalljon asked his eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

"As far as you can and get back by tomorrow night. Hathan, head back to the army tell them to slow down. In fact tell them to camp where they are for now, and to send parties back along our trail to chop own any trees. The wood's to be saved for now, not added to our fire supplies."

Theon watched his friend carefully from a nearby hiding place near the roots of an ancient tree which had been struck by lightning sometime in the distant past. Ranma and Roger were sharing the top of a small boulder, out of sight from the shoreline by simply being too far away, with the other Wolfsworn clustered behind them on the ground. "What are you planning to do?"

"I don't know yet, that depends upon the terrain. And if we can convince the White Walkers to throw good money after bad." He frowned thoughtfully thinking debating, and finally nodding. "Theon, find a place where you and say the best dozen archers from among our men could hide and strike those ships out in the water where they anchored before You think that's possible from around here?"

"I could start picking them off from here for sure, though we'd have to move closer for the other archers."

"Do it." Ranma ordered, frowning intently as he went back to examining the army. Over the next few hours he continued to do so, waiting for Daryn and Smalljon's reports, while Hathan and Edd were able to convince Rickard not to charge ahead blindly to engage the force already present on the shoreline.

It soon became dark out, and Ranma put his spyglass away. Not even he was able to see that well in the dark, and the White Walkers of course didn't need torches for their army's movements. Instead he closed his eyes, seeing through Fenris' while the direwolf made his way forward, getting far closer to the enemy army than any human could have done unseen. Even Ranma would have had to resort to the Umi-Sen-Ken, which the White Walkers could see through.

Over the next two days the White Walker's ships, or more ships, Ranma couldn't tell, came out of the sea to add still more troops to the force already present. The first few times these were giants, adding about fifty giants with each ship, though counting them through Fenris' eyes was not an easy task. The third time was a force of White Walkers, making the total number with the army on the shoreline larger than the number which had been with the army that attacked Winterfell.

And the last time, each ship carried a single undead dragon. Seeing them Ranma groaned, or was that Fenris? At the moment they were so linked it was impossible to tell. Not good, not good at all. The giants or the spiders or the dragons would be enough of a problem, all together, that's a major problem. Although, they haven't sent out any scouts, that sort of arrogance will cost them if I have anything to say about it.

At that moment Theon came out of the night to join him in the small hideaway Ranma had commandeered each night since they had arrived on the shore. "Ranma, I think I found a place where we could hide about 12 or so good archers. But the moment we light fire arrows the smoke will tell them we're there. Sorry, but the closer you get to shore the fewer hiding places there are, and none of the one's I've looked at could hide the smoke."

"That's fine I think," Ranma replied after pulling back from his link with Fenris with more difficulty the normal. He'd been riding the direwolves senses so deeply over the past few days, trying to figure out if he could tell the mages from the regular warriors, trying to see if he could see where they had hidden the crystal or anything else useful that he had delved deeper into their link than ever before.

He spent a few moments simply shaking his head, rubbing at his temples as if he had a headache while Theon waited impatiently. "All right," Ranma said at last, shaking his head. "I think I've got the beginnings of a plan, but we'll have to wait until Smalljon and Daryn report back."

"Wait no longer," said a voice from out of the darkness, the whisper carrying to them easily. Moving through the rocky terrain around them and finally pushing into the small crevice where Ranma hid, Smalljon nodded at the two of them, his face grim despite his joke a moment ago. "The rest of the shore to the south and east of here isn't as clear as it is here, but there's a place I found right as I turned around where I think they could continue to land troops in the future."

"The future is one thing, right now is another. They've shown no signs of spreading their forces between two landing spots and have continued to drop off forces since you left." Ranma said shaking his head.

"I don't think we'll be able to fight them in a straight up battle on the shore." Theon warned. "We could retreat straight east, drag them into the Gift."

"But then they may just ignore us and attack Eastwatch, that's what I'd do. Take Eastwatch, and you can sweep the Wall from there and if the Wall falls...Ranma shook his head. "No, we're going to have to fight sneaky..."

"Ranma, there aren't any forces we could call on to help us here, but if we lose..." Smalljon warned.

"If we lose we die. If we pull back, they'll just ignore us and march up north to the wall. Even if my wife's already broken the siege that won't matter if Eastwatch is attacked by that large a force from behind."

"So what are we going to do?" Theon snarled angrily. "Throw our lives away for nothing! All the good we've done so far we could lose here!"

"We fight." Smalljon said grimly. "We fight and pray for a miracle."

"We fight sneaky, like I said. Those spiders, if we can get them away from the rest of the Army I might be able to do something about them. And if they've learned about Winterfell and the other Army, they must know I'm public enemy number one."

"Maybe," Smalljon murmured, "but that will leave the dragons and giants to us. I'm not exactly happy with the idea of facing an enemy that can attack from the sky." He smirked slightly. "I've gotten used to thinking of the sky as belonging to your wife, not our enemies."

Throwing off his earlier skepticism Theon smiled evilly, tapping one of the dragonglass tipped arrowheads in his quiver. "I can take them out if they come within range and I'm lucky, and if we can somehow get them on the ground I think the Wolfsworn could deal with the others."

Ranma frowned thoughtfully, still staring out into the darkness.

At that point Daryn arrived, moving into the small hideaway, though now with the four of them in it, it was getting quite crowded. "About five leagues away the shoreline becomes a cliff face." He said, gasping a little. "I ran as far as I could along it, and I didn't see an end of it. I think, I think it stays a cliff until you get to that little port by Eastwatch, and Eastwatch has a lot of siege weapons that face the ocean, so I don't think they could land troops in that direction."

Ranma nodded, thinking hard. That army isn't going anywhere just yet. And if Hathan and Roger got the army working like I told them to, we might just have a chance here, a thin one but a chance. "All right, here's what we're going to do..."

OOOOOO

The first the White Walkers knew that they were being observed was Ranma's shout of "Direwolf's claw!" coming from near point-blank range a few turns of the glass before dawn. The vorpal blades shot from his hiding place directly outside the White Walker's camp, smashing into and through one of the giant spiders standing at the far end of it. The construction of ice and steel crashed to the ground, its steel parts slicing through or embedding themselves in White Walkers and wights alike and he howled, "Winter is Coming!"

With that he ran forward, hacking and slashing with Ice at a few White Walkers on guard at the edge of their camp. At the same time several thousand archers, pushed forward from the rest of the Army the night before, fired blindly into the camp. Unable to see in the dark they simply fired their arrows, dragonglass tipped of course since fires would have let them be seen and they'd had enough trouble moving quietly, as quickly as they could emptying their quivers within a few moments.

At the same moment the Wolfsworn charged in from different directions, spread out slightly in teams of two, Smalljon with Hathan and Roger, and Theon with Edd. Daryn was missing from their force, as was Fenris. Both of them had another job to do.

By the time the archers had emptied their quivers the White Walkers had gotten themselves under control again from the shock of being attacked like this. After all, they were the ones supposed to ambush others, not be ambushed in turn, particularly like this. But despite this shock the Wolfsworn were soon in danger of being overrun.

Realizing this, Ranma howled again his voice a primal snarl of fury. "Now, away!"

The Wolfsworn quickly broke off fading back into the night. They raced away, while Ranma pulled back slowly northeast, making him an obvious target for any kind of attempt to follow them.

The dragons of in the White Walkers camp flew up, searching down at the ground, but their eyesight wasn't as good as that of real dragons, especially at night. After a moment they were recalled, and the giant spiders were sent out instead, racing after Ranma. On their backs each of them carried a complement of twenty archers, more than enough, in the White Walker's minds, to bring Ranma to heel.

Theon looked at Edd, the two of them now racing from where they had hidden as the dragons were in the sky. Both of them were covered from head to toe in cold, hard snow at the moment, which Theon was not exactly happy about. Despite his heavy winter coat it was damn cold. "I hope this works."

"If it doesn't, we're dead, nothing we can do about that." Edd shrugged philosophically. "Besides, do you want to live forever?"

"Hells yes, I want to live to see my great-great-grandchildren grow up, and still be hale and hearty enough to fuck when I do." Theon replied. Edd simply shook his head at the other young man's humor, and he used that word lightly.

After their initial assault the archers had all retreated, going to ground the moment the wolfsworn signaled via howls that the dragons had taken to the air. Now they raced away through the darkness, daring broken ankles and feet to get away from the hornet's nest they had poked with a long stick.

The snow hindered them somewhat of course, but thankfully the White Walkers were not as interested in them, the army slowly folding out of its camp to come after them. But their initial response, the spiders which could have ridden the archers to earth and then gone on to slaughter the army scattered three leagues away did not go after them. Every single giant spider in the army went after Ranma.

Elsewhere in the dark Ranma continued to run, dodging through the rocky landscape with ease, while behind him he heard the heavy trump, trump, trump of the giant spiders. Joy, it worked. Now I just have to make certain that I get out of this alive.

The spiders chased after him, getting closer with each passing moment, their long legs and big bodies carrying them over obstacles Ranma had to go around and with a speed that was inedible. But that didn't matter, Ranma just wanted them concentrating on him.

As they came closer he dodged this way and that, not bothered overmuch by the spider's attempts to crush him. They weren't agile enough to bring their mouths and fangs down to bite him. Rather they served as walking mobile platforms for the White Walker archers, making them very dangerous against normal targets. Luckily, Ranma wasn't normal. If they had just kept a few of those beasts back this plan would never have worked. Heh, whatever powers they seem to possess, the White Walkers definitely have tunnel vision when it comes to tactics!

He bit off that thought when an arrow from one of the archers above nearly smacked into the back of his head, forcing him into a diving roll. Instead of retaining his forward momentum however, Ranma kicked off a boulder at the start of his roll, leaping up onto another one and then onto a third before jumping up into the air. Once there the White Walkers of course fired on him, as they had been doing all along but now Ranma was able to dodge their arrows in midair, smacking them aside with his hands and using those brief bits of force to remain in the air.

Humans would've gaped in astonishment at this feat but the White Walkers simply kept on firing. One of the spiders moved forward quickly, trying to bite him with its massive fangs. But Ranma grabbed it, flipping himself onto its back and pulling out Ice from its sheath, slicing two White Walkers into pieces. That he was in among them, the other White Walkers still firing on him but not hitting him thanks to their own fellows, as he killed several more before thrusting Ice down into the spider's body right where it's brain should be. It immediately began to convulse, falling to the side and he leaped off, hurling Ice forward like a spear to slam into and through the face of another spider.

That spider fell forward dead as well. Whatever powers they used to create and give life to the spiders they couldn't empower them with no brain to work with. Yet those White Walkers on its back survived the tumble for the most part, going to ground in the rocky field around them, shooting at Ranma whenever they had the chance, not retreating but working with their fellows, shouting orders to one another and generally trying to encircle him.

Ranma however was still in the air, using the White Walkers own arrows momentum to stay there for a moment, slicing out a "Direwolf's claw!" at another spider. It hit, slicing the spider into pieces along with its crew, and then Ranma was on the ground again, rolling behind another large boulder.

He huffed or a moment shaking his head, feeling the exhaustion of that technique hit him. "Dammit I can only do two of them now?!" Whatever the hell was feeding on his ki got worse the further north he went. It hadn't had an effect his body however, and Ranma raced forward towards Ice.

An arrow found his side, a weak point in the lizard lion armor at one of the joints. Ranma could feel the spell on it trying to feed on his ki and he pulled it out quickly, tossing it aside and holding a hand there as he rolled to avoid more arrows. Two White Walkers closed with Ranma their blades drawn, but Ranma dodged the first one's sword thrust, hammering his leg into the second throwing it back with its chest armor and the ribs beneath it broken.

The other lived for a brief moment as Ranma flipped himself over his sword. Landing on his other side Ranma pulled him off balance for a palm thrust to the side of the face which, rather than breaking his jaw actually made his entire head explode in a welter of yellow blood and ichor.

With the crews of the spiders above him still firing down at him, and the crew of the downed spider still trying to find him, Ranma dodged and ducked, using the cloaking technique so that the spiders at least couldn't see him. The cruise seemed to direct them somehow with that grating tongue of theirs. But it gave him a few seconds, putting a few of them out of position as he raced for Ice. Note to self Ranma, don't throw your weapon again, better to think things through than be without one.

He grimaced as an arrow gouged his cheek, but because it didn't stick in his flesh Ranma didn't feel the spell in it pull at his life force which was a blessing. Dodging and diving through the boulder field towards Ice Ranma was grazed several more times by arrows, but the lizard lion armor was equal to the task of deflecting most of them. Weak points existed in it of course, or else Ranma wouldn't be able to move, but aiming for those weak points was an order of magnitude harder than aiming for Ranma in the first place.

In response Ranma routinely picked up small pebbles and hurled them at any White Walker he could see, both on the large spiders moving around still trying to step on him, or the downed crew of the spider around where Ice lay. With his strength behind them the small pebbles hit with as much force as a musket ball, smashing through plate armor and skin alike.

Then Ranma was on the crew of the downed spider, smashing and kicking them aside before he reached for Ice. Another arrow smacked into his back right near where his hips began and he winced before reaching back and pulling it out. Another nearly found his eye, leaving a furrow right above it. In response Ranma ducked, pulling one of the White Walker's bodies over him for a moment as he dashed the blood out of his eye. He couldn't afford to be half blind now.

Thankfully because it was just a graze his healing ability kicked in almost immediately, closing the wound within moments. But by that point Ranma was already moving on.

The spiders were still moving around him haphazardly, try to keep their distance now their crews realizing that the spiders themselves weren't quick enough or agile enough to catch Ranma. Arrows fell like hail all around him yet despite this Ranma closed with one of them, Ice flashing out in a wicked arc.

"LKGHRAAA!" The spider let out a squealing sort of sound, one of its massive ice and steel legs cut straight through. Whatever magic had given the homunculi life they couldn't repair themselves with the surrounding ice or snow. And unlike most spiders, these didn't have enough legs to deal with the loss of one very easily. It remained upright, but it's movement was harshly curtailed.

And then before it could move away, Ranma had sliced the second leg. While the spider began to fall towards the ground, Ranma grinned evilly, dodging yet more arrows as in the distance the sun began to rise. You brought the wrong tools to this party! I just hope the rest of the armies doing as well.

OOOOOO

By this point the wights, the remaining White Walkers, the giants, and the dragons had all moved out of this small encampment by the frozen shoreline. Moving through the rocky terrain they raced after the retreating archers as dawn began.

This pursuit was rudely interrupted when Hathar and Roger lead the Vale and White Harbor cavalry in slashing attacks against their front, which was mainly White Walkers and wights, the giants not able to keep up with them. Instead of closing to use their lances at point blank range, the cavalrymen would throw their spears overhead at the enemy, not doing much damage with them, but inhibiting their charge after the retreating archers.

The two groups of around 640 men each did this three times before Hathan, who was in overall command being much more levelheaded and less impetuous than Roger, blew his horn four times. The archers had reached the first entrenchment, the safety of it full quivers and the infantrymen.

As they retreated back the way they came, the two cavalry groups merged once more, showing the enemy their tails. Hathan and Roger now raced their horses along next to one another through the terrain, going as quickly as they could without worrying about their horse's legs breaking in the uneven terrain.

They nodded to Theon who stood calmly halfway between the first defensive position and the oncoming horde. Yet he wasn't there to attack the horde. No, he was staring up at the dragons.

Those dragons dove down towards the retreating cavalry, intent on using their ice breath on them before they could retreat into the protection of the archers. Not that the White Walkers were anything but confident, they didn't know anything about the human's army but surely they were outnumbered here, and of course there were the Giants to consider.

But when they dived down they met Theon Bowsinger, newly made lord of the new House Bowsinger by Royal decree, and his warcry was a scream of pure fury. "For Torrhen Karstark! Our bows sing!" With that he pulled his bow up, pulling back the powerful bow to its full extent and let fly within a bare second.

The arrow sliced up into the air as straight as he could make it moving with all the speed of a shooting star. It impacted his target, the first dragon's eyeball. Piercing it the arrow kept going, splashing out the back of the dragon's skull at the same time destroying its brain. Without even a death cry the dragon plummeted to earth, slamming into the ground right before the oncoming horde of undead and White Walkers, but they didn't stop their racing advance.

Before a second dragon could turn away, another arrow is in the air. But this one only impacted its eye ridge, it didn't penetrate, and it squalled with fury as it beat its wings moving higher into the air to join its fellows, seven in all.

Roger had wheeled his horse back around, coming up behind Theon and he shouted now, "Theon grab on!"

Theon turned, putting his bow over his shoulder for a moment and reaching out with one arm to grab Roger's own, letting the other man pull him into the saddle as Roger raced on. "How many times do you think you can do that?" Roger asked, staring at the trail ahead of them, directing his horse around some of the more obvious obstacles.

"As many times as I have to." Theon replied coldly. "I owe them a debt of blood."

"All the North owes them that." Roger said grimly. He shouted now at his men forcing them on. "Ride you horse humpers! Ride!"

Rather than presenting the White Walkers a single solid target, Ranma had decided to spread his army out, but not in a conventional way. He had devised a scattered defense in depth, creating earthworks which ranged from trenches to several large boulders pushed together to create raised positions for archers. These hard points were scattered over several leagues in every direction six or seven leagues away from where the White Walkers had been encamped on the shore.

He had also spread out his commanders, with Lord Rickard in charge of the Center, the Wull the right flank and Lord Royce the left, with orders to do precisely what his father had ordered the entire North to do at the beginning of the winter war: trade land for lives. Only a few of the archers' positions were such that a retreat would be impossible. The rest, the infantryman and archer commanders were all under orders to pull back from the moment they felt their position was untenable.

Such maneuvers would've been impossible for nearly any other human army, but Ranma had worked the Vale Lords and his previous commanders hard, instilling in them and their men a discipline that was as dangerous as any weapon. And he had the Wolfsworn, as he had said, a force of irregular infantry whose quality the other side simply could not come close to matching. Even the giants couldn't match the Wolfsworn, as evidenced by the first clash the giants had with the first of the human entrenchments.

This entrenchment was several dozen small trees hacked to pieces and stacked together between two large boulders. Over 100 archers from the initial attack had retreated to these boulders, with another 320 infantrymen waiting to defend them.

The wights struck it first and were repulsed, fire arrows and dragonglass arrows, dragonglass spearheads and daggers doing for them all. White Walkers too fell, killed by dragonglass arrows or simply falling back to trade fire with the archers while the rest of the horde slowed down somewhat, their forward momentum stymied here and elsewhere.

Then the giants struck, smashing aside a few of the men on top of the barricade, hacking and smashing at the wood of the barricade itself with massive cleavers. They killed over 20 men in as many seconds, but then Smalljon was there. He roared and hacked down with his greatsword from the position on the parapet. "The Giant's Fury!"

Like the wights and the other undead creatures dragonglass weapons hurt the Giants, but they could not kill them without it actually being a kill shot. Unlike the White Walkers themselves, where even a graze from a dragonglass weapon would at best paralyze them, at worst kill them painfully. And regular weapons couldn't do much against the giant's hide, even fire arrows couldn't hurt them much before they could put the fire out.

But Valyrian steel did not have that issue which was proven now when Smalljon's sword sliced cleanly through the head of one creature, cutting its brain in half before going on to amputate an arm. A quick return swing caught another giant, cutting its head entirely off in a show of strength that would not be the last Smalljon evinced in this battle.

He howled with laughter, roaring out "The Giants Fury, the Giants Fury for the King and Queen!" Smashing and stabbing, Smalljon killed every giant that came within range of his sword.

The giants actually recoiled from his fury. Quickly however the wights and White Walkers began to spread out to either side, trying to envelop the position. One of Lord Rickard's men, the commander of this position saw this and bellowed "Retreat! Archers first then the armsmen!"

The men complied, the archers from one side of the position retreating first, then stopping about 40 yards away to rain fire arrows down on the pursuing wights and giants as another hard point took them under fire as they came around the former position. The giants didn't seem to mind fire as much as the wights, they feared it in large quantities, but could put it out if it hit them quickly enough to not take any damage.

The other archers came next, racing past their fellows position to take up another point and laying down their own fire, as Smalljon and the infantry pulled back just in time as the first of the wights came around their previous defensive position despite all the archers could do.

All along the front this pattern was repeated, the humans trading their defensive positions and ground for causing casualties among their attackers. Sometimes it didn't work. Sometimes a commander didn't retreat quickly enough and sometimes the White Walkers came up to quickly, taking a specific position under too much fire with their ice arrows to let it retreat.

Yet even with the dead quickly rising to support them the White Walker army took far more casualties than the Royal Army. The battle became a grinding sort of combat, becoming general quickly as both flanks of the army's central position came under attack quickly.

Hathan and Roger quickly brought their men back and around, rearming with more dragonglass tipped spears, and they rode out hitting the attackers here and there as they tried to encircle this or that defensive position, protecting the infantry as they retreated, though the cavalry paid for it in lives themselves occasionally.

At one point however the dragons got involved again. They had been cautious for a time, Theon's easy dispatch of one of their number and wounding of a second had made them skittish, and their masters knew that the dragons were the easiest way to break castles in the future which made them precious now. But they sent them in again and despite the best the scattered groups of archers could do they wreaked havoc wherever they struck.

Theon killed one more from a position on top of a giant craggy rock which he had climbed with difficulty it being several stories high, drawing the attention of two more. They both turned to him and dove down from either side of him. Their angles of attack were such that Theon knew he would only be able to get off one shot before the other dragon was on him, either with its breath attack or with talon and fang.

Despite this Theon stayed where he was, waiting to get the first dragon in his sight. The dragon seemed to realize that it was his target, and began to veer off, its wings beating slowly to stop its swooping descent. Yet even so, it wasn't quick enough. "For the honored dead and for my king!" Theon shouted, letting loose the arrow.

It was a shot out of legend. The dragon had turned its head almost entirely away, pulling its vulnerable eyes and open mouth away from a clear shot. But even so the arrow hit its nearest eye, smashing through it and out the other side with all the force of a ballista bolt. The dragon plummeted sideways down into the ground, kicking up rocks and snow, smashing several wights to pieces at the same moment.

Theon had just enough time to turn and try to pull out his Valyrian dagger before the other dragon was on him, its breath trying to freeze his body cold. But before it could, there was a shout from below.

"The Sun of Winter!" And suddenly Edd was there, leaping up with all the force his legs could handle, thrusting a dragonglass tipped spear up and into the dragon's stomach.

Theon ducked aside screaming in agony as the breath attack hit his arm, smashing at the ice that grew there and wincing as both his coat and vambrace shattered from the cold of it as he rolled away. Even the skin had peeled away in places, but he was still alive. At the same time the dragon smashed into the boulder, knocking it on its side and causing Theon to fall to the ground with it.

Even with Edd's spear in its guts the undead dragon raised itself on its hind legs, breathing in deeply. But before it could use its breath weapon again Theo jumped forward, his Valyrian dagger stabbing it in the eye. For a moment he thought that the dagger wasn't long enough to find the thing's brain, and he thrust harder, Ichor and puss bursting out onto his hands. Then after a brief second it finally collapsed and went still.

Theon fell to one side gasping and grasping his wounded arm, staring in horror at the bleeding places where his skin had been pulled away by the shattering ice that had previously been his vambrace and clothing. Then he was pulled to his feet by Edd, who laughed at him. "A few scratches for not one but four dragons dead and one injured? That's a trade I'd make any day, Bowsinger!"

Theon would've smiled but he stared past Edd's shoulder up into the air, where there were still three dragons circling. Then he looked over at the mess they had made of some of the entrenchments and the men that had been there. "I don't suppose you'd be willing to pay that trade yourself would you?"

"I might have to," Edd replied seriously, before starting to pull Theon away as he saw White Walkers making their way through the boulder field towards them. "Come on! Fall back, let's get that arm some cover, and you some more arrows. This battle isn't over yet."

OOOOOO

Hidden in the same hideaway Ranma had used to observe the White Walker army Daryn waited. He waited as the sounds of battle hit him and Fenris. Waited while Fenris moved off as quiet as a shadow, almost invisible even in daylight. Waited while the sounds of battle grew further away, gripping his longsword with both hands as he stilled himself to calm. Calm I need to do my part, let the Wolfsworn and our allies do theirs.

He remained even as the cold of his hiding space began to permeate his body despite his woolen coat and plate armor. He waited, until Fenris returned tugging at his sleeve. Then Daryn stood up, brown eyes flickering with berserk fire, the same fire that had befallen Edd a time or two as he nodded at the Wolf. "Let's go."

Fenris stared at the human, then showed his teeth in an answering wolfish grin.

With that the two of them made their way through the semi-abandoned shoreline, the entirety of the White Walker's army having moved off just as Ranma had predicted. The White Walkers didn't understand the concept of or need for a reserve force. They had thrown their spiders and other troops against Ranma, and then the rest of the army against the archers that had attacked them. Now all of that force was embroiled in the battle several leagues away.

But a small group had remained behind: the mages. Ranma had hoped that they had to be hidden somewhere nearby, the number of cadavers among the wights showed that they had to have some local source to amplify their influence. And Fenris had found it just as he had done previously. It was hidden in a small cave by the shoreline. It's entrance almost entirely frozen over by ice, but the interior was big enough for four White Walker mages to sit around a crystal much like the ones Ranma and Edd had smashed previously.

They didn't have any White Walker guards, instead this group had a giant defending it. A single giant was standing guard outside the cave now, a massive club in his hand, and an equally massive shield on one arm, something that Daryn hadn't seen before. Staring at the giant from over a small rise, Daryn cocked his head at Fenris. "If you take that thing out, I'll take the mages."

Fenris didn't bother to replied verbally, simply smacking him with its tail as he moved by before racing over the rise howling as he raced forward. The giant turned, bellowing its own fury at seeing a direwolf, lumbering towards the massive beast.

Daryn let Fenris to it, knowing that even if that giant was five or six times a normal giant's strength it wouldn't have any luck against the direwolf, which outweighed it probably 2 to 1, and was stronger besides. Instead he raced on, the giant actually ignoring him as he raced towards the entrance to the cave.

The ice underfoot came alive, spikes coming up at him but Daryn struck at them with his longsword and shield, blasting his way through, until he smashed his shield into the ice rising to cover the entrance to the cave. It took several blows to break, but when it did, he was able to leap inside just as his boots had begun to freeze to the ground beneath them. He rolled as he landed, avoiding several other ice spikes suddenly growing down towards him impacting the ground where he had been standing.

In response Daryn's longsword flashed out, catching one of the mages in the leg and cutting it almost entirely off. Whatever durability they had against regular weapons mattered not at all against Valyrian steel and that White Walker mage went down screaming as he clutched at the stump of his leg.

Two others turned quickly, moving away from the crystal, their metal cloaks glinting in the dull light of the cave as they pulled out swords.

One of them was older than the others, taller too, resembling the White Walker general that Edd had mentioned, something Daryn realized and he flicked his sword up in a mock salute, circling them both as they did the same, eyeing him warily. "Your friend down in Hornwood made ill-use of my brother-in-law Edd I heard. I'm afraid however he isn't a swordsman, while I, with all due modesty, am. Let's see how well you do here."

With that he charged, his looked longsword flicking here, there and everywhere as he roared, his voice echoing and re-echoing in the cave. "Righteous in Wrath!"

The two White Walkers fell backwards, one of them trying to move around Daryn but he quickly charged the other, pinning him and his blade against the side of the cave with his shield. Swiftly Daryn turned, dueling with the other sword to sword. Three clashes went by quickly, then a fourth, a fifth, and suddenly the White Walker's blade shattered under the Valyrian steel.

Daryn turned, ducking underneath as the one he had pinned to the side of the cave at last pushed his shield away, thrusting up with his sword. That White Walker died with the Valyrian steel cutting through his plate armor easily.

Then Daryn was forced to raise his shield which shattered at a blow from the White Walker's weapon, and Daryn winced as the metal fragments of his shield cut into his arm and face slightly. But they didn't have enough speed to do too much damage.

The White Walker general or whatever he was pressed forward quickly, trying to take advantage of Daryn's wounded state, but Daryn met him blow for blow, his lips a thin, cold smile. The White Walker soon became almost desperate, shouting something in the grating language of his kind to the other man.

Stalactites and stalactites suddenly grew, thrusting towards Daryn, but Daryn, dodged backwards, his sword coming up in a sweep that bisected some of them, then he kicked out sending the pieces at the warrior trying to engage him. Dodging around him he moved towards the mage, having to dodge several times again as the ice below his feet came alive trying to grow to impale him, and he winced as one spike of ice went through his foot.

Desperately the mage wielding the sword tried to engage him, but Daryn knew he was coming, and dodged to one side, coming around with his sword flashing out quickly. The White Walker couldn't get his feet under him after his desperate lunge, and Daryn's slice took him high in the neck, nearly cutting his head off.

The last mage turned to him, raising its hands and summoning up a cone of cold, but it wasn't powerful enough to do much but slow Daryn down. He winced as the cone impacted his wounded foot, but even so his sword came up and he thrust forward quickly, gutting the last mage.

Then he moved back over to the injured White Walker, who had been pulling himself towards the cave's opening surprisingly, only to stop as Fenris looked inside and chomped down, biting the White Walker's head off entirely before spitting it to one side. The direwolf made a face, and Daryn actually laughed, much of his fury leaving him. "Tastes foul, hmm? Doesn't surprise me, I don't think they are made of the same stuff as we are, and I don't mean mentally either."

Fenris nodded his heavy head then looked past Daryn at the large crystal. Daryn turned to look at it too, then shrugged his shoulders. "Longswords, come, longswords go." he said philosophically. "Even Valyrian swords."

He moved past Fenris, motioning him to one side then turned, changing his grip on his sword so that he was holding it as if it was a throwing spear. Then he threw back his arm and hurled it forward shouting "For the Wolf King!" Then he dove to one side as Fenris followed, covering Daryn with his own massive bulk.

The Valyrian blade smashed into the crystal, and there was an explosion of magical power which nearly buried the cave, shattering the crystal into countless pieces which flew in every direction with deadly power. When Daryn looked inside however he was astonished to see Woodhart sticking up out of the ground on the other side of the crystal.

It looked mangled, the blade warped and twisted, but intact. Daryn whistled shaking his head. "Those Valyrian's certainly knew what they were doing when it came to swords."

OOOOOOO

Elsewhere Ranma had finished de-legging the last spider and had been moving through the downed White Walker troops like a direwolf among chicken. The last few of them actually turned and ran, but Ranma was on them in an instant, cutting them down mercilessly. The last one died with Ice smashing into its back and through its chest pinning it to the ground like it was a butterfly on a wall.

At the same moment Ranma felt his bonded's exultation at a deed well done, and he howled in victory. He raised Ice into the air, connecting the Fenris for a moment. Now we join the main battle, and end this!

OOOOOOO

Hathan found himself unhorsed, his horse dying under him to a giant's blow. But he had thrown himself forward, smashing his dragonglass tipped spear into the thing's face, then whipping out his blade and slicing into its chest as he fell. He rolled on the stony earth for a moment, coming to rest and thrusting forward with his blade, destroying another giant's kneecap before turning away, bringing up his sword to block a battle ax a wight swung towards his face as another mounted armmen's spear slammed into the giant's chest.

Nearby another armmen had been unhorsed, the horse rising, the man lying where he fell. Hathan quickly made his way over and pulled himself into that saddle, hacking to either side of him as Roger sounded the retreat.

Suddenly the wights all around them fell, the magic in them unable to sustain them. The last three dragons and the giants however kept going, and there were still hundreds of White Walkers around.

Then there was they howl as loud as the loudest of horns and Fenris and Ranma struck the back of the army with Daryn, hacking and slaying dozens of White Walkers who had remained at the back of their army shooting arrows at the human fortifications as they advanced.

One of the remaining undead dragons turned and dove toward them, only to die as Ranma boosted Fenris into the air. The dragon tried to use its breath weapon on the direwolf, but the wolf dove through it, his fur glistening in the sunlight with the ice covering it, smashing into the dragon's face and ripping through from one side and out the other.

That left only two undead dragons in the sky. They both dove down, doing still more damage, but most of their intelligence seemed to have left them with the mages, and they got too close to the positions they were attacking. They did untold damage, but the arrows of the defenders did enough damage to their wings to force them to the ground, where Roger and Hathan met them, charging them from behind.

Smalljon saw the wights collapse to the ground and howled his own warcry. "The Giants Rage! The Giant's Rage for the king!"

He lost his sword then, the blade of it getting caught in a giant's club even as it knocked the club out of the giant's hand. The giant reached for him with both arms, but Smalljon roared in reply, gripping the thing's wrists right behind its massive fists.

The two of them held there for a moment, strength against strength, but then Smalljon roared again and ripped to either side, the giant's arms popping out of its shoulders. The giant had a moment to roar in pain and lean forward to bring its teeth to bare before Smalljon hammered it with a shield from one of the fallen armmen, shattering its skull before picking up his blade and thrusting it deep into the giant's chest.

Across the field of battle the giants were the last to fall. The White Walkers, those that could, faded away, here and there in ones and twos trying to go to ground, trying to retreat, but there would be no retreat for them now. Fenris was on them hunting them down one after another, calling his lesser brethren to the hunt. The Giants however took quite a bit more killing until the last one fell to a massive overhand blow from Roger, which cut through most of its neck, at the same time another cavalryman lanced it from behind.

For a moment for several leagues all was silent save for the cries of the wounded and dying, and then there was a roar from thousands of throats as it dawned on the army that they had won. It would sink in soon however what this victory had cost them.

Casualties, despite Ranma's plan, were bad as they always were after a battle against the White Walkers. Of the remaining Vale forces, there remained 9,000 men, a horrible total considering the might that had marched out from the Bloody Gate. Two lords had also died, Tollett and Elesham.

The Northerners had fared somewhat better, but even they had been battered bloody. Rickard Karstark had nearly died, both of his arms shattered when he went toe to toe with a giant, killing the beast as its club smashed his arms to flinders. It would be a minor miracle if both arms didn't have to be amputated. Dozens of knights from House Manderly were dead, dozens of horsemen from White Harbor and Hornwood, and the Karstark, Woolfield, and Flint men had paid a price for the victory.

Yet because of Ranma's strategy, most of those losses were in wounded rather than dead, the wounded, the men retreating when they could rather than fighting to the death. Now with the battle over Ranma delved into the job of caring for those wounded, putting everything he had learned from watching Merry and his own knowledge to work in organizing the efforts, thankful for beyond words that Rickard had brought along several dozen of Merry's more experienced helpers with his forces. But even so he knew they would lose hundreds of the wounded in the next few days, and he began to set up a brutal triage to conserve their limited medical supplies.

As the sun was beginning to fall however Ranma was interrupted by Daryn coming into the tent he was working in, limping slightly on his foot, which he had personally seen to earlier. "Ships incoming," Daryn said with a grin. "Allies!"

Ranma left the tent, moving forward towards the frozen shoreline as he pulled out his Myrish glass. He lifted it to his eye and after a moment smiled. The ships coming towards the shoreline, slowly oh so slowly, were flying the flags of House Manderly, Blackwood, Mallister and several others while above them all flew the Royal standard. He then noticed on the lead ship a small, yellow haired figure. Seeing that figure Ranma let his spyglass drop for a moment, and sighed, thanking the old gods for this deliverance for his wounded.

OOOOOO

Ranma and Merry stole a brief moment together later that night, hidden in a small out of the section of the camp with Fenris hidden nearby to smell anyone coming towards them. Merry started to explain she had remained in White Harbor, then came forward with the army which left the city the moment Saan had returned from his second run from Dragonstone. But she didn't even get halfway through before Ranma's arms were around her, pulling her into a hug and a kiss so ardent that it took her breath away.

He leaned back after a few moments putting his forehead against hers as he stared into her Jade eyes. "I don't care why you stayed back Merry, I'm just damned glad to see you. You and your helpers, you'll be the difference between life and death for hundreds, maybe thousands of men here, and that is a gift beyond price."

Merry blushed, leaning up to kiss him gently on the chin, then smirked, leaning back somewhat in his arms. "By the way, congratulations."

"Congratulations, for what?" Ranma asked, knowing full well that Merry wouldn't congratulate him for just his victory here. She all knew all too well the cost of such victories.

"I'd have thought that the messages from White Harbor to Hornwood would've told you." Merry said looking at him a little askance now. "Daenerys is pregnant, she stopped taking moon tea that night the three of us spent together in Maidenpool. She's about five months into her pregnancy, and she was showing the last time I saw her. I had to practically order Daenerys to stop flying with her little ones when she reaches her sixth month, just in case. She said that dragons were gentler to ride than horses, but..."

She trailed off as she noticed that Ranma looked as if someone had struck him in the head with a Warhammer. "What, really, I mean I knew Dae was going to stop taking moon tea, but, I, I am, I'm going to be a father?" He looked so ludicrously shocked and worried that Merry burst into laughter.

She shook her head after a few moments, smacking her hand on his chest and moving out of his unresisting arms.

"I'd love to stay and chat, but I still have a lot of work to do." With a laugh she left him there, still staring at nothing, his eyes wide and unseeing as a feeling of profound joy rose within him.

OOOOOO

"Strike while the iron is hot." Ranma said as he looked around at the gathered Lords, commanders, Wolfsworn of his army and Davos and a few captains of the Royal Navy. Time enough to think about being a father later, right now he had a war to win. "Your arrival Jason, Tytos, gave us enough men to not only leave enough of the army here to see to our wounded, but to also press the attack."

Both the River lords nodded, and so did Rickard fingering the stitches on his forehead where he had taken a glancing blow from a giant's club. "Agreed, and thy brought enough stores as well. But what happens after you take Skagos?"

"That is the question, " Ranma sighed. "If I have to, I'll leave the assaulting force in place as a garrison, but that'll be hard, dangerous work if the White Walkers are still able to send troops around the Wall."

"It can't be something that's easy for them," Jason said thoughtfully. "It has to be something that takes a lot of time, or the force that you destroyed here would've arrived long before you reached the Bay of Seals, and they wouldn't bother besieging the Wall at all."

"True, and it's obvious they weren't able to take whatever ship or whatever they did to Skagos to the shore here." Daven said thoughtfully. He nodded his head over at the three ships his fleet had captured. "Those are White Harbor galleys, and Theon said that they're the ones that he and his men took to Skagos. They didn't need to use our own ships and our own men to transfer their troops like that if they could've used their original transportation."

"None of the old records I've ever seen mentioned the White Walkers being able to put to sea at all, so that makes sense. And it give your idea about the Bay of Seals some weight as well, Robar." Ranma replied, nodding over at the old man. "But we're getting distracted. I want to leave within the hour." He held up a hand as many of the Lords made to protest.

"I told you, strike while the iron is hot! If they can't get more troops to Skagos, we might be able to take it without a fight, or we might find them trying to re-create their magical constructions there, and halt it before they can build up another army! Either way speed is of the essence. Davos, Jason, Tytos, get the fleet ready to move, leave as much of the supplies as you and Merry think is necessary for the rest of the Army, then we'll leave with the tide."

Knowing they were dismissed all three men nodded, bowed and left the tent. Ranma turned to Rickard, Edd and Lord Royce. "Lord Royce, I formally give you command of the Vale forces remaining to us. Once Merry is certain that all of the wounded can be safely moved, you'll take the Vale, Hornwood, Manderly, and Woolfield forces on a march up to the Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. Don't push the men too hard, considering that my wife's probably already broken the siege your men might not be needed immediately there. Merry will stay with you to deal with your wounded."

One of the Vale Lords harrumphed shaking his head. "Tis unseemly, her and some of her helpers are all women! Our men are not all true knights my Lord, and they been on the road for months, you cannot..."

His voice trailed off, as every Northerner and Riverlander there simply stared at him. They weren't particularly threatening stares, but there was a certain penetrating quality to them that froze his marrow.

"I realized that we haven't been campaigning in areas where this was necessary my Lord." Ranma said softly. "But perhaps I should make you aware of my policy against rape and molestation: execution. The penalty will be carried out no matter the perpetrator's identity or rank. I executed my own men for it, I executed Westerlanders lords and men for it, and if ought happens to Merry or any of her helpers, her bodyguard has full permission to do the same."

And it would still be kinder than what I'd do to you if aught happens to Merry while I'm away. Ranma growled, mentally shaking his head. I know leaving her behind, again, makes sense given the wounded, but I hate being apart from her and Dae. Hell, the two of them and the rest of my family! I am so damn tired of this war.

There were some grumblings about that, but not many. Though she'd been at work for only about a half a day by this point, Myrcella and her helpers had saved hundreds of lives and were set to save more from here on. And even the dullest Vale soldier (or lord) had seen the love and respect the Northerners and Riverlands men paid to the Maiden of Healing.

After that Robar grabbed his fellow Lord by the shoulder, and quickly ushered him out remonstrating with him in a loud tone that carried back into the tent for several moments, causing Ranma and the others remaining within to chuckle. That left Ranma with Rickard, Edd and the Wolfsworn. "Rickard, you'll take command of your own Houses forces and those from Flint and Cerwyn."

This would give the Rickard a little under 3500 men, each of those forces having taken a pummeling in the last battle despite Ranma's strategy. The spearmen in particular had taken losses, as had the armsmen of House Flint, nearly a fifth of which had died under the undead dragon's breath assaults.

"I want you to march down and retake Karhold, I only ask that you send the Cerwyn and Flint forces home afterward. They've paid enough in blood and lives for this war already, as have you."

Ranma sighed, reaching over to grab the older man's shoulder and staring him in the eyes intently. "I know that nothing material can make up for Torren's death, or the losses you sustained in Karhold. But I mean to at least try."

He let go of the man's shoulder and reached into a pouch, pulling out three scrolls he'd prepared long before this. Each of them bore the signet of the royal family. "This is a promissory note declaring that the royal family will pay for any repairs necessary to Karhold, Last Hearth, and Hornwood, and House Mormont's longhouse."

He frowned briefly, wondering what was happening on the other side of the North before shaking it off. "Those Houses, and your House in particular Rickard paid a heavy price for your loyalty to me and mine, and for your loyalty to humanity as a whole. It's only right that you get some recompense for that."

"This, is an order for a survey to be done of your lands." Ranma went on holding up the second scroll. "Any resources will be found, and further the royal family will pay to start such project up, though," he said smiling thinly "they will be taxed somewhat in the future if anything comes from it."

Rickard nodded, smirking a little at that phrase before Ranma went on picking up third. "And this, is part and parcel of the second. If a sufficient harbor can be found to start up a small port somewhere along the Bay of Seals, or where the Sun Stream reaches the sea, you will have Royal aid in paying for it."

Rickard took the three scrolls, tucking them into a pouch of his own. He knew intellectually that with these scrolls the future of his House would be all the greater than its present, and that in the long term the price in blood, death and dishonor would seem worth it. But right now, Rickard was simply tired of it all, and just wanted to go home.

"Thank you your Majesty, and thank you for your understanding. Will my son be coming with me?" He asked, looking over at Edd.

"Definitely," Ranma replied quickly looking over at Edd. "Edd, you've done your part and more since coming back to the North. And you're wounded, again." he said smiling thinly at Edd, who coughed and looked away, knowing how close he had come to death after the battle in Homewood from his wounds against that White Walker general. Something he had not shared with his father or brothers-in-arms.

"Go home, set your House in order, bury your dead, then do what you can to survive this winter." He gestured outside the tent, where it was snowing once again, and blisteringly cold too. Most of the guards and workers out there had to be bundled up in two or even three cloaks, with every extremity covered just as the men on the Wall had been doing for weeks or months, which made the loading and unloading of the ships a much slower affair. "Even if we beat off the White Walkers, it's going to be a bad one."

Despite Ranma's desire to move immediately, the fleet took the rest of the day and well into the next to unload enough supplies for those remaining behind. Still the ships eventually were able to pull up anchor and head out to sea.

But the army's delays did not stop there. What good fortune they had at sea with wave and wind coming up from the Bite left them and what should've taken a bare four days took them eight. This was thanks to the amount of ice floating in the Bay of Seals, and the snow storms that racked them occasionally. They didn't lose any ships thankfully, though several of them had come close a time or two of being capsized in a particularly hard storm that hit them about halfway to their destination.

Nonetheless, all the ships arrived, and with Fenris and Ranma going before them the Royal Army disembarked on Skagos.

To surprisingly nothing. Whatever the White Walkers had here, they weren't willing to try to contest the landing. Ranma frowned heavily, scratching at the stubble on his chin. Theon stood beside him, eyes narrowed and a dragonglass tipped arrow on his bow.

"This is the same spot you came ashore right?" Smalljon asked, coming up beside them, letting loose a hawser that he had been using to pull one of the dinghies into the shoreline.

"Yes," Theon said crisply. "The ice hasn't moved much further out to sea since then. Surprising, I would've thought it would."

"Whatever the case, let's get on actual ground, and quickly." Ranma decided. "We'll head into the woods and hold there while Jason and Tytos land the troops. I want to make certain that they can't somehow reverse their own powers or something."

"Er what? You really need help in communicating my friend, use your words." Daryn laughed, smacking him on the shoulder.

Ranma gave him the finger but nodded. "I mean, we know that their mages can make an area colder if they concentrate on it. If they can do the reverse they might be able to start melting that ice out there just as our troops are disembarking."

Roger nodded, and gestured his wife and the others forward, while Ranma began to bellow orders behind them to the men, slowing down the disembarkation so that the troops were spread out, not enough of them on the ice at any one time to either weaken the ice or provide a target.

But despite his concerns no magical assault revealed itself. The disembarkation went smoothly, and several hours later the men went to work on a large fort cut out of the woods nearest the shoreline.

Fenris and Ranma did not join this work however. Instead Ranma and Fenris headed into the woods scouting around trying to find anything they could about what kind of force the White Walkers had here. Twice they were attacked by small spiders but that was all.

Ranma was elated clenching his fist hard. Yes! I knew it, that force we smashed on the shoreline of the Bay of Seals, that must've been all they could muster up.

A few periods of the glass later however, Fenris found something else to explain away the lack of defenses. He found a dead direwolf and several dozen dead White Walkers. The direwolf in question was young for the breed, younger by at least a year and a half than the direwolves bonded to the Starks. The area around the dead direwolf and the White Walkers' corpses was shredded and mangled as if a battle had taken place.

Fenris nudged the dead direwolf rumbling sadly under his breath, then looked up at Ranma whining a little. Ranma understood, and nodded his head. Moving to a nearby dead branch then set it alight before moving to each body of the White Walkers in turn setting them on fire as Fenris let loose a howl.

It was a howl of victory and grief, unending as the tides, unyielding as the mountains. It reached every corner of Skagos, and was reverberated back to them in the throats of dozens of direwolves. Looking at his human even as he continued to howl Fenris opened up their bond, sharing the information the direwolves of the island shared with him.

The direwolves had felt the White Walkers arriving and had retreated everywhere they could, hiding here and there in the deepest, darkest places of the island, in the deepest, densest parts of the forest, where even the Skagosi never went or couldn't. They waited there, hunting only seldom, drawing no attention to themselves hiding in such a way that no human alive could've found them.

And even the White Walkers did not even realize they were still there. They thought the few that they had found and killed had been the totality of the direwolves on the island. Instead they had been sacrificed by the packs, those too old and infirm or infertile females.

Then at some unseen call when the massive force that had assembled here as part of the White Walkers second echelon was off, they attacked. They came out of their hiding places, stalking through the woods that they owned, more than any human could ever own them led by a female, a massive creature for the breed larger even than Nymeria, and they slaughtered every White Walker they could find.

Now the remaining White Walkers on the island, a bare two dozen or so, had retreated to the same village that Theon had found the Skagosi in, and were held up there, trying to send out messages. But any reinforcements from further north could not arrive here in time, and Ranma had destroyed the force that had been sent out already.

Ranma came out of their link with a gasp, and stood there a minute getting his breath back, shaking his head. "Avatars of the Old Gods, that was what you and yours were called ones Fenris, it looks like there might be more truth in that than most old sayings. And I think that's truer now than it has ever been."

He laughed suddenly, rubbing Fenris' ears occasionally as he felt his direwolf's interest in the female direwolf that led the packs against the White Walkers. "Leave it be for now you horny dog, I think we need to finish off that little pack of White Walkers first don't you? Then you can go courting."

Fenris huffed, knocking his head against Ranma's head nearly hard enough to knock him over, but nodded all the same. With that, the two returned to the rest of the army. When Ranma explained what he had learned the rest of the Wolfsworn simply nodded and muttered that it made sense, while the Riverlands lords and their men looked very disturbed by save for Lord Blackwood. Followers of the Old Gods, they were much more at home with the ideas of the direwolves being that intelligent even in the wild.

"What would you have us do Your Majesty?" Lord Blackwood asked formally.

"Send out scouts during the day, but not at night, forces of 10 just in case, and not too far out. The direwolves don't seem to be hungry, but they aren't pampered pets either. Fenris can control them to a certain extent, but I'd rather not have him push that too far."

"Not pampered pets he says!" Patek laughed, pointing at Fenris. "And what you have to say about that, my four-legged friend?"

Fenris looked at the finger pointing at him, then bared his teeth and Patek quickly pulled his hand back which caused Fenris to huff in laughter.

"Exactly," Patek muttered, shaking his head the little. They all laughed, and Patek made a mock salute to the direwolf, who simply nodded his head like a king getting his just do.

The next day as the rest of the army continued to make Camp Adamant, the name Tytos and Jason had decided on for the large fort, into something more permanent, Daryn and the rest of the Wolfsworn led a large force of Blackwood and Wull men through the woods. They quickly made their way through the island with Theon guiding them towards the village up into the mountains.

Occasionally they would see movement in the woods, flashes of fur and knew that it was the direwolves who had reclaimed the island for the animal kind. But none of them had a problem with it, indeed most of the men preyed on a nightly basis to the Old Gods, thanking them for their aid in this war. Each night the direwolves howled in response, moving through the woods around them almost like an honor guard now rather than sentries.

After weeks of hard travel Theon stared out at the village where his men and he had been seduced by the White Walker's womenfolk, his eyes and face bleak. "Feels like I've come full circle, sort of. I honestly never expected to see this place again."

"Is it just as ya remembered it?" The Wull asked, standing next to the Wolfsworn and staring hard out of the woods toward the palisade.

"They repaired the walls a bit, though I can't tell if they did the same thing to any of the houses on the other side. More importantly I'm counting an even dozen White Walkers on patrol along the parapet. Half of them look like those women of theirs too."

Nearby one of the Blackwood man whistled appreciatively as he stared, his jaw gaping open for a moment. "Damn me, they're gorgeous! Almost as sexy as the Queen."

"They'll turn you to their creature through your cock if you keep thinking with it!" Theon said sharply, turning it to the man, not noticing how his friends all exchanged amused glances behind him. The cost might have been high, but Theon had at last learned there were some prices too high to pay for wenching. "I only survived because of Ranma's training me for so long. Don't be fooled, that trick of theirs is probably their most effective. I'm just glad they didn't think to keep using it in the rest of the North."

"Arrogant of them." Daryn said, cracking his neck explosively. "Though personally I prefer a much more earthy sort of beauty, like my lady wife." He smiled, thinking fondly of Alys. Ranma had told him of his son, of how the toddler was seemingly a healthy child with a good set of the lungs, and it had made him yearn all the more for home. One more battle, he thought. One more battle, then I can go home. Rickard was not the only one who is weary of war.

Smalljon clapped Theon on the shoulder, while Hathon simply nodded, moving over to his horse and the front of around 600 cavalry. "Start the party Theon," Hathon Shieldarm said grimly. "Let's end this."

Theon nodded and the order was passed along the line. A second later more than a thousand archers began to set their fire arrows alight from small fires. Those fires warned the White Walkers that they were out there, and several dozen more raced to positions along the outer wall, while the cold air began to turn even colder, so cold that it started to hamper people's movements, but it wasn't enough.

Moments later, the archers fired, not at the White Walkers themselves but at the palisade. The wood was slick and frozen with ice and snow, piled halfway up the palisade itself, but there was still wood to be seen, and the arrows struck it here there and everywhere lighting the palisade, slowly but surely burning away the ice.

This attack continued throughout the day, the archers unceasingly firing not at the defenders who fired back at them with scant success thanks to the woodland. The snow melted, the ice melted, the palisade began to burn, and the White Walkers howled in their tongue with bitter anger and impotent rage as their defense began to crumble.

Then Smalljon roared out of the woods, covered by a few hundred all their archers, all of them now aiming with dragonglass arrows at the White Walkers around the gate of the palisade. Smalljon was not carrying his greatsword, instead he was carrying a huge hunk of wood, longer and thicker around than he was under one arm, racing forward like he was a one-man battering ram.

Which he was. He struck the door like one, shattering it off its hinges and then diving aside as the cavalry which had roared out of the woods behind him galloped in, longsword's out and seeking White Walker blood. "The Riverlands, the Riverlands for the king and queen! Honor's Shield!"

By the time Theon and the rest of the archers raised in after, the battle for the village itself was over. Hathan pushed his visor up, pointing his longsword with his other hand, it's blade streaked with yellow ichor, at the single longhouse in the center of the village. "They're hold up in there." He reported grimly. "Six or seven of them, all females."

He shook his head then, staring around at a few of the Riverlands men, who shuffled sheepishly in their saddles, the horses shying away in reply. "They seem to be able to cast some sort of allure spell, it affected our men before they could kill them. It got stronger where any of the women were together, hence why they were able to retreat at all."

"I'll handle this." Theon said grimly, shaking his head. "Daryn if you think you're up for it you can come with me as well."

Daryn nodded grimly. He fixed the image of Alys, brown haired, brown eyed, freckled, laughing, human Alys in his mind, his desire to see her, his delight in their courtship, their marriage, and their child. "I'm ready my friend."

Hathan saluted them with his blade, while Smalljon simply nodded. He knew himself far too well to have any illusions that he would be immune to the White Walker female's spells, and Roger wasn't there, remaining behind to command the construction of the fort.

Theon nodded, and Daryn and he strode forward, entering the broken shattered ruins of the doorway into the longhouse, pushing it to one side and entering the long hallway that made up the main room of the place. None of the White Walker females were there. "There are rooms in the back" Theon said calmly, pointing them out. "Set a fire somewhere in the supports, I'll be back."

Daryn nodded, moving over to a torch which looked to have been unlit for months, lighting it up with his flint and tender before moving on, while Theon stalked through the hallway towards the back and the rooms there.

Theon heard the female White Walker's before he saw them, screeching to one another in the harsh tongue of their kind. They were evidently having an argument, and Theon wondered for a moment if they were trying to place blame for this disaster, or trying to figure out what to do. Not that they have any options left but to die.

Stalking down the hallway Theon found the women all together in the chieftain's quarters. Moving next to the doorway, he chanced a quick look inside.

The White Walker female's carefully groomed good looks were gone now, and they stood snarling at one another. If Ranma had seen them then, their raging eyes, their wild unkempt hair along with their voices and skin color would have reminded him of banshees. Westeros didn't have any legends of such however, though they might start after this day's work.

Looking at them though, Theon still felt a faint stirring before he clamped down on it. No, no matter how tight their pussies, the price for sampling these bitches is too high by far. Time to make them pay instead for what they did to me and to my men here. With that, Theon girded himself and moved into the doorway.

Theon's first arrow took one of them in the eye, silencing her forever. Three more arrows left his bow before he passed the threshold of the door, and four more females died. One of them had been nicked by a dragonglass arrow meant for one of her fellows behind her, and she fell, screaming in agony as the dragonglass tortured her soul.

Out of arrows, Theon drew his stiletto, moving forward quickly his eyes bleak. In his mind Theon wasn't killing women now, he was exterminating so many rabid animals, and he meant to be done with it quickly.

One of the two surviving women however had different ideas. She spoke up in common, moving forward as her hands flashed. Suddenly her unkempt appearance seemed to fade slowly, leaving the beautiful woman who had seduced him in this very room so many months ago. "So, the conquering hero returns! You lived through something none of your race ever has before. You, you Theon Greyjoy, are destined for great things. I see that now, and I am sorry I had to test you so."

Theon stared at her, seemingly entranced, and the other female slowly made her way around the two of them, making for the doorway. The female in front of Theon moved towards him, sweeping her hair back to reveal her chest, barely covered by a thin white chemise. "I could guide you, you know Theon. I've dreamt of that night we spent together, you were magnificent, better than any of those so-called males of my own race. We could do great things together you and I, forge our own kingdom... Why should you or I bow to the whims of others, be it your king, or those who rule my own race?"

She held up a hand to the still and silent Theon, placing it over his chest plate while her other hand moved up to twin in his hair. She pulled his head down toward her for a kiss then gasped as something hard and sharp was thrust under her ribs.

"Fool me once shame on you, fool me twice shame on me." Theon said softly as the woman gasped and grunted as her life's blood, or whatever equivalent the White Walkers used, flowed out onto his hand. "Die bitch."

While the temptress fell to the stone floor staring up at him incredulously, Theon turned to chase after the last female. He stopped though when he saw Daryn in the doorway, the last female dead at his feet. The two men nodded at one another grimly and a few moments later Daryn and Theon left the longhouse. Several turns of the glass after that, the Army left while the village burned behind them.

OOOOOO

At the same time that Theon was dealing with the last of the White Walkers, Ranma and Fenris made their way to the shore of Skagos facing northward. Fenris kept on looking around, his snout wriggling as if he was trying to analyze a scent, and more than once he went entirely rigid, staring out into the woodlands. But whatever it was that was bothering him, Fenris refused to answer any of Ranma's questions about it.

After two days travel Ranma and his bonded at last reached the shoreline. There they found how the White Walkers had gotten to the island in the first place, a massive iceberg at least five maybe even seven leagues in size. And there was another, even larger iceberg set end to end beyond that one.

As he and Fenris moved over the ice Ranma frowned, wondering if he could somehow burn the things. Maybe if I used wildfire or got Daenerys and her two dragons here... But even then it'd be a slow process, there's too much ice here.

That doesn't even consider the last problem, how the hell do I secure Skagos? I'd have to leave the entire army and the Wolfsworn here, and even then, if the White Walkers can swing enough of their main army around and out to sea they might not be able to hold.

As he was thinking that Ranma and Fenris made their way back off the ice and into the gigantic forest which dominated Skagos from one end to the other. He was still worrying about the problem and not coming up with any solution when a low growl came from his left.

Ranma and Fenris turned in that direction, and watched as out of the woodlands came a direwolf. It was a massive female, nearly as large as Nymeria and suddenly knowledge flowed down their link quicker than Fenris could control it. Ranma suddenly realized why Fenris had been so itchy the past few days: she was in heat, nearing the end of her heat cycle actually, and she hadn't been bred yet. The fact that, like wolves, direwolves mated for life and that she had never found a male worthy of her, also carried over in her scent somehow.

Frowning Ranma shook off Fenris' interest in the female, wondering if the heat was the only reason the female had sought them out. But the look in the direwolf's eyes carried far more intelligence than any non-bonded of the species should be able to convey. And then there's the way the direwolves of the island acted after the White Walker's second assault force left...

After a moment Ranma smiled thinly. "I think you're a messenger or perhaps a guide, is that right?"

The female direwolf nodded its head, and then turned twitching its tail in a way indicating then to follow. Ranma shrugged and followed, while Fenris eagerly hustled ahead, before pausing and moving slower, his mind overcoming his instincts. The direwolf female turned its head to look at Fenris, and again nodded its head before moving off, as if Fenris had somehow passed a test, which might've been the case, or might not.

It was obvious the female was interested in Fenris, or at least it was if Ranma allowed their link to open far enough to tell, but it was equally obvious it had a job to do. The female would do that job before having any fun, and appreciated that Fenris wasn't going to push his suit just yet.

They traveled for hours not because they crossed so much ground, but because the trees became so dense that going forward was difficult in the extreme even for Ranma who could take to the treetops. Here were pines and other types of trees which kept her leaves year-round. Here were weirwood trees, hundreds of them with their branches interconnected, drawing so close together that Ranma could barely squeeze between them.

Suddenly the going got easier. At the same time around them Ranma felt dozens of direwolves through Fenris' senses, moving through the trees as silently as only the apex predators that they were could. An honor guard, Ranma realized, just as Theon had on his march towards the village. Or perhaps witnesses? A few minutes later Ranma spotted several of them and noted idly that the female who had come to get him and Fenris was head and shoulders bigger than any of the others, marking her out as pack leader.

A few moments after Ranma realized that he stopped and stared. Ahead of them was a giant weirwood tree, nine stories tall if it was an inch, and longer around than most holdfasts. It was ancient, its boughs drooping, yet its sheer power could almost be felt like a physical thing, and suddenly Ranma knew something. This was possibly the oldest weirwood tree in existence, untouched by man for thousands upon thousands of years, as powerful alone in its ability to convey a message from the Old Gods as the entire Isle of Faces.

Ranma moved forward, noting in passing that while it had dozens of faces on it they didn't look to have been made by someone's hand. Rather they seemed to have grown out of the bark of the tree like the one in Winterfell. But these faces weren't as humanlike as that one was. They were mere shadows, their features indistinguishable but their presence undeniable.

When he was within reach Ranma stopped, then stretched forward to place his hands on the weirwood tree below two of the faces trying not to touch any of the faces directly feeling it would be disrespectful. Closing his eyes Ranma began to search out his senses for the Old Gods. How, how can I secure Skagos against further incursions, how can I do it to Bear Island?

The answer came to him quickly, a blast of knowledge: A scene of Ranma, Jon and Arya, kneeling on the shoreline, placing seeds along the edge facing North, then of his sending his energy into one, the power moving from one to another. Then he saw his force leaving, the island losing any sign of human habitation, being left to the beasts of the forest. Then he saw another scene, of Ranma, older than he was now, kneeling with several young children in front of the weirwood tree of Winterfell. Both the aid, and the price for that aid in one.

With this Ranma knew what he had to do, and smiled grimly. I accept. With that oath given Ranma felt himself back out of the link. Almost immediately the weirwood trees all around him began to drop acorns.

At the same time the power which had compelled the female direwolf broke. She immediately launched herself at Fenris, and the two of them went down snarling and yipping, rubbing each other's scents all along their bodies before the female raced off, Fenris in hot pursuit.

Shaking his head at that little bit of drama Ranma moved around the woodlands, grabbing as many acorns as he could find among the loam. Hours later Fenris hadn't returned, and with a sigh Ranma made his way back out of the woodlands.

The journey took him until the moon was high in the sky, and by the time Ranma made it back to the shore, he knew it was past midnight. Still, Ranma was determined, and retraced his steps all the way to the shoreline, where he picked up speed, surveying the entire shore before stopping at one place which faced out to the Shivering Sea.

From there, Ranma made his way westward, stopping and planting a seed every few hundred feet. It took him the rest of the night, but by the time the sun was rising, he had finished. His hands, despite his ki-toughening them, were red and painful, his knife, which he had been using at first having been dulled and then broken on the hard ground.

After a moment of simply standing and blowing on his hand, Ranma knelt down as he had seen in his vision. He touched the ground directly over the seed he'd just planted, then began to funnel his ki down into the ground. He had to do so for several minutes before he found the seed, yet when he did it was as if a dam in his head, a dam he hadn't even known was there, suddenly came down.

Oh you bastards! Just as fast as Ranma had realized what the Old Gods wanted him to do he realized that the Old Gods had been planning this for years. They had placed some kind of block on his mind, keeping Ranma from accessing his full life force so adroitly he hadn't even realized it, just chalking it up to his normal problems with projecting ki. It was a cold, harsh move which had cost Ranma hundreds possibly thousands of lives he could have saved through use of his ki techniques.

Yet it might just be worth it right now, even how much I hate it. All of his energy which had previously been dammed up inside of him, built up for years yet which he'd been unable to use now came out of him in a torrent. And somehow all of the seeds he'd planted seemed to be connected, taking of his energy to grow far, far faster than they ever should have in nature.

The process continued for hours, draining Ranma of all the hoarded energy of his body, then began to take even further, as the seedlings sprouted into trees all along the shoreline. It took and took until Ranma's vision began to fade, and he slumped to one knee. He tried to break it off, but the connection he'd forged, or possibly the will of the Old Gods, kept him there, kneeling next to the weirwood tree as it grew.

Ranma had no idea how long he slumped there unconscious, but when he awoke it was to Fenris lightly licking his face. "Gerroff," Ranma muttered, trying to raise a hand to push his bonded away only to realize he was too exhausted to raise his arm.

Even so Fenris moved away, dragging a carcass of an elk into view. The sight of the uncooked meat made Ranma's stomach roar louder than he had ever heard it, and he grimaced, before letting Fenris drag him away from the shore, deeper into the woods where the direwolf gathered enough fallen wood to build a fire. Ranma weakly set flint to tinder, then watched rather bemused as Fenris hurled the elk carcass onto the fire.

After a few moments the direwolf ripped off a chunk and brought it to him. As hungry as he was the meat was possibly the tastiest thing Ranma had ever eaten, and he practically devoured the whole carcass himself, not that Fenris seemed to care, having hunted for his own food with his new mate. As Ranma finished eating the female direwolf, who Ranma decided to name Lyanna if he could get her to respond to it, came out of the woodlands, curling up next to Fenris proprietorially.

Ranma smirked at the two of them, chuckling and sending a feeling of congratulations through his link with Fenris. Then sighing he pushed himself to his feet, moving through the woods on weary feet towards the shore once more. Everywhere he looked weirwood trees, young but strong, grew along the shoreline, and he smiled grimly. Now it's up to the Old Gods to keep the White Walkers from landing here again. More power to them say I, so long as they don't fucking take mine again!

The trip back to the main army took Ranma nearly a week exhausted as he was, but eventually he arrived back to the hails of his friends and lords. Explaining they were done on Skagos and that furthermore they had to pull Camp Adamant apart took some doing despite all the evidence of the Old Gods and magic his men had seen, and another few days went by while the army obeyed his odd order and Ranma recovered.

Then they put out to sea once more, heading to Eastwatch-by-the-Sea with a new passenger. The female direwolf refused to be parted from Fenris and Ranma hadn't the heart to argue. Getting her onto the flagship took some doing but eventually she and Fenris were ensconced in his quarters, and the fleet was on its way to the Wall.

OOOOOO

In comparison to Ranma's march and the battle on the shoreline, Daenerys and her forces had it easy marching up to the Wall. They weren't even attacked often because Daenerys had one dragon on patrol at all times, along with Meera and a few men she had trained to move almost as unseen over the lands as she could.

Whichever dragon was not in the air would rest in a massive specially made covered sled, made in the Last Hearth to a design that Bran had created after he learned that dragons needed heat on a daily basis to deal with the cold. It was pulled by five teams of trained reindeer, who handled the cold of the journey with an ease that made Daenerys rather jealous at times.

But with the reindeer and the way the road up to the Wall had been enlarged in the months before the winter war began, they made very good time despite the number of sleds with the army now. Most of the men with her were also on horseback with several remounts and sometimes they even tied themselves into the saddle to keep going at night.

Both Daenerys and Greatjon were consumed by worry about the siege of the Wall, and they knew they had to break it as quickly as possible. That was why Greatjon hadn't objected to the army taking nearly everything edible in the Last Hearth with them and hadn't even tried to suggest he should remain behind. Instead, he had left Willowtree behind and in charge of the defenses of his seat, a sign of his trust in the man who had taken over command of the defenses when Hother was killed during the White Walker's final push to take the castle.

Five times on their trip the dragon on patrol found and destroyed parties of wights. But not once did Meera or her guards see a hint of White Walkers. Not at night, not during the day. Daenerys and Dacey felt this meant they had pulled back up to reinforce the siege on the Wall, while Greatjon felt they might not have had enough White Walkers to spread them out around the more uninhabited areas of the North.

They marched for a little over two months from the Last Hearth up to Castle Black, so much time Daenerys was now into her third trimester of her pregnancy and could no longer ride her dragons let alone a horse. Yet despite their fears, the battle to relieve Castle Black was anti-climactic.

Sitting on the driver's seat of the dragon sled, Daenerys closed her eyes, concentrating on her link to Sunfyre and Rhaegon. She watched as they wallowed into the air, then rode their minds as they rode the wind, sending them forward from the rest of the army as Greatjon, Elia and Dacey prepared the army. With so few dragonglass spears and daggers to go around, they would have to rely on fire arrows and dragonglass arrowheads rather than hand weapons to do any real damage.

Daenerys watched as Sunfyre and Rhaegon fell upon the attackers from behind, burning several dozen wights and White Walkers, swiftly creating a massive dead zone around the makeshift defenses of the beleaguered defenders. Then at her mental urging Rhaegon moved further abroad hunting any signs of movement in the surrounding area while Sunfyre circled the castle that really wasn't one.

Looking at Castle Black Daenerys shook her head, ignoring the odd look she got from the Stark drover sitting beside her.

How odd, it really is designed more as a barracks and training area than a castle, just like Ranma said it was. That lack of defenses facing south makes sense if you fear another Night's Watch King rising, but it nearly bit us in the ass here. If they had concentrated on attacking the Wall from behind, this war would already be over, and the Wall taken. That is a very scary thought, and something we might need to think about in the future if Ranma can't find a way to secure Skagos and Bear Island.

By the time the army was in sight of the battlefield, the battle was over and the siege broken by the dragon's sudden and seemingly unexpected assault.

When they arrived Daenerys and the army were greeted by shouts and cheers from people who looked as if they had been through sheer hell. She stared around at them, raising her hand with a faint, aloof smile, trying to let none of her shock or horror show on her face. Every man and woman there was gaunt to the point of emaciation having lived in starvation conditions, their eyes wide and desperate in their dirty, gaunt faces.

Daenerys spent a moment to order her two dragons into a manger that was currently empty, and then set several Stark men to cover the open entrances to the manger to keep in the heat before following Dacey as she and Greatjon cleared the cheering, boisterous crowd out of the way, making for the tower. Inside she was not met by Lord Commander Mormont, but Tyrion Giantslayer.

The Imp nodded at her, holding out his hand to shake the Queen's. Daenerys shook it gravely and said simply, "My army is laden with as much food as the Last Hearth could spare, along with fresh meat taken on the hunt in the past two days. You'll need to set up plan to distribute them, and order as many hunters as you can out to augment it now."

Tyrion was a ghost of the man he once was. His normal finery hung loose on his small spare frame, his face, which had once been lively and intelligent, looked almost like that of a ghost with sunken cheeks and skull almost visible through his skin. He nodded his eyes lighting up with something well beyond eagerness, an almost desperate hunger in them, his shoulders slumping in a relief so strong it was almost palpable. "You're a Seven-sent miracle Your Majesty, I swear it's enough to make a believer out of even a sinner like me."

He laughed, and Daenerys allowed him to do so as he led them through the tower, though she noted how brittle, almost manic his mirth sounded. Almost as manic as the cheers outside.

Eventually Tyrion stopped laughing, shaking his head, and when he looked at her, some of the edge of hunger and exhaustion had receded in his eyes. "The entire wall was possibly another week, possibly two weeks from running out of food entirely. And for over a month that food's been mostly bowl's o' brown that reminded me all too well of what the smallfolk served to one another in the poorer portions of Kings Landing."

Daenerys nodded. "We'd feared that, which was why I decided to start marching up here after liberating the Last Hearth rather than try to link up with my husband and his army. Tell me, what's been going on here? Other than the siege, how have they been attacking you?"

"Other than keeping us from refilling our larders after an initial hard push the siege became small-scale attacks here and there for a time. Then they learned where the weakest points of the Wall was, and began to hammer them. But we responded to that and they were forced to spread out once more."

"Weaker parts?" Dacey asked skeptically from where she was walking next to Daenerys, ready to aid her if the pregnant queen overbalanced on the stairwell they were currently walking up.

Tyrion shrugged, waving his stump in the air. "The Wall is magical, not just an engineering feat but a magical marvel, ancient runes of power are embedded along its entire length, but some of them have failed over time. Those places let their creations the dragons on the Others come within contact of the Wall, where elsewhere they wouldn't be able to."

"Your losses?" Daenerys asked softly.

"As our men weakened from hunger, our losses mounted whenever they sent a serious attack in. Our losses haven't been bad, we've lost more men to famine and disease than outright attack. Still, the Night's Watch is a shell of the force it was. My own order's lost a bare two hundred men or so, and the other Houses are pretty much the same."

Tyrion frowned heavily, his eyes darkening. "The losses among the smallfolk has been much worse. We had to execute several dozen people for resorting to cannibalism, and there have been several food riots here in Castle Black, which I had to put down harshly which caused several hundred deaths among the smallfolk that retreated here."

"But they haven't reached the Wall." He gripped Daenerys' arm, his eyes feverish and his hand shaking a little. "And that is the main thing Your Majesty! They have an army out there, the size and power of which you can't believe without seeing it. If they had gotten on the Wall with even a 10th of it, they could've swept us aside. But we've held, by the Old Gods and the New, we've held, and with your arrival we'll keep on holding!"

"You have my Lord," Daenerys said with a nod. "And you and every man who served here will be rewarded accordingly. You will be paid as the Royal Army is paid per day, with an extra gold dragon for every man and woman for every week of the siege."

Later that day Dacey and Daenerys made their respects to Lord Commander Mormont while Greatjon organized another convoy back down to the Last Hearth to start bringing up coal. The old man had survived but was too weak to get out of bed at this point the lack of food hitting his old body hard. Others however had simply died of starvation, including the former maester of Castle Black, which caused Daenerys a bit of grief when she heard about it. She had so looked forward to speaking to him, and now that time was gone.

Nonetheless, more food quickly came in as hunters denuded the nearby forests of every animal they could find, with more being shared out along the Wall with the other castles quickly. The next day Daenerys began to move from one castle to another with her little ones, destroying the besieging force here and there and everywhere on the southern side of the wall, but she never let them fly further north, fearing they could be overwhelmed by the undead dragons out there.

When she first saw those things through their eyes Daenerys nearly lost control of both her dragons, even the normally well-tempered Sunfyre, when pure rage ripped through their minds. It was on an order of magnitude greater than their initial reaction to the White Walkers attacking the Last Hearth, as if that anger had been more a mental thing, this was an emotional response, a reaction to this bastardized version of their own might and glory.

Twice as she made her way along the Wall those dragons attacked the Wall, and her little ones ambushed them in turn, slaying two of the undead dragons by overwhelming the larger magical constructions before retreating back over the Wall to those areas of the Wall where their enemies could not travel. This seemed to send the White Walkers into disarray, the entire army falling back, into the Whispering Wood, only their siege engines and a few guards remaining visible.

Soon enough Daenerys and her retinue arrived at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea, which was placed under Greatjon's command now the men he had brought up with from his House joining their brethren. Daenerys ensconced her dragons there, in a large stone stable, while she herself was given the commander's suite for her own use. There she waited with baited breath for news of her husband and his army and from White Harbor as well.

OOOOOO

While the siege of the Wall had broken and the war to the east was seemingly winding down, the siege of Bear Island was also coming to an end, but it looked to be an ending in favor of the attackers. The reinforcements of the White Walkers had arrived, and almost immediately began to attack the keep. Lady Maege immediately ceded the palisade around the longhouse to them, retreating in good order to the longhouse's roof.

While doing so she had fired the palisade, catching 4 of the 10 giant spiders leading the assault, as well as a few of the Giants. But the two dragons cost her dearly on the retreat, her archers simply unable to do anything about them. Even fire arrows only seemed to annoy them like so many bee stings, and their breath attacks and claws had slain several hundred men as they retreated from the palisade.

Now they circled up above the longhouse, waiting until the fire of the palisade died down. Behind that fire the remaining giant spiders served as raised platforms for their archers, which began to duel with her own at long-range. They caused few casualties however, and led a very uneasy life thanks to the ballista on the roof aiming for the spiders. Two spiders had 'died' to its fire before their riders realized the danger. This left only four of them moving around out there, serving as mobile archers platforms for their riders.

Luckily the palisade's fire wasn't going to die down anytime soon. The palisade had been made of wood, both green and not, and had been kept relatively clear of both ice and snow since Maege and her men had fallen back to it. Its feet had also been liberally lathered with fish oil.

Even so, Maege and every surviving defender knew it was only a matter of time. The dragons could attack now, but for some reason the White Walkers were keeping them back, waiting until they could support the giants and the rest of their land-based forces. She watched as several of her archers tried to fire arrows up at the dragons only for one of them to veer off avoiding them easily. The other simply ignored them, the arrows smacking into its underbelly and wings before bouncing away without any effect.

Maege shook her head, thinking of her grandchildren and the other children especially the youths who had stayed to fight, and knew that they would never see another sunrise. That her House would die here, only for all of them to be rise up once again to serve their enemy. If I had a single dragonglass dagger to me, I'd start killing my own people right now to save them from that she thought grimly. Simple death is one thing, serving the White Walkers after death is entirely another.

Shaking her head Maege ordered half of her men down below to get some rest, pulling her cloak and hood around her as she chose a corner of the longhouse's balustrades, leaning against it and closing her eyes. She idly thought about the dead drop that guarded the front door, thinking it ironic that he would probably split stand everything the White Walkers could throw at it, only for the longhouse's roof to fall above it to those damn spiders, which could easily just drop White Walkers or giants onto the roof.

Thinking about that and other, even odder thoughts mostly of what might have been Maege fell into an uneasy dream while the fires of the palisade slowly died down throughout the day and night. The dragons kept circling, and the White Walkers kept sniping, but nothing happened throughout the night save for another spider losing a leg to a ballista bolt. The sound of its screeches didn't rouse Maeve, though they did affect her dreams.

The next morning Maege was woken by a roar from the scrubland behind the wall barricade, which had burned down to nothing through the day and night. There stood the giants, the White Walkers and a few hundred or so wights, along with the remaining giant spiders which would along with the dragons be the true doom of her longhouse.

As men began to race up onto the roof all around her Maege spoke in a deceptively calm tone. "I want half of you archers with fire arrows on those spiders, maybe enough fire will deter them just like it did with the palisade. The rest, fire arrows on the giants, ignore the wights! Armsmen hack at anything you see coming over the balustrade, but beware of elf shot!"

She stared up at the dragons, wondering what kind of plan she could make for them then shouted. "A hundred men stay with me in the center here, your job will be to aim at those dragons which come within range, maybe enough fire arrows will deter them. Aim for the head and the eyes if you can!"

That was as far as Maege got before the White Walkers attacked. The White Walker's spiders led the way, stepping over the giants and wights, while the archers on top of them fired over at the longhouse roof. Men fell screaming as the elf shot hit. Then the two dragons came in from the east and west and Maeve knew that she and her house were about to die.

Deliverance came suddenly and without warning from the south, the area of the woodland nearest the shoreline. It was segued by a bolt of lightning coming out of a clear sky to slam into the face of one of the dragons, which exploded in a blast of gore.

From the woodlands to the south of the longhouse came a shout from thousands of throats. "Honor above all, the Reach and for the king and queen! For the Iron in our blood!"

An army suddenly appeared there coming out of the woodlands and forming up in the scrubland around the longhouse with Jon Stark at their head. He raced forward with Ghost, Arya, Nymeria and surprisingly Eddric beside him howling the battle cry of House Stark. "Winter is coming!"

OOOOOO

Jon howled as the last remaining Dragon drove down towards them, while behind them Asha pointed her mighty finger again. All jokes aside, that glove and the blessing of her god make Asha a very scary woman.

In emphasis to his thoughts another bolt of lightning lanced out, striking one of the giant spiders. Unlike the dragon which simply lost its head, the spider's entire body imploded like a giant overheated steam kettle, slaying its crew instantly and painfully. While the snow and ice that made up its body dissipated in that broiling heat the metal shattered, flung every which way like a catapult stone breaking upon impact, sending shards of stone every which way.

Only this time it was steel not stone. Another spider collapsed to one side its legs and body riddled with the shrapnel, its crew dead along with several dozen wights and White Walkers on the ground. Even a few giants collapsed to the ground, their hearts and head gone.

Jon had no time to marvel at the efficacy of that one shot. He simply pointed one of his blades ahead shouting, "Concentrate on the giants! I'll take the dragon!"

He was answered by a laugh from Arya, who suddenly cut to one side, racing towards where the dragon was turning around to bring its breath to bear on the approaching army. "I think not brother, you just stay here on the ground where you like it, I'll handle this!"

Eddric looked at her aghast and made to follow but Jon shook his head, and Nymeria quickly cut him off. "Leave her to it lad, she's the best we've got for fighting an airborne enemy, we've got other things to attend to." Above them another lightning bolt lanced out, killing the last giant spider. But Jon knew that was the last time Asha would be able to use her magic for a while. Now the army was on its own against the rest of the White Walkers' magical forces.

The dragon flew low, strafing the side of the army with its ice breath, not heading deeper into it for the moment, while its masters analyzed the weaponry of that army, trying to determine if it had dragonglass. After a moment seeing through the dragons eyes they saw no dragonglass among the regular troops and pushed their undead minions and creations forward accordingly.

This dragon however would not have any time to benefit from that knowledge because it had flown low enough for Arya to jump up and grab one of its trailing back legs. Not being alive the dragon didn't feel it, and Arya pulled herself up until she was standing on its large back then began to stab down into its back with Fang. "Die creature!"

But Fang was no Valyrian blade, nor was it made of dragonglass. It couldn't do much damage until Arya found the thing's spine which took a few precious seconds, during which the dragon had used its breath weapon again.

As men died below them Arya hacked into the thing once more and suddenly the dragon felt pain! It had lost feeling in its hind legs, and it roared, turning its head around to stare at whatever had caused the pain. It saw Arya and began to open its mouth, but then Arya lunged forward, her feet leaving the dragons back as she did so, her arms at full extension with Fang held in both hands before her. "Winter is Coming!"

The dragon reared back automatically and rather than the open mouth Fang cut into the outer edge of its maw, and up into the mouth from there. It reared back, pulling Arya with it but she refused to let go. It whiplashed from side to side trying to loosen the blade in its mouth, but Arya didn't let it. Latching her legs around the dragon's neck she ignored the scales cutting into her leggings, pushing forward with all her might even as the dragon continued to spiral upwards.

The dragon lifted up its arms, reaching at Arya and slashing at her. But Arya moved this way and that around its neck avoiding the claws, wincing as the scales cut further into her legs and the cold of the air around them began to penetrate. Even so she still thrust Fang upwards, trying to drive the blade up through the thing's mouth and into its brain.

One of the claws caught her back, and Arya grimaced in pain as it opened up the lizard lion armor. But it didn't penetrate deeply enough to cripple her and a moment later she had thrust Fang up to its hilt finally finding the thing's brain. It immediately began to fall like a rock.

Turning Arya got onto the things back as it continued to drop downwards, and she frowned, speaking to herself for a moment, her words whipped away by the wind. "Perhaps I didn't think this all the way through..." A second later the dragon crashed into the snow and earth below.

Arya was flung free, and she cursed luridly as she slammed once, twice, five times like a skipping stone over water before she came to a bumpy landing against a tree. Groaning she pushed herself up, shaking her head as she stared at the battle, and then decided that just this once, she could sit this one out and leaned back against the tree again.

With Jon and the wolves disrupting the giants, the glaives went to work both on them and on the White Walkers. Hundreds of men fell to the White Walkers, their speed and strength beyond normal men, but the glaives ability to slice off limbs, a few Valyrian blades, and Dawn proved effective enough. By the time midday arrived, the battle for Bear Island was over.

Jon leaned heavily against the carcass a downed giant, staring down at one of his twin swords both of which were covered with yellow Ichor. "Note to self, White Walker bodies may be immune to regular blades, but their eyes are not."

He looked up as cheers and shouts of "Stark, Stark! The North!" Abounded from the longhouse. He waved his twin swords in the air for a moment, which caused the roars to double in volume.

He was about to move in that direction when Arya limped were over towards him. "You think you have problems?"

She was leaning heavily on Eddic, who was bearing up easily under her slight weight. He nodded at Jon, who nodded back, raising one of his blades in a swift salute.

Dawn and Eddic had both proven their worth here. White Walkers might die from Valyrian blades, but the moment Eddic had pulled out Dawn, any White Walkers who saw it had actually recoiled in fear. Valyrian daggers and swords could kill them, but dragonglass could kill them painfully and apparently so could Dawn, only even more so. Several times during the battle Eddic had injured a White Walker only to watch as it died screaming. Even the giants weren't immune to it, and his presence had possibly kept the casualties among the regular armymen down to a somewhat manageable level.

Arya held up the broken hilt of Fang, shaking her head. "That damn dragon bit my sword in half!" Jon stared at her, then around at the battlefield as he thought about all the politics crap he'd had to deal with, and how much easier the actual battle was. Then he began to laugh and he only stopped when Arya smacked him upside the head several minutes later.

OOOOOO

About a week after leaving Skagos, Ranma and the rest of his army arrived at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. He was greeted there by fanfares and trumpets, but more importantly by both Merry and his wife, who was very visibly pregnant. Ranma carefully hugged Daenerys to him, laying his hands gently on her distended stomach, staring into her violet eyes. "Daenerys."

He packed her name with as much emotion and love as he could and Daenerys actually shivered in his arm for a moment in response while Merry laughed quietly nearby. She had gotten her own such response from Ranma weeks back, and then again from Daenerys when she arrived here in Eastwatch a bare few days ago.

"Ranma. I missed you sorely my love." Daenerys said, and Ranma laughed nodding. She kissed the side of his face lovingly before whispering. "You got here in good time, Merry and her female aids believe that I'm four weeks at best away from giving birth."

"Then I arrived at the perfect time." Ranma said smiling. "Now, I'd actually like to get out of this wind if it's all the same to you two, I presume we've been given quarters." Later on in their room Ranma and Daenerys pulled Merry into a three-way hug and then Ranma gave both his loves a tongue lashing, toe curling kiss. He pulled back with a sigh, chuckling at how Merry looked so wobbly on her feet as Daenerys simply leaned against his shoulder breathing deeply. "I missed you both so much!"

"And we missed you, but we had to part, you are right about that back in Maidenpool. We all did more good separate then we could have done if we stayed together." Daenerys replied, before turning to make certain the door to their room had locked behind them.

Their Lords let Ranma have some time with his wife and Merry, assuming that since the queen was too far along her pregnancy for their reunion to become physical and that Merry was close enough to both that her remaining with them was simply a sign of that friendship. They exchanged tales, with Ranma being particularly interested in how Daenerys broke the siege of Castle Black and what happened afterwards with the White Walker's army while Ranma absolutely astonished his listeners when explaining what it happened on Skagos.

"I don't like it that the White Walkers pulled back so quickly." He mused. "That disturbs me."

"You mentioned several times in your own tales that they were susceptible to casualties. Could they simply realize now they'll never get past the Wall? Could they be looking for other ways around the Wall?" Daenerys asked.

"No, they're not done yet. Have we heard from Bear Island?" Ranma replied.

"We have a brief raven message from them. It appears that rather than stay in the south as our Hand, Jon came north with a significant sized force from the Reach. Including Arya, her betrothed Edric Dayne, and Margaery Tyrell, who, in Jon's words, he has an 'agreement' with." Daenerys smirked while Ranma laughed, glad that bit of conniving had played itself out as they expected.

But when Daenerys went on her voice was serious. "There were some other things he mentioned, including a mention about the Iron Islands and Asha Greyjoy coming with them, and an Archmaester Martyn who wishes to put himself at our service. Garth Hightower is leading a decent sized force of Hightower men from Deepwood Motte up to the Wall as an honor guard for him, though how quickly they'll move through the mountains and the Wolfswood, or even if they can, is anyone's guess."

"But Jon's already stated he'll remain on Bear Island with his main force against any further invasion attempts from the Frozen Shore. We'll get word to him about what you did on Skagos, and see if he and Arya can reproduce it." Daenerys finished.

"Agreed, but for now, I think we'll need to be prepared for another push here." Later that day Ranma made that point to his lords, though many of them weren't convinced. After, of course, giving his condolences to Harrion Karstark, along with Greatjon and meeting with Tyrion briefly.

"Surely my lord the White Walker's won't wish to lose any more men in a battle they can't win. If the force here on the Wall know that the siege is broken and more aid has arrived, will they really through good gold after bad? I would think with the regular physical defenses of the Wall any such idea would be insane." Tytos said.

"I don't think the White Walkers are actually insane, but they are determined. They'll come after us again, especially now the magic in the Wall has weaknesses. Has something been found about that?"

Lord Commander Mormont and Tyrion both shrugged. "We've been searching all the castles for any information we could find about them, but we haven't had any luck. None of the surviving records mention anything about them, and only Castle Black has any records at all."

Ranma frowned. "I hate to suggest this, but when I was passing through the Neck, Howland's son Jojen mentioned a vision he had. Apparently the boy's been a sort of seer most of his life, only as events piled on one another before the war his visions began to get more and more imprecise. Still, he mentioned a stone in Castle Black, and the dragons, not certain what the connection is there, but it's something at least."

"We'll concentrate our search in Castle Black, but we haven't found anything yet." Tyrion said despondently.

Ranma nodded, but went on. "Just try your best. In the meantime, I want the Royal Army spread out along the Wall, rotate as much of the defenders off as you can, get the castles that you were previously using and the lands around them built back up." Many of those castles had to be cut off entirely from the ground below, in order to keep the White Walkers from getting up onto the Wall due to too few defenders. "But I want every commander to know that at least two-thirds of his force is to be ready to defend the Wall at all times."

That very evening, as portions of the royal army were dispersed along the Wall Ranma's prediction was proven correct. In the dark of night, with the moon blocked entirely by clouds, the White Walkers made their move.

Whatever else could be said about them, the White Walkers were not stupid. They learned and they knew tactics if not strategy. And they had magic, which is what they began the battle with. The snow slowly falling from the sky suddenly became ice as a wave of fear and cold hit the Wall.

These physical representations of the White Walkers magic represented the massive thrust of their magical power hitting the weakened Wall with everything the White Walkers could muster. Knowing that their new tricks had failed to allow them around the Wall, the White Walkers had become desperate. Hundreds, thousands of magic users from the most powerful to those who had been sent forward with the army, most of whom were mere journeymen, joined together in small groups scattered everywhere along the wild North Beyond the Wall.

The runes, which had been too long without their power being renewed, began to fade here and there at this sudden and overpowering assault. Not all of them, and not all at once, those runes on either side of runes which had been damaged or lost all their powers over the years faded most quickly, while others faded slowly, if at all.

It didn't matter however, the White Walker warriors and the army had their orders. Out of the Haunted Forest came practically their entire land based army, thrown directly at Eastwatch-by-the-Sea. This sudden and overwhelming attack pulled the entire remaining Royal Army up onto the wall directly in front of Eastwatch and to the west of it for three castles, along with all of the nearby forces which had already been on the wall.

The siege weapons on both sides fired, and the undead dragons began to attack wherever they could. The White Walkers wights and spiders moved forward, and men, undead, and a few White Walkers began to die.

The dragons were the most dangerous threat. They slaughtered many of the defenders, now able to land in scattered areas cleared of the magic that had kept them back. But they were met by the Wolfsworn. Theon Bowsinger killed several before they could land, and when they did, the Wolfsworn Greatjon and the others who wielded Valyrian blades met them head on.

The sight of this fearlessness rallied the men, and those with spears quickly got into the habit of rushing forward if it looked as if a dragon would actually come within their range. The undead dragons were not actually very intelligent and often would come within range of the humans' spears even if they were just trying to use their breath weapons. Many an undead dragon died that night on a dragonglass spear-tip wielded by a common-born infantryman.

The giant spiders also were a major threat now because now they were able to climb up the Wall's northern face. Wildfire and siege weapons killed hundreds of them, but those that lived to get up the Wall deposited White Walkers directly onto the Wall's massive parapet. And again it was proven that White Walkers were simply faster and stronger than normal men. They lacked the defenders organization however, and could not match the Wolfsworn, Fenris or his mate up close and personal.

Hundreds of men died in that fight, and more broke, but the Wall so attacked held thanks to the Royal army and the Wolfsworn. But this attack, for all its force, was but a feint, designed to pin the human reinforcements in place to allow the true attack to hit the humans where they were already weak.

Several dozen dragons, their backs heavily laden with White Walkers, flew up so high into the air over the Wall that they were practically out of sight from the Wall below them, then, several turns of the glass they dove down like raptors seeking prey on Castle Black.

The first sign their plan might fail came in dragonfire. Five of them died as the others scattered, fear of the fire of the real dragons which burned both undead dragon and passengers alike filling them before their masters could regain control and force them down.

Six of them turned heading toward the two living dragons, which quickly ascended into the sky, knowing as Daenerys did that height meant life in air combat. Linked to their queen's mind as they were, Sunfyre and Rhaegon danced in the air, working in tandem a linked team their opponents could not match.

Rhaegon and Sunfyre had originally come out of the sky to the south having flown out from Castle Black the moment the drums had warned of the attack. Daenerys had originally intended to use them to both make certain there weren't any more White Walkers south of the Wall waiting for this attack, but at Ranma's behest she had kept them in the area after that rather than send them east towards the attack.

Ranma had studied the White Walkers, and knew that misdirection came naturally to them, and so would be the tactic they would use if given the chance. Every time they tried to fight humans straight up they lost, at least in this war. Misdirection, feints, and ambushes were where the White Walkers were strongest, and while the Wall made ambushes practically impossible, and they could no longer go around the Wall, misdirection was still possible.

This was why Ranma was at Castle Black too. He stood by Tyrion and Lord Commander Mormont, staring up at the dragons. And this time fuckers, I've got enough ki to use my attacks as often as I want. "Ready yourselves my lords. The Wall stands, tonight and every night after the Wall Stands!"

His cry was answered by a roar from several thousand throats and arrows arched into the sky at the descending dragons. Many of those arrows didn't actually have arrowheads, instead they carried small pouches of wildfire. When they hit, naturally the wildfire ignited, and the undead dragons burned.

"Direwolf's Claw!" Ranma shouted, again and again, slaying more than a dozen undead dragons and their riders before they could land on the parapet. Only nine of the undead beasts landed successfully, but that was enough to bring more than 270 White Walkers onto the Wall. Men began to die all around Ranma and he nodded at Tyrion grimly. "Good luck Imp, see you at dawn!"

"Aye your grace, I've already got a wench picked out to celebrate seeing another day!" Tyrion laughed, and he raced forward with Bronn a shadow in the dark following as Ranma made for the nearest dragon, Ice out and ready.

With the last of the dragons facing them dead, Daenerys called back Rhaegon to the small prepared stable while she, Elia, Meera, and several dozen wounded searched the castle. Daenerys, concentrating as she was on her two little ones, was next to no help, and indeed had to be led along by Meera. Daenerys had no idea why she thought they would find something Tyrion, Jeor and all their searching hadn't before, but she also knew they were in dire straits right now, and needed a miracle.

Indeed, the battle to the east had become vicious by this point. The sheer number of White Walkers and wights assailing the Wall, the spiders and their ability to climb it now, and the dragons were taking a bloody toll on the defenders.

The defenders organization and the Wolfsworn were now able to keep the White Walkers coming across from the giant spiders at bay, and indeed more of them were dying well short of the parapet now, rocks and rubble tossed over the side did for those. The defender's catapults and wildfire were also taking a horrible toll on the attacking horde.

But the mages controlling the dragons had learned to keep them away from the Wolfsworn, and were slowly learning to keep them out of spear range. Giants too had begun to appear, being up to the parapet by the giant spiders. And whenever a group of White Walkers made it onto the parapet, the death toll among the defenders was horrendous, made worse when those they slew rose to serve them.

If not for the Royal Army being there the Wall would soon have been lost, which would become a mystery in the future: why didn't the White Walkers attack en-masse earlier than this, before the full Royal Army could arrive? Many historians came up with different answers, but none could really come up with an understandable answer. The best guess was they didn't really understand or care about the humans being reinforced, or they had hoped to take the wall without a full frontal assault, since even without its magical defenses, the Wall gave its defenders an almost overwhelming advantage if they had the numbers to man it.

None would ever know the real reason: that to the White Walkers, the Wall was a mere beginning. They wanted to crush the Ancient Foe, the Starks and their allies in one battle, break their morale, and regain that feeling of fear and awe that was as important a weapon to them as the magic which allowed them to raise the dead.

That fear and awe had taken a major hit with every victory the humans had won, but it all centered on Ranma, Daenerys and the Wolfsworn. Killing them would allow the white Walkers to regain that fear and behead the human resistance at the same time. And it wasn't like those in command of the White Walkers cared about the warriors dying in their hundred this day, or about any of their creatures.

Cutting down another White Walker, Ranma grounded Ice between two stones of the parapet, leaping up onto its pommel then into the air, bringing his hands forward. "Direwolf Claw!"

Another dragon died, and Ranma remained in the air for a moment to shoot off another ki attack at an undead wyvern, for that was what Daenerys called the undead dragons having noticed how different they were from her own 'little ones', that was trying to get behind Sunfyre. He wondered where Rhaegon was, but decided Dae must have decided to rotate the dragons.

Ranma approved, since this fight looked to be a battle of attrition rather than shock. Thinking that and feeling a faint lull in the battle around him, Ranma landed by Tyrion and his second-in-command, whose name Ranma could never remember. "Tyrion, pull half of your archers back, rest them for now we'll go with resting a fourth of our men every hour for your own men, and every four for my own. Then I want two squads of ten sent out in both directions along the Wall."

Tyrion nodded, pulling out his sword from a White Walker who had been unable to dodge his attack, its leg having been impaled right under its strange black armor by another warrior's spear. "You want to know where else we're being hit? We heard the drums from the east but they could have thrown some more attacks like this elsewhere."

"Yeah, but I also want to know where the magic of the Wall is still active. If we can pull men from those sectors to where the Wall's magic is weakest, we might be able to start getting some force parity here." Tyrion didn't know the words force parity, but he understood their meaning, and simply nodded, moving off quickly.

Ranma turned to Jeor, frowning at the old man who really should have sat out this battle. Despite a few weeks of good food, the old man hadn't recovered his strength from the siege he and his men had faced, and he was gasping now, the Valyrian bastard sword Longclaw dipping down to ground itself on the stone of the parapet.

"Jeor, I want you to pull back around two-hundred of your men who're most tired, we'll keep them back for now as an emergency reserve."

"Your Majesty, that will leave you badly understrength on this section of the Wall, and the runes here are failing even now!" Jeor said, gesturing to one side. The light of the runes could be seen here and there moving along the Wall, but here in front of castle Black itself they had gone dark quickly after the drums had warned of the attack further east.

"I know, but the White Walkers seem to've realized their attempt at a feint failed, that means they'll keep pounding us with smaller forces, try to wear us down here and to the east as well, so we might need those men later on more than we do now. Besides, I hope to bring in more forces from the west if possible." Ranma had not met Val, but had heard good things about her from Tyrion and Daenerys, who had, and if her part of the Wall wasn't under attack, the wildlings could certainly be of help here.

Just then a hail of arrows soared up onto the parapet, killing several down men as the crews of four giant spiders fired up onto the parapet from where they had been unseen far below the light of the torches. The defenders, even Ranma, had concentrated so much on the undead wyverns they hadn't even seen the giant spiders climbing up the Wall until they were in position.

At the same time the dragons which had been circling and trying to draw Sunfyre away from the Wall north turned and raced down. Even while Sunfyre slipped in behind them and flamed two of them out of the sky the others landed wherever they could along the wall, disgorging White Walkers and a few of the undead giants.

"Shit! Tyrion grab your fucking archers and push them to the parapet. Patrek grab a few of your men and start heaving rubble over the side. Lord Jeor, looks like...Jeor?" Ranma frowned turning back to Jeor and stopped speaking as he saw the Old Bear, his body slumped around an arrow that had caught him in the gorget, punching through his armor.

As the battle raged outside, Daenerys took a moment to come out of her trance partway, having just ordered Sunfyre to switch off with Rhaegon. Rhaegon had far better combat instincts than Sunfyre, and she had become an expert at riding the rage and fury both dragons felt fighting the White Walkers and their creations.

Looking around she shook her head at Meera and Elia and the men of House Cerwyn, who had served under Kyle Conton before their injuries took them off the Wall. "We're running out of time I think. Whatever magical attack the White Walkers have used is spreading. If the magic of the Wall falls completely, the White Walkers have the forces to spread us thin, then break us."

The queen who had faced more battles than any woman of her line had ever faced before shivered, her hands going to her belly and the life within. "We could very well lose this war unless we find this damn stone Jojen Reed saw in his so-called visions."

Meera nodded while the men grumbled and muttered among themselves. Most of them were missing limbs, or had fared even worse than most under the siege conditions, and so couldn't really do much in combat, but even so being sidelined like this was hard for all of them.

Elia watched them all carefully, very wary about three women being alone with so many men, regardless of how honorable they were supposed to be or the ladies station.

But Meera had her mind on other things, staring around at the deep basement the group had been trying to explore, with somewhat limited success. "You know, I think we might have been going about this the wrong way." As Daenerys raised an eyebrow the younger girl went on. "I mean, Ranna said Jojen's vision showed one of your dragons breathing on the stone? Well, can your picture even Sunfyre being able to fit down here, even if you could convince them to try?"

"I can't believe I didn't think of that." Daenerys scowled angry at herself, not Meera. "So what we're looking for is either part of the keep itself, somewhere high up, or on the first floor of the basement area."

Elia frowned, turning back to the conversation. "Someplace hidden in plain sight perhaps? Yet I have no idea where that would be."

"The King's Tower." Daenerys said, definitively. "It makes the most sense, either there or in the Lord Commander's tower, but that tower's been in use for decades, the King's Tower hasn't been. Even when I arrived I didn't move into it, though I could have. We'll restart the search there."

Meera and Elia both nodded, and raced out of the vaults through the Shieldhall and out into the snow covered ground, using the tunnels dug through the snow to move through the courtyard. They had to wait until the men with them broke open the door which was frozen solid. The gate and lock had also rusted in the centuries since the tower had last been used.

Eventually, as the battle on the wall became more desperate however they broke through. The men spread out quickly, while the three women stayed together, heading up to the top. They found their way blocked at several points, but eventually they were able to get up to the small chamber that visiting kings must have used to hold court in.

A large oaken chair sat on a small dais at the end facing several large murder holes, set rather closer together than most Daenerys had seen before, while the frayed remains of a carpet could still be seen on the ground covering the area between the doorway and the 'throne.' Several piles of dust and remains could be seen here and there along the walls on either side showing where four large tapestries had previously hung.

On the hard stone of the walls were carved several direwolves and dragons, along with lions, roses, and other heraldic symbols taken from the powerful Houses of Westeros. The carvings had survived the centuries far better than the rest of the finery in the room had, though given how many centuries it had been Daenerys thought that should have been obvious.

"It's here," Daenerys murmured. "Somewhere in this room, I just know it! Spread out, look for any kind of stone that seems out of place."

Meera shook her head moving forward quickly. "Remember what Elia said, hiding in plain sight?" She pushed the oaken throne backwards, and underneath it was a large stone of purest black, so black it seemed to suck at the torches she, Elia and the few men who had followed them held.

"That's it then," Daenerys murmured, closing her eyes. "I think those murder holes are large enough, so..." She reached out for Sunfyre, leaving Rhaegon to his own devices entirely for now.

The larger of her two dragons was having fun, dancing and slashing in and out of the undead wyverns. His fire and mobility gave Rhaegon an edge over their numbers, while his greater strength allowed him to both retain and regain the height advantage that was life or death in midair combat. None of the undead wyverns could match his ability to come out of dives or move as fast.

Sunfyre came out of the shed, and instead of joining the battle high up over the looming Wall made for the far smaller Royal Tower. His claws allowed him to actually hang onto the side of the tower as he put an eye to one of the murder holes. Seeing Daenerys inside, he stared at the large black stone she gestured at. Then he waited while Daenerys, unwilling to risk her unborn child to dragonfire, joined Meera, Elia and their men in the hallway. Once they were all in place, Sunfyre breathed in deeply then let loose a torrent of fire through the murder hole he had previously been looking through.

The fire seared through the murder hole and across the small throne room, impacting the black stone and moving over it, but something odd happened. Instead of hitting and splashing as fire normally would when impacting stone, the fire that actually hit the stone vanished, sucked into the black stone. Then runes of red, gold and blue began to appear all along the stone, intertwining and then disappearing into the stone of the tower, which, though no one had ever thought about it for centuries, backed up against the Wall.

In the battle more than one White Walker warrior frowned, feeling something on the edge of their senses. But they didn't have the training necessary to understand what it was. Nor did they or their opponents, pressed hard now as more giants were brought up by the monstrous spiders, notice how the blood of those who had fallen began to be somehow sucked into the cracks between the stones of the Wall.

But they definitely noticed when the wards, which had been losing power as the magical pressure on them continued, began to flare back into life. The warriors cried out and those that could began to retreat, while those that could not, died. All along the Wall the wards reactivated slowly but surely. Here and there those runes that had been damaged flared up darkly, not complete by any means but still powerful enough to join the chain of the magical defense.

Powered and renewed by the blood of those who defended it and the fire of the dragons they flared up for those with eyes to see, cutting off the White Walkers influence from further north. Those surviving wights south of the Wall collapsed where they stood, dead for real this time. Yet they died without pain, the magic in them simply cutting off, like those undead creations stuck on the Wall. Not so the White Walkers caught on the Wall. The White Walkers died where they stood, screaming in anguish until they collapsed into fine ash.

The White Walkers lords were not fools. They stared through the eyes of their fellows nearest the Wall, and seeing that brimming energy decided. At some unseen signal the entire army began to retreat from the Wall, leaving behind their dead and undead creatures alike.

Ranma saw this, and laughed loud and long, raising Ice high in the air. All around him the men began to cheer, as they realized that the Winter War was all finally over.

OOOOOO

Of course, life was never as clean as that. Plans had to be made for the Royal family to head back to Winterfell and the disbursement of the army. With the Wall once more empowered as it was, it no longer needed as large a defensive force. "I think we've earned a few months of simple family time." Ranma said, later that evening, as he held his wife to him in their giant bed in Castle Black.

Her belly was such that she could only sleep on her back, and even that was rather uncomfortable, but there was nothing wrong with her mind even so. "I think everyone else in the army could use the same my love. I've already sent orders to Eastwatch and Ser Davos to prepare the Royal Navy. They'll be taking the Vale Lords and the Riverlands lords' home. The Vale Lords have proven themselves in this war, and..."

"And the Riverlands forces have been almost as true to us and our cause as the northern forces. And have much further to travel to go home." Ranma finished. "But we'll retain the Dornish and Reach forces on the Wall and Bear Island. Just in case, and they have the most to prove I feel. Though with Jeor gone Tyrion will be in charge of the Wall's defenses.

Bear Island though is still vulnerable until we hear that my siblings have been able to somehow do what I did on Skagos there. We should also leave the Wolfsworn, or at least those Wolfsworn who aren't needed at home by their wives. Roger needs something to do after the death of his wife, and Hathar can stay with him, though Smalljon will have to go home with his father to help rebuild their lands."

Roger's wildling wife had died in the final few moments of the battle on the Wall, unwilling to retreat despite having been wounded early on. Roger was crushed by it, and desperately needed something important to concentrate on. He was also a good organizer and tracker, and would serve the defenders here well.

"Yes, House Umber, Mormont and House Karstark. I heard you rewarded House Karstark for their loyalty, and I know your mother plans to arrange a marriage between a Mormont girl and Bran, just like Rickon and Katarina Cerwyn. But we'll have to think of something to do for House Umber."

"Not really," he said with a shake of his head. "Give them control of the Long Knife and the canal, give them a percentage of the taxes from the goods traveling down it, and a new title, defender of the Gift say, and House Umber will be happy."

"And of course paying for the repairs to their seat," Daenerys murmured, nuzzling into his shoulder.

The door opened then and Merry walked in, smiling at the two of them before closing the door behind her and quickly moving to the bed. Getting underneath the covers she began to pull off her clothing one piece at a time tossing them to the floor by the bed, laughing as she noticed Ranma's rising excitement. "You two have been thinking somber thoughts for too long, I think it's time you concentrated on something more important don't you?"

Daenerys smiled at the two of them, she was too far along to join in of course, but that didn't mean she wouldn't like to watch the two of them. "I quite agree my love."

Later that night Ranma slept with his two ladies asleep against his shoulders, smiling. The Winter War had ended, humanity was victorious and so lived on, and a new life was on the way for the new royal house.

There would be other songs to sing of the royal family and their allies, other problems, other wars. Not only against the White Walkers, but Essos as well, since winter would soon hit that continent as well, and just because Skagos and Bear Island were protected from the White Walkers new and surprising tactics of using icebergs, did not mean that Essos was. And Westeros of course had other issues, other problems that would rear their heads occasionally.

But for now, as Ranma said, they had won some time for themselves and for their families. And really, what else could anyone ask for?

The End

---

Woot. Just woot. I had a devil of a time coming up with ways to make all the battles in this chapter different enough to not make them the equivalent of rinse/repeat. I realize that I could have gone into detail, put in a lot more scenes here and there of character interaction or about logistics or about travel in winter or any number of things. But I wanted to show war and how this war was different from the ones Ranma and the others fought before, and how alike it was in other ways and felt that I had done enough character interactions before this chapter.

I also know some people will think I should keep going, showing the rest of winter, the problems it causes, the news of the Golden Tooth running out of gold, the Essossi issues, the last Greyjoy brother being hunted down like a dog and possibly his horrible, horrible death. But I am just burned out on this world. Too much war/politics is not a good thing, and this, when the main reason Ranma was brought to this world has been dealt with, was the right place to stop. And indeed this was where I wanted to end it when I began this story, before I realized how many other plots I'd have to introduce over time. I hope you all enjoyed it even if this ending doesn't tie things up in a pretty bow.