Worse, he couldn't pin Ned down. Eddard and Brynden were moving through the city rather than trying to stop in any one area, and they were doing it better than Jaime's forces. This problem was made worse by two things. The first was that his troops didn't have the same level of organization that Ned's did, though he only had a vague idea of how badly he was outmatched there.

Like the Winterfell and Hornwood men Daryn had led in the ambush the wildlings sprang on him, the men of Lord Stark's personal guard had been organized into five-man squads, with each looking towards a squad leader who relayed commands and kept order. They all worked together smoothly, with very little need after a few hours to even check in with Eddard. This had led to several of his squads being mousetrapped, boxed into alleyways that didn't allow them to use their superior numbers by much smaller groups of Northerners.

Eddard had taken it further. As they were moving through a city if one group or another saw either that they were about to walk into an ambush or a place to set an ambush, Ned had given them leeway to do so, so long as they checked in first.

Coupled with their individual training which Ranma had seen to over the past few months this made the Northerners and their allies equal to any force three times their size. None of the Riverrun men were as good as Ser Jory and the contingent from Winterfell that had trained with Ranma back home as often as they could, but they were better than the normal run of armsmen. Eddard He was using the men from Riverrun as runners and extra shock troops feeding them into any battle where he needed them, leaving the scouting and most of the combat to his Winterfell armsmen.

The second problem was even worse than that however.

In large areas of the city there were roving gangs of smallfolk, many of whom were simple looters using this chaos as an opportunity for profit. But many were not, instead they were looking for anyone with a Lannister uniform or anyone else. They couldn't battle larger groups of troops, not in a straight fight anyway, but they could harass, throwing bricks or anything that came to hand, and had picked off dozens, possibly hundreds of his men, disappearing in the chaos of the city.

It hadn't even been twenty years since the city had been sacked by Jaime's father and his forces when they turned on Mad King Aerys. There were places still bore the marks of that battle, and there were thousands of families in the city that had lost people to the swords of the Lannisters. Normally the smallfolk would be too downtrodden to act against the Lannisters, especially since they were connected to the king, who despite being a drunkard was well thought of by most of the smallfolk, who credited him with getting rid of the Mad King. Now however, these people rose up to back the Hand who had done so much in the city to cut back on the noble's abuse of power in the city.

The entire city was embroiled in chaos now. There were very few safe zones, and Jaime was close to losing the bubble entirely, losing control of the flow of the battle. The navy crews had all pulled up oars and moved away, retaining the neutrality that was their calling card without the Master of Ships or the King around to command their loyalty.

And the gold cloaks were no help at all to either side. While Jaime had shut down the largest gold cloak garrison in the city, the rest were in the midst of a civil war of their own. Those who backed the anticorruption reforms of Lord Stark were fighting desperately against the old hands who wanted everything to go back to the way they had been.

Surprisingly in the rank-and-file the ones backing Lord Stark outnumbered those who wanted the old order to return, but they were not as well led or organized. That battle was seesawing back and forth in nearly every garrison, and was very bloody, with a lot of old and new scores being settled.

In the Mud Gate however, Jaime had been forced to send the men from this garrison under Deem to combat the men there. Jacelyn Bywater was an honorable man who had long hated the amount of corruption in the gold cloak ranks, a veteran who had earned his knighthood from Robert in the Greyjoy rebellion. He had command of the Mud Gate, and nearly the entire garrison would have gone over to the Starks if Jaime hadn't boxed them in with Deem's men. That battle was probably the bloodiest in the city right now.

Jaime had no idea how it would go, but he felt his family's supporters had the edge overall. Along with sending Deem to the Mud Gate he had sent Gundar Pyle, Lord of the minor House of Pyle in the Crownlands, with two knights and twenty armsmen to aid his side in the other garrisons, moving from one to another, adding the men in each to his ready forces.

He rubbed his face angrily. "Dammit, this isn't the kind of fight I'm built for." He had warned his sister this might happen if they didn't wait until Lord Stark had returned to the keep. Yet Cersei had feared Stark's ability to rally the Gold Cloaks, a fear that had been justified apparently. That left the single largest (numerically speaking) force in the city out of it. Though the second largest seemed to be following his orders, though its presence hadn't been something he even had a hint of before the battle began.

"And that's something we're going to talk about later, Baelish, you little snake." Jaime murmured to himself, looking at a map of the city.

It was a decent map, at least it marked out all the major roads and quite a few of the alleyways in the upper sections of the city, but it was nowhere near complete. On it was marked where his patrols had run into issues with the smallfolk, as well as where they had reported clashes with the men under Lord Stark. There were also several marks where mercenaries who, according to them, answered to the Master of Coin had joined in even without his first ordering them.

I don't know how Lord Stark is doing it, keeping control of his troops as well as he is and still moving through the city! But Petyr having such a large force on hand in the city is dangerous as hell, he must have had at least a thousand men all told! Not very good mercenaries for the most part, but a thousand is still a thousand. Though thankfully, that number has shrunk badly over the last few hours.

Jaime smirked at that. He had been pushing the mercenaries into the battle every time he could, and their losses had been much worse in those of his own men or the Lannister supporters outside of the gold cloak barracks, which again Jaime looked at as an expendable resource.

Of course, our losses taking the Tower will probably make up for that. Jaime thought sardonically looking over to where the Red Keep loomed above his command post on the Street of Sisters. I do not envy our men trying to pry the Starks out of there.

He growled angrily, pushing away from the table as he stood up abruptly. "Enough, I'm not doing anyone any good here! You!" he growled looking over at one of the men who had been bringing in reports. "Where was the latest sighting of Lord Stark?"

After being told the answer, Jaime left with a band of fifty Lannister men, heading in an attempt to try and circle around Ned's position. He just missed a messenger coming down from his sister about her missing daughter.

OOOOOO

The battle for the tower was over. Ser Willowtree knew it, and that knowledge was bitter in his mouth despite the fact he had seen it coming even before the battle was joined. Now only Adam, Lucas and four others remained alive outside Royer and his men on the top floor. Nine men were all that stood between the daughter of their sworn Lord and the blades of the Lannisters.

It was a bitter thought, made worse by knowing that the servants of the Tower that they had been protecting had probably been slaughtered by this point as they were forced to retreat to stay between the attackers and the top floor. He had personally seen several of them, including Vayon Poole, the majordomo, cut down.

The old man took his killer with him though with a massive meat knife he had taken from somewhere, slamming it into the soldier's neck even as the man's sword took Vayon in the guts. That had filled Willowtree with pride, but the screams of the maids had nearly overridden his self-control. He had lost five men at that point who had raced down to battle the reavers, and been surrounding and slaughtered in the Hand's council room.

"But we cost them." Lucas said, as if reading his mind. "We cost them sore, Adam Willowtree and no man could have asked for better."

A younger Riverrun man standing nearby scowled irritably, twanging the bowstring of a bow he had picked up along the way. "I just wish that bastard Joffrey had worked up enough courage to come forward! I'd only need one shot!"

They had seen the crown prince a time or two as the battle went on coming forward to harangue his troops, though it was possible he had been there all along, or even ordered the all-out assault in the first place. He never came near to the front, but made certain that everyone could see that he was there and 'taking part'.

"Tough luck on that lad," growled another man, a grizzled veteran from Riverrun. He was holding one arm awkwardly, and was bleeding from somewhere underneath his chain mail, but then again all of them were dealing with various injuries. "That little waste of shit doesn't have the courage to actually join the fight. He might break a nail or something."

That caused a rough round of laughter among the others, and the younger man smiled. "I just wish I was going to be around to see Lord Stark storming up here."

Adam said nothing while the others agreed with that, he had his own ideas about what was going on in the city at large. He had taken the time during one of the lulls in the action to look out a window and had seen fires in the city.

Whatever had happened it was clear that their Lord was busy. No help was going to arrive to save the day.

He turned as the noise from the staircase leading down signaled that the Lannister men were coming up again. The survivors of the battle up to this point had become veterans of storming up staircases into defended positions. They came in groups of seven men with space between each group.

The first seven men ran up in step wearing plate armor heavy helmets and with shields above their heads to protect against blows from the top of the stairs. Their job was not to kill the defenders, but to push or hack away at the makeshift barricade at the top of the stairs. Four of the seven men died doing it, but they hacked the large table that was the centerpiece of the barricade into chunks, letting the next wave of attackers hack at the barricade or the defenders on the other side. This method had worked before, though as always losses among the first groups of attackers was heavy.

Adam found himself pushed back by the rush of Lannister men, barreling the remains of the barricade backwards so they could clear the staircase. He saw that interspersed with the swordsmen were others, who were now wielding truncheons. Even while he ran one through with his sword, that sight caused Adam to frown.

To his left a truncheon slammed Lucas to the floor with an overhand blow to the head which dented his helmet and sent his man senseless to the ground. They're trying to capture us now! Adam realized with a start. But why the sudden change? For some reason he knew it wasn't a good sign.

He twisted quickly, trying to evade a sword thrust toward his stomach. It skittered along his chain mail leaving a bruise to add to his collection but not penetrating. Around him the last of his men fell unconscious or dead he didn't know. But the Northern knight fought on, killing two more Lannister men before a whirling piece of wood slammed into his face knocking him senseless to the floor. The last he saw was the same man raising his club again to bring it crashing down on his head.

OOOOOO

The sound of combat had gotten closer and closer as the day wore on, and Royer had ordered the girls into Ranma's room, along with Lady. The direwolf hadn't wanted to go, but Sansa had convinced her, tears in her eyes at the knowledge of how many men, men she had known all her life, were dying.

Royer and his men stood by the staircase, waiting grimly. They knew that the battle below was over, and they knew that meant Ser Willowtree and all the others were dead. But they were determined to do their duty as best they could.

The barricade here was less impressive than most, the furniture of the family suites having gone to earlier barricades. Because of this and there only being four defenders, the initial rush was almost able to clear them away on its own, but not quite. More Lannister men fell, with Royer talking the first man's head clean off, but the damage was already done. The men of Winterfell found themselves losing ground almost immediately.

Royer and his men were fresh, determined and well trained, and they wreaked a bloody toll on the exhausted attackers. But the Lannister armsmen still outnumbered them five to one. Once out of the staircase's confinement, the battle ended quickly, with each man isolated, then cut down or knocked out.

Royer had lost his helmet, but he had a thick head, and shook off the blow of one man's truncheon to take his arm off at the elbow in return. The pommel of his blade then hammered into the face of another man, before he found himself tackled a third. He brought the side of his shield down on that man's neck right below his helmet, breaking it, but he still lost his feet under the man's rush.

He kicked out, trying to take a man in the knees, throwing the dead man's body off him at the same time, but a blade snaked in, taking him in his side and punching through his chain mail there. Royer flailed his blade, catching a man on the leg, causing enough damage to cripple him, while around him, his men went down, dead or comatose. A second later, another blade caught him in the face, and Royer knew no more.

When the last defender fell, there was a sudden moment of silence as the survivors of the assault looked at one another, all of them weary nearly to the point of collapse. One of them, a knight of House Lannister, rubbed blood from his face wearily, shaking his head in bemused wonder. "If this is victory, Seven save us from losing." He had no idea how many men they had lost in this battle, but he didn't doubt they had lost possibly two-thirds of the men they had started with.

Another man in Lannister colors snarled. "I thought the princess and the Stark bitch and their little whore were supposed to be here. Where are they?"

A third man wordlessly pointed to the closed and presumably bolted door leading into one of the bedrooms. All of the men there looked at one another, as if debating who would open the door. After a moment one of them, the youngest there who was a little more hotheaded than the others, strode forward. Setting his shoulder against the door he slammed his body into it.

Unlike the doors further down the Tower, the ones in the Hand's quarters had never been intended to stop someone forcing their way in. It only took him five body slams to smash the door open. That however was when things went wrong for the young armsman.

The moment the door had been forced partially open, Lady, worked into a frenzy from the sounds of battle the smell of blood in the air and her bonded's fear, pounced. Her jaws latched onto the young man's throat, tearing it out as she bore him to earth. Not lingering on her kill she jumped away, taking another man by the leg and mauling it badly before she had to fall back from the sword points of several others.

"Just kill the unnatural thing already!" shouted one man, waving his sword back and forth to ward off Lady when she turned her head to keep him in sight.

"NO!" Sansa shouted, rushing out and trying to get to her pet, leaving Jeyne behind. "Don't kill her!"

"Why the hell should we listen to the daughter of a traitor like you, you little wolf bitch!" said one of the men, reaching forward to grab her.

"You take that back!" Sansa snarled. Suddenly her anger at all this overrode her fear, and she lashed out, catching the unwary man with a kick to the crotch that sent him gasping to his knees.

Septa Mordane surprisingly joined the battle too, moving quickly with her curved dagger to plunge it into the side of an armsman who had turned to grab Sansa. She was killed almost instantly though by another man running her through with his sword. At the same time another man grabbed Sansa from behind, raising his truncheon to pummel her to the ground.

He in turn was borne to the ground by Lady, her jaws searching for his throat. But the direwolf wasn't able to get away fast enough to avoid a sword thrust into her side. She snarled in agony, turning quickly enough to catch the swordsman's arm, biting it clear off at the elbow, but another sword came down on her neck, cutting deeply into it. Her spine severed by that blow Lady collapsed like a puppet with its strings cut.

"NO!" Sansa yelled in anguish, rushing forward, again, only to be grabbed by another man and flung to the floor.

Jeyne now tried to run forward to help her friend, but found herself grabbed similarly by two men. "Hah, at least we can end the battle on a high note!" One of them laughed, then began to tear off her dress, causing her to scream.

"That's enough!" shouted a voice behind them, more shrill than commanding, but it was a voice all of the men there knew. Joffrey strode up the stairs with Ser Trant, Ser Moore and Ser Blount. The young man's eyes were alight with something Sansa could not make out, but his gaze was stern as he looked at the men who had ahold of her.

"Whatever her father has done, Lady Sansa is still my fiancé, and Jeyne is her handmaiden, you would all do best to remember that."

The men all grumbled a little, but let the two girls go. "I am sorry about all this," Joffrey said looking at his bride-to-be. "You are looking well, despite this unpleasantness." He looked over at the wolf, hiding his delight in the beast's death easily. "I am sorry I was not in time to save Lady."

The words brought Sansa some comfort, though for some reason Sansa felt uneasy in Joffrey's presence for the first time. She stared at Lady's corpse, the direwolf still in its death throes, feeling as if something inside her had died with the wolf.

She didn't resist when Joffrey pulled her to her feet then into a hug, kissing her cheek. "Don't worry." He murmured. "We'll get to the bottom of this, whatever your father has done has nothing to do with you."

Sansa pulled back sharply, those words shocking her out of her grief, but she couldn't escape his arms where they encircled her waist. "Surely you don't believe my father could betray the King!"

"The evidence is damning, but again do not worry, you at least will be safe." He caressed her side gently, moving one hand up her skirt to touch her breast and she squeaked pulling back again, her eyes wide and horrified. "Your highness, this is hardly the time or place..."

The grip around her became tighter and Joffrey pulled Sansa close. "You're in no position to argue milady." Joffrey said harshly, his mask slipping fully for the first time in Sansa's presence.

Joffrey knew he held all the cards now. Ranma wasn't in the city, Lord Stark was, but his uncle would deal with him, and he was KING! Finally, he could act on his desires without fear of even his mother censuring him.

His arm tightened around her and he leaned in for a kiss while Sansa tried to lean backwards away from him, her eyes widening in horror while he pawed at her chest. The act and the fact there were so many men around, all of them grinning obscenely, terrified her.

Thankfully for Sansa, a welcome voice interrupted proceedings. "Your highness, you shouldn't come so near the front of a battle without the full guard around you." Ser Barristan stood near the staircase, looking around sadly at the blood and gore splattered everywhere.

He nodded coolly to the Prince. "I was sent to find you and see if princess Myrcella was here. The queen has been unable to find her."

Joffrey scowled a little, but Sansa used the opportunity to escape from his arms, hurrying over to the knight. "The Princess and Ser Oakheart went with a few men from Winterfell into the city early this afternoon. I believe they were going to go to the dress makers, and the jewelers today."

Barristan and several of the older men paled, but the Kingsguard Commander nodded. "Very well, I will deliver you to the queen milady, that was the other half of my orders. Then myself and Ser Moore will head into the city to find the princess."

Sansa nodded, noticing out of the corner of her eye the scowl on Joffrey's face at the mention of Myrcella. She decided then that her father and Ranma had been right about him, too late to do anything but lament her stupidity.

OOOOOOO

Ned groaned tiredly, Ice point first in the dirt of the alleyway, cracking his neck and rubbing one of his shoulders. While Ned hadn't taken part in a lot of the fighting after that initial clash, he was no longer a young man. These constant small actions were beginning to tell, both on him and worse on his men.

He looked up trying to figure out where they were. Noticing it was nearly full night now Eddard shook his head, the compression of combat astonishing him anew. "How close are we to the port?"

"Maybe ten blocks or so." Brynden replied from next to him, looking around wearily. He too was leaning on his sword, and he was older than Eddard. "This better work, we're down to about forty men I think." He scowled angrily. They had started the day with about seventy, and the fact that only lost thirty was amazing, but still hard to take.

"I know." Ned shook her head. "I didn't expect the Lannisters to be able to call upon that many of the other nobles in the city, or for there to be so many mercenaries."

"My fault there." Brynden scowled, his eyes flashing with anger. "I thought I'd found most of them but I don't think I even found half. They've paid for it, though."

The mercenaries had lost possibly as much as five-hundred men in bits and pieces throughout the day battling the Stark forces, and the smallfolk, who Brynden had witnessed attacking them as well. The Lannister supporters had fared little better, under attack from the smallfolk and unable to bring their numbers to bear against Eddard's men. His men were also organized, disciplined and trained beyond the forces they had been fighting.

Of course, we've only been facing Crownlands men and lords, along with the mercenaries. Petyr's men have been doing a lot of the dying, which I bet is deliberate on Jaime's part, I doubt Ser Barristan would be willing to command this action, so it must be the Kingslayer. But his use of their supporters and the mercenaries freed up his family's men to assault the Tower. Our men there are probably already dead, curse it! But Sansa and the other children are out of there at least. Ned thought grimly.

That worry had been niggling at the back of his mind for several hours now, but there was nothing he could do about it. All he could do was carry on, and hope his new plan worked like he hoped it would.

Both men looked up as a runner came towards them. "My Lord, we've spotted a large Lannister force moving towards us, about a hundred and fifty men all told. They're wearing various colors, but have fifty Lannister men at their core."

That caused both older men to wince, but Ned nodded again. "Squad leaders to me!" He called in a loud voice, made hoarse by bellowing commands over the clamor of battle.

It took about twenty minutes for his officers to arrive from out of the maze of alleyways in the darkening gloom of the city. This section of the city was poorly lit at night at the best of times, but they were close to several of the main thoroughfares down to the docks, which might be lit by torches. The docks for certain would be lit. Even with the battles occurring elsewhere commerce would continue as long as possible. Ned had also not heard of any of the galleys in the port throwing their men into the conflict.

When the men were all assembled, Ned looked at them all one by one, staring into their eyes one after another. "This is it; you know what's at stake. We need to push forward towards the port, and then the lions and their men will be getting a bit of a surprise."

They all nodded grimly, if tiredly. Exhaustion hadn't quite set in, but all of them could feel the specter of it. It had been a hard day of on and off fighting to get this far, but all of them were grimly determined to see it through to the end. "We're with you Milord." said Ser Jory, cracking his knuckles where they lay on his sword'sommel.

"Good. Then at the trot, let's move." Ned said simply and turned leading the way with Brynden down the streets.

They didn't make it four blocks before the Lannister force was on them. This time Ned couldn't in good conscience stay back and let his men do all the fighting. He, Jory and Brynden slotted into the line facing the largest street, down which the majority of the attackers were coming, trying to cut them off from the port, where Ned supposed Jaime assumed he was trying to commandeer a ship or something. Jaime didn't know Eddard that well unfortunately. Running was the last thing he was looking to do.

Behind them the few remaining archers began to fire, but quickly ran out of arrows, which they had been scrounging for since near the beginning of this conflict. They dropped their bows, picked up blades and rushed to join the line.

His scouts having spotted Eddard and his men, Jaime had hoped to hit them from all sides at once. Unfortunately, this didn't work nature of the city cutting into Jaime's organization as usual. A few of the attacks coming out of the alleyways to either side of Eddard's line of advance came in too quickly. They were wiped out with the Starks losing only one man in the process.

This allowed two of the squads to switch from the side of the advance to the front, where Eddard was. So despite the main assault coming from that direction, they continued to press forward.

Two more blocks, and five men were down. Another squad had been cut off from the main force and surrounded, lost for all intents and purposes though they kept fighting. The Lannister supporters and mercenaries were paying for every Winterfell and Riverrun man that went down, but all of them could tell that the opponents were on their last legs.

Ned found himself separated from Jory and Brynden, though he still had several of his other guards still around him, so wasn't worried just yet. He cut down a man in House Cressey colors, Ice opening his guts to the nighttime sky. Turning to his next opponent Lord Stark found his blade locked with that of the Jaime Lannister.

"You almost got away Stark," Jaime said almost conversationally as he parried the older man's blow. "Too bad."

"Too bad for the kingdom." Ned snarled back, straining against the younger man, pushing him back a pace. "Your sister has committed treason Kingslayer, as have you for backing her! Joffrey has no right to the crown!"

Jaime smirked. "I would say that Robert committed treason against my sister first, but I don't suppose it matters at this point." Setting his feet he pushed the older man back before moving into a series of cuts and thrusts He found to his surprise that Ned was able to parry or dodge all of them, even the final blow towards his leg, a trick Jaime had come up with that had never failed to cripple his opponent.

He grinned wildly. This was what he lived for, fuck politics, fuck leading the battle. He lived to fight, and this would let him see what Eddard, who was reckoned a good blade himself, had learned from his son. "Try to make its at least interesting for me old man!" Jaime laughed moving forward even faster.

Ned had trained with his son Ranma and Jon often back home in Winterfell, and had kept up his exercise regimen as much as he could even here in King's Landing. He wasn't as fast as Jaime, or as strong, nor even his skilled, but he was close enough in all three to make the fight almost even. He also had tricks of his own, both taken from Ranma's training and his greater experience, and his weapon was far better than Jaime's.

This was proven when he cut Jaime's shield, hacking a large portion of it away with Ice before backing away from Jaime 's follow-up attack, nearly disarming the Kingslayer with a swift strike of his own before Jaime could recover.

The battle had moved into the well-lit area of the warehouse district by the docks, which allowed the warriors to see what they were doing, but came with it's own dangers. This was proven when someone nearby knocked over one of the large metal lamps lighting the area. The fire quickly spread, the smoke and fire confusing things further.

Not enough however to let Ned break off from Jaime. Still, even with the Kingslayer pressing him hard, Ned had the energy to smile grimly. "You were wrong you know," he growled when their blades locked again.

"Oh?" Jaime grunted, trying to push the older man back. But he nearly lost his footing when Ned danced backwards, Ice flickering out to thrust, almost taking Jaime in the face before he jumped backwards in turn. "About what?"

"I wasn't trying to get away."

Over the clamor of battle he had heard a new warcry. "The White Harbor! The White Harbor! Lord Manderly for Lord Stark!"

Jaime back away, getting enough distance between him and Ned to take in as much of the battle as he could see from there. A new force had arrived on the scene, and judging by the way they were cutting into his men from behind they weren't on his side. Worse yet, they seemed to be well rested which was telling against his own, semi-exhausted men.

Captain Woolfield had timed his assault perfectly. The Lannister supporters were in just the right position for his men, one-hundred and fifty Manderly armymen, to take them from behind and the flank.

All of them had been cooped up in the bowels of his ship for months now, Eddard being unwilling to let them do anything that might give them away. So the men had only been able to go out in small lots to get away from one another or see the city. Thus all of them were angry and very willing to hit things at this point.

This was proven in those first few minutes of their assault, where they cut down nearly their own number of Lannister supporters. After that, their own disorganization bogged them down slightly among the warehouses. But the battle had definitely turned.

Realizing this Jaime scowled angrily, but pushed forward. If he could cut down Stark the heart would go out of the opposition, and this new force wouldn't matter.

Ned understood Jaime's reasoning, but didn't try to back away, knowing Jaime had to either die or be capture to truly break the queen's forces. Instead he stood his ground, matching the Kingslayer blow for blow for a few moments as the man of Manderly got close, almost breaking through to him several times before being pushed back.

Moments later Lord Stark found himself fighting with his back pressed against a wall of a warehouse. He ducked underneath a blow from Jaime, throwing himself into a roll underneath Jaime's outstretched arm. Ned came up on his knees twisting around quickly to bring Ice up to cut into Jaime's back.

For just a moment there Jaime knew he was going to be cut in half. Surprised at the older man's sudden acrobatics while wielding that massive blade he hadn't turned fast enough to block the blow. And Ice was Valyrian Steel, it would cut through his Kingsguard issue plate armor easily.

One of the Lannister men nearby however had dispatched an exhausted Riverrun knight just at that moment. Seeing Eddard concentrating on Jaime he turned slamming his mace down on Ned's shoulder shattering it. Ned grunted in pain, his stroke going wide. The blow still landed, Ice cutting through the back part of Jaime's chest plate easily enough, leaving a long gash in Jaime's back. But it wasn't deep enough to cripple the Kingslayer.

He turned scowling angrily at the fact that someone else had interrupted them. Even worse was the realization that said interruption had saved his life. "Still," he said raising his blade and moving forward. "All's fair in love, war and all that, Stark!"

Ned grimly backed away. The mace user tried to move forward too quickly, and his stroke took the man in the stomach. But he couldn't back away further before Jaime was on him, his strokes coming quickly, forcing Ned to use both arms to parry them despite his mangled shoulder. The pain was getting to him, and he was slowing down quickly.

Soon the inevitable happened. One of his attempts to parry wasn't quite strong enough, and he was thrown backwards off balance by Jaime's blow, opening himself up to the return stroke which caught him in the side. Ned's desperate twist meant the blow didn't kill him outright, but cut into his chain mail, deep and bloody.

The older man fell backwards to go down to one knee, one hand holding his side where he was bleeding profusely through his chain mail. Ice still held in one hand his eyes still defiant as he glared at Jaime.

Jaime sighed, holding his blade up in a salute. "Good fight." he said respectfully before darting forward, ready to finish his opponent off.

"RAAHHHH!" Suddenly through the smoke and chaos of the melee around them Ser Jory came roaring, holding a spear he had taken from somewhere as if he was trying to gore a boar. The spear shaft was missing its head, but the blunt end of it slammed with all the force Jory could put into it into Jaime's side.

The Kingslayer grunted as he felt his ribs crack under his armor from the impact. The blow actually lifted him off his feet, throwing him backwards and away from Ned. Behind Jory came others most of them wearing Manderly colors, along with Brynden, who went to one knee beside Eddard.

Getting his feet under him, Jaime growled angrily. His sword lashed out, cutting the spear shaft in two before flashing up to attack this new opponent.

Jory scrambled, letting go of the spear and bringing out his own sword to block the blow desperately. "Take Lord Stark and go!" He shouted. "This battle is lost!"

While Eddard had been dueling with Jaime, more Queen's men had arrived. Lord Pyle had finally ended the gold cloak civil war. He had split his forces into three, sending a small portion to reinforce the Red Keep just in case, then sending two hundred men around to try and start to get control of the middle class portions of the city. Lord Pyle himself then led his men and three hundred gold cloaks towards the port, where Jaime had gone. Not well trained or armored, there were still too many of them coupled with the remainder of Jaime's men.

Now it was the men from White Harbor who were in danger of being flanked. Dozens of them had already been cut off from their fellows and subsequently cut down. Worse, the men from Riverrun and Eddard's original guard had been nearly wiped out in the last hour and a half of combat. Realizing this and unable to find Ned, Brynden had commanded the men to fall back towards the ship. Then he spotted Ned battling the Kingslayer, and, from his vantage point on top of a large pile of crates, pointed Jory in that direction with the few remaining Winterfell guards.

Jory ducked under Jaime's blow, his fist coming up to slam into Jaime's side while his spear had impacted. The Kingslayer grunted, before Jory brought an elbow around into his face forcing Jaime back with a broken nose. Jory grabbed his sword arm by twisting his own sword arm around it, holding it in place wrestling with Jaime now rather than going sword to sword. "Go!"

Behind him two men in Manderly colors grabbed Lord Stark, dragging him away as Ned finally gave into his injuries, falling into blackness. The surviving guardsmen Eddard had brought down from Winterfell, all six of them, grimly stood their ground. Holding there they were a small roadblock, holding back the tide of reinforcing gold cloaks from pushing on after their injured lord.

"FALL BACK!" Brynden cursed internally while he directed the retreat, his voice almost gone now from continually bellowing orders. Ned's gamble would've worked if the damned lions hadn't had so many men! Or if they hadn't been able to call on so many mercenaries! He thought to himself savagely. If we had just the Lannisters and their supporters to deal with we might have won this despite the gold cloaks. But not with the mercenaries throwing their weight in and our losses against them throughout the day.

The men from the ship were still a fighting force, and they weren't as exhausted as the rest of the fighters on either side. But the gold cloaks arrival had turned what would have been a close fought victory into a running retreat. "Form up on me! Defend Lord Stark!"

OOOOOO

Myrcella and her group had continued through the city as the noise of battle and actual fires and riots got worse all the time. They'd taken the time before leaving the merchant district behind to grab two cloaks to hide Alayaya and Myrcella's faces from view, but they were still visibly women despite that, and the bands of rioters could see that easily enough. As Evening began they had lost Eaton and Richard, Riverrun men who had come to the city with Edmure. They fell fighting a particularly nasty group that ambushed them, but they were nearly to the wharves now.

They entered the warehouse district and were making their way around its edges towards the closet docks to where Mattimeo knew the ship with the men from House Manderly was moored, a less used area that was mostly unlit. Thankfully this was also the area where one of the naval cutters was moored, so Ser Oakheart hadn't questioned him yet.

There were close to breaking out of the warehouse district onto the actual docks when a shout went up. "Look it's a group of those damn wolf lovers! Get them!" Two dozen men raced for towards him, all mercenaries save for a few very shabby looking gold cloaks.

Ser Oakheart turned with a frown and looked down at himself realizing his white enameled armor now was much stained with soot and blood, its original white enamel almost invisible. His cloak was gone as well and he lost his shield in the last battle. He strode forward shouting "I am Sir Oakheart of the Kingsguaaaahh!"

That was as far as he got before a brick slammed into his face. He went down gasping as he tried to breathe through a shattered nose wiping away the blood from that and his ruptured eye, which had been caught by the corner of the brick. The thrower had been one of the gold cloaks, who snarled aloud, his eyes lit with madness. "Kill the traitor!"

Merry gasped and would have gone to her knight's aid if Mattimeo and Thomas hadn't grabbed him up, each one taking an arm. "Move!" The young man bellowed, and Merry and the others obeyed save Clifton, who knelt to his knees, sighting down his crossbow. His bolt took the brick thrower in the chest, killing him, then he fired two more shots, the last bolts he had while the others retreated before dropping the crossbow and springing after them.

In the dark lit only by starlight and the waning moon they were soon lost, but their pursuers were able to keep them in sight this time. Alayaya led the way with Myrcella running behind her, but they both skidded to a halt in front of a rickety wall about seven feet tall. "Seven damn it!" the black girl cursed.

Mattimeo and the others caught up to them, Arys able to move under his own power now, if groggily. The young armsmen stared in dismay at the wall, estimating how long would take them to cut it down while behind them they heard the shouts and screams of their pursuers, like hounds after a fox. He looked at Alayaya. "How far to get to the docks from here?"

Alayaya gulped looking around, knowing full well what would await her and Myrcella if they were captured by such men, regardless of their supposed allegiance. "We're at the back of a warehouse that uses this area as extra storage space, I recognize the warehouse because I've been here with my mother a time or to buying bulk foodstuffs. The wharves should be right on the other side of this wall."

Mattimeo nodded, reaching over to pick up Myrcella easily and hoisting her up to where she could grasp the top of the wall. "Pull yourself up and over." he ordered.

Myrcella looked down at him with wide eyes. "What about you?"

"Do it." Mattimeo ordered, not answering. Myrcella hesitated for another second then did so, pulling herself up and over landing with a grunt of pain as her ankle twisted when she landed on the other side, her dress torn even further than it had been after so many forced sprints.

Mattimeo turned to Alayaya while Oakheart looked at the wooden wall then around them as the men who had been pursuing them rounded the corner of the warehouse. Even through his pain from the throne brick Arys understood, and he nodded in approval while Thomas and Clifton formed a very makeshift shield wall at the narrowest point of the alleyway.

He raised his sword and shouted, spitting out blood from his nose and eye. "Remember me fondly little princess, and run!"

Mattimeo hoisted Alayaya into his arms, lifting her up to go over the wall as well. He took a moment to lean in, kissing her hard on the lips. "I wish we could've done more." He murmured. "Make for the ship that will be flying the House Stark colors, and if you see someone dressed in the colors of house Manderly, white on a light blue background, tell them the 'merman serves the wolf' and they should help you and the Princess."

So saying he didn't give her time to reply, hoisting her up to the top of the wall the wall with a grunt of effort. Alayaya scrambled, and then with a final push on her rear which caused her to squeak a little she fell forward over the wall, quickly covering her head with her arms as she hit the ground.

Myrcella was hammering on the wall, screaming. "Come over too! You can make it!"

"Not in armor I can't." Arys replied. "Get out of here little princess. Look after yourself, because I'm no longer going to be there to do it!"

Behind him the first of the rioters slammed into Clifton and Thomas. Clifton nearly went down with a spear to the guts, but he dodged it enough to let it graze his side, killing the man who wielded it with a thrust of his sword, before having to pull back quickly to avoid a mace swinging for his head.

"Run!" Mattimeo bellowed, and jumping forward with Arys as Thomas went down, tackled by two men even as his belt knife took one of them in the throat, his sword having been knocked out of his hand. "RUN!" And then neither man had time for more words.

Alayaya pulled Myrcella away sobbing. Myrcella tried to fight, tried to run back towards the wall, but Alayaya's grip on her arm was too strong and Alayaya pulled Merry away her own eyes wet as they raced on. Luckily Alayaya had been correct in her guess that simply boosting herself over the wall had put her onto the docks and she ran down them, looking for the ship with the flag of House Stark on it.

Soon they saw men in chain mail and strange tabards patrolling the area. One of them looked up and saw the two women running and shouted "Ho, stop there you two!" Six men converged on them quickly looking at the two women quizzically.

"Both of you should be hiding somewhere." One of them said assuming these were two merchants' wives or something of that nature that had gotten separated from their minders at some point. "Where are your menfolk?"

"Dead behind us." Alayaya said choking back a half sob. She looked at them, barely able to make out their colors in the light of the fires raging through the warehouse district, and said simply "The merman serves the wolf."

The man who had spoken stiffened. He was the lieutenant of the ship and had been left to guard the docks, more to make certain that the Navy galleys didn't put into sure than anything else. This area of the city was relatively quiet, since most of the merchant crews had simply upped anchor and moved away from the docks and those that didn't had forted up where they were. "Who are you two?"

"I am Alayaya," the black girl gasped. "An informer for the Hand. And this is the Princess Myrcella Baratheon." Myrcella pushed off looked up at the man from where she was now clinging to Alayaya's hand like a lifeline, her eyes wet with tears.

The man looked at the two of them it with wide eyes wondering how the hell they had gotten through the madness that was the city to here, but thanked the Seven that they had. Detailing one of his men to take over the patrol he hurried them back towards his ship.

As they went however, more men broke out of the warehouse district, all wearing Manderly colors and moving with purpose, especially a small group that were carrying a makeshift stretcher. "Lord Stark is down!" Several men bellowed as they saw their few fellows scattered around. "Back to the ship! This battle is lost!"

Myrcella's breath caught, and she raced forwards towards the ship meeting with the men from the battle just as Brynden came backwards still organizing the running retreat. Aboard the ship a dozen archers had been kept back for just this purpose (and the fact they wouldn't have been useful in the maze of warehouses) and they began to lay down a withering hail of fire aimed thanks to the fires in the warehouse district, allowing the men from White Harbor to gain some separation from their pursuers.

Brynden looked down at the princess happy to see her yet also concerned by who he didn't see. "Myrcella you're here, does that mean Sansa is as well?"

"Sansa refused to come with us today, she wanted to spend lunch with Joffrey, I'm sorry." Myrcella replied, her voice cracking as she tried to cling to her need to be polite in the face of so much upheaval.

But in the next instant she lost it. "My Lord Tully, what has happened!? One moment everything was fine, the next we come out of a shop and we hear that my father is dead, and someone has accused Lord stock of treachery! Then we hear that Lord stark has proof that the Lannisters have committed treason, what's going on!?"

"That would take too long to tell right now Myrcella." The man said waving her aside for now, though Myrcella could see his face had seemingly aged ten years after hearing her news about Sansa. "Lord Stark is sorely wounded." He looked up at captain Woolfield, who had just come towards him through his men as they bunched up near the plank leading up onto the ship. "Does this ship have a surgeon?"

The captain shook his head. "I'm afraid not."

Myrcella looked at the men as they brought Lord Stark aboard biting her knuckle as she looked at the man who had so often been kind to her, been that had become her rock when Ranma was no longer around. She spoke up hesitantly, current worry overriding her grief. "I-I have some knowledge of healing, do we at least have a stock of herbs and medicines? Alayaya, do you think you could do the stitching?"

"I could try, I suppose," Alayaya murmured looking at her benefactor as well, her eyes wide in both memory of recent loss and shock to see such a strong man laid low.

"Good. You men, get Lord Stark down into one of the beds, then heat water and find the smallest needle you have aboard this ship. We'll do all we can for him, I promise." Myrcella said taking command in a way that astonished those around her. Still they obeyed with alacrity, though later would be hard-pressed to say why.

Brynden smiled down at her rubbing her head affectionately. "Do what you can, I need to direct the battle."

Myrcella nodded. "I will however require that explanation of what in the Stranger's name is going on at some point Ser!" She said looking up at him with all the stern hauteur she could muster after years at her mother's knee. With that said she then hurried after Lord Stark's makeshift gurney, determined to do what she could for the man.

Brynden took a moment to stare after her shaking his head. "I hope to put that off as long as I can lady, and I hope you can handle it well when it comes."

OOOOOOO

Scrambling on the cobblestones, Jaime tried to get loose of the madman who had a hold of them. But Jaime couldn't get to his sword, and without a sword Jaime wasn't nearly as formidable. He tried to twist away, but the man, who had dropped his own blade, held him down while scrambling for his belt knife. He reached it, but Jaime was able to get a foot between them kicking him away.

Jaime grabbed his sword from where it had fallen, bringing it up just in time to smash the knife away when Jory tried a desperate lunge. Jaime in turn tried to cut the man down quickly and hurry after Stark, but Jory jumped backwards, grabbing up his own blade wearily.

"For Winterfell and Lord Stark!" he shouted charging forward. Jaime met him, but Jory wasn't as good as his lord. He was younger, but even more exhausted than Stark had been at the start of his duel with Jaime. Five parries, and suddenly his blade went flying, his fingers cut off where they had held the hilt. Before he could try to grab his sword up with his off-hand, Jaime's sword ran Jory through, punching through his chain mail over his stomach in a welter of gore.

Kicking the man off his sword, Jaime scowled angrily, staring down the street towards the harbor. The street was blocked end to end now with men wearing Manderly colors, holding off the reinforcing gold cloaks, whose lack of armor and formal training was telling.

They had to have been hiding on some kind of galley. How Varys and Petyr missed that I don't know but I'll be having words with them both later! The men there were now in good order, retreating but not beaten.

"Harry them!" he bellowed, his voice hoarse from smoke inhalation and pain from his ribs and his back. "Harry them, Seven damn you!"

But it wasn't to be. The gold cloaks lacked the ability to break the Manderly men's line, Jaime's men were too exhausted, and the mercenaries had no wish to throw themselves into battle again.

The mercs had lost more than four fifths of their number through this day of blood and carnage. Petyr had started the battle with about a thousand bought men, spread out over the city in penny-packets. About three hundred never actually joined the battle at all. They were picked off in small lots by roving bands of smallfolk all over the city. Thanks to Jaime forcing them to the fore of the battle, the constant small scale battles against Lord Stark's force throughout the day had cost them even more than that, and the final battle had killed more.

By dawn Petyr would find he only had a force of about a hundred bought swords remaining to him, the difference made up by those who had decided he had no idea what he was doing, and had decided to leave for greener pastures with the money they had already received. The Lannister supporters had fared better thanks to Jaime's forcing the mercenaries into the hottest fighting, but they were exhausted and disheartened now that a new force of Northerners had arrived.

An hour later, Jaime was impotent to do anything but watch as the men gained the wharves, moving quickly to a galley moored there, stuck between two others in such a way that no port-master would've approved of. He kept staring while the ship, actually scraping against another merchant vessel as it was pushed off the dock, sailed away into the bay.

O O O O O O O

The Queen, Varys, Joffrey and his captive Sansa, were waiting in the King's Counsel room for news of the battles in the city and the search for Myrcella. Cersei had questioned Sansa closely, almost desperately, about the whereabouts of her daughter, but Sansa had been unable to tell her more than she had Barristan. Cersei hadn't been nasty about it, only worried, but refused to answer Sansa's questions in turn about what had happened to spark this insanity, merely saying she would answer that question when her daughter was safe.

Cersei had sent Barristan immediately along with Ser Moore and ten men of House Lannister, including her cousin, into the city to find Myrcella. Lancel had wanted to talk to her alone, but Cersei had put him off. Now was not the time for his... payment, not when her daughter, her little lioness, was out there in the madness of the city. So here Cersei sat, her fingers tapping a nervous beat on the table in front of her, waiting for word.

She glanced at where Joffrey sat, seemingly composed as he whispered instructions of some kind to Ser Trant, while Sansa sat silent and unmoving next to him. The sight of her son made a proud smile form on Cersei's face. Though she hadn't known it until after, Joffrey had taken command of the battle to take the Tower, and he seemed to have done admirably.

Actually, besides ordering the initial attack the only thing Joffrey had been in command of was the final few clashes in the tower, when the battle had been all but won. Although he had been the one to demand they start to take prisoners. And he had saved Sansa and Jeyne from death and rape.

At least for now; Joffrey had his own ideas in that direction, as evinced from the scene Ser Barristan's arrival had brought to an end. Something Sansa was all too aware of, which added to her reasons to be silent, topped only by the shock of Lady's death still reverberating in Sansa's mind.

Several hours after the battle in the Tower ended they were still waiting for news when Petyr entered, nodding his head to them all. Inwardly Littlefinger cursed seeing Sansa there. He had hoped to get back in time to secure Sansa's wellbeing himself, he knew a passageway into the tower of the Hand that he could have used to get her out, and he could have easily hidden her among his staff for a time.

But Cersei's demand he take part in the initial attempt to confront Lord Stark, and Jaime's refusal to let him go after the battle began, had put paid to that idea. Now he was left scrambling, trying to think of a way to get Sansa under his power in some way.

That was for later though, right now, he had to deal with Cersei. He bowed formally to the queen and heir before giving his report. "The battles between the gold cloak factions have been decided. We now have full control of their remaining forces. I've ordered them to start quelling the worst of the fires in the city. We need to start getting order out there. We've also captured Edmure Tully. At Ser Jaime's orders, I've transferred him to the prison here in the keep."

He sent an apologetic seeming look at Sansa, where she was sitting by Joffrey, though now that he had time to look, Petyr saw that Sansa didn't seem as if she wanted to be there any longer. Perhaps the boy's mask cracked already, Petyr thought.

Cersei's voice brought his attention to her quickly. "Is there any news of my daughter? What of Jaime, has the actual fighting died down?"

"Your daughter?" Petyr asked, blinking in actual surprise. "Your majesty, I never received any news about the princess. If you sent runners out, they might have been killed before they found me. A single person wearing Lannister colors, or even a single nobleman traveling through the city right now would die quickly."

That made Cersei swoon for a moment, but she got control of herself quickly. "My daughter apparently went into the city earlier today before this all began, with Ser Oakheart and a few of the Hand's men and one of his maids." Cersei had not heard about Alayaya's past, Myrcella not having shared it, nor had Lord Stark or anyone else seen fit to mention it to her, so that was all she knew.

"I'm sorry your highness, I never saw any sign of the princess." Petyr replied, and he actually was sorry too. It would have been simple to use his finding Myrcella to gain further favor from the Queen Regent, something he could have used in many different ways.

Cersei waved him away before rubbing at her face wearily, her normal arrogance in abeyance for the moment. But only for a moment, and she straightened up quickly, staring at Petyr. "Grab the lords and the retainers here in the Red Keep that remained neutral, get them out into the city to help quell the fires and chaos, we can't let the smallfolk get used to acting like this."

Bowing, Petyr left to give those orders, just as Lord Gaunt entered. Cersei's face and eyes hardened, and she leaned forward eagerly. "Well?"

"It's done." The man said simply, his voice gruff. "I lost fifteen of my men doing it though, we were attacked several times by bands of smallfolk. But we were able to find them all." Nearby Varys frowned, wondering what that was about and fearing he had an all too accurate idea.

"Good, I'll double the agreed upon payment for this Gaunt, you have my word." Cersei said earnestly, now smiling slightly. She waved him off, and Detmer left the room without another word.

About an hour's anxious waiting later Lord Pyle came in, going to one knee before the queen creaking in his armor. "Enough of that!" She snapped. "What has happened? Where is my brother? Has there been any news about my daughter?"

"Your daughter? Majesty, I haven't heard anything about the princess. Ser Jaime was injured your Majesty, he is with the healers right now. It isn't serious." He said quickly, looking up at her face which had started to go white, "But it was extremely painful. Several cracked ribs, and a large cut that needs stitching."

That caused Cersei to breathe a sigh of relief. Jaime had such injuries before after all, and he pulled through easily enough. "Very well, if Jaime is alright and you don't have anything to tell me about my daughter, tell me what has been going on in the city. When can we expect Lord Stark to be brought before us?"

The man gulped. "Lord Stark escaped my lady. We were winning the battle, Ser Jaime had finally pinned the traitor down in the warehouse district, but Lord Stark had more men, men we had no idea he had, in reserve. All of them wore House Manderly colors. They hit Ser Jaime's forces and it was only my arrival with my force of gold cloaks that saved the day. Even so they were able to win through to the ports and boarded a ship, which put out to sea immediately."

At those words Sansa felt both elation and despair. Elation that her father had gotten away. Despair at what it meant for her.

"And Lord Stark escaped!?" Cersei said her voice rising with each word as Joffrey scowled, clenching his hands.

"S-sorely wounded, your Majesty." Lord Pyle hastened to say, shrinking in on himself. He was a middle-aged man, who was rather submissive in personal confrontations. It was well known he spent so much time in court because he wished to stay away from his wife, and he reacted visibly to the female voice of anger. "Lord Jaime fought him sword to sword, and nearly took his head. I, d-doubt that he'll live through his wounds. He's not a young man anymore after all."

Cersei's eyes narrowed that last comment, since she was only three years younger than Ned, but she ignored it for now. "Still he escaped. And the Blackfish, what of him?"

"Went with them your Majesty, uninjured, so far as I know." Lord Pyle replied, wincing.

Cersei leaned back sighing faintly as she rubbed her forehead right above one eyebrow. I do not share this belief that Ned will die by his wounds. So there will be at least two who know about the fact that Joffrey is not Robert son. Will they be believed if they declare it? Please, this is the oh-so honorable Lord Stark, of course his own Lord's will believe him, and others.

With a wave of her hand she dismissed the man, while Joffrey turned to glare at Varys. "Well eunuch, what do you have to say? Stark having more men that we didn't know about, it sounds as if your little birds have failed you."

"I have no excuse your highness." Varys said, bowing his bald head. "I have no idea how Lord Stark could have kept such a force secret, but will assign several of my agents to look into it."

Of course, many of his informers were child whores, and if men didn't visit them, the number of agents he had in the city fell sharply. Worse, very few of them could discern the difference between a Valeman and a Northerner's speech.

After ten more minutes, Petyr returned, having turned over the duty of working with the gold cloaks to Ser Balon Swann, a knight of the Stormlands House of the same name. He was a tough, tested young man, well thought of by his peers, who had stayed out of the conflict that had suddenly roared through the city only because he couldn't tell which side to believe. Now that the battles were dying down however, he would willingly do his part to restore order and law.

The queen filled Petyr in on what Lord Pyle had told them, then looked at her two 'advisers'. "Is there any chance we could send a ship after Stark?"

"I'm afraid not your majesty. None of the Naval galleys in the city have responded to our orders from the start, and I received a report just before returning to the Red Keep that all five of them have pulled up their anchors and have left the port." Petyr replied apologetically.

Again the feeling was real, though only the tip of a hate-filled iceberg. How did Eddard survive! Damn it! His vengeance against House Stark had not gotten off to the start he had hoped. After a moment's reflection though, he felt this might be the best in the long term, a whole House Stark would be able to weaken the Lannisters further so both could be finished off easier.

"I too do not think we can count on hope that Lord Stark dies of his wounds. We must assume that he will live, the question is what will he do? There is the King Beyond the wall pulling away much of the North's strength, nor can the North field a large force even at the best of times." Varys murmured, one perfumed hand tapping his baby-bare chin. "The North may be large, but it is also sparsely populated, and their roads are abysmal."

"Are you an idiot, or merely incompetent?" Cersei scoffed. "If Lord Stark declares that my son is not legitimate as he claims, there will be fools who believe him for their own reasons. Stannis for one, he has always hated the fact that Robert had sons removing him from the line of succession. Renly for another, he's ambitious as well, and would leap at the chance to name himself king."

Joffrey twitched at that, as did Sansa. Neither of them had heard that before. Joffrey had merely been told Lord Stark had wanted to reign as regent rather than allow him to take the crown, which had been more than enough for him. Now rage filled him at the very idea of someone thinking Robert wasn't his father, the very idea was ludicrous! Sansa on the other hand was now doing her best to seem invisible, not wanting anyone in this room to realize she was still there.

"We need to battle rumor with rumor your Majesty, spread the word that Eddard is connected to the Targaryen siblings possible return. And we need to prepare our forces." Petyr replied.

Cersei nodded. "I will send word to my father. I have no doubt that he already has forces in place to combat the 'bandits' around the borders between the Westerlands and the Riverlands. He can march into the Riverlands, and with an army already in their territory and with Edmure in our custody, the Riverlanders will not rise against us. I can also send messages to the Crownlands calling their men up."

"We could send to the Vale and have them attempt to run the ship down, it might be possible though I don't know how likely." Petyr said hesitantly.

"Unless you have connections I don't know about, that's not likely." The Master of Whispers said dryly. "The Vale might have a small fleet, but with it's Lord Paramount dead and Lyssa Arryn acting so irrationally since her husband's death, I doubt she would listen to any orders from us, or that her lords who have ships would listen to Lyssa in turn."

Cersei scowled, rubbing her forehead even harder as she felt a headache coming on. She looked over at the drinks cabinet along one wall, then resolutely turned her back on them. She would never fall to the drink that as Robert had, and she needed her head clear now.

Turning back, her eyes flashed over Ser Trant and Blount, the two Kingsguard who hadn't gone with their commander into the city. Cersei decided then that she needed to do something with the white cloaks. Both in skill and loyalty she thought to herself coldly. I know that they are loyal, but loyal to my son and I, or loyal to their positions and the money that my family has paid them. Men bought like that can be bought again, I need to remember that. They've been useful up to this point, but there are enough empty slots now that I can find men of ability and honor to fill them rather than just bought swords. Something to talk to my brother about later.

"So you're just saying we have to let the traitor get away free like this!" Joffrey said, smashing his hand down on the table, like a child having a tantrum.

Petyr spoke before Cersei could. "He's already escaped your highness. We have no ships to send after him, none of the navy will answer to us. We need to deal with the reality of this rather than our anger at it."

"Find whoever should have discovered that Stark had this extra force on hand, I want them executed! Them and whoever was in charge of the battle that allowed him to get away."

"Your uncle was in charge of the battle in the city." Cersei said coolly looking at her son, who quailed slightly under eyes, though not as much as he once would have. "He nearly killed Lord Stark personally, but he could not do everything." She looked back at Varys. "I agree that the lack of intelligence is something that needs to be addressed, though that is a conversation for later."

"What do you think of this, Sansa?" she asked looking over the girl, her eyes narrowed. "What do you think of your father's accusations?"

"If my father has been led astray by someone as to spread such rumors your Majesty, then he has indeed turned traitor." Sansa replied, keeping her voice level and not meeting anyone's eyes. "I, I cannot predict what his actions will be now."

Cersei smiled internally. The girl was good, but you could tell that she was distraught, and didn't know what to believe, really. That didn't matter, she would still be a good bargaining tool. "Very well, one of the servants will show you to Myrcella's room for now. Until this conflict is resolved, you will remain a guest of our hospitality."

The girl curtsied her way out, still shocked and numb at what had happened. Joffrey however was still furious that Lord Stark had escaped and decided that Sansa needed to pay for her father's perfidy. He bowed to his mother. "I trust that you will be handling things in the city mother? When can I expect to be crowned?"

Cersei smiled at her son fondly, for the moment forgetting her concern for her daughter's safety. "Tomorrow my little lion. You may retire now, you'll have a busy day starting early." He nodded to her, then left quickly, but he did not head to his room.

As the door shut behind her son Cersei turned to Petyr, her eyes narrowed. "You mentioned Lord Stark backing the Targaryens twice now, is there any reason behind that accusation?"

"I knew Catelyn Tully when we were young Your Majesty. When I learned from Ranma that she had welcomed a bastard into their family, it got me curious, though at the time I couldn't put my finger on why. She is a proud woman, so to allow her husband's baseborn bastard into her house... While she would not argue against her husband's decision if he was honor bound to take him in, she would certainly not make the boy welcome. Yet that seems to be the case. It has taken me months of research, but I have determined that John Snow might not be who he seems to be. I am waiting for evidence of that before saying what I suspect but..."

Petyr shrugged eloquently. "And it is fact that both Ranma and his father seemed to place more value in bringing the Targaryen siblings back rather than killing them. Yet their deaths would've been better for the kingdom as a whole."

Cersei frowned thoughtfully, wondering what to do about that. She could see what Petyr was insinuating, but proving it was another matter. "I've seen the boy, he's pure Stark. There is nothing of house Targaryen in him, if that is what you are implying."

"There doesn't have to be your Majesty, and it doesn't have to be believed by Lord Stark's people, or even those who would side with him for their own reasons, but our own people and that of Stannis and Renly."

"True. Very well, prepare proclamations to that effect, and send out men to find Ser Barristan and my daughter!" Cersei snarled the last sentence, getting worried every minute that Barristan didn't burst in with her daughter with him. "Leave me!" she shouted, looking at both men, before falling back into her seat.

She rubbed her face wearily, letting her concern and fear for her daughter show now that neither of her so-called advisers were there. She knew what happened in this city at the best of times, and was deathly afraid of what could have happened to her daughter in this time of chaos.

Just then there was a sound of booted feet outside. Cersei quickly straightened up, her face hardening into her normal expression of cool hauteur. Ser Barristan walked through the door, his normally resplendent white cloak and armor splattered with blood and soot, his helm gone, and a cut on his cheek. Ser Moore was not with him, nor, to Cersei's rising fury, was her daughter. "Where is my daughter!?"

Ser Barristan had faced more than one angry royal in his time, but he had rarely stood before one to report failure, and it galled him to do so now. He was more angry however at some of the things that had been shouted at him when they went through the city in search of the missing princess. "Your majesty, I regret to say we lost Ser Moore and several others, including Lancel. He was struck down in one of the fights we ran into."

Cersei waved that off, glad she wouldn't have to pay her cousin in the coin she had promised, having no family feeling toward him at all. He had been useful, but his lust toward her, which he had fondly thought was love, had been disturbing, despite her ability to manipulate it. "I'm sorry for the losses of course, but where is my daughter, Ser Barristan?"

"We were able to find smallfolk who were willing to tell us they had seen a small party of the Hand's men and two girls with a white cloak. We found Ser Oakheart, dead, your majesty, his head was caved in by something, along with three other men wearing Winterfell colors and over a dozen smallfolk who were armed with various weapons. After that, we questioned several sailors from the ships in harbor who had forted up told us they saw someone matching Myrcella's description boarding the ship."

Cersei's bit her lower lip so hard it bled.

OOOOOOO

Sansa sighed to herself looking around Merry's room. She'd had quite a lot of fun times here, but she knew that time was over. I hope she's all right part a part of Sansa thought to herself, while the rest was too busy with self-pity and recrimination to have much room for anyone else's problems. How did this all happen? Why do they think my father would tell such lies?

But, another part of her mind said, is it a lie? If Joffrey really is illegitimate, then he isn't the heir to the throne, he isn't the Prince, he isn't even a lord. Baseborn bastards cannot be heirs. If so, your father was in the right, not that it matters now. You might be forced to marry him anyway. A thought that even yesterday had been her fondest joy was now revealed to be a nightmare.

Sansa sighed, pushing that thought aside as she contemplated the number of men that had died to this day, many that she had known all her life. She would never see Ser Jory again, never see mister Vayon smile at her like a proud grandfather, or even the younger men of the guards. Never hear about their latest training practice, never see them bow to her as they did, with smiles and their eyes and on their faces back in Winterfell, never hear them call her 'the little lady' again or laugh as they tried to vie for a scarf or something else she had made. Never be scolded again by the septa, which hit her harder than nearly all the rest.

Tears welled up in her eyes again, and she brushed them away quickly. She sighed looking down at herself, then decided to get ready for bed, it was late, and it had been the longest day she could ever imagine. She needed sleep.

Behind her the door abruptly banged open, and Joffrey, Ser Blount and Ser Trant came in. Sansa quickly held her bodice which she had been about to pull off back up to protect her chastity, and squeaked "M-my Lord?"

It was taking all her self-control not to shriek at them, but Sansa knew that wouldn't help matters. She had to stay calm, had to play the dutiful fiancé. She needed to try to appeal to Joffrey's good nature rather than the 'Baratheon' anger that seemed to have risen within him since this all began.

Joffrey smiled thinly stalking forward, his eyes alight with eagerness. "You know, your father might have escaped, but someone has to pay for his crime. And if I can't get to him, well you'll have to do." His hand flashed out catching her in the mouth and sending her to the floor.

Sansa cried in shock, holding one hand to her cheek cursing the fact that she her hold out knife had been taken from her. The sight of the two Kingsguard members laughing at her pain drove that thought out of her mind though. Even if she could have protected herself against Joffrey, and she wasn't certain she could have, the two of them would've dealt with her easily enough.

Above her Joffrey wrung out his hand, wincing, then smirked. He clicked his fingers at Ser Trent. "Blount, hold her down, and you Ser trent, I want you to flog her until I say to stop."

The men did so, and Sansa, tears once more threatening to fall from her face, simply let them position her for the flogging. A deep wellspring of anger however had begun to make itself known however, and even exhausted she had decided she would not allow Joffrey the victory of seeing her tears. The men jeered at her near nakedness, but she kept her eyes closed, concentrating on not crying.

The flogging went on for several minutes, leaving large, painful welts on her back and shoulders when it was interrupted. "This is unseemly Your Highness, said a stern voice from behind them.

They turned to see the door open again and Petyr there with Sir Barristan. Barristan looked weary, but his eyes were hard when they flipped over his fellow Kingsguard, and both men flinched, backing away.

The older man sneered mentally. Paper shields, he thought sarcastically. Jaime's the only one amongst them who could fight me, even now I could cut through the rest like they weren't even there.

Barristan walked forward before the other man could holding out a hand towards Sansa who took it and was helped to her feet, while her other hand again held her bodice up.

The Master of Coin looked over at Joffrey. "This is an unseemly way to treat your wife-to-be your Majesty, or has that changed since I last heard?"

Before Joffrey could speak he went on in a soothing tone. "Moreover, we have just learned that the princess has been kidnapped by the Starks, no doubt they will use her as a hostage for our good conduct of this lady. Your mother would not be pleased to hear that you did anything to Sansa that could cause the Starks to hurt her daughter in turn."

Joffrey ground his teeth angrily at that. First Tommen, now Myrcella, both of them thorns in my side! Why can't mother see it any longer, I'm the heir, I will be king tomorrow, I'm the only one that matters!

Yet he had enough self-control to know his mother wouldn't take lightly to that, and may even be against him beating Sansa at all considering his father's treatment of her at times. "Very well" he said angrily looking at Sansa. "So long as this one knows her place I won't do more to her." A sudden thought occurred to him and he smiled evilly to himself. Not physically at least.

With that he stalked off followed by his two cronies, leaving Barristan and Petyr there. "My thanks my lords." Sansa nodded to them both, still leaning on Barristan's hand. "You are a true knight Ser."

"I'm no longer certain of that as I once was lass," he murmured shaking his head. "You need a healer?"

Sansa nodded weakly, and Barristan quickly moved to the doorway to call for one. Once the older man left Petyr moved over quickly to whisper in Sansa ear. "Keep on playing their game for now, I may be able to manage your release from this hell eventually."

Sansa looked up at him, her eyes a little colder then she would normally have allowed them to be. "And why would you be helping me Ser?"

"Your mother and I were good friends when we were younger. In her memory I would not let her daughter be treated in such a manner." Petyr replied smoothly.

Sansa nodded, seemingly taking in his words wildly inside her head she screamed, If you were such a good friend to mother why did you help the Lannister's against my father?! Do you take me for a fool? On her face however she simply smiled and said. "Then I will try to keep from letting Joffrey get to me and wait for that day."

She shivered a little as Petyr gently stroked her cheek, something about it sending a stab of panic deep into her mind, but she remained still as he did so before bowing his head again and exiting the room. Sansa shivered again. Enemies all around me, and not a friend in sight. Lady, I should've treated you better my brave wolf, Jeyne, what have they done with you? Now alone a Sansa fell on the bed sobbing, and was still sobbing when the healers arrived to see to her bruised back.

OOOOOO

Cersei had been correct that Joffrey would have a very busy day the next day. He was crowned that very morning. The Queen wanted that done as soon as possible to further strengthen their hold on the throne. She had also sent out a raven late last night to her father, detailing the events in the city, though not detailing the rumors that Ned had begun about her for children being illegitimate. It would come to Tywin's ears eventually, but with no evidence to back it up, he would never believe it, simply seeing it as a ploy for the Starks to seize power.

She had detailed the action in the city, as well as their capture of Edmure, and asked him to march into the Riverlands to make certain that they would not rise in war, as well as warning him about how Stannis and Renly might react. Renly had escaped the city unfortunately, well before she had even sent out Ser Gaunt, and Stannis already seemed to have plans in motion.

Cersei knew that her father already had an army, not a large one but still an army on the border waiting to crush the force sent against the so-called 'bandits', so his move from there into the Riverlands wouldn't take long. His arrival here in the city however would take months. Until then they would have to do what they could to bolster their defenses.

From her position at the bottom of the dais with the Iron Throne Cersei smiled thinly as she watched the crown set gently on her son's head feeling pride in her boy. Her daughter not being here was like a hangnail worrying at her mind, but at least her son was now king as he should've been. She wouldn't have cared which son, but Joffrey was her personal choice, and it was good to see it happen.

The courtroom wasn't as full as normal, even in comparison to the days leading up to Robert's death, but everyone there cheered and clapped as Joffrey stood up from the throne wincing occasionally from the cuts the swords had given him. The thing was more of a torture device than a throne really, all those blades would nick anyone who sat there, making certain that no king could sit comfortably.

With the actual ceremony over however Joffrey could transfer to a much more comfortable seat at it's base and he did so now. "Now, to business" he said clapping his hands and smirking. "I believe we have warrants of treason to sign? I know we talked about it last night, but could we try at least to catch up to Lord Stark?"

Petyr shook his head from where he stood nearby, moving forward with the other small council members as the rest of the court tears slowly dispersed. "We have no naval assets to do so your Majesty, we could ask some of the merchant captains, or even take them over, but I don't have any idea if we could catch up to them. Not with a full night's head start, and besides..." he shrugged. "We have no one who has any experience in naval combat."

"We need to bolster the gold cloaks and the Kingsguard." Cersei said quickly. "We lost several more members of the Kingsguard, and we haven't even filled the place that we lost in Winterfell."

At the mention of Winterfell Joffrey smirked. Not being privy to the messages that Ned and Cat exchanged every month he had no idea that his little mission there had failed. It was a pity, he reflected that he couldn't have told his father about it before the man's death, perhaps that would've made him proud of Joffrey. After all, what was the difference between hunting and sending in assessing? Joffrey couldn't see it.

"Actually speaking of the Kingsguard, I have an announcement to make. Uncle." He said looking over at Jaime.

Jaime was looking a little pale, his ribs were hurting something fierce, and the cut to his back had painful to sew together. Still he stood there in his armor, resplendent in his armor.

"Sir Barristan." Joffrey went on looking at the older man. He too was resplendent, standing ramrod straight, his eyes watchful. Nothing in his manner hinted that he was still quite tired from last evening's work.

"You have served the crown faithfully for years, I feel however that it is time for a change and that you have earned your retirement." Joffrey smirked. "I release you from your oath to the Kingsguard, you may go. Uncle, you are the new Kingsguard commander. I would like to see it be brought up to full strength within the week."

Jaime nodded his head, not trying to hide his shock. The Queen too frowned. Yet a part of her also whispered that Barristan had failed her, not being able to bring home her daughter last night. Because of that, she stayed silent.

Barristan ground his teeth. "You cannot dismiss a Kingsguard, we serve for life your Majesty." He said making the words ironic in a way that made Joffrey's eyes narrow.

"You serve at the king's pleasure" he smirked at the older man. "You have failed two Kings, and you don't seem to be as enthusiastic about my rule as I would've liked. Therefore you may go. Begone." his smile thinned abruptly "Ser Blount, Ser Trant remove his cloak."

"Don't bother." Barristan snarled backing away stood one step his hand going to his sword. He stared at the three surviving members of the Kingsguard, shaking his head. "The Kingsguard has been going downhill since the Aerys died." he said glaring hard at Jaime. "Be it by oath or by skill or will, none of you are worthy of the cloaks you wear. I could cut you all down here and now, and bury this sword in your heart false King." he said staring hard Joffrey.

The Queen growled angrily, surging to her feet but was mailed to her place by a stern look from the older man. "You're not worthy of that crown you wear, but I'll be damned if I'll let your to puppets here take my cloak." He pulled it off himself and threw it at the King's feet. "There it is, the rest." He said tapping the armor he wore. "Well, that stays with me. Call it a trade for my back pay if you want."

"So dramatic!" Joffrey said internally grinding his teeth but he knew that with his uncle injured the older man actually could go through with that threat. Trant and Blount were loyal, at least to the coin, but they weren't actually very good, even he knew that, hence why he had liked it when his mother found the Hound to serve him. "I suppose we can allow you your dramatic moment, but do remember to be gone from the Red Keep within an hour. After that," and his smile thinned again. "You will be detained at our pleasure. You've spoken your piece, just be thankful that we don't name you traitor with Lord Stark."

Barristan Selmy, the oldest serving Kingsguard, the last survivor of the last kings guard, sneered at that, then left without another word. Where he would go or what he would do he didn't know just then, but he first wanted to get out of this cursed city.

After the man left, Cersei turned to her son. "While I agree with the appointment of my brother as commander, it was foolish to dismiss Ser Selmy entirely like that. Ser Barristan adds credence to anyone naming himself King, he is seen as the one of the most honorable knights in all of Westeros, and is a extremely capable commander."

"Then we will have to see that he doesn't declare for anyone else." Joffrey smirked and looked over at Petyr. "Send some gold cloaks to see to that would you?"

Inside his head Jaime rolled his eyes, questioning his 'son's' intelligence at this point. Sending gold cloaks against Barristan Selmy was like setting so many sheep on a bear, it just wouldn't work. Still with his own wounds he wasn't about to go after the old man. He would've liked to, Jaime would've really liked to. Barristan was another man who could give him a hell of a fight, but with his wounds he knew he would lose at the moment.

With that taken care of and nodding her head at her son's forethought the queen went on to other matters. "Returning to the matter at hand, the gold cloaks as I said, need to be brought up to full strength and then some. We also need to send to the nearest crown lands Lord's, and tell them to start mustering their strength. We are vulnerable here with our losses in yesterday's fighting, and..."

OOOOOOO

It was early afternoon when Sansa was roused from her rather torpid sleep by a maid knocking on the door. "Your grace, his highness requests your presence within the hour. I am to help you prepare."

Sansa groaned opening her eyes and looking around, feeling a vague moment of disorientation despite the somewhat familiar environment as the memories of last night clouded through. "Very well," she said frowning as even talking made the wound on her face hurt, and she just knew moving would be painful. "I will need help to make myself presentable." she said grimly.

OOOOOOO

Joffrey smiled pleasantly as Sansa was led to him, guarded by Ser Blount. He sat on the raised dais in an area of the keep's open grounds which had been set aside for executions. In front of him was a long table, on which sat seven plates, with a piece of red cloth covering something on the middle most plate.

Normally executions would happen down at the prison, where the smallfolk could gather to see justice being done, but his mother had vetoed that. The city right now simply wasn't safe. Still, she hadn't told Joffrey he couldn't have his fun. She was too busy organizing the gold cloaks and sending messages to the Crownlands lords, so didn't really care what her son was doing so long as it didn't make her tasks any harder.

"My Lord," Sansa said curtsying formally to him.

"Ah my dear fiancé." he said waving his hand to indicate she should sit in the chair next to him, smiling slightly. "I trust you had a good night's rest?"

"Yes my Lord." Sansa said, bowing her head once more respectfully.

Joffrey peered closely at her face smiling evilly. He could make out the faint marks on her face from his initial blow last night, but Sansa and the maid who had helped her head done a decent job trying to cover it up. Good, it would hardly do to make people think that the girl had been abused after all, rather than simply... chastised in her father's place.

"May I ask why you have sent for me, Your Highness?"

"Ah but I so enjoy your company." Joffrey said taking her hand in his. He loved the small tremor that went through her at that, it made him smile even wider. It was so good not to have to wear his mask any longer. Now he could act as he should've acted all along, as a true King should, taking what he wanted and punishing those that opposed him.

"Your here to see justice done my dear." he went on. "I told you last night that someone had to pay for your father's crimes. Who better to start that process with than the men we captured?"

Sansa's eyes widened in horror at what she was about to see, and for just a moment she contemplated trying to kill Joffrey right there.

But the sight of the two Kingsguard right behind them dissuaded her. She watched horror stricken as several of the men that Joffrey had taken captive were put to death in front of her over the next hour, starting with Ser Willowtree, who had surprisingly been taken captive, the first to die.

The knight showed no fear nor remorse when he was led to the executioner's block. He simply stared straight ahead, his eyes flicking over Sansa for a moment, a faint smile on his lips at seeing her still alive, before he stared with loathing at Joffrey. He continued to do so until Ilyn Payne, the royal executioner, took his head. This seemed to embolden the others, who all went to their death with the same amount of bravery.

It was all Sansa could do to not break her vow of not giving Joffrey the satisfaction of seeing her cry. Nor did it get any easier. By the end of the hour Seven men had been put to death.

Each head was placed on the plane in front of them, three on either side of the plate that already held something. Joffrey said pointing at them, a wide, almost gleeful smile on his face, as his hand reached for the cloth covering the middlemost plate. "This is what will await your father unless he renounces what he has said of me along with his title."

He pulled back the cloth and Sansa couldn't stop herself from crying out in denial. On the plate was Jeyne's head, her face a rictus of horror and pain. She could feel the tears running down her cheeks, but she couldn't stop them, this was the final straw, and her heart could take no more.

Joffrey laughed then, reaching out to touch Sansa's cheek. She couldn't stop herself from flinching away as he touched the mark on her cheek. "This is what awaits anyone who becomes my enemy my dear, you would do well to remember that. I would hate for your head to join them."

With that Joffrey stood up and left waving his hand to the guards who took Sansa back to her room where she collapsed sobbing.

OOOOOOO

Ranma frowned, staring hard at the flag flying from a ship passing about forty leagues away from them from where he was standing next to the steersman. He could barely make out, but... "Make for that ship." He ordered pointing at it.

Daenerys standing beside him looked at him quizzically. "We're almost within sight of King's Landing, why are you so interested in that ship?"

"Because it's flying my father's flag, and there is only one ship in King's Landing that would fly that flag. And only a few reasons why it would be." he added grimly.

Ranma ordered Fenris to join him at the front of the caravel clearly visible to anyone with a spyglass. Soon enough his ship was spotted from the other deck, and they could see him soon after that. The two ships made for one another, and Ranma smiled as he saw uncle Brynden waving at him, though he wondered where his father was. An icy shiver of fear shot through him at that, but he pushed it to one side for now. "Ahoy there!" he shouted waving one hand at his uncle.

"I see you've returned." Brynden said calmly when the two ships came close to one another, his voice not giving any hint as to what had occurred in King's Landing just yet. "Successfully?"

"Well, half successful." Ranma gestured to where Daenerys was standing well behind him, her dragons on her shoulders. She stepped forward imperiously, her hair flying in the wind, to smile across at the older man. "But you could say this is the best outcome for the North personally, even if there are loose ends out there." Ranma said dryly.

Soon enough Ranma and Daenerys stood on the deck of the White Harbor ship. Ranma said formally. "Lord Brynden Blackfish, be known to Daenerys Stormborn of House Targaryen. The little ones on her shoulders are Sunfyre and Rhaegon. Don't get too close to them, unless you wish to lose a random chunk of flesh."

"I wouldn't dream of it..." Brynden said, his normal calm intelligence deserting him for a moment at the site of the magnificent creatures. There hadn't been a dragon sighting in over a hundred and forty years, and now there were two little dragons sitting upright as proud as cats on the Targaryen girl's shoulders. He shook himself after a few moments of staring looking at both young people.

Brynden could see things other people missed, often coming to conclusions that would take other people several minutes of observation, and he could tell almost immediately that these two were interested in one another. It was in how close Ranma stood to Daenerys, how he seemed unconsciously to be standing between her and the crew who were all gaping at Daenerys, how at home the little dragons and Daenerys were with him being so close.

It was in how Daenerys looked at Ranma as he did the introductions, not at Brynden, the way she smiled, the way their hands gently brushed. Good grief, they are besotted with one another. I wonder if this is a good thing or bad in the long term, especially with what occurred here.

"Nevermind my story, what's happened here?" Ranma said looking around at the Fish's Scales and the men, both sailors and armsmen, who were watching them. He frowned, not seeing any of the men he had known from their bodyguard in King's Landing, not even Ser Jory. "And where is my father?"

That thought broke Brynden out of his momentary amusement at the two young people, and he frowned sadly. "You had best come below..."

OOOOOOO

"He'll live, but that's about all we can say." Brynden sighed, shaking his head as he looked at the bed where his brother-in-law lay. "Merry and Alayaya did all they could, the rest is up to him. If we had a maester here there might be something one of them could do better but Merry's book learning is the only reason he's still alive." The man shrugged though Ranma couldn't see it, too busy staring at where his father lay, unconscious in the bed.

In his lap lay Merry, who had barreled into him hugging him for all she was worth the moment he appeared in the doorway to Eddard's room. Through her sobs and Brynden's calm, purposefully detached words, they told Ranma what had happened in King's Landing. Now Merry was asleep, safe in Ranma's arms, safe in a way she hadn't felt since confronting Joffrey and utterly exhausted from the past two days.

His mind could barely grasp all the changes that had been wrought in King's Landing since he had left. His eyes were wet with unshed tears at the memory of the young boy who he had taken under his wing, the boy who he had become an older brother to, who he would cheerfully have called king in the future. "Tommy dead, open warfare between our house and house Lannister. I can barely believe it..." he murmured. "I know Cersei didn't think highly of the King, but to do this, to commit treason like that!"

"We don't know who she laid with, or what she was thinking at the time, though if she suddenly remarries someone we might have a better idea." But there's no doubt that all three of her children weren't legitimate you're right about that, and Cersei will crown her bastard son king or may already have done so by this point." Brynden replied, speaking quietly so as to not wake up the grief stricken young girl, who was the only reason Ned was still breathing. Whatever else, that act had won his respect, and she was entitled to her rest now.

"And Sansa is a prisoner among them, possibly along with your nephew, my cousin, or he's dead." Ranma frowned heavily beginning to pace.

"Don't forget that Stannis is already readying his forces for war. How the hell did he get the news so quickly?" Daenerys said, from where she was leaning against the wall. She hadn't wanted to intrude on Ranma and his grief or his reunion with the royal girl, though she had felt a stab of mixed anger and jealousy at that. Anger at her looks, which looked far too much like the Lannister butchers for Daenerys' liking. And jealousy at how close she seemed to be to Ranma.

Yet when she looked at Ranma or his father, all she felt was sadness. House Stark might have been instrumental in Robert's victory against her family, but after interacting with Domic, and even further with Ranma, Daenerys had long ago realized that they had no choice in the matter. And her growing feelings towards Ranma had easily buried the little bit of residual anger she felt toward the Starks.

"What are you talking about?" Brynden asked, looking over at her, then back to Ranma.

Ranma briefly explained about the ship that had attempted to board them, causing Brandon's eyes to narrow. "I have no idea how Stannis could get the news that quickly," he said seriously. "We had thought to contact him, but the king's death forced our hand before we could. But his being ready to move might explain why the crews from the navy galleys didn't take part in the fighting on either side, they would answer to him as master of Ships after all. You're certain that the captain said there was a rumor going around that the king was dead?"

"Positive, he was quite open about it before the battle actually began." Ranma said, not taking his eyes away from his father's face, which was pale and pasty looking, far removed from his normal stern seeming expression.

"That's damn odd, even a raven couldn't travel from King's landing to Dragonstone so quickly, we're only two days out ourselves. How many days ago was this?" Ranma told him and Brynden's frown deepened. "If I have it right, that would be barely a day after, there's no possible way he could've gotten that news so fast."

"No earthly way my lords." Daenerys murmured shaking her head, voicing a thought Ranma had as well, though for different reasons. "Or no way that we know of, but that isn't the most important thing right now at any rate. What we need consider is what we do now."

Brynden smiled at the girl, though other people would have been irritated at her presumption there. "We keep going, we trust to the size of the bay, leave Dragonstone as far on our left as possible when we exit then turn north toward White Harbor. I'm almost tempted to say we should stop in the Vale at some point to spread the word about the queen and Joffrey, but we can't chance it, not with Lyssa acting so irrationally."

Brynden shook his head sadly. "That hurts to say, given my relation to Lyssa, but it's true. She was paranoid before this, she'll be worse after hearing what has happened in King's Landing. No, we need to get home as quickly as possible, to start marshaling our forces, though with Edmure captured, the Riverlands is in a precarious position."

Ranma sighed, gently stroking Myrcella's head where it lay against his chest. He hated what this would do to Merry when they told her, let alone Tommy's memory. Both of them deserved better, but when was the last time the world was a fair place? For now however he kept his mind on something more serious. "We, I can't let Sansa in the crown's custody. She's my sister, who knows what Joffrey would be willing to do to her to get back at us? And even putting that aside, she would be a hostage against our good conduct. I refuse to let that stand."

"Lad, we can't fight our way through the city just to get to Sansa, that's just not going to happen. We need to march back down with an army at our back, that's the only way."

"We can't." Ranma said with a small smirk, "but I can."

Alayaya looked up at him one eyebrow cocked from where she had been bathing Lord Starks forehead with water. "What do you mean?" The two of them had only spoken a few words to one another since Ranma arrived. Alayaya not being willing to intrude on Ranma's grief for his father or for Tommy, but his voice was once she recognized, and she was eager to see if her guess was right.

Ranma actually smirked at her. "You know damn well what I mean lady," he said then turning back to his uncle. "I'm not talking about trying to force our way through, I'm talking about sneaking my way through."

"It's still too risky. Someone might see you, and alone even you would be overwhelmed Ranma." Brynden said shaking his head. "And even if you could somehow sneak in, there's Stannis to think of now, we can't afford to stay here and wait for you. No, I can't allow this."

"Uncle," Ramos said as he concentrated, "they won't see me." Within one second and the next Ranma had pulled the Umi-Sen-Ken around him, disappearing from their senses for a moment, causing all three to gasp.

OOOOOO

Ranma raced along the shoreline heading towards King's Landing, moving faster than any save Jon could have even followed with his eyes, let alone kept up with on foot. Even Fenris wouldn't have been able to, but Ranma had left him behind on the Fish's Scales. This was a one-man job, and Fenris couldn't use the Umi-Sen-Ken. It seemed as if the direwolf simply couldn't grasp the maneuver mentally, despite Ghost having come up with his own, much more subtle version.

Luckily it had been early evening when the two ships met up, but he only had until dawn to get his sister out of there. Once the sun was up, he would be easy to spot carrying Sansa, he couldn't extend his technique to cover her, and even Ranma would have issues if they tried to surround him and shoot him full of arrows.

There was also the concerns about Stannis, Brynden had been right about that. He had told them to give him to dawn, but after that, they would have to pull out without him. But Brynden had no idea how fast Ranma could run. Jon and the others who had come with Ranma from Hornwood to Winterfell had some idea, but even they couldn't guess that even on that last spurt he hadn't been moving as fast as he could.

Even so, it took him the rest of the evening and well into the night to cover the distance. He spent the time making plans and grieving for Tommen. If his sweat had become somewhat more salty than usual, there was no one around to comment on it.

Sneaking into the city was easy, the gates were always open and the city itself was still dealing with the aftermath of the battles. All the fires had been put out, but people were still leery of going out at night, and the city was rather dead because this. Even sneaking into the keep was not exactly a challenge.

Figuring out where in Maegor's holdfast Sansa would be staying was very difficult however and in the end he just had to guess at it. He first tried the guest rooms, knowing where they were on the first and second floors below the royal apartments on the third and figuring that Cersei would want to keep her hostage close and in some comfort, especially if she knew that they knew Brynden had Merry with him. But he couldn't find any sign of her there, forcing him to searching silently from one room to the next, climbing silently along the outer walls of the holdfast to peer into each room.

Surprisingly he found Sansa asleep in a bed prepared for her in what he recognized as Merry's room. The two girls had enjoyed several sleepovers together since they arrived in the city. Yet to find his sister still being treated this well was surprising.

That thought remained in his head until he was close enough to see her face by the moonlight, whereupon he noticed the bruising. Ranma's teeth clenched in anger, but he kept it under control for now. Getting Sansa out of here was a priority, revenge could come later. He knelt by the bedside, quickly covering Sansa's mouth with one hand shaking her gently. "Sansa, wake up."

The girl did, gasping a little but Ranma's hand over her mouth covered that, and the fact that she knew that voice kept her from screaming. She looked to her side, astonished to see Ranma there. He smiled at her he murmured. "I'm getting you out of your little sister. let's go."

Sansa nodded wetly, looking torn between crying in joy and simply crying. She reached out quickly, pulling him into a tight hug, before getting up out of bed while Ranma moved back, watching the door warily. She looked up at him as she changed into a skirt she used for riding, a bit less frilly and more form fitting than most she owned, wincing with every movement. "R-Ranma, they, they killed Jeyne. And, and they k-killed Ser Willowtree, and old Royer! They, Joffrey, he, he made me watch! Why did this have to happen?!" She said, each word louder than the last.

Ranma close his eyes, his teeth clenching even more, his hands twitching with his fury. "I'm sorry you had to see that Sansa, but we don't have time to..."

That was as far as he got before the door opened and the night guard peered in. "Who are you talking to Gah!" He fell back, one of Myrcella's combs stuck in his throat, which Ranma had picked up from the nightstand and thrown at him.

Unfortunately he wasn't the only guard on duty, and the second one didn't bother trying to rush into the room, instead he shouted "Alarm, the prisoner is escaping!"

Thanks to being part of the royal suites, there were dozens of guards nearby even this late at night, including the remaining members of the Kingsguard. Before Ranma could turn back to grab up Sansa, several of them had charged in, swords drawn.

Once they saw who was there however the men hesitated. The story of Ranma's prowess had spread before his utter destruction of the Mountain that Rode, after that the tale had taken on a life of its own. This was only helped by him being here in the first place, here in the holdfast with no one having seen him come in or even known he had returned to the city.

Ranma smirked at their caution, moving into the center of the room staring at the men clustered around the doorway. "Such a pity, I don't see Ser Selmy or the Kingslayer with you, their presence could at least have made this a fight rather than a farce. What happened to the Lord Commander, has he finally realized that serving a dishonorable king is the same as dishonoring yourself? Where is Jaime, I owe him for what he did to my father, or are his boo-boos still hurting him?" He ended in a taunting tone, his smirk turning dark.

The men still hesitated, none of them wanting to be the first to charge forward.

Ranma and glanced sideways at his sister. "Which of these assholes was the one who beat you Sansa?"

"S-sir Trent" she said from behind the bed. She had no desire to show her body to these men, and they had burst through just as she was trying to pull on a vest over her bruised back.

Trent's eyes widened in horror and he tried to move backwards to hide behind his fellows, but it was too late. Ranma took two steps forward, faster than any man there could track, there was a brief flash of steel in the air then he was back where he had stood before, flicking his blade sending blood spattering on the ground.

Ser Trent breathed a sigh of relief, I'm not feeling anything for a moment. Then blood began to seep from his neck, and his head slowly slid off his body falling to the ground in neatly severed bones and all. Cries of horror abounded all around, yet no one stood forward, unwilling to be the first to attack the Stark heir even more now than before. Certainly Blount wasn't willing to, at the other knight's death he looked as if he was going to piss himself.

By this time Sansa had finished dressing. She was sprinting out from behind the bed heading towards the window when the Queen pushed her way through the assembled armymen. She had obviously been roused from bed by the commotion, she still wore her silk negligee, and Cersei's hair was sticking out every which way. Yet her crown was on her head and despite how she must have looked, her eyes were clear and her face composed as she stared hard at Ranma. "Where is my daughter?"

"Your Majesty." Ranma said bowing his head, no irony in his tone. "Myrcella is safe, you should know that I would never hurt her." Ranma paused looking at the mother before him. And right now Cersei was a mother, not the queen. The queen would've been more worried about losing the bargaining chip that was Sansa, the mother was worried about her daughter. And there was something else he needed to say. "My deepest condolences on Tommen's death. Whatever his true parentage I think I might've been proud to call him King, and he was someone I had come to love."

The earnestness of the young man's voice, the fact that his face looked puffy, his eyes red-rimmed in the glare of the armymen's torches, completely disarmed Cersei for a moment. She stood there, lost in her grief once more, sharing that grief with the young man in front of her.

Joffrey had arrived on his mother's heels, and his teeth clenched angrily as he saw his powerful magnificent mother simply standing there when his deadliest enemy was right in front of her. Even dead you haunt me Tommen! He yelled angrily, laying about with the flat of his blade. "What are you all doing, take him, he's just one man you idiots! Don't let him escape with my bride!"

Prodded like this, the men in the back pushed those in front forward towards Ranma. He grinned in anticipation but a 'Eep' from Sansa reminded him of his priorities here. "Dammit. Stay behind me Sansa, stay with the window at your back."

The first few men now having no choice raised their weapons and attacked. Ranma's weapons flashed, parrying, blocking, thrusting, killing five men in as many seconds before his katar got caught in one man's armored plate. He cursed, letting go of the blade and kicking the man's body into two of his fellows before pulling his other katar out, hurling it through the press of bodies towards Joffrey.

One man however unfortunately got its way, taking the knife straight to his armored head, flying backwards with the impetus of Ranma's throw. But his furious defense had cleared enough space for Ranma to turn, sheathing his blade quickly unmindful of the blood on it, before he lifted Sansa in his arms. "Hold tight!"

With that Ranma leaped out of the window, ignoring his sister's shrill squeak of fright.

He landed easily on the ground, as the men he had left behind began to shout in shock, having never expected him to jump like that. Cersei knew then that there was even more to Ranma's skills than he had showed, and that he could probably get away. She pushed through the men crowding the window, staring down Hard at Ranma as he switched Sansa to his back, just in case he had to defend them.

"STARK!" She shouted. Ranma looked up at her, as did Sansa, and Cersei smiled sadly, thinking so many what-might-have-beens that she could hardly get the next words out. "Take care of my daughter."

Ranma bowed his head to her. Unlike Brynden or his father, Ranma could see past her actions to the woman underneath, so had no issue with taking her words at face value now, regardless of the fact they would be facing one another across a battlefield soon enough. "I will, your majesty."

With that he turned, racing over the Red Keep's ground with Sansa now clinging to his back like a limpet towards the outer wall of the keep, not stopping as he leaped up landing on the battlements easily before leaping further out to land in the road leading up to the Red Keep.

Sansa had buried her face into his neck the moment Ranma had switched her position, and she clung even more desperately now despite Ranma having both arms underneath her legs as he raced on. He took to the rooftops occasionally, but the Red Keep couldn't get out the word that Sansa was escaping fast enough to catch up with him and he escaped the city easily, leaving behind chaos and a very worried queen and a furious king.

It was several minutes after they had escaped the city that Sansa finally had the courage to lean away from Ranma. The speed they were moving astonished and somewhat terrified her despite her clinging to Ranma, but Sansa had to concentrate on the here and now. "W-what about the others?"

"What others?" Ranma asked looking over his shoulder at her. He leaned forward to kiss her forehead gently trying to calm her down a little.

Sansa smiled faintly, remembering times when she was just out of her toddler years. When Sansa had hurt herself falling she would cry, which would get her minders attention. If he was watching her, Ranma would kiss her forehead just like that then sing this little ditty about the pain flying away.

It had always made her feel better, but nothing could make her feel better now. Childhood was over, never to return and the horror of what she had seen was still vivid in her mind. "Joffrey captured about a dozen men from the battle in the tower. He, he made me watch as that horrible Payne executed several of them, but there were still more there. And what about cousin Edmure?"

"Uncle Brynden didn't know about the men, but we figured that Edmure had been captured or killed. I'm sorry I never met him, he sounds like he was a good man." Ranma shook his head sadly. "I hate to think about what Joffrey will do to them, especially since I was able to rescue you, but I couldn't have rescued them all Sansa, I only have one back, and Fish's Scales can't wait. There're more enemies than just the Lannisters, and we need to get out of Blackwater Bay as quickly as possible. Even this was a risk, but I couldn't let you there."

Sansa nodded sadly, traveling into his back and telling him about what had happened since the battles had taken place. Despite it having only been a single day, it felt like years to her, years filled with fear, horror and pain as she came to see the true Joffrey under his façade.

Ranma ground his teeth so hard it was audible in the nighttime air at what his sister had gone through in just a single day with Joffrey, and vowed that the young monster's death would be the stuff of legends if Ranma ever got his hands on him. But it had been the same problem as when he had rescued Danny, Ranma couldn't protect Sansa and take on an entire castle full of enemy troops at the same time.

"Is it true?" Sansa said after another twenty minutes of silence while Ranma kept running down the shoreline. "Is Joffrey, Merry and even Tommen all illegitimate? That's what they're saying our father was trying to spread around, but no one believes it or at least no one will say they believe it now."

While she had nothing of Joffrey's pleasure for inflicting pain on his victims, Cersei was utterly ruthless. She had shown that in a brutal purge of the city's power structure, getting rid of anyone who might have been tempted to believe Eddard Stark's 'lies'. After only two days of this and the fact the gold cloaks and others were once more able to keep the peace in the city, no one was willing to speak out against her. A true carrot and stick approach, as it were. {does that make sense?}yes

"It's true. Our father wouldn't have said it if it wasn't, though I haven't talked to him personally. He was badly injured... he'll live!" He hastened to say as he felt Sansa start to shake, but he's still comatose from his wounds."

Sansa still teared up a little at the thought of their father being so badly wounded, but she kept her mind on what Ranma had said. "Were you telling the truth, is Merry really with you?"

"Yes, and so is Alayaya, though how they got to the docks is a story and a half. Ser Oakheart is dead, as is Mattimeo, both of them fell defending Merry and Alayaya."

"I'm sorry!" Sansa sobbed, clutching at his back now. If only I had gone with them, if only I hadn't been in the Tower!"

"The servants would have still been there, and you would've still had to fight your way through the city. Nor did anything you did affect what happened with our father and his men." Ranma said shaking his head. "Don't blame yourself for everything Sansa. It's true I would've preferred you to see Joffrey for what he was earlier, and yes, it might have been your presence that made the Lannisters attack rather than try to starve our people out of the tower, but they would still have had the prisoners in the Tower themselves. And our father would still have been wounded, and the battle would still have gone against our forces. Don't blame yourself for everything, don't denigrate our people's sacrifice like that." Ranma said again, staring ahead of them. "Simply know that you made mistakes, learn from them and move on."

Sansa nodded jerkily, falling silent. She simply clung to Ranma's back as he raced on through the night, more tireless than the direwolf that was part of their House's emblem.

To say the crew of the small boat resting on the shore were astonished at Ranma's return was a gross understatement. They had honestly thought that the young fool had been going to his death, not knowing anything about Ranma's special abilities. But they were loyal men of Lord Manderly, and they would obey Lord Stark as their Lord Paramount and Ranma spoke for Lord Stark.

"Damn son," the bosun said shaking his head. "I didn't think ya could do it."

"Your grace" he said bowing his head towards Sansa. "Er, pleased to see you safe and sound, milady." With the hard task of speaking to the noble born lady over with, the man quickly hustled Sansa and Ranma aboard.

"I won't feel safe or sound until were back in the North, Ser," Sansa replied with all the poise at her control. "When I step foot in White Harbor is the moment I will truly be safe."

That made every man there to sit up straight, squaring their shoulders with pride. Ranma smirked a little at how easily Sansa had made her trust in these men plain while also challenging them. "Will get you there milady," one man said as he began to pull on his oar strongly. "Have no fear of that."

Ranma nodded grim agreement at that leaning back and looking up at the stars as the first flush of dawn appeared in the sky. The ship that had tried to take Daenerys away had gotten off lightly, and Ranma was in no mood now to play Mr. Nice Guy with anyone that tried to stop them getting home. If he had to break out some more of his bag of tricks, so be it.

Soon enough they were being hoisted up the side of the Fish's Scales. Daenerys was there waiting for them with Brynden, who was shaking his head in bemusement that Ranma had actually pulled it off. Daenerys however was unsurprised, smiling in welcome with Rhaegon on her shoulder. Ranma smiled back, and, as Sansa stared at the slightly older girl in front of her, introduced them.

Sansa was in awe of the dragon princess. Even by the light of the lamps here and there on the ship she could tell the other girl was a rare beauty, and the shimmering of her silver hair was mesmerizing. Then there was the drakling on her shoulder, sitting up as proudly as any cat, yet easily recognizable as a dragon, its wings unfurled slightly behind it for balance.

"Lady Sansa, your brother has told me a lot about you." Daenerys smiled, though it segued into a prankster's smirk after a second. "Mostly embarrassing things it must be said. Did you really try to sew your sisters to her bed when she ripped up one of your dresses?"

Those listening laughed at that, while Sansa went red and began to smack Ranma's shoulder, the ice well and truly broken.

About forty minutes later Sansa was put in the same room with Merry, the two of them sharing the second of only two beds aboard the ship. Daenerys refused flat-out to take it herself, allowing the younger girls to have it. Instead she had a few of the crewmen rig up two hammock for herself and Alayaya. Alayaya had looked a little askance at the hammocks, but resigned as well. Merry was still out of it, not even waking up as Sansa fell into the bed next to her.

The Fish's Scales continued on, under full sail as dawn began to break, speeding along as quickly as they could. After settling Sansa down, Daenerys and Ranma removed themselves to watching over Eddard, whose condition had not changed in the hours since Ranma had left.

After a moment Daenerys spoke, her voice low so as to not disturb the two asleep draklings, Rhaegon having joined Sunfyre in the overlarge basket prepared for them in the corner of the room. "I'm sorry this happened to your family. At least I know my family was wiped out because of the actions of one of our own. Your's has nearly been ripped apart simply because it refused to play the 'game' of politics. I also wish I had been wrong that the unity of Westeros was a fiction, barely covered by a lie, but the Baratheon's rule was never going to be stable enough to last, not when it was undermined from within and built on so feeble a foundation."

"I know, Robert was never strong enough on his own to keep the crown, and he wasn't really suited for it either. But I never thought the queen would have done what she did." Ranma actually had hoped that his shows of force, and the rumors about it, would keep a lid on the shifting balance of power, but it hadn't worked out that way. He sighed, slumping against the outer wall of the room, rubbing at his face tiredly.

The two of them were silent for a time before Daenerys asked. "So what will we do now? And how is this going to effect your plans for me?"

Ranma looked up at her, his face amused. She smiled as he reached out to pull at her hair, gently urging her to sit down next to him. "I think we both know my plans for you changed well before we spotted this ship, don't we?"

"So, then what now?" Daenerys asked, her face flushed at the teasing tender note to his voice.

"Now?" Ranma's face firmed up even as he took her hand in his, squeezing it gently. His mind however was all on the business of the moment. "Now, Joffrey sits on a throne that shouldn't be his, Stannis has seemingly declared us an enemy, the Lannisters hold my uncle prisoner, and the Westerlands will no doubt be marching into the Riverlands soon. Now, we travel north, we return my family to Winterfell. Then? Then we prepare for war."

End chapter

Whooh! What a chapter to write out. I hope you all enjoyed the flow of the battle, if not the outcome. Sorry, but there was just no way after Edmure was captured before rallying the gold cloaks that they could win, the numbers were simply too against them, though they came a lot closer than anyone on the other side would ever have imagined, and both sides paid for it.

In regards for the budding romance between Ranma and Daenerys, I've always thought that public perception and the pressures of those around them would hurt any courting going on regardless of the individuals in question. If they didn't have the needs of their families to worry about Margaery and Ranma would have developed romantic feelings rather than friendly ones toward one another very quickly. Beyond the older man Domic, Daenerys and Ranma really had only one another to talk to on this voyage, they were attracted to one another from the start, they had the draklings to bond over, and simply a lot of time to sit and talk with no real ulterior motives. Is Daenerys ambitious? Somewhat, but it isn't the central part of her character, that is her deep and growing love for her draklings, and her desire to make her family a proud, honorable one again. Not the same thing.

For those wondering, yes, Joffrey will die in a spectacular fashion in the future, but right now, he and Viserys are both a sign of what I would call the inevitable escalation of enemy forces to match Ranma's ability and the changes he creates. Magic too will have been effected by his presence, as will be shown in the future when I do some Melisandre scenes (ugh, hate her, just as much but in a different way than Joffrey).

So, the civil war has begun, and the sides are set. What will happen next? And what has been happening up North all this time?

Thank you for reading, and as always please review.

*Chapter 9*: Chapter 9

A moment of silence for the passing of Terry Pratchett. He was an amazing writer, a truly fantastic personality, an inspiration both with his writing and in the rest of his life. The world is a slightly colder, more serious place without him.

I don't own A Song of Ice and Fire, if I did, I would commit seppuku for how long it's taken for me to finish the series. Nor do I own Ranma 1/2, I would have killed Kuno and Genma in Martineqsue ways if I did.

And my flamer is back! Or another one has taken his place, uncertain since they are both guests, though not the sort I'd welcome into my home, ya know. I'm sorry dude, but calling Ranma a faggot for showing human feelings and sympathizing with Cersei's recent loss of Tommen, who Ranma had come to care for as well, despite the battle that occurred between their factions is not what I call a review. Your little hate-blurb has been deleted with extreme prejudice. Let me state now, his sadness over Tommen's death won't stop him from killing Cersei if he has to, he doesn't want to, but he will.

A special shout out to EleazarJ, for answering some of my questions about the expanded world of ASolaF. Thanks also go to Crossfort for taking on the task of beta. Jessolt alas has retired from being my beta, but so everyone should thank Crossfort for stepping up to the plate for this chapter. If you think you are up to spotting small mistakes, word choice issues and other things, PM me please, since I need a specialist in that area both for this story and ATP.

---

Chapter 9: Divided, United

Jaime Lannister rubbed his face tiredly, looking down at the reports that covered the desk he had commandeered in the gold cloak garrison in the Street of the Sisters. He wasn't someone who was naturally good with paperwork but as the senior Lannister Commander in the city it fell to him to reorganize the city's defenses. He had been working on that since Joffrey had promoted him to the position of Lord Commander of the Kingsguard, a task made worse for having to deal with his injuries.

This, along with the dozens of carts devoted to removing bodies throughout the city, had woken Jaime up to the reality of the losses they had taken in beating off the Starks. Nearly crippling losses when you looked at both their supporting houses and House Lannister's own troops. Several houses had even lost their heirs or lords.

Lord Staunton would never return home, nor would any of his men. Lord Thorne was also dead, leaving only his second son and heir, a whelp of only ten and two to lead the family, minus the fifteen armsmen who had been with him. House Manning had been gutted, losing both their lord and two younger sons along with forty armsmen. Jaime doubted they would ever recover. Nor were those the only names on the battle's butcher's bill, just the worst. All these deaths would no doubt have political implications in the future, but Jaime would let that in his sister's capable hands.

The Lannister forces themselves had started off with a little over four hundred men in the Red Keep. They had been used almost exclusively against the defenders in the tower, who, they knew precisely having had to remove the bodies had numbered fifty-seven men. The price Jaime's House had paid there was almost worse than the fighting in the city. Ninety-two men had survived that fight, just ninety-two! The Winterfell and Riverrun men had used every trick in the book, and their training, their organization, and their prepared defense in depth had been just as deadly as their blades.

The fighting in the city had killed another hundred and ten men who were nominally under House Baratheon, but had been bought off by Lannister gold or were loyal to Joffrey as heir of the King's Landing branch of that House. Not all of them had died in the small, brutal skirmishes against Eddard's forces, many had been pulled down by smallfolk rioters.

The gold cloaks were even worse off because of that issue and their own civil war. Several garrisons had been shattered in the fighting between factions, with bare handfuls of men having lived through the bloody battles fought in the close confines of those garrisons. Two garrisons had in fact been burned to the ground. The Mud Gate garrison had burned their own barracks as they retreated. Its commander, Ser Jacelyn Bywater had been a staunch reformist and put up a spirited defense before eventually being overcome by superior numbers. That battle had been why Lord Pyle had taken so long to get to him to with the reinforcements. All told, a little less than six-hundred men of their original two-thousand remained.

Worse, his house's practices of paying for loyalty had left them with the dregs, those men who were more interested in lining their own pockets rather than fulfilling their duties to keep order in the city, which made what would have been a tough job nearly impossible now. The city was not really safe for any of the upper class outside of the richer districts and some other sections that hadn't been the target of much rioting. The rest of the city was pretty quiet, but it was a surly sort of quiet. On the surface the city seemed on the mend, but that was only surface deep, and the Lannisters were even more reviled now than before.

I know Cersei mouthed the words in that meeting of the council where I was elevated, but I don't think she understands how badly we were mauled. Still, she's done a good job pulling the remaining neutral lords on board, though if we can actually trust them I don't know.

Those neutral lords were the ones providing much of the stability in the city at this point. They also helped remove the bodies which were burned or tossed in the sea depending on where they were found. But even those nobles who didn't take part in the battle were finding scant welcome among the smallfolk. There was no sign of an outright rebellion, not yet, but the city made Jaime feel like he was standing near Mad King Aerys again; like danger could come at any time with no warning.

He looked up from the piles of paper when the door opened, showing a messenger from the keep. "Ser Jaime, her majesty has asked you to report back to the Red Keep."

Jaime nodded, standing up wincing from the pain from his wounds. They weren't serious, but they would take many weeks to heal fully, Jaime had cracked ribs before this, so knew how quickly they healed, and the slash in his back was debilitating as well, the stitches pulling every time he moved. Still he could walk at least. Soon he was back in the keep, standing before the doorway to the queen's conference chamber, a smaller, but even more opulent chamber than the king's.

He shared a nod with Ser Balon Swann, who was standing guard outside. He was a tried and tested knight, youngish, but grim of face, honorable and a decent blade by Jaime's reckoning. Truth be told, he was easily better than the two Kingsguard who had died since their journey up to Winterfell, and more honorable to boot. He had performed well returning order to the city since the Lannisters won against the Starks thus proving their legitimacy, and Jaime had made him his first appointee to the Kingsguard.

Balon opened the door for his commander, and Jaime's sister smiled at him as he entered. "I have good news brother. We have heard back from a few of the nearest Crownlands lords, they are prepared to answer my call for aid." She scowled a little. "Grand master Pycelle and I nearly emptied the keep of ravens to send messages out to all the lords I wanted to reach including our father and some who I hoped to overawe, but I think it was worth it. Ravens arrived from Rosby and Stokeworth this morning. In total two-thousand, seven-hundred men will be arriving here in a matter of weeks from those noble houses and their minor houses."

She waved Jaime into a seat across from her at the small table. "I want the Kingsguard and the gold cloaks up to full strength before they arrive. We cannot be seen to be weak, these men may be loyal to us since we retain the throne, but I don't doubt that they will just as soon kneel to anyone else who seems strong enough to take the throne from us. Once they bleed for us though they will be tied to our cause."

"That is a tougher job than you might think." Her brother answered, sighing wearily. Jaime then filled her in on the troubles he was running into in that area, listing the number of dead lords and heirs that had fallen in the battle in particular, and also mentioning how the city was still tense.

After a moment Cersei nodded. "I hadn't realized how bad it had been among our allies save in the gold cloaks. Still there is nothing we can do about it now save blame the Starks when the families learn of their losses. Name three more names for the Kingsguard, then concentrate on rebuilding the gold cloaks, and think up ideas for defense of the city. Maester Pycelle will be working on that as well. I'll let Joffrey fill out the rest of the Kingsguard, it will give him something to work on while I..."

The two siblings were interrupted as the door banged open and Joffrey stomped in, his entire body screaming out petulance. "Have we discovered my fiancé and her brother yet?! I want his head on a pike at sundown and Sansa returned to me immediately!"

The Queen sighed while her brother cocked an eyebrow in question. "As I told you this morning my son, there is no chance of us finding Rannar or Sansa. They were out of the city before our message could reach the outer walls of the city. I do not doubt he can run as quickly as that direwolf of his for a time, and I doubt carrying Sansa would bother him at all."

"What's this?" Jaime asked. "I've been neck deep in Stranger-be-damned paperwork since the meeting yesterday, when I wasn't with the poxy healers. Did something happen last night?" He had been given some sleeping draughts by the healers to help him sleep with his wounds, and had taken to leaving the keep early in an attempt to get as much work done as he could each day, so this was the first time he had heard this tale.

"Ranma Stark snuck in late last night to rescue his sister. He escaped with her, killing eight armymen and three knights including Ser Trant." Cersei replied, shrugging slightly. "Evidently there is much more to Ranma's abilities than we knew. He survived jumping down from the royal apartments to the ground outside the holdfast with ease, and then was able to get out of the keep before our men on watch at the walls could be warned. I doubt they could have stopped him in any case."

"You seem... awfully calm about this sister..." Jaime said, looking at her in surprise, himself being not happy about the fact to have lost yet another of the Kingsguard. 'Even if he wasn't worthy in the first place' he thought, rather amused. Trend should never have been elevated to the white given his skill set, let alone his moral fiber. And that's without some of the looks I've seen him give Merry and other young girls, no the world is a better place without him.

"It is an affront against the dignity of the crown!" The young King growled out before Cersei could reply. "I want my fiancé back now! It's impossible for one man to just escape so fast. He must be hiding in the city somewhere and I want them found now!"

Jaime was amused to see that 'his son' actually stamped his foot in a fit of pique.

"Yet evidently it can be done, if the person has the skills of a hero from the Age of Legends." His mother replied coolly while watching Joffrey through narrowed eyes. "Ranma could have made it his mission to kill you my son, or any of us, and gotten away with much less fuss than his rescue of Sansa. Ranma is not an assassin, he doesn't think like that."

Indeed the Queen saw his heroism as something to admire, his love of his sister striking her in the heart, as had his grief over Tommen's death which she had seen in his face and eyes. And Cersei knew she could trust him to watch over her daughter. "We have lost a political tool, nothing more, and I know Ranma well enough to know he will guard Myrcella with his life, something the mother in me is thankful for."

Joffrey ground his teeth in rage, knowing now that his mother's acceptance of Ranma's escape had more to do with insuring her daughter's protection than anything else. Damn it, both my siblings should have died stillborn, it would have been better for the crown if they had. They are always taking attention away from me, and now my mother's love for my sister has clouded her judgment.

Before he could continue his tantrum however, Pycelle and the others entered the room. The Queen nodded to them all, gesturing at the table to indicate they should all be seated, looking at their expressions closely, but she couldn't tell how they had taken last night's events. Yet Joffrey was not the only one who was mortified and chagrined by Sansa's rescue.

Petyr's reaction to Sansa's rescue mirrored Joffrey's save he felt even more hate and loathing for Ranma Stark. His rescue of Sansa meant that the Master of coin had missed his chance to ingratiate himself with Sansa, which would have been useful on many level. She would have been a perfect wife, a surrogate for her mother who had obviously been so sullied by the barbarian Starks as to enjoy it. Petyr could also have used her to create a connection with House Stark so that whoever won he would be well-positioned to take advantage afterward. Now Baelish had to think of some other way to seem at least neutral in this conflict, or he would be forced to work so that the Lannisters come out on top.

Face facts Petyr, no one of the Stark's faction would ever believe you had no part in how the battle here went, Petyr thought now. Not unless they were so desperate for aid they couldn't turn anyone offering such away. Eddard and Ranma would have to die first at the very least, possibly Jon Snow as well, all in such a way that the blame was placed on the Lannisters, or simply the random luck of battle. So, how to make that happen...

The moment the three men sat, Cersei told them her news then looked at Varys. "Do you have any of your 'little birds' in Dragonstone? Stannis will be the first to move against us, he will receive the news of the king first since Dragonstone is only a week by boat away, and he is an ambitious, prideful man."

And I have some suspicion on who helped Jon Aryn in his initial investigation. Stannis might have known about Joffrey's illegitimacy well before the events in King's Landing.

Varys looked a little worried, or perhaps the term disturbed came better to describe what his fat, florid face was showing. "I am afraid not your highness. I used to, but they stopped reporting to me about a month and a half ago.

Their last messages all spoke of a woman in red who preached the religion of R'hllor. Apparently Stannis' wife has been converted to it, as have others. The Dragonstone maester is also dead, though the reasons for his death were unknown to my agents. "

"Odd... I wonder why Stannis has allowed this priestess such leeway, he isn't known as religious or tolerant of such." Pycelle mused aloud.

Cersei however smiled thinly. "Inform the High Septon of that would you, Pycelle? I think we can spin that easily to make this a religious matter, and that may force him to open the Great Sept's coffers to fund the defense of the city."

"An excellent thought your majesty." Pycelle responded enthusiastically, a smile on his somewhat fligid face. "We need to prepare the seaward defenses for certain. We'll need to build siege equipment. The walls too, might have weak points, and the port itself needs to be defended. This will all take money, of course, and the Great Sept's coffers are very deep."

"Hmfm." Joffrey scoffed, hiding his fear of Stannis under bravado. He had never gotten along with either of his uncles, not liking how Renly didn't seem to understand how important he was, and he had hated how Stannis looked down on him the few times they were around one another. "We should just take the merchant vessels in the harbor out and meet him. Surely we can pull enough men from the city and the gold cloaks."

"The gold cloaks are a bare shadow of what they were before the battle against Eddard's faction. And even if they weren't there is no chance of us using them as an offensive force." Jaime said, shooting that plan down harshly. "They aren't even as well trained as common armsmen, and you need special training to fight aboard ship. Footwork and working with others in enclosed spaces becomes much more important, things armsmen don't learn normally."

Joffrey subsided for a moment, scowling at his uncle speaking to him like that, but Petyr spoke up before he could fire back, looking at the queen. "Besides appealing to the High Septon, where can we raise more money? Can you use your family's name with the banks in the city?"

"I can for now, though for anything over a hundred-thousand gold dragons I would need to have my father's approval. The bankers will take my word on that approval coming however. But my brother raises a good point. The gold cloaks and our noble allies alone might not be enough to defend the city. We need to garner public support, turn the citizens against Stannis, to get them to throw in their lot to help the defense of the city. The High Septon's backing might help, but we'll need to do more. Varys, we'll use your network to spread rumors about Stannis throughout the city: how he will be a cruel king, how he doesn't care for the common man, this new religion, anything you can think of."

Varys nodded, agreeing that the idea had merit, though for his own reasons. Varys hadn't really wanted open conflict to break out, but now that it had, he wanted all the Lords Paramount weakened, ripe for conquest by his backer.

"Besides Stannis being so close, we have time if we can rebuild the gold cloaks at least on paper. Our father will not receive my missive for five days, but will no doubt move quickly after that. Where does everyone see threats appearing long term? Also Varys, I want to find out the outcome of Ranma's mission. It could prove disastrous if he actually did come back with the Targaryen siblings. Find out if the ship he sailed to Pentos on came back and followed the Northern ship up North, or entered one of the other ports in the Bay." Cersei concluded.

Pycelle smiled thinly. "Before the Starks attempted their coup I received word from some of Lord Lannister's agents in Sunspear. Prince Oberyn has been jailed by Prince Doran to stop him from leading the army of Dorne against us for what they see as the murder of Tyene Sand. This is another sign that the Dornish Prince is too cowardly to pose an offensive threat. The Vale is rapidly disintegrating. Lysa Aryn may be its nominal leader, but she has little to no control outside the Vale of Aryn itself. The mountain clans are nearly in open revolt, and the lords are bickering amongst one another. The Riverlands will not challenge us either so long as we keep Hoster Tully's heir as our hostage. It is to the Reach and the Stormlands we need to look to."

"What about the North?" Joffrey asked indignantly. "You didn't mention them, and it is the North and that Seven-damned Eddard Stark who began this strife along with his son. I cannot understand why we don't simply march north to reclaim my fiancé from her barbarous family, and torch Winterfell as a pointed reminder to the rest of them who their masters are!"

"That isn't really an option I'm afraid." Varys said apologetically, an easy mask for him. "We named Eddard Stark a traitor from the beginning of this conflict. As king, you need to marry to a house that will bring power and prestige to the crown. Marrying a daughter of a traitor would bring neither. Nor could we simply march an army north. It would take months to arrive there with any appreciable force, and they would know of the armies coming well in advance of its arrival."

"I'm afraid he's right my son." Cersei said apologetically. "If Ranma hadn't absconded with her as he had we might have gone through with the marriage, but as it is, no. Instead, I will send a message to lord Tyrell to offer your hand to Margaery, you liked her didn't you?"

Joffrey now felt torn, he had indeed liked the look of the Tyrell girl and it would be great to steal away the fiancé of that cursed northern barbarian. Though she seemed to think she was clever, a failing in any woman really. Even his own mother thought that, and look at the mistakes she was still making because of her female sentimentality. Nor did Joffrey like the idea of giving up anything he saw as his by right, and Sansa was his, there was no doubt of that in Joffrey's mind. Still, I understand their points, and House Tyrell would indeed bring in a lot of men, men I could use to crush my uncles and then march on the North. But I wonder if there is a way to have my sweatmeat and eat it too...

"What news of Renly?" Jaime asked.

"I sent two score of my men out to try and detain him, but he was too fast to flee the city for them to find him, and he stayed ahead of our pursuit until they could no longer find the trail." Petyr said, shrugging. "He's no doubt halfway to the Stormlands by now."

"Would he not go to the Reach instead? They could field a larger army, and the majority of his guards at present came from house Tyrell." Varys said. "If so, your offer of Joffrey's hand to the Rose of Highgarden wouldn't be as welcome if they could marry Renly to her instead."

For just a moment the image of Margaery with a crown on her head filled Cersei's brain. She shivered in fear at the idea Margaery might be the young queen from the prophecy from old Maggy that had told her she would outlive all her children and then be replaced by a younger, more beautiful queen.

But then a sudden burst of joy wiped away her fear. With Ranma protecting my daughter, my sweet little lioness will come to no harm. If she doesn't die, that will invalidate old Maggy's predictions, even after Tommen's death! "It will still muddy the waters, and may force them to consider other options." She said, then frowned. "I just wish there was something more we could do to make certain the Stormlands would not answer either brother's call to rise against us."

"Now wait a moment." Petyr said. "I think his highness has a point." Joffrey sat up straighter at that, forgetting his own plans and desires for a moment. "I think if we strike quickly against the North, get to and through the Neck before they can get word of what happened here, we would have a much easier time of it later on. Once Moat Cailin has been cleared we can hold it, and then bring in more troops once we finish off our more southern opponents."

Both Varys and Jaime shook their heads at that, but it was Cersei who spoke up. "That isn't an option for many reasons. For one, we don't have an army to send just yet, and it would take months as I said to get an army up there at all. Plus you never saw the work being done on Moat Cailin Littlefinger. It doesn't need reinforcement any longer."

Jaime nodded, shuddering at the idea of going up against the Moat. The Rock might be more defensible, but the Moat's defenses would massacre any army that came against it. "Could we make overtures to the Ironborn? We could have them attack the North in our stead with the promise of more freedom under the crown, or a slice of the Northern pie."

"I wouldn't trust an Ironborn further than I could throw this table," Cersei replied tartly. "We'll need to wait for the Lannister fleet to be in a position to help our forces get around the Neck."

"Then I have another suggestion." Petyr said, smiling thinly. "Why don't you send me on a mission to the Vale? If we can get them on our side it will be a major boon. They might only be able to field a small offensive army, but they have closer ports for an invasion around the eastern side of the North through the Bite, and excellent defensive positions. I also suggest we send messages to House Sunderland. The smugglers of Sisteron can be brought to our side by the promise of gold, and should be able to assault Lord Stark and the Northerners before they reach White Harbor."

The Three sisters were three small islands set in the Bite about two weeks (because of weather and the Bite's sailing conditions, not distance) from White Harbor. It had originally been home to pirate kings, before they grew too bold and attempted to gain territory in the North, which caused the North to invade them in turn. In desperation the 'kings' of the island had bent the knee to the Eyrie of the Vale, and the two kingdoms had gone to war over the islands. The war may have ended a thousand years ago, but the men of the islands still remembered and would no doubt jump at the chance to kill Northmen with crown approval.

"That's a good suggestion, but we won't send you to the Vale, Littlefinger." The Queen scoffed. "You have duties right here as master of coin. Nor do I see how you could get the Vale on our side, unless you have something to tell us?"

Petyr subsided with a self-deprecating shrug and the meeting continued. Joffrey tried to interject his opinion a time or two, but for the most part was willing to let his mother carry the conversation, which she did fairly well, with Jaime and Pycelle aiding her. Joffrey knew his time would come in battle of course, much like his father before him, so had no issue allowing his mother to take the lead now despite his being king. He would make his name the same way Robert did, by remorselessly cutting down his enemies.

Later that day Joffrey followed that idea by going down to the Street of Steel to buy himself a new blade. Surrounded by a force of fifty, Joffrey still heard the mutters of the smallfolk and one or two thrown bricks impacted his guard's shields. But after killing the one too-brave idiot who threw one, the crowd grew more respectful in his opinion, melting away. Upon arriving at his destination, Joffrey was surprised to find that master smith Tobho Mott had died in the rioting that had spiraled out of the Stark's attempted coup, along with his apprentice, who was already considered a very good smith.

After a moment spent staring at the burned out ruins of the smith's shop, he shrugged, turning away to rejoin his retinue of Kingsguard and Lannister men. He would need to settle for second best for now. He didn't even look at the cart carrying their bodies away. One of the dead bodies was an old man who would have still looked hearty if he had been alive. The other was a young man around the prince's age, with broad shoulders, dark hair and eyes set into a wide face.

The trip back to the castle however was when the crowd began to reappear. It wasn't anything planned or anything like that, it was simply that the news the Lannister king was in the city had spread, and a crowd of smallfolk with more hatred than common sense to put it bluntly had begun to arrive. They began to circle the king's party, tossing refuse, a few bricks and anything else that came to hand. "Down with the yellow king, down with the burners, the rapists! Down with the gold fucking Lannisters!"

Ser Swann urged his horse forward, gently nudging Joffrey's steed behind him. "Your highness, I think you should move back." Balon raised his shield just in time to catch a brick thrown at his head, whipping out his sword. He turned to the rest of the party. "Flat of the blades only, we don't want a bloodbath here." The others all nodded, knowing the real reason, that there were far too many smallfolk for them to break through if the crowd became any more unruly, which it would once blood began to flow.

"What! I am the king, this scum need to be put in their place!" Joffrey snarled. At that moment a wine bottle was hurled over the intervening guardsmen, smacking into Joffrey's horse. The beast shied, but Joffrey regained control quickly, looking around in sudden fear.

"At a canter, make for the Keep!" Balon yelled, charging forward. The throng hadn't crowded them enough to stop their horses from gaining speed, and the front of their column slammed into the crowd blocking their path to the Red Keep easily, laying all around them with the flat of their blades.

The crowd gave way, some fearfully others reluctantly, but with the momentum and size of their warhorses Balon and his men forged a path through the masses for Joffrey. Now that he knew things had returned to the way they should be, Joffrey rode forward at the center of his guards, thinking of how best to remind these uppity smallfolk that he was their king. The same mind that had tortured Sansa now turned its attention onto a larger playground, staring around and noting the faces of particularly loud rioters.

Thankfully for the smallfolk, Cersei well knew they needed public opinion on their side, and curtailed many of Joffrey's excesses in the coming weeks. But eventually, her ability to control Joffrey would fade, and he would begin to earn the name that he would carry to his grave: Joffrey the Vile.

OOOOOO

Elsewhere in the city the former, though he was still getting used to that bit, White cloak commander Ser Barristan Selmy began to hide the bodies of the three armsmen that the Lannisters had sent after him. They had come upon him just as he exited the slums, having stayed at a rundown inn whose owner owed him a favor there. "Of course the little whelp would send someone after me, did they think they would catch me unawares? I'm almost insulted." He shook his leonine head, continuing talking to himself while piling garbage on the bodies, an easy task here in the slums. "Still, that doesn't help me much now. I still need to get out of the city, and then decide where to go..."

Barristan paused as he heard a murmur of voices coming somewhere in the maze of warrens that made up the slums. "I tell ye, the Stark girl's gone! Me mam's a servant at the keep, and she said she saw the stark boy, the one who gulched the Mountain right proper. 'e just 'peared outta nowheres, leapin' up the wall wit' his sister on his back.

An' there were a few deaders bein' dumped outta the keep this morn."

"Bah, yer mam's seein' thins, she been at some lordlin's alc when she were up there? Ain't no way no mortal man could jump 'at far, no way, even the man who un-armed the Mountain. Get it? Un-armed? HAR!"

In his hiding place Barristan frowned thoughtfully. I've always suspected that Ranma Stark was hiding some of his abilities. How he got into Maegor's holdfast in the first place I don't know, but if he's really returned... For a moment, he considered all he knew about the Stark heir, then went over that meeting with the small council when he was assigned the mission to find the two Targaryen siblings. Unless they were truly gripped by the Targaryen madness the Stark boy would have returned with the two siblings if anyone could, and that he returned at all tells me he succeeded in some fashion.

Yet this brought up another question he had been asking himself since his unlawful expulsion from the Kingsguard. What claimant for the Iron Throne has the best claim on the throne, and is therefore worthy of my sword? Barristan stood up, pulling his utilitarian cloak around him, hiding his white enameled armor from view. He stared up at the sky, nearly obscured by the walls of the hovels around him. He stood like that for several minutes then nodded sharply, before striding away purposefully.

OOOOOOO

Ranma and Daenerys woke up the next morning in that same position, slumped against the wall of Lord Stark's room aboard ship with Daenerys leaning her head on Ranma's shoulder as they slept, the two draklings curled up in her lap. Fenris was nowhere to be seen.

Knowing by smell somehow that Sansa was in distress the large direwolf had bedded down outside the girls room, growling at any sailor that came by. Worse, he felt a hollow feeling inside ever since seeing Sansa. Where the connection to his prissy, too domesticated female packmate should have been there was an emptiness now, telling Fenris Lady was dead, though not the manner of her death.

Ranma woke up first and after cracking his neck he looked down at where Daenerys was leaning on his shoulder, a smile playing across his face. Ranma didn't really understand how to describe husband/wife love in words, but after watching Ned and Catelyn he certainly understood what it was. He knew that was what he felt for Daenerys.

He'd felt affection for Dacey, but their friendship was more important than anything else, their physical relationship had simply been an addition to this, and he had willingly given it up when he went south to meet Margaery.

For a moment he felt a spark of guilt at the memory of Margaery, but Brynden had told him that the Tyrells had officially called off the courtship between them, and it had never gotten to the point where he was actually in love with her. From the very beginning neither of them had been able to enter into the courtship wholeheartedly thanks to the pressures of her family's plans and Ranma's desire to remain distant from her. Oh, there had been a moment where he had been very attracted to Margaery when they first met. Then Ranma had seen her flirting with Joffrey, and that feeling had died instantly. Despite that inauspicious beginning they had become firm friends, though Ranma didn't know if that would survive Loras choosing to not support his father in the battle against the Lannisters. Still, Ranma was honest enough to realize their friendship might have become love eventually if they had given more time or didn't have her family mucking things up.

But that feeling was a summer breeze in comparison to the storm he felt for Daenerys and Ranma knew it wasn't simple lust. He respected Daenerys more than he had Margaery for one. He had seen Daenerys at her weakest moment, when she had tried to get away from the magister's mansion. That moment, her glaring around her, using the dragon eggs to shield her chest, still defiant despite her plan coming to pieces around her, was one Ranma would never forget. Margaery had never been tested like that. Daenerys was intelligent too, shown in their conversations over the past month or so, and had a gentle nature under her fierce willpower that was astonishing. That gentleness, the fact she actually cared about people, merged with an incredible amount of charisma, making people gravitate to her naturally.

As intelligent as Margaery, as fearless as Dacey, as kind and strong-willed as both combined, Daenerys Stormborn had taken his breath away over the past few weeks. He wanted to spend the rest of his life with her, to kiss her every day, to wake up next to her, to talk about their problems together and face any trial that came their way side by side. A feeling beyond anything he had felt for Dacey or allowed himself to feel toward Margaery.

Now I know what my father and mother feel about one another. Yes, I will marry this girl, my Stormborn lady. She might only bring the dragons but that's a very big only, and... he frowned thoughtfully thinking of the future. She'll bring other allies I suppose in the future.

In Daenerys' lap the draklings began to cheap imperiously for their morning meal, waking Daenerys up. She yawned widely, then mumbled something about her back bothering her before she looked up and realized where she had fallen asleep. Her eyes locking with Ranma's Daenerys smiled up at Ranma, taking one of his hands in hers and squeezing it between them for a moment, leaning up to kiss the underside of his jaw. She smiled a little impishly at Ranma's surprised look of her action, evidently not having expected her to be that playful so soon after they had admitted what was happening between them

Standing up, Daenerys allowed the two draklings to climb up her leggings and her leather jerkin, which had been resized from one of the sailors on the caravel they had been travelling on before. It was a necessity since Rhaegon and Sunfyre both loved climbing up and down from her shoulders for some reason. She idly hoped that Ranma's prediction about them still having that habit when they were larger did not come true, but for now, Daenerys rather liked having them so close.

She stretched her arms from side to side working on her shoulders, accidentally thrusting her chest forward as she did. Daenerys smiled faintly as Ranma watched her, preening a little under his gaze. Exercising with Ranma actually started to put on some muscle on her, and while she would never have thought it given her reaction to being looked at by Viserys or Jorah Mormont, Daenerys positively loved it when Ranma looked at her like that. Where their looks had made her feel dirty, Ranma's made her feel simply desirable.

Unlike Ranma, Daenerys had never been in a relationship of any kind before, but she understood where their feelings were taking her. While neither of them had said the words yet, their affection was out in the open now, and Daenerys saw no need to lie to herself about her growing feelings for Ranma Stark.

Ranma stood up, and reached out to take her hand, bringing it to his lips and kissing it lightly before looking at the two hungry draklings. "Let's feed these little monsters then speak with Brynden and the captain." Daenerys nodded with a smile, slipping her hand into his. They left the room like this, leaving behind a smiling Domic to watch over the injured Lord Stark.

They found the Blackfish already awake and talking with Captain Woolfield staring out over the ocean as the ship continued to make its way through the waters of Blackwater Bay. Brynden smiled at them, but his smile froze on his face as he saw the two of them holding hands. Ranma simply cocked an eyebrow at him, daring his uncle to comment but Brynden simply smiled and bowed his head slightly for now.

Eddard had told him about the plans that Renly had come up with to marry the rose girl to Robert to produce some more heirs to the throne, and he didn't doubt that that house would jump at the idea of marrying Renly himself to Margaery, poor girl. So there was no honorable previous engagement in the way, and the draklings on the Stormborn's shoulders were a show of power even the Tyrells would have trouble matching.

"We need to talk about what we're going to be doing." Ranma said bluntly looking at the two men and holding out his hand to clasp arms with the captain. The two of them had greeted one another when Ranma came aboard, but they didn't know one another very well. Woolfield was a house that Ranma hadn't encountered personally, but he knew enough about their history and their loyalty to house Manderly to trust the man. "Captain, how likely is it that we can get away without someone from Dragonstone being able to run us down?"

"It depends on how many ships Stannis can spare milord." the man said with a shrug. He was a medium sized man with a full beard that was turning to gray slowly, though that was the only sign of age. His arms were bare showing heavy corded muscles, and his right hand rested on a belt where a heavy cutlass rested. "They'll know these waters better than us of course, but even though it's called a bay, finding a single ship isn't that easy. Even if they do find us, I didn't lose many of my men before were forced to pull back due to Lord Stark's injury. I have a hundred and forty men aboard fit to fight."

Daenerys nodded. "That's good to know captain. However I think that rather than fighting our way through we need to sneak through. Recall that Lord Stark is indeed down with injuries, and there are women aboard. Any battle can go badly if we are careless." She smirked at Ranma, making him remember the time she had stepped in to direct the battle against the ship Stannis had sent to capture her.

Ranma laughed squeezing her hand before letting it go when she moved over with the draklings to the stewpot that had been brought out for them. It was a heavy meat stew with some mushrooms and other vegetables in there, and Daenerys smiled at the cooks who smiled back looking almost in awe of her.

This was not an isolated feeling towards House Targaryen in Westeros. While the Lords Paramount and the larger noble houses had moved on rather gleefully from the days of the Targaryen Dynasty, the smallfolk and the minor houses still retained their awe of the family, and of their dragons. This would be important in the coming days, though unfortunately not as much use as it could have been were certain circumstances different.

Watching Ranma watch Daenerys walk off Brynden laughed, clapping the younger man on the shoulder, causing Ranma to look at him. "Your lady mother will be very angry. Catelyn will think that the young lady doesn't bring enough to the table for you to wed her, after all the Stormborn doesn't bring any men or swords or even land, and will bring out a lot of old prejudices among the other powers, plus removing one of your house's largest diplomatic tools. The two dragons might convince her though, we'll see."

Brynden smiled softly at his nephew, already knowing what the two young people felt for one another. Indeed, he had the feeling of, not destiny not quite, but of greatness whenever he looked at the two of them together. "For my part I will simply wish you well."

Reaching out to grab the other man's shoulder in turn Ranma laughed quietly. "Little early for that, but it's definitely a thought in my mind." he said, flushing a little bit. Despite his experience with Dacey, he wasn't actually experienced about actually talking about such things, and he moved on quickly. "With Edmure captured, what do you think Lord Tully will do?"

Brynden sighed sadly. "My brother is old, and dying. Even before all this began I didn't think he had more than a few years left, he doesn't have the strength for war. With his heir captured, there will be little he can do."

"How fast can the Westerlanders march into the Riverlands?" asked Daenerys coming back carrying a large bowl of stew from which her drakings were feeding while she walked from the perches on her shoulders. "I confess I don't have as good a grasp of distances in Westeros as I would like, but there's no doubt that Lord Tywin is the most dangerous of our opponents."

"And if word of the treachery of the queen gets out, how will the rest of the lords major react? I don't doubt Stannis has already begun to spread that news considering he knew about it nearly right after the fact." She said tartly, remembering the battle they had with the galley out of Dragonstone coming into the bay. "How will the Riverlands lords react, or the Stormlands lords? As one, or will they be divided? These are questions we need to think about going forward, gentlemen."

"My question is how the Freys will react." Ranma said shrugging his shoulders. "They're the family nearest the North, and they're one of the most powerful if not the second most powerful house in the Riverlands. Charging their damned tolls has made them rich, and I remember my mother mentioning a few Frey's had married into House Lannister. Worse, Edmure's helping my father can already be seen as an act of treason by itself, and Lord Lannister and the Queen won't let that stand."

For all his respect for Cersei, Ranma didn't delude himself on what the Queen would be willing to do to protect her son's life or their grip on the throne now that it had come to this. "He could strip Lord Tully of his title, and add their lands to someone else's, though whether that would stick without violence I don't know."

"That, my brother would have to fight." Brynden said sadly. "If they go with that kind of maneuver I have no idea what my brother will do but he won't simply bow to their demands. Even if his son's life is on the line Hoster won't allow anyone else to hold Riverrun if he can help it."

"And he's family." Ranma said reaching down to rub one finger over Rhaegon's green-scaled head. "I won't allow my grandfather to fight that fight alone."

Daenerys smiled approvingly at that. Her smile widened as Ranma went on looking at the other two men and then her. "But it won't be a large force. The Neck and Moat Cailin might protect our landward defenses from any invasion coming up from the south, but we are still very vulnerable by sea most particularly by the Ironborn. Worse, winter is coming."

Woolfield chuckled, and Ranma smirked at him. "I'm not just repeating my family's motto. Those words are as true for us as they are true for every other man, lord, knight or smallfolk, and we need to prepare for it. I haven't spoken to a maester recently, so I have no idea how long we really have until winter truly comes, but I've been to the Wall. I felt the cold there, it is coming. And then there's the King Beyond the Wall and other issues north of us we'll have to deal with." Woolfield looked quizzical at that while the other two simply nodded while Ranma went on. "We cannot, I will not allow us to neglect the defense of our people. We'll need to help Lord Tully and see justice done for the queen and her family, but our people cannot be the ones to pay for it."

Daenerys nodded, looking at him with shining eyes. Few Lords indeed would worry about their own people like that, but Ranma does. That tells me more than anything else what kind of a Lord, what kind of a man he truly is. Or possibly a thought entered her mind, what kind of future King he is. "I trust you would be leading such a force?" Daenerys asked raising one eyebrow.

"Oh definitely." Ranma replied, already thinking of the size and makeup of such a force. Ten thousand men would be the maximum he would allow to be pulled from the ready forces. Ideally he would like to field two thousand light cavalry/scouts, a thousand heavy cavalry, three thousand archers, three thousand heavy infantry and a thousand light infantry, but that was in an ideal world. Ranma knew that would probably be impossible.

Still, that number would certainly let enough force in the North to deal with any normal threat. The fact he would have to go south rather than to the Wall irritated him, but he hoped they had enough time to reunite Westeros before dealing with the White Walkers. "Do we have a map?"

Captain Woolfield went to fetch one and they all went back down into the ship to Eddard's room, letting the crew go about their business. Once there, Woolfield marked out the route they were going to follow north before looking up at Ranma. "We're currently moving through this area here, we shouldn't run into any trouble in terms of weather, at least I hope not. This part here," he tapped the map down by the marks for the island of Dragonstone and Driftmark. "Will be where we're most likely to run into opposition. But it's always possible that Stannis wants us enough to send enough ships to run us down even on open water even after we leave the bay."

"I doubt Stannis will bother sending ships after us once we leave the bay. He'll concentrate on rallying his forces." Daenerys said firmly with Ranma nodding agreement. "Stannis is not Lord Paramount of the Stormlands; Robert passed him over for that in favor of his younger brother Renly. He'll have to gather men to him by persuasion or force. The fact that precedent says he is Robert's legal heir will not matter in the face of their well-known mutual dislike. If he knows the truth about Joffrey he'll be able to rally some lords with that but his position as master of ships would've given him something like six thousand men all told? Not enough to take King's Landing if the defense is prepared and I have no doubt that the Queen and the Kingslayer at least will push as hard as they can on that front."

Ranma scowled angrily cracking his knuckles as he thought of Jaime Lannister. The man had nearly succeeded in killing his father, and Ranma very much wished to return the favor.

"What I'm surprised about." Ranma said shaking his head to get rid of his rather bloodthirsty thought. "Is that there hasn't been a response from Dorne about Tyene's death. I met Obery, and he was an emotional sort of man. I have no doubt that he at least will want take some kind of vengeance."

Domic shugged from where he had taken up position on Daenerys' other side. "While the roads in Dorne are better than the ones in the North, they have even worse logistics issues than us northern louts normally." Ranma and Woolfield grinned at one another while Domic continued. "I've travelled there, and trust me, water in particular is a major issue for any army marching through Dorne's territory. Not only would it take them time to gather their troops in large enough numbers for a foray into the Marches, but it would take them longer to get there. Nor do they have any naval power to speak of."

"That is one point that I particularly think we need to keep in mind Ranma, one which made me very pleased that you remembered the need to keep some of our forces at home." Daenerys said frowning thoughtfully as she looked at the map, tapping the Iron Islands, not even noticing Ranma's smile at the phrase 'our forces' or Brynden and the others reactions.

"The Ironborn will use this opportunity to return to their old ways." She said firmly. "The use of a hostage will not stop them, if the Greyjoys do not do it themselves than the other major houses among the Ironborn will do it anyway. They're reavers and rapist plunderers, they've probably been waiting for an opportunity to slip the leash again."

All four of the men nodded agreement, and Ranma replied dryly that was why he wouldn't be taking a large force from the houses on that side of the northern territories.

"They could still strike Moat Cailin from behind." Daenerys said worriedly, working her lower lip in such a way that made Ranma want to kiss her. "If they join forces with the Lannisters and take the Moat away from us, the Lannisters can then simply march through the Riverlands to deal with us first before picking up the pieces there."

Ranma laughed shaking his head. "Not going to happen, Daenerys. Trust me, you haven't heard of the changes we've made to the Moat. What's more, my family has known that something was going to be coming our way since before I left Winterfell, and we've been preparing for the worst." He smirked. "Ravens are such useful birds, and I believe that the preparations already in place will surprise you."

"I hope in a good way." Daenerys said smiling faintly as she flicked her fingers lightly against Ranma's arm. Her smile widened as Ranma took her hand in his holding for a moment as they turned back to the map. Their discussion continued from there for another hour before they were interrupted by a cough from nearby.

In the bed nearby Ned awoke to the sound of their voices. That he awoke at all was a shock to Eddard. While the wounds themselves were not immediately mortal, he had been prepared to die from the one in his side at least. He took a moment to just lay there in peace, enjoying the feeling of being alive, before coughing to get the attention of those in the room with him.

Despite the weariness and pain stamped across his features Ned's eyes were clear as he looked at the group which rapidly crowded around the bed locking on Daenerys and the two dragons on her shoulders. "Legends come before me in many forms it seems," he said, his voice a bare shadow of its normal commanding tenor. "Lady Daenerys Targaryen?"

"Milord." The platinum haired girl nodded her head formally then decided to try humor, it worked often enough with Ranma. "I would curtsy but..." she gestured at the leggings she was wearing.

Ned smiled slightly, but didn't seem to have the strength for more. He looked around at them all. "Who do I have to thank for the minor miracle of my life?"

"Myrcella, apparently." Ranma said smiling broadly, reaching forward to grasp his father's hand. "She's been studying medicine apparently, and she and Alayaya were able to stitch you up. You're still weak, and I'm afraid there wasn't much they could do about the shoulder save to tie it in place and hope it heals, but you're going to pull through. Still, I don't want to hear about you trying to lead from the front again father, that's a younger man's job!"

"I see. And it is good to see you too my son, both for its own merits and for that very reason." Ned replied, smiling faintly but warmly at his son. "But tell me, how long was I out, and what has happened since? How did your mission go besides the obvious? Are we sailing for Dragonstone?"

Ranma exchanged glances with the others then told his father what had happened to him and Daenerys as they came towards King's Landing, and about his rescuing Sansa. Ned looked at him in shock at that, but then bowed his head in true thanks, squeezing his son's hand again as hard as he could, which alas wasn't very hard at the moment.

He and Brynden both then filled Ranma in on the battle in the city in greater detail than Brynden had before, going into detail on the evidence that the maesters had sent him to prove the queen's infidelity. Ranma, his mind on a certain young lady, looked at the names of the children and noticed something, which he immediately brought up.

Eddard frowned, but nodded and acquiesced to his point for now before turning back to the topic of Stannis and what was going on now. He looked at them all shaking his head. "So the world changes, and in ways I did not expect or can understand. Legends come among us again, the direwolves to my family the dragons to yours milady, a King beyond the Wall and more, treason in the South and Stannis Baratheon having access to some kind of magic that allowed him to learn of his brother's death a mere day after the fact." He leaned back, closing his eyes and the others thought he might've fallen asleep but he opened them again now staring searchingly at Ranma. "So, what will you do my Lord?"

"My Lord?" Ranma said his eyes wide. "I, um, I had hoped to convince you to send of me and a smallish army south father, but um... my Lord? What...?"

"A crippled Lord cannot be a Lord in the North, you know this." Ned said simply moving his shoulders very slightly, wincing at the pain of the crushed bones in his one shoulder. It was all he could do as exhausted as he was, but it brought to Ranma's attention to his wound there, and then Eddard tapped one leg with a hand. "I can't feel this leg." Ned said simply. "Even if my shoulder repaired itself, I don't think I'm ever going to be able to ride to war, or to defend my honor in single combat as a Lord must if called upon to do so. That makes you Lord Stark my son, and Lord Paramount of the North."

He sighed sadly, shaking his head. "And I have made too many mistakes of late, too many errors in judgment. I should have known that Cersei would have heard of the King's death, if she didn't plan it herself, and made plans well in advance of the news reaching us for such an eventuality. I should have done more to prevent Tyene's death, or Tommen's! By the old gods, I should never have come south at all, nothing good has come of it!"

Eddard looked at Ranma and Daenerys, who was standing close by, her shoulder barely touching Ranma's as they crowded around the bed. He smiled faintly, wondering what was going on there but not wanting to push for the moment. Possibly nothing at any rate. "You are ready for this my son, I know you will do me proud."

Ranma and the others looked at one another and after a moment Ranma shrugged. "I knew this time would come, but at least my father is alive, which was one of the ways it could have come."

He patted his father on his good shoulder before moving away from the bed. "We were talking about problems in the future and had covered Dorne. What of the Vale or the Reach? The Stormlands will answer Renly's inevitable call to war of course, or Stannis possibly, one of the two. The Crownlands will answer the crown, at least most of it and the River lands we talked about earlier."

"The Reach will march with Lord Renly," Ranma continued tapping it thoughtfully. "Their strength from what I've seen reported to the crown is something like sixty-thousand men? Possibly more if they neglect the defenses." He ground his finger into the map over the mark for High Garden angrily, remembering what Brynden had told him about Renly and Loras having fled the city before the battle even began.

If Loras and Renly had stayed with their men and the men they could rally from the few remaining neutral lords in the court, his father might well have won the battle in the city. But no, instead of helping, instead of doing the honorable thing, the two 'knights' had run, taking their men with them. That act of cowardice would cost them, and it would cost them dear. Ranma wasn't prepared to name House Tyrell or Renly among their enemies just yet unlike Stannis. But they certainly weren't among his friends, nor would he trust either man again.

He wondered what Margaery and their family were making of all this beyond the obvious, but decided in the end he didn't care. House Tyrell tried to play the game of politics rather than solidify the arrangement between me and Margaery. Fine, I have a new 'arrangement' now. Let them try wringing what they can from the cluster fuck that's about to begin, right now I've my own plans to make.

"The Vale is leaderless," Brynden said striking his head. "Lysa won't listen to anyone, she'll stay on the defense and be a non-factor until well after the war is over. At that point we can remove her and her child from power if need be."

Brynden's leaving the Vale had been rather acrimonious. Lysa had called him a traitor for leaving to help Ranma and Eddard rather than stay to guard Lysa and her son. She went so far as to say if he left Brynden was no family of hers. The Blackfish had tried to keep calm, but words had been said on both sides that could not be unsaid. And Lysa had been acting irrationally long before that, something Brynden had noticed even removed from the Eyrie as he was in his role of Defender of the Gate.

The conversation continued from there for another hour with Domic joining in now before Ranma leaned back satisfied. The numbers he had worked out for the North matched with what captain Woolfield thought was accurate, and Brynden and Daenerys's knowledge of the Riverlands was also very good. Daenerys proved herself invaluable in her knowledge of the Reach and Stormlands, knowing nearly every house there and having a shrewd idea of their force strength and how they would react to the coming conflict. Ranma had only studied the most powerful houses, and them poorly outside the Lords Paramount.

They calculated how long they had before the Lannisters could get a force up to the Neck, how long it would take them to go around it by sea. Their analyses on what the various reactions of forces would be and how large the window was for them to start marching down into the Riverlands well as what forces they would have to retain at home were less accurate but close enough. It was enough for now for Ranma to call a halt to their planning session for now, looking over at captain Woolfield. "Do we have some way to send word ahead? Is there a raven aboard?"

"We have a sea-hawk milord. They're not as intelligent as ravens but they can be trained to travel back to their home. They're fast and very hard to train but good for messages back to White Harbor. But they won't be able to contact us, finding a ship at sea is impossible." Captain Woolfield said.

Ranma and Daenerys put their heads together for a moment composing the message, based off a plan that Daenerys had thought up. That this allowed Daenerys to run her hand up Ranma's thigh for a moment was just a bonus, as was his return kneading of her thigh. Though when she began to move her hand in a 'mischievous manner' and Ranma felt himself begin to respond, he was forced to grab her hand and move it away, much to her hidden amusement.

Despite their little under the table games, Daenerys still kept her mind on the task at hand. Indeed, at least one idea that would be mentioned in the note was something that Ranma wouldn't have considered even if he had at one point thoughts along similar lines in regards to the Wall and the Night's Watch. Still, from what little he knew of the man Tyrion would jump at it, removing The Imp as a threat and possibly strengthening the Wall for centuries to come if it went as Daenerys hoped. If not, Tyrion would still be removed as a threat.

The final message was brief since sea-hawks couldn't carry as much weight as ravens (they were very different flyers), but covered a lot. It read 'Bringing the Wolves home along with the Stormborn. Treason in the South, Joffrey is illegitimate. This must be answered. All lords to gather at Winterfell. Send for Theon and the others to bring Tyrion to meet us in White Harbor. Lannisters are not to be trusted. Lord Ranma Stark.'

"I think that's enough for now." Ranma said handing the message over to the captain who would affix it to the special carrier for the Seahawk. "I think it's time to go see if the ladies are up, and tell Sansa and Myrcella what is going to happen." He sighed heavily. "And for us to tell Myrcella what we suspect about her parentage."

Daenerys nodded. She nearly laughed aloud when she stood up and watched Ranma remain sitting for a moment, visibly getting control of himself before standing up in turn. Ranma mock glared at her, but Daenerys merely smiled back impishly. For some reason knowing she was having that large an effect on him was empowering in a way she had not anticipated. I will need to think about that in the future. For now she put aside such thoughts, taking Ranma's hand once more, allowing him to lead her out of the room.

OOOOOO

Sansa had woken up but decided to simply stay in bed for a time. She was still bruised and battered from her beating two nights ago, and despite Ranma rescuing her, a part of Sansa was still hopeful that the past few days had all been a bad dream. Sansa knew it wouldn't be, but she could dream about it being a dream couldn't she?

This rather convoluted thought had just meandered through Sansa's head when it was knocked out of her mind by her current bed partner rolling around and smacking Sansa in the back accidentally with one hand. Sansa hissed, the sound waking Myrcella up with a start.

"Wh-what?" the blond haired girl asked blearily looking around. Her eyes immediately lit on Sansa as the girl curled up a little from the pain of having her sore back hit like that. "Sansa?! How did you get here? Oh, I'm so glad to see you! Did I hit you when I turned over, I'm sorry."

Sansa waved that away turning awkwardly to face Myrcella. The two of them had shared a bed many times on sleepovers, so there wasn't any kind of awkwardness between them. Myrcella glanced around not seeing Lady. Her face fell and she looked back at Sansa. "Lady?"

The northern girl's eyes tear it up, and Myrcella wordlessly reached out for her and the two girls hugged one another tightly. In fits and starts they both shared what they had faced since separating the morning before.

Sansa cried when she heard about Mattimeo and the others. Mattimeo had been one of the youngest guardsmen, and one of Sansa's personal favorites. He always had funny stories to tell much like Ranma's, only sometimes better because most were about his older brother and how he had bumbled his way through courting his wife. Clifton Snow had been another armsmen she was fond of, one of the younger men who had trained extensively with Ranma. Indeed he had been chosen for the trip down to King's Landing by her brother. He may have been a Snow, which given the late septa Mordane's beliefs about baseborn children and her influence over Sansa should have immediately made Sansa look down on him, but thanks to Ranma and his influence that hadn't happened.

Both of them cried for Arys Oakheart, who Sansa had thought was a worthy knight, not on the same level as his commander, or Ser Jaime or the Rose Knight but still a kind and handsome gentleman. Sansa however did not share with Myrcella what she had heard about the reasoning behind the Queen suddenly turning on her father. She would let Ranma or someone else tell her friend that. That may be cowardly, but right now Sansa just did not want to think about that or her friend's reaction to it.

"I should've listened to you." Sansa said instead, taking Myrcella's hands in her own. "You were right to try to guide me away from Joffrey like you tried to, I can see that now, and Ranma and my father were both right about him. He's a monster!" she spat this viciously through her tears. "A complete monster. He killed Jeyne, and then he, he made me watch as, as some of the other prisoners were, were executed by that horrid man Payne."

Myrcella nodded grimly, pulling her hands free from Sansa's clenched hands, once again hugging her gently, making certain to not touch the other girl's bruises. "And he gave you those bruises?"

"He ordered it." Sansa said mumbling a little as she leaned against the smaller girl's shoulder. While Myrcella had begun the track to womanhood, Sansa was almost finished that journey, and had about three or four inches on her. Even laying down like they were it was still noticeable despite the princess' growth spurt over the past few weeks. Sansa remembered that time herself, she needed new clothing every other week, and it seemed as if her sense of balance and poise had deserted her. Myrcella didn't seem to have that last problem, not that Sansa was jealous or anything.

For a moment after that they were both silent, simply taking comfort in one another's presence, then Myrcella moved back looking at Sansa, her face set. "Let's see if I can do anything for that back, I made up some salves for your father and the other men, they should work."

"Tell me the truth..." Sansa said as she painfully sat up so that she could swing her legs out of the bed. "Will my father live?"

"I'm not really a fully trained healer." Myrcella said cautiously. "I've read a lot of books, and Alayaya's stitching was incredible, so we were able to stop the bleeding. But I can't tell you that with any certainty if that was enough given the damage to his side. I think it's up to Lord Stark. And... and even if he lives, your father could still be crippled."

Sansa took in that statement with a stoicism that would have surprised her even so much as three days ago, yet couldn't stop a shiver of fear going through her at the thought of never seeing her father alive again. She knew her father wasn't immortal, and then meant he could be killed, but Sansa had seen so much death lately she was just tired of it.

"Let me help you, your grace." Alayaya said, making her presence known from the nearby corner where she had been sleeping in her hammock until the girls began to talk to one another. She had made no attempt to join in, knowing that a good cry was often very therapeutic.

Sansa nodded thanks of the offer, and allowed the older, and even Sansa had to admit beautiful, woman to help her pull off her dress. The two of them had issues initially, not that Sansa had thought that she had been brought in to ply her trade or anything. But the septa had colored Sansa's worldview and had little truck with such people even if they were trying to reform. Brynden had set her down sharply on that, telling her about the girl's work as a spy for them, though not the particulars.

At the sight of the bruises on Sansa's back Alayaya and Myrcella both winced. So busy were they with helping the northern girl none of them had noticed the door open, and they all jumped when someone spoke up from behind them. It was Ranma's voice, normally a very welcome one for all three even if Alayaya was more at home with calling him the Rock Hurler, but this time it sounded different. There was a timbre there that none of the three had ever heard in his voice before, a sort of growling note. If a hurricane could speak it would sound like that, a fury fit to tear down mountains. "If I had known that bastard had done that to you Sansa, I would've made time to kill him properly before we escaped."

"By the Seven don't do that!" Sansa gasped pulling her dress up a little to hide the front of her body from view. Myrcella who was simply gasping a little holding her chest nodded agreement.

Alayaya stood still, trying to still her hammering heart. "So it wasn't only your invisibility trick that allowed you to become the Rock Hurler, Lord Stark?"

"He likes to do that, you wouldn't think it given his personality but Ranma is actually quite good at sneaking around. I think he likes to startle people, or at least girls." Daenerys said moving around Ranma to look at the three girls, frowning deeply at the marks on the northern beauty's back while Ranma allowed himself a very faint smile at her quip, still staring at his sister's bruised back. "We'll wait for you outside, we didn't realize you were changing." she said looking over at Ranma pointedly and nudging him back towards the doorway.

Ranma nodded, but his hands were still clenched, and there was a rage in his eyes that Daenerys knew she had to do something about.

The three girls turned back to one another, then shrugged and got on with business while outside Daenerys began to question Ranma about his rescue of Sansa forcing Ranma to realize that he couldn't have stayed and killed Joffrey, not with so many armymen so close to Sansa. He would've had to fight his way through them to the doorway and probably through more in the hall while Joffrey retreated, and it would only have taken one man that he missed to get to Sansa to either kill her or use Sansa as a hostage against him.

Ranma nodded reluctant agreement, turning around when the girls exited their room. Sansa moved forward quickly, her arms going around Ranma. "Thank you again for rescuing me, Ranma..." she breathed.

Her older brother chuckled, a familiar sound that added to the feeling of safety that having his arms around her shoulders gave Sansa. "That's what older siblings are for sister, to protect their little siblings, it's why we come around first."

Sansa giggled wetly and Ranma nodded over at Myrcella. "My father's already woken up, he looks as if he'll pull through. But he has something to say, and you need to hear it Sansa." he said turning back to his sister was still in his arms as he continued to hug her very gently around the shoulders being very careful to avoid the marks that bastard Trant had left on her back at Joffrey's order. Oh yes, Joffrey is going to die. Maybe cutting him into pieces while he's still living and feed him to Fenris? No, it'd be just like Joffrey to give Fenris terminal poisoning or something. Huh, do they have piranha in this world? Something painful, and possibly slow anyway, will need to think about that.

As soon as Sansa let him go, Ranma moved over to Myrcella, enfolding her in a hug in turn. "Thank you for saving my father." He said, his voice almost a whisper, though everyone in the corridor could hear him. "Without you and Alayaya he would've already died from his wounds."

Myrcella hugged him back, burrowing into his stomach a little. Suddenly Ranma realized with a start that Merry had grown up quite a bit since he had left King's Landing. It wasn't actually surprising given her age, what was surprising and what was making him rather uncomfortable was the feel of her small clementine (he was guessing there) sized breasts pressing into his waist right above his crotch. His control had been badly frayed from the past months of forced celibacy, and Daenerys' earlier flirtations had weakened his control further. Ranma could actually feel himself reacting to Merry's hug and it was mortifying.

For Ranma anyway, Merry's reaction when she felt it through his leggings and her dress was quite different. First she stiffened in Ranma's arms, letting out a nearly inaudible gasp. For a moment Ranma thought she was going to pull an Akane and slug him where it hurt. But to his surprise Myrcella then hugged him even tighter, moving her shoulders around, deliberately moving her chest against Ranma before moving back.

When she looked up at him, Myrcella had a light flush on her face, but a look of triumph in her eyes, and Ranma groaned under his breath, knowing she had not only felt his reaction but liked it. He knew this might make her crush on him worse, but he was at sea about that issue anyway, so Ranma resolved to continue ignoring it as much as possible.

To his side Daenerys looked amused, but her eyes were locked on Myrcella, taking note of the flush on the younger girl's face, wondering if the girls crush really was just a crush or something more serious. Only time will tell if I have a true rival or if the Lannister girl is simply a young girl enchanted by an older boy who has treated her so well. For now, I have more pressing concerns.

After a moment of embarrassment Ranma turned away from Merry with a strained smile, before leading the way through the ship to his father's room. When they arrived Sansa barely stopped herself back from running at him, seeing her father sitting up in bed. Having asked Brynden to help him sit up Eddard smiled faintly at seeing Sansa safe and sound.

It took a moment for Sansa to pull her attention away from her father, sitting there looking so wasted and weak, not tall forbidding and implacable as he should be, to notice that there were other men in the room. One wore the colors the Woolfield family, a minor but rather important house who looks to Lord Manderly as their overlord. She curtsied cordially to him, and he bowed gravely from the waist before she turned to the third man who she didn't know.

He looked slightly familiar, as if she had met him once before. He stood next to Brynden, who smiled at her stepping forward for his hug. Sansa met him eagerly, and resolutely did not cry again feeling another family member's arms around her, ensuring her safety. She'd done enough of that lately

Once Brynden let her go Sansa cocked her head quizzically, looking at the man leaning against the wall behind Brynden. "You look familiar ser, but I cannot place you."

"I would be surprised if you could, milady." The man said bowing far more flamboyantly than Captain Woolfield had. "We only met once, you were around ten or so I think. It was many years ago, regardless. Only a few months after your brother here rescued me from durance vile. I am Domic Snow, bard of the harp."

Sansa nodded her head still cocked to one side. "Are you the one who wrote that song, 'the Wolves of Winterfell', about my brother rescuing you from the Dreadfort? I thought you were a girl."

Domic looked sheepish for a moment, trying not to look over at the suddenly the glowering Ranma while the other men in the room laughed, even Daenerys joining in. "As I have repeatedly told your brother in the past few weeks I took certain dramatic liberties with that story. It makes much better telling if it is a woman being rescued, rather than another man. Much more dramatic and emotional that way, adding a, well a romantic element even if there is no romance actually mentioned in the song."

"I see..." Sansa said looking a little dubious, though her eyes were actually twinkling faintly with humor. "Well in any event perhaps you could play it for us later, I've never been able to hear the entire song in one sitting."

At Ranma's pout the others laughed again, but Ned spoke then, drawing all their attention back to him. "While this is amusing, and I realize that laughter is the best medicine, there are serious matters we need to discuss."

"I agree." Myrcella said, curtsying to the man she had saved. But her eyes were now hard as she looked around at them all. "I for one would like to know what by the Seven happened! One moment all was peaceful, the next..." She stumbled over her words as the memories of that horrible race through the city came back to her. "The next I hear people shouting in the streets and... I don't know who to believe or what is going on!"

Daenerys strode over, putting one arm around the girl's shoulders, who welcomed the support even if it came from a near total stranger. Daenerys knew what it was like to be surrounded by enemies or people who might be enemies, to not be in charge of your own fate. It made Daenerys feel rather sympathetic to the girl, despite how Lannister she looked. She looked over at Ranma and Eddard, silently urging them to simply get it over with. The longer she went on in ignorance, the more Myrcella would begin to doubt their words when they finally did tell her.

Before Eddard could speak Ranma held up a hand, signaling he would do it, making Eddard and Brynden both sigh unobtrusively in relief. For his part, Ranma it would be best for this news to come from him, since Ranma knew that Myrcella trusted him more than his father. "Myrcella... There is no easy way to say this so I'm just going to have to blurt it out. Your mother, well you know your father isn't the most... wasn't the most faithful, um in, um, in regards to his marriage vows?"

Myrcella was not stupid, nor was she slow. She made the connection quickly and gasped looking at them all. "You... you think that..." The blond girl gathered herself and said coolly. "I presume you would not believe that my mother did the same without evidence? Do you have such?"

"We do not know who Cersei laid with." Eddard said bluntly, taking up the tail. "But in the end that hardly matters. We... we do have proof that you and your siblings were not legitimate. Robert is a Baratheon, and they are known for having strong blood as it were. Their features black hair and light blue eyes, as well as certain mannerisms are always passed on to their children. They have married into the Lannisters four times before, and in over a dozen children all have favored the Baratheon in looks if not in temperament. And Robert has had at least fourteen other bastards, and all of them have favored him in looks."

"My son..." Eddard glanced over at Ranma. "Has brought up the point that none of the names of the children we have seen of those previous unions between your family and the Baratheons were those of daughters. Whether or not the Maesters that worked on this for me felt they were unimportant and simply did not include them, or if those pairings did not actually have daughters I do not know. Until we do know that, your own status is up in the air. I'm, I'm sorry."

Myrcella Baratheon, No I'm not a Baratheon am I? She thought to herself, a little disjointed by the shock of it, backed away from the other's pushing Daenerys' arm Myrcella got the feeling that they were telling the truth, but it hurt so much. She knew her mother and the King, she guessed no longer her father though he hadn't had much to do with rearing her after all so that wasn't much of a stretch, hadn't gotten along. But for mother to respond like this? There is a certain poetic justice to it but it's also high treason! Is that why she always called us her little lions when we were alone?

The others gave Myrcella a moment to collect herself for which Myrcella was very thankful. Finally she simply nodded and spoke with as much strength she could muster. "I can understand, I understand both why my mother was so terrified as to begin open conflict between her family and yours, and I can understand what you must've been thinking or trying to do. Though if you are trying to figure out who Joffrey's real father is, I am afraid I can't help you. I never saw my mother spending much time with anyone save my uncle Jaime."

A horrible thought struck Ned at that statement, making him shiver before he shook it off. There was no proof of that, so he would not even try to bring it up.

Myrcella continued regardless. "However I will not believe this in my own case or Tommen's whatever proof you show me. In Joffrey's case it would be almost a relief to not share at least one parent."

That caused Eddard and the others, even Sansa who had met Joffrey and knew what he had done to laugh grimly. Ranma and Daenerys both also nodded in approval of the younger girl's poise after having her world view shattered.

Ranma however answered before anyone else could. "If we could keep it quiet, we could say that you and Tommy were both legitimate, and ask the maesters to not share any further evidence. Say it was only Joffrey that was illegitimate but we probably won't be able to. Stannis is already moving against us, he attacked the ship Daenerys and I were on a day after Robert died and the captain of that vessel said that he already had evidence that all three of you were illegitimate. He'll probably spread that information as far as possible to strengthen his own position."

"Words cannot hurt me Ranma." Myrcella replied, smiling faintly at his concerned tone. "I just wish they couldn't damage Tommy's image in people's minds."

Ranma nodded. He didn't know what his father would've done if Tommen was still alive, but if it had been up to Ranma he probably would've simply met with the queen and talked about it, then removed Joffrey from the succession and family entirely. But somehow he got the feeling that it would prove to be all three children that were illegitimate. That would be the ultimate payback for all the times Robert had cheated on Cersei, for Robert loving a dead woman more than Cersei herself. He could also tell that Myrcella feared that too, but didn't say anything to take away her hope that it was untrue.

She rubbed at her eyes, wiping away the tears that had formed there as the realization of what this could mean hit her. Bastards had very limited rights after all, and as a bastard of the queen, Myrcella was a living, breathing act of treason. She was almost afraid to ask, but Ranma's kind, gentle gaze gave her the courage to go on. "M-May I ask what this will mean for me in your care?"

"Nothing." Ranma said promptly smiling at her. "You're still under my protection Myrcella, my family's and my personal protection. We'll still call you a Baratheon for now, until we get in contact with the Citadel and make certain one way or another. But even if the worst occurs, I won't let anything happen to you."

"Then I am much safer with you than with my brother, or even my mother. She always took his side, and she would continue to do so even if I was there." She looked at him, then suddenly could contain it no longer, and blurted out what laid on her heart so heavily. "And... and Joffrey has killed one sibling already." That sent a jolt through everyone in the room, and a little malicious part of Myrcella was grateful to return the favor.

"Are you certain?" Ranma said sharply, getting over the shock quickly, followed by his father, who looked rather skeptical as did Daenerys though for different reasons. "Are you certain? He really killed Tommy? He poisoned him personally?"

"I don't think he carried it out personally." Myrcella said shaking her head looking apologetically at Sansa. Sansa however simply looked back at her and then shrugged slightly. Her opinion of Joffrey had reached negative numbers, so she didn't have any issue with seeing him as a kinslayer. "But he admitted it to me, used it as a threat when I tried to confront him. I'll admit that wasn't the most intelligent thing I could've done, but I was just so, so angry at the time."

Ranma smiled a bit at that. "Now that kind of temper you could get from either side of your family Merry!" he said softly, reaching out to rub her head fondly.

She blushed under his touch, ecstatic that it really didn't seem to bother him that she might not know who her father was, that she might not be a Baratheon. She looked over at Daenerys who also didn't seem bothered by it for some reason, though that was because of a kindred feeling she felt for Merry's current circumstances. Ranma simply ignored blood status for the most part, something Merry should have realized given how close he was to his brother Jon.

"Could you tell us what Joffrey said exactly when you confronted him, Merry?" Brynden asked.

Myrcella did so word for word while the others listened quietly. After she was finished, she looked at them all, trying to see if they believed her. Sir Woolfield shrugged his shoulders after the princess finished, not having met the boy he didn't know what Joffrey was capable of though he was getting a very grim picture here from this and what Ranma had shared of Sansa's ordeal. Brynden looked thoughtful, but he wasn't one to make a snap judgment one way or another. Sansa too looked ambivalent, though she didn't question that Joffrey would do something like that if he could get away with it. Domeric simply looked uncaring one way or another. She turned back with some trepidation to look at Ranma.

"I believe you." Ranma said simply, and it was as if a tremendous weight had been removed from Myrcella's shoulders. Those simple words meant the world to her, even more than Ranma's accepting her still despite the possible issue with her birth.

Ranma went on. "Joffrey, he has nothing but being the heir to the throne. He's never tried to be anything else, has never excelled at anything else that could give him worth. He's a cruel little bastard, and I can definitely see that he would do something like that after hearing what he put Sansa through."

"But to kill your own kin?" Ned said shaking his head. "Even now, even knowing what he did to Sansa I can't...that is the ultimate taboo! Worse than killing a guest after breaking bread with him! Kinslaying is a horrible crime in any religion, any religion I know of at any rate. The gods both new and old will not just turn their backs on a kinslayer but work to strike such down."

"For my part your grace, I can easily see how someone could fall to that level if what you based your entire life around was going to be taken away from you. I'm thankful that you don't know what depravity humans can reach. My brother was willing to whore me out to gain an army so I can understand how siblings can come to hate one another, as well as ambition." Daenerys said, smiling slightly at the younger girl, who smiled back, despite beginning to have some concerns about the Targaryen girl's relationship with Ranma.

"No, I agree that your brother could come up with the idea but planning it out? From what Ranma has told me about him, Joffrey doesn't seem capable of planning that well, especially not finding a scapegoat as he seems to have in Tyene Sand." Daenerys finished, looking at them all with one eyebrow cocked in query.

"I don't know." Myrcella said seriously looking over at the older and, she was forced to notice once again, very beautiful girl. The Stormborn's silver-blond hair cascaded down her back, and despite the fact that she was wearing men's clothing her curvaceous form was easy to notice. Those violet eyes set into her pretty face that didn't have a single blemish were both striking and commanding.

However at the moment the question mattered more than the bit of jealousy Myrcella felt at the girl's appearance. "Joffrey was, well I wouldn't say close but he seemed to have some kind of understanding with Petyr the days after Tommy's death and I certainly don't know anyone else who would try to help him kill our younger brother."

"And what about carrying it out?" Daenerys asked.

Myrcella had to think hard about that but she eventually nodded. "House Lannister sent several dozen servants to serve my mother and us, and there are one or two that serve Joffrey personally. One of them... I'm trying to recall his name but I can't think of it, he's such, well, he blends into the background so well..."

Frowning in sudden thought Eddard raised a hand to hover above the bed. "Short, about this tall, brown hair, brown eyes, has the sort of face that would disappear into a crowd? Well thought of by the rest of the servants?"

"I don't know how the rest of the servants think about him but that's the one I was thinking of, yes." Myrcella replied honestly.

"He was the one who gave testimony against Tyene." Brynden murmured, nodding over at Ned. "You're right, he's very hard to think of, it's almost as if he slides away when you try to concentrate on him."

"Whoever did it, Joffrey seems to have planned it." Ranma said bringing them back to the present discussion. "If Petyr helped him plan it, that's one thing, but I don't know if he could or would do that. It's a rather big step for him isn't it, I mean he was trying so hard to keep neutral between our families. He failed obviously." He said laughing a little with Brynden and his father, though Eddard's laughter broke off into a rasping cough. "But still I don't think it matches his personality."

"You might be right about that big brother." Sansa said. "But Petyr is hiding something." She described what happened between her and Petyr, what he had said about being Catelyn's friend when they were younger, and the way he looked at her.

Ned growled in anger. "He must still be holding a grudge about that, how even after my older brother died Catelyn's hand was simply transferred to me rather than the arrangement broken off entirely."

"Or he wanted the daughter of the woman he was so entranced by when he was younger." Ranma said growling. "Again, if I had known that, I would've taken the time before finding you to give him some attention."

"Regardless I'm going to put him down on the 'needs to die list'." Daenerys said laughing lightly at Ranma's look of anger. She nudged Sansa in the shoulder lightly. "You're very lucky to have such a protective older brother. As I said mine was at the other end of the spectrum to say the least."

"It wasn't nearly as much fun when I was growing up." Sansa replied honestly. "Oh, when I was younger it was great fun, but then I discovered boys, and Ranma discovered I discovered boys, and suddenly the boys realized that and ran off faster from him than Septa Mordane."

"Good times." Ranma said with a laugh remembering several boys he had run off both noble and not after finding them sniffing around his sister.

"Father." Sansa said changing the subject before Ranma could go into detail on those 'good times'. "How are you feeling, really I mean?"

"I will not die if that is what you are worried about." Ned said smiling faintly at his oldest daughter. "However I am stepping down as Lord Paramount. A lord in the North cannot be a cripple, and my shoulder and my leg are both crippled. Despite Myrcella saving my life there are limits."

Sansa nodded reaching over to take her father's hand and looking up at Ranma. "I am sad, but I know you'll do a good job Ranma. I just..." she paused, and all of them could see tears in her eyes before she straightened her shoulders and womanfully banished them. But her voice still came out plaintively. "I just want to go home." For just a moment Sansa sounded like the little girl she had been a few months ago, in Ranma's memories at least.

Both Ranma and Eddard nodded agreement, and Eddard squeezed her hand gently. "I think we all do."

Sansa looked over at Fenris, who was curled up next to the bed around the two young draklings, who were still sleeping off their after-meal torpor. Sansa was very interested in the little creatures, but she had more serious business right now. "I'm, I'm sorry, Lady died. She'd died protecting me."

The large direwolf stretched his neck up slightly to lick her face before pressing his nose against Sansa's shoulder consolingly, making the younger Stark stumble a little. She wasn't nearly as bulky as Ranma nor as strong even as her younger sister. Moreover Fenris was much larger than Lady, and his entire massive frame was muscle. Despite this, Sansa threw her arms around his giant head, hugging the direwolf tightly as she had to once more fight back tears.

After a moment, Ranma touched her shoulder gently. "Why don't you three go get something to eat, then we'll see what we can do to make your quarters a little more comfortable. We've got a long voyage ahead of us before we reach White Harbor."

Alayaya had remained by the door, silent as possible as the lords and ladies talked, but now she moved forward, gently taking Sansa by the arm. She curtsied to Lord Stark, sent a sultry look toward Ranma then led Sansa and Myrcella out of the room.

Brynden smiled faintly, shaking his head. "If I was going to remain as your spymaster, I would like to make Alayaya my assistant. As it is that won't happen so what will you do with her or Merry?"

"I've been speaking to the crew on and off since we boarded." Domic spoke up, having been silent for most of the discussions today, not having anything to add other than helping in figuring out distances and travel times. "The crew is impressed by Merry, she not only saved your life Lord Stark, but several others, and even helped one man with a bad facial burn."

"Alayaya's stitching is incredible, the sail master has already asked if she can help him work on some of the spare sails." Captain Woolfield added. "For now, both of them can be useful on board, and don't worry about the crew acting out. There might be some issues with Alayaya, but none with the young princess, not after how she saved Lord Stark."

"Squash any such problems quickly please." Daenerys said, though the sentence came out with all the authority of an order, and Woolfield nodded his head before he even realized he had responded. "That will do for now, and when we get to White Harbor I can use them both as handmaids. I may need them when we go south."

Domic and Ranma both simply nodded, though Ranma was smirking at her slightly, which Daenerys returned before looking at the others who looked surprised. "My dragons may become an asset faster than we thought, and I may be able to use them and my name to garner us allies. And Ranma might need my advice as well. You didn't think I'd allow him to go off on his own did you? Who knows what kind of trouble he could get into?"

Eddard surprised everyone by bursting out in laughter for a moment, before subsiding into a cough. "Jon will appreciate the help..." he gasped out between coughs, causing Ranma to laugh as well, remembering the many times Jon had said the same thing.

While Eddard began to tell Daenerys some stories of the trouble Ranma had gotten into with Jon, Woolfield excused himself to send off the message, and Ranma found his mind travelling before it. By the old gods I've missed Jon and the others. I hope they weren't exaggerating about the preparations they've put in place.

OOOOOO

In the Chamber of the Painted Table, Melisandre very carefully concealed her triumphant smile. Normally she would've let it show, but right now was not the time. Things had been going very well, so well that she knew that R'hllor was pleased with her. The sword she had pulled from the rubble of the statues to the heathen 'Seven', which had been smashed by her magics not the hands of men, had proven that.

The Lightbringer of Azor Ahai in the Age of Legends was a flaming longsword, made by quenching the blade in the soul of the maker's wife. It was made to be a weapon against the Great Other, the leader of the Others, those who came with darkness and eternal winter. Melisandre had only hoped to create a blade that would showcase the power of R'hllor in a minor way, a small glamour that would make it seem on fire.

Instead because of the strength R'hllor had given her it blazed with a hard orange and red flame, a real one that gave off heat every time Stannis pulled out of its sheath. The cutting edge was also phenomenal. Stannis had tried it out on a small piece of the wreckage of the relics that hadn't burned, a piece of rock of some kind. He had cut through it easily.

And it had certainly worked for her purpose. Stannis had renounced the Seven immediately and bowed to the will of her god without further reservation in her power.

Since then Melisandre had been converting other nobles, the ones around Dragonstone as well as the captains of the Westeros fleet. House Celtigar, House Velaryon, and the new House Seaworth had all acquiesced to the conversions easily, having seen the proof, the new Lightbringer and her own R'hllor given magical abilities winning the day. She wasn't certain if she believed Davos Seaworth had truly converted or given lip service, but his loyalty to Stannis was such that it wasn't truly necessary. Sunglass had not, and its lord had been imprisoned for denouncing Stannis. With their lord in Dragonstone's dungeons, the house had joined Stannis, but they were hardly trustworthy.

Moreover, some of their maesters and of course all the septas and septons in the nobles castles however hadn't, and she had gleefully sacrificed many of them to her Lord's fire. This had impacted how the smallfolk viewed her, and they weren't converting in as many numbers as she could have wished, but that was fine, since the real power lay with the nobles and their armymen, who were converting slowly but surely outside of Sunglass and Rambton, a minor house sworn to them.

But what was making Melisandre have to hide a smile now was that her visions had once more cleared again, a sure sign that her R'hllor was happy with her. Composing her face appropriately, she turned from her viewing fire to Stannis, who had been sitting at his desk, sipping from a glass of campaign water as he read through several messages. "The old Wolf, the young Wolf and the Dragon Queen come back this way. The Lion's victory in King's Landing was not complete, they are weak, badly weak, the old wolf pulled down many of their supporters. But this gives us another opportunity to take and sacrifice the Dragon Queen."

Stannis stood up from the table, marching back and forth thinking hard, more counting than thinking actually, while staring at the table that gave the room its name, which had a detailed map of Westeros carved and painted on it. I have access to some forty ships docking here and on Driftmark, they each have around two hundred men, plus another seven or so within distance of the signal lights on top of Sea Dragon Tower. Say five days to ready them for war, then approximately a weeks sailing to get to King's Landing from here. By which time the Crownlands lords nearest the city could have reached it with their own forces, upwards of four thousand, my estimates of their houses military strength is accurate anyway. Plus they could always conscript the populace of the city.

"I want to strike at them now." he said aloud, shaking his head, his face twisted into his habitual scowl. "But they will have time to be reinforced from the nearby lords before we get there." He leaned forward, marking off distances making sure he had been correct about the timing.

"If we could have gotten to King's Landing within say three days, that would've been a different thing. But no, a week, if that." The winds were almost always against going into the interior of Blackwater Bay rather than out of it, an oddity of weather that would hinder his plans. If I could get a message to the cutters I stationed in King's Landing when I pulled back from court all those months ago that would be a different story but better to concentrate on what I can do.

"Have you seen what my brother is up to?" He asked looking over his shoulder at the Red Witch before going back to pondering the map.

Melisandre frowned faintly. "He escaped, like a coward he fled before the battle began. He goes towards the Reach, though he has sent messengers and messages into the Stormlands. But that's not important, we must take the Dragon Queen!"

"Hmm...." Stannis murmured something as he thought. "So my brother is going to the Reach? A bold move I suppose, if he's wishful to rally troops. But he isn't their Lord Paramount. He's not going to Storm's End?" he asked to make sure.

"No." she said sharply. "He is not. Again however it doesn't matter! Right now the Dragon queen is the closest of our enemies."

Stannis frowned at her tone, but nodded. He didn't want the Targaryens to return either, though Stannis was surprised that the Starks seemed to be backing the idea. Ned was an honorable man, and if Robert was still alive there was no doubt that the Starks would have bent the knee to me. But what will they think of my attacking their ship before official word has spread about my brother's death? That will probably have turned them against me, something I should've thought about before.

He waved one hand in a calm down gesture, something he wouldn't normally do but the Red Witch seemed a little put out that he didn't automatically agree with her. "I cannot send my entire fleet out on this chase of yours. I will send two ships, and you can send your ... creatures along." He said the last words with some discomfort, not liking to think of the creatures Melisandre's magic had created.

"But I will need you with me. If Renly is not going to the Stormlands personally, that gives me the opportunity to rally them instead. Many of them will not look to me as their Lord Paramount, but my actual physical presence may persuade some of them, and your magic and what it says of my cause will do more."

Melisandre scowled but was forced to concede that the man made good tactical sense, and that she would be worth far more in the short term going with him then capturing the Dragon Queen. And there were indeed her shadow-bound to consider. "Very well, I have no doubt my pets will be able to succeed in this."

Despite his habitual self-control Stannis couldn't stop a look of revulsion from crossing his face thinking of those things again. Still, the woman seemed to have them under control. And they surely would prove valuable if this Young Wolf was as formidable as the Red Witch seemed to think. "Send them all to make sure. You... you can always make more when we reach the mainland, after all." That statement actually won him a smile from Melisandre, a sight that was both arousing and terrible to see.

OOOOOO

Illyrio waved one hand grandly at the damage to his estate, the other keeping a scented handkerchief on his nose as he spoke to his guest in the Dothraki tongue. "The proof of what I said is all around us great Khal, there can be no doubt that the King of Westeros feared you. We did all we could to stop them, but the warrior he sent still absconded with the woman that was to be your gift."

Khal Drogo was a tall man, copper-colored skin, black hair, and black eyes like most Dothraki. His muscles and upper chest would normally be on display among his own people, since they traditionally, only wore leather leggings and painted jackets and when he moved his body showed all the self-control of an expert warrior. Since he was in Pentos, he wore a silk shirt of exceptional quality, yet on Khal Drogo it looked out of place, like a dress would on an armored warrior, almost but not quite hilarious in its attempt to cover the warrior beneath. He had a long, drooping moustache and a long braid down to his thighs that was hung with tiny bells. This symbolized his status among the Dothraki as an undefeated warlord.

For all that he truly was as barbaric as his face and hair suggested however, Khal Drogo was also a warlord, and a shrewd observer. He looked around the house, then said something in the Dothraki tongue far too fast for the magister to get to one of his men, his bloodriders, men sworn to his service who filled the role of brothers, guards and close companions.

The other man, who wore similar clothing to Drogo and looked just as ridiculous in it as he did, nodded then answered in a single fast sentence. The magister could only make out two, maybe three words in the sentence, something about fire, something about future, he didn't understand the last one he thought it might have religious overtones though.

The man finished his answer by gesturing at a blood platter on the ground by the outer wall. That was where Illyrio and Viserys suspected Doremic and Daenerys had met up with Ranma Stark in their escape from the grounds.

Arianne Martell had been very helpful in identifying their helper, and Illyrio had grabbed that and ran with it in his explanation to the Khal. He painted Ranma not only as a lord but one of the most dangerous warriors in Westeros, which, judging from what Arianne had told them about what she had seen personally, wasn't an exaggeration, sent to spirit off Daenerys to keep her from marrying Khal Drogo in fear of his might. The idea of such being sent to spirit his 'gift' away, might be enough to keep Khal Drogo from demanding and getting Illyrio's head handed over to him.

If he did, the other magisters would cheerfully hand him over to the Dothraki warlord, since the alternative would be the death of the city. The Dothraki couldn't have taken the city easily, but they could have destroyed all the farms that fed it, cut off their inland trade, and then siege the city easily enough, though it would take a while since they couldn't well cut off the port trade. But without the farms around it, the city would eventually starve, and all the magisters knew it.

Several of the others bloodriders who had come with the Khal were crowded around Balerion, who was tethered to the ground with ropes, sleeping off its after-meal torpor, the only time Viserys let the creature out of his sight. That was a good thing, since only Viserys could even be near the beast without it trying to bit them. Luckily it showed no sign of developing the fire breath of its breed just yet, but the fangs and claws were enough to make everyone else stay away, which Viserys was quite happy with.

Watching the Dothraki as they stood around the creature, Illyrio thought it was interesting that the barbarians were obviously fascinated with the young dragon. They had been told that if it was awake Balerion would attack any of them who came near, something which seemed to amuse them when he said it.

Illyrio looked between Khal Drogo and the unintroduced bloodrider, trying to follow the conversation they were having, but unable to figure out more than a word for every six they were talking so fast. They were seemingly still discussing the battle that had occurred here though, if their gesturing was anything to go on.

After a moment the barbarians exchanged another sentence, this time with the words 'Vaes Dothrak' in there, which Illyrio knew was the name of the single real city the Dothraki called their own. The bloodrider nodded emphatic agreement, and at last Drogo turned back to address Illyrio. "It is understood. No dishonor will remain on your name, though this would not have happened if the gift had been prepared when it should have been initially."

The barbarians dark eyes pinned the magister in place, and he shivered a little, but Drogo said no more about that, certain his point was made. After a moment Drogo went on. "However, because this was caused by you putting off the gift-giving for so long, no dishonor accrues to us either. We will go. There'll be no exchange of gifts between us at this time. You may go, and we may go on our ways untied to one another."

In point of fact, Drogo was not at all certain what to do in this instance. It was true that Illyrio had been in the wrong by putting off the giftgiving, but Drogo knew even that had been because the gift, the Stormborn who was to be his wife, had proven clumsy and hurt herself several times trying to become fit enough to become a Dothraki wife.

Needless to say, Illyrio had created a worth lie out of pure nothing to cover Viserys beating of his sister. If he hadn't Viserys life would already be forfeit for marking a woman meant as the future wife of the Khal.

But it also looked to be true that the Stormborn had been spirited away by a third party. In any other circumstances, that would have been an act of war, and Drogo would already have vowed to lead his khalasar against Westeros. But this was mitigated by the fact the giftgiving had been postponed for so long and that to follow them, the khalasar would have been forced to cross the ocean.

There was more to the Dothraki fear of water than the city-dwellers realized. Yes, part of it was the fact they were very superstitious, and feared and loathed any water that a horse could not drink, horses being the true center of every aspect of the Dothraki culture. This tied into the other reason why a sea voyage was impossible for them to truly think about.

The Dothraki went everywhere on horseback. If you could not ride, you were less than a man, a slave or a eunuch, the only exception being the women in childbirth, the very young or very old. To go across the ocean would mean to travel by boat, thus travel by means other than a horse, an unthinkable thing for any Khal. Even if Drogo could have done it, his khalasar would have revolted against him at the very idea of going so far without being able to ride, and well they should.

No, for right now he was willing to pull out of the agreement between him and the merchant before him. In the long term however, he needed to consult with the Dosh Khaleen to decide if honor demanded more of him in this case. The wise old women, all wives of former Khals, served his people as seers and masters of tradition. Since Drogo had never heard of anything like this occurring in the history of his people, he would consult them and see what they saw in the future. If they decided he needed to ride down this Westeros King, with their backing his khalasar would follow him even across the sea despite the dishonor inherent in that, but Drogo hoped it would not come to that.

The magister nodded, knowing that was the best outcome he could expect from this debacle. Moments later, the Dothraki left, riding out of his manse on their horses and then out of the city rejoining the khalasar quickly.

That evening, Illyrio shared the details of that meeting with Viserys and Arianne when they returned from their own tasks for the day. At first, Viserys was contemptuous of the magister's efforts to bring the Dothraki to their side, but after Illyrio painstakingly explained the Dothraki position he simply shrugged. "Well, if we can no longer count on Dothraki aid, at least the day was not a total loss. My wife and I have had a much more profitable day than you Illyrio."

Illyrio looked between Viserys and Arianne. Viserys had turned away after saying that, heading out to train with Balerion before giving the black scaled drakling his evening feed. The training consisted of running Balerion around on a halter, giving him treats of specially spiced meats if he obeyed without fighting back, and a few exercises designed to build up his flight muscles.

This left Arianne to answer Illyrio's questions, which the new wife did with a smile. "We have talked to representatives of two mercenary companies today, and agreed to contracts with both the Company of the Cat and the Stormbreakers. The Stormbreakers will arrive by ship in a matter of days, while the Company of the Cat will arrive overland in another week. That will give us some five thousand mixed infantry, and about five hundred light cavalry."

She smiled, reaching for the food on the table, a new purchase like much else since the fire had ravaged the first floor of Illyrio's manse. It wasn't technically time for the evening meal just yet, but she'd had a busy day, and felt she deserved a snack. "Another two thousand men, mostly infantry themselves, will also be joining us, some mercenaries, some slaves, others from the city guard or individual guard troops."

"And who will be paying for these mercenary companies pray? I do not have enough liquid funds for that."

"The two thousand mixed men and the Stormbreakers are going to be paid entirely by the other magisters in the city. They will also pay the Company of the Cat until such time comes when we are actively making war. After that, they will find their own payment in loot and booty, or I will be forced to pay them on credit on my father's name."

Arianne frowned at that, she wasn't in favor of such for many reasons, but the Company of the Cat was their largest contingent of troops, and they were organized and very experienced, both factors in her aiding Viserys in convincing their father to sign with them instead of allowing the man to leave port for Yunkai, which was where he was going next. Their current contract was nearly up, and they needed a new contract, hopefully one, in the man's words, where loot and plunder was guaranteed.

She wasn't looking forward to what that would do for discipline in the field, but right now, they were a worthy addition to their forces. Besides, she had no doubt her uncle and her father could contrive to feed the mercenaries into the battles before Dorne's own loyal men, which would help them in the long run.

"Ahh... I take it Viserys was his normal convincing self then?"

"Oh indeed." Arianne replied, coming back to the here and now at Illyrio's question. "Viserys was able to convince the other magisters to aid us by pointing out what had happened with Ranma absconding with Daenerys was an affront to all of their dignity, and an attack on the very sovereignty of the city. After all, they couldn't let any foreign government think they could get away with sending agents into Pentos to kidnap those under the protection of a magister, now could they?"

Illyrio's eyebrows went up in surprise, but then he nodded thoughtfully. Arianne elaborated slightly. "None of the magisters added a lot, but little bits here and there from all of the other merchants large and small added." Of course, Arianne's presence and what it said for Viserys cause also helped open up the magisters purses.

She nodded at her cousin Obara, who had just come back from placing their horses in the manse's covered stables, which had survived the fire Daenerys had started. The other woman's surly return nod amused Arianne somewhat, Obara wasn't nearly as happy with being here with Viserys as Arianne was, having been, well, rather terrified if she was honest by Ranma's martial abilities.

Arianne wasn't sanguine about facing Ranma across a battlefield either, which was something she wanted to avoid if she could in the future. That was doubtful, but possible. And if not, there is little he could do to stop himself from being immolated by dragon fire once Balerion can fly high enough to remain out of bow range and is large enough to breath fire. She thought complacently.

In many ways, this had been the best outcome Arianne could have hoped for. Whatever they might have thought, the Targaryen Dynasty's real strength always lay on their control of dragons, and here she was, married to a man who was bringing back one such dragon, once more joining the house of Martell to House Targaryen. Daenerys and her two dragons was a fly in the ointment, but one that could be overcome with judicious use of assassins, as Viserys had said.

That was politically however, emotionally she wasn't so happy about things. For one, she was rather angry at her father for never telling her that she was promised to Viserys, which he had shared with her almost immediately. At least now she knew why Doran never put forward any real suitors for her hand. Those he had were merely to placate propriety and she vowed they would be will having words in the future. The second is she would have liked to put off marrying Viserys if she could, but he had pointed out that they needed that solid bond between them before he could trust her with his plans going forward, and her hand had been promised to him after all. Those plans were good, risky but still good, so even that was a minor irritant.

As a lover Viserys had the tools, but not the stamina or interest in her pleasure. Those could be overcome eventually, and at least he had an inventive frame of mind, and a willingness to experiment.

As a husband, Viserys was arrogant but not blind to Arianne's importance as an advisor. He could be dismissive at times but she had been able to get him to agree with many of her ideas, including making certain the mercenaries always had minders once they arrived in Westeros, and to use them as shock troops as much as possible in the future.

Yet there seemed to be an edge to Viserys, not madness, but something that could all too easily become it, that made Arianne remain somewhat unhappy with being tied so tightly to him. Still, there was nothing she could do at this point but put her best foot forward, and practice using sex as a control lever on him, of course.

"How long until the fleet we've commissioned is built?" Arianne asked, turning back to Illyrio and doing just that.

OOOOOO

At the sounds of a drum somewhere beyond the torch light Tyrion looked up from directing his work crew to finish up work on the trebuchet, the seventh they had emplaced since beginning the project. His men did as well before racing over to where they had placed their weapons on the massive cart they had used to bring up the equally massive parts of the trebuchet. The entire area was lit by the lights of several braziers and torches, which allowed them enough light to both work and grab up their weapons.

Tyrion beat them there, grabbing up his blade and a bottle of wine, staring one way and another trying to localize the sound. In the night sound carried a little too well up here on the Wall. But this wasn't the first nighttime raid warning he had heard, and after a second Tyrion pointed down the Wall westward from his current position. "Over there!"

The men behind him nodded and raced in that direction, with Tyrion first at their head, then falling behind due to his deformities. Spry, agile and almost acrobatic Tyrion was, a gifted runner he was not. His men soon passed a small, covered wooden palisade set into the center of the causeway. Up on top of the palisade two men were beating on a massive drum sounding the alarm. One of them shouted down to Tyrion and his men, pointing further westward. "Sounds of battle westward two signal towers down!"

Tyrion nodded up at him as his men raced on, passing two more palisades about two thousand paces apart. These two were manned, and they directed Tyrion and his crew on.

A few dozen paces after that they arrived on the scene of a wildling assault trying to get up the Wall. They were being held back by ten men from Castle Black, one of the patrols that walked portions of the Wall, moving from Castle Black in both directions along the Wall like their fellows in the other castles. Two of the twelve men squad were down, one dead, the other with a mangled leg, but the wildlings were not getting past the rest, and had lost seven men already trying to force their way away from the edge of the wall.

The patrolman who had been carrying the torch was their one fatality. Worse, there was only a sliver of moon out, making vision bad all around. Still, Tyrion could see the grapnels attached to the top of the bulwark.

Tyrion and his work force hit the wildlings from their side of the Wall like a hammer, bellowing out a myriad of war cries, throwing the wildlings back over the wall. Tyrion slew one of them, his sword going under his opponent's studded leather back plate before the man even knew he was there. "Destroy the ladders, destroy the ladders!"

Several of the Northmen heard him, and one of them had enough presence of mind to grab of the patrols sputtering torch, tossing it down onto the massive ladder that had been placed against the Wall's northern face. It was actually a series of massive ladders, no one ladder could ever reach the top of the Wall. But each set of ladders constituted weeks of preparation for the wildlings, as well as being the only really fast way a large group of wildlings could scale the Wall.

The torch struck right in front of a wildling climbing up the last leg of the ladder and he howled in pain as some of the sparks got in his eyes. Then his howl became a scream of agony as Tyrion threw the bottle of wine he carried at the small flickering torch flame. The fire spread quickly, now fueled by the wine and the tar that was splattered on the sides of the ladder in places to keep it from freezing against the Wall.

Tyrion ignored the man's scream, dodging backwards from a female wildling wielding a club studded with sharp bones. The wildling bitch only had that one chance to attack him before she was taken in the side by a spear from one of the patrolmen.

After that, the fight was over, and all the men gathered around the edge of the Wall to look down, watching as the light of the flames worked their way down the ladder. Far below, the wildlings who were waiting to make their way up retreated quickly, while other wildlings scattered here and there on the ladder either retreated down it quickly or if they were too high up, were left with a deadly choice to make: face the fire or jump to their deaths.

Two Hornwood men who had been assigned to the patrol, both archers, pulled their bows from their backs and began to use the light of the burning ladder to pepper those far below. That was enough for the wildlings, who retreated away from the Wall back toward the safety of the tree-line.

Around Tyrion the men gave a cheer, and the Imp left it to them, staring out into the night beyond torches of the Wall thoughtfully. For the past week or so the Night's Watch and the rest of the forces on the Wall had been dealing with probing attacks like this, night raids that were more designed to get a feel for their defenses than actually win through. The wildlings were very good at night attacks, but they had been stymied at every turn by the readiness of the defenders.

Reports from Eastwatch by the Sea and Shadow Tower indicated they saw at least two such attacks per night. The commanders of those castles were both very worried, feeling vulnerable since they knew the wildlings could get around them in various ways to possibly attack them from behind. Lord Commander Mormont was worried however that the numerous probes against the two widely spaced towers might be a feint designed to draw the defenders away from the center of the Wall and Castle Black itself.

This would have worked if the Night's Watch hadn't been so heavily reinforced, so much so that the two castles could watch out for themselves. Of course given the size of the Wall they could still use more men, but they had enough to hold for now, thanks to the organization of the defenders and Tyrion's own work on the ballistae, which hadn't seen action just yet.

A communication network had also been set up at Daryn's behest, a series of covered palisades that doubled as warming areas for the patrols. The Northmen had long used horns to signal in battle, but drums were easier to learn, made even simpler since there were only a few signals the men had to learn. The sides of the first story of every palisade were covered by hardened leather. A brazier was set in the center with room for four men to gather. The heat from the brazier also kept the two watchmen up top with the drum from freezing.

The coldness of the Wall hadn't become a major issue yet, but they all knew it would soon. Even Tyrion, who had never seen snow before coming north, could feel the sharpness in the air increasing with every passing month. Yet that wasn't all he felt here on the Wall, evinced by the men around him slapping his back and shouting his name.

He laughed at their enthusiasm then bellowed "All right you Northern louts, that's enough of this little pleasure jaunt, back to work the lot of you!" There was some grumbling at that, but it was good natured. The men in the patrol laughed as well before moving on their way. This was an example of something Tyrion had been noticing ever since he arrived here on the Wall.

There were no jokes about his size or deformities, or at least none that were meant to actually hurt, and there was no sense of his name being more important than his own contribution. While Smalljon, Daryn and a few of the other lords still very obviously saw him as a Lannister, the majority of men didn't care, or at least looked past it. He had won their respect as Tyrion, the Imp, not Tyrion Lannister. This was a first for him, and he liked it, he liked it a lot.

OOOOOO

Four days after his rescue of Sansa Ranma stood with captain Woolfield at the front of the Fish's Scales in the early morning. He stared ahead through a dense fog that had rolled in last night at two oncoming vessels which hadn't been there moments before. Already they were almost within bow range. Behind them the crew were responding, grabbing weapons out of the lockers and preparing for battle.

The other man shook his head, scratching at his beard thoughtfully. "As I've said before lord, the navy crews know these waters better than we do. One of 'em must've been shadowing us forward, then met up with the other ship. They knew this fog'd be coming in, letting them ambush us without letting us a chance to get away or even draw it out. Look, they've caught us in a pincer movement, we can't turn away unless we go to full oars backward, and that would take us too long anyway."

Ranma shrugged. "It doesn't matter how they did it captain, all that matters is that they did." He frowned looking at the ships. "Continue to get your men ready, I'll tell the others."

He found Daenerys with Domic and Brynden in his father's room pouring over the map once more, the two men trying to teach the Dragon Princess how to discern travel times in Westeros, which she was still having trouble with. On the other hand she had a firm grasp on the logistics and the general rule of Army movement which was the larger the Army is, the slower it can move.

They all looked up when he came in, and Ranma sighed. "The lookout was right; there're two ships out there making for us, both of them flying flags that show the mark of Dragonstone. Stannis really wants you for some reason Daenerys. We don't have much time before they're on us."

Sansa, Myrcella and Alayaya had been tending to Eddard in his bed, and they all gasped, looking at one another fearfully. Myrcella feared what would happen to her if she was brought before her uncle, if he really was her uncle after all. Sansa of course simply was frightened of the impending battle, while Alayaya knew all too well what could happen to women after a battle.

Daenerys however merely nodded. The two dragons who had been curled up on Fenris who had been lying next to her woke up, scrambling up to her shoulders quickly. "What is the plan?"

"Like I said, they're too close to escape. We can't back away and try to take them down one at a time. Brynden, Domic, you'll lead a group to defend the hatchway leading further into the ship. Captain Woolfield will concentrate on defense of the ship. We'll use fire arrows on one as they approach, the captain has a few dozen in the ship's stores but not many. I'll take the fight to the other one, take it out and then turn on the next." Ranma shrugged. "That's about all we can do."

"You say that in so blasé a manner." Myrcella said shaking her head, looking at Ranma worriedly. Though to her credit it was obvious it was more worry for Ranma than the overall battle. "Are you certain that you're not overestimating yourself?"

Daenerys and Ranma both chuckled. "I see Domic hasn't set the first battle we had with Stannis' forces to song yet, good." Ranma mock-gloved at Domic who chuckled wanly but continued to pull on his sword belt. "Trust me, this is an accurate statement of my abilities."

OOOOOOO

Aurane Waters, so-called the Bastard of Driftmark, was a bastard of house Velaryon, half-brother of the current lord of that house. He had the looks of a Targaryen, wiry, with a thin, somewhat handsome face framed by semi-silver hair, and an odd eye color that mixed brown with violet, looks which had helped him in many a conquest in foreign ports. On Driftmark or Dragonstone however his looks were not exactly unusual. Many of the smallfolk could count bastards of that family in their lineage, thanks to how long the Targaryens had ruled there.

He was technically a sellsail, a mercenary/free trader who sailed as an auxiliary of the Westeros Navy. But that was only technically, given his connection to house Velaryon, one of the most powerful houses of the Narrow Sea houses. His house had been the first to bow to Stannis as King, and his brother had already converted to the worship of R'hllor, which was why Aurane's ship had been one of the two chosen for this mission.

At first, Aurane had been proud to be given this assignment by Stannis, seeing it as proof that the king was one to overlook baseborn status in competent individuals. Hunting down the traitorous Starks and the Targaryen Stormborn had also seemed an honorable pursuit. But that had been before Melisandre had delivered to his ship and its fellow the two almost but not quite crates, apparently designed to protect those within from the sun's rays, which contained her creatures.

The Red Witch called them Shadow Warriors. They were as tall as a man, though they stooped all the time, and their arms were far longer, thinner than a man's much like their bodies. Each in some fashion looked like the sacrifice that had died to give them life, though not really, as if the details of their faces was being seen through dark, distorted glass, or as if the entire creature was made of such material, since you could for the most part see through them. Each Warrior also wielded a sword made of shadow, seeming as immaterial as the rest of the warrior, but in their hands those blades could cut open the finest armor.

Aurane had only a vague idea of how they had been created. Some rumors said that Melisandre had burned a dozen people alive to create enough magical power of whatever to create each Shadow Warrior. Another one said that she had slept with Lord Stannis, fucking him on the pyre of the sacrifices, then had given birth somehow to each warrior in turn. Another, far simpler one was that she simply ripped the soul of the dying sacrifices out, merging them with the smoke and the shadows of their own funeral pyres to create the Warriors.

Whatever the case, the Shadow Warriors were horrible, and if it were up to Aurane, he would have tossed their cages over the side in an instant, but he was too terrified of Melisandre to try that. They seemed to live for nothing but to kill, and even in their specially prepared cages they had killed two men who had gotten too close, ripping them to pieces. He did not doubt that the story was the same on the other ship, which had an equal number of them five in each cage, ten per ship.

The Red Witch had promised that they would bring Aurane victory this day, then disappear after seeing their captive in his hands, allowing him to return with the prize alone. She had even done some sort of ceremony that was supposed to have made him the only one they could hand the Targaryen girl over to. Yet even so, Aurane hated and feared them with every fiber of his being

Now time for them to earn their keep. Arrows had begun to fall among his crew, showing him that the men aboard the other vessel had apparently decided not to try to parlay. The sooner he could loose those things the better. He turned to his second-in-command. "Make the signal to the other ship, then move the cages to either side of the boat facing the side nearest the target."

OOOOOOO

Captain Woolfield's men were not sailors. They were armsmen who just happens to have enough skills to play at being sailors, with a handful of few real ones along to really direct the others. Woolfield himself had sailing experience, hence why he had been given this task, but like his men, he was just as good with a sword in his hand as the ship's steering wheel. They were also all very proud of the fact that Lord Manderly had handpicked each of them for this mission, and were grimly determined to get him at his family home. The words of Sansa to the boat crew had spread, and it was with pride and determination that they took their posts. Suddenly the sides of the ship bristled with shields, two stern battle lines prepared to repel boarders.

Those who looked at Ranma also found there courage bolstered further. He stood unarmored, having handed over his armor to Domeric who stood with Brynden and a few men chosen for the purpose, blocking the hatchway leading down into the ship. Instead Ranma stood with only a leather shirt, one hand holding his last katar, the other his katana. Fenris too patrolled the deck, waiting with all the patience of a master hunter.

Ranma ignored his direwolf and the men around him though, staring ahead through the fog that was still clinging to the ocean's surface toward the two attacking ships. They were close enough now the archers had taken one of the ships under fire, their prepared fire arrows tiny flashes in the fog. That ship fell back, its rigging on fire but the crews were experienced, and would soon put it out.

Still, that might be enough to let Ranma and his fellows defeat the first ship, or at least kill a large portion of its crew before the second ship could rejoin the battle.

Soon enough the second ship was close enough to make out details of the men on its deck. Ranma frowned seeing two cages set in the dead center of the ship. For some reason the sight of them filled him with sudden foreboding. He shook it off quickly, and when the other ship was close enough leaped outward over the intervening water, howling his warcry. "Winter is coming!"

He landed near the front of the other vessel, and as he had said a few days before, Ranma was in no mood to take prisoners or be gentle at this point. He had his wounded father to get home, his sister to look after, Myrcella and Daenerys both under his protection. He struck, and there was no mercy in it, no attempts to hold back. In fact he tried to put the fear of god, whichever they worshipped, into these people, letting loose entirely.

Twelve men died in fewer seconds, and Ranma moved on, killing. He jumped up into the air from the forecastle, using one hand bouncing off the hanging jib boom or whatever it was called throwing himself forward. Every slash from his katana killed or crippled, every thrust punched through helmets or chain mail, every kick shattered bone, flinging men aside like ragdolls.

While Ranma's sudden assault had actually taken the crew of the ship so assaulted aback enough they hadn't even started to throw grapnels over, luck of battle however had worked against the Northerners overall. The ship that the archers had first taken under fire had been Aurane's ship, which would matter soon.

Right now, Ranma's sudden assault had terrified the captain of this vessel, and he turned, smashing open the cages holding the Shadow Warriors. All ten of them bounded out, their fell blades raised as they stalked towards the attacker, the captain's body collapsing in a pool of blood behind them in the instant they had been free. Within seconds they cut through several men to get to their enemy, and soon Ranma came face to face with these terrors.

Ranma backed away quickly, nearly losing his katar in the chest of one of his victims when a length of pure shadow formed into a sword tried to cut into his forearm. He really did lose it when it another blade tried to take his hand off where was holding the knife, the Shadow Warriors astonishing in their speed, not up to Amiguriken levels, but almost as fast as he was normally. Quickly pulling his hand back he cursed as he lost his second katar, the first having been lost when he threw it at Joffrey's head. Hurriedly Ranma brought up his blade to block the next thrust from a third Shadow Warrior, while all around him the regular troopers made way for them.

Faced with trying to join that battle or taking the fight to the other ship, the choice was obvious. Under the surviving officers, the men aboard the navy galley began to toss across their grapnels at the Fish's Scales. Soon they had enough across to pull the ships into direct contact, the hulls of the ships scraping together.

With a roar the men tried to charge across, only to be met by a wall of shields and swords from the crew of the other vessel who were waiting for them. The men of Lord Manderly were not nearly as well trained as Lord Stark's retinue had been, not having trained with Ranma or John Snow. However they were organized, and had shields, plus the caravel was slightly taller in the water than the two naval galleys.

This difference in height and their defensive position allowed the Northerners to hold back the impetus of that initial charge. Battle began in earnest there between the bulwarks of the ship, but it looked like the Northerners would be able to hold the line for now. The fire arrows had gained them enough time for the crew to concentrate on the first ship, and they were not going to look a gift horse in the mouth.

For his part Ranma was too caught up in his battle against the Shadow Warriors to help repel the regular attackers. There were ten of these Shadow creatures crowding Ranma now, their weapons seeking his life, and they also used their hands to try and grab him. Ranma suspected that his ki-strengthening technique would not wholly stop those blades which made him dodge around as much as possible.

Worse, at first his own blade went straight through the Shadow Warriors, which Ranma found out when he tried to stab one of them through the chest. The damn thing ignored his blade sticking out of its chest, while trying to cut his head off with a vast overhand blow.

Ranma leaped back, watching as his blade actually fell through the thing as if it had no substance now that he wasn't holding the blade where it had been.

"Alright change o' tactics." Ranma channeled ki into his hands, which began to glow blue and gold. He ducked under one blow, kicking off the deck quickly to dodge to one side, his hand flashing out to smack a Shadow Warrior in the side, before kicking another in the head with a foot also glowing blue-gold with the energy of his ki.

The Warrior he kicked screamed, his head disappearing, the substance that made up its head vanishing under the impact of Ranma's life-force. The other was thrown back, but it evidently wasn't a killing blow, they had that much in common with still living opponents anyway.

The men at the back of the crowd trying to push their way aboard the Fish's scale noticed this and gasped in shock. Some of them lost their will for the fight at that, backing away. The reaction from the Northerners was the opposite, they all had been frightened by the sights of the Shadow Warrior beyond the melee they were involved in, but now took new heart, seeing the things die under their lords oddly magical blows. Some of them began to Chant "Stark, Stark!"

Questions about Ranma's abilities would come later, though not many. The men of the North had long been accustomed to thinking that Ranma and his brother Jon were at the very least superhuman. Having some kind of body-related magic wasn't that far a stretch. Indeed, the idea that their Lord had such abilities would convince other Northerners further of the rightness of their cause. After all, the old gods would not have given Ranma such skills if they were not totally behind his cause.

The death of their fellow Shadow Warrior seemed to take the others aback, and they hesitated for a second, which allowed Ranma in turn to roll away. Grabbing up his blade from where it had fallen to the deck he concentrated for a bare second. Then it too began to glow with his ki, and Ranma grinned viciously. "I have no idea what you fuckers are, but if you can die that's good enough for me!"

He charged forward with a howl. The shadow Warriors hesitated another few seconds before charging to meet him across the deck, losing another member quickly before the others could change their attacking style to match their opponent's ability to actually kill them. They began circling Ranma like hyena, their speed making them dangerous even to him. If Ranma charged one that one retreated and the others closed in from behind. If he leaped into the air they all backed away, waiting for him to land, taking away one of the major advantages of his style. The battle became a stalemate, however Ranma was keeping the remaining Shadow warriors on this ship fully occupied.

He killed four more over the next twenty minutes, taking a few shots in turn but his Ki-strengthening technique sustained him while the rest of the battle went on. This had given Aurane enough time to put the fires on his ship out and move back in. With the archers so busy firing at the enemies their fellows were already engaged with, they didn't have enough archers or fire arrows to force his ship was away again, and Aurane skillfully brought it along the other side of the Northerner's ship.

Woolfield however was rather cagey. He had kept four dozen men still along that bulwark, forcing them to remain there while their fellows battled along the other side of the vessel. They were still there when Aurane's men threw across their grapnels, pulling the two vessels. Once more the strange torturous sound of wood grinding against wood sounded out through the fog of the bay. At captain Woolfield's shouted order, another dozen men pulled back from the battle against the crew of the first ship, moving with Woolfield at their head to engage the attackers from the other vessel with the men already there.

Unlike his fellow captain however, Aurane had devised a way to use his shadow Warriors from the very beginning. He ordered the two cages containing them to either side of his vessel and then concentrated his men in the center. When the two ship sides were scrapping along one another, he shouted "Release the cages! Fall back and let them break the Northerner's line!"

None of the other Northerners had Ranma's ability and before Woolfield, his face a rictus of horror, could order them to fall back the Shadow Warriors cut through his line in a matter of seconds. He lost nearly half his men before they burst through, heading onwards to the hatchway leading into the ship. Woolfield fell too, his sword uselessly carving through a Shadow Warrior as the thing's blade took him in the side.

As the defensive line collapsed Fenris was on them in turn. He howled, the sound actually pulling many of the Shadow Warrior's attention away from their task. the nearest on to Fenris died quickly, his fangs crunching through it glowing blue-gold. Six of the remaining Shadow Warriors turned, circling Fenris while the others raced on.

"At them now!" Aurane shouted, leaping forward onto the Fish's Scales. With the shield line broken on this side, dozens of duos and one or two trios gathered around one another, trying to defend the backs of their fellows holding off the first attacking ship's crew for now, but with limited success. If not for the swirling, chaotic melee between the Shadow Warriors and Fenris taking up the center of the ship, the battle might well have been lost.

Brynden held seven men together from the melee all around them. They drew men who got around Fenris and his battle down on them, protecting the backs of the rest of the crew. He saw Aurane, and recognizing him as the man in charge, charged forward, his sword up and questing, smashing against the other, younger man's blade, throwing him backwards slightly. "Hold the line, let Ranma and the other lads do their work, we can still win this boys! Keep heart!"

Domeric and the men chosen as a final guard of the hatchway leading into the interior of the ship had been picked out from the best swordsman aboard the vessel. They had all already noticed that the Shadow Warrior's couldn't be stopped by normal blade. To combat this they kept their distance, flashing forward when they could to hack at them, not expecting to kill them, just holding them up as much as possible, keeping their attention on them rather than doing anything else. The Shadow Warrior's speed was incredible, but they weren't truly trained, nor were their reaction times very good, so in a battle like this, they showed a few disadvantages.

"That's the way lads!" Domeric shouted as he ducked under a blade questing for his unarmored face, stabbing his blade through the leg of the Shadow Warrior attacking him through the top of its knee and down through where its leg bone should have been. Such attacks seemed to slow the creatures down. He raised his shield to block a blow from another Shadow Warrior, pulling out his sword and backing away, leading the two of them away from the hatch. "Hold them here until Fenris can deal with the ones fighting him, and come to our aid!"

If any of the men around him found it odd to be looking to a direwolf for salvation they certainly didn't have the time to voice such thoughts. But they went about their business grimly, and with as much skill as they could muster against warriors who fought in a manner none of them had ever imagined, with bodies they could not injure, merely hinder.

Suddenly in a odd moment of tactical thinking one of the Shadow Warriors turned from fighting Fenris, forcing most of Domic's men back and away from the hatch lest they be caught from both sides. Two of the ones already fighting Domic's men pressed them further back, cutting off many of the men from the hatch while the other three turned away.

Domic, seeing what they were doing grabbed the men around him, pulling them around and away toward the hatch. "Fall back into the ship, we'll try to hold them off in the confines of the passageway below!"

He hoped that this way he could negate the Shadow Warrior's sudden numbers advantage, but he hadn't figured how much their greater speed would matter more in an enclosed space. Domic lost two men in the hatchway itself before he and the last man fell back into the hall, retreating desperately.

Domic gasped as one of the blades nearly cut through the armor Ranma had given him, almost opening up his stomach. He had backed away just enough to stop from being skewered, but his fellow swordsman had fallen back into the doorway leading into the crew quarters. He was fighting one of the Shadow Warriors, the door closed enough so the creature could only engage him with his sword, but that left Domic facing two, trying to keep them from pushing on down the hallway. And he simply couldn't do it. While he was able to hold off one of the Shadow Warriors, the last one darted by him down the hall, heading toward where it somehow knew its true target was.

OOOOOO

Inside the vessel the girls had all remained in Lord Stark's room. Sansa and Alayaya were huddled together by the bed. Sansa could all too easily remember her brush with battle after the fall of the Tower, and wanted no more of it, the very idea terrified her. Alayaya too was nearly paralyzed. She had seen women who had been taken after battle by the winning side, their minds broken by the ordeal. One of her hands was playing with where she had a tiny holdout knife, and she was very well aware that it would be better to use it on herself and Sansa than let that fate befall them.

Myrcella was anxious as well but also fighting back a growing anger at all this. Her world had been shattered, recently and all she wanted was some peace and quiet, a week before the next crisis occurred, was that too much to ask? It made her angry, and the anger kept the fear she felt from finding a purchase in her as it had in the other two.

She had taken the little knife that Ranma had given Sansa upon learning that his sister had lost hers. Myrcella didn't know how to use it, but thanks to her medical studies she had a good knowledge of human anatomy, so knew where to stick her very sharp knife to cause the most pain.

Daenerys was waiting by the door, a short sword in one hand. She wasn't very good with it yet, but she was determined to fight for herself. She stood in a low crouch with the sword waiting to be thrust forward, a small buckler that one of the cabin boys apparently used on one shoulder.

Behind her the two dragons also waited, tensed to spring at anything threatening their mistress, their tails the only thing on them moving. They could feel their mistresses' distress, her anger and fear, and were waiting to attack whatever was coming in Daenerys' defense despite their being so young.

Even though she had been waiting for it when the door actually crashed open it was still a shock. The door banged open with a massive "Crash!" and Daenerys backed up slightly then backed up further as behind her all three of the girls gasped in horror at the eldritch horror stalking towards her.

The thing looked as if it had been me out of shadow and smoke, solid looking, but how it could be so was a question since they could vaguely see the deck and the doorway through it. The blade it held however while just as oddly translucent looked sharp.

Daenerys snarled, sounding almost like one of her drakling for a moment, save even more menacing. "I know not what horror has spawned you, but you will have neither my children nor me!" She darted forward, and the thing's blade came around crashing into her own, sending Daenerys stumbling backwards to land on her rear.

For a moment she thought her arm had been broken by the impact of that blow. But she could still move it, and she rolled to one side, before darting back in attacking the thing again as it stalked forward.

The draklings charged forward now, biting and trying to claw or scratch at the Shadow Warrior's ankles. But they did not have the ki ability of Fenris, and could do nothing against the shadow with fang or claw. The Shadow Warrior merely ignored them, not even bothering to smack them aside.

Myrcella darted forward, trying to distract the thing from its single-minded attack on Daenerys, only to gasp as the Shadow Warrior's blade sliced sideways almost too fast for her to follow. She raised her small knife desperately to block the blow, catching it. But the blow threw her back, shattering the knife in her hand. The slivers of the knife went everywhere especially backward from the point of impact, her hand and arm was now a bloody mess from the bits and pieces of the knife cutting her skin, and Myrcella crumpled to the ground, holding her arm in agony against her chest.

Daenerys used the opportunity Merry's sacrifice had brought her to try to dart forward. Her short sword took the thing in the side, but unfortunately it did no damage, and it was all she could do to recover when the Shadow Warrior's blade came up around towards her after smashing Myrcella away.

Her blade did not shatter like the younger girl's knife had, but it was still thrown out of position. Another overhand blow smashed Daenerys down to one knee. Daenerys' desperate attempt to raise her buckler was just enough to turn the next blow away. The buckler however slammed into her forehead and she slumped nearly senseless to the ground from the blow

The Shadow Warrior raised its blade once more, prepared to cut her down. While their orders had been to kill the wolves and all the others and allow the Dragon Queen to be captured, at this distance the Red Witch's control of the Shadow Warriors was tenuous at best. Worse, they had felt the deaths of the others of their shadowy pack, they knew they faced creatures that could kill them, and it was making them go into a frenzy, nearly forgetting all their orders let alone the most complicated.

Daenerys's dazed eyes focused on the thing as it brought its blade up, ready to cut down. For a moment she thought she was going to die, and her last thought was about the little ones, hoping that Ranma would look after them.

Then her violet eyes widened as the thing stumbled, letting out a loud scream, the only sound it had made yet as Ice appeared slamming out of the Shadow Warrior's chest from the back. Whatever magic sustained it could not stand against a Valyrian blade, and with that final despairing wail it dissipated.

Eddard gasped, leaning on Sansa and letting his sword fall once more to grate against the wood of the deck beneath him. Standing had been difficult, wielding Ice with one hand even more so. Ice was a great sword, five and a half feet of Valyrian steel designed to be wielded with both hands, though Eddard had wielded it himself in one-hand thanks to his own size, strength and the fact Valyrian Steel was lighter than any other type. Still doing so now had nearly sapped all of his strength. He had waited, urging Sansa to be quiet until the Shadow Warrior's back was to him then had ordered Sansa and Alayaya to help him out of bed, before moving forward to take the thing from behind with his daughter's aid.

Now he slumped against Sansa even as Alayaya raced forward to help Myrcella. "Are, are, you huh, well, lady?" Eddard asked gasping, his one good leg shaking under him.

Daenerys was still rather dazed, but the two draklings had moved in quickly, climbing up onto her shoulders and nuzzling their heads against her face in reassurance. Sunfyre was making this crooning sound, trying to comfort his mistress, while Rhaegon was feeling fiercely protective, emitting a continual growl of sound much larger than his small frame would suggest.

Suddenly Daenerys could feel them through their mental connection reaching out to her for the first time. Love, affection, fear for her welfare, and a fierce protectiveness thundered through her from them. She could tell Rhaegon was the one who wished to protect her, while Sunfyre was slightly less... belligerent about it, just as defensive, but more concerned with her wound and making certain Daenerys knew he loved her. What was coming from both of them though was something else, a hot, fiery anger that they couldn't do anything to the shadow creature that had threatened their Mother/Queen, as they thought of Daenerys.

She raised shaking hands to them, gently scratching their necks and snouts to reassure them as she stared up at Lord Stark. "I am well for now my Lord, thank you for the timely intervention." The words though formal came out in a stilted manner, as if she was concussed. But she wouldn't say her currently fuzzy thoughts was because of that. No she was awash with the feelings of her draklings channeling to her for the first time. And suddenly through that haze Daenerys knew what she had to do.

Lord Stark nodded, then as then Daenerys stood, reached out with one weary hand to take her own, placing it on Ice's hilt. "Take my blade to my son, he is out there fighting I know, I don't know however if he has found some way to kill those things. But they cannot stand against Valyrian steel, it seems."

"I hope that it is not the only thing they cannot stand against my Lord." Daenerys murmured, taking the blade in both of her hands. It was as tall as she was, and despite being surprisingly light for its size, there was no chance she could actually wield it. But she could at least drag it along. Daenerys had other plans however. Without another word she moved forward nodding to Myrcella and the others. "Take care of her wounds." she ordered Alayaya, "I'll be back."

The three girls watched in awe as Daenerys turned towards the door, the draklings on her shoulders now looking as tense as springs, her feelings having soothed them, but also warned them of more to come, that she was going toward the danger now. They approved, and were tense and ready to defend her. Blood was coming down from the cut her own buckler had made on her forehead, matting her silver hair in blood. The battle had already caused Daenerys to start to sweat, and she was looking a little wobbly on her feet, staying upright only by pure will and by using by the massive blade in her hands as a staff. Yet for some reason all three girls felt they had never seen a more regal, commanding figure.

Outside in the corridor Domic had fallen, smashed to the ground by the flat edge of a Shadow Warrior's blade, his own blade having barely turned it so that it didn't cut into his unarmored helmet, having lost his helmet earlier to a grab by another Shadow Warrior. At the time, it had been his helmet or his head, a trade Domic had been willing to make, but now he paid for it. His head slammed into the wooden floor of the hallway with punishing force, and Domic could already feel his consciousness fading.

The last sight he saw was Daenerys coming towards him from the doorway into Lord Stark's room, her face hard, her eyes blazing with fury, and her dragons once more on her shoulders. The site of Domic down, a Shadow Warrior above him ready to run him through filled Daenerys with rage. For only the third time in her life she felt that unrelenting fiery wrath that had marked the Targaryen Dynasty.

Her connection with her draklings was still crackling in the back of her mind, vibrant, more colorful and deeper than ever before. Daenerys reached for it, picturing in her mind the fire, the flame that made the dragons so very dangerous. She then pointed a finger from where she holding the hilt of Ice at the thing. "Dracarys!"

For a moment she feared that the draklings were still too young to create the flames that had truly made them so dangerous, but after a bare second both Sunfyre and Rhaegon's heads jerked forward, spitting out tiny fireballs. The heat of them washed over her face despite being behind their elongated necks yet she still grinned in fierce triumph.

Their tiny balls of flame weren't as hot or as powerful as they would be later of course, but they were still dragonfire, that odd mix of innate magic and natural flame that made the dragon's weapon of choice so much more dangerous than any natural fire. Eventually a dragon's fire could become so powerful, so hot as to literally melt stone.

Even in this youthful version the Shadow Warrior couldn't withstand it. Their magic could protect them from physical harm, but the magic of the fire of the draklings negated that. The thing standing over Domic screamed as it burned, dissipating into motes of shadow and smoke.

As the two dragons pulled back their necks, recovering from the new, strange exertion, Daenerys strode forward, stopping to reach down to touch Domic's throat. She breathed a sigh of relief when she felt his pulse, thready but there. "Wait my friend, we will see to you soon."

Daenerys stood up, looking at the two draklings still perched on her shoulders. She sent a surge of approval and pride down their link, followed by a question. After a second, she got back in affirmative, the drakling indicating they were ready for more. With that done Daenerys Stormborn moved forward again down the hall, her eyes bleak slivers of violet stone.

OOOOOO

Ranma gasped as one of the shadow blades slammed into his shoulder. Luckily his ki-strengthening technique had held up under the Shadow Warrior's blade. So once more though his shirt was sliced open yet again, the skin underneath was merely badly bruised. In return Ranma's ki-covered katana skewered the thing's chest, causing it to shriek as it dissipated before Ranma leaped into the air, twirling to kick the head off the last Shadow Warrior closing behind him, its sword out to stab him in the back. The thing didn't even have time to scream before it dissolved into motes of shadow and smoke.

For just a moment Ranma stood still, gasped in lungfuls of air. That fight had been tough from the get-go, and he had the bruises to show it, but that was all. The worst wound he received had been an ugly bruise to one side, where he had taken two blows from the Shadow Warriors' blades, one on top of another. He might have a cracked rib under there, but Ranma was still good to go.

After another second he turned, smashing a blue-gold foot into the side of the naval galley's main mast. With a shriek of breaking timber the mast shattered at the point of impact causing dozens of men still trying to break the weakening shield wall of the northerners to turn in horror.

Dropping his katana, Ranma grabbed up a mainsail, the long wooden spar that stuck out of the mast tied to the sail. With that in his hands he raced forward with a wordless roar. "RAAAHHHH!"

Using the large piece of wood like a battering ram he slammed into the backs of the men trying to break his fellow's line, and suddenly the fight went out of the men. The Shadow Warriors were gone, and the mystical warrior that had killed them was now turning his attention to them. With no leader to rally them and not having made much headway in getting aboard the northerner's vessel to join the melee there, the men broke. Dozens of men broke from the battle, throwing themselves into the water, throwing weapons down and trying to surrender, or retreating into the interior of their ship. Unfortunately for them the Northerners were in no mood to take prisoners, and the men trying to surrender were cut down like the rest.

Captain Woolfield had fallen in the initial charge of the Shadow Warriors, leaving Brynden to organize as many as many of the men as best he could. But the battle had become spread out across his vessel, and he had simply become one more combatants. Even so he had quickly singled out Aurane, and the two of them had been dueling for most of the battle, ignoring all of the others around them.

Fenris ripped apart the last of the Shadow Warriors that had surrounded him, then shook his mane free of blood rapidly to keep it out of his eyes. The unnatural creatures man-fangs hadn't been able to penetrate his fur very far, but he was still covered with little slashes. Not so many bruises thanks to his fur, but more slashes than Ranma had after his own battle. After taking a second to look around him, Fenris turned racing towards the entrance down into the vessel after the others.

Behind Fenris, Ranma join the melee spread out over the rest of the ship, jumping over the area still being held by the beleaguered shield line of the Manderly men. He aimed to land among a large group of them that were attempting to roll up the defenders line, the last of the defenders protecting their fellow's backs having fallen or forced to retreat out of position lest they become surrounded. "Hey, look up assholes!"

Two of them actually heard him over the din of combat. They had a brief moment to gape in shock before his feet slammed into the face of one of them. Ranma used the impetus of that to flip himself up in the air, landing slightly on a surprised man's shoulder, his hands lashing out, killing two more, smashing one straight over the edge of the Fish's Scales to land in the ocean, the other slammed senseless into the center of the deck, his helm so badly mangled he couldn't even see out of it.

The man he was currently perched on tried to thrust his sword straight up to skewer Ranma but by that point he had leaped away. The man had just a moment to wonder how the hell the northern man had been standing on him like that without pressing down on him, when a foot slammed into his head, ending his questions forever.

With the crew of the first Dragonstone ship broken, more and more men broke off from fighting them, turning to help their beleaguered fellows. Ranma saw this, and he laughed wildly. "Form up on me! Push the shadow lovers into the sea!" Admittedly he had no idea where the Shadow Warriors had come from, but despite that it made for a good rallying cry.

The men responded, twenty men of the crew forging toward him, using his position as a fulcrum to create a new battle line and begin to push the men of the second naval galley backwards across the deck of the Fish's scales. The crew of the first ship were so badly demoralized by this point even more men turned from defending against them, and suddenly the whole battle turned. The defenders could tell too, and responded with a roar of their own. "The Mander! Manderly for the Wolf!"

With the Shadow Warriors nowhere in sight, Aurane embroiled in his one on one contest with Brynden, and having seen Ranma at work already the men of Aurane's ship began to pull back. They weren't as demoralized as the first ship's crew just yet, but it was getting there quickly.

Elsewhere on the deck Brynden barked out a laugh, his blade once more locked with that of the captain of the attacking vessel. "Hah, my nephew's returned and you are fucked!" Thanks to his experience Brynden was able to feel the flow of battle around him and the renewed shouts of "Stark, Stark!" was a hint as to what was going on.

Aurane could feel it too, and began to back away, but Brynden wouldn't let him. He charged forward, his sword flitting in and out with suddenly renewed energy. Aurane had been on the attack most of their duel despite his inability to get in a killing blow, but now found himself backpedaling. He realized with a sinking sensation that Brynden had been holding back deliberately, knowing his endurance wasn't what it could be, and lulling Aurane into a false sense of superiority.

The Bastard of Driftmark couldn't deal with the sudden shift, and he found himself flatfooted, his strokes becoming wilder with every blow the two exchanged. Moments later, his sword was battered just too far to one side for Aurane to recover quickly enough. Brining his own sword back quickly, Brynden ran his opponent through his chest, sword plunging through the other man's chain mail to find his heart. He turned then, slashing his sword across the open face of another man's face, charging forward to join up with a Manderly man who had been pushed against the mast.

Behind him, Ranma and the other's continued their push, and the clumps of combat around Brynden began to resolve themselves as the attackers fell back trying desperately to link up. From the hatchway leading into the ship, the attacker's final doom approached.

OOOOOOO

Below in the hall of the ship Fenris raced down the small staircase, crashing into the side of a Shadow Warrior, biting through the back of it. The thing dissipated with a pained wail. The man it had been dueling with, the last armsmen who had been with Domeric, had been desperately trying to hold the doorway to the crew quarters. Now he nodded, at the wolf, leaning against the doorway and gasping in air, his arms nearly dead from blocking the Shadow Warrior's blows. Fenris grunted in some sort of reply before bounding on.

He spotted a Shadow Warrior several feet further down but before he could attack it the creature screamed and burned under the attack of two small fireballs hitting it from the direction it was facing. Around the bend of the hallway came Daenerys, stalking forward with Sunfyre and Rhaegon on her shoulders, the greatsword Ice in her hands, the tip of it dragging along the deck beneath her. Nodding at the direwolf, she smiled slightly, despite the pain from the cut on her forehead. "Hello Fenris, having fun?"

Fenris huffed in amusement, moving forward to nudge the shoulder of his bonded's alpha mate, even if they hadn't actually become so just yet. Silly two-legs, always so slow about the things that actually mattered. Courtship? Simply hunt down a deer, drag it back, eat it together, then mate, done.

Daenerys' arm trembled as she let one hand briefly leave Ice's hilt to rub the ears of the massive Direwolf, who was taller at the shoulders than she was. After a moment she sighed, once more placing both hands on Ice's hilt, dragging it along behind her as she continued her trek. "Come, we have a battle to finish."

The giant direwolf followed her willingly, as did the man who Fenris had saved. The trio emerged out onto the deck of the ship about a minute after Brynden had finished off Aurane.

The sight of the draklings and the return of the monstrous direwolf unmanned many of the remaining attackers, who began to turn and flee back onto their own vessel, hacking away at the ropes and trying desperately to push them out away. The men of House Manderly however fell on them from behind cutting them down mercilessly while Daenerys moved forward, Fenris at her side.

Leaping over a few clumps of still fighting men Ranma landed next to her and Daenerys, quickly handed his family blade over. "Take it, that thing is heavy!"

Ranma nodded wordlessly, taking the blade in one hand and lifting it quickly, charging into the battle. "Winter is coming! Push them into the sea men!"

Behind him Daenerys stood in place, Fenris guarding her as her eyes closed. Suddenly she flung her arms up into the air, and at her signal both draklings leapt into the air from her shoulders. She roared with them, feeling the wind under her/their wings, the exaltation of flight taking their conjoined minds for a moment. It was intoxicating and it nearly made her forget her purpose, but with the iron will that made Daenerys Stormborn who she was, she kept rigid control of both draklings even through their shared exultation, directing them into the attack.

While Ranma and his crew were beginning to wipe out the men who were still aboard the Fish's Scales, the two draklings attacked the rigging of the second vessel, the second one's mast already down. It being their first flight, the draklings couldn't sustain themselves in the air for long, but they were able to get into range, spit out their tiny fireballs at the tied down sail of the other vessel and return. By the time they landed only about two minutes had passed, but even so both draklings were drooping with exhaustion, and hunger began to dominate all the other feelings coming through Daenerys' link with them.

That was the final straw. Faced with the fire on their own ship and the renewed push by the defenders, the men of Aurane's ship broke utterly. They retreated entirely from the defense of their own bulwarks, turning their attention on trying to stop the flames now engulfing their sails and rigging.

Brynden looked around and shouted, "The ropes, cut the ropes, they've had enough."

Ranma took up the shout. "Leave off, the bastards are running now, let's get out of here before that fire can spread!"

The Manderly men set to with a will while the fog around them at last began to dissipate under the heat of the sun. While Ranma and a few others cut down the few remaining attackers on their ship, most of the others began to cut at the ropes tying the three ships together. A dozen men then grabbed up several long oars, pushing at both ships then began to row away from the two naval galleys.

Neither vessel's crew had the numbers or the will any longer to do anything to stop them. Soon enough the Fish's Scales was far enough away for the sail-master to take over, bellowing commands to unfurl the sail. This was a sign for the armymen all around to let loose a cheer at their success. It was ragged though, as the men looked around and realized how badly the victory had cost them.

For now Ranma ignored the dead lying everywhere, his eyes instead on Daenerys. He moved over to her reaching out gently to touch the cut on her forehead with the hand that wasn't holding Ice. She winced slightly as his fingers traced the wound gently. For just a moment she could feel something flow from Ranma into her, before she shook off the notion as silly. "You need to stop doing this." He said gently. "This whole charging into battle thing is going to get you killed one of these days."

"I'll agree to not take part in battles the moment it is no longer necessary, I promise." Daenerys replied dryly, leaning into his hand lightly now that it had moved from her cut to her cheek. The two of them stood there like that, taking comfort in one another before Brynden coughed getting their attention. Both young people sighed, then steeled themselves and got back to work.

OOOOOO

Even though the shadow assassins she had made were much more independent than any other she had conceived (literally before the jump in her power she attributed to R'hllor's growing favor) Melisandre still had a connection with them, tenuous though it was.

Melisandre was in her room, mediating naked as the day she was born in front of a small pillar of flame, sweat beading her magnificent body. The sailors hated the fact she had a seemingly uncontrolled fire in her room every night, but they were ignorant of the control R'hllor gave his faithful over his fires, so could be forgiven that.

In her meditation state Melisandre felt the deaths of her shadow warriors, some killed by the odd blue-gold fire, something she could sense was of the body but not, and others who had fallen to the fire of the young dragons controlled by their queen. As the last one died she came out of her trance and began to curse, rather inventively it must be said, in her native Asshai dialect.

Currently the ship was carrying her and Stannis to the Stormlands. At their back were fifty other naval galleys. They would make port in a few weeks' time at the nearest point along the shore of The Narrow Sea with Haystack Hall, the seat of House Errol. They controlled a third of the most fertile land of the Stormlands. With them allied to Stannis' cause, he would be able to feed his army in the field.

It would be a hard sell, since most of the Noble Houses of the Stormlands were happy with Renly's governance, even if the houses minor, landed knights and smallfolk were ambivalent about it at best. Still, if Renly had indeed retreated to the Reach rather than the Stormlands, it might allow Stannis to rally the Errols and others to his cause.

While twenty galleys had remained behind to guard Dragonstone (and spy on any naval movement in Blackwater Bay) a further ten had been assigned to head to Sharp Point then Stonedance in the Crownlands under Stannis' most capable captain, the Onion Knight, Davos Seaworth. The houses of those castles, Bar Emmon and Massey, historically had strong ties to Dragonstone, and Stannis had long cultivated those relationships. Both of them would probably rally to his cause quickly, which would give him a start on building an army.

At the moment Melisandre could not care less about that. What she cared about was that the Dragon Queen and the Wolf shaped man had escaped once more. While it would not matter in the short term she could feel, like a wind across her skin, that in the long term it could prove disastrous.

She scowled. "I should have gone myself, the wolf would not survive against the fires of R'hllor wielded first hand. I let myself be swayed by materialistic, worldly arguments rather than following the path R'hllor set for me. I will burn twenty heathens in recompense for now, but I must act against the Dragon Queen and her Wolf Lord the moment I can." With that Melisandre turned, grabbing up her silk dress before heading out to find the Azor Ahai to tell him the bad news.

OOOOOOO

The aftermath of the battle was pretty horrible. Along with Captain Woolfield, more than half of the ship's crew had died, and at least a quarter of the survivors were injured in some fashion. This left the bare minimum necessary to man the ship, but luckily the rigging and sails hadn't been damaged in the battle, Aurane having not been interested in sinking the vessel since his orders were to capture the Dragon Queen alive. Better, none of the actual sailors had died, having intelligently stayed put in the crew quarters until the battle was decided. The sail-master, who was the one actually in charge of most of the actual sailing, also knew their route, and could navigate them to White Harbor.

Myrcella, Alayaya and surprisingly Sansa got to work on the injured, using the tiny hold as an infirmary. Daenerys, despite her protests went first, and under Myrcella's direction she placed a small poultice on her head covering the cut there. Her eyes were still barely tracking however, and the little princess sent her to bed down with Fenris and the draklings, taking with her food for all three.

Myrcella's own wounds weren't serious, the gashes on her arm weren't deep though many of them had required stitching, which Alayaya had done as the battle wound down. With Myrcella instructing her Alayaya stitched up what wounds she could, and the princess's poultices helped others, and together the three girls saved several men who would otherwise have died without a ship's surgeon.

Despite their aid however, eight more men died through the day, loss of blood and the severity of their wounds carrying them off. That evening, Ranma stood by as the bodies of the dead, which had been laid out on the deck, were consigned two at a time to the ocean as the rest of the men watched.

Outside he looked grim and somber, but inside his thoughts were not on the men who had died, but those who had lived and what they had run into. He was worried about Merry, but she seemed to have grown up not just in body since he left King's Landing, but in heart and mind as well. The death of Tommy had hardened her heart to mere physical discomfort. Her work with the wounded was excellent, and he was happy to see that too. Daenerys as well had come through the battle as well as could be expected given her injury, and seemed quietly ecstatic that the draklings had breathed fire for the first time.

Sansa had not been hurt thankfully nor had Alayaya or Eddard, though his strength had been sapped once more, and his leg was definitely crippled, as well as his arm. His father's leg wasn't dead entirely, but he couldn't feel it, or bend it at all, the leg just refused those commands from his mind. Domeric had a concussion, and a broken forearm. Brynden had come through the battle with only a few nicks, the worst being a gash on the back of his off hand. Fenris too was nicked up, but nothing life threatening.

The majority of Ranma's thoughts however were not on his family or the girls, but on the Shadow Warriors, those strange creatures of smoke and shadow. They had caused at least a third of the crew's casualties, including captain Woolfield, despite the fact that Ranma and Fenris had occupied most of them. Without the two he was sure the enemy would have surely won the day even with the fire of the draklings.

By the old gods, where did they come from? I've never heard about anything like them before, not even in the tall tales I heard as child from Maester Luwin, and none of the books in Winterfell ever mentioned anything similar. Could they be an example of magic, I remember hearing about the city of Lys having a reputation for some kind of magic, but then, who created them? Who has Stannis allied himself with, and why? Is the man so ambitious that he would turn to any means to gain an advantage? And what's that mean for the war to come?

Looking down at his bruised arms and side, Ranma knew whatever the answers to most of those questions was, the answer for the last was 'nothing good'. For now however, he put that thought aside, turning to the sail-master who had taken over as captain for now. The sooner they left Blackwater Bay and got far away from Dragonstone the better.

OOOOOOO

At the same time that Ranma was dealing with the aftermath of the battle against Stannis's vessels, the news of the battle for King's Landing had begun to spread.

Thanks to the queen's 'largesse', Hoster Tully heard the news of what would be called The Battle of Two Truths and of his son a mere five days after the battle ended. The news that his son was languishing at the king's pleasure nearly gave him a heart attack. If it wasn't for the fact his maester had stayed after giving him the raven's message, he might well have died then and there.

Maester Vyman shook his head leaning back gratefully as he finished examining his lord. And friend too, he had after all served here since becoming a maester, and Hoster was the only lord he had known in that time. "My lord, you do not need me to badger you to tell you this but..."

"I know old friend, I am old, and I am dying." Hoster said the words somewhat philosophically. He had led a full life, and had been sick for over a year now, one could only see the end coming for so long before losing fear of it. "I had hoped to live to see Edmure return, having finally come into his own at last. But that is not to be. How long do you think?"

"At best... I would say another half a year, possibly less." Vyman said sadly.

"So little time left, and so much to put right." Hoster sighed sadly, looking down at the missive in his hands from Queen Cersei fucking Lannister, thinking about what he could do, and what he had to do. "I cannot in good conscience let my son being held captive force me to forget that I speak for all of the Riverlands, not just Riverrun. Yet I cannot bring myself to act in such a way that would endanger him."

He leaned back against the pillows of his bed closing his eyes, thinking. Hoster recalled the talk he had a little over two months back with Lord Mallister about what might be coming, and knew they had both been badly understating the storm that was coming.

After a moment he opened his eyes and looked at Vyman. "Gather up writing material old friend, I have several messages I wish to send off. To House Piper, both branches of House Vance, Seagard, House Whent and House Ryger."

Vyman's eyes went up at the list of houses, all counted among the most powerful noble houses in the Riverlands for one reason or another, be it land, men under their command, or the position of their castles, like House Whent, which in other ways was the weakest listed. "Not the Freys my lord?"

"No, I do not trust Old Walder further than I could walk these days." Vyman laughed at the weak joke, since Hoster had been unable to walk for months. He smirked suddenly, though there was no humor in it. "Also prepare one to Winterfell. I wish to send a message to my daughter."

OOOOOO

Nor was Hoster the only one to be contemplating the outcome of the battle in King's Landing. Thanks to Cersei having sent off a message as soon as the battle ended, her father received the news almost as quickly as his fellow Lord Paramount despite the greater distance between Casterly rock and King's Landing in comparison to the distance to Riverrun.

Tywin frowned down at the raven carried missive in his hand, thinking hard. Cersei has done as well as she could given the Stark's power grab. Hah, for all their vaunted honor, the Starks are as ambitious as any other family. Making a grab for the crown once the heir who they had the most influence over is dead, I wonder how they would have kept it after? Or did Stannis and Eddard have some agreement between them? Or Renly perhaps, though that doesn't make as much sense. This idea of Littlefinger that Cersei and Pycelle mentions is interesting, but I can't see any truth in it. Yet it will do for now, though I wonder how the Starks would have justified removing Joffrey from his position.

For all his intelligence and insight, it never occurred to Tywin that the Starks were simply following the dictates of their own sense of honor when removing Joffrey. Nor would he even consider the blandishments upon Cersei and her children that Renly and Stannis spread as more than the two justifying their actions. This was a combination of two things. First he was projecting his own ways of thinking onto the Starks, believing Eddard's honor a front, it would never even occurred to him he was telling the truth about Joffrey's heritage, which neatly tied into his second reason for dismissing it. He simply didn't care if it was true or not, all he cared about was his family's influence that was all.

The news of Tommen's death however means there is another player in this game. Varys perhaps, or his mysterious backer? He is the one I would assume would truly be connected to the Targaryen siblings, though I won't order

Cersei to try and come up with another reason behind the Starks actions. Or is it someone else entirely, Eddard was right about one thing, from all accounts the Sand Snake Tyene had ample opportunity but no motive to kill Tommen.

Someone worried about Stark influence? But that implies they are not worried about our own. Perhaps they think they can influence or predict our actions, where they could not do so with the Starks? That is worrying, yet until evidence comes up to point at who was really behind young Tommen's death, there is little I can do, save prepare for open war, both against the Baratheon brothers and House Stark, but against everyone else.

With that thought Tywin summoned a servant to prepare messengers to send out, as well as to call Casterly Keep's measter. He had a goodly number of messages to send. Tywin Lannister, Lord Paramount of the Westerlands, was calling his banners to war.

Once they received his messages, the minor houses that looked directly to his house for lordship and the city of Lannisport gathered their forces at the Rock, along with the men of his own house. Within a fortnight, he was marching with a force of twelve thousand pulled from his family's lands, the city and those of the minor houses around them.

Tywin left his brother Kevan, who was grief-stricken at the death of his son Lancel in the battle in King's Landing, behind to rule from Casterly Keep with four hundred men of his house as a garrison. He left orders for the family's navy to be brought out of dock and placed on a wartime footing and the Lannisport city watch strengthened.

The ships would be manned from conscripts from the city, but would be kept in a defensive stance for now while they were trained up. After that though, Tywin wanted them ready for operations against his enemies in the Reach or Riverlands, or even the Iron Islands, who Tywin fully expected to see this chaos as an opportunity to revolt again.

The city watch in contrast was comprised of volunteers. These men were better trained, led and equipped than the gold cloaks, and would be strengthened further while Tywin rode to reinforce King's Landing.

OOOOOO

Thoros of Myr was a red priest of R'hllor, though he wasn't a fanatic like Melisandre by any means, nor had ever exhibited the powers she showed, assuming they were a sign of the favor of R'hllor. Really he was more known as one of the king's drinking buddies than a religious man, as well as a fairly good warrior. Still, though he would possibly have counted himself as an atheist more than anything else these days, some of his beliefs were still the same now as they had always been, and he hated rapists or child murderers. Which was why, several days after the events in King's Landing had begun to spread, his eyes were boring into the man across from him in the command conference.

Amory Lorch was a fat, choleric knight who had been Gregor Clegane's companion when they scaled the walls of the Red Keep and slaughtered the Targaryen royal family. He had also taken full part in the sack and rapine of the Red Keep. And like Clegane he had not been charged afterward. Unlike Gregor though, Lorch had the presence of mind to stay well away from King's landing so had not been present for the tourney where Gregor had met his end. But he had been chosen to lead the Westerlands portion of the anti-bandit force, which might have been a subtle warning by Tywin that the man was under his protection.

The man had brought 400 and then with him, adding half again to the forces Thoros and Lord Dondarrion could command against the wily bandits. But that didn't change the fact that Sir Thoros despised him with every fiber of his being. In his mind this man was just as complicit as the Mountain That Rode (and oh was it pleasant to mentally change that to the past tense) in the rape and murder of that horrible day.

He and his force had already been here, searching for the bandits on the Westerlands side of the border. There were several long crags and a few tiny trails that led to the other side of fortresses like the Golden Tooth and others, which guarded the only large scale entrances between the Riverlands into the Westerlands. The back trails and mountain passes couldn't allow a large force through them, but the bandits seemed to be managing very well by filtering smaller groups in or out one at a time, and Lorch and his men seemed a little ragged around the edges. But they had been able to confirm the bandits had not crossed back into the Westerlands, and had put smaller blocking forces in place to keep them trying to cross over again without battle.

It had taken them several days to even find the bandits, despite the size of the bandit's forces. They had been able to get to the border between the Riverlands and the Westerlands relatively quickly thanks to having brought along extra horses for every man even their infantry, so it had only taken them three weeks to get here. But it took six days since arriving on the border, their scouts slogging through the mountains and woodlands to find the bandits, who had retreated from the more populous areas for now into the mountain range but not across them.

"All right, we've finally found these bastards. I want no fancy tactics or strategy, simply encircle the camp and wipe them out." Lord Dondarrion, the overall leader of this mission stated.

The bandits had occupied the burned-out village they first sacked and had even repaired it to a certain degree. Beric wondered why the hell they had bothered creating a permanent base like this at all as it only gave their pursuers a target. Yet he wasn't about to look a gift horse in the mouth. Besides, bandits weren't exactly known for thinking ahead. This group probably figured thanks to their recent round of successes that they were unbeatable. He said so aloud, then added grimly, "let us disabuse them of this notion." All the commanders nodded grimly at that.

The following day the battle began at dawn. As soon as there was light to see by the archers, about a hundred all told, considering there haven't been that many in the city to begin with, began to pepper the hold with arrows. In response the bandits rushed out en-mass. Waiting with the cavalry Thoros was surprised to see how many of them there were, he wouldn't have thought they'd be able to put that many people into that small a holdfast.

He smirked however as they crossed the distance they had cut out of the surrounding woodlands and the burned-out houses. "Sound the charge!" At his command two-hundred mounted knights and their retainers broke cover, lances couched as they charged the force of bandits. Their job was simple, break the bandits charging line of infantry, then let the infantry in.

The bandits however surprised Thoros, quickly breaking off their charge and retreating into the burned-out ruins around their fortress, which hampered his cavalry's ability to get at them. He scowled, pulling up his horse and wheeling away.

From where he was standing with the infantry Lord Dondarrion scowled. "Bring up the infantry. We're going to have to go in and dig those bastards out."

Nearby Thoros slid off his horse, grimacing as his stomach flattened against the horse's side. I'll have to go on some kind of diet or something he thought to himself irritably. Getting too fat for this. Yet despite his weight the red priest moved lightly on his feet after the infantry catching up with Lord Dondarrion w easily. "House to house fighting in a burned-out village." Lord Dondarrion said shaking his head as Thoros joined him. "This will not be pleasant."

"It's a small village." Thoros replied. "Won't be as bad as you think lad, there're too many of us, we can simply attack them from all sides as we wanted."

The bandits hadn't even bothered retreating to their Fort, simply making a makeshift shield wall within the burned-out rubble of what must've been a prosperous inn of some kind before the bandits' initial arrival, nearly as large as the small holdfast itself. With the rubble of that and the holdfast guarding their flank and back they were able to concentrate their forces on two sides, and force his men to come to them only from those directions.

Arrows began to hit the attackers from the holdfast and Beric cursed. These bandits were fighting far better than he expected, far more organized. "Bring up the archers!" he shouted

At his side Thoros frowned looking around in the mass of infantry as they surged forward despite the arrows falling among them. There didn't seem to be as many infantry as there should be, and Thoros began to feel uneasy.

Moments later he found out why. The runner Dondarrion had sent to the archers arrived back gasping looking over his shoulder in shock. "Lord Dondarrion, the Westerlanders, they..."

A sudden shout from behind him came, and the Westerlanders roared in from behind cutting into the Rverlanders and King's men.

Thoros didn't have time to wonder why the Westerlanders had suddenly turned on them. He suddenly knew that the archers were all dead, cut down from behind by those that should've been their allies. None of them had even worn more than simple leather armor, in hand-to-hand they wouldn't have stood a chance against the armsmen from Westerlands, all of whom were kitted out in chain mail wielding heavy weapons.

"Betrayal!" Thoros shouted, "Form up on me!" That was as far as Thoros could get before the battle reached his position at the back of their infantry line.

He slashed his sword forward quickly, slicing into one man's face, sending him down with a scream as his eye and nose were slashed open by the blow. The next instant he ran his sword through a second man's chest, piercing his chain mail before his shield took a blow from a spear that was coming for him from his right side.

Rage filled Thoros, rage at this treachery. Lord Lannister was obviously playing his games. He realized what this had been, a trap set for someone, possibly one of the Starks, possibly even the king himself. Whatever it was it was barefaced treason, and he would not let it slide.

A sudden throbbing sensation filled him as his rage peaked, coursing from his soul to the hand that held his sword, the same sword he had used for years for the alchemists fire trick that had stood him in good stead in many a tournament. "R'hllor curse your black souls, I hope you burn!"

Suddenly the throbbing throughout his body intensified, flowing out of his hand into his blade. Thoros' sword burst into life without him having to coat it with alchemist's fire and instead of green this flame was bright red and white. It was blazing with so much heat that the metal should have begun to melt, but the blade itself seemed to be immune to its own aura.

Men stumbled back from him and Thoros roared as he charged to meet them. The flames of his blade were hotter and brighter than ever, slicing through his enemies' swords or even plate armor, sending five men to their deaths in the next few moments.

The overall battle however was turning quickly against the forces loyal to the king. The Westerlanders had simply planned things too well. Not only had they hid half of their force from the king's loyal men, always sending out their own scouts in that direction so that none of the others even realized they were there, but that half of their force was cavalry. While Thoros led his fierce rally, these knights had decimated the loyalists, sending only a few survivors reeling through the wood lands around the main battle. Once that had been done, they turned to finish the job, riding around the edge of the burned out village and killing any loyalist that tried to break away from the ruins.

Yet with Thoros in the lead and the fear his blazing sword generated in their opponents his men were able to break out of the trap for now, sending the Westerlander infantry falling back in disarray. But the bandits pressed them hard as they retreated from the ruins of the village in a controlled wedge. Thoros and his sword could only be in one place at once, and the victorious Westerlander cavalry hammered his other flank hard. Dondarrion's barked orders and his own example forced the men to hold and they continued on, unhorsing several dozen knights but at ruinous cost.

Dondarrion knew a moment of despair as he saw in front of him the Westerlander infantry Thoros had first spooked remerge from the trees. They took position at the edge of the clearing of the village, while the bandits and the cavalry closed in, each of them spreading to envelope his forces as he had hoped to do to the so-called bandits. Now he could see among them several men wearing the colors of the Bloody Mummies, a mercenary band known to be made up of murderers, thieves and rapists from all over Essos and Westeros.

Still he rallied his men, trying to make for the trees. With Thoros and his still burning sword warding away the cavalry on their flank the embattled force was able to reach the edge of the area, though they lost men of their men fighting their way across the open area around the former village. For some reason the ten men from Winterfell that Lord Stark had added to their force were fighting harder than any of the others, pushing towards the outer edge of the forest in a concentrated group.

At the back of the force Thoros knew that none of them would get away from this unless the pursuit could be drawn off somehow. He looked over several dozen men's heads toward Lord Dondarrion who was making his way through the melee towards him with two others guarding his back and flank. These two and several others closed in around both leaders, allowing them a moment of respite despite the mercenaries and traitors closing in once more.

"None of us are going to get out of this!" the younger man said grimly, shaking his head and wiping away some of the blood that had accumulated from a gash over one eye. Beric had been reckoned a handsome knight back in King's Landing, but even this brief brush with real battle had changed him, adding dark lines to his face.

"Some of us can!" Thoros replied nodding over to Jaryd Waterman, the leader of the Winterfell men. All of them were still on their feet, despite killing at least three times their number so far in traitors and mercenaries, but you could see that they were edging towards weariness now. "Take as many men as you can and get out of here." Thoros went on bluntly. "I'll hold these bastards off."

Lord Dondarrion's eyes widened and he made to grab Thoros by the shoulder, but the red priest shook his head and pushed the younger man away. "I've lived a full life already lad, you've got yours yet to live, and a fiancé to look forward to seeing. Besides, this is something only I can do." The red priest, who had long since devoted himself more to the wine bottle than his god, said.

He was saying this while looking down at his flaming sword, before looking up and around determinately, his lips forming a snarl. "R'hllor will burn you to ash!" With that bellow Thoros charged toward where the cavalry were about to strike the right side of their force once more.

"Baratheon!" He shouted. "For the king! Burn in the fires you faithless scum!" With that he raised his sword in both hands. With an effort of will the fat red priest somehow grabbed the burning power of his god he felt coursing through his body and channeling it further into his blade. The pillar of fire lengthened from the edge of the blade first becoming as large as a pike, then as large as six men, and wider besides.

He slashed the fire blade down in front of him, slicing over a dozen men in its path into pieces. The sight of this and their natural fear of fire caused the horses of the incoming cavalry to shriek with terror. They bolted turning away from the battle despite whatever their owners could do.

Thoros turned his mystic blade to the side slicing right and left, cutting or immolating another two dozen men as the remainder of the loyalist force ran off behind him. Arrows were still following around them, and the 'bandits' were still attacking from one end and the infantry from the other. But Thoros turned, slicing down several infantrymen before turning his attention to the mercenaries, his eyes becoming glazed over as the power that had been filling him started to wane.

He caught himself as he stumbled however, seeing Amory Lorch trying to rally his cavalry to charge around him. "LORCH! Come to the flame, child killer!" Thoros roared, barreling forward with sudden energy, unmindful of the arrow that slammed into his shoulder. He cut five other men down before Lorch turned in fear, finally realizing his peril. His fat face blanched, and he tried to turn away, tried to pull his horse around. But terrified of the oncoming apparition it bucked, throwing him to the ground before bolting away.

Lorch raised his sword desperately trying to parry, but even as the flaming blade began to splutter, the power Thoros had been using dissipating, it was still powerful enough for this. The flaming blade went through Lorch's sword as if it wasn't there, then went on to cut deep into his shoulder cleaving the fat man in a diagonal slash, armor and all. "Die traitor!"

As Lorch fell with a last despairing gurgle, Thoros turned at bay only to gasp in agony as someone slammed a spear into his back. He lurched forward, but desperately kept his feet. Thoros frantically raised his once again normal sword to block an incoming, but he had little strength left, and it was knocked from his grasp. The spear wielder pulled the shaft of it out of the red priest's back, causing even more damage. Thoros gasped, feeling all his remaining strength leaving him. He fell to his knees, barely even able to look up as a Westerlander brought his sword down. Thus Thoros of Myr, red priest of R'hllor, a man who everyone in court had seen as a drunk but who had proven himself a true priest of his god on this blood soaked battlefield, died.

OOOOOO

Thoros' self-immolating stand had given Lord Dondarrion and the others enough time to rally their men, bursting through the thin Westerlander line at the edge of the trees before rushing on, running through the trees. They ran and kept on running as far as they could, many even discarding their armor in order to run faster, trying to get away from the pursuers that would no doubt become.

After several hours Lord Dondarrion saw a spot up higher in the mountain side, a sort of shelf of rock about twice as tall as a man, continuing as far to either side as he could see. "Rally up there!" He shouted, pushing his way forwards and climbing up the sheer rock face.

It was tough going, especially for the exhausted and demoralized troops, but they eventually made it. Beric did not let them rest, sending a dozen men all around to discover if there was an easier way up than the one they had come. There wasn't, this little cliff continued until it shrank at both ends merging with the rest of the mountain face. With that confirmed, the Stormlands lord allowed his men to rest.

He went around, ignoring his own wounds, numerous but small, and his exhaustion. None of the heavily injured had been able to run away, and he sighed sadly. He only had about a hundred and fifteen men here, possibly a hundred and eighteen considering that three of the scouts had yet to return. He looked up as a shout came, and smiled on pleasure.

Coming towards them through the woods, looking somewhat better than the rest of his men were Anguy of the Dornish Marches and three scouts, each of them lugging a dead deer. Anguy had been one of the surprise volunteers to join the force assembled in King's Landing, but he had proven his worth as an archer and scout. Beric had thought him dead with the rest of the archer force, but evidently he had switched over to scouting just in time to avoid that fate, though right now the game he and his fellows brought with them were much more welcome.

Beric looked over at his squire, young Edric Dayne, his squire. The boy had stayed at his side throughout the battle, and even had slain one or two men in doing so. Now that the adrenaline was leaving him he seemed almost ready to go into shock at either the betrayal or as a normal reaction after a battle. Beric's voice however snapped him out of it for now. "Get out flint and tinder lad. Let's get some food in us while we think of what to do next."

Jaryd had recovered by this time, and he went around as well checking on his own men first than the others. He came back shaking his head. "We've got about sixty five men able to fight here, and of them only my own men still have armor, about twenty others retain their weapons. Well I shouldn't say that." The Northerner shrugged his shoulders. "We have seven archers with us, all of them still retain their bows, and the scouts still have their short swords and javelins or small bows, but all of the other men are either injured, without armor, or both. The rest though don't have anything save for a dagger here and there."

Lord Dondarrion nodded, looking around at them thoughtfully. The venison was cooking under young Eddic's watchful gaze, and you could see the men eager for the sup, the promise of good food heartening them all, but they were still looking shocky. A battle lost could do that to any warrior especially one like that, even without adding in Thoros' amazing abilities. Beric realized he would have to think about those later. Certainly the red priest had never shown anything like that before, but right now it was unimportant. "We need to think about what to do now." He said looking around at them all.

One of the Crownlands lords spat to one side. "Survive." he said bluntly. "Those Seven-damned Mummies won't be interested in us, they've done their work. This was a trap." He said simply, looking around at them all.

Lord Davit Wendwater was the Lord of a very minor house, whose holdings were south of King's Landing along the river of the same name on the outer edge of the Kingswood. He spent most of his time at King's Landing because his younger brother was a much better land manager than he was. This way Davit kept out of his brother's hair, his brother got to look after their family interests, and Davit was able to have fun.

Despite his shortcomings as a land owner Davit was politically astute man, one who never took sides in any conflict if he could help it. He had been known as one of Robert's drinking partners and had decided to come on this trip to make certain his martial skills hadn't rusted.

He now shared his opinion on what had happened. "Someone's decided to take the game of politics to the next level, and considering how we were betrayed and who was leading them, it has to be Lord Lannister. That fat coward Lorch wouldn't have dreamed of doing this without someone higher up giving him the orders. I'd bet that this was meant to draw out some of the Stark men or their supporters, hell it could have been meant for young Ranna considering how long it would have taken to set up."

"Agreed," said Lord Dondarrion sighing sadly. "That means that something might have gone on back in King's Landing as well. Lord Lannister may be a traitorous bastard, but he's an intelligent one. This was probably just one arrow in his quiver."

"That doesn't matter to us here and now." Davit replied shaking his head scowling angrily through his wide bushy mustache. "For my part I would not have it be said we just gave up the fight."

"Look at us!" said another man, this time a Riverlander scout they had met near the border, a Whent man. Beric recognized him as one of the scouts that they had met upon reaching the border. "There's less than a hundred and fifty of us, and we're not well armed, or even in good condition." He looked askance at the Winterfell men, who were indeed all still armed and seemed to be recovering from the run through the woods better than the others. "Well some of us aren't anyway."

The winter fell men all shrugged their shoulders and he went on. "What are we going to do?"

"We were sent out here to fight the Bloody Mummies even if they were simply posing as bandits, I suggest that's what we do. We fall back for now, find some way to get ourselves some more weapons. Makeshift spears and the like aren't that difficult to make." Beric replied, smiling faintly, remembering many a time had to do the same on hunting expeditions when he was younger. "We can harass them, attack their supply lines, and create small ambushes and traps. Do what we can to protect the small folk in the area from their predations."

"So we will act like bandits to fight bandits? That's fine, but I demand we have a name. All the good bandit groups in history have had names." Jaryd said laughing lightly. For his part, he knew he couldn't get back to King's Landing in time to do any good, so he might as well do what he could to make the Lannisters uncomfortable.

Beric Dondarrion laughed looking at them all. "We are a ragtag bunch, all of us coming from nearly every land in Westeros. Borders no longer matter to us, and we are united in purpose against House Lannister are we not, like brothers should be?"

For a moment the men around him looked at one another, then one by one all one hundred and twenty of them nodded.

Beric smiled, nodding back. "Very well then, I name us the Brothers Without Borders."

OOOOOOO

Vargo Hoat, leader of the Brave Companions smirked, looking down at the body of the man who had been supposed to start giving him orders after this. Despite the red priest's astonishing power, the battle had been a resounding success. His own force had only lost about ninety men all told, though the Westerlanders had been hammered worse, and their cavalry had been unhorsed entirely. It would be a special miracle if any of the horses came back.

Well, it was a resounding success from Vargo's perspective. He knew though that none of the Stark men had died and he certainly hadn't seen the house's banner. So it looked as if Lord Lannister's plan had failed to draw out their real target. But the battle itself had been executed as well as could be expected even with the red priest's fantastical magic, and Vargo could see no reason why the fact their prey wasn't here would reflect on him.

After a moment's contemplation Vargo smiled evilly. He knew orders would be coming soon, the Golden Tooth was not that far away from here after all, and he had already sent a runner back to tell them the good news. Until orders came however, he was going to act as he saw fit. After all, his actual mission was over, and Lord Lannister wouldn't begrudge him or his men some more fun, would he? "Bring out the map." he said grinning evilly. "I think we should try to hit..."

OOOOOOO

Ranma stood by Brynden, the both of them leaning against the mast, watching a few of the armsmen accompany Domeric on some pipes as the bard led them through a lively dancing tune. Daenerys, Myrcella and Alayaya were dancing around one another and with some of the men. Many of the other armsmen were laughing and joking with all three, and Ranma smiled at the sight.

Normally the idea of highborn noble girls acting in such a manner with simple armsmen would have terrified or appalled Southern Lords and ladies, but this was a special circumstance. And there was no chance of any of the men trying anything with the girls, not under the watchful eyes of their fellow men, Lord Stark who sat nearby in a chair brought out for him, or Ranma himself.

But it was also a sign of something that amused Ranma when he realized it. These men respected him, and their own Lord and Ranma's father as their Lord Paramount, there was no doubt about that. But in the two and a half weeks since leaving Blackwater Bay behind them they had come to love Sansa, Daenerys and Myrcella.

Even with the knowledge of her questionable birth becoming a common secret as it were, Myrcella had befriended them all with her kind, gentle manner, her friendship with the Starks, and more importantly her work as the ship's healer. Many men here who might have died after the battle against the Dragonstone men were still alive because of her medical knowledge and Alayaya's steady stitching. She wasn't a maester, she didn't save all or even half of those injured, but Myrcella did the best she could with the tools and knowledge she had, which was enough for the men if not for her. The guilt she very visibly felt about her shortcomings had also helped the men come to love the little 'Baratheon' princess.

The men of House Manderly of course had already been prepared to love Sansa, so that wasn't nearly as surprising. The little gifts that she had shared and designed for Lord and small folk alike for years at Winterfell had made certain that the men knew 'the lady' behind the scarfs. Alayaya too was no surprise given her aiding Merry in her healer role. There'd been a few problems when her past profession had come to light, but Brynden and Ranma had dealt with them swiftly. Her dry, earthy sense of humor and her willingness to flirt back with anyone who approached her in the right manner was also a hit, even if she didn't let the game go too far.

Daenerys on the other hand... She was charismatic on a level that was simply astonishing. She had a caring manner toward her friends matched with an implacable fury towards her enemies, and a fierce courage as fiery as the flames her dragons had begun to routinely practice since the fight against the Shadow Warriors, both of which she had shown in that battle. Her intelligence was also easy to see, everyone could see that regardless of what the actual conversation was about. No one had said the word in Ranma's presence, but it was clear to everyone aboard that Daenerys was a queen in the making.

There was also something primal about her at times, a fact she shared with Ranma. They were both extremely honest and straightforward, and at times acted somewhat like the animals they were bonded with. Daenerys was playful and fiery like her dragons with her friends, and at times that carried over into... other things. To say their flirting leaned heavily towards the physical rather than the verbal was an understatement.

Ranma couldn't take his eyes off her now as Daenerys spun around, dancing with Alayaya arm in arm in some kind of jig or other from Essos. Her silver hair flashed in the torches set here and there around the deck. Her leather jerkin and leggings, which were not exactly clinging to her, still somehow set her body on display at least for Ranma, and Daenerys' violet eyes were snapping with delight while she danced. After a final twirl she turned and saw him watching her sending him a small, yet somehow sultry smile that set his blood to racing.

"I'm happy for you." Sansa said, moving up beside him and sipping at a cup of water. Luckily the ship's stores had been fully stocked before leaving King's Landing, so there was no need to ration anything.

Beside her Fenris moved, Sunfyre and Rhaegon by his side. They had grown some since they had hatched, and now when they walked the two came up to Sansa's knee, and were slightly longer than they were tall. They got along with Sansa and Merry so long as Daenerys was nearby and would even let the two young girls touch them. For some odd reason they wouldn't let Alayaya touch them though, a fact that would have cost her a finger without Daenerys there to warn her.

Ranma turns to his sister to see Sansa smiling up at him, her lips quirked into an impish smirk. "Happy for what sister?"

"For you and Daenerys. She's an excellent match for you in temperament, though I don't think mother will be pleased. She had her heart set on a dynastic marriage between you and House Tyrell, but in my opinion she's far better than that bitch Margaery."

Ranma laughed, pulling her into a one armed hug. "I think that might be the first time I've ever heard you curse, can I ask what brought that about?"

"And may I ask you what your own opinion on Margaery is?" Daenerys said, stepping up to join them picking up a small cup of water and thanking the crewman who had brought them out. The man smiled a gap toothed smile back at her. Behind them the dancing stopped, though the music kept going, as Domic began to tell a story.

Daenerys wasn't paying attention to that just now. Her eyes were on Ranma's face one eyebrow quirked in query. She had subtly asked that question before but Ranma had never actually answered it.

To her faint surprise however Ranma now simply waved his hand airily. "nothing beyond friendship occurred between me and Margaery. We spent about two months getting to know one another in King's Landing, but because she was also ordered to make a play for Joffrey, I never took the courtship seriously, and she realized it too, and decided to stop trying to flirt with me, instead becoming a friend."

"I see," Daenerys said thoughtfully one eyebrow still raised and Ranma took her hand quickly. He shook his head wordlessly telling her she didn't need to worry, and the spark of something of what could have been jealousy disappeared from her eyes as she squeezed his hand. She was already beginning to be irritated by how Myrcella looked at her Ranma, she certainly didn't want to know there was another highborn lady out there who might have designs on him.

Nearby, Eddard laughed quietly but with feeling. Looking at Daenerys and Ranma was like looking at a switched, distorted image of some sort of when Rhaegar and Lyanna met one another. Looking back it was obvious to him that both of them were besotted with one another on their few meetings, despite Rhaegar already having been married to Elia Martell, and Lyanna being betrothed to Robert Baratheon.

That thought brought a frown to his face however as he wondered if the time had come to share some truths about that, and about Jon Snow's origins. He decided after a moment that no, the time had not yet come to say those secrets out loud. Jon deserved to hear it first after all. But Eddard vowed he would tell Jon about it the moment they got home.

He was jolted out of his thoughts when Sansa sat down on the deck next to his chair, looking up her brother. "Well I for one would like to hear one of your stories Ranma, rather than the ones Domic is sharing, those are all old bards' tales, yours are much more interesting. I would hear something new, something real. What about that story that you told Arya about your trip up to the Wall?"

Perhaps it was the convivial atmosphere or perhaps it was because of the thoughts Ned had previously been thinking, but he spoke up now, drawing all the youngsters' attention to him along with Brynden. "If you wish a true story Sansa, I have one. It is one that started the friendship between House Stark and House Reed, though I'm afraid it only has romance on the periphery of it."

Sansa shrugged unconcerned of that, while Myrcella and Alayaya joined them, leaving the crew to their own devices. Ned smiled at the newcomers, then began his tale. Regardless of what began after that day, it was still a shining memory in many ways, when he gained a friend, when the world was still simple, before all the smiles died. "I remember it like yesterday. My sister and I had journeyed down with several dozen other men and women from Winterfell to a Tourney being held at Harrenhal by lord Whent. Others of the North came as well, most particularly Lord Reed, though he was not Lord at the time. As you know crannogmen are seemingly deformed, and this caused problems for Howland with many of the southern lords and knights. Well, Lyanna was not one to..."

Over the next hour Ned's simple yet heartfelt words drew them all in. That tale was followed by others from Ranma, and even Sansa as the wolves continued to welcome the dragon, the former whore and the possible stag/possible lioness into the pack.

Later that night, Daenerys and the other girls retired to their room, though Sansa remained behind for a moment to speak to her father and Ranma. They were going to compose a message to send from White Harbor to tell their family more about what had been going on most particularly Catelyn, informing her of what had happened to Sansa, and Petyr's part in it. To that end they wanted to talk with her to get her impression of the man, and what might be really driving him. They were in no rush, they were still a few days away from rounding the Paps into the Bite, but they wanted Sansa to be thinking about it for a bit.

This allowed Daenerys to broach the subject with Myrcella that she had wanted to speak to her about for several days now. As soon as the door closed behind them she turned to Merry and said "So tell me little lion, what are your feelings towards Ranma?"

Myrcella blushed slightly, but stared up at Daenerys defiantly. "I would ask you to remember I am still legally a Baratheon until it is proven otherwise, Lady Targaryen. And I think you know the answer to that question all too well." she smirked. "Why? Are you jealous, or worried?"

In response Daenerys simply laughed lightly, though her violet eyes glinted dangerously. "Neither, my position is secure, yours, as you pointed out, is quite up in the air isn't it? Though for reasons beyond your control, of course."

Myrcella flinched a little at that. Everyone aboard ship knew that her heritage was in deep suspicion, indeed it was almost certain that she was not a Baratheon or and therefore not a trueborn, despite Ranma's willingness to wait until it was conclusively proven. She still refused to believe that however, both for herself and for Tommen though that was simple pride and hope. Once Stannis and Renly spread their version of her mother's perfidy, Myrcella would no longer be able to protect Tommy's memory.

Still she fired back. "My position might not be secure, but I've known Ranma longer than you have. And regardless of whether or not my father's heritage is within me, my mother's certainly is, which connects me to one of the most powerful families in Westeros. You on the other hand only have your dragons to offer. A formidable force to be sure, but only on the battlefield, not in terms of money, prestige, politics or alliances. You might be ahead of me now, but don't get too comfortable, because I have no doubt I can get Lady Catelyn on my side." She wasn't certain of that, but wasn't about to back down either.

"I don't suppose." Alayaya said from where she had begun to undress for bed, cutting through the tension quickly (and deliberately). "That I should mention that I have a bit of a crush on Ranma too? It was rather easy to fall for him and his Rock Hurler persona, so mysterious so interesting, so masculine even through that invisibility technique of his."

Both Myrcella and Daenerys turned to glare at the Summer Island woman. She smirked a little at their expressions, then shook her head. "Of course I know now nothing can come from that, but a girl can dream. I think however that you two should stop this rivalry of yours before it actually begins. Ranma cares for both of you, he even cares for me in a way. You'll only put him in an untenable position if you keep arguing, keep trying to make him choose between you. Eventually you'll force him to choose sides, and whichever person wins he'll resent for forcing him to do that."

Daenerys frowned then nodded thoughtfully while Myrcella scowled for a moment before nodding in turn. With that Alayaya looked directly at Daenerys. "Daenerys, you have to realize that Ranma does feelings for Myrcella. They might be sisterly, I think they are actually, certainly he's never done anything to show anything otherwise."

Unnoticed by the other two Merry flushed a little, remembering the time the day after Sansa's rescue when she had hugged Ranma and could feel him reacting to her body pressed against his.

She didn't say anything though while Alayaya continued. "You might eventually need to meet this Dacey woman that he's mentioned having had a relationship with, you'll have to simply acknowledge it and realize it's no longer a factor. Your place is secure, so long as you don't grind it into Myrcella's or Dacey's faces."

With that she turned to Myrcella. "Myrcella," she said softly. "I hate to say this, but even if were a natural born Lannister, even if the Citadel gets back and says that yes there have been a few girls born with golden hair from previous Lannister/Baratheon marriage, you and Ranma marrying formally would never happen. Not with how he and the rest of the North will view House Lannister after word of what occurred gets out."

Daenerys knew that was putting it lightly considering their long term plans, which she and Ranma had discussed at length. What their policy going forward boiled down to was this: house Lannister had been built on treachery from the first, they were proud of the fact that they had tricked the previous owners of the Casterly Rock out of their wealth. They were a family of traitors, ruthlessness and cold ambition. In the Westeros that Ranma and Daenerys were prepared to build in the coming years such things in a house of power could not be borne. To that end the war would only end with the complete destruction of the Lannisters. Whether that meant all of its members would die, be sent to the Wall or otherwise dealt with was still up in the air and they only had some specific plans in mind for a few of them, but that was the long term goal.

Outwardly Daenerys merely nodded thoughtfully not knowing how Merry would react to that idea, then sighed turning to face the younger girl directly. "I'll apologize for what I said, I'm not..." she paused waving her hands as if she was trying to conjure the words from thin air. "I'm not used to this, I've never fallen for a man before. I've never even considered that love would be a major factor in my marriage, considering my brother's and my dire straits for so long. I knew I would have to have a dynastic marriage, it's just come as a shock to me how much... how much I have come to... to care for Ranma in so short a time. My jealousy got the better of me, and I apologize."

Myrcella looked up at the taller, though only just, Daenerys, then nodded. "That was well said, and I accept your apology. I, I'll try to stop flirting with him I suppose. I don't seem to have much of a knack for it since he certainly hasn't noticed, and though I hate to admit it Alayaya is right."

(Actually Ranma had noticed, it made uncomfortable and like in King's Landing he really how to deal with it. SO Ranma had fallen back on his old life's standby defensive response to anything female related: Ignore it and hope it goes away.)

Myrcella sighed sadly, remembering a few fond memories of her mother and wondering what would happen to her. Would she die somehow during the war, during a sack of the red keep or something? Things like that happened after all, and far worse she knew. Or if the Stark's faction won, would Cersei be exiled to some motherhouse or other, with naught but the clothes on her back? Myrcella couldn't say that the woman didn't deserve it, she certainly did if even the little bit about Joffrey alone being illegitimate was true, let alone herself and Tommy. But it was a harsh thing to think about your own mother.

"It's just..." she said shyly, returning to the current discussion. "It's just he's so, so..."

"Magnificent?" Daenerys supplied, laughing quietly and then reaching out to pull younger girl into a hug. "I know, trust me he swept me off my feet too. Rather literally actually, I don't think I've ever shared the story of how Ranma and I first met did I?"

From there on all three of the girls shared how they had first met Ranma. Sansa came just as Alayaya began her story, which caused Daenerys and Myrcella to laugh at the way Ranma had rescued her and the other girl from the corrupt gold cloaks. Sansa told them a few stories in turn, and the night ended on a high note.

Though as she fell asleep in her makeshift hammock Daenerys realized that Myrcella hadn't said she would be trying to give up her crush on Ranma, only that she would no longer act on it. After a moment she shrugged her shoulders in the dark, while the two draklings flew up from their bed beneath her join her in the hammock. For some reason they enjoyed the rocking motion. If she hasn't, well there's nothing I can do there, and every girl is allowed to dream. With that complacent thought, Daenerys put her arms on the sides of her two little ones, and began to fall asleep, still wondering what the future would bring them all.

OOOOOO

Jon finished reading the short message that had been passed on by Lord Manderly aloud, then looked around at Lady Catelyn, his siblings, master Luwin and Rodrick Cassel. He set it down gently, then spoke in a calm somber tone. "And so we finally have confirmation of treason in the south by the Lannisters, though the full extent of our losses isn't clear in this."

Luwin nodded, speaking his small piece before anyone else could. "Lord Manderly also said he had imprisoned his maester, who is a Lannister by birth. Lord Manderly intends to keep him under house arrest until this war is settled. He'll be kept in comfort, but isolation."

Jon nodded, wondering if that was what was in store for Tyrion. What else his brother could be planning for the little lion he had no clue.

Arya's reaction caught his attention then, and he watched as she slammed her fist down on the table, growling like their totem. Or like her own Nymeria, who seemingly had sensed her distress and was now prowling around the room. "How can you be so calm! All this says is that our family was betrayed! It doesn't say anything about their condition only that they're 'coming home'. Sansa and father could be dead for all we know!"

"I think not, else the message would have tried to warn of it in some fashion. Have some trust in Ranma, I have no doubt all three are alive." Jon said coolly, his tone a sharp contrast to his sister's.

It was only when one looked at Ghost however that they saw Jon's true feelings on the matter at hand. The normally calm, quiet direwolf was growling audibly, his eyes flickering, his teeth bared as if he was about to pounce on someone, for all his body was still otherwise.

Jon's ability to read between the lines of his brother's writing was better than anyone else's, and he could tell that there was a lot that had gone on in King's Landing, most of it bad. For instance Ranma would have mentioned at least a few of the guards by name, those whose families lived in Winterfell. He would've wanted to reassure them. And the fact that it came from Ranma's hand, yet signed Lord Stark, was telling. Ranma's handwriting was distinctive, far blockier than their father's more flowing style. That he didn't mention any of the guards probably meant that they were all dead. Whether or not that meant that just those guards were dead or all, Jon didn't know, but feared.

The rest of the message however, he didn't know what to make of. 'The Stormborn', did that mean he had brought back the Targaryen siblings? Their father had mentioned that in his last message, but why then did the message only mention the girl? And what was the extent of the Lannister treachery? Jon didn't know the answer to those questions, but he was looking forward to finding out.

To Jon's left Catelyn sat at the head of the table, reading the message silently for herself, her face a rictus of fury. Thankfully the babe was elsewhere with his wet nurse, else the face Catelyn was showing would've frightened him deeply. "So it was the Lannisters as I feared." She said coldly. "I wonder how far back their treason goes. And what exactly that treason is, besides Joffrey being illegitimate. I'll note that we haven't received anything from King's Landing, which probably means that whatever it is, they know we will not believe them, and that they are no doubt preparing for war against us."

She leaned back tapping the message with one finger as she tried womanfully to gain control of herself. That Ranma said all of the wolves were coming home was a delight to her, meaning that her husband, Ranma himself, and her daughter were all safe, Jon was right about that. Though possibly not whole since Ranma didn't actually mention their physical well-being, and the fact he wrote the message rather than her husband was telling. That was worrisome, but as long as they were alive she was happy. She was also concerned about what the part about 'Stormborn' meant, and feared given the task Ranma had been sent on she could tell all too easily.

There would be time enough however to worry about that later. For now Catelyn turned her attention to a well-worn topic. "I still think that Bran's near-death experience had something to do with the Lannisters. Perhaps you saw was the queen and her lover, my son?"

Bran, who was sitting next to Arya across from Maester Luwin, shrugged his shoulders. His mother asked him some variant of that question once a week or so, to see if his memory had come back. But it hadn't come back, nor had the feeling in his left foot. All he could still remember from that event was the words 'the things I do for love'. Still he didn't say anything right now.

Jon shrugged. "Personally I think that's rather far-fetched, I believe that incident was precisely what we thought initially, one of the Kingsguard with the queen's maid. Would Cersei truly have been so arrogant as to carry on with her lover in Winterfell, a castle of another Lord Paramount? I wonder though if all of her children are illegitimate. It says here that Joffrey is, but doesn't hint at the other two."

Catelyn waved that off. "We know that my husband and Ranma both had come to care for 'Tommy', and Myrcella is but a little girl." Though perhaps a young woman by this point. "You know your brother would not wish to denigrate the memory of someone he cared for, nor Myrcella if he started to see her as a surrogate sister as the messages from King's Landing said." She still had every one of those messages and kept them in a small wooden box in her room. The whole family read each one again and again in the intervening months between messages.

Arya however scowled, then determinately shook her bad humor off. In the last message that Ranma had written part of he had hinted at the fact that he would much rather see Tommen marry Arya rather than Sansa marry Joffrey. It had been done in a joking manner but it'd still riled her up.

Easily able to discern what Arya was thinking Catelyn smirked at her daughter's constipated expression, shaking her head. "That would've actually been a good match I think. I think you would've been happy with him Arya, though I doubt you would have been happy as queen if he had been named heir over Joffrey."

"I have no doubts about that at all." Arya muttered shaking her head, the accompanying shiver a show of what Arya thought of that idea. She looked over at Jon then back to her mother. "So what are we going to do?"

Catelyn frowned looking over at Rodrick, whose face was set in stone. They both knew the same thing that Jon had realized; if Ranma hadn't mentioned the guardsmen that probably meant they were dead. "I can summon the Lords in my husband's name, though only a few would be able to get here before Ranma and his party arrive if they need to bring their hosts."

"I don't think we should ask them to do so, tell them to call their armsmen up, but we can't afford to send all our remaining forces south, not with what's been going on at the Wall. The force we send will be something we will need to discuss with the lords when they arrive." Jon allowed a small smile to appear on his face, looking over at Bran. "But it will be easier at least for some of them to get here than I bet even Ranma realizes. And it will be easier to armor them here as well."

At that Catelyn smiled proudly at her younger son. Bran flushed under their gazes, and even more when Arya slapped him on the back, but it was a fact that Bran's ingenuity had made a massive impact on two projects that in turn had impacted life in Winterfell, possibly for good.

The ongoing projects to prepare the White Knife to make the river a transportation hub had continued apace over the last few months, with every House whose land it crossed pitching in as well as they could. At this point barges could use large stretches of the river not only on its nearest approaches to Winterfell but even further north to its origin in Long Lake. The entire stretch from White Harbor north until the river forked where one half continued into the wolfswood moving past castle Cerwyn, and the other travelling further north to the Long lake, its nearest point within four days cart travel of Winterfell, was useable for barges. There were still stretches of rapids and of course dozens of small waterfalls, but many of them were marked and had winches in place to help barges up or down them.

This already had a massive effect on their ability to ship goods, most particularly in conjunction with another of Bran's creations, fed by Hathan's discovery on his new holding's land. His holding was near the edge of Stark lands, right on the White knife, and his find had made the small Shieldarm holdfast a very important one. Iron was always in heavy demand, especially in times like these, and an easy to work vein such as his find was an amazing find. But it was Bran's ingenuity that made that iron worth even more.

Even here in the main keep's hall you could hear the bellow of the furnace outside that Bran had helped design and the clamor of blacksmiths as they worked the steel coming out of it. In another universe the furnace that Bran had created would be called a double puddling furnace. There it was one of the first ways found to create large amounts of iron or smaller amounts of steel, and here it served the same purpose.

Bran had been very interested in the work Jon, Ranma and Mikken had put into creating Arya's sword. He had talked to the blacksmith about the process to create a blade, how steel wasn't a single ore, something found naturally in nature, and what other ores had to be added to produce good sword steel, what on Earth would be called carbon steel, and the difference between that and the steel that made the best armor. They both had several things in common, the need for coal to be added to add carbon to the steel, and for the iron of the steel to be heated in a continuous manner.

With the help of the original Bran the Builder's notes, Bran had come up with the design for a massive furnace that could, with the right ingredients, create true steel in huge amounts with far less in terms of manpower. Now besides Mikken there were two dozen blacksmiths and their apprentices working with it to create armor, swords, arrow heads, and pike and lance heads.

Iron, coke and coal flowed into Winterfell down the White Knife or from elsewhere on Stark lands, and weapons and shipments of raw steel flowed further down the White Knife to White Harbor. But the main work was being done here in Winterfell. The same hot springs that kept Winterfell warm gave them both steam to use to power the air pumped through the furnace, and the water used to cool the steel being worked by the blacksmiths.

Needless to say this was a major force multiplier, in its own way just as important as Ranma, Eddard and Jon's pushing the teamwork training of the armsmen. Many of the houses minor in the North, and even one or two of the noble houses, still armed their armsmen with bronze or iron weapons. And even the Starks and more powerful houses couldn't armor the majority of their armsmen in more than hardened leather. Thanks to Bran, given enough time they could arm and armor every armsmen in the North

Rodrick joined the discussion for the first time, his voice gruffer than normal, preparing for the grief to come. "I would recommend that each of the northern Lords only bring about two hundred or so for the more powerful noble houses. That is enough for them to have representation, but not enough so they would be hindered on the road. Lord Stark can ask for more men to be sent when he arrives"

"House Glover should be informed and send a representative but not a portion of their forces." Jon said, nodding at Rodrick.

He and Catelyn shared a look, and both of them nodded minutely. Neither of them trusted the Ironborn further than they could throw Winterfell. The fact that Lord Stark had trusted them to honor their agreement thanks to Theon being a hostage was an example of him believing that other people were as honorable as he was. He never understood that such an idea was laughable.

Theon himself had proven trustworthy even to Jon as one of the wolfsworn, but the rest of the Ironborn? No, they were vultures, and would take the opportunity of all this chaos to strike at where they could. The North could not afford to appear to be an easy target for them, which meant House Glover, House Flint of Flint's Finger, and to a lesser extent House Ryswell would need to keep their strength at home.

"Very well, let's go with that for now." Catelyn said decisively already preparing going through the messages to be sent off. Hornwood, Cerwyn, Glover and Dustin are close enough that horse sent messengers would be able to reach them, carrying, letting the ravens be used for the more distant noble houses, and Catelyn would personally pen the message for Lord Cerwyn that evening. Being the closest Lord he would be able to get here the fastest, and would be able to call his men up faster for this and other reasons

She frowned as a sudden thought occurred to her. "The two Reed siblings are still here, they should have returned long ago but I think we need to send them home now. I'll send a message with them for their father. We'll want the Neck as prepared as possible ready for an invasion."

Jon nodded. "Only a fool or someone who really doesn't know anything about Westeros would try to assault Moat Cailin, but it is best to be prepared. We should also send word to the mountain clans, I feel certain their chiefs should be a part of this war council."

"Good." Catelyn nodded, carefully not noting Bran's look of relief at not having Jojen around any longer. "Arya, if you could go and get my writing implements, I'll need them in a moment. Measter Luwin, I would like to speak to you and the majordomo to make certain our supplies have enough reserve for a large amount of guests." Rodrick, Luwin and the others all nodded and correctly realizing this was a dismissal stood up bowing to Lady Stark before exiting the room.

As the doors closed behind them, Jon looked over at Arya who still looked miffed at the idea of her friend being sent off. She hadn't cared much for Jojen, but Meera was fun. It was always nice to have another tomboy around as Ranma had sometimes called her. "Arya, I'll want you to step up your training. I have no idea what Ranma will want to do with you personally when he arrives, but I think we both know it'll be something that will make our mother irritable."

Arya grinned at that nodding eagerly. Indeed, Jon had thoughts of his own about Arya, but it would have to wait until more of the wolfsworn were gathered to do anything about them. One thing was certain though, given her general attitude Arya would never allow herself to remain behind if Jon and Ranma went to war. It was something they would have to plan for.

With that Arya scampered off to do her mother's bidding and get her writing tools while Jon walked on, until he found a murder hole overlooking the training area and the Keep's square. Below him there were hundreds of men practicing, men armed with long pikes and shields, working in formation along with a few men with swords and others with bows and arrows. Everywhere organization and working together was being drilled into these men, and at the sight Jon smirked proudly. We've been preparing for this for months. We're ready, let the southerners play their foolish games, let the Lannisters make their power grab and the other houses war with one another. Whatever else happens, we are ready. The North will rise!

OOOOOO

Later that evening Meera and Jojen Reed were led into Catelyn's rooms by a servant. Catelyn was sitting at a small desk, writing up a missive for the Lords Umber and Karstark, both of whom needed special yet very different handling. She looked up with a smile at them both, though it did not match the grim look in her eyes. "Please, have a seat."

Over the next few minutes Catelyn explained what was going on and then said simply. "Because of this, I'm sending you home. You should be with your family in this dangerous time, and you can carry a message for your father for me. We'll also be sending a hundred archers with you, to help reinforce Moat Cailin."

Both of the Reeds stiffened at that. Meera looked at Jojen for a moment her head cocked to one side. Catelyn noticed the look, but didn't care to figure out what was going on there.

In point of fact she really didn't understand why the two of them had stayed in Winterfell for so long. Whenever she had brought it up before one or the other would always put it off by saying their father wanted them to bond with the Stark siblings. But this was really no reason for them to have stayed so long. And while Meera had made herself a place here as a hunter and a friend for Arya, the same could not be said of Jojen.

She had heard rumors of the servants having overheard odd conversations almost arguments between Bran and Jojen. The boy was certainly strange, and unlike his sibling hadn't volunteered to work on anything, or even try to fit in. Catelyn had seen the boy following Bran around at times. The look in Jojen's eye when he saw Catelyn's babe a time or two had been distinctly odd as well, almost as if he was seeing something he did not believe, a very odd look indeed.

For a moment Jojen merely stared ahead, not at Catelyn but over her shoulder, then he seemed to sag slightly, before shaking his head. "The builder has won, the wolves are coming home when only one should have, and a dragon is coming as well. Nothing is clear anymore, my sight is blinded."

With that simple statement he turned and left without even asking leave to go. Catelyn's eyebrows rose at this snub as well as the mention of a dragon since she hadn't mentioned the Stormborn mentioned in the letter. She looked over at Meera with her eyes narrowed. Meera shrugged her shoulders and tried to apologize for her sibling though she did not mention the fact that he had visions, something she knew most would not believe. Without that Jojen did seem to simply be an odd young boy.

The two siblings left the next day with the archer for Moat Cailin. Bran stood watching them go from a window, a sense of relief feeling him as he watched Jojen ride off. He sighed to himself shaking his head. Whatever else I might become, my place is here with my family now. Whatever it actually is, the three eyed crow will just have to wait.

OOOOOO

Margaery stood with her family as she watched Lord Renly Baratheon be led into the hall by her brother Loras. The two of them had ridden from King's Landing to Bitterbridge, killing several horse each, before taking to a boat there down the Mander to Highgarden. From Bitterbridge Renly had sent out messengers and ravens into the Stormlands, and they were already getting reports of the lords nearest the Stormlands borders rallying their troops at castle Fawnton. From there it was presumed they would join forces with the Reach's army, an assumption Margaery, for entirely personal reasons, wished was false, but knew alas to be true since Olenna had already decided what House Tyrell would do:

Flashback:

"Hah, Cersei's let her arrogance show, offering her son's hand without any other concessions. She doesn't seem to realize how tenuous her position is." Olenna scoffed, tossing down the raven carried message from the crown. "So, according to her, the Starks tried to make a grab for the throne as soon as Robert was dead, either as part of a plot with House Targaryen or for their own gain. What say you to that daughter?"

"I would say that it is a very neat lie, since it can't be disproven. I also note that the message doesn't say what happened to Lord Stark, or if Ranma has returned." Margaery said, frowning heavily. Of course if Ranma had, I doubt Cersei would be in any position to write such a message at all.

Margaery sighed sadly, trying to work things out in her mind, and coming up with a theory. They had learned of Tommen's death several weeks back, and she felt that might be the catalyst for this. "I think the king's death and Tommen's were interconnected. I think Lord Stark and the king had decided to name Tommen the heir over Joffrey.

Certainly the king was closer to him than either of the other children. So someone, possibly fearing the Stark's influence over the boy, had him murdered."

"You've said so before daughter and why you think Tyene Sand wasn't the one behind it, get to the point." Mace growled.

Margaery sighed. She had liked the young boy, even felt he had the makings of a decent king, and grieved his death. But her family was uncaring of that save Loras, who probably felt as she did. "I was getting to it father. I think that Eddard and Ranma later concluded that Joffrey was unsuitable. I've passed on some of the rumors about him, so maybe one of them had some basis in fact. Whatever the case, this became known to either the queen herself or other Lannister supporters, and they, in an effort to keep their chosen heir on the throne... took steps."

"Hmmpf, from all accounts Cersei has never been one to let anyone slight her. That sounds plausible." Olenna replied. "And so it became open conflict, with the northern wolves running away with their collective tails between their legs! There's no fool so foolish as an honorable one!"

Willas spoke up from where he was grooming one of his massive hunting hounds. The beast, a gravid bitch, stood docilely as he worked over her coat. "The North will march, such an affront to the honor of their Lord Paramount is something they will never condone."

"Bah, Eddard's no doubt dead or crippled in the fighting, that's the only explanation for his forces to retreat like that, and the Stark boy as well." Margaery scowled at that, but her grandmother rapped her hard on the knuckles. "Enough of that daughter, regardless of your own feelings on the matter, there's no doubt he died somewhere on this wild dragon chase. Without either Stark or his oldest boy the North lacks a rallying force. The Stark bastard certainly won't be able to."

Margaery wasn't certain of that, not after hearing how Ranma and even Sansa talked about Jon Snow. Nor was she sanguine about Olenna's belief in Ranma's possible death, but there at least Margaery knew she was too close to him to make an objective analysis.

Before she could speak however, though what she would have said Margaery didn't know, Willas replied, his voice still calm and thoughtful. "Brynden Tully is a survivor, and for any of the Stark men to escape someone must have led them in a retreat, which I understand is a most difficult task. Even if Eddard is dead, and we have no evidence of that, Brynden could stand as his niece's general to avenge him and her son."

Mace shook his head. "The North's population is too small to matter and too spread out, especially embroiled as they are on the Wall. Where is Renly and Loras in all this though?"

That question was answered several days later by another raven arriving from Bitterbridge. When it arrived, bringing with it both the real reason behind the conflict and Renly's assumption of the throne, Olenna had laughed, looking over at Margaery while Mace and Willas were still working through the ramifications of it. "I see we'll be putting a crown on your head sooner than I thought my dear!"

Flashback end

With that, Margaery's fate had been sealed. In exchange for their agreeing to help Renly secure the throne against the Lannisters, he was to wed Margaery binding House Tyrell to the royal family by blood, along with several concessions in trade laws and other areas. It was a good plan, it made a world of sense for both parties, and Margaery loathed it.

The thing was that while she and Ranma had not been in love, he had certainly been growing on her, and she had a few... tawdry dreams about their marriage after so many days spent watching Ranma practice with Tommen. Love no, not yet, but respect, friendship and a healthy smattering of lust, yes. She also knew Renly's preferences, and that any marriage to him would never bear fruit. Unless she invited Loras into bed with them, or got Renly drunk enough to overlook the fact she was a woman.

Margaery also realized when she looked at Renly Baratheon, resplendent in the finest clothing he could buy for this event, that she had indeed spent too much time around the Northerners. When she looked at his magnificent clothing and courtly bearing, she didn't see the perfect image of a noble lord. Instead she saw someone who had decided that taking the time to primp himself and prepare clothing was more important than getting down to the business of planning what looked to becoming a full scale war. What she saw was a man who had decided to run rather than take a chance, to do the honorable thing and stay and fight.

This new attitude even colored Margaery's opinion of her brother. She knew Loras was an excellent swordsman and all around knight but instead of standing up against the Queen's treason with Lord Stark, he had followed Renly's command and ran away.

None of this showed on Margaery's face however. She moved through the prepared panoply of the welcoming ceremony and the formal betrothal with the ease of long practice with such formal pageants. It was only when they were taking one of the prescribed, 'getting to know you' walks around the grounds of High Garden that she let her emotions out.

The two of them were followed by Loras and one of Margaery's maids as chaperone. Normally Nyesteria would have been there as well, but she had been called down into the city to aid in a difficult birth. Yet even if she had been there, Margaery probably would still have said what she did.

Margaery's voice came out as coldly contemptuous as she could make it. "So, Loras, Lord Baratheon, I have to ask, how does it feel to know you ran out on your allies? That you betrayed their trust to save your own skins?"

Behind them Loras flinched at his sister's tone and at her words. To be honest he had wondered the same thing after they had fled the city, but in the end had decided his love of Renly mattered more than aiding Lord Stark, whatever the upside. It still bothered him however.

Renly on the other hand took Margaery's words with aplomb, smiling faintly at her controlled outburst. "While I would not say I was friends with Lord Stark, he was an ally, and it was not a simple decision to leave him behind. But it was a decision I had to make. The numbers in the city were simply against us, milady. Oh I do not doubt that your brother, my men and his would have sold themselves dear, but that is all they would have been able to do. It would have simply been throwing good coins after bad, so to speak."

"And what about honor or loyalty, are those just words to you?" Margaery asked, looking at him with a small sneer on her beautiful face.

"Certainly they are not, but my duty is to my people, to the throne that Cersei has despoiled with her treason. I cannot meet my obligations to those if I died with the Starks." Renly replied, still calm, almost amused at Margaery's assault. "I think that your closeness to Ranma Stark is clouding your judgment lady, the father was not the warrior the son was. Make no mistake, if we had stayed, the outcome would not have changed."

"And do you think those excuses will matter to the Starks? I wonder what Ranma will think when he returns."

"If he returns lady." Renly said, though he was frowning now.

"When he returns." Margaery replied, with no doubt in her voice. "The man who slaughtered the Mountain like he was a babe-in-arms will not die easily, either by treachery or main force. And when he does, both you and my family now will pay a price for your actions."

"Perhaps it is as you say milady. For my part I will worry about Ranma returning when we see evidence of that return, and as for his family and the rest of the Northerners." Renly shrugged. "They would be fools indeed to come south past the defenses of Moat Cailin. Now, I believe we are expected back soon."

With that he took her hand, and led Margaery back into the castle. Margaery didn't resist, she had said her piece and she was powerless to change what was going to happen soon. Luckily she would have a few months to get used to the idea of marrying Renly, since it had been decided that their marriage would happen at Bitterbridge once the full combined army was assembled.

Maybe by that point Renly will have discovered he can actually perform with a woman after all. She thought harshly, not letting her feelings show on her face with the ease of long practice.

Nearby Willas pushed himself away from a shadowed tree in the garden with a frown. He hadn't decided yet what he felt about Renly, oh, he liked him well enough, but was he really king material? There seemed to be a softness to him, an eagerness to talk, but not to do. If Renly had the military aptitude that Robert had been famed for he might have already struck at King's Landing with the Stormlands forces on the border between them and the Crownlands. Instead he was building up a large enough army to simply crush any other army that got in their way. The safe bet rather than the quick yet risky one.

Willas was not like his grandmother, he understood there was more than politics or family influence in the world. Nor was he like his father, Loras or even Garlan in that he knew knights and the cavalry charge were not the only things that mattered in war. Willas was slow, methodical, and reserved. He didn't know if Renly would prove himself however, so he would keep his own council for now.

What the Tyrell heir did know were animals. He was known as one of the best breeders and trainers of animals in all Westeros. His horses were highly prized both for their beauty as well as their intelligence and strength. His hunting dogs and even hawks were also highly prized, both for their strength and their durability.

Because of that he knew something about wolves. He had studied them, and had even painstakingly, with many fits and starts, added a strain from a wolf pack to his hounds to add to their sense of hearing and endurance. They were survivors, dangerous and much more intelligent in their own way than humans gave them credit for. A united pack was something to be feared by even giant mountain bears, and they were able to live through wounds that would kill a hound of equal weight, something he had not been able to breed into his own dogs.

So Willas added those observations to the absolute certainty in Margaery's stance, along with the knowledge of what Ranma had done to the Mountain and how good Eddard had proved as a general in Robert's Rebellion. With all that combined, Willas was worried that maybe his family was underestimating House Stark. In which case, winning our way back into their good graces in some fashion might be necessary...

OOOOOOO

Daenerys shivered, standing near the front of the boat with Ranma's arms around her waist leaning back against his warm chest. A single fur coat covered both of them, with only her head appearing out of it given the difference in their height. "I've never been cold before." She said, shaking her head, her hair rustling against his shirt, silk despite the colder air. Ranma didn't seem to care about weather, another thing she had added to the list of things that made him so unusual. "At least not like this, I've been cold at night, yes. That occurred many times when my brother and I were wandering Essos. But not like this, not so bone-chillingly freezing like this. I hope that it doesn't bother my little ones."

While others were moving their armies or otherwise preparing for the coming war, the Fish's Scales had been sailing for a little over a month since leaving King's Landing. Now the Paps were well behind them and they were into the Bite, which Daenerys felt was very aptly named considering she felt the wind was trying to bite her face off. The sail master said they had another ten days or so of good conditions before they were within sight of White Harbor.

"I think they've found a way to beat the cold milady." Ranma chuckled looking over to where the two draklings were buried under Fenris. Daenerys had kept them inside the ship since it had started to become cold out, but today they had forced her to let them out for some flying exercise. Daenerys had walked them through about twenty minutes of flying practice, directing them up to the crow's nest (cleared of the lookout for now) and back down twice. But evidently the cold didn't agree with them. After finishing the second flight they had immediately tried to burrow under Fenris, something they could still do despite their growth. Now only their snouts were visible from underneath his bulk to the direwolf's great amusement.

Fenris on the other hand had been ecstatic at the change in weather. The cold felt good, and it also meant that they would be coming to the end of this interminable journey. While not exactly claustrophobic Fenris was a direwolf after all, used to having room to roam and hadn't been able to hunt for nearly three months now.

"My little sister hasn't seems to have missed it either." Ranma said hugging Daenerys even tighter around the waist as his head to rest his chin on her hair, breathing in the mix of the cold biting air and whatever it was she put in her hair. How Alayaya had come up with any sort of soap for any of the girls he didn't know, let alone what she had done to make them all smell different. Such things were a mystery best left unsolved. Daenerys smelled of fruits he couldn't name, a hint of ash and burning, and something else some smell that was totally her. "What about you, are you cold? We can go below if you want."

The Targaryen princess smiled, leaning back against Ranma's chest as they watched the wake of the ship staring out over the Bite. In the distance Daenerys could see several large bits of ice floating along. There weren't many, but there would be more the further north they went. "As long as I have you here to keep me warm your highness, the cold will never bother me."

Ranma winced at her word choice, which she had chosen with malice aforethought. The two of them had talked about their overall plans for the future, but they couldn't make very detailed ones at this point, not for most of it anyway. In the long term they had a plan for the war, and Daenerys would cheerfully allow Ranma to control the whole overall campaign, but a plan for their own long term goals besides that? Daenerys had made no bones about what she wanted, but Ranma had avoided saying anything along those lines.

Now he sighed, pulling back enough so she could turn around and face him while still remaining covered in the coat.

"I would be much happier to simply be Lord Paramount of the North and remain in Winterfell if I could."

"I know that my poor, humble man." Daenerys laughed quietly, nuzzling into his chest for a moment before taking his invitation, turning around in the cloak's environs. It didn't look the most dignified way to have a discussion, but it would do for the two of them. "And I think that actually speaks better of you. But we still must take it. The alternatives are far poorer, not just for the North or for your family, but for all of Westeros. Stannis has proven himself an enemy of your house and of me personally at the very least, and those shadow fiends do not speak well of whatever allies he has been able to procure."

"And Renly and House Tyrell have proven themselves to not have enough backbone, and the others are even worse." Ranma said, shaking his head as they began to reiterate previous conversations. They had talked of the other noble houses, and Viserys, fearing what could be happening with her brother and with the Princess of Dorne. What those two would do was up in the air, but it would probably not be good for the rest of Westeros. Arianne had not, to put it mildly, impressed Ranma with her moral character or her understanding of what war was really like, so the idea of her acting as a stopper on Viserys' ambition was unlikely.

So yes, Ranma would probably be forced to try for the throne himself with Daenerys at his side, particularly with the Lannisters being in many ways the strongest of their opponents, and the ones who had started the war. Regardless of what else happened, the Lannister name would only be mentioned in the history books after the war. Ranma meant to break their power forever, one way or the other.

"Have I mentioned lately how amazing you are?" Ranma murmured, seemingly going off topic. "That plan you thought up for Tyrion, that's just a magnificent example of killing two birds with one arrow."

"Really, it seemed a natural progression to me given what you told me about the Imp. As well as what he is supposed to be doing on the Wall." She frowned shaking her head. "The Night's Watch must change, and this will be a wedge to do that. We need to solidify that front permanently, especially given what else is coming from that direction."

With a sudden move, Daenerys grabbed the end of the coat, pulling it off Ranma and stepping away with it now wrapped only around her own body with a laugh. "And you, Ranma Stark have tried to dodge the issue for the last time." After a second she shook her head, shivering slightly, but wanting to make a point here. She went on more seriously, her violet eyes locked on Ranma's ocean blue ones. "We both know the choice you will make, but I would have you say the words."

"I know." He sighed then shook his head, then decided to shock Daenerys in turn. "The iron throne is dead." He said blandly looking at her face closely. Daenerys's eyes widened, but then narrowed in thought. Seeing her not react as negatively as he had feared (or hoped at the moment) Ranma went on. "Your family may have created it as a symbol of unity, but you created it through conquest, through blood and fire. Your family retained control of it through similar the power of your dragons and your armies, and Robert took it using that same coin. You can never wash the Iron Throne clean of it, we'll need to start entirely over."

Daenerys smiled at the 'we' bit there and nodded thoughtfully. "Some new symbol of unity, rather than relying on the old one, which has come to be a symbol of brute force, with no real power beyond 'to the mighty go the spoils?' Yes, that makes sense."

Ranma nodded, grateful that she had agreed. He already had some ideas in that area, ways to unite and bring together the noble houses, based off the idea of the wolfsworn written large, and he suspected Daenerys had some ideas as to a proper symbol.

Moving forward, Daenerys sighed as she covered them both with the coat once more, relieved when she felt the heat or Ranma's body against her clothing through his silk shirt and her leather jerkin. "I know that it is a difficult thing to contemplate, but, when we join together formally, it will signal to everyone our intentions, and you need to be ready for it."

Ranma chuckled at her word choice there,. "I understand, and while i would not wish to be king, i will take burden." then he gasped smacking his forehead in affected shock. "But you know, we're forgetting something, something about that whole formal thing. A certain step we seem to not actually done yet." Daenerys looked up at him quizzically, and he pulled back slightly to look into her eyes, his voice becoming husky and deep. "Daenerys Targaryen, Avy jorrâelan. Ao ynoma dīnilūks?" What he had said in high Valyrian was 'I love you. Will you marry me?'

Ranma had decided he wanted to formally propose to Daenerys, something he had always felt was extremely romantic, and which was not part of normal courtship in this time and age. So he had gone to Domic and his father, and practiced a few words thinking that saying it in high Valyrian would have greater impact.

Which they had. Daenerys' eyes widened at the flowing Valyrian words, and they began to tear up as the meaning of those words hit her. For a moment she just stood there, still leaning against him, then she nearly shouted her response. "Kessa avy dīnilūks, Avy jorrāelan Ranma Stark!"

She leaped up lightly, her arms going around his neck as her lips sought his. At first both of them wanted to keep the kiss chaste, since they were not yet married and there were certain conventions that had to be followed.

However the moment their lips touched, and Ranma's arms went around her, their passion erupted. Ranma growled into the kiss, his lips opening, tongue tapping at Daenerys' lips, demanding entry.

Daenerys responded by growling in response, her sound more draconic, slightly more of a thrumming sound than a rumble, but just as primal. Her own mouth opened, and their tongues began to fight furiously, moving from one mouth to another. Her hands tightened on the back of his neck, drawing Ranma down, further into the kiss, while his hands moved down her back to grip her tight rear.

Thankfully for propriety's sake, they were not alone. This declaration of love, though occurring in an unknown tongue the body language was easy to read, had been witnessed by several of the armsmen aboard the ship, and Myrcella as well. She had come out to get a breath of fresh air, and seen the two of them. Sansa and Alayaya were more than happy to sit in their room around the brazier and try to forget they were going north into more cold, but Myrcella had fond memories of her time in the North, and the cold was making her remember them. They were bittersweet now with Tommy's death, but still precious, and she had come up to enjoy them alone.

Surprisingly Merry didn't feel much jealousy at the show the two lovebirds were unknowingly putting on. The chemistry between the two was obvious to see, and it wasn't like Ranma had distanced himself from her either. She knew deep down that she wasn't mature enough in body yet to interest him, but it was clear he respected her mind, he wasn't just acting that way because he saw her as a sister, but as a dear friend. It was amazing how empowering his respect was really.

Worse, she had come to like the Targaryen princess too. Oh, she still wished she was in Daenerys' place, but she wasn't egotistical enough to think she could take her place. Besides, the match between them made good sense, and she knew Alayaya had been right all those days ago, she and Ranma could never marry. Of course, a wicked part of her brain said, that doesn't rule out... more unusual unions, does it?

Myrcella ignored that little voice for now, it would just get her into trouble otherwise, and she had two people to embarrass the Mother out of right now. "Congratulations!" She shouted in a loud voice, startling the two almost-lovers apart. "It's about time you two made it official!" Her voice seemed to open the floodgates and all the nearby sailors, even the ones up the rigging at present joined in congratulating the duo.

The two tried to spring apart, but were hampered by still sharing the fur coat, and nearly fell to the ground as they tried to put some distance from one another as the crew and Merry laughed at them.

The fun was interrupted by a call from the lookout up on his perch in the crow's nest. "Sail Ho! Small sail off the port bow aft!" that made all the sailors nervous, since they hadn't yet reached the shipping normally used shipping lanes, the sail master having tried to cut off as much of the Bite as possible, cutting his course closer first to the Pebble then eventually to the Three Sisters than most were willing to do. And if it had been a caravel or a galley, the lookout wouldn't have specified small sail.

"At's a smugglers sloop," the Sail master, an older grizzled man covered with tattoos said, spitting to one side. "Probably out of the Three Sisters. I'd thought they'd let us alone since were flying the flag of house Manderly. The last time they tried to rid one of my lord's vessels we sent back the heads of all those involved, and threatened to burn out their ports."

Ranma frowned angrily. "I wonder if someone sent word to them about us. This seems too much for it to be random." The Sail master nodded, and the two remained there watching the sail until it got too dark out for them to see it.

For the next few days there was always a sloop shadowing them while the Fish's Scales sailed on, just barely within sight, but always there. It made the crew very nervous, they knew how understrength they were. Ranma took their mind away from it by drilling with all of them, both one at a time and in groups, as he had been doing for much of the voyage only much harder, running them into the ground. He'd decided to trust the sail master's prognosis, about the ship following them, or ships whatever the case may be, having come from the Three Sisters, which meant they would wait until the Fish's Scales came closer to those benighted islands before jumping them.

The moment that a small sliver of land was sighted, indicating that they were coming near one of the Sisters he stopped the practices. He then gave the men the rest of the day off except for their sailing duties, and ordered their rations doubled for the remainder of the journey, to better keep their energy up.

He was so busy with the men he hadn't taken time to be around Daenerys or the others. He was unsurprised however to discover that Myrcella had once again taken control of the other girls and several of the walking wounded, those without a working arm or other injuries that kept them from their duties. With their help she had prepared a portion of the crew quarters to act as a hospital area.

Daenerys had been busy in her own way as well, exercising personally with Ranma, but also forcing her two little ones to continue their flight exercises despite the cold. They would take breaks curling up around a brazier between each flight up to the crow's nest and back down to keep warm, and she was always communicating mentally with some throughout the exercises. She was continually controlling, directing, often times even explaining to the little ones that their fires might be needed soon. That idea seems to excite the drakings, but the cold was hindering their mental facilities, which weren't exactly pronounced just yet in the first place. Yes they were smarter than Daenerys had expected, but that wasn't saying much.

On the second morning after that initial sighting of land on the southern horizon, the look out once more shouted that a sail had been spotted as usual. Then a second later the now mundane report changed, the man in the crow's nest shouting it out at the top of his lungs. "Multiple sails, multiple small sales off the port bow!"

Ranma quickly joined the sail master up in the rigging, looking out over the incoming ships, his breakfast forgotten on a handy barrel below them. "It looks like you were right." He murmured to the older man, who laughed grimly.

"I wish I were wrong lad." He said, spitting to the side. "Even with you and the dragons, this is going to be one hell of a hard fight."

Coming towards them were over a dozen small sloops, each not more than fifty feet long, and with barely enough room across for five men to stand abreast. Their sails were small looking, mobile, but it was obvious they were only there for small movements, the oars sticking out of their sides was what really drove those ships. As Ranma watched, they switched over entirely from sails to rows, streaking through the water toward Fish's Scales as fast as they could from both the port and from directly in front of their route. They were so spread out now the galley had no chance of evading them all.

By this point the crew had finished readying themselves for battle. Leaping down, Ranma grabbed up the large bow that he had commandeered. It had the heaviest draw he could make it, but even so it was almost flimsy in his hands.

As the ships closed, Ranma began to fire at one ship in particular, one that seemed to have better armored and armed people on board, if the glint of gold and silver was anything to go by. His first target was the man who was at the front of the ship. His back was turned to their target while he extorted his men to greater efforts on their oars.

Ranma loosed, and between one word and the next he fell forward with a scream, Ranma's arrow having taken the man straight in the back, punching through his armor even at this distance thanks to Ranma's strength. The rest of the men on that ship seemed to gape for a moment, and by the time they had recovered, two more men died under his arrows.

While Ranma was attacking that ship, the rest continued on, but then a few of them faltered, the men in them pointing up into the sky. Daenerys had come out on deck at the first shout, and with her, came her two little ones. Both of them had grown to the point where they could no longer rest comfortably on her shoulders, looking almost like small to medium-sized dogs next to her, and they were not nearly as graceful getting into the air from the ground as they had been from her shoulders.

But they could still fly, and no matter that dragons had not been seen alive in living memory, any idiot could tell you what they were. At the site four of the ships turned around entirely, heading back the way they came. The others came on however.

Now standing next to Ranma, Daenerys closed her eyes, concentrating on the link between her, Rhaegon and Sunfyre, directing them into an attack on one of the ships that was still heading their way. Even before they attacked she could tell they both getting a little tired. In response she only allowed them to shoot out a single stream of flame each at the ship before ordering them to come back. Even so, they had barely reached the ship before they collapsed onto the deck exhausted despite the days of exercising.

That ship however was no longer advancing. While their flames hadn't improved much yet, those little fire attacks had immolated two men, and they were running around screaming while their fellows tried to push them overboard.

Several of the men packed together on the sloop had been set alight, their clothing igniting like the sail above them. As the burn victims ran around trying to get their fellows to help, they were subsequently pushed into the sea. Only one of them had died, but with that and the fact the ship's sail was also on fire that ship decided that that was enough, and turned away joining the fellows who had already retreated.

Ranma paused in his own assault to nod at Daenerys. "Good job, but keep Rhaegon and Sunfyre close for now. Head to the back of the ship, and see if you can hit any of the ships that try to circle around that way. Don't send them out to far though."

"Teach your grandmother to suck eggs!" Daenerys barked back at him, already kneeling by her dragons, caressing their heads and holding out small goblets of food, while sending feelings of encouragement, pride and love down their link. She lifted them with difficulty in her arms as they began to eat, already heading aft. "I know how to best utilize my little ones thank you, you just take care of your own targets."

Ranma laughed not taking her tone or words seriously but his eyes were cold as he turned back to the oncoming vessels of which there were still seven, all of them packed from end to end with men. All told they had her to be have at least four to five hundred men spread out over them, and he only had something like 52 armymen to meet them.

By this point however, several of the ships were close enough for the rest of the crew to take them under fire. While only a few men among them were trained archers, thanks to their losses they had been able to put a bow in one out of every three pairs of hands.

What they couldn't do with aiming, they made up for in numbers. Concentrating as Ranma had on one ship, with the few remaining fire arrows mixed in with other types, cutting down several dozen men even as the fire arrows did their work.

"Sail ho!" said the man up in the crow's nest. "Two sails, both galley type coming from forward starboard."

Ranma groaned aloud, wondering what the hell was going on now even as he put an arrow in another man's eye. His ship was still coming on though why that was he didn't know, but they were. After a moment however the look-out continued, this time sounding jubilant. "Galleys, naval galleys flying the colors of House Manderly!"

The men all cheered, and Ranma let out a whoop. "You hear that boys, all we need to do is hold them, helps on the way!" He was answered with a roar, and Ranma grinned, dropping the bow and picking up Ice.

The attacking ships were now close enough to throw over grapnels, and unlike in the last battle, this group had enough ships to spread out around the larger vessel trying to attack from all sides and spread the defenders out. Daenerys stopped that, her dragons attacking the two ships that tried to get around the aft of the Manderly ship. When grapnels began to fall around her she called back her dragons, and the three of them cut or bit through the ropes trying to tie to the aft of the ship.

Fenris and the rest of the men did the same along the port side, and several men were hit by arrows from the pirates, who were trying desperately to protect those ropes so their fellows could climb up. The smuggler's sloops were much smaller than the Fish's Scales, which meant the men had to climb up the ropes, and they were very vulnerable as they did, so the archers were trying their best. But thanks to Fenris and the men attacking the ropes, they weren't getting anywhere.

Up front Ranma allowed the grapnels to bite in. So Ranma let them come up, then cut the ropes all around him at near Amiguriken speeds, Ice slicing through the ropes easily. Dozens of men fell back onto their fellow, into the freezing ocean or onto their ships bulwarks with bone breaking force.

The assault continued for another twenty minutes with no real change. If the pirates still had their full complement of ships, they could have overwhelmed the defense with sheer numbers of grapnels, or pushed it back with their own arrow assault, but not anymore.

The retreating ships had taken that advantage away from them, and now they were too embroiled in the assault to get away when the two navy ships got within ballista range. Before the embattled pirates realized they were there a shot from one of the navy galley's ballista smashed into the back of one of the sloops attacking the fore of the Fish's Scales. The shot was tough, but it killed several smugglers before slamming into and through the bottom of the ship, holing it.

That target quickly began sinking, and the men on it tried to scramble into their fellows boats even as those boats tried to turn away. They didn't make it. The two navy galleys moved around the Fish's Scales, taking each sloop under fire from what amounted to knife range for their ballista, so close they couldn't miss, which heightened the hitting power of their massive bolts as well.

It took another twenty minutes, but only one ship at the back was able to even turn away before it too was struck. Ranma looked around, smiling at seeing only five men down with arrow wounds, all of them alive too, and laughed. "Well that was anticlimactic wasn't it?"

Soon enough the two galleys moved to either side of the Fish's Scales, and Ranma used a bullhorn to bellow out their bonafides. His voice, and Fenris at his side was enough to make the captains of the two Manderly galleys believe Ranma was who he said he was, and the ships fell into a guard position, leading the way to White Harbor.

Thankfully that was the last bit of excitement on the voyage, and the rest of their time passed uneventfully, with the Northern shore becoming more and more visible on the starboard bow every day. The ship continued into the large inlet that held White Harbor at its tip, where the White Knife entered the ocean, for another few days, and then White Harbor itself was in view in the distance

One of the galleys left them then, racing forward on oars to inform the city of their arrival. Soon they were able to make out the Sea Rock, the massive stone island that sat in the entrance to the harbor. On top of that fort was a ringfort, full of scorpions, spitfires and even trebuchets, along with a full complement of three hundred armsmen of House Manderly. The colors flying from the fort dipped in response, and as the ship passed under the gaze of the fort cheers could be heard coming from the men up top, so loud they disturbed the seals that routinely rested along the lower edges of the stone.

Daenerys stood with Ranma, Sansa and the others, with Eddard leaning on his son to take his weight off his bad leg. As the sound of cheering reached them, Sansa laughed aloud clapping her hands in glee before grabbing Myrcella and spinning around with her in sheer delight. "We made it, we made it!"

This caused the whole crew to break out into cheers, and for a moment it was all the sail master could do to make certain his men kept on their tasks, as the ship passed the Sea Stone into the outer harbor of the city. It was a stark contrast to the busy but disorganized port at King's Landing. Every ship had a dock, and at present all those ships had been forced to remain there while the Fish's Scales continued on, passing a thirty foot wall that separated the outer and inner harbors. The inner harbor had better anchorage and was protected both by that wall and the ancient holdfast called the Wolf's Den.

Daenerys gripped Ranma's hands tightly as the ship began to maneuver nearer the dock prepared for it, knowing that the next few moments would mark the end of one chapter of her life, and the beginning of the next. Looking up at Ranma however, her worries left her, and she smiled as he looked down at her, his eyes alight with the same delight that had caused Sansa to start dancing. "Welcome to the North, my lady."

End chapter

---

I deliberately did not show the creation of the Shadow Warriors. I will show the creation of one in the future, but I want it to be somewhat different from the original. I want it to be sexy and disturbing as fuck, which is a very tough target to hit. Oh, and sorry Gendry fans, but he is dead, on Gendra or whatever in this story. I have other plans for her. And yes, I know the original name was Brotherhood Without Banners, I changed that too.

This chapter is how I will deal with travel times from now on: showing something else going on except for important/funny bits. I have also decided I will not introduce a POV to show the Ironborn until combat is joined. I have never understood what was so interesting about them, let's face it, at bottom they are rapists, reavers, slavers, the worst sort of scum, and their Iron Price and their following their Drowned God is simply a way to justify it all. I realize Asha Greyjoy has something of a following, but I will only be truly kind to her if the writer of the story The Icy Tide comes back and continues to write his story. If not, then she might live, but then she might not. Certainly she will not become a main character. I also never understood why no one was ready for the Ironborn to try to rebel, it seemed obvious to me given their national culture the moment Theon's past was explained. So they will face a Westeros divided, but also ready for them.

This chapter also showed one thing that I have never really done before: that there will be a hierarchy in the pairing. I have tried to make an equal relationship in ATP, and in Warrior's Way and all my other stories, the 'harem' is more of a family, where they all love one another with only an informal hierarchy if that. In this story, Daenerys is most definitely the alpha, with the others below her. They won't join only at her sufferance, but they will only join at her agreement, and that can range from happy to irritated but resigned. Of them all, while Ranma will love the other girls, he will LOVE Daenerys, as his true equal in every way. Hope that makes sense to you all.

Also, Westeros geography is weird, and I would kill for some real travel times from the original. Enough said.

In the next chapter we see what Dacey has been up to, what Hoster Tully has set up, and if Tywin will be having things all his own way as he begins his march into the Riverlands, the North's reaction to Daenerys and the events in the south, and some other stuff as well. Heh. See you then, and as always, please review.

*Chapter 10*: Chapter 10

I do not own Martin or Takahashi. Such a pity, they both need some reality readjustment.

Thanks go out to Anthony444 for his help in betaing this chapter as well as being a major source of information about Westeros.

First a plea, then a warning. Please, my fellow ASolaF writers, please, for all that is holy, stop trying to out-drama or angst the original. It doesn't really work, and frankly its getting old. I am still looking for a story that concentrates on the warfare aspect, stark centric if possible, but I'm getting desperate enough that no longer really matters. But I haven't found any. I realize Martin sucked at the warfare aspect as well, but come on, prove you can do it better than the lazy one!

Now the warning here: some bad things happen to a few characters who I think have a certain following here, as well as my first lemon in this story. It's marked so you can avoid it, but this is A Song of Ice and Fire, and sex is just part of that universe.

Wild Wolf Chapter 10 Opening Moves

---

At the same time that the Fish's Scales was rounding the Paps into the Bite, Dacey and her party had finally reached the edge of the Gorge, the incredibly deep cut through the mountains that would become the Frost Fangs as they kept on going further north. Forged millennia ago by glacier runoff, the Gorge marked the far western edge of the wall. That was marked by a bridge over the expanse guarded by a castle called, rather unimaginatively, Westwatch-By-the-Gorge. It had previously been abandoned like most of the others, but Dacey knew that it was manned now by men of House Umber, if she remembered correctly.

Yet where Dacey and her party reached the Gorge was quite a ways down from the end of the Wall, the Gorge going by the Wall on a wavy diagonal down towards the Bay of Ice. Over the edge of the Bridge of Bones, the Milkwater was visible below it. Here it was so far below them they could barely make out the frothing torrent as it moved down through the bottom of the gorge. It was an awe inspiring sight, an amazing example of what running water could do over time to even the hardest granite.

But after the last two months of travel through the mountains Dacey was in no mood to take in the sights. The going had been tough from the moment Dacey reached Norrey territory, giving her a whole new respect for the Mountain Clans who survived up here, and that was just the start of it. The further north they got, the colder it got and the more snow there was on the ground. The cold shouldn't have been anything she wasn't used to having been to the Wall, however up here in the mountains it was even colder than it had been on the Wall. Dacey was uncertain why it was colder at the higher altitudes, but it was. This, the steepness of the going for so much of their trip, and the fact they had to move around large drifts of snow to make any headway had made the trip as irritating as it could be.

Thanks to her mother's preparations no one had lost anything to frostbite just yet, be it limb, finger or other appendage, but one of the men had come close after having taken a piss one night. Dacey had found that amusing, but the other Mormont men had been appalled so she hadn't let her amusement had been the only humorous thing to happen though.

"Told ya." Wilhelm Stonegrinder said, pulling down the bit of wool cloth covering his mouth to spit to the side. He was the leader of the band of fifty Norrey men, some relation or other to the clan chief, and he had been against the entire journey, seeing it as a pointless exercise. If the wildlings were scaling up and down the Gorge, they surely weren't doing it this high up, nearer the Wall was somewhat believable, though even that wasn't really, not with Westwatch-By-the-Gorge manned once more.

When his woolen face mask was back in place Wilhelm went on. "It's too cold up 'ere, way too 'igh for anyone, even wilders to try climb the Gorge. They'da 'ave ta use magic or have someone on this side ter help. Even then it'd be l'possible, de Gorge is too wide 'ere."

"Does it become thinner anywhere else along its length?" Dacey asked after deciphering the man's accent, her voice muffled by her own scarf. Two months and she still wasn't used to the way the man mangled common. Still, she wasn't quite ready to give up on this mission just yet, but it did look to be a dead-end at this point.

The senior Norrey men conferred for a few moments then Wilhelm came back. "It does nearer where the mountain's start ta go down agin. We can follow the Gorge for a bit, if that's what ya want. But it be too cold up here fer us to be here long, and there ain't no game up here. We'll be eatin' our supplies from here on."

"Not what I want." Dacey replied, shaking her head. "But I think we need to do a thorough job here. Four days, we'll follow the gorge down to the bay for four days, and if we found nothing by that point, we'll turn back."

Around her the men of House Mormont and the mountain clansmen all nodded.

The next few days they followed Dacey's command, moving from their starting point down towards the now heading somewhat further down the mountain, albeit in a very slow and roundabout manner, each day was colder than the last, and even the mountain men were worried about it. Wilhelm finally said it was bizarre, that it should have become a little warmer at least, not colder.

Dacey kept her own council but her eyes were watchful, her body tense as she stared into shadows, and she always took two watches each night, realizing that this mission might actually bear fruit. It was debilitating, but she was determined to be awake if anything happened.

On the third day they got away from the sparse covering of the very top of the mountains into a small forest, the trees giving them cover from the wind and some relief from the cold because of that, though not as much as anyone had hoped. That night they camped under the eaves of the trees there and it was almost as if they had been watched, because Dacey had just gone to bed when a worried shout from outside.

She dashed out instantly, not having bothered to change. None of them did at night, simply pulling their bed rolls over themselves for further warmth with a heated stone for their bed rolls thrown in first. On her way out she grabbed up her sword, giving thanks once again for the good fur-lined leather gloves her mother had gifted her. A few of the mountain men couldn't handle anything better than a spear, needing to wear large, clumsy mittens rather than gloves that could give them the gripping ability of their uncovered hand.

She wasn't the first one out, several other men had bolted out of their tents as well. They all raced towards where the watcher that shouted, a Mormont man, was pointing. "Blue lights!" He said, his teeth chattering with the cold almost making the words unintelligible. "I saw blue lights, something is out there!"

Dacey scowled, her fears confirmed. No longer caring about seeming to be jumping at shadows, she barked out orders looking at the men around her. "Rouse the others. We'll have half on half off for the rest every night."

That meant fifty men would be awake for every watch with fifty off for the rest of the night, with the watches broken into two rather than the normal three. It would tire them out for the next day, but it would also allow them to have a large enough guard force that maybe they wouldn't be to be taken by surprise.

Moments later the men who would be joining the watch were awake grumbling but not complaining overmuch. The men of House Mormont, able to read Dacey's concern in her voice and eyes over her face covering, knew something unusual was going on. The clansmen had legends about blue lights, they didn't know what they meant, but they knew bad things followed them.

Both groups were given another clue to this when Dacey pulled out her pack, then began to unwrap the six dragonglass daggers Jon had given her. After unwrapping each one she handed them to the two best swordsmen among her House's men and the three most senior clansmen, keeping one for herself. "Just in case." she said grimly.

The man looked at the small, primitive looking dragonglass daggers and back to her wide-eyed, then around in the woods. "Are ya sure?" Wilhelm asked, his voice trembling in what in anyone but a clansmen Dacey would have called Fear. She would still have called it that in this case, but not aloud, such would have been an insult answerable only in blood. "Ya really think, ya really think there's some'at unnatural out dere?" He didn't want to outright say what might be out there, none of the Norrey men would use those words. It was a known fact that naming an evil was to invite its attention.

"Hopefully not." Dacey replied grimly. "But better safe than sorry."

The men, even her own who hadn't been able to make the connection just yet, all nodded, breaking up into groups. Many of those on watch looked around for places where they could hide with their backs to the fires so that they wouldn't destroy their night vision of too much while being invisible to someone out there. Only a few were successful, but the others hoped that a visible sign of readiness might ward off whoever was out there.

Dacey, still tired from having been on watch for most of the night already, retired back to her tent. Thankfully for Dacey despite her concerns the next few hours passed uneventfully, allowing her to get some much needed sleep.

It was approaching the first blush of dawn when that changed. One of the guards was pulled out of his position in a small dugout underneath a tree by monstrously powerful hands. Before he could shout his throat was opened from one end to the other, and he was tossed aside like trash. Another man died with nearby in a similar fashion. But another hidden guard had caught the movement and shouted "Alarm, man down east side of camp!"

Dacey and the others woke up quickly, their weapons always close to hand. It was this and the fact that half of their number were already on guard duty that saved the entire party. One moment that shout had been the only warning, the next all of the guards were under attack from every direction around the camp.

Their attackers were men who looked almost like smallfolk, dressed in the same manner as the men of the north had for centuries, with only one or two wearing actual armor. But their faces were uncovered as were their hands, as if they didn't feel the cold, their breath did not mist in the nighttime air and their eyes were glowing, deep ice blue. Their strength was far more than most mortal men as well, evidenced by a scrawny one who looked as if he should never have been even able to wield a rake lifting up one of the guards and throwing him backwards against a tree. They also were using weapons, makeshift ones but deadly all the same.

"To arms!" Dacey bellowed, jumping forward and grabbing up a large cob of firewood, smashing it into one wight's face, while her sword took another through the brain box, slicing the top of its head clean off like it was a loaf of bread. "Use fire! Toss fire on them, they fear it! If not that, chop them apart, it will make them easier to deal with, but be wary of the limbs! Back to back, no man fights alone!"

Nearby one of the men she had given a dragonglass dagger lost his primary weapon, his longsword to getting stuck in an overhanging branch. He quickly jumped away, whipping out the dagger from his belt. Ducking underneath a hoe's blade searching for his head he stabbed the former farmer in his chest with the dagger, high and to one side. It was a killing blow, but the creature should have been able to keep going given its undead status. Yet instead it screamed, and the blue light in its eyes faded as the dragonglass somehow destroyed the magic animating him.

The man, one of House Mormont's men, pulled his blade free from the overhanging branch, staring in shock at the body of his former enemy. Turning slightly, he raced over to aid another man, longsword in one hand and dagger in the other. "The dragonglass daggers work, they stop moving if you kill them with the daggers!"

Soon Dacey's roared instructions had the men all working together with their fellows, trying to guard one another's back. Despite her orders and the dragonglass daggers it was touch and go however. The undead kept coming, and Dacey and her party kept killing them, but they definitely weren't having it all their own way. Men were down and dying, their bodies steaming in the nighttime air for a few moments before freezing. Other men had lost limbs, one man had lost his eye to what looked like some kind of miner's pick, along with the rest of his face, but was still fighting miraculously. Slowly however the flow of undead began to trickle out.

Dacey ducked under a charging blow from one man wielding a long scythe then used her shield to block another wight's arms from trying to grapple with her. She had dropped her sword in favor of her dagger, which greatly impacted her reach, but even so she stabbed over her shield, catching the second undead warrior through its eye. The magic that drove it died, and it collapsed like a puppet losing its strings.

The scythe came back with a whistle through the air, but even off balance she blocked it, her shield thrusting aside in a show of strength that few could match. "RAAH!"

Even the undead beast was surprised to see its blow battered aside, but that surprise didn't last long because Dacey quickly stepped inside its arm reach, and slammed her dagger through its chest right over where its heart was. "And stay dead!"

As the blue light faded from its eye, Dacey turned slamming her shield into a wight who had gotten one of her house's men down on the ground and was trying to get around his shield, which he had raised to protect his chest and face. Her dagger took it in the back of the neck, and the man threw it off before grimly grabbing up his own sword. "My thanks Dacey," he said before raising his huge greatsword, roaring his battle cry as he charged toward the nearest wight. "Here we stand!"

He brought it down with both hands, cleaving a wight in two throwing the body aside, and the two of them forged onto the next snarl of combat, adding more and more men as they went along, while behind them other men, mostly those who had either lost weapons or been injured, quickly grabbed up faggots of burning wood, tossing them onto the bodies of the wights who had been cut down by swords or chopped to pieces.

Thirty minutes later, just as suddenly as it began the battle was over, the remaining wights fading back into the darkness beyond the fires of their camp, their blue eyes slowly disappearing into the darkness. Through the canopy of the pine trees small flickers of dawn light could be seen.

Dacey growled, looking around angrily before glancing down at her once more battered and met almost mangled shield. "Why do people not like my shields?" She shook off that whimsical thought. Looking around she noticed that everyone was looking shell-shocked, the brush with the macabre and mystic breaking through even the normal rash mountain clan courage. Knowing she had to break through that or else their unity would be lost, Dacey began to bellow orders pointing to the nearest clump of men. "You lot, grab up hatchets, chop down some trees, we need to make some kind of barricade for ourselves. You men," she said pointing to a band of Norrey men who were looking at the bodies with wide eyes. "Grab up the bodies, all of the bodies and toss them on the fires."

The men she had first pointed to jumped to obey the voice of authority, grateful for something to do to keep thoughts of the horror they had just faced at bay. They pulled with hatchets from their packs, using them to cut down a few nearby trees, working as quickly as they could with the frenzy of the truly terrified.

Thanks to practically every man having a hatchet, which they needed to make snow boots for several legs of this journey (plus the Norrey men felt they were good for in close work) they were able to cut eight large trees down within the next few hours. While this was going on Dacey had figured out how many men she had lost.

Her family had sent fifty men with her, and the Norrey men had added another forty to guide her and her men through their territory up to the Gorge. Out of that ninety she had lost thirty four men tonight, twenty of her House's men, and fourteen Norrey men. A grievous account, but much less than it could have been if she hadn't prepared her men as best she could.

At the men finished their work Wilhelm and the other Norrey men had finally recovered their courage. He strode up to where Dacey was helping the men toss severed limbs onto a large pyre set well away from the burgeoning fort, his eyes over his face covering narrowed in anger. "Is dis what ya thought you'd run into, is dis what we're up here looking fer! You never said aught 'bout, 'bout anythin' unnatural!"

"Would you have believed me if I had?" she asked archly, tossing the last arm she could see onto the fire. With that done she pulled out her dragonglass dagger, cleaning it before placing it back on her belt next to her broadsword. She didn't like the dagger, it was too light even for its size, and the lack of reach had almost killed her several times during that fight. But it worked, Jon was right about that. Still, best to leave that for after, unless we can figure out a way to create obsidian swords that won't shatter in combat.

That caused the mountain men behind Wilhelm to mutter to one another, but it was an argument they couldn't exactly gainsay. Certainly her own men couldn't, they merely nodded, shrugging their shoulders now, having moved beyond their terror to wandering about some things, such as the vast mustering on the Wall, and what the wolfsworn had really run into in that ambush nearly a year ago now.

Eventually Wilhelm broke off from his men. "We might've, our legends say much about t'e forces o' the ever death. Ya coulda told us Mormont, ya had no right to be keepin' it from us."

Dacey looked at them thoughtfully then nodded. "Alright I'll apologize for that, I didn't think you would believe me without proof."

Another, older clansmen shrugged, pushing Wilhelm in the shoulder when he looked as if he was going to yell at the Mormont woman. "Least ya brought the daggers. Dragonglass, fire and swords of ancient Valyria're the only things that can stand against the might of the ever death."

"So we're turning back right?" Stated one of her family's was a young man but outspoken and rather more arrogant and chauvinistic than most of her House's men given the role women had always played in House Mormont. He was also visibly spooked still, unlike most of the others.

"We haven't finished our mission yet." Dacey said, rooting around the pile of weapons and shields taken from the dead. She picked up one shield, shaking her head at how light it was but it would still be better than her own battered one.

"I say we turn back now." Luke said angrily. There was a murmur of approval from Wilhelm and some of the other clansmen, but the rest of her House's men backed away slightly from Luke shaking their heads.

"We go back when I say we go back." Dacey growled, sounding very much like the bear on House Mormont's banner, standing up to tower over the younger man. Luke was tall and heavily muscled but not as tall as she was or as heavily muscled. After a second he quailed under her glare and she nodded. "Jon Twinblade gave me this job, and I will find out what we need to know, how the White walkers are getting their creatures around the Wall."

Dacey looked at him then around at the others before deciding to fill them in on what had happened on the trip up to the Wall. There were some exclamations of shock at that, and more than one man prayed to the old gods for protection when they heard about the strange ice giants. But none of them disbelieved her words after what happened a few hours ago.

"So you think they're getting forces around the Wall somehow? They never did that in any of the stories from the Age of Legend's I ever saw." One of her family's men muttered. He was an older man named Stefan, and he had originally trained to be a bard before becoming an armsman when his older brother died in the Ninepenny Kings War.

"They have changed their tactics somehow, or something else changed, though I have no idea what." Dacey replied.

The Flint men conversed for a few moments then Wilhelm turned back to Dacey, nodding. "We said four days, I say we stick ta tha'. One more day o' searchin' the Gorge, then me an' mine turn for home. We're at least two week's fromme clan's nearest outpost, and the rest o' me clan needs ta be warned o' this."

"Agreed." Dacey said with a nod. In fact, this had already been worth the trip in one way. Getting this many witnesses, witnesses who wouldn't believe anything but what their own eyes had seen, were invaluable to truly prepare the North and the Wall for this incursion. Of course, Dacey thought, the Others probably know that too. If they can direct their troops with any kind of control, they'll try to kill us all before we can get the word out.

"All right, here's what we'll do. We'll rest here for the rest of today, making this fort as good as we can make it. Then we'll head out tomorrow as far as we can go and still get back here before the sun starts to fall. We'll retreat here for the night, then the next day send out scouts on a run down along the Gorge toward the ocean. It'll be up to them to decide if we go on, while the rest of us remain here then on the way back we'll go slow, forwarding up every night like this just in case until we're back in territory your clan patrols." Dacey said decisively.

Wilhelm looked rebellious, but the older Norrey man pulled him aside to speak to a few others again, speaking to him in low tones. After a moment he nodded with a jerk of his head, scowling, evidently overruled.

With that the impromptu planning session broke up, pitching into the work of making this defensive position stronger for more than half the day. It was very close inside the makeshift palisade but there was enough room for the survivors of the attack to get their tents into the open area inside the triangle, along with one large fire in the direct center. In a fit of inspiration Wilhelm ordered the men then to pile up several other bits of wood, creating a shelf for the men to stand on, which would allow them to have a height advantage on anyone who tried to get over the small four feet tall wall. It wasn't exactly a holdfast, but it was still amazing how much building it helped the men's morale.

"Well done everyone." Dacey said, looking around with a satisfied expression. As her men and the Norrey men all smiled she went on. "Warm meals for us all now and tonight, take the rest of the day to see to your weapons, then we'll set off early tomorrow." The men all nodded, some with enthusiasm, whether at the prospect of moving on or the food Dacey didn't know, and others warily.

While her men rested throughout the day, Dacey stayed up, getting by on short naps, then stayed up the entire night, anticipating an attack that did not come. It tired her out, but this wasn't the first time Dacey went without sleep, she would deal with it. As soon as the sun began to rise she roused her men in turn.

About an hour later the party was on its way again, leaving behind ten Norrey men along with their wounded to protect their temporary dwelling. With the scouts in the lead they swiftly found the Gorge once more, and then began to follow it through the forest towards the ocean again. After that however they slowed down, not because they were running into trouble moving through the forest, it was thankfully somewhat less snowy in here thanks to the overhead canopy of the pine and fir trees. No, they moved slower because they all subconsciously knew without even talking about it that they were in enemy territory.

Several hours after they had stopped for a lunch break the scouts spotted something through the woods a ways ahead something that glittered as if there was some large band of ice reflecting the sun. The scouts called for a halt while they rushed forward, keeping to the shadows of the trees as much as possible while they moved. Behind them the others prepared themselves for anything, a shiver of anticipation going through all of them.

A moment later the scouts came back, their faces once visible showing awe and fear despite their coverings. "You will not believe this!" One of them stammered, in good common for all of that. "but this... I-I mean, there's some kind of ice bridge! It goes across from one side of the Gorge to the other. It, it looks sturdy, and I mean, but it's, it's ice!"

"Show me." Dacey ordered, moving forward already.

The two of them showing her how to move through the forest and soon they were overlooking the bridge. It was in a small drop in the land, invisible from a distance thanks to the walls of the tiny drop, which was a single tree length maybe. The bridge itself was a single span of ice thicker than most trees in diameter, with the top flattened out. "Well, I think that's what we've come up here for." Dacey said thoughtfully. "Now, how should we destroy it?"

"Fire does for ice." The Norrey scout said grimly.

She and the scouts returned and seven men swiftly raced off into the woods to gather wood. Moments later the men returned from all around, placing it in a large pile. Other men grabbed up as much as they could carry before moving forward, while the rest gathered around, weapons ready.

They were all almost within sight of the bridge again when they were once more attacked. Much like the night before last, one moment everything was fine then the next the wights were on them from nearly every direction. It was as if they could hide in small bits of snow and shadow like the best wildling raiders. Whatever the case, despite the Northerner's being prepared surprise was almost total.

Dacey immediately bellowed orders, her broadsword already swinging. "Scouts and four others, light up the wood and start tossing at the wights for now, everyone else protect them, but keep heading for the bridge!" Dacey hoped that destroying the bridge would cut off the White Walker's ability to send more forces across the Gorge. If, after all this time they could only sustain a small bridge like this and couldn't put across massive numbers of wights, then it represented a major target. One well worth the lives of Dacey and all the men with herso long as they destroyed it.

With the wights in their way and all around even that final fifty meters took time to cover, and they lost ten more men fallen and two of the dragonglass daggers had shattered by the time they reachedthe bridge. Night was falling by that point, but even so the moon was high up in the sky helping the fires now lighting up their gathered wood to give the humans enough light to see by, even if the smoke was becoming an issue to visibility.

Still, the great swords of her clansmen, the longswords and heavy hatchets of the Norrey men were able to hack the wights into pieces even without the obsidian daggers. It was just there were so many of them, not nearly as many as the wolfsworn had faced, yet even now at least three wights for every man Dacey had with her.

Despair and exhaustion began to tell, and even while Dacey slammed her claymore through one of the wight's bodies cleaving it into two from shoulder to thigh, two more men went down to the weapons of the wights. Another fellow had the obsidian dagger he had been using in one hand shatter, leaving them with only three. Dacey pushed to her right side, protecting a Norrey man who had just lost his longsword when a particularly skilled wight disarmed him. Dacey's sword took the thing in the side, cutting it nearly in half while her fellow warrior scrambled at his back for his hatchet.

With Dacey at their head the Northmen forged on, but they did so more and more grimly, more and more slowly. Eventually they reached it, able to somewhat concentrate their defense more thanks to putting one portion of their defensive circle against the drop of the Gorge.

Dacey roared out orders to the men who had been lobbing random pieces of burning wood at the wights. "Concentrate on the bridge! Get that bunch of wood on it and melt the fucking thing!"

As the men obeyed Dacey shouted a wordless battle cry. "RARGG!" With that she charged forward leaving the line of her fellows, trying to break up the assault on her men, who were visibly flagging was a calculated move, but she knew it was a move of desperation as well. There were simply too many of the wights.

Her strength and speed were so great Dacey actually succeeded in clearing an area around her, killing five of the wights or at least chopping them to bits with her claymore. Her shield was once more mangled, and she tossed it away, flinging it at a wight with such force that when the sharp edge of it took the man in the neck it cut his head clean off.

This show of strength won a roar of approval from her fellows, and the miasma of despair that had clung to them lifted a little as Dacey roared her family's battle cry. "Here we stand!" This was answered by her House's men behind her, and she roared out again. "Here we stand! Come get me you undead fuckers!"

She cut down two more wights then suddenly found herself sword to sword with another one. This one looked like a wildling, one whose bronze armor was of extremely good quality. Unlike with most of his fellows there was no outward sign of his death, but his eyes blazed with that blue power that was keeping all of the wights alive and in his hand he held a wasn't like any kind of sword that Dacey had seen before, it was all edges and cruel hooks. And it was made of ice, the same kind of ice that made the bridge.

Her claymore withstood the blows of the strange ice weapon but each blow seemed to send shivers of cold through the sword and into her hand. It began to hurt even through her gloves. Dacey roared in agony, buttook up her blade with both her hands, adding to the speed and strength of her strikes.

This wight however was different from most of the others, he was a tried warrior or at least the wildling equivalent, and used his sword expertly. Worse, Dacey was already tired from the ongoing battle, and staying up for two full days with only small naps to sustain her. That was making her slightly sloppier than she would otherwise be. Even a wolfsworn like Dacey had her limits.

Suddenly her sword shattered, and she screamed in shock when some of the shards went backwards, cutting into her arms, one of them sticking out of her bicep and another her side while a third cut her cheek as it went past. She hurled the broken stump of the blade at the creature, leaping backwards and keeping her hands up and ready for any kind of opening, but for just a moment, Dacey knew true despair.

"Catch, Dacey!" shouted one of her men from behind her.

Dacey looked over in time to see the man throw one of the two remaining dragonglass daggers through the nighttime sky, and she reached up towards it, barely able to see the flash of the red cloth that made up its hilt. At the same time the wildling swordsmen charged, slamming his sword into her plate armor which gave way under the blow as if it was butter. It stabbed into Dacey's flesh, taking her high up near her armpit along her side. The blow missed any vitals but it was still a horrendous wound.

At the same time she was struck Dacey reached out, grabbing the dagger with one hand out of the dark. Her other hand clamped down on the thing's shoulder, keeping it from pulling out its blade, forcing it to stay put, and stopping it from creating even more damage to her side by pulling the blade out.

The thing only had a moment to flick its eyes sideways and see the threat before she stabbed it through the neck with the dragonglass wight creature collapsed at her feet and Dacey gasped too, going to her knees, clenching her teeth in agony.

Around her more men had died during her one on one duel. Now there were only twenty two men left, almost all of them injured. But it seemed as if they had finally killed all the wights. There were more than a few bits and pieces of the undead creatures on the ground still scabbling at them, but even so, the battle is over.

Dacey forced herself to her feet, looking around her as men began to drag bits and pieces of corpses into a center area to light on fire with faggots taken from the blaze already set up at the end of the tiny bridge. The ice was tough, but against its natural enemy fire it was slowly giving way already. As she watched a few droplets fell down the side of the gorge and Dacey nodded in satisfaction.

"You're hurt lady." Said one of her men, a would-be healer named Oris, running up to nodded grimly, trying not to move her arm and shoulder along above where the ice sword had punched through her.

Oris pulled her aside, ordering her to strip, glaring around at the men when they began to leer at her bare back visible in the firelight. They all suddenly found other things to do rather than gawk at her, and Dacey laughed at the older man quietly. He snorted at her, then pulled the jerkin underneath her armor to reveal wound in her side. The healer probed the area around her wound for a moment then nodded and said. "By the old god's favor you didn't hurt anything important lady." He growled in his worst bedside manner. "Once the, the blade has melted away, I'll stop the bleeding. But you'll not have full ability in that arm for months, any movement of the shoulder will aggravate the wound."

She nodded, ignoring Oris now while he did as he could while the ice sword that had done so much damage through the metal of her cuirass the sword was already decomposing somehow which was no doubt something built into the magic that created it. As she looked over at the bridge, which was now melting freely then at the wights, who were slowly also being burned to ash, she smiled. Not this time, she thought grimly. We know you're out there you bastards, and as soon as I can get in touch with Winterfell, I'll make certain all the North knows to be ready for you.

Unfortunately, while this would help the North prepare for the great enemy, all their preparations would prove to be facing the wrong direction, exactly as the White Walkers had hoped if their first way around the wall was found. Plans within plans, and if they couldn't keep the first way around the Wall a secret, then at the very least, they had baited the trap well enough.

OOOOOO

At the same time that Dacey was fighting for her life, Tyrion lounged back contentedly on a heap of cushions. Reaching down, he patted the head of the working girl who was at work on his lower regions even now while he swigged a bottle of wine. He and his men had finally finished the first twenty siege engines, and Lord Commander Mormont had allowed him and his men three day's rest and recuperation. Needless to say Tyrion had made for the brothel that was now part of Castle Black, and hadn't come out since.

Normally the very idea of having whores on hand constantly near men who were, to put it bluntly, rapists, murderers and thieves despite being covered with the veneer of redemption in their Night's Watch garb, would have been unthinkable. However that was before. Now they needed them here, and the Night's Watchmen were a small percentage of the forces on the Wall in comparison to the Northerners who had been ordered up there.

After a few examples had been made there was no longer any trouble because any infraction against the women was met by immediate execution. The same penalty was given to those found drunk on watch up on the Wall if the evil bastards on the other side of the Wall didn't do it for you. The nighttime raids were still going on, but the attackers lost upwards of twenty men for every one Northerner they killed. That was no doubt painting an ugly picture of the number of defenders available, but they had yet to catch a glimpse of Tyrion's little toys.

He smirked over at a few of his men who were using a few cushions and cubicles to have an orgy, one, though he didn't know it, that wouldn't have looked out of place in a Roman senator's house on Earth. A few of the mercenaries were good men and he had bought a few of their services. Bronn was the best swordsman among them, and he had saved Tyrion's life twice since coming to the Wall. He, his fellow Chiggen and a few others were here on his tab now rather than their pay from Lord Manderly because of that.

Pity that the fat man couldn't have found any of the mercenary companies. I doubt he could have gotten the Second Sons, or the Golden Company, but surely a few of the others wouldn't mind the easy work, though perhaps the Wall's reputation scared them off. The fact of the matter was that even with the massive influx of troops that Stark had begun before going south the Wall was so long that it was all they could do to patrol it all. He had no idea what the numbers of wildlings were going to look like when they actually launched their full assault, but he was beginning to paint a very bad picture, and if they found a weak point, it would be very bad indeed.

He had first protested that the wildlings couldn't muster that much strength, but the old hands of the Northerners told him he was wrong. The land beyond the Wall was huge, unmapped for the most part but still probably as large as the North or even larger. What was worse, the wildlings nomadic lifestyle and the fact that they bred as often as they could meant their numbers were higher than most people would think. It was the knowledge of logistics Mance Rayder possessed that would allow them to keep such a large force in one place without needing to move on. Their full host was still gathering, and probably wouldn't be ready for another three months, but it was pretty obvious that once the full host assembled they would attack right away.

Tyrion was actually looking forward to it, eager to see his little toys in action. Or not so little toys in this case, he thought, smirking evilly. The size of the Wall had allowed him to place equally large siege engines in different positions along it, and thanks to the turn aisle concept they could be aimed too. In fact he doubted that the wildlings would be able to bring anything that would be able to range on them without being hit in turn well before it could get into range to loft a projectile that high. As such, well, they were utterly screwed, even without the alchemists and their own addition to his toys lethality.

The girl that was servicing him noticed that Tyrion's mind was elsewhere. Feeling a bit of professional pique, she scowled and used her teeth on him just slightly, biting down slightly. He growled, grabbing her hair and pulling her mouth away. "God's girl, my bodies short enough as it is, I can't afford to lose any inches no matter where they are. Let the teeth out of it down there!"

"That'll teach you to let your mind wander so much Lord Imp. A girl likes to be appreciated you know." The black haired woman replied saucily.

He laughed, pulling her head back down to work as he began to rub her head apologetically.

About an hour later he was finishing up, well finishing with that whore anyway. He was draining the last of his wine when the door to the warehouses door opened with a looked up to see Theon striding in. "Ho, Greyjoy!" he said laughing. "Astonishing, you found a whorehouse, that's amazing. How long have you been in the Castle for, 2 minutes? Pull up a girl and a couch, then tell me about the pirates, are there any more out there?"

Theon Greyjoy had changed somewhat since Tyrion had last seen him. Gone was the cocky somewhat touchy young man from Winterfell, now Theon walked with a tried and true confidence and self-possession, not to mention armed. From his long dagger at his side to the large composite bow made from lizard-lion bone on his back, he was dressed for business.

There had been four more battles at sea since the first one. The last had been two weeks ago, and evidently the harsh manner with which the pirates had been dealt with every time they attacked the convoy had gotten through to the idiots at last. Theon was pure death to the pirate crews, and his favorite tactic would terrify anyone who made their living at sea. Fire arrows were an evil thing at the best of times but after you've watched every officer on your ship die, everyone who could in theory direct a response to such, they were even worse.

One ship had gotten away after the last battle to report on the disaster to their fellows, and suddenly no more pirates regardless of where they were coming from dared to attack the convoy. Theon had first thought they were coming from that Skagos, an island with a truly horrible reputation, with the men there being rumored to be anything from cannibals to monsters who wore the skins of their kills for power, both men and animals. But after the last battle, Theon ordered two galleys to split off from the rest of the convoy to chase after the pirates. He found that they came from Skane, a much smaller island slightly further north from the giant island of Skagos.

Theon had written up a request for a land expedition to go in and burn them out, but doubted it would happen now since the pirates had finally grown a set of brains. It had been speaking about that to Mors Umber and the local Night's Watch commander that kept Theon in Eastwatch-by-the-Sea long enough for the orders about Tyrion to arrive there, otherwise he would have missed it.

Now his smile was grim as he nodded at the Imp. "Lannister, get dressed. You're wanted down at White Harbor."

"What?" Tyrion said shaking his head. "Why? Did my father finally get word I'm up here, does he want his so-called heir back under his thumb?" Tyrion was heir to the Lannister name in name only, and the entire family knew it. Tywin blamed him for his wife's death, again no secret, and had long lamented the fact that Jaime was removed from the line of succession when he joined the Kingsguard. That had actually been one of the main reasons why the Lannisters had been so ready to rebel against the Mad King.

The old man was simply using Tyrion as a fill in until one of Cersei's three brats showed enough promise to let the old man swoop in to train up as a real heir. That hadn't happened yet, but Tyrion felt he probably had four years or so until he was removed in favor of Tommen or even Myrcella.

"We don't know all the facts yet," the young man replied, but his eyes were still locked on Tyrion. Behind him Daryn and Smalljon entered the room, also dressed for war. The mercenaries who had changed to Tyrion's direct employ now looked nervous, keeping their hands away from where their swords were placed nearby. Even alone any one of these three young men would've carved through them like they weren't even there and they all knew it. Indeed most of them had trained against Smalljon or Daryn at least once, and you only had to lose a few times when you have a four or five on one advantage to get the idea that you are overmatched. "All we do know is that the queen has performed some kind of betrayal, the King is dead, and Rannar and his father Lord Stark are returning by sea to White Harbor. They want you down there, I don't know why, but I'm going to deliver you whatever the reason."

Tyrion's face blanked at that, he couldn't stop it as he wondered if maybe someone had figured out what was going on with the three Royal brats. He had long suspected what might be going on there, but he didn't have any proof, certainly he hadn't seen his two siblings in the act. But even without that he wouldn't put it past his 'loving' sister to do anything she could to retain power.

"That sounds interesting" he said standing up from his bed of cushions, quickly pulling on his breeches. "Do I have enough time to pack? And what about my men? I've started to pay these four out of my own pockets, will the Lord Commander take up their bill?"

"Fifteen minutes," Theon said simply. "We'll be heading along the Wall back to Eastwatch-By-The-Sea and then down from there to White Harbor. And yes, they'll stay here. I don't think they'll be able to keep up with us unless they brought a train of horses with them?"

Bronn laughed harshly at that then nodded at the Imp. "We'll still be here when you get back. Besides, if we take over making the next batch of siege engines, maybe we'll be paid more by the Lord Commander than you pay us Lord Skinflint."

Tyrion laughed, then made for the door, waving farewell to the whores.

"I'll help you pack." Smalljon said clapping the much smaller man on the shoulder. Over the past few months he and Daryn had come to like the Imp and the siege weapons he had designed for the wall were magnificent. They didn't trust him of course, he was a Lannister after all, but Smalljon liked him well enough. The big man leaned over as the two of them exited the brothel, whispering. "Don't worry, I doubt Lord Stark or Ranna will paint you with the same brush as your sister, but they'll want to make certain that you can't take her side."

Tyrion scoffed a little at the very idea. Cersei certainly wouldn't thank him for that, she had hated him for years for some reason, possibly the same reason their father did. Jaime was the only member of his family Tyrion liked at all, but if this was truly about what he feared, well he couldn't protect his older brother from his own follies any longer. It would be impossible to even try alone like this in the North. With the proven abilities of the young men around him there was scant chance he could even escape his own predicament right now. He also knew not to try to talk them around to his side, their loyalty to House Stark was unshakeable. Still, as long as I'm alive I can try to talk my way out of this and if there's one thing I'm good at, it's talking my way out of things.

Soon enough they were prepared, and Smalljon lifted the Imp onto a horse, one of a dozen that had been brought up onto the Wall for the trip along it to the east. "We'll ride for now, then when the horses get tired we'll walk. I'll carry you if I have to." Smalljon said somewhat grimly. "Speed is the thing now."

"In that case we should grab one of the invalid transports." Those had been designed by Tyrion in one of his off-hours, a way one person could transport an injured man on his back.

Daryn grunted, racing off to grab the carrier and place it on another horse which was the pack horse for the first leg of this trip. He nodded at Theon who was sitting on his own horse at the head of the column, and away they went, the horses hooves clattering on the stone of the Wall.

No one spoke for the first few hours, and Tyrion got the impression that whatever was going on was much more serious than Theon's brief sentences could relate. After a time however he regained his normal insouciance. "You know, I just thought of something, your families ordered both you and Daryn up to the Wall, won't you get in trouble for leaving your posts?"

Smalljon chuckled setting his beard to wag. Theon laughed too, while Daryn responded. "Get in trouble, that's a laugh! We are the wolfsworn, our places are with our leader! Our families know that and will understand."

Tyrion nodded. He understood that kind of loyalty though he had only seen it a few times before and only felt it toward his brother. The rest of the family could go hang for all he cared though he would feel sorry for the kids.

With the speed they were going, and Smalljon's endurance in carrying Tyrion they were able to cover the entire distance along the wall in five days. Not even an hour later they were boarding ship, which told Tyrion even more about the urgency of what was going on, with Theon and the others not even thinking of spending time in a brothel before going aboard ship.

As Tyrion boarded the ship he hoped he would be back to the Wall. Despite the hardship of living that far north, he would much rather be there with his new friends and allies than down south in luxury with his family backstabbing him and one another trying to get closer to his father's lordship.

OOOOOO

"I am sorry Lord Lannister, but I can't let you pass. My Lord Tully has sent word to all of his noble houses and told us to act as we might to defend our lands and as our conscience dictates in relation to the crown. I personally believe Lord Edmure would sooner cut off his hand than commit treason, and as such you have no right to march your man across the Riverlands!"

The man who bellowed this from the top of his keep's walls to Tywin Lannister was a youngish man, who had been a squire during the Ironborn Rebellion. Despite this he had no real experience with battles, much like all of his age group much to Tywin Lannister's contempt. Summer knights and this boy is no exception, he thought sardonically. Your personal winter has come if you think you can stop me.

Knowing that the Reach would rise up for Renly because he retreated there first, Tywin had decided to go through the Golden Tooth down the River Road. He calculated that if he acted quickly he could meet up with some of the Riverlands families that would back his own: those whose loyalty he had purchased with good gold in the past and through blood or could influence through other means. They could then keep any expedition from the North from threatening to interfere with the southern campaign, and keep the Riverlands from rising as a united power for his enemies. That this would force the battles to all occur in territory not his own was also a factor.

As such, he had split his initial twelve-thousand strong force. He personally was at the head of ten thousand men, mixed cavalry and infantry, which he had led through the Golden Tooth. He had hoped that Lord Vance and his family, which controlled Wayfarer's Rest, would see reason, giving him a hold on this side of the mountains to secure his logistics. Evidently that wasn't going to happen without a fight.

The other two thousand, all of whom were mounted infantry, that is infantry with enough horses to keep going at a decent pace to cover distance faster but not trained to fight on horseback, had turned southward Deep Den to meet up with Lord Lydden and Lord Serret's forces there. Those forces, about eight thousand strong would force-march to King's Landing as fast as they could. Once there Lord Serret would become Hand of the King for now, and with that army and the remaining defenses of the city would secure it against all comers.

That was a calculated risk, much like his march into the Riverlands, but one he felt had some merit. Renly did not impress him as a possible general, he lacked any real combat experience and didn't seem able to act quickly. If Lord Stark lived however, Eddard became the more dangerous of his foes, a tried and tested general who had fought in two wars already and acquitted himself well. He wanted to goad the northerners out from Moat Cailin, then crush them in the open field.

Right now however he had to deal with this young and soon to be dead fool. Still, it was a shrewd move on Tully's part. Simply sharing the information of both sides of the conflict in King's Landing can't be seen as piling on further treason and telling his nobles to simply follow their conscience isn't anything that could be repaid on the body of his heir. Plus the Riverlands are excellent territory for small unit tactics, which can hold up my advance.

"I see," Tywin said coldly, staring up at Lord Vance from where he stood on the River Road where it wound by the Wayfarer's Rest. The sun glinted slightly on his shaved head, but it did nothing to diminish the power of his green eyed stare. A flag of truce flew overhead, and he was surrounded by armed guards just in case the fool proved pragmatic enough to take a shot at him regardless. "So you believe that you and your paltry force and that equally paltry castle of yours can stop me? Amusing."

"My men are ready and willing! They fight for justice Lord Goldshitter, whereas you fight for your own ego and to keep that bitch of daughter and her baseborn child on the throne. Whatever lie you have convinced your people to swallow, their morale will never match ours!"

"Of course..." Lord Lannister said slowly as if he was talking to a particularly thick child which he was beginning to think he was. "Pardon me, of course your belief in the rightness of your cause will make up for the fact that you only have six-hundred men or so under your command. Whereas I have ten thousand, most of them veterans, something that your men probably cannot say given the sheer idiocy I am hearing from their Lord."

He watched in amusement as the young man's face flared up with anger and one of his hands went to the hilt of his sword despite the talks occurring under the owes of parlay. "I've said my piece!" The young man shouted. "If you think you can take my castle, then do try!"

"Very well." Lord Tywin responded, turning away, shaking his head internally. The moment he reached his army encamped around the keep he nodded to his second-in-command, motioning over his head. "Begin."

His cousin Stafford Lannister, nodded, raising a horn to his mouth and blowing the attack command. All around archers began to fire up at the keep's ramparts, protected themselves by large wooden walls carried by other men. This gave them an advantage against their opponents despite said opponents being on top of the keep's two-story palisade. A simple wooden battering ram with a simple roof was also brought up, with twenty men underneath it rushing towards the gate.

"That young fool in there is an utter moron, I have no doubt the battering ram will take all of his attention. Wait another hour then send the men around his puling little keep, spread the defenders out and then scale the walls." Tywin ordered, looking at the action from a safe distance.

His men all nodded. They were all veterans, most of them from at least two wars. They weren't as experienced as he would've liked in siege warfare, but his own knowledge of that was decent enough, and the advantage in manpower was superlative in this case. It wouldn't be if he had to capture Riverrun or one of the more serious castles in the Riverlands, but Wayfarer's Rest wasn't a real threat.

He turned to look at one of his men, the one in charge of building any necessary siege equipment. "You said you would be able to build a catapult quickly, how quickly?"

"Half a day Lord." the man said with a shrug of his shoulders. "Getting the timbers cut for it won't take very long, but putting it all together and getting the weights right will."

"Don't bother then." Tywin said staring over at the keep, where his archers were beginning to win their duel. Sheer weight of numbers was doing for that considering he had more archers in his army than the defenders had men. Wayfarer's Rest was not a large castle, nor a very modern one, more of a keep rather than a true castle. Certainly it was no Golden Tooth. That, Lord Lannister knew was a sign of his triumph in controlling the local economy. He had carefully made certain that house Vance and other houses along the routes into and out of the passes into his kingdom were not rich enough to pay for any kind of upgrade to their castles.

Of course if Lord Tully had decided to he could have given them the money for it, but he didn't and despite his recent clever move, that is going to cost him and his nation. Lord Lannister thought to himself.

With a final glance up at the castle he turned away, moving through his army's camp to his command tent. Pushing inside his servants bowed him in, one of them already holding up a glass of wine which he took sniffing it suspiciously for a moment before sipping at it and moving on. His map was laid out on a desk, far lighter than his normal one back in the rock, light enough to be put on one of the cars that made up his baggage train.

Behind him his commanders entered, and he frowned at them. "Lord Kenning, take command of the overall battle, follow my orders and take that keep."

Terrence Kenning was a large barrel chested man, who liked wrestling and fisticuffs over swordplay, and his face showed it. A descendant of a castaway Ironborn family, he had some leanings in that direction so grinned evilly, bowing swiftly.

As he was turning away Lord Lannister's voice called back him back for a moment. "Kenning? No prisoners. We don't have time for them, and an example must be set early for it to be given time to sink in before we move on."

The man's grin widened noticeably and he bowed again before leaving. As the other men in the tent muttered to themselves very quietly, they didn't want to draw his ire, Lord Lannister turned to his map, staring down at it thoughtfully.

If this had occurred even a year ago, I would be rushing for King's Landing with all of my forces as quickly as I could, but my daughter has proven herself to be quite dangerous on the political battlefield, and my son at least can defend the city well enough. He might be untried on a greater campaign, but sieges are ridiculously easy. No, my initial estimate was correct, my time will be better spent in the field. That will only become more certain when Josef Serret arrives there, Tywin thought.

While he was reasonably happy with his two children's leadership in King's Landing, Tywin was concerned about the type of accusations flying around now. They were as polarizing as he feared they would be, and he knew that both of the surviving Baratheon brothers would be striking out. If Stannis has already struck for Kings landing, I couldn't arrive there at any time to do anything, I need to deal with what I know, not with what I fear. If I can keep the Riverlands out of it, I can crush Stannis with my larger forces when my second army begins to move. And as for Renly, he'll be able to field the largest army, but if he tries to lead himself, hah!

"Now if Randyll Tully is in command, that is a different kettle of fish." He thought aloud, something which made some of his men look at him. One of them stepped forward before being waved back. He didn't need their minds on this, it wasn't as if they had any new intelligence to add.

Still, raising that large an army will take time, time enough for my own second echelon to arrive at the borders and start their march. Plus my orders to house Clegane and the mercenaries there will no doubt draw off some of that strength. Until then, I can be better served by smashing the Riverlands, stopping their forces from joining Stannis or Renly and preparing for the Northern incursion. He counted off names in his head of the various lords and noble houses in the Riverlands, going through how they would respond to the current events one by one.

Eventually he nodded, then began to pen some more messages to a few of them. One or two he knew would cause issues, but he also knew that without Tully to rally them, they would lack the ability to meet him in open battle. And as for the ones who were already his agents, they knew him well enough to know what would happen if they tried to double cross him.

Outside there was a roar, and the thundering of feet. Lord Lannister frowned and turned to gaze over at the youngest man present. "Go see if that's the attack going in."

The man nodded and scuttled out returning quickly. "Yes Lord, our forces have finished surrounding the keep and are now pressing in from all sides not just this one. Lord Kenning reports that it looks as if the assault at the back was repulsed, but the defenders are spread so thinly now our forces are getting up on the wall in numerous places. We haven't made much headway beyond that, but it's only a matter of time."

Lord Lannister nodded, turning his thoughts back to the future but a sudden thought occurred to him. He turned back and said "Tell Lord Kenning that I want the maester of the keep taken alive as well as all of his ravens. I will need them to send words to King's Landing of what has occurred here, as well as some orders back to my brother and children."

Tywin wanted to preserve the number of ravens in his army, and doing this would allow him to stretch their numbers nicely, though of course he couldn't be contacted from elsewhere in the same manner. The younger man didn't seem to understand his reasoning, but he nodded obediently and ran off.

Two hours later the battle is over. He had lost something like three hundred men, but house Vance was done, their Lord, their heir, the lady of the house, and her young daughter put to the sword, after Lord Kenning and a few of his men had fun with them of course. Their land would be incorporated into either the Westerlands itself, or Tywin would later give it over to someone else in the Riverlands one of their neighbors if he they proved more intelligent.

"We'll stay here for the night." he said looking up at his commanders. "Tomorrow, we'll leave Damon here with a thousand men to retain Wayfarer's Rest and hold the pass open. The rest of us will march further into the Riverlands and sack any castle that doesn't bend the knee to the King."

As his lords cheered at the idea, Tywin smiled thinly. If they don't bend the knee, they will all learn why the Rains of Castamere is so well known in the Westerlands personally.

OOOOOOO

Five men there had been to take on this single target, and now only two remained alive. They had made the mistake of assuming that the target was drunk and come up on him in the night as he slept by the roadside under a tree. Sandor Clegane had been prepared for treachery, the first man being gutted by his heavy longsword showed an example of such preparation.

But two of the others had bows, and four arrows had slowed their target down, though not before he had slain a second of their band. The third died when he got too close to what should have been a corpse, only to find the man's plate mail had stooped the arrows from fully penetrating. Still, the third man had near to chopped his arm off before going down with their target's dagger in his throat, and the archers had simply filled the man with arrows until he looked more like a pincushion than a man.

After that the two archers had taken the time to bury their fellows, ruffling through their money pouches first of course. After that the man they had been hired to kill was also buried there by the road, not the first and certainly not the last. Sandor Clegane, the man called the Hound, was buried there, his unmarked grave barely a weeks' travel away from the keep he had hoped to call his own soon.

OOOOOOO

The dockworkers and other smallfolk were cheering as Ranma stepped down the gangplank, followed by father, then his sister and his uncle. Daenerys and the others waited onboard for the moment, with Fenris there. That was actually Brynden's idea, he felt Daenerys needed to make an immediate impression.

In front of the wharf a carriage had pulled up moments before. Now Lord Manderly himself got out with his entire family around him. That wasn't surprising though what was, was seeing Theon, Smalljon and Daryn there as well grinning at Ranma as he walked down the plank, Ice in its sheathe on his back (it was a greatsword after all, and too tall for him to wear at his side).

At the sight of his friends Ranma laughed, leaping forward. They pulled them into hugs one after another as they thumped and pounded on his back amid demands from all of them to hear what had happened.

Eddard shook his head resignedly at his son's complete dismissal of all decorum, leaning on his daughter for support at the moment. "Lord Manderly." he said bowing slightly. "I thank you for your service and those of your men. Without your forethought, the Fish's Scale's and the men aboard, I would not be here today."

Lord Manderly chuckled into his goatee at the boisterous greeting going on to one side, bowing his head to his Lord. "You trusted me to provide you with an escape route my Lord, it behooved me to provide you with the best one I could."He frowned looking up at the ship. "Where is captain Woolfield, did he fall in battle?"

That question broke Ranma out of his joy at seeing his friends after so many months. "He and many others Lord Manderly."Ranma said moving over to shake the man's hand in a warrior's clasp before doing the same to his two sons. Both younger mansmiled at him, clapping him on the shoulder in return for the gesture which he returned, before turning back to Wyman. "It's quite a tale to tell, since he didn't die in King's Landing but after."

Lord Manderly shook his head. At first Wyman had thoughts to offer one of his daughters to lady Catelyn for Ranma to marry. But frankly he was too wild, and Ranma had never looked at them with favor much like the Karstark girl Alys. Since then, he had made other plans for them, both of which in this time of chaos made even more sense, and Alys had been promised to Daryn nearly two years ago. The two young people had apparently become besotted with one another after a few meetings, and their mothers had pushed to solidify the arrangement despite Lord Karstark's hope for his daughter to marry Ranma, something Wyman could have told him would never happen given how Ranma treated Alys like a sister.

Still despite his wild nature Ranma was a good man, and would make an excellent Lord. Indeed, Lord Manderly was happy with all of the children of Lord Stark that he had met, and the only one he hadn't was young Rickon and the latest babe.

"I see." he said, now, looking at Ranma and then to the ship. "Well, we can speak about that later I suppose. But this surely cannot be young Sansa!" he exclaimed looking at the beautiful young woman before him. "By the Seven child, it's only been a few years since I've seen you and look at you now!"

Sansa blushed a little, but leaned upwards, kissing Lord Manderly on the cheek and then moving over to hug his sons and daughters. "It is good to be home in the North my Lord." she said, turning to him again, her voice trembling a little.

She had loved so many things about the South, but when it all been ripped away by war she realized that all of what she loved was so shallow. Some of it was simply a lie, some of it was just the trivial desires of a young girl and it was time for such things to be put aside for what really mattered; integrity, being able to trust those around you, to be safe and to be loved.

At that point Sansa turned back to the ship and looked at the sail master who had come down the gangway to formally greet his Lord. Stepping towards him she spoke in a loud, clear voice so that his crew up on the ship could hear along with the crowd around them who were still cheering. "Ser, thank you for your aid in getting us all home to the North. Without your sea knowledge and leadership we would not be here. Please, take this with my thanks."

With that, Sansa pulled out from her small sea bag a heavy coat of wool, dyed in various colors of green and sea blue. It was a magnificent work, and one that had taken up quite a lot of her time aboard ship for just this moment.

"A gift from the lady!" someone shouted from the crowd, causing Sansa to blush. The sail master also flushed in happiness at the gift, almost like a young boy before reaching out and taking it with gentle hands. "Thank you Lady Stark" he said bowing to Sansa. "And I am glad that we succeeded in returning you and your family to the North where you belong."

As the crowd cheered watching the gift be given, something that had spread Sansa's name far and wide, Lord Manderly smiled at the display but turned back to Ranma and the others. "You wrote in your note something about having the Stormborn with you? Might I ask what that was about?"

"Your answer is before you." Ranma said laughing lightly, waving his hand at the ship. At her cue, Daenerys appeared at the top of the gangway. Suddenly the crowd silenced itself, staring up at her.

Fenris padded down first, as if guarding the Targaryen girl. Daenerys followed, her head held high, her long silver hair flowing in the wind coming off the harbor, her violet eyes flashing with delight as she looked around the city. Behind her, not caged or chained in any way came her two dragons, now the size of medium sized dogs, walking on all fours, their wings furled against their backs, looking around with seeming as much interest in the city as their one could look at those animals or Daenerys and not realize what they represented.

While House Glover would have a problem with Daenerys's presence, the present Lord Glover having lost his brother to the Mad King's insanity having been Brandon's squire, he was the exception to the rule of how the return of the dragons would be seen here in the North. The North had never felt dragon fire not even in the Targaryen's conquest of Westeros since King Torrhen Stark had bent the knee rather than subject his people to that threat. They had remained mostly untouched by the rebellion, and for the most part the smallfolk had good or ambivalent memories of House Targaryen.

Say what you would for how they went about it, but House Targaryen's forced unification of Westeros had stopped much of the internecine warfare that went on all the time between the different nations. True, violence had flared up occasionally but that was better than the almost constant warfare previously. The Riverlands fought the North, the Vale fought the North, the North fought them both and the Ironborn occasionally, and of course each other. It was long thought by the smallfolk that it was the coming of the dragons that had truly brought a semblance of peace to the realm.

Because of this most of the North hadn't blamed the Targaryen family for the Mad King's deeds. The slaughter of the children in particular had infuriated many of the northern lords seeing it as dishonorable in the extreme. Lord Bolton might not have thought that way, but he was dead, and anyone who thought like him kept their thoughts to themselves.

Behind Daenerys and her dragons came Myrcella and Alayaya. The two of them almost disappeared in the crowd's cognitive perception however as the men and women all stared at the dragons and Daenerys Stormborn.

Smiling Ranma waved his hand towards the three girls to come forward. "Lord Manderly, be known to Princess Myrcella Baratheon. There are some questions there, but treat her as such for now." He said in a lower voice, before going on in a more normal level. "The lady behind her as Alayaya and last but certainly not least, this is Daenerys Targaryen, my fiancée."

Lord Manderly's eyes widened in shock then narrowed in speculation as a small smile appeared on his bearded face. "Interesting, very interesting on many levels."

"Truly, you have a gift for the understatement my friend." Eddard said. "Still, her dowry is something no one else can match, and it will add legitimacy to our future plans."

While Smalljon and Daryn were silent, simply staring, Theon burst out in an awed tone. "By the Drowned God Ranma, when you go hunting you hook the best game of all!"

"Eyes back in your head Greyjoy," Ranma mock-growled. "Or I'll tell her about how I finally changed your attitude to that Iron Price crap."

Theon gulped but Daenerys laughed. "Oh, don't bother, Sansa has already mentioned that one. You didn't think there weren't any witnesses to that episode did you? I don't suppose though you have any equally embarrassing stories about this one?" She waved a hand at Ranma, laughing quietly.

Lord Manderly frowned for a few silent seconds, then smiled. He reached back into his coach, and pulled out a large flowing cloak made of bear and wolf's skin. Fenris growled a little at seeing it, but then ignored it with lordly disdain.

"I had anticipated something like this, though the fiancé bit through me." Wyman said dryly to Eddard. "My lady, the North is cold, might I present this cloak to you for your convenience?"

Turning away from Theon's scowl, Ranma took it from him as Daenerys nodded, smiling faintly at the large, fat man. Ranma had filled her in on Lord Manderly, and how judging him by his looks would be a mistake of epic proportions. Indeed, she could see there was something very shrewd looking out of those twinkling eyes of his and rather liked that. "Thank you my Lord, the North is rather cold in terms of weather, though I feel there are more important things to a nation than whether or not you can go around in silk shirts, and your welcome has been as warm as I could ever hope."

She looked up at Ranma from her smaller height, not coquettishly as so many girls had done over the last few years, but challengingly with a smirk on face as he put the cloak around her shoulders pulling it tight. She licked her lips a little bit, knowing that drove him wild and saw the spark in his eyes before he turned away, causing her to chuckle under her breath.

Ranma took two more cloaks from Lord Manderly's carriage. These were made of mink furs and he put them over Myrcella and Sansa, pulling them both to him in one-armed hugs before he helped them into the carriage, then his father. Daenerys however refused to join them. She instead took on one of the horse prepared for them, while the two young dragons rode Fenris, a rather amusing sight if she were honest.

The crowds gathered everywhere they went through the city up to the keep, to stare at Daenerys on her horse as they rode past, with the two dragons curled up on Fenris' back beside noise of the crowd was beginning to get to them both, but Daenerys was fully connected to them both mind to mind, calming them down with words of affection love and commands to remain calm. Fenris too seemed to be irritated, but nowhere near as much as Ranma had reported he had been in King's Landing.

The smell certainly is much better than that of king's Landing is supposed to be, Daenerys thought, looking around. The city was also different from any of the cities in Essos she had seen. Those were such a hodgepodge of new and old, organized and disorganized, small and large and well-kept all the way to just falling apart. This city was organized in a way that she hadn't ever seen in a city before, very clean and it was obvious to see designed for defense as well. It was almost as if the whole city could become a fortress, not just the outer walls but everything, which was in fact the case.

Lord Manderly and his ancestors had planned everything about White Harbor and defense was always foremost in their minds. Even the interior of the city was like would've missed one such idea and its significance if Ranma and the others hadn't pointed them and there were a few four stories tall houses, all of which were made of stone like small keeps or holdfasts, with flat roofs for the walls were ever lost the defenders could pull back to them and keep fighting from these houses. Each of them was within bow range of the ones near it, and commanded a view down into the city around them.

After Theon had finished explaining that Sansa stuck her head out the window of the carriage. "Ignore them. Ranma and his friends only care about military stuff. You should come and see the bazar here, the markets and the shopping stalls are a lot of fun, and they have some very interesting jewel work, and this local bread, it has some kind of local oil mixed into it, and its lovely. Oh, and I can show you some northern dress styles!"

"I doubt we'll have time for that Sansa." Daenerys replied laughing, leaning over to cup the younger girl's face for a moment. "Besides, I'm afraid I am not as fashion-conscious as you are. Indeed, you'll have to be in charge of my wardrobe once we get settled into Winterfell."

"I'll hold you to that." Sansa laughed, already turning back to talk excitedly to Myrcella about it, who rolled her eyes. She wasn't as much of a fashion butterfly as her friend, but she wasn't going to ruin her friend's parade by interrupting her.

Later that evening Ranma, his father, uncle and Daenerys (who had spent most of the day in a bath, along with Alayaya and Myrcella) met with Lord Manderly, his sons and the wolfsworn. They were joined at Daenerys' behest by Domic, and also a surprise guest: Robin Flint, heir of Widow's Watch.

Robin was a thirty something man who had traveled down to the city to take part of this discussion before heading back home, unwilling to take the time to go all the way to Winterfell. He didn't even want to be here in White Harbor, or anywhere at all away from his lady wife. Limira Lightfoot was the firstborn daughter of House Lightfoot, who held Ramsgate, a normally healthy and cheerful woman, but she was recovering from a very bad miscarriage. It was an emotional and physically trying time for her, and Robin was unwilling to be away from Limira for long.

Knowing that Robin and Wyman would not make the trip up to Winterfell, Eddard laid out what had happened in King's Landing, as well as the act of treachery that had sparked it. He made certain to underscore his guards and the Riverrun men's acts of heroism, how well they had fought, and in particular Ser Jory's heroic rescue of Eddard himself from the Kingslayer, going into his own wounds and thus explaining why he was stepping down for his son. Then when Ranma showed no signs of doing so Eddard told them how Ranma had gone into the city to rescue Sansa. That feat had everyone but the wolfsworn astonished while they simply clapped Ranma on the back for the deed.

But then Ranma told them what Sansa had said about the prisoners being executed, and the feeling of the meeting nosedived. After that Ranma looked around at them all, his eyes dark as he looked at their grim faces. "I don't know if they have other prisoners from the tower fight, but we can't let that effect our actions going forward."

Brynden nodded. "Besides, if Joffrey was willing to kill Greentree and the others in a fit of pique, he might have already done worse to the other prisoners after Ranma rescued Sansa. Regardless, they all fell in battle, and their families need to be told and rewarded for the loyalty of their men."

After that Ranma took up the tale once more, filling them in on what had happened with Lord Stannis' attempt to take the ship, the horror of the Shadow Warriors, and his own thoughts on what that would mean in the near future, as well as their own plans. Ranma's decision to march down into the Riverlands to help Lord Tully and the Riverlands lords was met with approval.

Lord Manderly however was rather pragmatic, and he came to what he saw as the crux of the matter quickly. "I have no issues with the war you are beginning to prepare my Lord, and agree with the fact that it should only be a medium-sized force we send, especially with what's been going on up on the Wall, and the reality of the threat beyond." He ignored Robin's raised eyebrow, staying to the main issue. "However, such things will take money. Should we start forging a new currency now? Based off of silver perhaps?"

"Yes." Ranma said nodding sharply. "When the time comes, we'll start issuing silver coinage to our men. I won't be paying our men through what we take in battle, that will be bonuses divided out after the fight at times, then possibly sent back north since on the march there won't be much for them to spend their loot on, though in the Riverlands such will be scarce unless we are on an opposing lord's land, and even then I won't allow any pillaging of the smallfolk. Order, discipline and speed will be watchwords in my army. But that's not all I want from you Lord Manderly, your city or yours, Robin."

"I presume you mean something other than sending some of my men with you?" Robin asked before Wyman could respond. "I refuse to leave my wife for long as I said earlier, but I can send some men under my master-at-arms."

"Hold off on that Robin, I don't want your men with me, I'll want them here to deal with the other issue I have for both of you. I will want some of your heavy cavalry though, Wyman"

"My city and my house are at your disposal, of course." Wyman replied, cocking one eyebrow.

"I know that, but it's good to hear anyway." Ranma said with a smile. "My idea for both of you is about Sisterton."

Eddard looked up at him sharply. "We didn't discuss that, what do you intend Ranma?"

It was Daenerys who replied. The two of them had talked about this since the smuggler attempted to attack them. "If the Vale cannot control those smugglers, and at present the Vale is splintering thanks to the weakness of its ruling family, we will."

Ranma nodded. "The smugglers have always been an obstacle to trade here, this attack on us was just the last straw, besides the Vale's control of them has always been tenuous at best, more a thing of law than reality. I want the Three Sisters captured, their lords removed and either arrested or executed depending on if they try to fight back and were connected to their smuggling and pirate activity."

He turned to his friends. "Theon, you'll be in command of the naval forces. Given what everyone has told me about how well you led the defenses of the convoys heading up to the Wall I doubt any of the captains will have an issue with that."

Lord Manderly and his two sons both nodded firmly, while Theon flushed slightly at the praise as Smalljon clapped him hard on the back. None of them had any doubts about Theon's ability to command at sea. For his part, Theon was slightly unhappy to be sidelined like that, but he could see the reasoning behind it.

Seeing that, Ranma smiled at his childhood friend then went on. "Wylis, you'll command the invasion forces, made up of your own men and those of your family Robin. I trust I don't have to tell you my views on discipline, or the treatment of female prisoners?"

While he was not a wolfsworn, Wylis and his younger brother Wendel had spent quite a lot of time around Ranma at one point or another, and knew his views on rape. How that could be stopped during a sack of a town was another question, but Wylis was also a true knight and had his own views on such, so was determined to at least try. Thus he simply nodded his eyes hard. "What about male prisoners?"

"If they are willing to live under Northern rule, let them retain their current lands and possessions. If not, then they will need to be shipped up to the Wall or be forced to be of use on other projects going forward." Ranma shrugged philosophically.

"Is there anyway we can send supplies down to slightly beyond the Neck?" Daenerys said looking at the map that was on one wall of Lord Manderly's study. "I would presume that such would allow us and the army to march down much more quickly if we don't have to carry all our supplies with us."

"We don't have enough lift capacity in the city to lift an army of any appreciable size just yet, but yes we can transport foodstuffs and other items easily. I believe there's a small fishing village on the edge of Lord Reed's territory that sometimes bring up items from the Neck, ingredients for medicine and other things, though they sell most of that down in the Riverlands. It will take a few months but we could enlarge it and make it into some kind of supply depot." Wyman replied, his eyes narrowed thoughtfully at the 'we' part of that sentence.

"Excellent." Daenerys replied enthusiastically. "That could also allow us to bring in reinforcements somewhat quickly if we need them. I would think House Locke could send troops down that way much faster than overland for example."

Ranma nodded, smirking a bit, though his eyes were still hard. "I want the whole of the Bite under our control. If we have the Bite locked down we can then use portions of the Navy to reinforce us elsewhere further south, which'll be needed if we have to take the fight to Dragonstone in particular, and could come as a shock to the Vale if Lysa or whoever replace her comes in on the Lannister or Baratheon side of things. But behind that, what kind of force can you send with the army?"

"I will send Wendel here with a seven hundred heavy cavalry and six hundred heavy infantry straight down to the Moat within four days' time." Wyman said decisively, Wendel nodding in agreement. "I'll start working on creating a silver-backed currency as well."

Wylis smiled. "You'll be traveling back to Winterfell up the White Knife most of the way. It's slower going up the river, but is still faster than on foot. Well..." He laughed looking over at Ranma. "For most of us anyway."

While his son and Daenerys laughed, Eddard leaned forward eagerly from where he had been propped up on some cushions by the table. "Tell me about that. How are Bran and Catelyn doing, what have they been up to the past few months? We'd gotten some news of Bran's work on the White Knife in the monthly messages I shared with my lady wife before everything went to the crapper in King's Landing but I crave current news of my family."

Lord Manderly smiled gently at the other man, knowing how important family was to Lord Stark, despite his stern appearance. The rest of the night was taken up by discussing Bran's work on the White knife, the issue of steel and how it would pertain to the coming campaign and the pay for the men who would be joining the army, and other sundry items throughout the night.

Later that evening, after everyone else had gone to bed Ranma bid good night to Daenerys, then stayed up with his three friends, talking about their own adventures. He was pleased with most of what he heard, though he hoped that Theon wouldn't be needed in command of the convoy system for a while, since Theon would be needed to command the fleet against the sisters. The waters around the sisters were nasty to anyone who didn't know them, the reason, along with them bending the knee to the Vale, which explained why the Lockes and Manderlys hadn't gone in and wiped them out long since. Theon's ability to control a naval action and anticipate his opponents moves would be needed there, hence his appointment.

As for the wildlings, well, Ranma thought complacently, they were just screwed. They would've had trouble fighting the Night's Watch alone with the Wall's aid, it was so good defensible position, now through they had no chance. It remained to be seen however if the King Beyond the Wall realized that, or indeed had any alternative to simply try to bull rush ahead. The wildlings were not like any army of civilized people, they were a fractious horde, one that would sooner rush headlong into a slaughter than simply give up and go home.

Worse, Ranma was certain Mance and his people knew about the threat rising behind them. No, Mance would have to at least make a real, concerted effort to get past the Wall to save his own position, and to attempt to save his own people from the White Walkers. But if he did, their losses would be hideous. Still, that was a problem for the future. For now, he had human issues to deal with in the south first.

As Smalljon and Daryn left the table to get some more ale, with Smalljon ribbing his friend about his upcoming marriage, Theon turned to Ranma. "I had a thought by the way."

"Oh no!" Ranma said shaking his head and coming out of his own thoughts. "That's never a good sign."

"Shut up." Theon said pushing his shoulder lightly. He sat there silently for moment then looked over at Ranma again. "The Ironborn. We could get them on our side you know. They've got a fleet, and they've no doubt recovered from their rebellion against the throne, and they'll have no love of either the Lannisters or the Baratheons. If you sent me..."

"No." Ranma said emphatically shaking his head. "For one thing, I need you right where you are. You've seen it, the fleet of White Harbor isn't very experienced, they need someone who knows how to use them in a fleet action leading them, and right now that's you. I was serious, I want the entirety of the Bite under firm Northern control, regardless of the outcome of this war that is going to be a done deal."

Ranma and Daenerys were envisioning that as being part of a transportation renaissance for the North, and maybe even for the Riverlands if some of Ranma's other plans down there worked out. Daenerys had waxed eloquent on how much the ability to trade with one another had influenced the Free cities, making them all rich and trade could be the lifeblood of a middle-class, which in turn could fuel innovation going forward. Ranma was incredibly happy with what Bran had done so far, but he would love to see Westeros start taking its first steps beyond the Middle Ages in his lifetime. He just wished he personally could do more, but he had been a middling student past, and that had come back to haunt him here.

"For another, Theon none the other Ironborn have gone through your epiphany, I haven't hung any of them out a window after all."

With no girl around to try to impress Theon simply shook his head with a faint smile. It had been an interesting experience, though at the time it had been terrifying too. Yet for all his fear at that moment, it had marked the turning point in his relationship with the rest of the wolfsworn. He stopped carping about the Iron Price and the honor of his people, and, while one or two of them still saw him as an outsider, most had welcomed him after that.

"But surely as allies," Theon began again.

"The Ironborn are no allies of anyone Theon." Ranma interrupted him, his voice gentle, but still stern. "They burn, they pillage, they rape. You think I can win the hearts and minds of people if I align myself with a force like that? Besides, they would never agree to it. Not even if we sent you." he said holding up a hand when Theon went to speak. "They'll strike wherever the rest of Westeros is weak, so long as that isn't us it's something that'll work in our favor, and we don't have to ally with them to get that. Indeed, if we sent you to them, it might be seen as a sign of weakness regardless of anything else."

Theon actually paused to think about that for a moment then nodded unwillingly. "All right, I can see that. I just thought..."

"I know." Ranma replied, clapping him on the shoulder. "It's a hard thing to turn your back on your people, but you have to realize, they weren't worth your allegiance in the first place."

Theon nodded slowly, though his face still showed turmoil but Ranma's next words wiped that out of his mind. "After you're done taking the Three Sisters, if Daenerys and I haven't called for the fleet to move further down into the rest of Westeros, feel free to burn out that pirate Island of yours, Skane was it? In fact, depending on conditions on the island you might have earned your own title there."

"What?" Theon said coming out of his maudlin and rather self-destructive thoughts. "What do you mean?"

Ranma shrugged. "We know that the wildlings and the enemy beyond them can get around the Wall somehow, maybe they're doing it by the Gorge, maybe they're doing it by sea. Regardless, having a fortress on that island to control the Bay of Seals would be a good idea. It could be the northernmost outpost of our fleet, which means it would need its own lord. I can't think of anyone else for that, can you?"

Theon grinned, the last vestiges of ill humor leaving him as Smalljon and Daryn returned with the ale.

OOOOOO

That night Myrcella shared a suite with Daenerys, something both of them and gotten used to over time and something Daenerys wished to continue if Myrcella was going to become her official handmaiden. Not only would it be difficult on campaign to have more than a single tent devoted to her, Daenerys wanted to keep Myrcella around to help with her dragons. The two draklings had surprised Daenerys by allowing Myrcella to touch them and even to feed them occasionally. She had been extremely helpful after the two little dragons molted the first time. That was a very touchy time for them all, with Daenerys and Myrcella helping Sunfyre and Rhaegon remove the dried bits of scale.

Normally it would have been an impossible task for anyone of Non-Targaryen blood, but the young draklings were on their best behavior with Fenris giving a continuous warning growl from his place nearby. Fenris had no hesitation where Myrcella was concerned, she was pack, that was all there was to it in his mind. The two flyer-cubs were pack too, but they were young, and sometimes the young didn't realize how strong they were or when play fights became real, a problem made worse by how weak some of the two-legs were. It was the job of the elders to teach them this, and he was happy to help.

Myrcella and Daenerys woke up the next morning to a knock on their door, followed swiftly by Ranma poking his head in. "You two decent?" At Daenerys's nod he came in followed by a harried looking maid carrying a tray of food. Ranma had attempted to purloin it from her, but she had beaten off the Lord Stark's attempt at being helpful, certain in her duties, but it had been a near run thing.

The two girls didn't know that, all they knew was that the maid brought with her the most magnificent thing that Myrcella had ever tasted, mulled cider with a tiny touch of cinnamon, a major export of the Cinnamon Straits. It was extremely expensive here in Westeros, and Myrcella had only been allowed even a hint of it before on special occasions. Here in White Harbor it was even more expensive given the distance and it was a sign of the regard Lord Manderly held the ladies and Lord Stark that it was available at all.

Daenerys sipped appreciatively at her mulled cider, though she had added bit of honey to her portion. For a moment there was silence save for the appreciative noises of the ladies broken when Daenerys let loose a last approving hum of pleasure before speaking. "I might have to keep you Ranma," she laughed, laying her head against his shoulder for a moment as he sat on the bed beside her.

At her mental okay the two draklings scooted over to their plates from their places by her bed, eating daintily but quickly. Their manners had improved as the weeks went by, something she was very happy to see.

Ranma looked over at Myrcella, one hand grabbing up a bagel and spreading some fresh churned cream cheese over it, slicing it in half for him and Daenerys. "So, are you going to be up to helping us with Tyrion, Merry?"

Myrcella finished chewing a bite of fresh bread, then nodded. "I've always liked Uncle Tyrion, even if my mother didn't for some reason. I honestly have no idea why the two of them were so at odds, I don't think the Imp ever did anything to hurt her, embarrass yes but not hurt or humiliate. But my mother was strange like that. I won't say he was very close to any of the three of us, but he was kind at least." She sighed sadly as she always did considering her mother. "He'll believe me about Joffrey I think, the rest of it..." She shrugged.

"Do you..." she went on hesitantly looking up at Ranma. "Do you think I could contact my mother? I, I would like her to know that I'm safe at least."

"I told her you were with us when I rescued Sansa." Ranma replied then bit into his own fresh bagel. After a moments chewing he went on. "She asked me to take care of you, something I was going to do anyway but she'll know it without you telling her. I won't say no you won't ever be able to talk to her Myrcella, but, and I know you don't want to hear this, she's the enemy right now."

"I know, and I know, I mean I know I have you to thank for keeping me safe, but it's still a hard thing to think of." Myrcella said shrugging her shoulders. "She and I, we were never, we weren't as close as I think Lady Catelyn and Sansa are, but there was never any doubt that she cared for me. It was a possessive sort of thing, but at least it was there. Joffrey!" she spat the name like it was a curse. "He can go to the Stranger, and I hope I'm there to see it."

Ranma nodded, not saying anything but merely reaching across the distance between the larger and smaller bed (brought in from another room for Merry at Daenerys' request) to rub her hair consolingly. "If I can swing it, you will be. Joffrey has a lot to answer for." They both do, he thought grimly, but refused to say it. Whatever his own feelings toward the queen he knew she was the instigator of the current crisis, and thus had to pay for it.

The meal passed for a few moments silently then Daenerys asked "Do you think we'll have time after the meeting with Tyrion to send a raven up to Castle Black? I wasn't aware of it, but last night Smalljon said that the maester there is a former Targaryen. I would like to talk to him, if only by raven."

"We can do that. White Harbor's almost like Winterfell, it's got ravens trained to home in on practically every Castle on this side of the North, and Castle Black as well. Though I'm sorry I missed that. I only met him for a few minutes and his hair is so gray you can't tell what color it was originally. If I had, we could've asked Theon to bring him down to meet with us here."

"I doubt that would have happened. He's so old he can't get all around very well, and very rarely leaves his rooms in Castle Black at all." Daenerys said with a shrug which did interesting things to her night dress.

She smirked as she noticed Ranma's eyes flicker downward for just an instant, and was tempted to tease him further but decided against it for now. She wasn't going to rub their relationship in Myrcella's face like that, and had been careful not to do that since the two of them formally got together. Daenerys had come to genuinely like the younger girl, regardless of her parentage or how much she looked like a Lannister.

"Hopefully he'll be awake and still alive by the time we turn our attention that way. But if not, I would like to at least talk to him via raven if nothing else."

Ranma nodded, though he wasn't as hopeful about that. He knew the campaign down south would take a minimum two or three, maybe even five years, by which time the White Walkers might actually be at the Wall. He hoped the magic's in the Wall were still keeping them at bay, though it was obvious that they had weakened considerably going by the ambush he and the other wolfsworn walked into.

With a sigh he stood up. "I believe Tyrion will have finished his own breakfast by this point, let's get this over with one way or the other." Myrcella looked at him sharply with that last word, which had come out much more grimly than the rest of the sentence, but didn't say anything. Instead she stood up, and looked at Daenerys. "Do you want to go first in the bath or might I?"

"Me, I believe rank has priority in such things." Daenerys said laughing quietly at the other girl's pout. "Besides which I think we can both fit in that monstrosity." The fact that this would be their third bath since being given this room was not mentioned, baths were a magnificent luxury after more than two months at sea, potable water being so precious on any ship. In fact all four of the girls had delighted in the baths here since arriving in White Harbor, and Sansa had waxed eloquently on the baths in Winterfell as well. Those were heated from the Hot Springs that made Winterfell such an amazing place when it became colder out, but these were good enough for them all for now.

"I'll wait outside." Ranma said. "Unless," he whispered in Daenerys' ear, his hormones getting the better of him for once. "You want me to wash your back?"

She laughed smacking his chest for a moment and pushing him away. "Away with you, you cad!"

Ranma laughed standing up and motioning to the trio of animals who were watching things it with various degrees of understanding and amusement. After looking at their mistress the two draklings followed un-biteable two-legs out of the room with four-legs elder.

OOOOOO

About an hour and a half later Ranma led the two ladies into the suite that had been given over to Tyrion. The Imp jumped up from a pile of cushions where he had been reading a scroll of some kind, and bowed grandly to Ranma. "I see you survived the south young Stark, and come back with in strange company." He said musingly staring at Daenerys. "I hadn't actually believed the rumors I've heard since coming here. Lady Stormborn, I can't say you're welcome in Westeros, because I'm certain my family for one would not do so. Indeed, I'm sort of confused as to why the young Stark and his House are so wishful to see your family and your particular brand of flame-based insanity return. Tell me, have you already developed the pension for burned human flesh, or does that come later?"

"Your tongue is as sharp as rumored." Daenerys said smiling thinly. "Yet tell me why I should care one way or the other about the word of a man whose family condones child killing and rapine? Is there such a difference between us, that one of my family members did that through madness, whereas yours father ordered it through cold calculation?"

"A hit, a very palpable hit!" Tyrion replied grandly, holding his chest as if struck by an arrow, though his eyes did not lose any of their seriousness despite his playacting.

He turned to look at Ranma and then at Myrcella bowing his head. "Princess. Are we then to be two hostages together? I have to inform you that my father at least would not care a jot about me, and my sister may well pay you to kill me if it comes up. The Princess though, she might at least be a good bargaining tool."

"She is not a tool!" Ranma growled, stepping forward and putting a hand on Myrcella's shoulder protectively. He didn't even realize he was doing it, but the very idea of someone treating anyone he cared about as if they were a pawn in the game of politics infuriated him. It would never even have occurred to Ranma to use Merry in that manner. However now it had been spoken he knew that his mother at least would assume that such could be done, and maybe one or two of his other lords.

Myrcella looked up at him with adoration in her eyes, loving him all the more for that while Daenerys smiled, shaking her head at her paramour's innate goodness. He was too honest and too good to play the politics game, and if Daenerys was honest with herself she loved that about him. She could play the game of politics though admittedly it wasn't exactly natural to her. She too liked to be direct in her own dealings.

"What you are Tyrion, is either a dead man walking or something else, to be determined by this discussion." Ranma said coolly. He gestured Myrcella and Daenerys to sit. He then explained in clipped, simple sentences what had happened in King's Landing, including Tommy's death apparently at Joffrey's order. Myrcella cut in at that point with Joffrey's admission of guilt.

Tyrion kept interrupting the tale with questions, trying to see if there was any break in Ranma's story, anything to indicate it was all a lie. If it had been, there would be hints, something, anything to hint that Ranma wasn't telling the truth. But from the moment he said that the three royal children might not be legitimate, Tyrion knew the rest was true. He wasn't about to sell out Jaime, but he knew who the true father of all three children were, and that made everything else make sense.

After Myrcella time in about Joffrey's admission, and Ranma described the battle from what his father had told him, Ranma fell silent looking at Tyrion. All three of them let Tyrion soak it in, though it didn't take nearly as long as Daenerys had expected. Tyrion was indeed as intelligent as they had been told he was. He turned to Myrcella and said. "I'm sorry this had to happen to you, and I'm sorry that Tommen died."

Then he turned to Ranma "For my part I agree that my sister has committed treason, and that my father might know something of it since he was already planning against you or was moving against you for his own reasons, notably the loss of influence in King's Landing. Those bandits on the borders you said, I'll agree that they were probably his men, and that there's no doubt that he's already moved into the Riverlands by this point. But what does that have to do with me? You said I'm not to be your hostage, so what am I supposed to be, or is this some elaborate way to make certain I don't head south on some stupid quest to aid my family?"

"That depends on you." Daenerys said entering the conversation for the first time. "Even before all this began, you were seen as separate from your siblings or your father, not just because you were the Imp, and all that entails but because you distanced yourself from them purposefully. Added to that the way your father treats you is well known. Just how loyal are you to your family Tyrion?"

"I am as loyal as anyone can be to a bed of scorpions who would do their best to kill me. My father's lack of respect has long since opened the way for the rest of the extended family to assume that they are one Imp's corpse away from being that much closer to his Lordship." Tyrion said bluntly. There had been a time when he had still hoped to become lord of Casterly Rock, and before he had been to the Wall.

He noticed Myrcella flinch at his statement, but didn't offer the girl any consolation. She would learn, the Lannister family was a den of treacherous bastards. Oh, they were quick to close ranks against any outside opponent but that didn't make the backbiting any less deadly. They could all go hang for all he cared. In that family backstabbing and fighting for position was second nature, else Tyrion would never have spent his time at court.

The only one he cared about was Jaime, and he had literally made his own bed in this case. There was no way Tyrion could see for him to get free and down south to protect Jaime from himself. If I wanted to do that, I'm about 16 years too late anyway. He thought morosely. And how exactly would I have done that in this case? 'Now remember Jaime, don't listen to anything that bitch says', or 'remember to pull out Jaime'? Or 'whatever she wants after Jaime, force-feed her some moon tea'?

Daenerys smiled, thinly but with an edge of actual amusement if not warmth in her expression. "That is precisely what we wanted to hear. Yours is a mind we would hate to see wasted, and that was the other possible outcome of this meeting." Her eyes hardened. "Make no mistake, while we will extend mercy to those who deserve it, your family in the main has not proven worthy of it. Your family is built on betrayal, on ambition and dark deeds. We mean to smash House Lannister's power, to either scatter it or break it for all time."

"You'll not get any argument from me." Tyrion said shrugging. Oh he liked, hells he wallowed in some of the trappings of his name when he could, but he had become used to simply being Tyrion, master of siege-craft in the past half a year. He had built himself a life up on the Wall, one where he was respected and listened for his own merits, not for his family's connections. He didn't have to watch his words, didn't have to watch what he ate or who he talked to or the shadows for his sister's servants always ready to rat him out to her, or his father's machinations. "So am I to take the Black?"

"Not quite." Ranma said smiling now. This was going better than he had hoped. "You've been doing exceptional work on the Wall from what Smalljon and Daryn reports, along with what Lord Commander Mormont sent via raven. The siege weapons you've created up there will be to the wildlings or any other threat from that area."

Tyrion pounced on that. "Any other threat? This wouldn't happen to have anything to do with the secret that Daryn and Smalljon were keeping? Odd pauses, odd silences, something the two of them talk to your uncle and old man Mormont about but no one else?"

Thanks to his very nervous life The Imp was very good at watching people, and had noticed that those four seemed to have a secret, one that was connected with but separate of the wildlings issue. He had never tried to ferret that secret out, but it was there and seemed to color their response to the wildling threat. Frankly the siege engines on the wall were overkill in the extreme if they were just facing normal wildlings. A King Beyond the Wall's ability to galvanize the wildlings to overcome the Wall even without it being as well manned as it was now, let alone his little toys.

Ranma paused thoughtfully and looked over at any. The two of them communicated silently for a moment before Daenerys cocked one eyebrow and shrugged her shoulders slightly. Ranma nodded then turned back to Tyrion. "me, how educated are you on other threats that come from the north?"

Tyrion frowned going through his memory. "I've heard ancient bard songs about giants, mythical beasts, like your direwolf, and..." he paused thoughtfully and then went on much more slowly. "And something about the undead coming alive, and mystic beings that came with winter, the forces of winter alive in some fashion. I can't remember the whole tale."

By this point his eyes had widened significantly and he was looking between Ranma Daenerys and Myrcella in shock. "W-what exactly are we talking about here?"

"White Walker" Daenerys said coldly. "Ancient enemies of all life, and apparently no myth."

From there Ranma took up the tale, explaining what he and his friends had run into, explaining what the Wall had actually been built for by Bran the Builder all those millennia ago, the true threat that was once again rising to threaten all of Westeros.

By his side Myrcella listened attentively, having only heard snippets of this story before in particular the ambush the war wolfsworn had run into. She hadn't connected the White Walker's to the building of the Wall at all, and by his face, unguarded for just a moment, Tyrion hadn't either.

"I see why you were so anxious to get the Wall reinforced." Tyrion murmured. Even if it was just the Night's Watch they could have defended the wall from the wildlings, but from the White Walkers? If the magic of the Wall really is weakening, maybe they couldn't. I need to read up on them as much as I can, what works on them, what doesn't, anything.

Already Tyrion was making plans thinking of ways that his little toys could be used against the White Walkers. The alchemist's fire that had been delivered some weeks back, and its accompanying alchemists, all young, eager and willing to get their hands dirty, would make them deadly beyond anything else the defenders had in their arsenal.

He came out of his thoughts shaking his head. "That's interesting, and I applaud your forward thinking in getting your Northerners up there even if you couldn't share the true reasons with them. Still, and again, what does this have to do with me?"

Daenerys took up the conversation again. "The Night's Watch has truly lost its way in a fashion. It was always supposed to be a haven for those running from dishonorable past, but it was also supposed to be an honorable profession open to those men who saw the duty of the Night's Watch was one they could follow, but now it is seen as simply another recourse to prison for those who have no honor, with fewer volunteers every year. I have no idea how long the White Walkers will remain a threat, but we need to change the Night's Watch in a way, or perhaps I should say augment it, and through it the image of duty on the Wall."

Taking over smoothly from Daenerys, as if they had practiced this dozens of times, Ranma went on. "You asked if you would be joining the black, and in a way you will be joining their duties on the Wall not as a Night's Watchman but as a knight of a new knightly order. We'll be calling it the Order of the Ardent Defender. The order will hold land in the Gift, which will be gifted to your Order at the end of a five year probation period, where they can move from the Wall at will, have dependents or whatever. Your only objective will be to defend the Wall from any exterior threat, maintain it, and in particular the siege engines."

Daenerys' smile widened slightly as she took up the thread once again. "You will be this Order's Knight Commandant. You can name and raise anyone to it from the forces already at the Wall, providing they agree to it. And of course the order will have a knightly image to uphold. Not celibacy, but a certain way of acting, and no rape whatsoever will be tolerated."

Tyrion was in shock but that shock didn't stop him from thinking, and his eyes narrowed speculatively. "You would need to declare yourself queen to be able to create a knightly order, and to effect the Gift or the Night's Watch or the Wall in any way other than reinforcing it."

"It has been millennia since a king cared about the Night's Watch" Ranma said with a shrug. "Only the Lords Paramount of the North even noticed the Gift or the Wall at all. In any event we may be jumping the line a bit, but we will be declaring that soon enough. As it is, our independence and that of the North from the Iron Throne is already accomplished. I'll send the Raven to the Lord Commander, but I doubt he or anyone else on the Wall will have any issues with this. If there is, you'll be able to handle them, because you will answer directly to Lord Commander Mormont. Whether or not the Order succeeds or doesn't will be totally on you, we'll send a war chest up with you, but that's all. What you do with it, is up to you."

"One thing you will need to do be worthy of this honor is to give up your name." Daenerys said, once more taking over from Ranma with a smoothness that left Tyrion wondering how long the two of them had practiced this. It would have shocked him to learn they hadn't done any such thing. "You will leave the Lannister name behind, and everything that comes with it good or bad, and take up a new one of our choosing." She smiled slightly wider. "Don't worry, it won't be demeaning or humorous or anything of that nature."

Tyrion blanched at the very idea, but after a moment he realized that this was their side of this agreement. He could walk out of here with a new last name and this Knight Commandant of the new nightly order (and he did like the name Ardent Defender), or he wouldn't be walking out of here at all. Ranma's stare told him that. Nor was there any way to finagle his freedom either through oath given under duress or demanding to a trial by combat through champions. If Ranma was the teacher of Smalljon and Daryn, no one he could call on here in the North could match him.

And in the end what will I be leaving behind my name? One person out of the entire my family that I love, and I can't help him anyway. He would help our sister, that leaves me with nothing. This plan would also force Tyrion to finally let his admittedly naïve dream of being Lord of Casterly Rock go completely. He had known intellectually that such was a pipe dream at best for years, but he had held out hope for a long time. Now that particular hope was gone, but another one had taken its place. This one however was one that he could grasp through the use of his intellect rather than one mostly controlled by another.

And at least this way I will do some good, and my name will be remembered! It was astonishing how fierce he wanted that just then. He wanted Tyrion, the Imp to be remembered as more than a jester, as more than the little lion, as more than his father's son, unwanted or not. "I agree." he said blurting it out, not realizing how much of those last few thoughts had shown his face to the three across from him.

"Good." Ranma said smiling. Your new name then, will be Brightwall. Alluding to both your place on the Wall, and that you're quite bright."

"Leave the jokes to other people." Tyrion said shaking his head sadly. "I'll agree to the name but please that, just, no."

Ranma and the two ladies laughed then Ranma stood up. Daenerys stood up as well, and while Ranma leaned down to help Myrcella to her feet Daenerys addressed Tyrion again. "We'll have a formal renaming ceremony and a ceremony to inaugurate the commission of the order of the Ardent Defender in a few hours. Lord Manderly will be sending a few servants to prepare some clothing for you, but be aware Lord Commandant Brightwall, this was a one-time deal." Her eyes narrowed and suddenly Tyrion shivered not seeing the madness of her line there, just cool, cold purpose, worse than even his father's glare. "If you try to cross us, there will be no second chances."

Tyrion nodded mutely, and Ranma led the two ladies out of the room. True to their words, there was indeed a full ceremony done in the throne room of Lord Manderly several hours later, with Lord Manderly's able assistance after Ranma had told him the outcome of their discussion with the Imp.

After that, group started travelling up the White Knife, which was much slower than travel down river, but still faster than traveling overland would be. Upriver travel depended on paddlewheels, worked by oxen bought down in Runestone in the Vale. They were expensive, and all of them were owned by either House Stark, like this one, or House Manderly, but they were large and powerful able to move almost as much tonnage as a barge could down river.

The paddlewheel barges had been designed by a well-to-do farmer from House Stark lands, whose holdfast Bran and his guards had to use when two of their horses came up lame. Bran had immediately befriended the man, and when the farmer hesitantly offered his design based off a water wheel he had seen once, Bran jumped on it and immediately began to pay the man to teach others how to build them. Now Bran had several other smallfolk working for him who had similar ideas for how to build things, which Ranma was quietly ecstatic about when he heard. From that seed he hoped to see many things, and he definitely wanted to see it continue.

They had been joined by a few 'new' faces. Wyman's firstborn son Wylis went with them to represent him in the conclave that Catelyn had called in her husband's name, and Smalljon and Daryn of course went with them. Smalljon was looking forward to seeing if he could be fitted for his own lizard lion armor from the remaining skin of the beast that Ranma had killed in the Moat before heading south. Daryn had his upcoming wedding to Alys Karstark to look forward to, though Sansa had insisted on getting to work on creating a formal outfit for him on the trip. The amused glances of his friends did nothing to help Daryn become accustomed to Sansa's eagerness.

But while the next leg of their travel was beginning, elsewhere events were ongoing.

OOOOOOO

Beric nodded over at the archers, who silently raised themselves up from their position in the shadows of a small, almost imperceptible rise in the woodland, aiming down at the fires of a medium sized camp of the Lannister men who had betrayed them. They had split off from the Mummerns, the Mummerns making for deeper into the Riverlands while the Lannisters skirted down the mountain range towards the Deep Den, the nearest of the real entrances into the Westerlands, presumably unwilling to act further without orders.

This maneuver had allowed Beric's men the time to regain their morale, retreat to the Stony Sept, and rearm before coming back out after them. The walled town was rather famous for being the sight of the Battle of the Bells in Robert's Rebellion, where his victory or defeat had been tottering on a knife's edge, where he was rescued by Eddard and his army. The Mummerns, having no wish to be bogged down in a siege or the numbers to storm it once the city had been warned of their coming, had bypassed the Stony Sept, and were somewhere deeper into the Riverlands. But they were still too many of them for his men to take on just yet.

The Lannister forces that had betrayed them however, had taken the brunt of Thoros's last stand, and without horses were too slow to get away. They had barely four hundred men left, and were not the best equipped for a battle in the woods. Especially one where he and his people had been given the time to seed the woodland with various traps ahead of their advance.

Arrows flashed through the nighttime woodland, impacting several figures curled up by the fires, their dying gasps cutting through the normal nighttime sounds. A cry rose up, while more arrows flew, downing more men. But soon a response was formed, and fifty men from the camp barreled into the woods, torches and swords in hand.

They ran into prepared pitfalls, trip ropes, rabbit snares, and anything else Beric and his men could think up. Beric and the rest of his men moved forward quickly, cutting throats or overwhelming the odd man who hadn't been so caught, before at a signal from Edric, set up a tree as lookout, retreating further into the woods.

Even so, a force of twenty formed men caught up to them, only to run into the ten men of Lord Stark who fell on them howling like the wolves Northerners were often derisively called. The numbers were against them, but the Lannister men were rattled, and no match one on one with the men from the North. Soon they too fell back, moving through a area of the traps with a few scouts leading the way, letting the traps cover their retreat.

Beric led them on, stopping to clap Edric on the shoulder when he shimmied down his lookout tree. "That's the way lads, nip in and out, bleed them here and there, we have at least another two weeks travel through these woods to bleed them before they reach the Gold Road pass. With time, we'll have our justice."

OOOOOOO

"So while House Cafferren is still recovering from my brother's rebellion, they are willing to use their castle as a rallying point for the other Storm-lords."

"Twelve thousand men pledged to your cause already." said Loras shaking his head as he looked over at Renly, who had just finished reading the message from Lord Fell. "I knew the Stormlands Lords were always quicker to muster than those of us in the Reach, but that much quicker?"

"Well they have to be quicker," said Lord Ashford, laughing. "There aren't nearly as many of them after all."

"Now, now." Renly interjected mildly looking at the other young man. The present Lord Ashford had come to power several years ago when his father the former lord had passed on, and he was of an age with Renly and Loras. "Stormlands lords tend to have somewhat better trained armsmen than your infantry here in the Reach, though not up to your magnificent cavalry of course. But even there, the lack of cavalry makes it quicker for us to muster. That is why Grandison, Fell, Swann and Selmy were able to muster their forces so quickly, though it will take Swann's forces time to reach Fawnton. Since the rebellion, my family has had no firmer friends than Grandison and Fell. Say what you will, we all know that horses eat more than men, yes?"

There was some laughter and comments about 'but a man on a horse is worth ten on foot' from many of those from the Reach, but that was all.

Renly laughed, hiding his relief with ease. Evidently his idea to retreat to Highgarden had been the right one; his Stormlands lords knew him well enough and most would respond to his call to arms even without his presence to emphasize the need. Here in the Reach though, his presence had been needed to solidify the agreement between his family and that of House Tyrell, and it too was bearing fruit already. "Besides, do not think that I belittle you or the rest of the Reach by saying that you are in the main slower. We've heard from Harvest Hall, your own men Lord Ashford, Fossoway, and Merryweather as well."

Those were the houses that Renly had passed by on his continued trek down towards High Garden, stopping in on the river trip to send out riders to them as he went on his way. In turn, most of those families, all of whom either had heirs or lords who he was friends with, had already begun to march toward Bitterbridge to meet with Lord Lorent Caswell's men. Being the northernmost castle Lorent had offered his castle as gathering point for the Reach's portion of the army Renly was calling up. He was a rather sickly, weak young fellow, who saw this as a way to gain Renly's favor without much cost to himself.

"Nor is that the only forces from the Reach that have been quick to answer our call to muster, the Marcher Lords, for all that you were unable to send us all your forces, have also responded heroically." Loras said, nodding to Randyll Tarly, who was seated two spaces down from Renly himself, on the other side of Lord Mace.

Randyll was an older man of Mace's generation, with a bald head, wide shoulders, and a grim, weathered expression that went well with his dour demeanor. Even here in the heart of Highgarden the old general went armed, his family's Valyrian blade, the longsword Heartsbane strapped to his waist. He was one of the most dangerous military minds in the Reach, who, despite Lord Mace taking the credit for it, had won the few loyalist victories in the last war when the Reach backed the Targaryens. And it had been Lord Randyll who led their forces in the Ironborn rebellion, what little forces they used in that war outside House Redwyne's navy.

Taking his cue the older man nodded sternly, looking around at the others. "Lord Renly already knows this, but none of the Marcher Lords are willing to release all their forces to action elsewhere. The death of the Sand Snake in King's Landing has spread, and regardless of whether or not it was justifiable will not matter to her father Oberyne. If Dorne does try to rise, the Marcher Lords must have their forces at home to meet them. We decided to only release a third of our forces, but those forces were already assembled, and will be marching to Bitterbridge even now."

Well, it was more like Randyll had decided, but even if the other lords besides Mace realized that they wouldn't have said anything. Randyll continued. "We even have scouts down the passes, and our forces are ready to march to block any assault coming out of the Prince's Pass, or even reinforce House Dondarrion in holding back any force coming out of the Boneway. Your back, Lord Renly will be secure."

Renly nodded gravely. "Baseborn she might have been, but the daughter of Prince Oberyne nonetheless, and bastards are not looked down on so much in Dorne."

Where she was seated near the table but not at it, position between and back of Renly and her father Margaery frowned, wondering why none of them had asked her oldest brother Willas his insight. Despite what his family might think of the friendship, he was firm friends with Oberyne and could have offered his opinion on what the man would or could do. While Oberyne commanded the armies of Dorne, it was well known that his older brother was much slower to act. If that was the case, Oberyne might strike out on his own for justice's sake rather than Dorne as a whole.

Hopefully grandmother has already thought of asking Willas his opinion on Oberyne and Dorne's response to Tyene's judicial murder. She thought, keeping silent. She was here to be seen, the visible connection between her family and Renly, not to actually speak. War was man's business, and her grandmother had been very implicit with that command. While at the same time ordering Margaery to keep her eyes and ears open in preparation for relating everything that happened in this meeting between what Renly was calling his small counsel back to her. That she didn't trust her son-in-law to do so was implicit in that comment.

Margaery kept the scowl that thought generated from showing with ease, but it was heartfelt nonetheless. Renly was a thinker, which was good, but he did not respect Margaery as a thinker, and did not even attempt to ask her for advice. He feared her grandmother and often at least listened to her, but did not think to look to Margaery for any advice despite that. Politics and influence was her area of expertise yet they were also Renly's and after she had disagreed with him a few times he had ceased to listen to her.

She felt he should have immediately sent word to Winterfell and to Dorne, informing them of what really happened in King's Landing. In that manner they could put the Tyene's death squarely at the Lannister's feet. But he felt that the Dornish would not listen to him, and one way or another had already made their decision as to how to act. Implicit in that statement was that he felt that Dorne and its ruling prince would keep waiting for an opportunity that would never come so long as the Marcher Lords were visibly prepared for war even as the rest of the country ignored his nation and got on with things.

As for sending word to Winterfell, he had agreed to do that but only after his army was marching out of Bitterbridge and had won a few victories. He wanted to use that to offset the fact he had retreated from King's Landing without giving battle. In the north especially that information would be deadly to any attempt to bring them to his side. But if he won a few battles then his understanding of warfare would come to be seen as truth and his retreat simply good sense, rather, as Margaery thought it, cowardice.

Worse in her opinion was that he had made no allowances for the Riverlands lords or the Vale one way or the other! The Vale it was easy to see wasn't really an offensive force, so that could be explained away. But the Riverlands could raise an army as large as the Westerlands. They should've sent overtures to those houses but Renly and her father both disagreed, saying that the Riverlands would be out of it because of the capture of Edmure and how old Hoster Tully was. None of them felt that the Lords of the Riverlands would act independently, which Margaery thought was foolish, since they too had their hotheads and those of ambition.

"I could wish that we had heard from a few more Stormlands lords, but the distance is such that it doesn't worry me save in House Buckler's case, but Ralph has always been slow to act. No doubt it will take him time to decide how much of his forces they send." Renly continued. "And on that same note House Dondarion's refusal to march isn't that surprising." He shrugged his shoulders. "Their Lord isn't there, and so there's no one to give the orders for a muster. We haven't had any word about him, or the expedition sent against the bandits on the Riverlands/Westerlands border."

Her father spoke up then. "I have some bad news for us all. Lord Lannister is already on the move. He's already marshaled a force of twelve thousand before his full muster and from all reports of our agents in the Westerlands is almost to the passages through the eastern mountains. As of the time they sent this message to us it wasn't certain which way they were going."

For just a moment Renly looked worried to Margaery's trained eye, but then the moment was gone and he said confidently. "Well that's good then, if he's alone with such a small force, we might be able to catch his army out in the open before they are reinforced! Without Lord Lannister to rally them the rest of the Westerlands will pull back entirely. If we can do that, we can march on Kings Landing quickly, and end this war before it becomes any worse."

There was a lot of murmuring at that, most of the youngsters around the table thinking it a grand idea. They were all examples of what Margaery's grandmother called summer knights, youngsters who weren't blooded yet, not really. They knew the tourney, the joust and perhaps the melee, they hadn't fought in either Robert's or the Ironborn Rebellions. Margaery however noticed Randyll didn't join them, even if her father did.

She had to chance it. "Lord Tarly," Margaery said, her soft tones quieting everyone as all the men at the table looked to her. "Could we have your thoughts on how Lord Lannister ranks as a general? I am curious how his personality affects how he acts in the field."

Randyll looked at her with respect and nodded his head at her. "As in all else milady, Lord Lannister is pragmatic, calculating in all things. He will first reinforce the defensive points of the Westerlands no doubt. Deep Den, Golden Tooth, certainly Cornfield and Crakehall, possibly Clegane Hall, though it isn't as defensible. Or he could possibly not reinforce them and merely let them retain all of their forces."

Renly looked at both Randyll and Margaery then shrugged internally and went with it. "Where do you think this small force will be sent then Lord Randyll?"

Internally Margaery sighed with relief as Renly went with the flow of conversation rather than trying to change it. At least he recognized that Randyll was an asset above and beyond the men he could bring.

"I am uncertain." Randyll shrugged. "As I said he'll leave enough manpower to defend the Westerlands. I can't guess if they'd march straight for King's Landing, hoping to get there before we finish our muster, or if he'd send that army into the Riverlands to stomp any rebellion there out and take over castles to put in place against the northern incursion, which it's certain he knows will be coming, then meet up with his second force before moving against us."

Margaery noticed that Randyll wasn't nearly as dismissive as the others of the occurrence of the North joining the war.

"If he does that he could use the River Road as a more secure, if longer, line of supply for his armies. The Gold Road is too easy to cut off from the Reach, and beyond the pass has no natural defensive positions until you get to King's Landing. He might think he could draw us into the Riverlands, fight on neutral territory. That would actually be a good outcome for us as well. Certainly better than letting him take the initiative and march into the Reach at any rate." Randyll continued. "Lord Rowan's Goldengrove is the only real castle we have anywhere near the border with the Westerlands, and even then isn't very close to the border."

The discussion continued from there, and in the end it was decided that it didn't really matter which Lord Lannister tried to do. If he tried to make for King's Landing they had a good chance of catching him, he couldn't clear the eastern mountains without word getting to them, and the armies already gathering at Bitterbridge and Fawnton might be able to intercept him in the open. Or if not, bottled up in Kings Landing twelve thousand men wouldn't matter much to the Army that Lord Renly was starting to put together.

"Indeed." Renly said laughing lightly. "Let Lord Lannister get to the capital, in that case we can besiege the city with the forces from the Stormlands, while the Reach forces find and smashes the second army the Westerlands will be certain to send. With that second, larger force destroyed, Lord Lannister will lose any ability to reclaim the initiative in the war."

Margaery closed her eyes, shaking her head internally. That, she thought, was thinking far too ahead, and far too positively. After all, this isn't like a game of conquests, your enemy is trying to win, he's not there just for you to smash. I would have sent Randyll and the forces already gathered here to meet the forces at Bitterbridge before sending them on to hunt down Lord Lannister or at least cut off the Gold Road from King's Landing now. Lord Lannister is too good a general to allow him to allow him that strong a position. And if Renly thinks that's finding and crushing the second army sent out of Westerlands will be simple, he is an idiot.

Besides, where in all of this is Stannis? Renly hasn't made any allowance for him, at least none I've seen. Admittedly with only the forces of the navy and Dragonstone to use he's no real threat, yet we haven't heard anything about him. That's worrisome, as is his reputation as a general. His command of the siege of Storm's end, the siege of Dragonstone itself, and his crushing the Iron Fleet is proof of that.

But she said nothing, remaining silent throughout the rest of the meeting until it became time for the council to break up. Renly and the other young men went off quickly, eager to fetch a few hounds and go on a hunt together. Mace went with them, always happy for an excuse to hunt and get away from his mother-in-law for a few hours more.

Randyll however was not a man to enjoy such excursions. He was going to retire to his room to compose a message to send back to Horn Hill, but Margaery caught him in the hallway outside the council room. "Lord Tarly a word if you would?"

He turned to her nodding his head slightly to the young woman whose one contribution to the discussion had been an extremely well-chosen one. It's evident that the girl's grandmother has a lot to do with this one's brains, he thought to himself bowing. "What can I do for you your highness?"

"I'm not Her Highness just yet Lord Tarly." she said smiling. "Pray do not tempt the Seven by assuming that before it is fact."

Randyll nodded at the correction, and waited silently for her to speak. "I noticed in there that you were not very happy about the fact that the North would be sending down their forces, may I ask why not?"

"Two reasons milady, for one I could wish that the entire northern forces would concentrate on the Wall, the wildlings and the King Beyond the Wall seem real. If Lord Stark believed it that is good enough for me. That man does not have a lying bone in his body, for good or ill."

While Randyll had never met Ranma, and was not about to believe all the rumors about him, he had met Eddard, both across the battlefield during the war of the Usurper and on the same battleground fighting the Ironborn. He couldn't comment on whether or not Ranma would return from his mission, but it was certain that the Starks had been telling the truth about the King Beyond the Wall. "The wildlings can put a force in the field much larger than even the Reach at full muster, no one knows how much land there is beyond the Wall, but the massive hordes the wildlings could put in the field occurred in every tale of the King Beyond the Wall. Worse, if they break through the Wall there's no way they would stop in the north, especially when there is much easier living further south."

He paused a moment, thinking of his firstborn son Samwell. The pulling weak whelp had no hand for a sword and no mind for combat despite all Randyll could do to instill such, and thus no worth in Randyll's eyes. Randyll had sent him off to the Wall a year gone with the last recruiter to come through the Marches. As far as Randyll was concerned, that was good riddance. His second son was already showing much more promise at eight than Samwell had shown at twenty. "The second issue I have with the North sending forces down is that every time they do, they impact the flow of history."

Not certain what he was speaking of, Margaery cocked her head, one eyebrow raised in query.

Randyll sighed. "The last King of the North mustered his forces and came south to face the dragons, he then bowed creating Westeros in its first iteration, then in the wars after the Blackfyre Rebellion the Starks came down and made the difference in many a battle there and in the Ninepenny Kings war, just as in Robert's Rebellion. They also provided the bulk of the forces fielded on the Iron Islands, which means that most of their forces are veterans, unlike our own. Despite their army not being nearly as large as the Reach, they can have an impact well beyond their size. I'm also leery of the connection between Tully and Stark, if they can rally the Riverlands they could field an army nearly as large as the Reach."

Margaery nodded, and would have asked further questions but a maid came up to them then. "Milady," she said. "Lady Olenna has sent me to fetch you."

Sighing irritably Margaery curtsied formally to Randyll. "Thank you for satisfying my curiosity Lord. I'll let you go on your way."

Randyll nodded cordially, watching her leave thoughtfully before turning away to head towards his rooms. I'm beginning to think it was good that most of my forces remained home, if Renly is unwilling to listen to that woman in counsel, he is a greater idiot than I expected.

OOOOOOO

Entering the room in the highest tower of Highgarden that served her grandmother as for informal throne room, Margaery found her grandmother as usual sitting in torchlight in her room high up one of the towers of Highgarden. She was accompanied by one man who looked like a smallfolk of some sort, perhaps a drover given his dress, and her oldest brother. That surprised her, as Willas had been with his dogs for the past few days. Two of them were due to give birth soon, and Willas was always on hand for that. "Willas, how are your dogs? Did the births go all right?"

Willas smiled at her, taking her hand in his and pulling her down to join him in the chair, perching her on his lap as if she was a little girl again causing her to giggle. "Indeed, both bitches are doing well, ten puppies between them all of them healthy and the size of their paws indicate my strain for breeding for size has succeeded again! It's too early to tell if their instincts will follow their mothers or fathers, but that at least give me hope."

"If you two are finished acting like stupid children, I did not call you here to simply talk about Willas' latest successful breeding." Their grandmother barked. "Though, if he had done some breeding of his own I would be much happier!"

Willas rolled his eyes at that, and Margaery chuckled. Willas' hand in marriage was a weapon of diplomacy that the family hadn't yet found a high enough price for, but he was by no means a virgin, simply very careful. They had been holding out for Princess Arianne of Dorne but they had been rebuffed in that every time they had brought it up. With Arianne out of the way there wasn't another highborn lady of enough standing to interest House Tyrell for their firstborn son. Not at the moment at any rate.

"Enough!" their grandmother snapped, and both of them finally realized she was actually unhappy. Looking closely Margaery could see that her grandmother's lips were ruler straight, so thin and white that it indicated extreme anger. Or at least discomfiture she wasn't sure which.

"I apologize grandmother." she said, sitting up and bowing her head before pushing Willas to bunch up enough to let her share his seat, refusing to sit on the small footstool that was normally her place in this room. The choice was an easy one for her.

For his part, Willas wasn't going to complain. He had disliked how their grandmother and father treated Margaery at times like a child at times before this and at others like a tool in their machinations. The continued use of the stool was part of Olenna's way of putting Margaery off her stride in conversations between them, and it had worked often in the past.

"This," Olenna said, gesturing at the man standing beside her chair. "Is one of our agents in King's Landing, a grain drover that works the loop between Highgarden and that cesspool of a city. You were right." she barked looking away.

"Excuse me?" Margaery said raising an eyebrow. "Right in what?" Inside however Margaery was beginning to smile, knowing it must've been something up about which she and her mother had disagreed, and if it was about King's Landing, there are very few things it could've been about.

"Don't be snarky." Her grandmother said, a thin smile on her face despite her words. "You don't have the age for it. As you have no doubt already deduced, Ranma has returned. More than that, he apparently entered the city and abscinded with Sansa Stark. He killed yet another Kingsguard, along with several more knights and armsmen, before getting away with an ease that is... disturbing. What's more, it appears as if Lord Eddard Stark was able to escape by sea. He apparently did have more forces on hand as you predicted girl." Olenna glared at her granddaughter, not enjoying the fact that she had been wrong. "He was badly injured apparently, but the Starks are as tough as those wolves on their banner, I have no doubt he survived."

She scowled further. "If we had heard of this before, even a single House's worth of knights might've been able to win the city for us." At Willas' interrogative look Olenna sighed and gestured at the man.

The man began to speak. At first he tried to erase his bucolic accent, but as he went on it seeped through more and more. "Well milord, it's like this, there was a lot of fighting in the city, and I mean a lot. Lord Stark, his troops, both his own and from the Riverlands, were just on a whole different level than the Lannister supporters, in bein' able ta work together and use the small back alleys and sich that make up most o' King's Landin'. Several Houses've lost their lords and heir's. Da bastard Gold Cloaks had their own bloody civil war they did, wiped each other out but good. And the servants from the Red Keep, they say that da men in da tower put up an even 'ardor fight, gutted the Lannister forces but good!"

"It was days afore they and the golders had enough numbers ta come out of the hoity areas of da city and try an' put some order 'n place. They had this knight from down in da Stormlands, a right grim faced youngster he is, big too, a warrior born, that was in charge o' most of that effort at first, and the Kingslayer, 'e took it over after that. He might not be the most trustworthy sort, but 'e knows how ta pick fightin' men. By the time I was given da okay ta leave most o' the city was back in their control, if not 'appy 'bout it."

"So if Renly and Loras had stayed with their forces Lord Stark might've won the day." Margaery said, her eyes narrowed. "Can I be the one to tell Loras that?"

"Be nice." Willas said tickling her side for a moment. She smacked his hand away, in no mood to be mollified but subsided slightly, which had been his objective in the first place. Most of his attention however was elsewhere, going over what this news meant for his family.

"I wonder how Ranma got Sansa out." she murmured, cocking her head to one side.

"Don't know 'bout 'at." said the man shrugging his shoulders. "The Northern lordling came in one night and left that same night sneaky like a thief on'y better. Didn't get on no ship in port neither, 'e 'scaped o'erland from the city, prob'ly fetched up along the shoreline somewheres."

For all his small folk accident the men's points was good, and her grandmother nodded, thanked him and sent for a maid to give him his reward for the information before escorting him wouldn't be returning to King's Landing of course, the grain supplies that normally came from the Reach for King's Landing had already been stopped by this point. It would take a few months, but eventually King's Landing would begin to feel the pinch from that.

"So I was wrong," she reiterated. "With both Ranma and Lord Stark back, the North will not only march they will be well led, and organized."

"We'll need to think of a way to appease them." Willas said calmly, nothing about him hinting at the giant 'I told you so' that was hovering in the room at the moment. Olenna was touchy at the best of times, rubbing her nose in her error was not a good idea.

"That's a tall order." Margaery shook her head. "Neither man will be influenced by threats but by honor and friendship which you have possibly ruined by recalling me grandmother, you and father. Loras certainly did his part to crush their opinion about us by retreating from the city. That cowardice will not be forgotten. Maybe helping house Tully will appease them somewhat, but I can't think of anything else."

Willas could, and it was sitting next to him at the moment, but he was also worried. Ranma struck him as someone who either succeeded or died, and going from what Margaery had said he was no assassin, whatever Robert's orders might have been. Which meant he had returned with the Targaryen siblings. What that could mean to the coming war he didn't know, but he was very worried about it, and the word 'legitimacy' was going through his head. Would the Targaryen siblings look favorably on us, my family was loyal to them during the rebellion, if largely ineffectual. Would that be enough to offset the disdain the Starks will no doubt feel for us and Renly?

His grandmother however believed in facts rather than wild supposition, which Willas would admit that line of thought was. Eventually the news from the ship Ranma and Daenerys had taken from Pentos to Westeros, which had by this point put in at Duskendale, would spread but the Tyrells didn't have any agents in that port. It was an important enough mercantile place for the rest of the Crownlands, but it wasn't important in the great scheme of things to House Tyrell. Until then, no one but Stannis and his closest advisors would learn of the return of the dragons.

Frowning, Olenna thought hard. "Lord Renly is still the safe bet, he is here and easy to influence, and our army will still be the largest, not just of his forces but anywhere. And we can keep putting off the actual marriage, the arrangement is enough for now to connect us to his cause."

Inside Olenna was now very worried they had jumped the line very badly here. She had thought that the Starks were out of the way, making it a case of Renly versus Lannister, an easy decision to make, considering how little influence they could wield with the Lannisters. Putting a crown on her granddaughter's head would have been somewhat simple, and connect them to what would no doubt be the new ruling family. But now, with no news about Stannis, Renly's own idiocy, and the Starks not only alive but with the apparently frightening Ranna back to lead them to war, it looked like they were going to become more and more embroiled in open conflict.

All because she and Mace had been too quick to act. Damn me, I was too quick to act, Mace is a buffoon, but I should've known better. "We need to think about appeasing the North at the very least you're right about that Willas, we don't want to fight the North, the Riverlands and the Westerlands as well as the Crownlands if we can help it. And I'll open up dialogue on the side to House Lannister as well. Tywin is pragmatic, I have no doubt somewhere down the line we might be able to make a deal there, for a time anyway. We can play all sides that way, and come out on top whoever actually begins to look like the winning side."

Beside him, Margaery laughed quietly, already liking how this conversation had shaped up. Olenna on the other hand simply stared at both her and Willas thoughtfully. Hmm... Cersei will need a new husband eventually, say a few months down the line? Perhaps, perhaps. And of course Margaery could well marry Joffrey, so long as we put off the actual marriage to Renly for now. No worry there, Hah, his preferences will work for us for now, allowing us to back out with ease later on, even hand him up on a silver platter if he proves as incompetent as I fear. But where by the Seven in all this is Stannis?

Willas nodded, but then prevaricated. "I can see the point about Tywin, he is indeed practical enough to wish to at least look at the idea of having us fighting on his side with favor. But I have no idea how you're going to go about doing that same thing with the North grandmother, it will have to be a very big bone we throw to the wolves."

Then he went on, deliberately changing the subject, something his grandmother of course noticed but allowed, having already considered that same things. "Right now the North is a problem for the future, Grandmother. At present I am worried about what Stannis is up to, he is not known for giving up what is his easily. Regardless of Renly's charisma or his good, well thought out reasons given Stannis' lack of flexibility to anything outside warfare that he would be a disaster as king, Stannis is still the oldest, and therefore Robert's lawful heir. This silence is not like him."

Her grandmother frowned nodding her head. "I was just thinking the same thing."

OOOOOO

Indeed, while his younger brother was simply talking and planning for the future Stannis had been on the move though not in a direction anyone else would have suspected. The voyage and subsequent marching overland into the Stormlands was difficult to say the least, it had also proven as profitable as he had hoped. His army was on the small size, but it was his presence that truly did the trick. Renly was a fool to retreat to the Reach rather than the Stormlands, he thought looking across the table at Lord Sebastian Errol, Lord of Haystack Hall and owner of much of the best farmlands the Stormlands contained.

The man sipped thoughtfully at his wine then nodded. "If the queen has truly descended that far, then it is no doubt right and proper that we rebel, but I will be honest with you my Lord. If Renly was here, if he had retreated to the Stormlands, I would have raised my armsmen for him since King Robert placed him as our Lord Paramount. He is not here however, which shows a remarkable disdain for his rightful position, and his duty to lead us in person rather than afar. I will not jump at his command sent by raven wings, unlike my late aunt, who was more than willing to do so."

Stannis very carefully did not smile. That aunt had a mishap several evenings before his army came into sight of Haystack Hall. No suspicion could fall on him for the event. The red witch had once more proven her worth.

"And what will my place be in this new court you are putting together?" The younger man asked casually, those his eyes were locked on Stannis.

"I have thought long and hard about the small counsel as it is, and how Westeros is ruled." Stannis said grimly. "I have decided to keep the positions of master of purse and master of ships, but all of the other positions are going to be up for review after we win this war. The position of Hand will be split in two. We will have a Hand, a Fist who the king will turn to on matters of war, and the Open Palm, which will be his aid in matters of law, and the wellbeing of Westeros. This is a time of war Lord Sebastion, and even though I respect the number of men you can bring to battle, you yourself do not have battle experience." As the man bristled Stannis went on smoothly, the diplomatic words sticking in his craw somewhat, but true none the less. "I would make you my master of coin instead, and in this time of war that will make you the one in charge of supplies."

The phrase 'until you have earned your spurs' did not need to be said, and Sebastion nodded thoughtfully, subsiding somewhat under Stannis' cool, unruffled gaze. "With the output of my lands that makes sense, and I agree. I will ally my forces with yours, your grace." he replied at last, nodding his head.

"Excellent." Stannis said nodding his head firmly.

That made two houses that he had added to his forces peacefully. House Bolling, the next-door neighbor to the southeast of House Errol had also agreed to join him. Bolling was started by a cadet branch of House Baratheon, a bastard house to put it bluntly, set up where it was to give House Baratheon more land through it, land which was much better for farming than House Baratheon's own. Barely a noble house, its lord had joined Stannis on agreement of his house's independence of its parent House. Together they would add five thousand men to his cause, nearly two-thirds the size of the forces he had brought into the Stormlands. This was minus the men needed to remain and secure their keeps from attack, which he knew would come.

He had no illusions that he could turn all of the Stormlands against his brother, he was too popular with most of the young lords before this, those that had risen to power after Robert's Rebellion, and the oldsters didn't have the stomach for more war, whichever side they'd fought for in that conflict. It was only because the former Lady Errol had been enamored of Renly for years that he hadn't made any similar arrangement with the heir to this house. An oversight, among others, that would haunt Renly now.

"My men will be ready to march within the next two days." Sebastion said, nodding. Nodding in turn, Stannis stood up and made his way out of the room without another word. Smalltalk would never be something he was comfortable with.

Two weeks later found him once more staring at another lord that should have followed him because he was the eldest and therefore the heir to his brother's crown. He hated this, hated the fact that he had to try to convince people of the rightness of his cause, when it was so readily apparent that he was his brother's heir by law and common convention. Still, this had been the easiest sell of the three he had done so far.

Lord Penrose was an old man, frail and so thin his bones could be made out under his thin skin. Stannis's presence had easily browbeaten him. In return for the certainty of his son's safety if a battle broke out at Storm's End, Penrose had agreed to bend the knee to Stannis rather than his younger brother. Cortnay was castellan at Storm's End, but Stannis had no issue with assuring the young man's safety, indeed he had no plans to assault Storm's End just yet, that would take too much time and effort best used elsewhere. If Renly were to retreat there eventually perhaps, but not yet.

The old man nodded his head, looking at Stannis through nearly blind eyes. "My son Cortnay is all I have in my old age, the price is easy to bear. I will send my men out within a fortnight."

Stannis nodded then shook the man's hand. Both swore their pact on the Seven, which was no longer Stannis's god, but he wasn't about to mention that. In all honesty his opinion on his new so-called religion was much like his opinion on the old one; he saw it as a tool to be used, not fact.

He marched out of the keep, which was one of the smallest ones in the Stormlands, but one of the best placed. With the sea behind it, and residing on a cliff as it was, Parchment could only truly be attacked from one direction easily. In modern times with heavier catapults something that any army could build in time, it could be taken of course, but slowly.

Twenty minutes ride found him once more in amongst the tents of his now fifteen thousand man army. He nodded to lord Bolling, who had come to command his scouts. "Leave ten men with two horses each to watch Parchments. That old man agreed too easily, he's one who will agree to follow whoever is standing in front of him at that moment, then do nothing the moment their back is turned. He's mustered about half his strength, and I want to know if they march out when he said they will."

"And if they do march out but don't make to catch up to us?" Lord Bolling asked.

"Then I want to know about that the moment they march." Stannis replied grimly.

Another week's march had the army back on Bolling land, moving toward the last house Stannis wished to see if he could influence, House Buckler. That evening as all evenings Melisandre retreated to her tent. Often she simply did so because she was unused to being on horseback for so long, but other times she would retreat there to use her powers. This evening however, she was only in her tent for about an hour before she came back out, moving to find Stannis quickly.

"I have seen something in my flames." Melisandre stated as soon as she was in Stannis' command tent. He was alone, which the priestess of R'hllor had known before stepping inside else she would have waited to share this. "Men below a banner like that of the House we just left moving to a shoreline within a few days march of their keep. I see a fleet coming from the straits to meet them. The ships fly a quartered banner of blue and purple, a yellow sun set on the purple, a moon sliver on the blue."

"House Tarth." Stannis said grimly, pulling on his jerkin quickly from where he had just taken it off for bed. "Are you certain? Which direction from Parchments did they march? What about our scouts?"

"The scouts are dead for the most part, the few survivors have escaped, but are horseless." Melisandre replied calmly. "And I believe they marched south along the shoreline for three days."

Stannis nodded, thinking hard. House Tarth would not join my cause, its lord is too arrogant, and his heir, the so-called 'Maid', is known to be besotted with Renly. Penrose has betrayed me far more quickly and thoughtfully than I expected. Pity, for him that is. "I will turn the Army around, I will smash Penrose. I will burn it to the ground and stick that old man's head on a pike to deliver to his son. We made an agreement in faith, and he goes behind my back to aid the allies of my brother? No mercy."

He frowned looking pulling out a very vague map, the best he or anyone really had of the shoreline of the Stormlands. "You said three days march down the coast from Penrose correct?"

"That is what my vision saw yes."

"Good, we'll be able to deal with them first then turn on Parchments. Besieging that castle will take too long. We will have to think of other ways to break them."

"We have only used a Shadow Assassin once my Lord, we could use one of them again." she said coquettishly, staring at Stannis as she stood directly in front of him. From here Stannis could see down her dress to her bare breasts, they were larger and more perfectly formed than Selyse's, and he felt a trembling of desire stir within him.

The Shadow Assassin was a different breed from the Shadow Warriors. The Warriors were able to operate independently for longer, but Melisandre now understood she couldn't control them well from a distance. They were sustained by the life force of those that had been given to the fire in R'hllor's name, called forth as Melisandre pulled their souls from the fire and carved them into their new shadow shapes.

Whatever she might say, they were not easy to make each one took a toll on her, most particularly in the form of burn marks on her throat from her choker, which glowed hotter with every warrior she called forth. She couldn't create more than ten before resting, and the gem that was part of her choker took days to cool down, getting worse every time without a longer break. She had been bedridden and wounded sore after the last batch of the ones she had created back on Dragonstone. But they survived for days so long as they were not touched by sunlight.

The Shadow Assassin was created in an entirely different matter. Instead of coming from the fire, it came from Melisandre herself. After she explained that a Shadow Warrior would be subtle enough for the task they needed, the death of Lady Errol, the two of them had slept together. The very next evening she looked as if she had been pregnant for months. Unseen by any Melisandre had slipped away from the army and gone into the woods to birth their unholy child.

Stannis was not a superstitious or queasy man, but he was thankful she had not asked him to come with her for that, it would have been horrifying. He did not have any idea what the thing looked like, only that it could kill at a touch and that its creation also took a lot out of Melisandre. It could be called upon to kill a single individual and was able to cover ground like a shadow in the night, moving faster than anything natural could even come close to. But it would only last a single night, if it could not find its target within that time it would dissipate.

"I will think on that further after the battle." He said stepping away from Melisandre. Whatever her physical form, he knew the woman before him was the most dangerous creature he had ever met. Once was enough. Yet even as he thought that, Stannis' eyes stole over to her, and she looked into his eyes smiling seductively and he knew that eventually, sooner rather than later, he would lay with her again. But now was not that time.

At his orders, his army turned around despite his commanders protests. Stannis gave orders for rumors to abound that Penrose had decided not to keep to the agreement, and that one of Bolling's scouts had returned, but died after giving the word. Errol and Bolling agreed that an example should be met for someone who went back on his word.

At Stannis's command, the cavalry gave up their horses for a portion of the infantry, something that would have been impossible to contemplate for most armies in Westeros, leaving him with seven thousand men. Speed was the essence, not striking power. With every man taking a few hours on horseback the entire force was able go faster, and they arrived back near Parchment in two days rather than the five days it'd taken them to get that far away, arriving back on the third night of their forced march. On the way they had run into two of the scouts that had escaped House Penrose's men, and their words helped bolster the army's outrage.

Scouts sent out on foot once they were within sight of the shore came back with a report that there was a force of seven hundred men waiting on a shore nearby, with the banner of house Penrose flying above them. The shore they were using was small, barely enough for two galleys to put to shore at once, which they would have to do to offload horses, and at the end of a small, but very craggy inlet. The Stormlands were not named that because of the gentleness of their weather, nor did Shipbreaker Bay only start at Storm's End and head down towards Griffin's Roost. While there were a few places where landing was easy, like the one they were now observing, these were in the minority.

The shoreline was also set somewhat below the rest of the cliffs that made up the shoreline here. And, the scouts were gleeful to report, Penrose hadn't stationed any men on either side of the shore. Penrose must have thought he was very clever to use this little secret, but for all his cunning, Lord Penrose knew nothing about war.

Stannis nodded at Sebastian, who he had given command of his archers, and ordered him to take up position overlooking the small shoreline on both edges, but not to join the battle at first. "Your task will be to stop the ships from leaving. Our own ships can't get here in time to do the task, but I want those ships added to our numbers." At present Stannis had more men than he could actually lift with the fleet he had, so adding more ships to his armada would help him tremendously.

The archers left camp quickly making their way unseen through the night to their new position while Stannis positioned his lines. They would be hiding nearby, waiting for his signal to attack. While he was willing to attempt to convince Lord Tarth to join him, if the man didn't he wanted to wipe out their entire force utterly. After setting everything to order, Stannis allowed his men to bed down where they were but no fires were lit, and no tents put up while he waited for word from the archers up on the hill that the Tarth fleet was in sight.

About two hours later a runner came, slinking his way down from the vantage point then making his way in a roundabout manner to where Stannis and the rest of his forces were waiting. "Lord," he gasped, coming to a rest in the small rocky hedge where Stannis was hiding from sight with Melisandre and Lord Bolling nearby. The ships are within sight, fifteen of them all galleons."

"Excellent." Stannis said nodding his head. "That will add tremendously to our ability to transport my troops. Remind Sebastian of those orders, I have need of those ships." The man nodded, turning around to race back the way he had come while Stannis turned to lord Bolling and ordered him to get the men up and ready for battle. "But be quiet about it, I do not mean to give away the element of surprise. We'll hit them on the shoreline once they have started to disembark."

Lord Robert Bolling nodded, intelligent enough not to comment on the fact that this was an ambush, not exactly an honorable undertaking. This was war, and if he played his cards right, his family would be enriched even more than his previous agreement with Stannis would have made them.

Another hour passed until another messenger arrived, saying that the unloading had begun. Stannis wondered how many men could be on those galleons. Unable to see them Stannis could only guess a number that they could reasonably carry for the time it would take them to get from Evenfall Hall to here. He knew that trip would only take two days unless the weather was against you, so it would have been quick.

He shook off that idle thought, and summoned up another runner. "You, head down there under a flag of peace, tell them to surrender." Robert looked at him and Stannis shrugged. "They get one chance, I doubt they will take it, but I must offer it in any event."

"And if they run, what will you do then?" Melisandre asked..

"If those men try to board their ships again, Sebastian has permission to take the ships under fire with fire arrows." Stannis said coldly. "They will either surrender and join me, or they will die, it's their choice."

Two minutes was all the time he was willing to give his scout and the men down there to decide. When that time passed and his scout had not returned Stannis nodded coolly. "Very well, they have made their decision. Our forces will advance."

He pulled out his sword, and immediately after it left the scabbard, which was specially made by Melisandre from a piece of hollowed out dragon bone that she had found on Dragonstone, it ignited yet again. "Forward!" he shouted, "kill the traitors!"

His force of five thousand infantry trooped out of their hiding places among the rocks and trees, joining up into a wedge with Stannis and his guard at the front. These men were the fire guard, knights and skilled swordsmen taken from Dragonstone and the fleet that had pledged to him and to R'hllor, fanatical in their devotion in a way that made Stannis' skin crawl at times. In battle however, was when they truly fulfilled their purpose.

The army marched down toward the shoreline, where their enemies saw them coming in time to prepare their lines.

Stannis took in the scene in a glance. His men were racing down from a slight hill, which had hidden their position from the Penrose man and the men of Tarth who had landed. There were two galleys pushed up against the shoreline, with more lying behind them in the waters of the small watery crag. They were all so close to protect them from the winds and waves that would otherwise have smashed them against the side of the rocky shores, but they were so close together it made the entire area a fire trap, something the crews of those vessels should've known.

In front of those ships were the men of Tarth and the men of Penrose. He estimated there were possibly half of the men he commanded down there. But there was no way they could use that force, not on the front they had, they would be getting in their own way, and they didn't seem to have any archers. Worse, many of the men were cavalry, and their horses too were trapped by the press of bodies. Even in open battle they would be crushed, under these conditions they had no chance. Selwyn is a fool. He thought coldly. He should have surrendered or at worst tried to retreat, now he will die, and his men with him.

At the front of the troops down there was a force of twenty cavalry already horsed somehow with the banner of Evenfall flowing at their front. Stannis made a beeline for them, pointing with his Lightbringer. "There!" he shouted, looking to either side at the fire guards around him. "Cut them down, and this battle is over!"

The cavalry units, all knights from House Tarth, couched their lances and raced towards the incoming army of infantry. Stannis and his fire guard faded back into the ranks for a moment letting the front rank take the charge. There were too many men for the charging horses to break through, and they soon became bogged down unable to make any headway.

And as any experienced knight would tell you, a knight who has lost his forward momentum is a dead one. Stannis' infantry began to cut horses down, getting close and ripping open their bellies with their blades, while other blades sought the knights from every side. The rest of the infantry flowed around them to slam into the barely prepared infantry line behind them, much of the men in it encumbered by armor too heavy to let them move easily on foot.

Stannis slammed his sword up, shearing through a hastily raised shield to cut off the arm behind it then was forced to duck away as the horse whinnied in terror from his Lightbringer, trying to kick his head off with its front hoofs. One of the fire guards wielding a spear came up behind him slamming the point of the spear into the horse's unarmored belly.

The banner bearer had fallen out of his saddle, his horse maddened as well by Lightbringer. The banner bearer however stood his ground, cutting down three armsmen as they came against him, then cutting a fourth, a fire guard down before turning his corpse and using him as a shield against four more wielding spears.

Stannis frowned he hadn't thought that Selwyn was that good, indicating this was someone else leading his force, a pity. Nonetheless he forged forward, cutting down another knight before clashing blades with the man beside the banner. He frowned as the other man's eyes widened behind his full face helmet. "You're not Selwyn, who are you?"

"You'll get nothing from me!" The person shouted, seemingly unfazed after that initial start of surprise by the Lightbringer. Yet the voice was that of a woman, a deep voice for all that, but still a woman.

Realizing who this was, Stannis scowled. He ducked a blow from her sword, sweeping his shield against it to knock it further out of position bringing up his own blade to slam the flat of it against her head. It dented the helmet enough so that she had been forced back away, ripping it off quickly to retain her vision on that side. Besides which, in an infantry battle like this a full face helmet like that was just as deadly to the wearer as it was blinding. Peripheral vision in a battle like this was a necessity, not just a good idea.

The woman's face thus revealed was not pretty. The kindest word you could use to describe it was punkish. It was freckled, with a nose which looked as if it had been smashed in, the chin was manly, the cheeks thick. Yet for all of that the lips were that of a woman, and the eyelashes too. "Brienne of Tarth," Stannis said. "So, your father sent you to war while he remained behind?"

Letting the woman recover, he took a moment to look over the battle. Thanks to the small incline of the hill he was able to look down to see the battle ahead of him, where the forces of Tarth had been pinned against the shoreline in the ships. The men there were well and truly pinned, unable to form a line to let most of their men enter battle, his men crowding them into the sea and against the ships' sides. Their heavier armor availed the cavalry naught now, and they were being slaughtered, his own men taking one dead for every three.

Several of them were trying to board those ships again, but Lord Bolling had ordered a few of his archers to take them under fire, while the others shot fire arrows at the farthest ship from the shore. The message there was clear, and those ships weren't going anywhere. Indeed two of them had already struck colors, the two that had been hit by fire arrows already. The fact that several of the crewmen lay dead from regular arrows showed why, and the normal seaman's fear of fire.

The woman snarled and came on again. "For my Lord Baratheon!" she shouted, showing no fear of Lightbringer still. Her blade clashed with his, and Stannis was amused at how good she was, certainly better than the average armsmen or knight, but not up to his level yet. Give her a few real battles though and maybe that would've been different, he thought, moving into smashed her sword aside again before kicking her in the crotch. That works just as well for women as men, and there was no such thing as fair play in battle, something youngsters always had to learn the hard way.

"I am Lord Baratheon, my brother has no right to that lordship or to the throne, I am eldest it is my right." Stannis said, unknowingly echoing words Joffrey had said to Myrcella more than two months before in meaning if not in tone.

The woman glared up at him, trying to scabble for her sword which she had lost when her hands went to her battered crotch, but Stannis brought his knee up into her face, then kicked her face in as she lay there until she stopped moving. Unconscious or dead, he didn't care which at this point. It wasn't the daughter he was interested in, it was the Lord, though he was afraid that his taunt had been correct, Selwyn had sent his daughter to war while staying home himself.

Stannis turned raising his burning blade into the air casting his face into a mass of shadows and light. "Your leader is gone! Surrender!"

At that, and seeing Brienne's dead or comatose body at his feet, the surviving men of Tarth and Penrose threw down their blades surrendering. A few dozen more died in the heat of battle, but generally speaking that was the end of it. Stannis' men stormed around them, several hundred racing onto the ships to capture the ships in turn. Their crews did not put up any further fight, having known the battle was over the moment fire arrows began to rain on the furthest ship from the drop-off point.

When the next day dawned Stannis found that they had taken about two-thousand two-hundred prisoners a hundred and twenty of which were sorely wounded and would not survive the day, as well as nearly two thousand horses to add to their army's train. Whether or not any of the uninjured prisoners would survive however was still in question.

Stannis let his army rest throughout the day after they had stripped the prisoners of their weapons and armor. Then at sunset Stannis had the prisoners trotted out in front of him.

Stannis sat on a makeshift throne with his fire guard arrayed on a diagonal from his throne out to either side, Melisandre standing nearby in the councilor position, while Lord Bolling and Lord Errol stood on his other side. The first group of prisoners, all knights sworn to the House of Tarth, were paraded out before them, then forced down to their knees before the throne.

At their front Brienne tried to fight, her face a mask of bruises from her beating at his hands, but two of his fire guards moved forward, smashing her down to the ground with the flats of their swords against her back. She still glared up at them defiantly, then spat at their feet before staring hard at Stannis.

Looking down at them all coldly Stannis spoke a moment after letting the silence linger. "All of you are guilty of raising arms against your true King." Brienne made to speak but Stannis held up a hand glaring at her. "The lines of succession are clear, regardless of anything else: if the older brother dies without trueborn heirs, the next oldest is his heir. Robert did not have a true heir, he has left many a by-blow, but his three children, the ones that were supposed to be true heirs, are instead the seeds of incest, spawn of the queen and her king slaying, oath breaking brother!"

There were some exclamations of shock from the prisoners at that, who unlike his own men, hadn't heard it just yet, that information not being part of Renly's propaganda, and Stannis' own not moving as quickly. He ignored that however, going on. "Therefore by law, by tradition and by destiny I am King!" With that exclamation he brought out Lightbringer again, hoping to overawe them all and get the prisoners to swear fealty to him.

"All praise the Light That Was Promised!" Melisandre said her eyes alight with religious fervor as they glared down at the prisoners. "Chosen of R'hllor!"

"You surrendered, and thus you are alive to be given a choice, swear your fealty to me and you will join my army as valued members." Stannis said now.

That was as far as he got before Brienne surged to her feet, rage giving her strength to ignore her bruises. "Never! I will never denounce the Faith! You aren't even a Baratheon anymore, your brother and your ancestors are rolling in their graves, giving yourself to some foreign tart and her God! Your soul is as black as aAGGGHH!"

Brienne screamed as fire suddenly surged from Melisandre's hand to impact her chest. One moment she was standing there shouting her defiance, then the next she was on fire, dying as it ate into her chest. Yet she did not call out in pain, no. "Seven Aid your faithful!" She screamed then barreled forward a few steps before finally collapsing several feet from her starting point while the flames consumed her.

Contrary to what Melisandre might've hoped, the death of Brienne did not dishearten the other prisoners. When Brienne fell they all shouted as one, surging to their feet and towards Stannis and the fire guard despite being unarmed, despite being tied up. They looked like madmen, fully intent on trying to take armored and armed men on with just their teeth and legs.

Stannis sighed, then slashed his hands down. Archers from all around the makeshift court fired, and his fire guard surged forward their blades rising and falling.

In the end every one of that first batch of prisoners had to be killed along with half the remainder. Somehow word had gotten out about Brienne's death, and most of them refused point blank to swear allegiance to Stannis. Instead they tried to revolt, to escape, and had to be killed by their guards.

The bloody business went on for hours, costing them the remainder of the light that day. Luckily it didn't seem to have affected Bolling and Errol's opinion about Stannis. They like him put the blame for this directly at Melisandre's feet. When informed he would be having words with her during the debacle, they both nodded, understanding. A weapon like her was useful, but she had to know her limits.

Forty minutes after the butchery ended Stannis and Melisandre entered his command tent alone. The moment they entered Stannis turned grasping her around the throat and lifting her off her feet shaking her like a dog with a rat. "You stupid bitch!" He roared.

Shaking her he went on, his voice only slightly lower but no less ferocious, letting it carry to the men, so that they knew he was laying down the law to the madwoman. "Brienne's defiance was less than empty, it would have amounted to nothing if you hadn't overreacted! We could have won a thousand more men to my cause, instead I have a thousand useless corpses, and an army that now is divided on how it sees you. The R'hllor worshippers believe you speak for their god, but the rest would see you dead if they could! You are supposed to be a hidden dagger, a threat I can use without anyone knowing how dangerous you truly are, not an overt threat, a mad bitch who burns anyone who speaks out of turn! From now on you do not burn anyone without my say so, do you understand?"

Despite having her feet a foot off the ground, Melisandre stared back at him defiantly, and under his hand Stannis could feel the jewel in her choker began to heat. But he had wielded Lightbringer for hours on end in practice, getting used to the heat of it through the pommel and he closed his grip slightly, cutting off her circulation.

The two of them stared at one another until Melisandre finally looked away bowing her head. "As you will, Azor Ahai." She croaked.

Stannis let go of her throat letting the woman massage it for a moment turning away slightly. Her breasts were heaving from the lack of air, but she let none of that show on her face. Stannis was taken with a sudden desire to throw her down and prove his dominance further on her body right there. He threw that thought off however, instead turning to more important matters. "We will leave within the hour for Penrose, I trust you will be able to create another assassin?"

Melisandre looked at him, and a sultry smirk appeared on her face as she let her hands fall from her throat down her body to rest on her hips. "I am certain that together we can do this my Lord" she said seductively.

A week later found Stannis once more marching overland towards where he had placed his fleet, thinking hard about the future. Parchments had fallen, the lord having died apparently from a heart attack in the night, with only Stannis and Melisandre knowing the truth. With that and with the men he had captured from that house having sent word at his request ahead, Parchment had opened its gates. Bolling now had a new castle, and a fair chunk of new territory to expand into after the war.

Now Stannis was debating between staying here to smash a few of the other northeastern Stormlands Lords one by one, emulating his brother's work in the Rebellion, or move to take King's Landing.

He was within sight of Haystack Hall, and he smiled seeing that Sebastion's castellan had been as good as his word, several dozen cartloads of foodstuffs were already outside, and his men gave a cheer seeing it, having marched for nearly two weeks on half rations. He would rest his men for two days here, allowing them to eat their fill and rest before deciding on a course of action. Yet even as that thought struck him, he knew what he would do.

Later that evening he announced it to his captains and lords. "We will march on Bronzegate." he said decisively. "House Buckler is strong, and their town a good resource. It and their keep are set as a choke point for any force further south in the Stormlands using the Kingsroad. I will try to persuade them to join us, but if not we will lay siege to Bronzegate until it gives over."

He did not allow his eyes to stray to Melisandre, who smiled a small secretive smile and said. "Only the foolish or the suicidal will stand against the Azor Ahai, especially with the examples of House Tarth and Penrose to call upon." She had taken the time the evening after the battle to pickle Brienne's head, and that and the banners of the two houses would do to show what happened to the last people who tried to fight Stannis.

"I agree house Buckler will make a good addition to our cause sire, but besieging Bronzegate will take months. Luck has been on our side so far, if we try that..." Lord Bolling shrugged.

Stannis nodded. "True, but Lord Buckler is practical, much like you are Lord Errol. And house Fell on its other side is certain to have sided with my brother Renly. I understand that Buckler has always coveted that land..."

Lord Bolling and Sebastion both frowned at that thought, knowing how strong adding that land to its own would make Buckler. At the moment they were one of the richest houses in the Stormlands, sitting on the Kingsroad which was the best trading road into or out of the Stormlands. The town Bronzegate also gave them access to artificers, metal workers, and cloth makers.

Not a trained force, though they could raise a decent sized defensive levee, but what armsmen they had, possibly three thousand or so, were well armed, equipped and trained. Much better than Bolling's men in the main, or the majority of the men Stannis had taken from the navy if not Dragonstone itself. Errol could more than match their numbers and training even from the men they had fielded already, but not the equipment.

After a moment Sebastion nodded. "A promise of some position, and if House Fell does raise arms for Lord Renly your protection against them and the promise of their land after the war might be enough to tempt Ralph Buckler, true."

"Then what my Lord?" asked Lord Bolling. "And what about House Tarth?"

"Hmm... I will send Davos down after we meet up in Dragonstone to burn out Tarth's port. No port, no way for them to rejoin the war, and we can deal with them at our leisure. For now, if Bronzegate comes over peacefully we will reinforce it as much as possible. Bronzegate is not only a town, it is one of the more powerful castles in the Stormlands. We can use it as a bottleneck to block further troops being sent the easiest way around the mountains into the Crownlands and Reach via the Kingsroad. That will force them to go overland through the kingswood, which will slow my brother's muster from the Stormlands.

"But not from the Reach my Lord." said Sebastion frowning, looking worried.

"True, but the Reach's army will be large and slow, we will retain our small size for now, it will allow us to outmaneuver them." Indeed they only had about sixteen thousand men at this point. "We will soon join with several other houses, I have sent the Onion Knight to Sharp Point and Stonedance, and we will meet them at Dragonstone."

"We are to take to the ocean then," said Lord Bolling, looking a little ill at the thought, while Sebastian merely nodded.

"Yes, we will march to meet my fleet where I left the ships along the shoreline at the nearest point to Haystack Hall. With it and the ships taken from House Tarth who we'll meet there, we can transport our forces to Duskendale. House Rykker will not wish to fight us; Duskendale isn't a defensible position, the port is far too open for that. It will allow us to land our forces quickly and we will march into the Riverlands. I have already sent a message to House Tully demanding their aid."

Stannis hadn't stayed in Dragonstone long enough for word to reach him of all that had happened in King's Landing, so he only had Melisandre's information about the Wolves and the Dragon Queen. He had no idea that the king had Edmure, and so fully expected to meet forces from the Riverlands as soon as possible.

"We will meet them on the Kingsroad near the Trident, and from there march down to King's Landing to put it under siege, smashing any Lannister force that Tywin has put into the field by this point on our way." He had other thoughts along those lines, using a few connections that Seaworth had with a few pirate lords might give them another avenue of attack. Or even make overtures to the Ironborn to see if he could convince them to attack Lannisport for him, force Tywin to turn back. The main point was that right now he didn't want to be bogged down in taking castle after castle or convincing lord after lord to join him.

No, he who held King's Landing held the throne. Once he had the throne, his brother would be certain to surrender, and he could make overtures to House Tyrell. He knew that they would have already demanded Renly take Margaery to wife, but offering his daughter to Willas for marriage would offset that. With their neutrality secured Renly would only have the Stormlands and not even all of them to call upon. With those two facts and King's Landing under his older brother's thumb he would surrender Renly was not want to risk his life if he had no chance of winning.

The plan took a few more hours to hammer out, mostly about how much food would be sent by Errol with the army, but as an outline it would do. In the end house Buckler would indeed join them. In return for House Fell's land if they rose against Lord Stannis, and the heir's position on King Stannis' fire guard they agreed and bowed to Stannis allowing him to turn around quickly after investing the Castle with another two thousand men pulled from all his loyal houses with a thousand coming from Dragonstone itself.

With that, the Stormlands were broken into two pieces, and Stannis was on his way back to the shoreline to meet his navy, with his younger brother as yet none the wiser.

OOOOOOO

Dacey woke up in pain and with the feeling in her mouth as if a skunk had taken up residence in it. She groaned, moving the shoulder above where the ice sword had pierced her side finding she couldn't at the same time she began to open her eyes, trying to sit up.

"Stay put girl." Olis' gruff voice interrupted her efforts, and a firm, but gentle hand pressed her upper body back down. "None of that. What's the last thing you remember?"

"I..." Dacey croaked, then paused as Olis held a cup of water to her lips. She drank greedily, then began again. "I remember feeling feverish, and it getting worse every day on the way back to Norrey territory. That, that's about all I can remember."

"That would be because you apparently collapsed halfway back my friend." A deep voice she knew very well spoke up from nearby, and Dacey turned her eyes in that direction to see Hathan, leaning against the doorway of the room she was resting in. "Something in the wound was fighting the healing process, much like Ranma's arm when he was struck by the Ice giant's club during the ambush. If not for Olis you would have succumbed to whatever it was Dacey."

"Bah, her pushing herself on as she did almost did as much to kill her as whatever it was in the wound." Olis shook his head. "Still don't know what it was, but the poultices I made were able to keep it at bay, and we forced you to sweat it out, whatever it was."

"Thank you Olis, I, I didn't... thank you." For all her courage in battle, Dacey was deathly afraid of dying from illness. "I don't know how I can ever repay you."

"How about by not undoing my good work by moving around too quickly." Olis grumped, but she could see he wore a slight smile under his beard.

Moments later he left, and she turned to Hathan. "How did I get here, and where is here?"

"You're in my holdfast, Dacey. The mountain clans have a system where they use a series of runners to pass on important messages, the Norrey got a message down to me, and I and men of my household road out to meet their party with as many extra horses as we could and a gurney for you. You've been here for a few days now."

Dacey nodded. "Good, that will mean passing on my news will be that much easier."

"True, though perhaps not for just the reason you think." At Dacey's inquisitive look, Hathan smiled grimly through his well-trimmed handlebar mustache. "Lord Stark, Ranma and his sister are back from down south." He went on from there to explain what was going on, and Dacey's eyes narrowed grimly. "So we have some time for you to get better, we're waiting for the barges carrying Lord Umber and Lord Karstark's men down from Long Lake. After that, well, we'll have to see what Ranma plans."

OOOOOOO

The trip upriver to the nearest point where the course of the White Knife took them to Winterfell was an extremely nice, sleepy, six days. During the morning, Ranma spent time with his sister, Myrcella and the others, exchanging stories and listening to what Myrcella wanted to do with her life going forward if she could. She had decided she wanted to be a healer, and had raided the rooms of Lord Manderly's former maester for his tomes on healing. She spent most of the afternoon reading, taking small, neat notes on sheets of parchment Wyman had given her. The idea of talking to the former master, her distant family member, had never even occurred to her.

Needless to say of course she would need to remain near Ranma, since he had promised to look after her but Ranma and Eddard were very supportive of her interest. Alayaya on the other hand wasn't certain what she wanted to do. Yes, she could play at the handmaiden for Daenerys and a fine needlewoman for Merry, but she missed the excitement of being a spy, of stretching her mind and concentration like that. Yet it would be a long time if ever before she could utilize those skills. Alayaya was a city girl, utterly at sea out in the country and her odds of fitting in outside a town or city were nil.

During the afternoon Ranma and Fenris left the boat to hunt, with the two draklings sometimes sent into the air to practice flying and hunting by Daenerys, who remained in firm control of them when they were in the air. Like Ranma and his more experienced siblings, she had to deal with some of the backslash from that connection during moments of high emotion, and when the two draklings made their first kill under Fenris' direction was one such moment.

Fenris had scared a medium-sized elk out of the deep woods, a young buck that had probably been part of a herd before going off on its own. After stalking it for some time, he started herding it back towards the river at a diagonal, into a small opening in the forest which normally crowded the edge of the river. The elk broke out into cover, it's breathing ragged and its eyes widen and terrified.

The draklings had been circling above. Somehow understanding Fenris' instructions, they had remained in that area, sending thoughts back to Daenerys of waiting and anticipation. For a moment they froze as the prey animal burst out of the woods below them, its size and sudden presence startling them. After a second however instinct kicked in and Rhaegon and Sunfyre plummeted down, fangs and claws bared.

Back on the boat Daenerys gasped, her hands almost unconsciously gripping like the draklings' claws as they used slammed down onto the back of the elk, which was larger than they by more than a bit, their claws gouging into its back, teeth seeking its neck. She gasped again and again, then shook her head as the feeling of still warm red blood hit her senses, but a soft touch on Daenerys' shoulder broke her out of it.

"Easy," Ranma said his voice understanding, knowing what she was feeling. He had lost himself in the hunt a few times with Fenris, particularly after the hunt became a fight with another predator. Overall he felt it made their bond stronger, but it was incredibly disconcerting the first few times.

Daenerys shook her head, coming back into herself much faster than Ranma had. Of course unlike Ranma she had experience with overwhelming emotions coming from the draklings along with sensations that she had no experience with. Flying with them had prepared her for this quite a bit more than running did with Fenris for Ranma. After all, even now he could still outpace his direwolf if he really tried. Whereas no human could fly under their own power.

"Is it always like that?" Daenerys asked gasping a little.

"You'll get better at sensing when you need to start pulling out of the connection." Ranma said nodding his head. "I tend to ride Fenris right up until the moment he spooks whatever prey he's after or goes in for the kill. That's actually tougher if I'm honest. Fenris likes to go after bears, something about showing them who's boss I think, and after riding his brain in a fight, even helping him a time or two, it was much harder to pull away when it came time for the fight to end.

"I can understand that, flying with my draklings is...." she shivered a little but it was not from the cold. "It's utterly magnificent, I don't have any words to describe it."

"I suppose for a normal person running with Fenris would be the same thing, but I have a bit of an advantage there." Ranma laughed, putting his arms around Daenerys's stomach and holding her tight. "Keep a light touch on them, I have no idea how they'll respond after their first kill, young ones are unpredictable."

Daenerys nodded, leaning against his shoulder as she closed her eyes once more concentrating on the link between herself, Sunfyre and Rhaegon. Luckily it seemed as if the hunt itself was more important to the draklings than the kill. Ranma and Daenerys were uncertain why that was, maybe the draklings just didn't have as well developed taste buds as a direwolf did, but it was much easier to get control of the two draklings after they had eaten their fill than Ranma had feared.

That became the routine, with the two draklings exercising from after the humans had lunch to when the sun began to go down, flying, hunting and occasionally, very occasionally practicing with their flames. It was only occasionally because Ranma and Daenerys were very firm that they did not want to cause any sudden forest fires, and along the river the forest was often almost straight up against the bank.

The nights were given over to further discussions between all of those on the boat on various topics, most notably the power of river travel. Ranma and Daenerys had a lot of thoughts about that, most importantly the idea of channels, which were heavily in use in Dorne and in Essos, but never so much elsewhere on Westeros. Brynden too was enthusiastic about the idea, seeing what they could mean for the Riverlands. Eddard also saw the point of them and work like that done on the White Knife, in particular in the North.

They had a bit of an argument about where however such a project should be started. Eddard felt that with the infrastructure already in place that creating a channel to lead toward Winterfell from the white knife at its nearest point to the castle was an obvious solution, which would make transportation to and from White Harbor even faster.

Daenerys on the other hand felt that was unnecessary. The nearest point was only four days travel by horse drawn cart since the tributary by castle Cerwyn was too narrow for large barge traffic (small traffic and logs were a different story), and barely a day on any regular horse. What was more, the trip according to what everyone else was easy-going. Even Sansa had been there before, visiting House Wells.

On the other hand, the Last River passed through house Umber's land, and could be used to get goods down to the ocean and from there elsewhere in the North. Since house Umber was one of the two houses that produced the most coal in the North, and with winter coming up that would become very important, it was not only an economically sound maneuver, but a necessity. The other house that produced a lot of coal, House Flint of Flint's Finger had no rivers, few places and no money to pay for ports on the Saltspear. They also had very little in the way of manpower, and therefore no easy way to get their coal, much like their other resources of tin and copper, to anyone else.

With Eddard and the others as arbitrator the discussion continued. This was a task he took to with a small smile on his face, always amused by the way these two seemed to be perfect foils for one another. Eventually the rest of them were swayed by Daenerys' arguments but Eddard added a caveat. "It's an interesting idea, but Greatjon might not go for it. He'd probably prefer to be on hand to oversee it, and trying to keep him away from the campaign in the south is going to be an exercise in futility."

Ranma laughed in agreement with Smalljon who nodded. "We Umber men all love a good fight." He said smirking.

That conversation ended the evening, and it ended up as all evenings on the river did, with Daenerys and Ranma going off alone on the boat to find a quiet place where they could have some time together. They were careful never to do anything untoward, but it was certainly taxing their self-restraint to keep to that. It was fueled and helped along by Daenerys' unwillingness to rub their relationship into Merry's face, knowing how the young girl felt about Ranma. She had come to understand over the time on the Fish's Scales that Myrcella truly did love Ranma, and was of two minds about it.

On the one hand, she got along well with Myrcella herself, seeing the younger girl almost as a surrogate sister not just a handmaiden or even a friend, someone she could laugh and joke about in ways she would never consider joking about with Ranma (a very short list admittedly but still there). But on the other, she was concerned about what would happen there. It was almost a certainty that they would receive word from the tower that Myrcella was illegitimate, after which she would lose much of her rights, and all of her standing in the eyes of society this side of the Dornish mountains. But that would mean her wellbeing would depend even more on Ranma than was the case now, which meant Merry would be around the two for years, maybe her entire life.

Still, that was a problem for the future. Right now the girl seemed happy for her, able to move past her own jealousy, and Daenerys would do the same. She was not a scared little girl, uncertain of her position or power. She was the Dragon Queen, the woman who had brought dragons to life, and with Ranma by her side, the two of them would change Westeros.

Three days into the journey they reached the fork where the White Knife split, a portion of it going via a tributary towards House Cerwyn, while the main river continued heading up towards Long Lake. As they passed the fork they could see several small river boats being kept there, and an odd sort of doorway set over the water, keeping them from entering with several guardsmen posted there. One man, who was most probably the one in charge wore the colors of House Poole on his tabard. He waved his hand at the boat coming up the river.

In response Sansa, who was at the front of the barge, waved back somewhat sadly, remembering Jeyne's death. The sight of her caused murmurs from the men on the other barges as they recognized her and beside her Ranma and their father. The news of their arrival evidently hadn't gotten this far, Lord Manderly not sharing who was traveling up the river that was worth halting down river traffic, just giving the order.

The man grinned "Welcome home Lord Stark, there's been a few changes as you can see!"

Eddard actually laughed, raising his good arm in reply. He still couldn't move his other arm without pain, something that would no doubt be with him for the rest of his life, and his leg was still dead to any commands he tried to give it, though for now it could still hold his weight with aid. He recognized the man, so when he replied it was with his name. "So I see Helden!"

But by that point they were almost out of shouting distance. Behind them the doorway so swung open on either side allowed in the barges that had been piled up there to start their way down river herding timber down to White Harbor.

Three days after that they arrived at the stopping point for Winterfell, which had been heavily built-up. House Wells had poured in its resources and the resources of their lords, and the result was a small dock area, with space enough for four barges to load and unload, a large cart area, and equally large barn for trained reindeer, which did the same job as horses would for cart pulling here in the North. Their holdfast too, which was near the new construction, was in the process of being reinforced.

Lord Wells came out to clasp forearms with Eddard and Ranma, bowing grandly to Sansa. "It's good to see you all safe and home. I have transportation available for all of you, a cart and horses." he said, though his eyes kept tracking to Daenerys awe in his face at the two draklings, who were leaning against her sides as they stared around at the many four-legged animals around them.

This was only the second time they had seen even horses after all, the first being in White Harbor, and up to this point they had killed two wild elk, which looked and smelled similar to these new four-legged things. But Daenerys had been very firm with them that any four-legged one who had humans around was not for eating. It was the best she could do, but thankfully they weren't actually hungry at present, merely curious.

An hour later, the party moved on with the two drakling in a cart whose nervous reindeer was being led by Ranma on foot with Fenris beside him, growling lightly whenever the beast tried to bolt. Eddard had insisted on riding a horse, but he had to be tied into the saddle, unable to grip the saddle with one of his legs.

With only one cart with them, they made excellent time to Winterfell, only taking two days to cover the distance larger carts would take four to do. Of course word had been sent ahead that they were coming. They met a force of 20 men riding out from Winterfell, with Jon at their head, his face broken by an uncharacteristic grin. He swung down from his horse, laughing as he pounced on Ranma. The two brothers embraced, slapping one another on the back while the aerial and Smalljon looked on with Daryn, both of them grinning. "By the old gods it's good to see you brother!" Jon said.

Ranma nodded "You too, Jon, damn, you too!"

Jon turned, exchanging a much more restrained hug with his father as well, reaching up to do so, Eddard not having left the saddle. "Father, it is good to see you too!" Eddard nodded his heart in his throat at the warm welcome from his foster son. He only hoped Jon would take the news of his parentage as well as Eddard hoped. A moment later Jon released Eddard only to find his hands full of Sansa a moment later, the girl trying desperately not to cry, while Jon blinked, not having expected this warm a welcome from her.

Looking at the two young men together Daenerys could see both their similarities and their differences, and smiled faintly. Ranma in her opinion was much more handsome. Jon was a little too Stark in his features for her, those blue eyes of Ranma and the smile lines on his face offset those features in him, and she disliked facial hair. The well-trimmed goatee Jon had was most definitely not to her liking.

Jon broke the hug moments later, looking over at Fenris and Ghost, growling and yapping at one another quietly sitting side-by-side. Fenris was a good head taller than ghost, and somewhat more muscled at the shoulders, but other than that and their coloring they were very much alike, and slightly larger than normal war horses. He leaned in close, nodding his head at the direwolves. "Ghost knew you had arrived and nearby before any of us knew, even for the messenger from House Wells reached us. I think they sort of took over the local wolf packs and forced them to pass on messages at some point."

"Wouldn't surprise me." Ranma murmured back smiling faintly.

"And this is the Stormborn?" Jon asked looking over at Daenerys. He bowed his head slightly to her. "Milady." He looked at the draklings and shook his head. "Wonders both good and ill walk this world it seems."

"Your brother has told me a lot about you Jon Snow." She said taking his forearm like a warrior would rather than holding out her hand to be kissed. "I hope to get to know you further, he holds you in high regard. I hope you're capable of helping me keep Ranma out of trouble as he seems to think. It is most definitely a full-time job."

Jon turned with to Ranma with a smirk on his face. Ranma laughed and Jon grinned, putting his arm around his brother once more in a fierce one-armed hug. After that he turned back to his father, his eyes still shining with joy at seeing all three back and relatively whole. His eyes had not missed the fact that Eddard couldn't put much pressure on his one leg, which hung limply in the saddle.

Moving back to his horse, Jon laughed. "We should get on or else several people will wish to box my ears for me. Lady Stark and the rest of the family are anxiously waiting your arrival."

Eddard's smile at hearing about his wife and family shattered his normal stone face, and his eyes gleamed with eagerness.

Not two hours later they arrived at Winterfell. The bugles of horns announcing their presence, and the shouts of the smallfolk of the small town rang in their ears as they made their way through it to the castle. The town was nearly full, not because of the impending winter, though every Northmen knew it was only a bare few years or so away at best, but because the workers were needed here for various projects. Even during their arrival the clamor of blacksmith hammers could be heard, and other work continued. Inside Winterfell however work had stopped, and all of the servants and castle denizens had come out to greet the returning Lord.

But not the lords who had already arrived at Catelyn's call. Hearing of their impending arrival, Medger Cerwyn and the others who had arrived already, Glover, Hornwood, Mormont, and Ryswell, had all decided to give the Starks the rest of the day to themselves, heading to castle Cerwyn for the day. Many of their men had already been moved to Cerwyn, allowing the army being mustered to be spread between the two castles and not burdening Winterfell or Cerwyn with their full numbers.

At the head of the family was Lady Catelyn, her eyes shining with tears as she saw her husband and oldest children returned to her alive. In her arms she carried the baby that was yet to be named, though not for much longer while on either side stood Arya, Bran and Rickon, with maester Luwin behind them one hand on either boys shoulder, holding them still as both of them vibrated in place with happiness at seeing their older siblings and father returned.

Luwin's placement near Bran was not by chance; Bran's mind had been a treasure to the maester ever since he woke up. Every good teacher desires to have a student who is capable of surpassing them, capable of taking what is taught to a whole new level, and in Bran maester Luwin had that student. His ideas had been the Maesters delight to cultivate, and he had enjoyed immensely the little group of thinkers that the young man had brought together, who stood behind Luwin now as Winterfell welcomed its lord home.

The entire family was grinning widely as Jon and Ranma led the troop in, with Fenris and Ghost speeding along ahead of them. The rest of the pack met them and Fenris led them to one side to allow the human to have their own reunion while he and his family had their own.

Eddard rode ahead of his two sons, his eyes locked on Catelyn while his hands were busy untying his body from the saddle, before looking to either side at his children's joy at seeing Brand awake and moving around with his own eyes clear on his face. Working the reins he brought his horse to a halt before his family and then with difficulty got himself out of the saddle. A stern look at Ranna stopped him from moving to help, and Ranna shrugged his shoulders but stood nearby just in case.

Catelyn strode forward, curtsying gracefully to her husband. "My husband, I'm happy to see you home, your family and castle has..." At that point Eddard had had enough of the formal greeting, and pulled Catelyn into his arms kissing her thoroughly to the cheers of the jubilant crowd around them.

She should've been shocked at this breach of propriety, not just the public showing of affection, which Catelyn always saw as rather uncouth. She should've been, but she was not. It had been many long months since Catelyn had last seen her husband, since she had last been able to touch him, and most of those days had been spent worrying for his safety as well as that of her eldest children. Propriety, she felt, could go hang this once.

This seemed to be a signal, and the rest of the family raced forward, gathering around Ranna and Sansa hugging them both ecstatically. Even Arya hugged Sansa and jabbered into her ear about how happy she was to see her, something that Sansa would never have thought of her younger sibling. They weren't exactly close after all before she left, simply being too different. Yet that didn't matter at all right now and she returned the hugs all around fiercely, crying happily.

Daenerys watched with Smalljon and Daryn beside her as the family was reunited. She smiled, her own eyes misting slightly while next to her Myrcella was looking on in sadness, knowing her own family, while never that happy with one another, would never be the same now. Then Rickon and Sansa reached out for her pulling Merry in as well. Whatever else, Sansa valued Myrcella as her dearest friend, and she was making certain that all of her family and their retainers knew it in no uncertain terms.

Myrcella smiled happily as she exchanged hugs with the younger boys, though Arya avoided her slightly, simply patting her on the shoulder before moving on to Brynden. "Great Uncle Brynden?" She asked, staring up at the gray haired man.

The older man smiled down at her. "Aye lass that'd be me. Your father and siblings described you well, though you are much taller than I thought. Come here child." Arya laughed and hugged the older man tightly. The strength in the girl startled Brynden. She was wiry and limber of arm and leg, and he could actually feel the muscles under her skin, something he had never felt hugging any other woman or girl.

With Sansa leading the young siblings over Brynden was soon surrounded by his niece's family. With that Arya left them to it moving on to the most interesting newcomer, Daenerys. She took in the long knife at the older girl's waist, her silver hair bound up in a braid at the moment, the sparkling violet eyes and the way she stood with Jon and the other wolfsworn around her, before moving forward, holding out her hand to shake.

Daenerys clasped it in a warrior's grip. "You must be Arya, your siblings told me a lot about you. Which one of those is yours can I ask?" she said tilting her head towards where the direwolves were getting reacquainted, roughhousing with one another exchanging senses and yips, communicating at a level neither human nor normal wolf would be able to follow though derived from both.

There seemed to be a bit of a moment over there just then. The shaggiest looking one growled and went for Fenris' throat in something a little too serious for play but just as he did, Fenris smacked him aside easily, then grabbed him by the back scruff, shaking him lightly but pointedly. Nymeria, Ghost and Summer looked on in something that looked remarkably like vexed amusement at their fellow's ill fortune.

"The third biggest one, the one with a bit of her right ear missing, her name's Nymeria." That had happened a few weeks ago, when the two of them were on their last hunting trip with Meera before the Reed girl had to leave with her brother. Nymeria had accidentally gone after a mother fox who was protecting her cubs. The bit of ear was a small price to pay considering that if she had been a normal wolf she might have well been completely overmatched by the enraged mother.

"What about the two dragons?" Arya asked, looking at the two animals, her main interest in coming over this way and leaving the mushy welcoming stuff behind her. Normally she would not have been so welcoming of a strange girl, but the little beasts were really amazing looking.

"This is Sunfyre and Rhaegon." Daenerys said nodding to the two draklings who were curled up on the ground behind her, following her stern injunctions to be on their best behavior, their eyes watching all the odd humans around them.

"Can they fly already?" Arya excitedly asked, kneeling down in front of them.

Sunfyre was the friendlier of the two, and he leaned his neck upright to stare into her eyes. This one smelled much like queen-mother's mate, though female. Not like the other female whose head fur was the color of flame and who was good with the scratching, but similar enough that Sunfyre realized that this was a new family member. That was all right, so long as she didn't try to give him orders like the queen-mother, he would let her close.

Rhaegon was not as friendly, and remained where he lay staring up at her but did not strike out.

"Yes they can fly!" Daenerys said laughing. "That was an experience let me tell you. In fact, I believe your brother will have many a tale to tell you of our adventures getting up here. Trust me, It has been quite an experience." She knelt down to scratch Rhaegon behind his skull right at the base of his neck, causing the little draklings eyes to close in pleasure. "Though I understand that you've had a few adventures here as well? Ranma mentioned something about some battle that occurred here a few weeks after he left? And you're training with Jon?"

Nearby the married couple broke apart and Eddard laid his forehead against Catelyn's. "By the old gods and by the Seven it is good to be home my lady. If I have my way I am never leaving again."

He turned in her arms, and Catelyn's eyes narrowed a little as she noticed his wince at even that slight movement. "If I have my way you're not leaving either." she replied in a low, tart tone. She smiled as the little bundle in her arms began to make itself known again having woken up from his nap with all the noise and shouting. It cried out, and she held the babe up removing a bit of blanket so that Eddard could look down into it. "My Lord, may I present our son."

Her eyes lit up as they always did when she watched her husband with her children. Say what you would about the agony of going through the whole birthing process but Catelyn was one of nature's mother's and Eddard, for all of his sternness was just as good a father. He brushed a finger along the baby's silk smooth cheek and the baby quieted, reaching up with his two little hands to grasp Eddard's finger staring up at him.

The babe's hair seemed a dark red, a mix of Stark brown and Tully red, and his eyes seemed to be a mix of Tully blue and Stark brown, deeper and darker than Ranma's or Catelyn's, but not quite the shade of Rickon. There was no blemish on his face, no blemish on any part of his body Eddard could see and his eyes, which had been wrinkled in tears, were now wide and inquisitive looking up at this strange man.

"What shall we call him my Lord?" Catelyn asked, leaned her head against his good shoulder.

Eddard raised his newest son in his arm smiling faintly as the baby tried to nibble on his finger. "I believe we should name him after your father my lady, I think that is the best idea. He will be Hoster Stark."

Catelyn's eyes widened. She had thought that Eddard would pick a name from his family or from Northern tradition. But then her eyes misted over at this show of compassion. "I like that just fine my Lord." she murmured, looking down at the babe with him. "My little Hoster."

After a moment she turned to stare at where Myrcella was being still hugged by Rickon, while Bran was laughing at something the princess had said, his own arms around a Laughing Ranma, frowning slightly at the site. The Lannister golden hair of the girl made her want to growl like one of her family's pets, but she refrained looking at the girl and the expression on her face as she was welcomed as if she was part of the family.

She looked over to where Daenerys and Arya were talking, exchanging excited talk about something, with Arya demonstrating a sword thrust of some sort while Daenerys nodded, pointing to where ice was resting on Ranma's back. The sight of the two draklings behind the Stormborn girl startled and terrified Catelyn for what they could represent. Catelyn was happy that they were on her side, but unhappy that they were alive at all, she could all too easily remember the stories of what happened to the people burned alive by the Mad King, and she had never been as good about not allowing her hate to splash on the rest of the family as her husband was. And the sight of the little draklings was adding to that worry all the more despite the fact that they seemed docile enough.

At that point Ranma finished hugging his siblings. He moved over to pick up Catelyn in his arms hugging her tightly. "Mother it's good to be home! And who's this?" he said looking down at the little baby.

Catelyn smiled up at her oldest son, reaching down and hugging his head to her chest, while at the same time admonishing him to set her down. When he did, she leaned in whispering into his ear. "Thank you for bringing your sister and your father home." She knew somehow that it had been Ranma's presence that enabled them to get home at all, though she was still in the dark as to what they had actually faced, or that Ranma had gone into King's Landing and rescued Sansa. That tale she would hear later that evening and it would nearly cause her to break down and gives thanks to the Seven that her son was so skilled, though she still had no idea where those skills had originally come from.

"They're my family to you know." Ranma said with a chuckle in his voice, kissing her cheek before pulling back, one hand under her arm as he gestured to Daenerys to come forward. She did so breaking off her conversation with Arya to come forward curtsying to the lady of the house despite the leggings she wore. "Mother, may I present Daenerys Targaryen, my fiancée."

And just like that nearly all of Catelyn's good feelings began to fade.

OOOOOOO

Later that evening at dinner, Eddard told the entire castle that he was stepping down as Lord Stark. Ranma then swiftly installed him as steward of Winterfell, where Ned would have control over the day-to-day running of the keep while Ranma left for war. After tales were exchanged among the family, eliciting much exclamations of shock at the Shadow Warriors and the perfidy of the Queen, Catelyn organized where Myrcella and Daenerys were to stay.

Daenerys got her own apartment with Alayaya embedded there as her handmaiden while Myrcella was put in Sansa's bedroom next-door. It was much the same as she had left it, which pleased Sansa no end. After the events at King's Landing what Sansa wished was to return to the life she had led here previously, though she knew that the memories would never allow that.

After the dinner broke up, Catelyn showed Daenerys and Alayaya to their room, then made a beeline to Ned's study, where she knew her husband and sons would opened up the conversation between them with an opening volley the moment the door shut behind her. "My son, I realize you are quite taken with the Targaryen girl but surely you must understand that your hand in marriage is a massive diplomatic tool! I realize that having her on our side is a good thing, but it will also paint you as one of their loyalists, it will affect how other families see you, how they see us and our cause, and close many doors that would otherwise be open! Besides, what can she really bring to you? The draklings are too young to be of any use at the moment."

"You'd be surprised." Ranma said laughing quietly, moving forward to hug her again before moving back, taking up a chair at the desk beside Jon, a map spread out between the two of them and Eddard. "We only gave you the bare bones of our battles earlier mother. The draklings can already breathe fire, and proved their worth against the Shadow Warriors and against the boats of the pirates. So while they might be of limited ability now, eventually they will be a force no one else can match save her brother, and I sure as hell will not be allying with him."

That forced Catelyn to nod. If the draklings were already able to breathe fire, then they were indeed a military force already, one that would grow as they did.

"Besides," Ranma went on. "Just as Daenerys might close some doors, she will open others. There are loyalist lords everywhere, and not all of them fought in the war. She will give us legitimacy in the eyes of many down south. And if the choice is between taking the throne myself with Daenerys at my side, or backing Renly the coward or Stannis our enemy, then I'll do it."

If Tommy were still alive I would be happy to simply be Lord Paramount once we removed Joffrey from his throne and from his life because with Tommy alive neither Renly or Stannis could ever be king. But I still would have married Daenerys. I've always wanted to marry for love, and the draklings are just a very large bonus.

The thought of Tommy and his death brought a familiar pang of grief and rage to Ranma, and he once again vowed that Joffrey's death would be the stuff of legends if Ranma could get his hands on him. While they might not have been related, much like Myrcella Tommy had become family to Ranma, and anyone who fucked with his family was going to die. Or perhaps not quite like Myrcella, the insidious part of his mind said, remembering how she had made his body react during that hug they shared after he rescued Sansa.

He drove that thought out of his mind quickly, the image of Daenerys flirting with him helping him quite a lot there. He was brought back to the here and now by his mother speaking up again, changing the subject for now. She was not happy, and Catelyn doubted inside that she would ever be happy with the idea of the girl being her daughter-in-law, not after what the Mad King did to Brandon. But Ranma was right, the draklings were a force that no one else could match.

She was not so sanguine about Ranma declaring himself King, and was glad to hear that he was not going to pronounce it himself, but let it simply come up in the conclave naturally. She felt they should back Renly, who while not having the strongest legal claim was certainly the best candidate of the three.

But her husband, uncle and son had been adamant about that at dinner: the cowardice of Renly needed to be answered, and he was the one that needed to open overtures in that direction. He had to come to them to apologize for his cowardice and for the fact that if he hadn't run this war might not have started at all, or at the least not be as bad as it was going to become, before the Starks even considered backing him.

"I have something to show you both," Catelyn said changing the subject for now. She pulled out a Raven message, with the signal of Riverrun on it. "My father sent this to me. My brother is captive in King's Landing, so you will hear no argument from me that you need to march. That kind of dishonor needs to be repaid, but worse my father's health is fading badly."

Catelyn paused, her lips trembling. He had been very blunt about it, saying that he had barely months to live at best, and most of the message had been a last goodbye from father to daughter. Another message had come with it with her uncle's name on it but she had not opened that one. She hoped, prayed that it was a sign of reconciliation between the two, but it was doubtful that even at an army's best speed that her uncle could reach Riverrun before her father died. And even if they did, what they might find there was questionable.

"He names you as his voice my son, acting in his name until my brother is freed. And if anything should happened to Edmure while in Lannister captivity, my father names you his heir."

Ranma's eyes widened at that, then narrowed in thought and he nodded. "I was going to aid them anyway if it was needed, you know that but that will be a help once we get down into the Riverlands."

His mother nodded, visibly pushing her grief to one side. She had one last question she wanted to ask tonight, then she wanted to retire. It had been any incredibly emotional day, and she needed some time alone with her husband. "Before I take my husband away for the evening..." Catelyn paused smiling as her uncle chuckled at that, though her sons looked rather pained.

Like all children Jon and Ranma didn't like the idea of their parents doing anything physical like that with each other. She found a little bit of vindictive pleasure in that, after he had so easily shot down her objections to his fiancée.

After a moment she went on. "The Lords Mormont, Cerwyn, Ryswell, Glover and Hornwood have already arrived, they are spending the evening at Cerwyn to give us this time. Lords Karstark and Umber were going to take the new river passage down from the Long Lake, but should be here within a week. Hathan Shieldarm will be arriving with them I think, he contacted us yesterday with a message that said the Flints had passed on a message from the Norrey clan asking him to wait for them, I don't know why. And with that gentlemen, I bid you goodnight."

With that she turned, and after helping Eddard to his feet the two of them left heading towards their room, the lords bedroom, since Ranma had refused to change the sleeping arrangements.

Behind them Ranma shuddered a little then went downstairs with Jon. Jon pulled out one of his short swords, passing it over to Ranma. "That's an example of the blades we're turning out here thanks to Bran and his special furnace and the iron that Hathan found. I'm not surprised Hathan was willing to wait for the Norrey clan for more than one reason."

He briefly explained the mission he had sent Dacey on, and Ranma nodded, understanding that the message from the mountain clan might mean Dacey was back. He was a little worried about that, since this would put his past lover and current fiancé/future lover in the same place, something no man was really prepared for. Still, he was happy to hear that Dacey had returned from the dangerous mission.

Jon knew what his brother was thinking, but instead of commenting on it went on. "Besides that, I know Hathan wanted to put someone in place to command his new holdfast, but frankly he's not happy with his decision. The man he's chosen is inexperienced in the extreme, even if he is personable and intelligent enough to do it."

Ranma nodded, staring back down at the blade Jon had handed him then going into a few katas in the middle of the hall. After a moment he nodded "this is an excellent weapon, by the old gods Bran's helped us more with his mind than any ten thousand swords could." He turned his eyes back to Jon. "So, Arya, she looks good, I take it she took to her continued training as well as she has before this? I bet you have some plan there, and I bet it's the same as mine."

His brother smiled, nodding, his head, and then sighed theatrically. "Lady Catelyn won't be happy." Ranma shrugged philosophically, and then they both laughed.

OOOOOO

The lords returned late the next day and were welcomed by Ranma in his new persona as Lord Stark. After greeting them all he took Lord Glover over to one side, and informed the man of Daenerys' presence, as well as her two draklings. At first the man looked fit to attack him, he had lost his uncle to the Mad King and any mention of the Targaryen family would set him off. But Ranma calmly explained what had happened, and told the man some of the rest of what had went on down south.

Galbart was a late-middle-aged man, with prematurely grey hair and a mind more at home with law and managing disputes than war, he could easily see the upside to having dragons on their own side, especially if there was a chance her brother might return to Westeros with one of his own.

Later, after getting all the lords sequestered in their rooms, giving them a bit of information but putting off most of their questions with multiple refrains of 'I don't want to say it over and over again, wait until the conclave', Ranma was finally able to say hello to one of his other friends. "Roger." Ranma said, gripping the other man's arm tightly, thumping him on his shoulder. "How are you? I'm surprised that you didn't bring what's her face, the wildling woman with you."

"She wanted to come, most particularly when we found out there might be war in the offing, but she's a little too far into her pregnancy for that." Roger said rather complacently with a smug smile on his face. It remained to be seen if his wife, (she still had a problem with the removal of the word spear before that), wouldn't be coming after him eventually, but for now she was safe in his house's castle.

Jon and the others crowded around, thumping his back and shaking his hands in congratulations. "I'm not the only one!" Roger protested, pointing at Daryn and then at Ranma. "Word travels quickly, you're marrying Alys Karstark, and you apparently brought back the Stormborn as your bride? Or at least that's the rumor I've heard. That's a tale and a half I'd wager."

"Wait for it." Ranma said with a chuckle. "I have no doubt that Domicer is putting it in verse, I'm surprised he hasn't already finished it frankly, but until then, I would rather tell the tale just once more if I can get away with it. And, as Lord Stark, I can, so there."

"So the former Bolton is back," Roger said, his eyes glittering coldly for a moment at the remembrance of what happened there. He didn't have a problem with Domicer per se, but any mention of the house that he had once been a part of was enough to get Roger's goat up. Given what had happened to his older sister Bethany, the wife of Roose that Ramsay Snow might have poisoned, that was understandable.

Ranma led them off towards the exercise area, whispering. "Now that you're here, Jon and I have an idea..."

They stopped and watched as Arya put several men through their paces. All of them were former armsmen wearing Hornwood colors, and were now part of the light infantry, swordsmen in the main, despite all of them wearing decent light chain mail. They also had been trained for weeks now, and it showed but not one of them or even all of them combined matched Arya. She was devilishly quick, her strikes coming from every direction, and she was always moving, never still, constantly turning the tables on them when they thought she was cornered.

To one side the wolfsworn after hearing the two Stark's idea, nodded to one another, then left the area for time.

Later that evening after having spent the rest of the day with his younger siblings, Ranma asked Arya to join him late that night in the godswood. Arya wondered what that was about, but decided to go with it. It wasn't the first time she had slipped out of an evening after all, and the godswood was always comforting. You could truly feel the age of the place, and some kind of power as well. Her mother and the other followers of the Seven didn't seem to like it, but it was very comforting to Arya. Something she equated to the fact that her family had held land here for as long as the woods had been there.

Stalking through the woods toward the heart tree Arya and Nymeria both stopped suddenly, staring as they noticed a small circle of figures waiting for her illuminated by the moonlight above them. One voice boomed out, the comforting voice of Ranma, though the tone was more formal than he normally sounded. "Who comes before us?"

Arya's eyes narrowed, but she strode forward confidently. "I'm Arya Stark." "I've been called here for some reason I don't know." She said staring around at them all. Arya wasn't one to stand on ceremony, and this looked like some weird ceremony that her brothers had thought up.

There were chuckles, and the people stepped forward out of the trees and further into the light of the moon above. Arya nodded, she had guessed right, it looked like all of the wolfsworn in Winterfell were here, along with Ghost and Fenris standing next to their masters. Daenerys too was there, though she was standing to one side, with only one of her draklings, Rhaegon Arya thought, he was a little bulkier than the other one, at her side. She was obviously there as a witness rather than a part of what was going on.

Ranma grinned raising a thumbs up in Arya's direction before going on, his voice now somewhere between formal and jovial. "Arya Stark, you are known as a warrior, are you loyal?"

"I am loyal to my family and to my friends." Arya said looking around again but answering readily enough. If this was what she was thinking it was, she wasn't about to make waves just yet.

Ranma nodded. The wolfsworn hadn't been a name he and his friends had given themselves, but once it had been thought up by the smallfolk they ran with it, and had created this whole ceremony to induct new members as they had done with Hathan, Edd and Roger before this. Arya was responding pretty much the same way they had, she seemed to both see the humor of the situation and the seriousness which was good. "Are you blooded in battle?"

"I am." Arya replied, her head coming up proudly.

"Then Arya Stark, we find you worthy of becoming wolfsworn, will you take the oath?" Ranma pulled out Fang, letting it rest for a moment by his side.

Arya's eyes narrowed again one eyebrow going up but after a moment she nodded hesitantly. She knew Ranma took oaths seriously, and so did she for the most part, but this was coming at her out of the woods. Still, she trusted Ranma not to have come up with anything she would find disagreeable.

At Ranma's gesture Arya sank to her knees, but her eyes remained on him, which Ranma again nodded to. The flat of Fang touched each of her shoulders and he began. The oaths were pretty much like those knights were supposed to do, hitting upon integrity and loyalty, both to the other wolfsworn to her house and to the common man. They also demanded she hold herself to a way of acting, like the code of chivalry knights were supposed to keep to, but much more realistic, and with a greater emphasis on how she was to treat the smallfolk than most knightly oaths.

Despite this they were quick, with Arya answering each with a simple "I will."

After the oaths were over Ranma nodded. "Then rise Arya Stark, wolfsworn."

She grinned, taking her Fang back from him, and moved to stand beside Nymeria where it crouched in the circle of wolfsworn near Daenerys. She looked around at them all, then took the jug that Smalljon passed down to her, sipping and gasping as the strength of the ale inside of it. The big man laughed, but thumped her on the back with a surprisingly gentle hand, before indicating she should pass it on. Arya growled then took another defiant sip before passing it on.

"Now." said Ranma, sitting down and gesturing everyone else to sit, while Daenerys sat next to him, leaning against his side lightly as he in turn leaned against the front of the heart tree. "Before you get too drunk, tell me what you've been up to little sister, and we'll tell you about our adventures down south."

The next several hours passed thus, with the jug of what another world would call scumble being passed from one wolfsworn to another, though after the first round Smalljon gave Arya some from a specially watered down jog, something that she didn't notice by that point.

While Daenerys was still an outsider here, she was most certainly a welcome one, and after the others had told her own tales of what had been going on since the last time they had gotten together like this she regaled them all with the tale of her escape from her brother. All in all, it was the most fun Arya had had since Ranma had left Winterfell.

By the end of that time, most of them were extremely tipsy, and Arya was quite a bit closer to drunk than sober. At that point they all broke up, heading back to the keep and their rooms with Arya being helped along by Ranma, with Daenerys behind him leaning on Jon. Still, Arya had enough presence of mind to stop Ranma from leaving her when she flopped onto her bed. "When you go south, I'm going with you." She said, her voice sounding almost sober.

"I know." Ranma said sighing. "I knew that ever since Jon agreed with me you should be inducted into the wolfsworn. Just don't tell mother about all this okay? We'll think of something, but that's one fight I really don't want to have to battle okay?"

"M'kay." Arya nodded, then flopped onto her side in her bed not even bothering to pull up the covers, asleep the moment her head hit the pillow.

OOOOOO

Elsewhere things were not as peaceful. Not even the ocean itself was proof against the chaos that was gripping Westeros. On the Sunset Sea, ships of black hull and varicolored sails, long sleek shapes like sharks on top of the water, sailed on in groups, some as small as five, others as large as two hundred. On many of them the flag of the Kraken could be seen flapping in the breeze.

Much like many lords suspected, the Ironborn had taken the weakening of the Iron Throne as a sign. They had long chafed under the rule of the Iron Throne even before their rebellion during Robert's reign, and the North having a hostage to compel their good conduct could not keep the Greyjoys from trying desperately to turn back time to when they were true masters of the ocean. Be it pride, be it hubris, be it a desire for blood and mayhem or the needs of their God to be sated by the blood of others, the Ironborn were going to war.

OOOOOOO

The next morning, Jon was asked to join his father in his study. Wincing occasionally as he passed a arrow slit letting in the sun, he made his way there after downing some of maester Luwin's special hangover remedy. There he found not only his father but Ranma, Catelyn, and Daenerys.

He exchanged weak nods with the other two young people, amused that Daenerys was showing more pain than Ranma, despite having taken only from the jug specially prepared for Arya after the first round rather than the real rotgut that the rest of them had drunk last night. Still, being awake this early after what was obviously her first time getting drunk was impressive.

Daenerys nodded in turn, trying to keep her head from falling off with the movement while internally vowing that last night was the last time she was going to be getting drunk. Through her pain however she still smiled at Jon. He was a remarkable young man much like his brother, both intelligent and loyal. He also had a surprisingly good way with her draklings.

Actually both Jon and his younger brother Bran had a way with her youngster seemed to get along with any animal, something which Ranma said spoke of Bran's more powerful warging potential. He had however taken Bran aside the day after they arrived and warned him not to try to connect to the draklings without Daenerys's permission. That was just rude after all. Bran had seemed saddened by that, but had agreed to it. Bran seemed in awe of her and so too bashful to approach Daenerys to ask permission, but she knew that if they spent overlong here in Winterfell he would. What she would say to that however, she didn't know just yet.

Jon on the other hand showed no sign of being able to connect mind to mind with the draklings, but the draklings treated him much more kindly than they had treated Sansa or Myrcella in the beginning, showing none of the aggression that they showed anyone else. Save Ranma the un-biteable or course.

Still Daenerys wondered why she was here. She had been told it was a family matter, but surely that meant she shouldn't be here shouldn't it?

Sitting at his desk with his leg up on a cushion, Eddard looked at Jon's gravely, none of his amusement at the looks of pain that all three young people had on their faces showing on his, while Catelyn was mildly disapproving, or greatly disapproving he wasn't certain right now nor did he care at present. "Jon, I have something to tell you. Something about your parentage, something I have had to keep secret before this for the safety of us all."

Jon's eyes widened. Am I finally going to learn who my mother was? That had been the one thing that always bothered him; that he didn't know who his mother had been, had it really been just a sudden love affair between her and Lord Stark, was there something deeper there? Or was he from smallfolk stock, something that happened after a battle like Theon had once said, before being soundly thrashed by Jon for it. That was the fight that had destroyed several dozen bottles of wine in the wine cellar, and caused Eddard to raise his hand to the boys for the first and only time.

Now Jon looked at them all, then back to Eddard. He gulped, his throat having suddenly gone dry, then nodded convulsively. "I-I've always wondered about my parentage, but, but can I ask, why now?"

Eddard's eyes flicked to Daenerys then back to Jon. "Because the reason it had to be kept secret no longer matters. Robert is dead, he can no longer take vengeance upon you or my family for hiding you. And because you deserve to know, you both do."

Daenerys cocked her head, wondering what that meant, unable quite yet to see where this was going while Jon and Catelyn both simply waited and Ranma smirked internally. This would answer the one, final question he had about his brother's birth, and he was looking forward to it.

"The tale begins near the end of the rebellion, when myself and my companions finally found my sister where Lyanna had been placed in the Tower of Joy down in Dorne by Prince Rhaegar. Everyone in the West knows how he absconded with her, despite already being married, but, and I swear this to be the truth on my name, we were all wrong. Lyanna did not, she was not taken against her will, she had fallen in love with Rhaegar, and he with her despite already being married."

While Jon and Ranma's eyes widened at that sudden shock, Eddard shook his head, once more thinking of the folly of love and its power to change the world. If Lyanna had been open about their infatuation, could that have changed anything? No, the Prince was still married, and Dorne would never have forgiven any attempt at annulment, especially one without reason.

Daenerys now was looking between him and Jon in wild surmise, while Jon still wasn't there. Eddard smiled then went on with his tale. "There were seven of us, seven of the best warriors of the North, against three Kingsguard, and only myself and Lord Reed made it back alive. Only Lord Reed and I know what was really going on, that Lyanna had not only had run away with the Prince, but had already slept with him. By the time we found her, she had gone into labor."

His eyes turned distant remembering that moment, when they stormed up the steps of the Tower of Joy to find three healers with his sister all of them trying desperately to save her life while a babe was cradled in a wet nurse's arm, crying out lustily. At the time, all Eddard took in was the blood on the sheets, the paleness of his sister's normally lively face, her eyes opening and closing rapidly, the sounds of the panicking healers. Those healers had all died by his blade unwilling to swear to keep the secret as the wet nurse had.

"That babe was you." Ned said, coming back to the here and now to stare at Jon. "My sister made me promise, on the blood that we shared and on my love for her that I would watch over you, that I would treat you as family. Yet I could not declare you such. Robert was gripped in a blood madness, shown by what happened in King's Landing to Elia Martell's children, and his standing orders for Viserys and Daenerys. He wanted to wipe out every bit of Targaryen blood from the world, and my friendship with him would not have saved us."

Jon trembled. "I-I have Targaryen blood in me." He stuttered looking at Daenerys. "I, that's unbelievable, I have nothing I mean nothing in my features say I am..."

Daenerys nodded looking at him thoughtfully but she shook her head. "That's true, but there is the way you have with the draklings to consider. They didn't let Myrcella or Sansa near them for a time unless I was close by controlling them, it was only after the two girls helped me with their first molting that they accepted the two of them. And they still don't let Alayaya or any of the others near them, and it certainly isn't because of sensing that you are like Ranma, since they attacked him at first too." she said, obliquely referencing the warging ability, not looking at Catelyn.

Catelyn was a devout believer in the Seven, and the Seven held that magics like mind to mind linking were signs of witchcraft and therefore evil. Ranma and his siblings had long since decided to hide their ability to warg from her, and in fact Ranma had made Bran and the others promise to not mention it even to Sansa, who was the only one among the kids who have decided to follow the Seven, though Rickon hadn't yet made that choice.

"But they let you touch them, they even seemed to like it when you did so, which is incredible, since even Bran wasn't allowed to do that the first time he approached them, and you know how good he is with animals. It could be a sign of what Lord Stark is saying." She smiled suddenly, reaching forward to grasp his shoulders with both of her hands looking into his eyes. "For my part I'm happy to have found a family member who I can honestly say I am honored to know. I'm happy to meet you, nephew."

Jon stared at her, then began to smile as well reaching out and pulling her into a brief but heartfelt hug before turning to the others. "What does this mean for me?"

"It means that you can be known as a Stark, brother." Ranma said smiling at him. "I mean to legitimize you as one of the first orders of business in the conclave. I doubt that many of the Lord's will object." he added dryly. That actually won a round of chuckles, since Jon Twinblade was almost as well respected in the North as his father or Ranma.

"Alternatively," Ranma went on. "We could name you Targaryen. At the moment that really can't make our position any worse in the eyes of the Baratheon siblings or the Lannisters, they apparently are already sending out messages saying we are closet Targaryen supporters anyway." The official line of what happened in King's Landing had spread to the Riverlands, sent on by messenger to Moat Cailin and then by raven up to Winterfell.

Daenerys looked hopeful at that, not because she would indeed like another Targaryen named member around her, but also because she knew how her brother would react when news reached him. Hah, if only I were there to see it!

But after a moment Jon shook his head. "I'm a Stark, I've been that for years regardless of the name, regardless of who my father really was." he said looking apologetically at Daenerys before turning to face Catelyn and Eddard. "you are my father sir, and you lady, despite never quite treating me as well as one of your sons, you were the closest thing I had to mother. I will be a Stark, whatever my real heritage."

Ranma clapped him hard on the shoulder, a wide grin on his face. Daenerys shrugged philosophically, while Catelyn and Eddard looked on proudly.

Jon-now-Stark joined his brother later that morning with the rest of the Wolfsworn including Arya and Daenerys as they raced out of the woods. Ostensibly they were heading out to watch Daenerys train her draklings, while the rest of the wolfsworn got to know one another again after so long, but that had mostly been accomplished last night. Still, none of the lords cared, their egos having been sufficiently stroked the day before, and they were eagerly awaiting the last of their fellows. Besides, Eddard remained, and there were old tales to speak of and drinking to do.

Soon they came upon an open clearing, ironically the same one Arya had been training with Dacey in when Nymeria heard the incoming raiders.

Ranma held up Ice, the greatsword easily wielded one-handed as he moved through a series of katas. The others were all watching him, then gasped in sudden shock as the blade began to glow light blue tinged with gold, not sickly blue like the eyes of the undead, but bright flickering blue gold fire.

"This was why my weapons were deadly to the Shadow Warriors" he said, coming to a halt and bringing up the blade holding it in front of him. "A Valyrian blade like Ice is apparently deadly to them on its own, but this, was just as deadly. I mean for all of you to learn how to do this."

"What is it?" Roger said looking at the blade in awe. Daryn and the others were staring in awe as well. "And how did you learn to do whatever it is?"

"You've all been training with me since we were young, and I know some of you have wondered where my own skill comes from. I'll tell you all when Edd, Hathan and Dacey arrived, it's not so interesting I want to tell the same tale twice. But for now, let's concentrate on this."

While Daenerys moved her draklings through their flying paces, getting better and better at controlling them and sending them further away from her, though they still couldn't go very far in a single flight, Ranma trained the others in the rudiments of ki manipulation. This began with meditations, something that had them all grumbling. But he had introduced them to it before, telling them about how they could sink into a combat mentality, which would help them their reaction times and awareness during combat. After that he walked them through the feeling of pushing their life energy into the blade.

Leaving the rest to practice, Ranma took Arya off to a side of the clearing into the woods to where he had set up a series of ropes tied between trees. They were at various heights, ranging from one a foot off the ground, to another well into the branches of the largest oaks that made up the course.

"What is all this?" Arya asked, looking around.

"Jon and I have talked about it, and we think given the fact you need to base your style off speed and movement, you should learn something of the same style I do. We call it Anything Goes, and it was originally an aerial style, meaning the user tries to stay and fight in midair. It's tough, but it gives you a lot of advantages in a fight, not just mobility, but shock value, and the fact it's very hard for other people to adapt to."

Arya nodded, having occasionally seen Ranma in what she had called 'jumping practice' jumping from one limb of a tree to another, while kicking or striking out. He often practiced that in the godswood. Then she frowned. "Wait, Jon doesn't use this style, does he? I mean, I never see him jumping like you do or anything like that."

"Hah!" Ranma laughed. "Well, heh, Jon started to learn a weapons style that used both hands before we could really get into midair practice. And once we did, we found that he's afraid of heights."

He was forced to dodge as a large cob of wood passed through the place his head had previously inhabited. "I am not!" Jon's voice shouted from the other side of the clearing, to the background of several people laughing. "I simply have a preference for keeping both my feet on the ground if I can help it, and a respect for gravity that you, you crazy shit, don't."

"Whatever!" Ranma yelled back, before turning to Arya. "Anyway, let's see if you have any aptitude for it."

Arya nodded eagerly, then followed his instructions getting up onto the first rope. Thanks to her previous training she had excellent body control and balance, so she was able to stay up on the rope, and even flip herself up to the second one. Nor did she have any fear of heights. Arya had often gone with Bran on his climbing expeditions, until her mother had threatened to cancel the agreement between her and Ranma.

When he began to throw things at her while shouting "DODGE!" however, Arya began to have a much harder time of it. She fell several times, but other than cursing Ranma out every time the small leather wrapped sticks hit her she didn't complain.

After a few hours to Ranma's surprise Jon was able to show a flicker of energy before that first day ended. But by the end of the week, Roger had begun to exhibit similar flickers. The Daryn and Smalljon were slower, only showing flickers on the last day, before Greatjon and Lord Karstark arrived with Dacey and Hathan in tow.

Both men arrived with a force of one thousand five hundred, coming down the river from Long Lake. Umber brought a thousand mixed weapons infantry, who Ranma thought of as light infantry, two hundred cavalry and three hundred archers. Karstark brought seven hundred archers, five hundred infantry, and three hundred cavalry. Combined it was a powerful addition to the army already in place here and in Cerwyn, but right now Ranma was happier to see his friends than the men.

Dacey looked weak where she sat in her saddle, and Hathan and Edd were hovering around her protectively, as if they were worried she might fall off her horse. The fact she wore no armor but a shift over which she had a sling keeping her arm still and what looked like heavy bandages under her armpit, also worried Ranma. But her eyes were clear, and she was watching everything around her alertly. A single glare his way also made it clear she was nearly fed up with the cozening she had already gotten, and would thump him if he tried to add to it. So instead Ranma turned back to welcome his fellow lords.

Lord Karstark was at the head of his family, his heir beside him on one side and his daughter on his other, though not his wife, she traveled poorly. She became sick even when in a cart moving slowly over flat ground let alone by horseback or by riverboat.

"Cousin." Ranma said reaching up to clasp forearms with Rickard, then, as she gracefully descended from her horse pulled Alys into a one armed brotherly hug. "Good to see both of you, looking forward to getting married Alys?"

"I am well cousin." Alys said reaching up to kiss Ranma lightly on the cheek. "And yes, I am. Daryn is a good man, and I have been dreaming of this day for some time now."

Her father looked at the two of them as he slipped off his own horse, sighing sadly at hopes he'd had in the past well and truly gone now. Still, the marriage between Alys and Daryn Hornwood was good, and had been long in the making. He smiled as the rest of the Starks came toward him led by Jon, always happy at how the Starks treated him and his like family rather than simple lords or vassals. "You've been busy I believe, Jon." he said then smirked as he caught Daryn staring at his daughter a blush on his face quickly matched by one on hers.

"I think we should get these two married off quickly yes, to make sure something untoward doesn't happen?" He said aloud in a whispering sort of voice yet one which carried, causing both youngsters to blush even redder.

Ranma laughed and the Karstarks moved off, with Catelyn showing them into the keep while Ranma and Jon turned to welcome their friends and Greatjon. As soon as he was within the castle's main square, Greatjon's voice boomed out. "Smalljon! What are you doing down here, you're supposed to be on the wall with your uncle, I'll tan your hide for disobeying me!"

"Peace Greatjon" said Ranma, leaning up to clasp forearms with the man before backing away to let him slide out of the saddle. "I'd decided I wanted all of my friends around me, and he came down with the Imp to make sure he didn't try to run away before we arrived in White Harbor."

"And is he here?" Greatjon growled, looking around. "The Imp I mean. What's all this I hear about the bloody lions showing their true colors again? And you bringing back the Stormborn girl?"

"No, Tyrion and I came to an agreement, he's back on the Wall, and happy with it I think. As for the rest, you and everyone else are waiting for that, but I wanted to tell all of you all at once, save my throat some work that way." Ranma said laughing and slapping the older man on the shoulder. "The war counsel is tomorrow afternoon, and we'll have quite a tale to tell you. Before that though, I think we've got a wedding to go to tonight."

Greatjon looked over to where Daryn was still staring after Alys who had just gone inside the keep, then began to laugh.

After that, Ranma was finally able to greet his friends. "Dacey, Hathan, Edd, damn good to see you three, the gangs all here now!" Ranma grinned, exchanging a hug with Edd and a handclasp with Dacey and Hathan. "So, what exactly happened to you Dacey?" He went on, his voice lower as he began to direct them toward the keep, Greatjon behind him talking to Jon about a schedule for his men' rearmament. "Or should I ask, what did you find?"

Dacey nodded her head slightly down at her wound, keeping her voice low. "That was done by a sword that was made of ice and we found a small foot bridge leading across the Gorge made of the same thing. Burned it, and if that was all they could do after a year from the time we were ambushed, we might have cut off the White Walkers from being able to send troops around the Wall for now."

Something about that statement bothered Ranma, but he nodded. There they were interrupted by Maeve Mormont coming out of the keep, roaring for her heir to show herself, and tell her how she got herself hurt.

After Dacey escaped her mother, she met up with the others in Ranma's room where she relayed the entire story to them, Arya, Domeric and Daenerys. After she finished, he was so busy talking about the implications with Jon and the others he didn't notice Dacey and Daenerys sizing one another up.

After a moment, the older Dacey, shrugged philosophically, and nodded her head over to Arya, who was listening to the truth of the northern threat avidly. "So runt, how did you bribe your brother into letting you join this troop?"

Later that day while Ranma was once more spending time with Rickon and Bran, Dacey and Daenerys talked, and Dacey realized quickly why Ranma was so besotted with the girl, while also setting her straight on their own relationship and how it had ended. Daenerys in turn told Dacey how she felt about Ranma, how they had met and how she had come to care for him. By the end of that discussion the two had made their peace with one another, with Ranma none the wiser.

A much more important meeting occurred while the godswood was being prepared for the wedding. There Ranma told his friends (minus Theon, who wasn't there), his sister and Daenerys about his past life. Not everything, just the bare amount, that he was a warrior from another place, who had developed his skills in combat against others with similar skills, and how he had been forced to run away to retain his personal honor, then found himself as a baby once more here. He also included the fact the old gods had sent him visions.

This was the clincher for his friends. All of them had been prepared to believe him before that, but it was well known that sometimes the old gods spoke in such manners to their believers in times of great upheaval. Daenerys was more skeptical about that, but did believe that Ranma had been resurrected in some manner, and was here now to face the White Walkers by something.

After the others had confirmed that this new information changed nothing between them (after all, they had suspected Ranma was gods-touched before this) and promised to keep this information a secret, Daenerys spoke up. "I agree this needs to be kept a secret Ranma, but I wonder if you've thought this through."

When everyone looked at her she shrugged. "I do not believe in the old gods, and my faith in the Seven isn't particularly strong either, but if the old gods do exist as indicated by them giving you visions and bringing you here, then it stands to reason other gods might as well."

Ranma nodded somberly. "I've thought of that, and I think we've already seen an example of something like it, those Shadow Warriors. Though what god they're connected to I don't know. I hope that the Seven remains aloof at least, I can't see it, er them, er... whatever..." Hathan, the only real follower of the Seven among them, snorted in amusement while Ranma went on. "Have any real problems with us, unless they don't like the whole warging thing, which is another thing we'll all need to keep secret. But other than that, well I'm just hoping the White Walkers don't have a real deity to call on."

"I don't think they do, if anything from the old tales they seem to simply worship, well, themselves in a way. Not their ancestors, but their own abilities, as well as simply winter in all its horrible power." Jon shrugged. "At least that's my impression after researching them here in the library."

Hathan was frowning thoughtfully. "So really this whole war in the south is more of a side show for you and for us, if the old gods brought you here to face the White Walkers." He would have preferred that Ranma had been sent by the Seven, but given his abilities it actually made more sense for him to have been sent by the old gods.

"Pretty much." Ranma shrugged. "We march south to see justice done, to avenge our dead, but also, and this is even more important in a way, to unite enough of Westeros under us so we can bring even more aid to the Wall if needed. And I'm very afraid it will be. I could wish we didn't have to but wishes in one hand, shit in the other, see which one fills up first."

At that they all laughed and the moment passed. None of them really cared one way or another what might be out there, whatever it was they would face it together.

OOOOOO

Daryn and Alys were married that evening in the old style as practiced in the North. Daenerys and Ranma were both there as witnesses, and Daenerys afterwards pulled him to the side. "If you think for one moment I'm going to have a marriage like that you have another think coming Ranma Stark!" she said sternly poking him in the sternum with every word.

"Never dreamed of it." Ranma said shaking his head. "I think it's barbaric myself, and I live here remember. Don't worry though, I've got a plan." Ranma began to whisper the plan for the real marriage, and she nodded. It seemed like it would work, especially given the power of the scumble she had tired the night Arya was inducted into the wolfsworn.

The next afternoon however, both of them had other, more serious things to concentrate on. While the two newlyweds recovered, the Lords and all their heirs gathered in the keep's main hall. Daenerys, Myrcella, Brynden, Sansa, Ranma, his father and Jon were waiting for them, with Fenris and Ghost laying on the floor nearby. Myrcella acted like a maid, going around and giving them each steins, while Ranma went around filling them from his own hand.

After they all had quaffed a single gulp, symbolic for this meeting, they sat down at the long table. Ranma nodded to his father who sat beside him in the advisers position rather than Lords, something Greatjon noticed, and sighed at. But he had already heard about his Lords crippling injury, and understood. More, he knew Ranma and like all the others who did knew he would be a magnificent Lord Paramount for the North.

"So!" he bellowed, getting the ball rolling quickly as was his normal bombastic nature. "Since I've arrived here I've heard rumors gossip and suppositions. I'd like to hear some facts. You called us and our men up, told us to gather here, so what's going on down south and what do you plan to do about it?"

Ranma nodded at his father who began the tale from the beginning. First was their worry that something was going on, though they couldn't at first pin anything on the Lannisters, then Ned's concern about what had happened to Jon Aryn and looking into the bastards of the King and the lineage of previous marriages between House Lannister and House Baratheon. Many a Lord turned to look at Myrcella where she stood behind Daenerys, who was sitting on Ranma's other side at the head of the table. She met their eyes levelly, while Ranma stated their current position, that she and they would remain acting as if she was a princess of the house of Baratheon until they received word from the Citadel that the female offspring of those marriages also favored the Baratheons.

There was some murmuring about that, but that ended when Daenerys spoke up saying that Myrcella would act as her handmaiden, and after Ranma said that she was under her personal protection. In the south there would have been a lot of mutters about that, seeing the young girl as a potential tool against her mother and the rest of her family, but here in the North they didn't think like that for the most part. Not after Ranma said that she was under his protection.

From there on Ranma's father Brynden and Myrcella continued, filling them in on the war of influence that occurred in King's Landing, then the death of Tommen, where Myrcella stated unequivocally that it had been Joffrey who engineered it, admitting it to her later.

After the roars of disbelief and fury that the idea of a kinslayer sitting on the Iron Throne evoked faded, the conversation continued with Brynden and Eddard describing the battle that had occurred in the city. Eddard surprised many there with how passionate he was in praising his guards. He went into detail about how they had sold their lives more dearly than anyone could have ever expected, how they had come so close to victory and if not for Renly and Loras' cowardice they might've won.

This caused some more murmuring, which ended when Sansa spoke up from where she stood behind her father, describing the perfidy of Joffrey. Her lips trembling as she remembered, describing how he had her whipped, how he put men to death simply to grind into her face her position as his prisoner.

That was the final straw for Rickard, who had come to care for Sansa and the Starks as his family as they had his,

and the others. They all rose to their feet, slamming their hands down on the table and shouting out about treachery, cowardice, and 'this must be answered' and 'to war!'. After a few moments, Ranma's voice overrode them "There is more my lords that you need to hear!"

Daenerys spoke into the quiet then, her voice passionate, yet controlled. "You have heard of the Lannisters, and you have heard of Renly, who, we have since learned has declared himself King. You have not yet heard of Stannis, and the villainess that he seems to have welcomed into Westeros. Hear this tale now, then think hard about what fighting it may mean. This is not a war like any other my Lords, this might be a war against pure evil."

She went on from there, describing both the first attempt to take her alive, then the second with the Shadow Warriors. There were exclamations of shock and horror at them, but no disbelief. While magic was not very well known here in the North, they found it easier to believe since it had a place in the Old God religion, and none would doubt her words, with Sansa, Ranma and Eddard all there to back it up. The only one who is skeptical was Lord Ryswell, but that was simply his nature.

"You say we have a choice whether to face this my lady," said Lord Hornwood shaking his head, his normal control in abeyance now. "The choice is simple, face it now down south, or face it in the North when they come for us. None of the three claimants to the Iron Throne are of the type to let us alone up here, we'd have to bend the knee to one or the other if we don't march. These Shadow Warriors sound like the foulest magic wherever they come from, so I'll have no truck with Stannis. I have no patience for cowards, and thus have no respect for Renly. And I would sooner die than bend my neck to a Lannister bastard!"

There were shouts and thumps on the table of approval at that, and it came as no surprise to Ranma that Greatjon spoke up next, his voice allowing him to quiet the hubbub easily. "Aye, even before this Renly Baratheon was nothing to me, a pulling whelp who's never known battle, nor Stannis neither, a cold fish and not the man he was if he has truck with such as these shadow things. Why should they rule over me and mine from some soft seat in Highgarden or the Stormlands? What do they know of the Wall or the Wolfswood or the barrows of the First Men?"

He stood up, looking around at them all, his great, bearded face fierce and challenging as the northern wind. "What has the south done for us since the dragons passed? It was the dragons we married, the Targaryens who helped create the Night's Watch, who gave them the Gift, who allowed us to keep to our ways. And look we have dragons!" Greatjon bellowed pointing at Daenerys. "I've seen them, we've all seen her little ones, have seen them in flight, and we know what they can do. I say that it is time for new blood on that throne coupled with the old, let us raise our own king and queen of the North!"

The other Lords took it up bellowing agreement, but it still shocked Ranma when he saw Lord Ryswell stand up, banging his stein on the table for silence. "You speak for me as well Halys, Greatjon, and I'll say it again. What did Baratheon or Lannister or even the Reach do for us here in the North, nothing! At least the Targaryens helped us on the Wall, at least they gave us subsidies for food when times were harsh! I agree let us raise our own king and queen, king in the North!"

There was a roar of approval, which sent Fenris down to his haunches putting his paws over his eyes whining slightly along with Ghost. Despite their irritation at the noise, they both understood this was some sort of pre-battle howl and were happy with that. They had their own bit of vengeance to look into. Lady's death had left a hole in the pack, and it would be answered in blood.

"No matter what else happens, we will not just be king and queen of the North." Ranma said. That silenced them, and Ranma read out the message from his grandfather. There was some mumblings about that, though every Lord there understood that Hoster was doing all he could to keep his lands from falling to Lannister control. Ranma went on. "Even without this I would not be willing to simply stand back and let my grandfather and my family down there fall without a fight. We will march to their defense, as much as possible, and we will deal with this these Shadow Warriors of Stannis's, and with the Lannister treachery! But we cannot leave the North undefended."

There were some looks exchanged at that wondering what other threat there could be. The wall was held so securely now that there was no doubt that the wildlings couldn't break through. Not unless they found a way around it, and there was no sign they could do that not with the forces enough to matter.

Daenerys spoke up, shaking her head sternly. "The Ironborn my Lords. Surely you do not think that they will remain peaceable in this time of chaos? They will no doubt go back to their old ways, and the North cannot seem an easy target."

"That is why my lady mother specified that you should leave your men behind Lord Glover, your town will be a primary target for them, a forward base they could use to invade further inland. In fact, I hereby order you to build up your defenses as much as possible in that eventuality. If you cannot, if your town in your opinion is not defensible, then I give you leave to retreat further into our territories. Let the Wolfswood be our defense on that side. And you my Lord," he turned to have Lord Ryswell. "I would like you to only give me a fourth of your forces. You will need to be available to defend the Stony Shore if need be, and Lord Tallhart, you as well."

Tallhart smiled, enjoying being called lord rather than 'master', as his house's rank would allow. "I've gathered about five hundred men here my lord, three hundred archers, two hundred infantry. I have about another five hundred light cavalry, which I'll put at lord Ryswell's disposal for defense of the shore under my brother."

Normally such a task would be given to his son, but Benfred Tallhart was known as an arrogant, standoffish and rather idiotic young man. Ranma and he had met once, and it had been all Ranma could do to not smash his teeth in. He was an utter idiot when it came to anything combat related, or much of anything really. It was why Tallhart's brother was his heir rather than his firstborn son.

After a moment Ryswell nodded. "I've already gathered two thousand men here, heavy and light cavalry, that leaves me another thousand light cavalry and five hundred heavy for defense of the shore. But are you certain you won't need more men down south? The armies of the Westerlands and the Reach are massive."

Ranma and Dacey exchanged a look, and after a moment, Dacey nodded her head and Ranma stood up. "There is more you all need to know, more than you have been told up to this point about another threat. For that I and my friends apologize, but we didn't think you would believe us, not until we had more proof. But we have some more proof now, and more witnesses, thanks to Dacey Mormont and her mission to the Gorge."

From there, Ranma went into the ambush he and his friends had walked into on their way to the Wall. Hearing the full story many a parent harrumphed, having figured out there was something more going on there than they had been told, though none of them had supposed the full horror. While one or two were angry they hadn't been told earlier, Maeve and Lord Glover being the most angry of these, the others understood why it had been kept a secret. Certainly the former king or his court would never have believed such a tale.

After Dacey filled them in on her own mission and what it had revealed, Greatjon in particular was much more positive about it all, pointing at the fact that all of their Houses had already sent forces to the Wall. Indeed it was still being reinforced, a force from Locke, about six hundred armymen, had been sent up there less than a week before Ranma and the others arrived in White Harbor. "Hah, if those undead bastards think they can get through the Wall so easily with just the Night's Watch to contend with, let them face the might of the North united and ready for them!"

There were some bellows of approval at that, though a few of the lords were suddenly looking a little more leery about going south.

Sensing an opportunity Medger hummed thoughtfully, looking from one lord to another. "I probably don't need to say this, but I'm getting a little old for this warfare game." There was some laughter at that, though there was a bit of truth to it. Cerwyn could still fight and well, but he was an older man, slightly older than Eddard.

The more important fact though was that his daughter Jonelle and son-in-law were both not warriors, not really. Oh his son-in-law, Jerolt Flint of Flint's Finger, the second son of that family, was a good warrior but had no head for leading. And Medger had already sent his second, Kyle Conton, to the Wall and had no one else he trusted to look after his land and lead his people in battle.

"Still, it needs to be said." Medger went on, waving his hand at the others laughter. "But I trust Ranma Stark to lead my men, even without me looking over his shoulder to make sure, so I'll hereby relinquish formal command of my men going south to him. Now, let's put some numbers on the table here. I don't think any of us should call up more men for the southern excursion, let's look at what we've already brought together. By my count, and it's accurate since my house is putting up food and board for half of it, we have four thousand pike, some five thousand light infantry, around two thousand light cavalry, and a little over a thousand heavy, a little over two thousand archers, and seven hundred scouts and skirmishers from the Mountain clans."

"House Manderly has already begun to send a force down to Moat Cailin of six hundred heavy cavalry and infantry, and they will be preparing a supply point for us on the other side of the Neck." Ranma smiled. "I told you I wasn't going to let my grandfather and his house fight alone. Even if you had not all joined with me so vehemently, I was not going to let that happen. I would've gone alone if I had to."

There was some mutterings of approval and disapproval for that, but they were quieted as Medger spoke up. "So even with the forces on the Wall that leaves all of us with enough forces, particularly cavalry, to guard our own lands and field a decent defensive force or reinforce the Wall further. Excellent."

Daryn frowned, knowing the 'us' had been sent his way in particular. "... son, despite having to tear him away from his wife, will be sent in my stead. Even if they will wait for full winter to come against us, I can't in good conscience go off to war and let my wife hold my land alone with a threat like the White Walkers looming." Like Medger, he didn't really have anyone who he could trust with leading his men in war other than his son, and despite having to leave Alys, Hornwood doubted he could keep Daryn away from this.

Lord Ryswell snorted, seeing no need to save face, since he was the oldest man here, and well past his warrior years. "My son Roger will lead my troops of course."

"As will Dacey mine, after we've a talk about keeping secrets girl." Maeve growled. Dacey had the good grace to look mildly abashed, but unrepentant. "I'll not let any Ironborn attack my island without me there to personally put my sword up their ass!"

"Hah, well Rickard and I have a son and an uncle respectively we can leave to look after things. There's no way I'm missing out on this!" Greatjon laughed. "Though if the war drags until winter starts, I'll have to rethink things."

"In that line Lord Umber, we have a proposal to talk to you about." Daenerys said. "Specifically your control of the Last River and coal supplies."

Greatjon looked at her, then nodded as she went on, agreeing to house the workers that would start that task, taken from Stark and White Harbor for now. Later prisoners might be used for that sort of transportation construction, but not right now.

"What of House Locke?" asked Rickard. "Or the Flints and Dustins? And besides your pikes, won't you be sending any cavalry? Cavalry is the measure of a lord's worth."

Ranma laughed, and at a mental command Fenris stood up, leaning his massive head over his master's head where he sat. His lips rippled backwards, allowing all his teeth to show, while beside him Ghost did the same, leaning between Merry and Jon to nearly reach across the entire table to stare at Rickard. "Oh, I think we've got an equivalent force here, don't you?"

Rickard withdrew his objection while the other lords laughed, then Ranma addressed his other questions. "The Flints of Flint's Finger have the same problem that you do Lord Glover, they're very vulnerable to attacks from sea. I refuse to take people from their defense if the Ironborn return to their Old Way." Ranma nearly spat the words shaking his head.

"House Locke and the Flint's of Widows Watch have already promised their services elsewhere." Daenerys took up the tale. "They and the Manderly navy will be taking and investing the Three Sisters, then building us a supply point at the lowest point of the Bite to the Neck."

That brought a round of approval from all the lords. Memories were long in the North, and the sistermen hadn't made any friends here even after the war between the Vale and the North over them had ended.

"Is that what that Greyjoy brat is doing? I noticed Theon's not here. If he were, we could still use him as a hostage against the Ironborn." Lord Glover said, though there was no acrimony in his voice. He hadn't lost any family to the Ironborn's last uprising, but he hadn't particularly warmed to Theon either.

"He's in command of the fleet taking the Sisters." Ranma confirmed, grinding his teeth a little at the older man's tone, but letting it slide for now. "Wylis Manderly will take over the conquest once the landings are secure. Besides, the idea of hostages only work when the other family is honorable or cares for their members. Can anyone here say with a straight face that you believe that the Greyjoys are honorable? Or will care about a son who has been raised here in the North most of his life?"

Eddard, who had been silent since finishing the tale of the south, looked away, not happy about that, but unable to gainsay it. The men around the table however laughed, and the question turns to logistics and other things, including pay for the man on the march. Two silver Stags a day, to be started forty days from now for most because of the subtraction of payment for their weapons and armor. More than fifty silver stags could then be exchanged at the end of the war for land up in the Gift, or possibly in the Riverlands. House Stark would pay for the foodstuffs for the army as well up until they left the neck behind, whereupon Locke and Manderly would take up the task until one of the Riverlands lords took up the task.

As the meeting finally reached its conclusion, and the various northern lords got up from the table talking excitedly about the coming campaign, Ranma, raised his voice for a moment. "Lord Cerwyn, Lord Ryswell, please stay for a moment."

Looking at one another wondering what this was about, the two men obeyed, moving over to where Ranma, his father and Daenerys were still sitting. Ranma turned to Lord Cerwyn first. "Your grandson, Cley, he is of an age to be sent to ward correct?"

"Yes." Medger nodded. "I had hoped to have him do so with Kyle. He could squire with him and then Jonelle wouldn't chew my ear off for sending her little boy away. Now though, I will need to look for other solutions. Why?"

Ranma smiled. "On the campaign, we're not going to have servants or anything of that nature, but a squire or ward can help immensely, he could fill in the same position for me and the rest of the wolfsworn as Merry is going to be filling in for Daenerys."

Actually that wasn't true, Myrcella and Alayaya were both going to be housed as Daenerys' maids but Merry was also going to be acting as part of the medical teams at need. That had been an innovation Ranma had put together that Merry had distinctly approved of. They would be adding any healers, both septons and maesters who they came across that proved trustworthy to their army.

This would later include the maester of house Locke, who Lord Manderly had convinced the elderly Lord Locke to send down to meet the army at the way point his people and House Reed were going to set up past the Neck. He was a youngish man, and Ranma hadn't met him before but he was already renowned as a healer more than any of his other duties, hence Manderly's suggestion of sending him.

Medger smiled. He also knew why Ranma was offering this, since Daenerys was standing there with a smug little smile on her face. Due to his wife dying in childbirth along with their second born, who would've been a son, he hadn't had a son of the proper age to join the wolfsworn. But with his family's position and power, he should have had a representative among Ranma's friends. He hadn't felt slighted by it, Ranma had often been to his house on this errand or other and the ties between their families were strong, but this would be a good way to continue the tradition. "Excellent, I presume you'll also be training him?"

"Of course." Ranma said nodding. In fact if Medger had brought him to Winterfell that training would already have begun.

"Good, in that case I except, I'll tell him when I get home this evening. But you get to tell to his mother about it." Medger said dryly. "I'm old, my ears are too frail to put up with that kind of punishment."

Ranma winced while the others in the room laughed. "Are you sure you don't have a castle you want me to take single handed instead?"

"Not at all, if you're going to be taking her darling boy away to war, you get to be the one to smooth talk Jonelle. Besides, she likes you, and you don't have a beard for her to pluck out. Mine would most distinctly be in danger if I was the one sacri-I mean the one to inform her of this."

Ranma winced again then nodded acquiescence. Realizing that was his cue to leave Medger stood up, stopping only when Eddard asked him to help him out of his chair, and walk with him out of the hall. Eddard knew this was on a topic he should have taken care of years ago but hadn't for friendship's sake and sadness, and had no desire now to be the one to solve it.

The others left too, knowing that what Ranma had to speak to Lord Ryswell about wasn't nearly as pleasant. Daenerys alone stayed, one hand resting lightly on Ranma's arm. When the room was cleared Ranma began. "Lord Ryswell your daughter, Lady Dustin..."

"I know what you're going to say, milord." the older man said shaking his head. "She holds a grudge like no one's business, it was always that way with her even as a child. Not being here or even sending a representative for this meeting was unconscionable, and there needs to be repercussions forward. But remember that house Dustin is in a bad way and has been for years, they lost nearly all their forces in Robert's Rebellion along with their lord, dead near the end. Barbrey took that hard, and has loathed your father for getting him killed ever since, that and her own memories keep her from moving on."

"I know, and I'm not going to raid her scant force for the army or anything of that nature. No, what House Dustin and Barrowton will be doing is equipping the army with provisions, and adding to our supply train."

Daenerys pulled out a list of their requirements, which had taken the two of them hours of working with Jon and maester Luwin to write out. Much of it had already been filled by Winterfell and House Cerwyn, and some more of it would be filled by House Locke when the army left the Neck. Blankets, arrows and food for example were taken care of for now, but they still needed more, in particular medical supplies and tents. Ingredients they would get from house Reed directly, but actual supplies, carts for the supplies, and other things they needed more of. Ranma intended to move the army quickly, but he wasn't about to let them rough it more than was necessary.

"She'll be filling these out gratis from her own resources. We won't be paying for them at all. Let that stand as payment for not obeying her Lord Paramount's commands." Ranma said sternly, taking the list from Daenerys and passing it over to the older man.

Lord Ryswell looked over the list wincing a little. It wasn't that any one item on it was expensive, but there was so much there. "She could say that since it was only your mother speaking for your father rather than him speaking for himself she didn't have any obligation to listen," he prevaricated.

"Which is so much marsh gas." Daenerys said sternly. She had been the one to come up with this idea when it became clear Barbrey Dustin would not appear, and was certain to drive the lesson home. "Many a time a castellan or lady has stood in for a Lord away at war, and they are not questioned in their authority. Let me be blunt my lord, lady Dustin has allowed her house to slide into a recession of power that is leaving a power vacuum in the Barrowlands, one that we cannot allow to remain. I urge you to speak to her about this, she is yet middle-aged is she not? She can change her ways, come to some form of agreement and move past the past. If she cannot, then we need to think of a more... permanent solution."

Ranma nodded. "Ser Jory Cassel gave his life to defend my father, and the Cassel House has been loyal to mine for generations. Nor are they the only ones. The Poole for example, or House Stout or Goldgrass may be elevated to fill in the void she has allowed to fester." While the Poole and Cassels were minor houses beholden to Winterfell, with House Poole actually looking to become richer with their position along the White Knife and the small taxes that would allow them to garner.

Goldgrass and Stout however were two of the few minor houses that still were nominally supposed to answer to House Dustin. In contrast to that house however, they had grown slightly since Robert's Rebellion. Ranma and Eddard really didn't care for either house much, Eddard had met their leaders and they seemed too like southern 'yes men' than real northern lords, so that was more of a threat than something they would actually go through with. House Cassel however, despite the fact Dustin's minor houses wouldn't like it, was a definite idea.

Lord Ryswell winced again. "I'll talk to her." he promised. "I don't know how far I'll get, but I'll talk to her. Hook of by crook though, you'll have your supplies my liege."

Ranma nodded. "That's about all we can ask of you, just make certain she understands her position."

OOOOOO

The next day, the rearmament for the Karstark, Norrey and Umber forces went on. The light infantry, the trained armsmen, were given decent, but still light chainmail to replace their studded leather armor they wore for the most part, something even Karstark and Umber men needed. The cavalry too received some better equipment, though not the heavy cavalry, which had been given the 'lion's' share of such before. The light cavalry however received breastplates of the same type the heavy infantry were given to wear over their leather armor, and more than one man also was given a helmet as heavy infantry of Stark and Cerwyn, all of them having been trained by Jon, wore plate cuirass and thigh guards over chainmail plus helmets.

They all needed this to a greater or lesser degree. The Norrey men's armor was all leather or ancient ring mail, and more than one minor house couldn't give its men steel weapons, using bronze instead. They were all ecstatic about their new weapons, but the Norrey and the other Mountain clans were even more so, since Ranma and his father had pledged that the rearmament was for all their fighting men. Each clan lord had already sent a runner home with news to that effect, and they would see more mountain warriors arriving in clumps over the next few months after the army left.

Ranma wasn't in charge of that. He left that in maester Luwin and Bran's capable hands, along with his father to manage the lords. Instead, while all of the men were getting over the fact they would have excellent weapons and armor, Ranma was having his first battle of the southern war and seemingly losing badly.

"For the final time NO!" Catelyn growled looking as if she wanted to shake him by the throat. She had lost the argument about Daenerys, she was not going to lose this one. "I nearly lost Bran once, I am not letting you take him off to war! I would rather you stay here too, but I know you cannot, but Bran is too young, and he is no warrior.

Whatever projects you think you may need him on, I need him here, I will not allow it! If you take him, you'll have to take me too!"

That ended that conversation. Ranma wanted his mother as far away from the war as he could get her, and he sighed in defeat. "Alright, I would've wanted him to be the lead on some of the projects I can see needing down the road, but um, y-your right, his, his place his here with the rest of his family." Catelyn's eyes remained narrowed as they stared at him and he asked timidly. "Er, I-I don't suppose I could ask him to suggest someone else?"

"Fine, I'll go with you." Catelyn said smiling thinly. "That way I'll know that you've not tried to pressure him into going."

Ranma nodded meekly, but internally he was actually rather pleased with how this went on. Their fight had gone on long enough for Catelyn to truly believe that Ranma had desperately wanted Bran along, and not once had he mentioned the idea of Arya coming with him. No, he wasn't even going to try to fight that battle, he was just going to take her with him.

Arya was flat-chested enough to dress up as a man, and could slip in easily with the rest of the army until they were well away from Winterfell, whereupon she would join the wolfsworn along with Nymeria. That was a much better idea than having her chase after them alone, which was almost certain to happen if he didn't bring her along himself. That way, hopefully they would be out of earshot when his mother realized Arya was gone.

Of course, his argument with his mother wasn't the only thing that was going on that day...

OOOOOO

That evening, the Lords, their heirs and a few of their ladies along with some chosen retainers met up in the godswood before the heart tree. The area was now crowded with several long tables, piled high with food on their white linen. Garlands were hanging from several of the trees, though not the heart tree, which stood resplendent, powerful and forbidding in its austerity, the face of the old man on its bark seeming to both stare and smile at the same time for some reason.

Ranma stood beside the pool at the heart tree's bade wearing formal clothing, Ice resting in the ground next to him. Jon and his father, using a large staff, stood to either side of him, the rest of the Lords gathered to either side.

As the sun set Daenerys moved towards them through the woods Myrcella, Alayaya and Dacey with her, performing an honor guard. Sunfyre also moved alongside her, the most well behaved of her two draklings. While Rhaegon was willing to not bite everything he saw, he did not like crowds, or noise. Fenris stood by her side as well, and there was some murmuring from the few retainers who had yet to see him or Ghost, who was also trailing on her other side. They acted like bodyguards, growling at the crowd of people to keep their distance. Ranma however barely noticed, his eyes locked on Daenerys.

Daenerys wore a simple dress of purest white, with some silver stitching done in the shape of her house's banner on her shoulders. It fell loosely down her legs, hugging her chest and upper body, showing her figure while allowing her legs full movement. Her head was bare, the silver hair of her house falling in a cascade down her back. Her violet eyes were locked on Ranma's blue ones, and neither could look away.

To one side Dacey laughed silently at the two of them. Seeing the two of them together had been amusing to say the least to the older woman. While she had enjoyed being with Ranma greatly, a wedding like this had never been something she wanted or wished for between them. Indeed Dacey would have balked at the idea of being tied down, even if at the time she had been happy sharing Ranma's bed. Daenerys on the other hand, could have nothing but and seemed to be looking forward to it. Young people. Eesh. Was I ever that young?

"Who comes before the old gods?" Ned asked in a loud voice standing forward.

Daenerys answered here. "I am Daenerys of the house of Targaryen, I come before you never touched by man, a willing wife I be, looking to be wed to Ranma Stark."

"Ranma will you take this woman?" said Lord Stark looking at his son.

"I will take this woman." said Ranma formally, holding out his hand to Daenerys who grasped it. At this point Ranma would normally have placed a cloak over Daenerys shoulders, but considering this was more a marriage of equals, and that their names were going to be Stark Targaryen signifying this, they had decided not to include that. Plus, they were both still wondering about what their banner should look like, let alone their family's colors, and had indeed decided to let Sansa loose on the problem for now.

They both knelt to the heart tree, and Lord Stark stood before them, trying to keep the pain from standing on his unresponsive leg from showing. "Then by the grace of the old gods I proclaim the man and wife."

The two of them looked at one another, and Ranma leaned over kissing her on the lips. There was a roar of approval, and Daenerys's arms went around him, hugging him tightly for a moment before they turned and viewed the cheering lords of the North.

"Now to feast!" said Smalljon pointing at the tables. "I bet I can finally drink you under the table father!"

"That will be the day!" his father bellowed back, smacking him on the shoulder. "I'll take that bet, and see you eat crow!"

With that their party started, with Daenerys sitting at the main table next to Ranma. He whispered into her ear as he sat down. "We'll act as if this was a normal feast for now, then as soon as the drinking begins we can slip away. Don't worry, all of the ale has been spiked already."

It wasn't exactly by the rules, the feast was supposed to end after the two new married couple had eaten then the bride was supposed to have her clothing torn off by the crowd so that everyone could see her body and make certain that she was clean and unblemished. Then they were supposed to watch while her maidenhead was broken, like Alys had been forced to endure. But both Daenerys and Ranma found that ceremony repugnant, and knew it wasn't needed in any event. Still, as long as the lords had enough fun and drank enough spirits, they would be allowed to slip off to Ranma's bed in his room without being bothered.

About an hour later Ranma nodded over at Jon who nodded back. The others were all drunk as Lords, and the only ones that remained awake were Smalljon and Greatjon. Every retainer was down, though maester Luwin was still awake staring around at the others in amusement. He however like Catelyn was a follower of the Seven, and did not really have much truck with the marriage customs here in the North.

Daenerys smiled, looking around them. She was feeling slight hesitation, but more and more eagerness as Ranma's hand was on her thigh, kneading the skin through her dress as her hand was on his. "Do you think they'll be irritated tomorrow?"

"Hung over yes, irritated no. It's not the first time this has happened after all, trust me on that. We will however need to remember to strip the sheet off the bed afterward." He shrugged apologetically. "Sorry, but some things apparently need to be proven to a wide audience."

"We might wish to think of new marriage ceremony in the future. I liked exchanging our simple words out in the woods, underneath the sky and stars, but the whole bedding ceremony...' she shook her head.

"I'm just glad that you decided to go along with being married in the old tradition at all, that would have been a disaster." Ranma said standing up and helping her to her feet. "so, um, t, to bed, my wife?"

Daenerys nodded, anticipation boiling within her. With that they made their way out of the godswood, back into the keep and up to Ranma's room, never noticing how Greatjon had noticed them sneaking off, and smiled, shaking his head, understanding easily what had happened, but not having a problem with it. As much as he espoused the traditions of the old gods, he knew the bedding ceremony wasn't the most romantic of events, and that kind of thing mattered to girls.

Lemon start:

The moment the door shut Ranma turned to Daenerys, only to find her leaning up to him already. Their lips met, and her arms went around his neck, drawing him down to her. His own hands went around Daenerys' waist at first before grabbing her svelte rear, lifting her up with one hand on either cheek. Her legs went around Ranma's waist as he plunged his tongue into her mouth, dueling with her own there. Daenerys did not let Ranma dictate the kiss easily, pushing back as hard as Ranma did, unwilling to allow him control just yet.

Both of their eyes were closed, but Ranma knew his room well enough to move forward, still carrying Daenerys until her rear slid up along the bedding, forcing him to remove his hands, sliding them up her sides. Daenerys pulled back grinning wickedly up at him, as Ranma quickly divested himself of his shirt tossing it aside. Running her hands up his chiseled chest for a moment, Daenerys reveled in the feel of his muscles, so hard under her hands.

She began to fumble at her own dress for a moment, but Ranma reached around her, pulling the dress apart from where it tied at her neck easily. Daenerys pulled out of her sleeves, letting it pillow around her waist where she sat upright on the edge of the bed.

Her body was then bared to his gaze, and she flushed at the look of desire in Ranma's eyes. Though petite, Daenerys was quite stacked up top, with high C-sized breasts in the scale of his former life, a bare size smaller than Ranma's female form in that past life. Her nipples were a pale pink color, already hard and sticking out from the rest of her breasts.

"You're so beautiful Daenerys..." with those words Ranma knelt down, his knees on the floor. He then leaned forward taking one of her nipples in his mouth sucking gently, then harder as Daenerys encouraged him, pulling his head against her chest. "Harder. I'm not glass, harder."

Ranma complied sucking harder at her nipple as his tongue went to work on it, his other hand kneading her other breast while her hands fisted in his hair for a moment her head thrown back at the new sensations rocking through her body. This was amazing, this was astonishing, it was almost frightening how good it felt. Then it got better as Ranma began to use his teeth on her nipple, grinding the hard nub between his teeth, a sensation they caused her to gasp aloud. "Yes! Ranma!"

He grinned up at her, then switched to her other nipple giving it the same attention. After several minutes of this Daenerys pulled him back to his feet, then down into a heated kiss, their tongues once more dueling, almost beginning in midair for a moment she was so eager.

Then she pushed him away slightly, reaching down to grasp his breeches pulling them down hard. Both his breeches and his underwear came with. His cock sprang free, eight and a half inches and thick, standing up as hard and as straight as a granite column. The sight sent a pulse of desire through Daenerys. After a moment staring, she hesitantly leaned forward, licking the tip of it experimentally. Alayaya had told her about this and its equivalent the lord's kiss which she hoped Ranma would do to her but she had to be the one to start things apparently.

Or she would have, if Ranma was a normal part man. Instead he stopped her with a gentle hand on her hair. "You don't have to do that you know." He said his voice deeper than normal with lust and love. "I won't force you to do that if you think it's beneath you or anything."

Daenerys smiled at his concern, but shook her head pressing forward and licking the underside of his cock for a moment. Ranma had bathed of course before the ceremony so it didn't smell or anything like that. She licked at it experimentally, her hands going around him to knead his buttocks as Ranma's hands sank below her head, once again playing with her breasts, catching her nipples in his fingers.

She murmured in appreciation at that, then backed away from his shaft and opened her lips widely to take the tip in her mouth. Ranma moaned above her, signaling that she was doing something right. Licking the tip for a few moments Daenerys got used to having it in her mouth, then slowly pulled him forward, letting more of his shaft enter her mouth slowly, still licking at it as it entered.

Ranma growled his hands twitching against her breasts one of them leaving her breasts for a moment to fist in her hair, then falling away as if he was forcing himself not to simply grab her head and his cock down her throat. His self-control made Daenerys smile even more and she continued slowly forcing his cock down her throat.

After two more inches however Daenerys realized she couldn't go further, and her jaw was beginning to hurt. She slowly pulled back, licking at the shaft then the tip as she did so before it exited her mouth with a 'popping' sound. She works her jaw for a moment shaking your head. "Alayaya was right." she muttered, "that kind of thing takes practice."

Ranma laughed, lifting her up easily by he get his hands on her waist tossing her onto his bed to causing her to squeal. "Plenty of time for us to practice together my wife. I'm never letting you go!"

Daenerys laughed then gasped as suddenly her skirt was ripped from her and tossed to the side followed quickly by her underwear, with her lifting up her rear eagerly to allow Ranma to pull it off more easily. Her glistening flower was thus revealed, dripping with arousal already. The scent quickly hit Ranma, and he growled like Fenris, diving down before Daenerys could even gasp. She gasped then however, as he nuzzled her flower, his lips licking and biting at her outer folds. Indeed, she cried. "By the gods old and new!" Her hands fisted in his hair as she groaned aloud, bucking her waist up into his mouth. "Don't stop, don't stop. It feels so good!"

In response Ranma grabbed her thighs forcing her waist back down onto the bed from where she had bucked up. Now Daenerys couldn't get away from him, and was utterly at his mercy. Not that she was complaining, Ranma was working over her nether regions like a master pianist on the piano.

About five minutes later, Daenerys' cries became more and more ragged, and her upper body thrashed, her hair wildly flown this way and that as her eyes began to slide shut. 'Something, something's coming, I.....AHHHHHH!' At that moment Ranma had added a finger, gently pushing it inside her hole as his lips found her clit. She screamed like a banshee, her fingers almost ripping out his hair as she bucked up against his grip, spasming as she came for the first time. She actually squirted a little, something Ranma hadn't ever seen before or even heard about.

He grinned moments later pulling back and wiping his face licking at her juices. "You taste amazing Daenerys, like honey and cinnamon and some kind of fiery fruit, if that makes sense."

Daenerys laughed shaking your head. "I have no idea why, but I'm glad you enjoyed yourself my dear husband."

She practically purred the word husband, reaching up to grasp Ranma by his ponytail pulling him down to her while her fingers undid the string holding it in a ponytail, letting his hair fall against the back of his neck freely like her hair did. They kissed again, and Daenerys could taste herself on his lips. Ranma had described it accurately, and Daenerys was not repulsed by the taste. Indeed, it tasted rather good on his tongue against hers.

The two of them kissed softly then more ardently as Daenerys recovered, and Ranma moved himself up lightly to be between her legs. He pulled back, looking down at her, blue eyes meeting violet. "Are you ready?"

Daenerys nodded, staring up at him bravely, speaking formally. "Go slow my Lord. This has been magnificent so far, let's not ruin it with untoward haste."

Ranma laughed, and she slapped his chest, still some of the tension of the moment left them at that, which had been her objective speaking so formally. Moments later however she watched as Ranma brought his cock up to her flower, gently sliding it along the outer edge for a moment, lubricating it if such a thing was truly needed given how wet Daenerys was. Indeed the bedding underneath her waist had been drenched by her orgasm earlier.

At her nod Ranma slowly eased his cock into her, going in a bare inch before stopping letting her get used to his girth. Her hands fisted in the bedding on either side of her, then moved to his shoulders as he added another inch. It was excruciating torture for him having to control himself, but he persevered despite wanting to simply ram it in and get the painful bit over with. She had asked him to go slow, and he would do so.

Still, his control was fraying badly as he went on, and finally he hit her barrier inside her. Daenerys grimaced, pulling him down to kiss her again. After a few moments she pulled back and nodded and Ranma pulled back slightly then rammed forward, breaking her barrier.

She wanted to scream but instead Daenerys bit down on his shoulder, biting so hard she actually drew blood. Her nails also dug in to his back slightly. Ranma grunted, the pain of that helping to combat the feeling of his cock being inside of her.

The two of them stayed like that for several moments as Daenerys's pain began to recede, and she loosened her clamped jaw on his shoulder. Her nails also slowly loosening their death grip on his back. She pulled back, her eyes closed as Daenerys fought the pain for a moment, before looking up into Ranma's concerned blue eyes. She nodded, and he leaned down and kissed her again, while his hips began to slowly piston in and out, not going deeper just yet, just in and out slowly.

That lasted about ten minutes before both of them began to be top anxious for more for him to continue. She raised up to meet one of his downward thrusts breaking the kiss to growl. "I'm not made of glass, please, faster!"

Ranma complied, thrusting into her harder and harder, until she was bouncing off the bed in rhythm with his thrusts, squealing, moaning "YES, jarasea (my love), yes!"

In response Ranma simply began to say her name over and over again "Daenerys, Daenerys, Daenerys!"

Soon enough Daenerys peaked again. Shouting "Ranma!" her nails on his back once again punctured his skin, raking his back slightly leaving welts and almost drawing blood as she thrust her core up into his thrusts.

Daenerys's pussy clamped down as she came and it was all Ranma could do to pull out before he too came, like a geyser going off. Streams of cum splattered Daenerys's stomach, her breasts and even reached her neck, before sliding slowly down to one side of her neck as Daenerys turned her head, lolling completely out of it for a few moments.

Daenerys slowly came back to herself as Ranma leaned away, remaining on his hands and knees at the foot of the bed but obviously wobbling a little. She looked down at the mess he had made on her chest and stomach, then reached down slightly with one finger and scooped up a gobbet of his semen. Tentatively she raised it to her mouth, sticking out her tongue to lick at it for a moment. Her eyes widened slightly surprised. It wasn't nearly as nasty tasting as Alayaya had told her it would be. It tasted almost good, and she wondered why before licking the rest of the gob away from her fingers. She looked down at Ranma, who was watching this with wide eyes. "You taste good." she purred then laughed as Ranma's eyes widened further. "Thank you though for following our plan there."

"Of course." Ranma said as if not following it hadn't even occurred to them. "A child right now might make my nobles happy, solidifying the line of succession, but it would also damn irritating on the march."

Daenerys nodded, reaching down to scoop up more of his comments sucking at it off her fingers staring at him. The two of them had discussed children on the boat coming up from White Harbor, and had decided together that it was not something they needed or could really deal with now. There was simply too much going on, they would both need to head south, Daenerys because of her draklings and the influence she might have with a few houses down south, and him because of the army. A child would force her to remain behind, and while that was fine for a normal noble wife, Daenerys wasn't just his wife but his chief counselor, and the symbol of their union. None of the families that had supported her house would believe him if she was not actually with him physically.

"Very good indeed." she said, pushing herself up the bed to lean against that bedpost behind her. Her eyes strayed down to the mass they had made of the bedding, a few large spots of blood marking the place where she had lost her virginity, centered on the rather large wet spot that she had caused earlier, then added to when she came a second time.

Ranma moved up to her side, kissing her lovingly on the lips then down the side of her face to her neck sucking there gently, leaving a mark as Daenerys had on his shoulder while his hands began to work at her breasts once more. She looked down, gasping when she saw that his cock was once more erect, if it had indeed flagged before. "Oh my" Daenerys murmured, causing Ranma to break off kissing her neck with a chuckle. She looked at him quizzically, but he shook his head leaning up to kiss her on the lips before pulling her to him, switching around so that he was on the bottom of the two of them.

He pulled back from the kiss nuzzling into her neck as he looked up at her with one eyebrow cocked. "Round two?"

OOOOOOO

Daenerys laughed, pushing her rear back against run his cock, lifting herself up slightly to allow them to line up once more before lowering her herself with a moaning gurgle as his cock once more filled her. Neither noticed during this that the door to Ranma's room was open a crack.

On the other side of the door crouched Myrcella, hidden in the shadows of the hallway outside while the action on the inside of Ranma's room was very visible thanks to a few torches set into the walls of the room earlier that evening. She continued to watch for several more moments, the sight burning its way into her brain and causing a fire in her belly and further down.

It was a feeling that Myrcella had only felt once before, when Ranma kissed her that time during the tourney when he was under the aphrodisiac's power. Her hands, unconscious of her mind which was still trying to burn everything she was seeing into its memory, trailed down to her privates, covered as they were in her skirt.

Alayaya had been with her originally during the festivities outside, but had retired with Smalljon for the evening. The Summer island woman was rather fascinated by how there was a mind hidden under that wild northern bumpkin exterior. That relationship would probably not become permanent, but for now Alayaya was more much more freer with her affections than Myrcella could be.

Catelyn too had been with her for a few moments, but she had retired with her husband several moments after Ranma and Daenerys had escaped. Sansa was with the other youngsters having a sleepover, her and Arya taking turns telling Rickon stories while they all bunkered down in his room at the end of the hallway. Myrcella was supposed to be with them, but she had been able to convince lady Catelyn and the others to allow her to watch the ceremony at least, and after the drinking had begun and the children escorted away, she had begun to follow the newlyweds when they broke off.

Fenris who was guarding the hallway from busybodies had let her go, not seeing any harm in it and with Ranma not having told Fenris to stop her, just any of the people whose sense Fenris did not know intimately. Nay of the wolfsworn, Sansa and Alayaya could've done the same thing, but they weren't interested thankfully.

Myrcella stopped touching herself after the first shock at doing so, which had sent a bolt of pleasure through her, then reluctantly pulled away from the doorway, closing it as quietly as she could. She looked around, then to the room next to Ranma's, which had originally been Bran's, but he was with the others down in Rickon's in the next hall.

For a moment she waited there, her mind dueling with her subconscious desires. Myrcella knew she should return to the other children before she was missed, but. A loud moan from Ranma's room, and the shout of "Yes!" caused her to decide, and she moved into Bran's room. There she leaned against the wall separating the two rooms, which thankfully put her directly behind the bed where the action had begun once more. Sliding down to the ground, she began to gently place her hands underneath her bunched skirt...

Lemon End

OOOOOOO

The next morning dawned bright, though Daenerys didn't really realize this at the time. She was in pain. A lot of pain. She felt as if someone had driven a red hot poker up inside her. She cursed Ranma volubly and he winced as he rolled out of bed. "Okay, so maybe the fifth and sixth rounds were a bad idea. But ya weren't complainin' at the time."

"A moment of insanity that I am now paying for!" Daenerys said reaching out to smack him on the shoulder. He winced, moving his shoulder theatrically but that hadn't left a mark, she had given him others. His back was a crisscross now of welts from her nails, her teeth had left a mark on his shoulder, and on his thigh from later that evening. Other than that however, he was feeling quite spry this morning, whereas Daenerys wasn't.

She was feeling wrung out and hung out to dry, and that was without the pain centered on her privates. She was also feeling rather sticky, covered with both of their juices. Ranma had been as good as his word and had pulled out every time, but that and the sweat and her own juices made for a very sticky combination. "Get Alayaya or one of your maids in here to clean the up, then get me something for the pain." she ordered imperiously pointing at the door. "And until this pain has gone away my Lord, you can think again about any sort of reprise of last night."

Ranma laughed and kissed her on the lips and Daenerys' traitorous body began to respond again. She pushed him away quickly. "None of that! Besides, aren't we supposed to leave later today?" Ranma nodded, more grimly but still stole one more kiss for leaving, one of his bed pillows following him to the door.

Daenerys fell back onto the bed, her smile going from a tiny almost invisible one to a wide beaming grin as she leaned back. Despite the pains shooting through her body and her general level of exhaustion, she had never felt more alive, never more like a woman that she did now.

Moments later the door opened, and Ranma pushed his way back in, carrying a warm damp towel, with Sunfyre and Rhaegon behind him Alayaya followed them at a safe distance, a smirk on her face. Surprisingly Merry followed her, face flushed so much that it looked almost rose like in color as she stared between the two of them. The feelings she had given herself last night had been astonishing in their potency, and looking at the two of them simply brought back that memory. Luckily she had gotten back to the children with no one the wiser, simply saying that something she had eaten had disagreed with her.

Alayaya moved forward with Ranma, both of them taking a cloth and working them down Daenerys's body cleaning her off. While they were doing that, Myrcella looked at the utterly ruined sheet. "You know you'll need to show that to the lords outside?"

Daenerys and Ranma both growled, but Ranma nodded. "Take it with you Myrcella, show the crowd what they have to see I suppose."

Moments after Myrcella left they could both hear the shout of joy from outside, and Daenerys shook her head. "And that my Lord," she said looking up at Ranma. "Is the first and only time anything we do will be on display!"

"I'm certainly not gonna object." Ranma said leaning down the kitchen kissing her on the lips again. "I'll send some more maids in to help you get dressed, then I get to have the fun of getting some drunk and very hung over lords ready to march."

"Good luck!" Daenerys laughed, reaching down to help her no-longer-so little ones up onto the bed where they nuzzled into her sides. They had felt her exultation last night as well as her slight pain, but Ghost and the other direwolves had sat on them hard when they tried to go to her. The draklings didn't get along as well with the rest of the pack as they did with Fenris, but they were friendly enough, and they feared Nymeria. For some reason she just gave them the creeps, even more than Ghost, who their senses could barely follow if he moved around. There was just something about the powerful female direwolf that screamed submit to both of the young draklings.

As soon as they were alone, Alyayaya smirked at the princess. "So, how was it?"

Outside Ranma gleefully went about the business of waking the lords from a massive drinking binge to equally massive hangovers. Regrettably Myrcella had done a good enough job, getting most of them to at least be awake when she came out and informed them of the nights activities parading the sheet around. Seeing it lying on the main table Ranma shook his head in disgust. Some things in this world just pissed him off, but at least they'd found a way around that bit of politically motivated vileness.

Hours later however, his irritation was gone, and he was once more saying goodbye to his family. Catelyn was crying softly, leaning against Ned who was exchanging hand clasps with his son. Rickon was also crying, clutching at Ranma's leg begging him not to leave again. Ranma looked down at him then gently pried his youngest brother's arms off him, shaking his head. "I have to go Rickon, I have to save our grandfather. Maybe if I do you can come down and see him sometime, wouldn't you like that?"

Actually the odds of Ranma arriving in time to save or even see Hoster alive was low, but Rickon didn't know that. After a moment he nodded sniffling still but backing away. Bran came forward for a hug, as did Sansa, who was in no hurry to leave Winterfell again. Arya was in her room after having a loud and very public row with Ranma about coming with him. That had assuaged Catelyn's fears that the girl might run after him, and she hadn't even noticed a much shorter than normal guardsmen joining the column as it marched out of Winterfell behind Ranma.

Daenerys waited on a horse nearby by Jon, with Ghost and Fenris to either side of them with the two draklings on their backs for now. Fenris could've carried them both weight wise, but not size wise. They were now both nearly up to Daenerys waist if they stretched, small in comparison to the direwolves, but laid out still large enough so that they didn't have enough space for both of them.

Catelyn looked up at her, nodding formally at her. "Take care of one another."

"We will." Daenerys said nodding her head. Luckily, no one had argued with the fact that she had to go with the army, personally talking to the houses that she hoped to bring to their side, though the first several of those houses would at best be able to give the army a local source of food and housing rather than actually add to its strength overmuch. The loyalist houses in the Riverlands had been smashed by Lord Tully after the war, and not a one of them had been able to regain its former strength. The Reach however would be a different story, and possibly the Vale, where the Loyalist houses hadn't been smashed as badly by Jon Aryn after the war.

Ranma finished hugging his parents and siblings, then turned away taking position next to Daenerys. The two of them waved one final time then left. "Let's get out of here before mother decides to check Arya's room and finds her gone." Ranma whispered.

Jon laughed quietly, and the two of them with their wolves beside them raced through the winter town to join the forces already making its way down the Kingsroad from Winterfell. They would meet up with the forces already sent to Castle Cerwyn, and then would march down as fast as they could go moving as quickly as they could down to Moat Cailin and from there into the Riverlands. Ranma, Daenerys and the North were going to war.

Chapter End

---

I hope everyone noticed that I didn't even try to do many travel scenes. While travel times and communication times matter, I used those times originally to build characters and interactions, that is no longer necessary. I won't even mention the march down to Moat Cailin, except for three scenes, neither of which will have anything to do with the actual travelling. The war however is going to pick up down south, and what the Northerners run into won't be to their liking at all. Nor will the Reach or Renly be happy. Renly will have to face the charge of cowardice head on, and The Reach learns that Tywin has ways to hurt them even with his army elsewhere.

So, now the North knows about the White Walker threat, and the threat of Stannis, and are ready to defend their lands from all comers while also wishing to unite some of the southern forces so they too can be added to the defense of the Wall. Thanks to the larger levees from Cerwyn, Karstark, Ryswell and Stark the force sent is actually larger than in canon but don't take too much from the houses that will allow them to defend themselves.

I realize it seems a lot of secrets came out in this chapter without much hullabaloo, but I think in the main it made sense for the lords to take the news of the White Walkers as they did, especially given the Shadow Warriors. And as for the wolfsworn, sorry, I don't do angst. There was no chance of any of them turning against Ranma because of his resurrection, but given the new training they were taking on, it made sense for it to come out now.

I also know that Daenerys keeping her last name might irritate some purists, but I wanted to make the marriage very obviously a marriage between equals, in mind and position towards one another if not in military strength. Think the marriage between Cayleb and Sharleyan and how they kept their last names.

For those wondering, I'm about a week and a half away from putting out my next ATP chapter. Sorry Harry fans, but this story has really grabbed my attention and thus my free time.

As always please review, and I hope you all enjoyed it.

I've also added a new idea on my profile, if you want to talk about it, PM me, but be aware I won't be taking them up any time soon.

*Chapter 11*: Chapter 11

I don't own Martin or Takahashi's work, one was written by a lazy dork that read one book (Prince) and assumed that was enough to understand Medieval warfare, while the other has only the vaguest understanding of how actual love/attraction works.

RJP: As you're not a member I am responding to you here. No, I will not be giving Ranma access to cannons or any kind of gunpowder. Sorry, but there are so many steps between finding saltpeter (which would likely only be found in Dorne in any event in Essos and creating even the first version of recorded gunpowder would take a lot of knowledge that Ranma has no way of knowing from his past life.

Note three things. One, I give one or two scenes in this much shorter screen time than I had initially thought and might have indicated in PMs to past reviewers, this is again because the war has begun. Two, I made a name mistake in the last chapter. Damon Was the Lannister left to lead the force at Wayfarer's rest, not Daven. A Dragon Naturally Speaking screw up that I missed, sorry. And three, while my beta reader, Anthony444 – give him a round of thanks people – and I tried to be thorough, we ran into a formatting problem when I sent the chapter to him so there might be missing spaces and especially misplaced ". If any of you see one, or my normal DNS mistakes, please tell me via PM, and I will correct it as soon as possible.

---

Wild Wolf 11 In the face of the northern wings, castles too can crumble

Ander Clegane was an old weasel sort of man, a branch member of that family and had served as the Mountain's castellan and seneschal for years. Gregor was not a man who understood how to truly take care of a castle or manage land, so Ander survived in the Mountain's service because he was small, unassuming, un-threatening, and completely sycophantic. He was utterly loyal to the Lannisters, since part of his survival was based off Tywin's protection.

The castle of the former hound masters of the Lannisters was set on the southeastern edge of the Westerlands, not quite on the border with the Reach but close enough. It made an excellent staging area, close enough to rapidly deploy to the defense of the Westerlands along that border or as an offensive force.

Lord Lannister knew the value of having specific tools to do specific jobs, and had slowly invested over the years in a large band of men who had come to be called The Mountain's Men, who were of similar disposition to him. Like the Brave Companions they could handle the more atrocious jobs and could also give Lord Lannister plausible deniability later on. After all Gregor had been a monster and monsters often slipped their leashes. Only a few of those men had ridden with the Mountain to the Tourney of the hand. Those few of course died in King's Landing to the mobs after Ranma slaughtered Gregor, but this left the majority still around to cause carnage.

Indeed those were the orders Ander was following now, that had set these men on the march into the Reach and to lands held by House Rowan several weeks ago. 'Burn, pillage, rape, make a nuisance of yourselves. Avoid any set battle with larger forces, instead harry, harass, burn, keep on the move. Bring the horror of war to the Reach as much as possible before you are forced to retreat'. That, these men, these two thousand barely human monsters would do gleefully, as the line of smoke in the sky behind them attested to.

Nor was this the only group sent out from the Westerlands to raid the Reach. While Tywin did not employ many mercenary companies save those who could perform deeds he would like to have plausible deniability for, he retained one company from Tyrosh, a band of free riders that were more organized and better led than most.

This company, consisting of nearly another two thousand men, moved down the Ocean Road from Crakehall into the Reach from that direction. They were backed by men of House Turnberry and Greenfield, another eight hundred archers and a little over a hundred scouts. Their job was to either sack any keep or holdfast which they felt was too weak to hold them out, or wait in ambush for any force sent out against the former Mountain's men. The decision of which order to follow was left up to the commander, Ser Prester.

OOOOOO

The camp sitting on the outskirts of the city of the Whispering Woods wasn't large, about eighty armstrongs, three knights and two hundred archer. Over the main tent flew the banner of House Grell, a blue shield split by a diagonal white line with three red birds. A knightly house, they had long been loyal followers of House Tully, just as House Paeg was known to be, hence why the camp's guards merely waved Ser Harmon, head of that house, and his party of ten men through when they rode up.

House Paege too had mustered their forces. They were waiting in Fairmarket but Halmon had ridden out to meet with House Grell, wanting to confer on what they should do before marching out.

It was interesting Ser Hartwick Grell thought to himself as he studied the ten men dismounting from their horses, that not one of those men is one of his son-in-laws, or even his grandsons. That said something about the house's interior disposition, and it wasn't good. "Halmon," he said aloud, grasping the other man's forearm warmly. "Are you ready to receive us in Fairmarket?"

Fairmarket was a town on the Blue Fork, the waypoint of trade between Seagard and the rest of the Riverlands. It was small, but growing slowly and its defenses were also growing. Paege had originally been a knightly house, but thanks to Fairmarket continuing to slowly grow, they might achieve lordly status in a generation or two more.

"Aye, I am," The other man said. He was a knight and retained both the body and the training of said, much like his counterpart. Both were hard, tough men, who had fought against the traitors that followed House Targaryen rather than their Lord Paramount in the War of the Usurper despite their own misgivings, and again against the Ironborn when they tried to invade the Ironman's Bay, serving under Lord Mallister. "But I have other matters to speak of."

Ser Grell groaned. "What's gone wrong now?" There'd been so many things going wrong that it was an easy assumption to make.

"I know not what maggot has infested his brain, but Bruce Nayland has declared his house for Lord Renly!"

For a moment Hartwick simply looked at him blankly. Nayland was a knightly house much like his own, but even weaker considering that they held the lands of the Hags Mire, a large everglade that was the end of the Blue Fork, with many of its source tributaries feeding out of the glades. It was a small weak area in terms of men and food it could produce or support and the power of the knightly house in control of it reflected that. They could barely put a hundred men, at best two hundred men into the field, and most of those would be untried levies.

What bothered Hartwick however was the fact that they were declaring for Renly Baratheon rather than simply stating they wouldn't take any side. That he could understand, indeed for most of the minor houses that stance would be sensible, especially in a situation like this when no one really knew which side was in the right, whatever they may say publicly. But to declare for a Lord Paramount not of the Riverlands and one without a good legal claim to the throne, that was bizarre. "By the Stanger what is Bruce thinking!"

"I don't know if he is thinking." Halmon growled. "The Naylands have never been known for their ability to plan ahead, but the young firebrand that is their head of house now is even worse. I think he met Renly once at a tournament or something, and that seems to be enough for him."

"Enough for what, to raise his house in arms against their Lord Paramount, to ignore all oaths of loyalty and fealty?" Hartwick said incredulously. "Fool."

"True." Halmon replied, shaking his head then looking around before speaking in a lower tone. "In truth, I would prefer to not take the field against the Lannisters either. I do not believe Lord Edmure or Lord Stark committed treason, but there are so many differing reports of what really went on in King's Landing that I can't tell which is false and which is true."

By this point Renly, the Queen's and Stannis's version of events in King's Landing had begun to spread along with rumors, which were the only things faster than raven wings. Lord Renly was declaring that the children of the queen were all illegitimate, though he did not know their father. He had information from the maesters to back it up, notes from a genealogy study that showed that every time the Lannisters and Baratheons married, the boys took after the Baratheon line. There was no specific message about the female offspring of those unions but that could have simply been an oversight of the genealogists.

Stannis had taken it a step further. He had declared and sent messages out both on horseback and by raven stating that all three of the royal children had been the kingslayer's sons, that Cersei had committed incest with her brother. That was so beyond the pale that none would have believed it, yet it was coming from Stannis. Stern, dour and lacking in people skills he might be, but every lord who had met the man knew Stannis was not one to spread such rumors. Not unless he had proof. Though few were prepared yet to say they believed it, no one was willing to say they didn't either.

Then of course there was the Queen's version, wherein Lord Stark of all people had made a play for the crown in conjunction with Targaryen loyalists, dragging in Edmure as well. That made no sense to anyone who had met Eddard or even knew anything of his character. Yet it was fact that the victors won the right to make the histories, and at first even those most loyal to House Tully were prepared to believe it. After all, Edmure wasn't known for his forward thinking, and could easily have been led into folly.

But that was where rumors began to come in. Rumors which said Lord Stark had survived. Rumors that said his son had returned from a mission to Essos then rescued Sansa Stark singlehandedly before retreating to the sea. That before he had retreated, Lord Stark had stated that the queen was a traitor, and that it was his proof Renly was mouthing.

Muddying that further was the fact that everyone agreed the Starks had opened their arms to Tommen and Myrcella, the two youngest of the three royal children. If they were illegitimate, then surely the Starks wouldn't have been willing to do that, right? And surely Lord Tully would never have sent so many men to the Starks if he had any idea they were going to commit treason? So no one really knew what to believe, but thanks to their lord Paramount's orders to follow their conscience, every house was doing just that.

"I would've said the same if not for this. It was passed on to me from Riverrun. I'm probably the first to see it." Hartwick replied, holding up a small raven message. He handed it over to the other man who took it, read it then smiled grimly.

"Interesting." Halmon said simply while handing it back, but he shook his head. "Still, I have the defense of Fairmarket to see to and that limits the amount of men I can send into the field."

"Bah, combined we don't have enough men to make any difference in a straight up battle against the Lannisters. Let that to the Noble Houses, they're apparently planning something over at the Kneeling Man's ford. Rather poetic frankly, if they can pull it off." Hartwick smirked.

Lord Paege barked a laugh then shook his head again. "I was going to say that we shouldn't field any forces against them, but we can match Nayland."

"Yes," Ser Grell said nodding his head grimly. "We can put Naylands back in their place, and guard Fairmarket. With its defenses and my own men added to yours we should be able to hold out until help arrives from Lord Mallister."

They both knew was true. House Mallister was one of the five most powerful houses in the Riverlands, but Jason Mallister had even more area he needed to defend. Not a single Riverlands lord was under any misapprehension of what the Ironborn would be doing in this time of calamity. As such Lord Mallister couldn't field his entire force. He had to keep some at home to defend Seagard, and had to keep some to go to the aid of any of the small villages in the Cape of Eagles. There weren't many of them, and they were all decently protected, but not one of them could call on more than five or six-hundred defenders even if it called up its entire male population.

As such Lord Mallister had sent word he was putting a force of three thousand men, mostly infantry and archers into the field. This let him his heavy and light infantry, and he had enough horse to add to their speed which would allow him to better protect the Cape of Eagles. His son Patrek led them marching down the Green Fork around Hags Mire before marching to Fairmarket on the Blue Fork which was not only a village but also the site of a bridge across that river. Once that force reached Fairmarket it would be a far harder nut to crack, one that even Lord Tywin would probably try to bypass rather than fight.

"But you have issues of your own." Grell went on obliquely looking at the men who were watering their horses behind Lord Paege. A few of his own men were coming out with bowls of hot stew and field bread for them, but they wouldn't tarry long before turning around with his own force to continue the march. They would be at Fairmarket within three days if they kept up their current pace.

Paege grimaced and nodded reluctantly. "I, I've been displeased with my sons-in-law for a while now. But this current business has brought that to the fore. Both Whalen and Jammos think we should follow Lord Frey's 'suggestion' and either remain neutral or join with the Lannisters." He scowled angrily. "Damn Freys, wouldn't know honor if it bit them in the ass!"

Hartwick laughed, shaking his head. "I'm just glad none of mine' are married into that damn family. Your daughters?"

"Somewhat fond of their husbands, but there's been some issues there with how they are training their children and how much time they and the boys spend up at the Twins." He shrugged. "They won't be happy with their husbands being restrained, but they will understand."

The problem was Old Walder Frey had been around so long, and been so... profligate that his sons had married into dozens of other lordly houses, but all of them were far more loyal to him than to their new houses. The Paeges were not alone in facing this issue, but they might be one of the worst off. Halmon had three sons and two daughters. Both daughters had married Freys, the thirteenth and fourteenth sons of Old Walder both of whom were very much their father's creature.

Also unfortunately, none of his sons had married just yet, his refusal to take a Frey as a daughter as well as a son-in-law into his house making that tougher. There were a few other marriageable age girls, but some of them were spoken for already, and for the others, the houses had turned down his proposals. Despite controlling Fairmarket House Paege was still a knightly house, not a lordly one, which hurt his prospects.

His oldest daughter Sallei had three sons, and had two miscarriages besides them. His other daughter Sylwa had one son and a daughter. Hoster was a likely lad, and had already agreed to squire for Halmon's youngest Garrett when he was knighted in two years. Jammos' three had been sent up to the Twins or other Frey supporters to Hoster, and come back changed. All three of them were likely to follow Jammos rather than Halmon despite Halmon being their head of house.

"I'm going to arrest them all if they keep pushing." Halmon went on quietly as the camp broke up around them and the men began to move.

Hartwick clambered up into his saddle beside his friend and nodded grimly. "Want some help with that?"

"No." Halmon replied, shaking his head. This is an internal family matter, and I hope to imprison them without further bloodshed."

Hartwick nodded his head, hoping it went as well as the other man wished.

Three days later they arrived back at Fairmarket. Fairmarket was a town of around three or four thousand souls, though it had swelled thanks to the current troubles up to six or seven thousand due to refugees from down past the Red Fork.

Lord Lannister's forces were not being kind as he marched over the Riverlands, unless the Lord of the land they were currently on bent the knee. More than a few had, but that hadn't saved their neighbors. Luckily only the Stone Mill and Mummer's fords were under Lannister control, allowing men to come across at the Kneeling Man's ford to make their way to Fairmarket or other castles, begging for aid and protection. There were also other groups here from the lands of other lords who had sent them here to get them out of the way.

House Paege's keep was a simple two-story keep made of stone set into the side of the outer wall of the village. That wall showed how Fairmarket was slowly changing. Where before it had been a simple wooden palisade now there was a wall made of stone along that entire side, with the stone continuing on until it reached the two towers, both new constructions, set near the river. The other side still retained its wooden palisade, and the two towers were still being built, but it was a decent defensive position.

Halmon's oldest son Robert rode out from the keep to meet them. After exchanging pleasantries with both older men he became grim. "Word has arrived from the Twins. By order of the crown, Lord Tully is going to be stripped of his Lord Paramount status if he does not send orders to get the Noble houses under control. According to the Freys, the Lannisters wish to name Lord Frey as the new Lord Paramount of the Riverlands. They aren't going to just yet, not until this present conflict is over, but that's a major carrot to tempt Old Walder with. It's made my brothers-in-law even more strident in their demands that we follow Lord Frey's suggestions."

Robert spat the words 'brothers-in-law' having never liked either man, even if he couldn't figure out if they were abusing their wives or not. Keeping them pregnant was dangerous and debilitating to them, but that wasn't abuse, not quite. Certainly not enough for him to take umbrage against anyway.

Halmon growled angrily. "It seems I have no choice. Will you be all right keeping your men out here for another hour or so my friend?" he said turning to Hartwick. "It seems I have to clean house before offering you hospitality."

Hartwick nodded and the two Paeges turned. With their men following them they rode ahead to their small keep. Inside they quickly dismounted, handing their horses over to one of the stable-hands before moving into the keep proper. Robert broke off there, heading into the first story barracks to alert the men of coming trouble while Halmon moved on inside up to the families private suites.

He was making for his office where he would call his sons-in-law in along with his grandsons, but was accosted on the trip by the oldest of them. Jammos was broad shouldered, fair-haired and pleasant to look upon, but that pleasantness only ran skin deep. He was a true son of Old Walder, who thought himself intelligent and brave beyond what he truly was. "Father." he said, making that word a mockery almost, and Halmon noted absently he had a sword strapped to his side. "We have to talk. No doubt you've already heard but..."

"I have heard. Halmon said interrupting him. But my answer remains the same. "I am sworn to Lord Tully, not your father and certainly not Lord Lannister. My Lord asked me to act in the way my conscience dictates, and I will do so. I will not side with you Freys or the Lannisters. That is an end to it. If you keep on pushing this, I'll have no choice but to place both you and your brother under arrest."

The man shrugged as if it was no moment turning away only to come back, his sword flashing out of its scabbard. "In that case, I think it's time for House Paege to have a new Lord."

Halmon stumbled back astonished but still pulling out his own blade and blocking the younger man's thrust. "Traitor!" he bellowed, parrying and sending Jammos backward, before the two began to trade blows there in the hallway of his own keep. The noise of that conflict seemed to be a signal because suddenly all around them noises of battle began flared up from within the keep.

The younger man grunted, not showing any of his strain in his voice. The older man had surprised him by his speed and strength, but then again this was the first time they'd faced one another sword to sword, the older man disdaining tournaments. His father's orders however had been very specific. House Paege was to come over to their side, securing Fairmarket for the Lannisters before the Mallister force arrived.

Though Jammos didn't know it, Lord Walder was playing a long game. With Fairmarket and its crossing secure, the Lannister could then march up to the twins along the Blue Fork, smashing the Mallister forces out of their way to link up with the Freys before closing down that neck to anything from the North. Combined the Freys and the Lannister's first echelon would have enough strength to sit at the edge of the Neck where the Kingsroad entered it and fortify the position.

That was, if the North couldn't offer the Freys more than the Lannisters could or at least match them. Lord Frey wasn't about to risk his own troops until he was assured of gaining something. The Lannister's promises weren't worth the paper they were written on, enough for him to put his armsmen into the field, but not enough to actually order them into battle, not without some solid assurances.

Playing both sides against one another's was simply good sense according to Old Walder. He was a realist, and knew that many of his fellow Riverlands lords would look upon him askance for being elevated to Lord Paramount by the Lannisters, regardless of anything else, so was willing to listen to other offers, especially if they were more solid. After all, Ranma Stark was as yet unmarried, and there were the other Stark children to consider. (Needless to say certain tidbits of news had not reached very far just yet...)

Jammos frowned, backing away from the old man as Halmon pushed their locked blades closer to his chest, then broke the lock before trying a lightning thrust. But Halmon ducked to one side, his own sword coming up slicing deep into the younger man's arm. Jammos screamed, but that was all he had time for before his father-in-law's blade took him in the chest punching through his leather armor and out his back in a welter of blood.

Staring down at his son-in-law's body Halmon shook his head. "Stranger Damned Freys!" He then turned his attention to the battle at hand racing towards the largest concentration of noise.

He came upon his other son-in-law and two of James's three sons, fighting his own son Damon four on one there in the halls. Damon fell as Halmon approached, his leg pierced by a blade from one of his nephews. "Damn you!" he cried. "We're family! Why?!"

The boy who'd stabbed him, Mathis, backed away, looking down at his blade almost as if he didn't know why he was holding it for a moment shocked at the sight of his uncle bleeding from a blow from him, but Whalen moved forward his sword rising for a blow to finish Damon off. "That's precisely why we're doing this, family!" he sneered. "It's just House Frey is much more worth following than House Paege as it is now!"

Halmon barreled into them, slamming Whalen against the wall behind him as his own blade flicked out slamming one of the younger boys backwards from a blow from the side of his sword to the side. Walder grimaced in pain but he and Dickon recovered quickly, swords rising to attack their grandfather.

But around them the men-at-arms of house Paege were rallying. Jammos had brought back ten men with him from the twins on his latest return home. He and his sons had long known that battle might occur inside house Paege to determine who they would follow and they were all determined to win. However, the men that Halmon had taken out with him to meet with Ser Grell had been just as prepared for violence when they got back. As Halmon fought his family, with his son Damon once more on his feet protecting his back, his men rallied in the rest of the keep, cutting down the traitors in their midst.

Several blows were exchanged further when Sylwa's son Hoster raced out of their suite of rooms further down the hallway. He was crying, and at eleven was the youngest boy there, but he held a blade in his hand, a gift from Halmon on his last birthday that his mother had taken control of when Hoster was not training with his uncles. Outside of practicing young boys often thought that once they had a blade in their hands they ruled the world after all, and Sylwa had views on her little boy wielding a weapon in that manner.

"You bastards!" Hoster shouted as he came. "You killed her, you killed my mother!"

Halmon's heart went cold at those words and looking into Whalen's eyes he saw the truth of it. "Why?" he said his voice of alloy of grief and rage. "Why!"

"The bitch would've warned you." The younger man growled, pushing back at against the older man's sword. "I refuse to let you bring this whole family down with you. Fairmarket is mine!" Actually, it would have been Jammos', but the younger Whalen had no illusions on what he would or would not do to gain control of the village.

Hoster slammed into Dickon and Walder, losing his sword in the impact but bearing the two larger boys, almost man at 16, to the ground. Both of them raised their swords to cut him down, but he was inside their grip, and his belt dagger flew stabbing frenziedly. Dickon screamed as it first found his side, then his guts.

Seeing his brother dying on the floor under his cousin , Mathis came out of his funk. He plunged his blade into the younger boy's back killing him instantly.

Halmon howled, and Damon, grief stricken, cut Mathis down before bringing his blade around to finish off Walder. Walder ducked rolling on the floor to dodge the blow, flinging his own blade up to slice into Damon's unarmored side. Damon slumped against the hallway's wall, gasping from the pain. With that done, Walder turned to help his father with Halmon his face almost blank.

Robert and several armsmen arrived at that point and looked in horror at the scene in front of them. Robert had been about to demand his brother-in-law's surrender, but seeing the bodies on the floor his own brother and the bodies of his nephews down he simply roared and charged. Not two minutes later it was all over, with both Walder and Whalen chopped down to join the others.

After ordering Robert to organize his armsmen to remove the bodies in the hallway and send for a maester for Damon, who still breathed, Halmon moved down the hallway. Passing Hoster's body he stopped momentarily to close the boy's wide, staring eyes, his own brown eyes filled with tears of grief. "Brave lad, you deserved better than this."

Leaving that scene of carnage, Halmon moved on. He soon reached the suites that Hoster had come from and looked inside. It was a small family suite like many found in castles the world over, one master bedroom, one child's bedroom set to the side, and the main sitting area. In the sitting area Sylwa, his youngest daughter, lay dead on the floor, her neck broken.

Halmon didn't know what happened here, and likely never would since his men hadn't taken any prisoners. But he supposed that Hoster had been ordered to remain in his room while his parents argued only to come out when he heard the sound of battle out in the hallway to find his mother like this.

"Brave boy." Halmon said, his voice gruff as he went to one knee by his daughters body, not having the heart right then to check on his other daughter, somehow knowing she too would be dead. Both of his daughters had been very loyal to their family, and would never have agreed to go against him, their father. "Brave boy and loyal too, the only one of them who knew what honor was. I should've never let the others foster where they did! No, I should've never agreed to let those two into my house at all! I'm sorry..." he said to the body of his youngest daughter "I'm sorry. Damn Freys, Stranger damned Freys!"

OOOOOO

A group of 20 men on horseback moved through the woods several hours in front of the main force of the Lannister forces. All of them were wearing the colors of the Westerlands House of Jast. These men were assigned to scout out the route ahead of the army. All of them were veterans and knew the troubles similar parties had run into before so rode with one hand on their swords and both eyes wide open, scanning the trees.

They would've done better to also have been watching where their horses were walking. As the first horses in the small party passed between two larger oaks there were two men covered with leaves and branches hidden among the roots of those trees. Barely able to see from under the leaves, the two men nodded slightly to one another, the rustling of their covering lost in the tramp of hooves on the ground. As the first horses came level with them both men tugged hard on a rope that lay between them. Snapping taut, the rope rose up out of the grass where it had been hidden to catch the second pair of legs on the two horses.

Those horses stumbled, the action taking the attention of all of the scouts for just a moment, which proved deadly. Out of the woods from all around them arrows flew, and suddenly the group of fifteen was down to five. Those five men at the back of the party turned and tried to race away, but seven men, all of them wearing dark green colors, purposefully dirtied leather Jerkins with bits of leaves stuck here and there, the better to blend in, suddenly popped up, spears raised and slamming up into the riders, piercing their leather armor and smashing them out of their saddles.

Two more men came out of the woods wielding short swords that had been purposefully darkened and oiled to make no sound as they came out of their scabbards. Moving methodically through the downed men they slit throats while also taking the dead men's pouches. Their leaders didn't care if they looted the corpses of the enemy, so long as it was the enemy dead, not their own.

Suddenly an owl, a nocturnal hunter hooted, causing all the men there to look up into the woodlands towards the sound. This signal followed by four more hoots. At that signal they all quickly faded back into the woods, racing off and away from the ambush point.

One of the men paused just a moment to pull out of his backpack a spare tabard. On it was a shield quartered with two squares of black with a white tower, and two squares of white with green dragons on them. "Blood for blood." He muttered, tossing it down onto one of the bodies before racing off into the woods.

OOOOOO

Mules marched through what was formerly House Smallwood land, being led through the woods by men of House Lannister, along with twenty men of the Bloody Mummer's guarding it. The Mummer's men were cocksure and not watching their surroundings, still full of themselves for the sacking of Acorn Hall. The Lannister men were paying attention but this wasn't their land. While they knew to look for movement in the woods, they couldn't spot an ambush point coming up in this strange land of large forests, hills, small streams, and glades. Their fellows had been paying for that lack of knowledge for several weeks now.

One of the men guarding the right flank of the small party paused quizzically, looking up into the trees.

"What?" said one of the others.

"I could've sworn I saw a red..."

That was as far as he got before an arrow seemed to grow out of his eye, splattering his fellow with his life's blood. The surviving man cried out in shock then screamed as an arrow found his side, his leather armor little protection against a heavy bodkin arrowhead, which punched deep into his gut.

What they lacked in actual martial ability or situational awareness the mercenaries made up for in survivor instincts. As one they all turned in the saddle, trying to race away through the woods. Instead they ran into more men, suddenly appearing from under bush or behind tree. Spears flashed up into their faces, short swords stabbed into their horse's bellies, and the men went down.

Tyos Blackwood, lord of House Blackwood, pulled his sword out of one of the mercenaries, leaning down to spit into the man's face before slitting his throat. "You've murdered your last child!" he growled, his face a mask of fury over his beard.

Raven feather cloak swirling, Tyos stood up moving to his men and those of House Vance who had joined them for this ambush, a squad of five to add to his own twenty. Other groups like this were spread out all over Smallwood lands and many other houses that were on the route Lannister's men had followed up to this point. In times of peace that would be an act of aggression against those houses, but now Tyos and the Vance youngsters could not care less. Blackwood saw it as his duty to oppose the Lannister invaders, above and beyond not wishing to bow to a child of incest, while the remaining house Vance wished to avenge their cousins. "What were they transporting?"

"Flour and medicines on this one." Said one of the house Vance man, a youngster named Cliff Aleris, an archer and an excellent shot despite coming from a smallfolk family of farmers.

"Arrowheads and cured meat on this one." One of his own men said, an armsmen named Saros.

"We'll eat well tonight then." Tytos said laughing and slapping both of the men on their shoulders. "Now away. We'll keep moving for the rest of the day, we won't rest until deep night, I want us to put at least two of the small rivers between us."

Small rivers were the name of all the unnamed little brooks and inlets that dotted the Riverlands, whether or not they fit into larger bodies of water were not. No mapmaker had ever tried to name them all, you would have been able to see the land for the names.

They turned to their local guide, and armsmen of Smallwood who, like a few others had survived the battle of Acorn Hall. Terrence Corbeck decided to link up with the groups of raiders, taking bloody vengeance on the invading army for his home. Terrence nodded and led the way off through the woods while Tytos quickly organized the race through the woods, divvying out the spoils to his men. Little things here and there, he thought to himself, none of us have a strong enough spear to gore the lion, but even a lion can die from enough bee-stings.

OOOOOO

Lord Tywin scowled, looking down at his map while around him his officers shuffled uncomfortably. Not normally one to allow irritation to show except under extreme circumstances, that he was doing so now was a sign of the trouble they had run into of late. Dammit, Hoster's move was even shrewder than I had feared. The Riverlands lords might not be capable generals in a pitched offensive, but little skirmishes and delaying actions, on their own ground? That they can do quite well apparently. Over six hundred men I've lost in the last week alone!

At first after the example of House Vance of Wayfarer's Rest, things had gone smoothly. The Lychesters had then bent the knee, a small House, they had known better than to try to fighting him.

The Goodbrooks were next, and had been very shrewd in how they had fought him for all of two days. They had set several small deadly ambushes for his scouts, killing two dozen of his men for little return, fading back into the woodlands and away from his army's angle of advance. That had ended when one of his nephews had set up an ambush of their own, riding their initial party of ambushers into the ground.

The Goodbrooks, a house that had never recovered from Hoster's retaliation against them for following the Targaryens, had lost both their lord which probably meant they were now extinct in the long run considering the only survivor of the house was a uncle who had married a Frey girl. Their keep, which had also been nearly demolished by Hoster along with the small village around it, was several days out of the way however. This plus the fact the he house was too poor to support his army in any way meant Tywin was willing to let him, his wife and their two children be since he surrendered and vowed to support the king.

Crossing the Red Fork had also been relatively easy. A small force out of Pinkmaiden including Lord Piper's heir Marq had tried to ambush his scouts, but been ambushed in turn. Apparently the young fool had been a friend of Edmure, and had acted without his father's approval in leading that attack.

With the heir captured, Lord Piper had negotiated for his return. Lord Piper was a shrewd character however, and had already evacuated everyone who was willing to leave the village of Mummer's Ford into his castle. Despite its idiotic name, Pinkmaiden was a hard nut to crack, a fully modern castle. The Pipers were also a decently strong noble house, with the numbers of armsmen on hand that title implied unlike house Vance of Wayfarer's Rest, which Tywin's economic moves had crippled over time.

From this position of strength, the agreement they reached was almost even. House Piper agreed not to support any attacks on Lord Lannister's forces as well as supply a force of two hundred scouts, and to keep Mummer's Ford open for Lannister traffic, with an agreement in the future to bend the knee once the 'position of the Riverlands in relation to the crown was less fluid'. In others words, Piper would bend the knee the moment doing so wouldn't set the majority of its neighbors on him.

In return, Tywin promised the honorable treatment of the other Piper men captured, and guaranteed his armies conduct while on Piper land, plus provender for two thousand to be paid from the village stores. In all House Piper had lost two-hundred-and-eleven men thanks to Marq's idiocy, but his father had saved their house for now and Lord Lannister had crossed at the Stone Mill's ford without further incident.

The geography of the Riverlands meant that on a straight line march, the fastest march he could do, up to the Neck meant he would have to cross the Red Fork again later on. The Red Fork, the slowest and most meandering of the three great rivers, made a half loop down from the mountains to where it intersected the other forks at the Trident.

But since that first crossing, his army had begun to take niggling losses here and there. Not a day went by on the march when some small group of scouts were not ambushed and when his scouts missed those ambushes his men on the march took losses as well. No one of any importance had died as yet, but fifteen light cavalry here, one or two knights there, a dozen infantrymen here, it added up.

Wiping out House Vance was a mistake I realize that now, Tywin thought. Yes, it sent the message I wanted to, but I should've realized that House Vance of Atranta would take it poorly.

Vance of Atranta was one of the three most powerful Riverlands houses of the on this side of the Red Fork. Led by an old blind man, Tywin had thought possibly too cautious to raise arms against him when he had the crown's approval, or barring that, the sons too young and untried. But that had not proven to be the case thus far.

But they surprised me. I thought that if they did they would try to stand up against my army in a straight up fight, possibly with Blackwood and other families of the region beside them. Ronald 'the Bad' isn't known for his martial ability after all. That way I could smash them in an open contest without being forced to root them out of their castles. Instead house Vance of Atranta seems to have put forth its strength in little ambush groups here and there.

Despite finding out that Acorn Hall and House Smallwood had fallen to a surprise attack by the Bloody Mummies, the attacks on his scouts but more importantly his supply train and line were telling. Of course that was because while Acorn Hall had been sacked, its stores had also gone up in the fire the Bloody Mummies set on the wooden keep.

Nor was there any sign of Lady Ravella Smallwood, or her daughter. Tywin had the ruins and the Bloody Mummer's camp searched in particular for any sign of them, having a description of both and no wish to let potentially important tools be ill-used by Hoat and his lackeys.

When it came clear to Tywin that the Smallwoods might have escaped the sacking of their keep, he had Hoat brought before him, then executed the man some called the Goat for gross incompetence and overstepping his bounds. One could have been excused without the other, but Hoat and his band were almost as bad as the men Tywin had collected to put under Gregor's command. They had to be shown there were limits. Moreover, Vargo had dared to speak to Tywin as if he was an equal. Such things could not be allowed to pass, but thankfully the Goat's execution seemed to have gotten his message across.

So despite his progress, Tywin was in danger of stalling here, which had forced him to consider an action he had hoped not to. He looked up, his face once more composed as Lord Bracken was shown into his tent.

Jonos Bracken was brown eyed man of Tywin's generation though not as tall as he, with broad shoulders and arms, a sign of his youth when he was a well-known wrestler. He wore plate and mail, with the tabard with the color of his house proudly displayed, a red horse on a yellow shield with a brown frame while he carried a great-helm with a horsehair crest under one arm.

"You will supply my men with the supplies they need." Tywin stated firmly. "If you do that I will aid you in destroying House Blackwood, as they have taken up arms against the crown. I will send a force from my second echelon to siege and take their castle in conjunction with your own men." Blackwood men had also been seen attacking Tywin's supply trains. Tywin internally wondered if Tytos Blackwood was the one who had shaped the Riverlander's strategy so far, it seemed far too intelligent to come from the oldest Vance boy, Ronald.

Bracken growled at Tywin's tone, but nodded. "I'll agree to that, so long as I have your word we'll destroy them, root and branch." The Blackwoods and Brackens had been feuding for generations, longer than anyone alive remembered, and their hatred for one another's houses was the driving force behind Bracken being here. He couldn't care less who sat on the Iron Throne, nor was he truly close to House Tully or anyone from that family.

"You have my word." Tywin replied formally, before turning back to the map. "Now, how many men can you add to my force, and how fast can supplies reach us?"

Bracken frowned, pulling at his short cropped beard thoughtfully. For now, I'll say that the force I brought with me here, a little over a thousand armsmen, five hundred archers and a hundred heavy cavalry. If we wipe out Blackwood, I'll add another two thousand mixed levies and archers to that plus five hundred more armsmen."

Tywin went over those numbers in his head, comparing them to what he knew of Bracken's strength and nodded. That would mean stripping Stone Hedge, House Bracken's castle of nearly its entire defense force, but so long as Lord Lannister controlled the side of the red Fork that would be an acceptable risk for the other house. After a moment Tywin nodded. "Very well. Now," he said gesturing down at the map. "Tell me what you know of our route, do you recommend one fort over the other?"

Over the next few hours after talking to Lord Bracken and his sub commanders Tywin decided on their course from now on. There were two Fords to get across the Red Fork going further north. One was at the Trident, where you could cross all three of the Forks at once, then take the Kingsroad up north. However, that would take Tywin and his army nearly a month out of their way marching east, and that was time that Tywin could ill afford if he wanted to get up to the Neck and defend it against the northern incursion.

By this time the ship carrying his granddaughter, the almost certainly alive Lord Stark would have already reached the North, and they might have already begun to gather their forces. With the Riverlands now broken into pieces thanks to Hoster's declaration and every lord responding individually to the events in King's Landing, there was no chance of any one family standing up and taking control of the defense against him, and for all his natural charisma Renly was untried as a general. If Tywin knew what Stannis was up to perhaps he would prefer to remain here in the south and meet up with his second echelon. But not knowing that and with forces already sent to bolster the defense of King's Landing, keeping the Riverlands divided and the North out of action was the most important thing.

Then too, if he could smash a few more houses without needing to be bogged down in siege after siege, the aura of an undefeated general and his own well-earned reputation for ruthlessness could keep the houses along the eastern edge of the Riverlands from acting. A few of them backed the Targaryens in the War of the Usurper, and were individually very weak still due to Hoster's retaliation.

The Houses between the Red and Blue Forks however were a different story. Those houses were well known to have friendly and deep ties to House Tully, and most of their heirs like several others were friends of Edmure which would push them to act against any rumor of his being a traitor.

Moreover continuing straight up to the ford at the Kneeling Man would allow him to keep most of his supply lines on Bracken land, making it much harder for them to be attacked. If they tried to follow the River Road though, the Blackwood's would become more and more into play and of course Vance's men would continue their depredations.

Over the next week this strategy proved accurate. House Bracken's men took over protecting his supply lines entirely, and waged a vicious campaign against House Blackwood and House Vance men to protect them. They did a much better job than his men had done thanks to being on their own territory and knowing where any ambush points could be set up. However, Tywin was faced with a new problem when he reached the ford.

Tywin sat on his horse staring through a small spy glass across the ford. Defensive bulwarks had been thrown up on the other side of the Ford, and there were several houses allied against him over there. "Interesting," he murmured handing the spyglass over to his cousin, Daven.

The other man looked through it and nodded. "I see banners for Blanetree, Deddings, Shawney, Lolliston, Vypren, and Vance of Atranta. Apparently the sons of the old Lord have decided they've had enough of playing bandits in the woods. Overall, Possibly...." he paused, thinking as he surveyed the defensive line. "Could be as many as seven thousand?"

"That was what I estimated yes." Lord Tywin said turning to look hard at Bracken. "You assured me that they would not ally with one another."

"I said that they probably wouldn't ally." Bracken corrected. "Shawney and Lolliston would always have stood against you here or soon after Lord, their standing together is not exactly unexpected, they've married into one another often enough. The others being here is a surprise, I'll admit."

Tywin stared hard at the other man, but Bracken wasn't just old, despite his bluster he was actually tough and he stared back unflinchingly. Eventually Tywin nodded and there was some respect in his voice as he replied. "Very well, your house has served the crown well enough so far, and your advice up to this point was good. And frankly this plays to our strengths as well."

Daven nodded. He was a jovial looking man, with wide shoulders, long yellow hair and a pug nose, which had been broken several times in his youth, but despite the pugilist features he was intelligent. Daven was known good leader and blade, much better than his father Stafford. Stafford had initially served as Tywin's second-in-command, but Daven was simply a better leader of fighting men, and just as good an organizer as his father.

To avoid familial friction Tywin had sent back Stafford back to the Westerlands to help Kevan raise the second muster and then command its march. Kevan would have normally lead that army being Tywin's closest and most trusted relative but Tywin was loath to remove Kevan from Casterly Rock. He feared that the Ironborn would attempt to revert to their roots once more, and wanted a strong, dependable hand in place to protect Lannisport.

"We outnumber them, and while that position is good, it won't make up the strength difference. We can smash those houses now, and might not have to deal with more niggling losses on the other side of the river. Especially since the Vance boys are over there." Daven smirked.

"If we smash them in as believable a manner as possible." Tywin murmured, sounding skeptical. However, Tywin knew something that Daven hadn't truly realized: that the enemy was not a unified force, far from it in fact.

"Send over an emissary under the white flag. While that's going on, ready the men for battle." With that he began to give out commands briskly, assigning each Westerlands lord to a separate section, and putting Daven in charge of the heavy cavalry.

The Red Fork was a wide, winding, lazy river, not very deep for the most part, it seemed as if a man on horse or a cart could make their way across. But it wasn't the depth that made fords necessary, but the mud. The bottom of the Red Fork was a silt and mud mire, where a horse could suddenly go in up to its ankles in places. Attempting to cross anywhere but the fords at any time except for during a dry season was folly unless you had boats to carry you across. The defenders were at the Ford because that was the only place that heavy cavalry or carts could get across without breaking their legs.

But despite that, the land here wasn't very good for a defense, it was much too flat for any defending army to have a height advantage for its archers, and there were no natural defensive points save for the ford itself. The defenders had done their best, creating a line of makeshift bulwarks with a small step behind them and large wooden walls for the archers, but it was obvious the defenses were unfinished.

Looking at them closely, Tywin could see that the far right flank had actual rocks and gravel mixed into its bulwarks, and was much taller as well. Seeing this, Tywin knew he had to smash this defense aside quickly.

Within the hour the emissary came back, with the statement that the Lords would hold the Red Fork against the Lannister's army marching forward, but that they would not attack if the Lannister's remained where they were.

The man he had sent, Lucion Lannister, son of Damion, Casterly Rock's majordomo, shrugged his shoulders. "They seem confident my Lord, they think they can hold us here, and they think that help is on the way."

The man's squire, Willem Lannister, a nephew from Tywin's dead brother Tygett, spoke up. "Sir, I think I know why."

Tywin stared at the younger man, who gulped under his heart glare but stood his ground. After a moment Tywin nodded, gesturing with one hand for the man to speak. "While I was delivering your demand for them to move aside, I talked to a few of the other squires. They were smug about it, apparently Lord Mallister has already sent men. They're already on their way and nearly to Fairmarket already. And there was some kind of missive recently out of Riverrun, something about the North already on the march. That was supposed to be a secret but..." The young man shrugged.

Tywin's eyes widened slightly and he looked over at his other field commanders all of whom looked surprised at the news. Tywin wasn't surprised that the North would march, but if they were already on the march that was incredibly fast. It should've taken them three possibly even five months to gather their forces, possibly two if they didn't want to gather their full strength. Then at least another month to get down to the neck with any appreciable force!

After a moment however he shrugged. "It's a morale boosting trick. I have no doubt that the North might've already begun to muster, but that's not the same thing as being on the march. The Mallister force however, that is more worrisome."

"If they reach Fairmarket and join with house Paeye they might be able to hold Fairmarket against us entirely." Daven said worriedly tugging at his short cropped, neatly trimmed goatee.

"Agreed." Tywin nodded crisply. "That makes it even more imperative for us to push this up force out of our way and continue on."

If they could not take Fairmarket, they could not get over the blue Fork without moving all the way down to where it connected to the Green Fork, which would take them at least a month out of their way. The Red Fork had several fords of various sizes, but the Blue Fork only had a few, and only two of them were large enough for a full army to move across. The area around the Ruby Ford was too good a defensive position for Tywin to wish to chance it, though it would get him across both the Blue and Green Forks. Worse, if Tywin went that way he might force the families on that side of the Green Fork to side against him, so he needed to capture Fairmarket.

"Very well, signal Lord Bracken to begin the arrow storm. I'll want the first and second infantry forces ready to storm across in ten minutes. The first will advance line across, the second in a column ready to exploit any openings in their defense."

His men jumped to obey as Tywin began to bark out further orders. He positioned his archers, around a thousand two hundred men, in two wings on either side of the ford, with his infantry set up into three groups. The first a group of nearly two thousand under Lord Brax, the second group another of two thousand five hundred under Lord Lefford, upwards of two thousand heavy cavalry waited behind them, with a further force of nearly a thousand light cavalry waiting at the back of the formation with the reserve, nearly another six hundred infantry. Lord Bracken's men made up a portion of the archers on one flank, bits of the light and heavy cavalry, and nearly half the second wave of infantry.

While the majority of his archers were waiting just outside of bow range, Tywin sent several hundred forward of his lines, and ordered them to start firing on the enemy bulwarks. This was more to give him a clue as to the nature of the enemy command than to inflict any real losses.

To his amusement this probing attack elicited a strong response. He stared through his spyglass as a large force of light cavalry raced across the ford towards his archers. "Tell my nephew to bring up the heavy cavalry, crush those light cavalry! Then bring up the archers in their entirety on the wings. If they react so strongly to a small probe, let's see what they do when we start to bring up our main forces. If we can pull them out of their prepared defenses..."

Within moments the archers he had committed to that initial attack were falling back seemingly in disarray towards his main force. Rather than turning aside, the light cavalry broke apart, some of its men pulling back across the ford their objective complete, while others pursued the archers. Those archers did not live to return to Tywin's lines, but their killers died under the lances of his heavy cavalry, or retreated in broken disarray across the Ford.

Under Daven's command those heavy cavalry did not pursue, pulling back while Tywin brought up his archers, racking the defensive line and the surviving light cavalry. From a makeshift stand at the back of his Army Tywin used his binoculars to observe the assault as his archers began to fire en-masse at the opposing line. He winced however when the archers on the other side began to fire back. Riverlands archers were better than Westerlanders, their bows larger and their pull heavier, not quite up to that used in the North or the Vale, but heavier than the Westerlands type. His archers began to take losses, despite the wooden palisades that protected them just like their fellows across the ford.

Under the hail of arrows from both sides, his first infantry column raced across the ford. With the archers concentrating on one another, they crossed the ford to assault the defenders line, and infantry began to die on both sides. The defenders were outnumbered, but had a prepared position, and slightly higher ground to fight from where they blocked the ford. The blood of the Red Fork truly began to turn red from the blood of the attackers.

Tywin watched this through his binoculars, his face carved from stone. "Order the second group to advance, tell them to concentrate on the left flank, and signal our first line to shift that way. Then tell our signal men to play the Rains of Castamere."

His fellow lords looked worried at that, not the song but the concentration of the infantry on the left flank. That was the strongest defensive position of the enemy, so why would you attack there? Tywin however had noticed that the defenders on that flank had become disorganized by the retreat of the remaining light cavalry into their lines.

Moreover, on that flank his archers seemed to be slowly winning the arrow duel. The other side showed the exact opposite, and the archers of House Vance had now split their attention, hitting his infantry as they tried to cross the ford. He could see dozen of his men dying from those arrows already, their chainmail and even plate no match for the arrows of their enemies at this close range.

The messenger raced off and moments later, the battle slowly shifted away from the right flank of the defenders line. Within moments of that, the song began.

Through his spyglass Tywin saw it happen. House Vypren controlled a portion of the line on the right flank, not the outermost portion which was given over to house Blanetree and Deddings, but the next bit, with Lolliston and Vance of Atranta holding the center and Shawney holding the left. It was the Shawney who were disorganized by the retreat of the light cavalry, and their line was already bending, forcing the small defenders reserve to reinforce them.

Over the noise of his army the song of his signal men reached across the Red Fork. The men under the Vypren banner, a black toad on a white lily pad backed by a green shield, turned to their right and began to assault the men of House Lolliston from the side. It worked even better than Tywin had expected, as he saw the banner of House Lolliston fall. He could make out one man falling from his horse who looked to have better armor than his fellows. Later on he would confirm that Lord Lolliston and his guard had all died under that sudden assault, the Vyprens proving to be vipers in truth.

With his infantry engaged with the rest of the defender's line holding them in place that left the heavy cavalry to exploit that breach. Without even being ordered to, they did so barreling into the suddenly disorganized House Lolliston line breaking it into pieces. As Tywin watched the men of house Loughton began to retreat in disarray, causing the breach to open even wider. "Order the infantry reserves in after the heavy cavalry. They are to exploit the breach, turn to the left as they get across, sweep the line and make certain that the Vance boys are either killed or captured."

Tywin did not want any of the House Vance troops to escape. They had proven far too capable in hit-and-run attacks up to this point, he did not want to have to deal with that again.

At the front of the line of heavy cavalry Daven laughed as he splashed across the Ford and into the disorganized Lolliston lines. His lance impacted one man as he spurred his horse over the defensive line of earthworks then pulled out his sword, cutting down one man then another as his horse galloped on through the infantry lines. The men whose spears might have been able to hold his cavalry at bay had turned aside to fight Vypren's men, and so were now easy meat for his horsemen. Behind him the rest of the heavy cavalry slammed into the already disorganized defenders routing them and moving on to circle back for another pass through.

Daven shouted orders to those around him, keeping a firm grip on his men while he turned looking for an appropriate target. He saw House Blanetree and House Deddings pulling back already, unwilling to stay and fight now that their initial infantry line had been broken by treachery. "Rally to me!" he bellowed, then pointed forward at the retreating Deddings. "After them lads!"

The Deddings were a small but relatively rich family, their holding like that of House Vance or Atranta actually on the other side of the red Fork. They had never been a powerful house, always hovering on the edge of noble and lordly status, but that balance was broken now as Daven led his men after them.

Lord Deddings turned, and saw the heavy cavalry racing down on his man. He tried to form up his infantry, tried to get a semblance of a spear line ready to receive them, but failed to do so in time, and the horse of the heavy cavalry rode his men down. Several horsemen were skewered from the saddle despite this, but the infantry's lack of a true line allowed the shock of the heavy cavalry hitting them to do its work. Deddings himself, his sons and two knights sworn to his family, realizing the battle was lost, spurred their own horses away. That was the final straw for his men, and they broke utterly.

Seeing the lord getting away, Daven rounded up two of his men and went after them, letting the destruction of Deddings's infantry to the other knights. Within moments he had caught up to the fleeing lord. Daven personally dueled with him for several moments, before an overhand blow shattered the other man's shield before cutting deep through his helmet, slicing into his head with a sound like a melon shattering. Over the next few hours Daven crushed house Deddings into the dirt, utterly breaking that house killing its Lord and both his sons, before harrying Blanetree, killing many of that houses' men over the course of the day, but failing to get Ser Blanetree himself.

Still staring through his viewing glass Tywin smiled grimly. "Push the light cavalry across. Their lines are broken, harry them into the ground."

House Lolliston's men stood and fought where they were grimly, but without their lord and with their flank open they were slowly ground under. House Vance and House Shawney fought similarly, with House Shawney's men regaining coordination then slowly falling back but under good order now. That screw up had been because the heir of House Lolliston sent out with the light cavalry to run the archer probe down had tried to give orders to his line when they retreated, but now he and his men were following Lord Shawney's command as well.

Lord Stephen Shawney was an able commander, having fought against the Ironborn numerous times during the rebellion and even spent a year in Essos as a mercenary before being forced to return when his father died of old age to take up the Lordship. He knew when a battle was lost, and began to slowly pull his men back from the defensive line.

House Vance of Atranta had played the game of war magnificently up to this point, but this one mistake, coming out into the open, doomed them. With their lines broken the three sons of house Vance who were present each had a different idea of what to do, and as a consequence their men were stuck where they were.

That proved deadly, and as Lord Shawney began to fall back to the west deeper into their territory between the Blue Fork and Red Fork, House Vance's men were slowly being left behind. Without a central commander who knew what they were doing, they were quickly circled, more and more infantry coming up on every side and piling in forcing them away from prepared defenses and cutting them down.

Ronald 'the Bad' Vance, the oldest brother tried to break through with a force of hoarded heavy cavalry, but by that point there were too many of the infantry surrounding his position, and he couldn't get up enough momentum to break through. For any cavalry force momentum was everything, if a heavy cavalry man was pinned in place, he lost his greatest advantage, and that happened now. Ronald fell, pulled down by the infantry of House Lannister and slain. Yet his assault had given his two brothers, Hugo and Ellery, the chance to get away themselves with a small band of cavalry. They retreated from the battlefield, only to be caught the next day by Lord Marbrand and his House's light cavalry. Fighting to the death, they took an equal number of men down with them, but still fell.

In total, House Vance had lost almost all of the strength it had sent to war in this attempt to hold back the Lannister forces, having broken from their winning strategy and paying for it with almost total annihilation. If that would have been the case if House Vypren had not turned its coat would be debated years later by maesters who studied the War of Reformation, as this war came to be called. Reality however could not be changed, and the reality was that Tywin Lannister had won the day.

OOOOOO

The next day dawned with Lord Tywin in full possession of the Kneeling Man's Ford, but his losses had been heavier than he had hoped. Several thousand men now lay dead, especially among his archers and infantry. The Riverlands archers had taken a truly deadly toll among his own, killing two for every one of them that went down, and until House Vypren had turned coat, the infantry line had held against his own men, their higher position and wider line allowing them to wreak a deadly toll when combined with his inability to bring his full numbers to play before their lines were broken, not having the room to spread out in the Ford.

Staring at the blood-soaked battlefield Tywin sighed shaking his head. "We lost."

"Sir?" said Ser Tybolt Heatherspoon, head of a house of landed knights sworn to the Lannisters. He was looking at his lord now in shock. "We won the battle."

"But lost the initiative you young idiot." Tywin said shaking his head. "It'll take days for our cavalry to regroup, either light or heavy." Tywin wasn't worried about them overreaching or riding into anything they couldn't handle, he had faith in his commanders, nor was he prepared to call them back. He wanted those Houses harried as much as possible, though Shawney had retreated too intact for that to occur to them, especially with his heavy cavalry already chasing down Blaneytree.

He could've used them to break up the Shawney line, but he had mistakenly put them all under the command of Daven, who had gone after the first groups to break off rather than remaining engaged to hopefully be used against a better target. It had been an excellent tactical move, but showed his inexperience when dealing with a larger battle.

Tywin turned aside from the view of the ford to stare at Lord Vypren. The lord was a thin, sallow faced man who moved in fits and starts, but was reputed to be very quick, with a snake's reflexes. "You played your role well." Tywin said sparing the man a nod. "Fairmarket will be yours, once we take it. That will happen well in the future however."

Lord Vypren nodded his head. "I am of course at your service Lord Lannister. Never let it be said that we are traitors to the crown, after all."

"Of course." Tywin said smiling thinly.

Over the next few two weeks the news of his victory at the ford spread, bringing several new houses to his banner. House Whent, house Wode, House Darry, all houses on the southern side of the Red Fork sent messengers to him, stating that they would bend the knee to the King. He ordered them to muster their men, and to besiege Raventree Hall.

With the uttered decimation of house Vance's forces and the death of three of its sons, House Blackwood remained the only powerful house on the southern side of the Red Fork with its forces intact that had not yet bent the knee. Their men were still hitting his supply line, but if he put their Castle under siege, it would force those men back home to defend it. Obviously of course such a move would take time, and news of those houses marching towards Raventree Hall would spread, giving Tywin the desired result.

At those orders Lord Bracken smiled his eyes lighting up with eagerness. Tywin looked at the man then nodded. "You may pull your forces back as well Lord Bracken. Leave enough men to continue to guard the supply lines from your castle up to our current position, but other than that go and claim your prize."

With that seen to, and news of Daven returning, Tywin dismissed Lord Bracken and the others to wait for his nephew alone in his command tent. He stared down at the map, estimating distances, travel times and other things. When he heard the flaps of his tent open and closed he said without turning around "I trust you have good news for me Daven?"

"Some good and some bad my Lord." Daven replied, moving in front of Tywin before taking a knee.

"Get up." Tywin scoffed, shaking his head. "What news?"

"My forces and I were able to harry House Deddings forces into the ground, if more than two or three of those men survived it would be a minor miracle. It will not include the Lord himself, or any member of his family that was here at the battle."

"Good." Tywin said nodding his head sharply. With Deddings out of the way that was one less family that could fight him on the southern side of the Red Fork. Their keep too would be a source of remuneration for his troops as well as supplies. "And what was the rest of the news?"

His nephew grimaced, tugging at his now unkempt goatee. "We were able to cut down at least half, maybe more than two thirds of the men wearing house Blanetree colors, that's what took us so long. But the rest of them reached the Ruby Ford, and I have to say that we made the right decision to cross here."

"That sounds ominous." Tywin said and though his words were lighthearted his gaze pinning Daven in place was not.

"I have no idea who is in charge over there my Lord, but those defenses made the ones here look like nothing. Ditches have been shoveled out of the earth on the other side of the Ruby Fork, with a full palisade thrown up after them, large ones, at least a man's height in places, and at worst coming up here on a normal man." Daven said gesturing at his waist. "Even worse, I think I saw some small catapults set up well behind the defense line. I lost over a dozen men trying to follow Ser Blanetree's men to archers, they looked like pincushions!"

Tywin grit his teeth shaking his head. He had hoped that the houses on the other side of the Green Fork would at least have taken a wait-and-see attitude, but if they had prepared that good a defense of the Ruby ford...

"We truly have lost the initiative." he said shaking his head.

"With respect uncle, I think we lost it the moment the Houses here joined together."

Tywin nodded. "I underestimated their loyalty to House Tully, or perhaps their hatred of us."

"The rumors that Lord Stannis has spread seem to have been the tipping point, uncle..." Daven said hesitantly, licking suddenly dry lips. "We took a few prisoners, and all of them were saying that no true man would, would bend the knee to a King who's..."

"Enough!" Tywin barked making his nephew shut up. "There is no way my daughter and son would have acted in such a manner, it is simply propaganda, well-chosen by Stannis I'll admit, but propaganda all the same." And Tywin was certain of that. Surely his catching them when they were young would have been enough to scare the two idiots. Whether or not that meant that the three royal children were illegitimate he did not know, nor care, really.

Tywin went on in a much calmer tone. "I've already sent word to my brother to push the second echelon through the Golden Tooth to us here. I don't know where Stannis is or what he's doing, but perhaps our being here rather than further north might prove advantageous to us."

Left unsaid was the fact that his losses among his infantry forces and most particularly his archers meant that taking the remaining castles even the few between here and Fairmarket would be too costly. They would bleed his army dry, leaving no men left to take Fairmarket, especially since by that point he had no doubt the reinforcements from House Mallister would've arrived.

"Should we retreat to King's Landing milord?"

"No." Tywin replied shaking his head. "We might've lost the initiative for now, but I refuse to allow us to be pushed entirely on the defensive like that. King's Landing will be reinforced by Lord Serret and the force I ordered sent there already. No, we'll wait here for the second echelon, then either march north in force through Fairmarket to the Twins or against Renly or Stannis. For now, the Riverlanders showed us what we need to do. We'll fortify the ford here then fortify Harrenhall as well before taking Darry and Harrowway. That will force the Riverlanders and the Northerners to fight us in set, defensive battles where we can bleed them while husbanding our own forces."

Plus this will give me time to discover what Stannis is doing, and get an idea of how Renly is acting as a general. Perhaps it will turn out to be a good thing I was forced to remain here rather than moving further north... Tywin thought to himself grimly.

"I don't like it uncle, if you don't mind me saying. We're facing too many enemies. I would recommend we retreat entirely if we hadn't already brought several houses of the Riverlands to our side. As it is, perhaps we should... figure out ways to let them take the positions of most glory in any battle?"

"That is a good idea, and I know we are facing too many foes at present." Tywin said, being more open with his family member than he normally was, but willing to for this one moment. "But I don't think the North will arrive as quickly as the Riverlanders propaganda said they would. In fact I can guarantee it." Tywin finished, smiling grimly.

Directly after the battle he had sent a raven forward to the Twins containing a very simple message. 'Hold them, harry them. You wanted to be Lord Paramount, earn it, or else.'

OOOOOO

Tugging at his close cropped salt-and-pepper beard Lord Blackwood stared out from one of the towers set into the walls of Raventree Hall at the army encamped outside his walls. "I think they brought enough men to the party don't you?" he said looking at his second-in-command, his firstborn son Brynden.

Both men had been leading separate groups of armsmen attacking Lannister supplies in Bracken land. That hated house had taken over the duty of supplying the Lannister army almost in its entirety.

Like his father Brynden was a tall man, thin of shoulders but quick of limb, and the same long hooked nose of their family. His eyes were also dark, and his hair long down to his shoulders like his father. In response to his father's comment he laughed though there was no humor in the sound. "For my part father, I would rather it was all Bracken men out there."

"Hah!" laughed the older man, shaking his head. "The Bracken's alone could never take Raventree Hall, not by siege and they know it." The castle of House Blackwood was old, but it had been renovated several times unlike many others in the Riverlands. It had stone walls five stories tall, with powerful towers at each corner and two more even larger guard towers over the only gate in the wall. It also had a moat around it.

"True," said his other son Lucas scratching at the beard he was trying and, his father had to be honest failing, to grow. For all that he was in his 20s the young man simply couldn't grow any hair on his face, much like his younger brothers. "But at the same time, I can't believe so many Houses went over to the Lannisters. I knew the Bracken's would jump at the chance to eliminate us, but the others?"

Tytos frowned, nodding his head at that. "Fear, ambition and the vagaries of battle have done for much of that my son. It would not surprise me to learn that many of those houses would back whoever seems strongest at the time." His contempt for that idea was plain to see and both of his sons nodded grimly though that didn't change the situation.

Outside their wall was an army, of around eight thousand or so, though only a bare two thousand were flying the Lannister flag. The rest were all made up of other Riverlands Houses, the Whents, Wodes, Lychesters, Darrys and of course Brackens.

"It's a shrewd move by the old gold shitting bastard." Tytos went on, shaking his head. "I don't think he really believes they'll be able to take us, not by assault at any rate, but they pen us in place, forced us to pull our strength back to defend Raventree Hall rather than raid his supply lines."

Indeed, Tytos and Lucas had both been leading such raids when news of the defeat at the Toad's Treason had reached them. They had immediately begun to pull their various raiding parties back but arrived back barely ahead of the first group of reavers to reach their lands.

Luckily, Lord Hoster's initial message to his lords had enabled Blackwood to begin to draw in supplies from his lands, as well as order his smallfolk to prepare to abandon their properties and pull back to his keep at a moment's notice. This added to the number of mouths they had to feed of course, but it also added to the force he could put on the wall, so much so he actually had more men in his walls than the besiegers, though not nearly as many were trained armsmen.

And he thought grimly to himself, that'll force that army out there to bring in its own provisions. No army can really despoil the land as well as the smallfolk who own it, they'll learn that to their cost in the coming days. I wonder how long Bracken can continue to supply both the Lannister force and this army at the same time.

Brynden nodded, unconsciously echoing his father's thoughts. "We've got plenty of provisions, plenty of manpower, and our own well. We could hold out for years here, tying up that force out there easily."

"We won't have to hold out for years." Lucas said grimly. "One way or the other."

Tytos looked at his sons smiling thinly, a smile they both returned. Three days before the battle at the crossing had occurred news had flown out from Riverrun on Raven's wings. The North was on the march, and the man who had killed the Mountain That Rode was leading them to the defense of his grandfather and his country.

"We can hold." said Tytos grimly loosening his sword and his scabbard. "We can hold until the wolves come to relieve us. And then." he said grimly looking over at his sons " Then we ravens feed on Bracken blood once more."

"Pity it can't be the Bloody Mummies." Lucas growled, his eyes flashing with anger. "What they did to House Smallwood still needs to be paid for, whatever rumor says Tywin did to the Goat."

Brynden scoffed, pushing his brother's shoulder playfully. "You'd only prefer that because you're enamored of Lady Carellen." The Smallwood ladies had escaped with the aid of a few loyal knights sworn to their house during the surprise assault that took Acorn Hall. Lord Theomar hadn't been so lucky, and had died when Vargo Hoat set fire to his keep. "Or is it lady Ravella you fancy? She may be old, but that body!"

While Lucas blushed and pushed his older brother back Tytos rolled his eyes at their antics.

Just then a voice shouted out from the army surrounding Raventree hall, ending the lad's merriment. Jonos Bracken's voice made Tytos and his sons all grit their teeth angrily. "Blackwood! I know you can hear me! Surrender, you can't hope to win! If you surrender now, I'll spare you and your family!"

Tytos looked out from the murder hole he had previously been using, trying to find where Jonos was, but he couldn't. But I don't have to see him to respond appropriately to that little bit of idiocy. He moved over to an interior murder hole, shouting down into the courtyard of his castle. "Hoster, Ben, could you give that bastard out there our response?"

Both his younger sons laughed, then began to work frantically with their men, loading up a large catapult that had been constructed inside the walls. Moments later a load of stones was sent hurling into the sky, to land among the besieging army, causing screams and cries of agony and shock.

Tytos raced back to the murder hole, shouting out. "That for your offer, your traitorous dog! I'll never submit to a child of incest, or to Bracken scum!" With that, the siege of Raventree Hall began.

OOOOOO

The small dock by the edge of the Neck where the Kingsroad wound its way out of the Neck was used by men of the swamps to transport their goods down into the Riverlands had no name. It never grew to need one. It was simply a series of buildings to house any trader heading down into the Riverlands, as well as their goods. Most of the time it had at least a few traders, but now however it was lifeless.

House Frey had put its strength out into the field, and the first move had been to send a small band of raiders to harass the crannogmen from house Haigh. They descended on the docks enforcing the crannogmen there to pull up stake and retreat into the swamp. None of the traders died, but several of them sported broken arms and bruises from the beatings of the Haigh men. These were not warriors after all, these were tradesmen, not even hunters really since the hunters gave them the goods to trade away.

The hunters of the crannogmen came out that night, and four of the five men of house Haigh on guard died under their bows and tridents before they faded back into the Neck as easily as a lizard lion. The next day, the men of House Haigh pulled back from the Neck slightly, and began to dig in, waiting for their lords to arrive.

All that however was a more of a sideshow at present. House Frey had sent a group of cavalry to reinforce House Erenford, another Erenford beholden to them. Erenford had put forth its entire strength under Ser Erenford down to the new port being constructed where the Bite was closest to the Kings Road. A hunter tracking a cougar had reported seeing the work, and gotten word back to Erenford who passed it on to Old Walder.

Much like the small dock by the Kingsroad the original position Ranma and the others had talked about was used irregularly at best, when House Manderly sent a raven indicating White Harbor wished to trade for medicines. The original dock was also close enough to the Neck to put men there in danger of the various bugs that carried diseases to those who didn't have any immunity to them. So after talking to a few ships captains, Wendel had made a command decision to start to create the supply depot from scratch a half day's sailing further down.

This position wasn't quite as close to the Kingsroad, being five days ride away rather than three days. The ground there was rocky hardscrabble and not very hospitable. Ostensibly under the control of House Erenford, there was nothing there to draw any settlers or even crannogmen to it. Here however the near constant wind coming off the Bite kept the bugs away, which was a major plus, and some of the stones were large enough to be used to help construct the depot in various ways.

The makeshift dock was still small, but it had allowed them to put ashore the men and materials to start work on the depot. Wood brought all the way down from House Cerwyn's land and then transshipped here was quickly put in place. The men, over a hundred carpenters brought down from White Harbor plus the infantry troops under their direction quickly went to work. Soon they had built longhouses for the men, which would double later as a way point for the army's supplies. From there they had then begun to put up a small barricade around the depot, but work on that had just started when the forces of Erenford neared.

Moreover, the entire force from House Manderly and Locke had been put ashore. But the horses, even after only two weeks at sea, needed some days to recuperate after the sea voyage to get their legs back. Therefore it was up to the infantry to protect the depot, backed by the bows of House Locke, five hundred archers sent down to represent them in the army the North had mustered.

It was this sight that greeted Ser Erenford at the head of a force of his own house, almost six hundred men plus three hundred more sent to him by House Frey. His orders had been simple: find out what they were doing on the shore of the Bite, and if they were doing something that would bother House Frey either in the war or in the long term, stop them.

Looking at the number of men already down there, as well as the defenses that were being put up Ser Emmon Erenford made a decision. This decision would haunt his house for its remaining lifetime which could, because of said decision, be measured in less than two months.

"We hit them now." He decided, looking around at his men mostly heavy and light cavalry. "If we can break them now, before those horses down there get their legs under them, we can drive them back into the sea and put that place to the torch."

"In fact." Emmon went on looking around at two men in particular. "Get some torches now, there's nothing like a fire during a battle to divide the enemy's attention."

Ser Erenford should not be blamed for his ignorance. Throughout human history, there has been a sort of misconception about cavalry, tied in with the ego of the human mind. A person who is sitting up on a horse looking down at other men tend to believe that he is a better man than they are, that he is somehow stronger, more honorable. Tied into this is that horses have always been the purview of the rich. But despite this, a well-trained, well led and organized infantry force that stands its ground and has any kind of polearm, a spear, halberd, a bayonet on top of a rifle, or a pike could eat a cavalry charge for lunch.

Now while his house wasn't rich, Emmon Erenford was a knight, a cavalryman down to his toes. He firmly believed in the might of the cavalry charge. Moreover, he could not see the organization in the work going on down there. He could not see that there was always at least one group of a hundred men standing idle near the edge of the supply depot.

He could not see that among the workers busily creating log houses, or enlarging the wharf for greater cargo capacity, were men who did not stray far from hidden bows. While Emmon could see the infantry down there were better armored than most, he didn't see the giant pikes the heavy infantry had been trained with. Those were hidden near where the infantry were helping the carpenters. Wendel was a wily man, and had prepared for trouble from the get go.

Worse, the terrain was against Erenford. The land here was hardscrabble with very few trees and only scattered boulders that a large group could use as cover to get closer. Even his scouts couldn't get very close without running the risk of being seen.

The Freys commander, one of old Walder's numerous sons shook his head. "I, I don't know Ser Erenford. That's awfully good armor those men down there are wearing, especially if they aren't expecting trouble. Besides, from what your scouts could tell us we barely outnumber them. I think we should wait for more reinforcements. We can keep them locked up instead, and find out why they're building a port here in the first place."

"No we can't." Erenford said shaking his head sharply. "Didn't you hear the scouts report about the number of heavy horses they've unloaded? Those aren't draft animals man, those are warhorses! My scouts might not know how to count very high, but they could tell that there were more horses down there than we've got. If we let those horses recover from their voyage, they'll be able to match us."

As a knight himself, Emmon knew that heavy cavalry could prey very easily on light. They weren't quite as fast of course, but they moved fast enough, and their heavy armor and heavier weapons made them deadly against the mostly leather armor of light cavalry. His force only had around a hundred-fifty heavy cavalry, less than a fifth of what was down there.

The Frey man looked at the scouts. Both of them nodded agreement. Sighing against his better judgment he nodded in turn. "Alright. That's a bit more overt than my father wanted us to be, but I think he'll understand the reasoning."

Within moments, a little under a thousand men on horseback thundered over the scrub towards the supply depot, coming up over the small rise they had been hiding behind. With no cover they were spotted immediately, but rather than the panic and shock that Ser Erenford had expected to see, three horn blasts rang out. First one horn sounded from near the edge of the depot, obviously some kind of warning. Then two more from deeper within the northerner's position, signaling some kind of order, Erenford thought.

In response the hundred men near the outskirts of the encampment grabbed up helmets and pike. Their sergeants, men chosen from among the levies for their intelligence and strength of character by Jon during their training, began to bellow orders. Quickly they moved out of the encampment moving into a tight line abreast two deep to face the oncoming rush of cavalry. The sides of their line were anchored on one side by the unfinished palisades stretching down to where the galleys and their scorpions could take the attackers under fire and on the other the wall of the outermost longhouse.

Elsewhere archers put down their tools, grabbing up their bows and quivers rushing for their positions while the actual carpenters ducked inside the nearest longhouses.

Wendel, despite being a knight himself was his father's son, an organizer. He had absorbed everything about the need for organization in an army, and had drilled his men on certain horn calls on the trip down here. Moreover the pikemen he had may have been levies from White Harbor, but they had been sent up to Winterfell to train under Jon Snow. These were not barely-trained levies, men taken from all walks of life from farmers to city folk suddenly given a weapon and told to go fight. Nor were they warriors, not trained practically since boyhood like most armsmen were, but pikes were a simple weapon in comparison to a longsword.

No, these were soldiers, and that made them a very different kettle of fish. If they had been dropped into Rome, the Roman legionnaires would've known their own despite their weapons. If they had been dropped into the army of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, they would've fit right in with a pike regiment (after several more months of training and experience).

At another signal the pikes came down, held firmly in the hands of the men behind them, a bristling wall of metal points facing out against the Erenford cavalry that was attempting to ride them down. At the sight, more than one of the mounted men faltered, but the others, as infected with the disease of cavalry ruling the battlefield as their head of house, continued with the charge. Their horses however began to try and shy away, slowing their advance.

Archers began to fire and men to tumble out of their saddles but that was more of a sideshow to the slaughter that those pikes wreaked on the Calvary when the two forces met. Pikes outreached lances by a wide margin. Those heavy pike heads smashed into and through breastplates, slicing into horseflesh and riders with equal ease. Cries of the wounded began to abound, some even cried to the Seven to aid them, but there was no such help here.

Even where the weight of the charge got past the first row of pike, they only ran into the second. In one or two places where they could push that pike or this one aside in the second row, cut down a man here and there they couldn't enlarge the holes before more men came up, the dismounted heavy cavalry of Manderly cutting their horse's stomachs from below. And always those pikes kept stabbing, stabbing forward.

Wendel bellowed commands to his men, backing up the pikes killing what few men could break through the two person line. Soon however more pikemen came up from behind them, reinforcing the two deep formation of infantry. "Hold them!" he bellowed, "Hold them!"

Killing one man by thrusting his sword up into his side underneath his chest plate, he pulled the man down. Then with difficulty Wendel lifted his heavy body into the saddle of the horse before it could bolt, regally not noticing that a few of his fellow knights had to push him up given his girth. He pulled the horse around as it tried to race away, maddened by the smell of blood and not particularly well-trained alas. Still, Wendel did not become a knight by not having horse skills. Seconds later he had his makeshift mount under control and turned it gazing out over the battle.

The front of the battle was a snarl now, the initial cavalry rush having broken against the pike but the man behind them still pressing forward for now. That wouldn't last. Their horses, mad with the smell of blood and hearing the screams of their wounded herd-mates would bolt regardless of what their riders wanted. Unless they can get around the front of the pike line on the other side of the longhouse. He spotted the next group of pike and shouted "Break into groups of twenty five, first two guard the left flank, one to a side!"

The men did so, their sergeants following his order quickly. Soon there was a line of pike on facing out from the edge of the longhouse, anchored further by its edge now being within range of the ships out in The Bite.

He held back the remaining pikemen, waiting, waiting for the moment when the cavalry charge rebounded on itself. Wendel was a veteran, admittedly more against bandits, pirates, and a particularly recalcitrant minor house from the former Bolton lands than real war. Despite that, he was extremely well-trained, and his father and Lord Stark had both gone on at length about 'the moment'. It was that brief moment when an attacker realizes his attack has failed, but before he does anything about it. When the attackers morale broke enough for them to start to run, but before they did so en-masse.

Wendel watched from his vantage point at the back of the infantry formation and saw it. The horses began to override their rider's control, and those riders too were now panicking, trying to break off. But those at the back, especially the few with torches, were stopping them from pulling away quickly. He signaled one of his men who had remained behind the main battle with a horn. "Sound advance."

With that command the last two hundred plus pikemen joined the battle. At the horns bellow all the infantrymen along the main line of battle began to march forwards, the men at the back pushing the men in front of them forward, their pikes all leveled in one direction.

The cavalry broke. No, it didn't break, it shattered. It had barely been holding the space it could when faced with two lines of pike, with five, and all of them now marching forward rather than holding station, they couldn't even do that. On that bloody field the strength of House Erenford broke, shattered in its entirety along with Emmon Erenford, who had been among the first to die having led the charge like any knight should. It was but the first of the death blows to rain on that house, and the losses among the Freys the first but not the last that house would take as well.

For the present Wendel didn't care about that, all he cared about was that the depot was safe for now. Even as he ordered the archers of House Locke forward to hunt down the remaining attackers, even as his fellow knights moved forward to finish off the wounded, he turned back gazing out into the sea. There, Wendell saw the quartet of galleys waiting patiently to offload. The sight, with his House's flag waving from every ship and from above the depot, made him smile.

OOOOOO

The Frey force that had been loaned to House Erenford was not the main force that the Freys put in the field. Realizing that Lord Lannister was more than ruthless enough to take umbrage at them trying to get by without actually doing anything, Old Walder had ordered a force of two thousand men to move out from the Twins and reinforce House Haigh as they set up shop on the Kingsroad as it entered into the Neck. Far enough away from the Neck that they didn't have to worry about diseases from the various bugs of the marshes but close enough that they blocked any army coming out of the Neck along the Kingsroad from spreading out into a combat formation to match their own defensive line, which was being built like a half circle, the inner curve facing the road out of the Neck.

That was all they did. They didn't act against the crannogmen scouts they saw, the Frey men even publicly executed two men of House Haigh in clear view from the marshes. Black Walder had been put in charge of this group, and he had been ordered by his father to make a point of seeming to be reasonable to any watchers from the marshes. They were also, at the first sign of a whole army coming down the road from the north to withdraw to the Twins.

Other than that he was simply going to stay there. If a force came up Kingsroad to join them, all very well they were already starting to put in place defenses. These were ditches and earthen palisades for the most part, since the only nearby source of wood were the trees of the marshes, which were much more trouble than they were worth.

Despite this, it could be a good defensive position, or they could be meeting up with a force coming down from the north. His men didn't know, precisely the way the Freys wanted it. Old Walder wanted to play both sides, to see which side offered him the best deal, though admittedly it would take a lot to overcome Lord Lannister's offer, something solid and immediate.

OOOOOO

Despite being hunters by profession, the men of house Reed also made excellent scouts especially on land so close to the Neck. While the Frey camp was a little too far away from the Neck for any scout to get close enough during the day, at night they didn't have that problem.

Listening to the reports Lord Reed laughed quietly. When Meera, newly returned from House Stark looked at him in puzzlement he laughed again, louder this time before speaking in his deep, scratchy voice. "The Freys aren't committing themselves. Every man in that force out there knows that they're only there as a show of force, to show the North that they could've made trouble if they wanted to, or to meet up with Lord Lannister, whichever comes first. They don't want to be pulled into full combat, but they don't realize that position is just as in danger as it is dangerous. Cowards all, and not an experienced man among them because that's the way Old Walder has always played it."

Meera nodded, shaking her head slightly at the duplicity of it. "They want to play both sides? Do you think that would work?"

"It might work for Lord Lannister. So long as the Freys seem to be following his orders he won't hammer them too badly, he probably won't be able to afford to at that point." Lord Reed shook his head. "If the Lannisters get up here first anyway. I doubt they are having an easy time of it though."

"But it won't work for Ranma. If the Freys don't change their tune when they hear what really went on in King's Landing he won't barter or bargain with them." Meera said in a tone that made her certainty plain.

" True enough. Still, the army will need to know what they might be running into. Meera, I'll be sending you in the morning to Moat Cailin to wait for the army. I'll send word to the other Neck Houses to gather up a fleet of our coracles, they might be needed."

Meera nodded, eager to see Ranma, Jon and Arya again.

Her father smiled, though inwardly wondered if she would be coming back to Greywater Watch anytime soon. House Reed did need to be represented at least a bit in the expedition being sent south after all. Meera was an excellent scout and hunter, as at home in a forest or on a plain as in a marsh. Only a fool would not see that and wish to add her to his army, and Ranma Stark was anything but a fool.

He shrugged inwardly, knowing that children often had to leave home to grow. He had no wish to see Meera hurt, but neither would he hold her back.

OOOOOO

At the same time that the Freys and their allies were making trouble for house Reed, the army had arrived at Castle Cerwyn, covering the same distance in a day that had taken a day and a half for Robert's party to travel. It's amazing how not stopping every few hours to go hunting and actually pushing the pace does for said pace, Ranma thought.

This was one of many thoughts occupying Ranma's head as he tried desperately to ignore the whispering going on behind him between Alayaya and Daenerys. Myrcella too was there, the three girls of course sticking together. Merry was even sharing a horse with Daenerys, the two of them far less weight than a man in armor even though Daenerys wore lizard lion plate, left over from the scales of the beast Ranma had killed all those months ago. But from what he could see of Merry's red face seemed to indicate that she was not taking part in the conversation.

Oh, and now they've started to use hand gestures lovely, he thought, having caught the movement out of the corner of his eye. Indeed, Daenerys was twisting her fingers in the air for a moment as if demonstrating something, while Alayaya was shaking her head in return. Behind Ranma's silver-haired wife Merry was now as red as an apple, her face buried in her companion's hair. Oh look, now Dacey has fallen back to join them, even worse.

He and Smalljon, who was riding beside him just then, shared a glance before Smalljon spurred his horse slightly and Ranma nodded moving along beside him with ease. At this point, Ranma thought to himself as they raced on moving further down the column of the army, I'd rather face lady Jonelle rather than hear more of that conversation!

Several hours later Ranma was questioning that decision as he dodged a second plate thrown his way. "How dare you!" Jonelle shrieked, glaring at him. "No, my son is too young to go to war!"

"Now lady calm..." Ranma began then was forced to dodge again as Jonelle, showing a decent arm threw a plate like it was a Frisbee at where his head had previously been. It crashed against the wall behind him, and Ranma winced again while the copper of the plate made a ringing tone against the rock.

"I won't let you! I won't let you take my little boy to war!"

Outside the private dining Hall where this conversation was going on Lord Cerwyn turned to Jon. "So, lovely weather we're having lately."

Jon snorted, while inside the noise of a mother in full rage went on for several more minutes.

Rickard and Greatjon stood with them. Greatjon was laughing, one large hand muffling the sound for fear of attracting Jonelle's attention out here. Rickard however was looking rather askance, since it was certainly not normal for a Lord Paramount let along a King to have to calm down a noblewoman when taking her son to ward.

He didn't know how close Cerwyn and Stark had become of late, nor that Jonelle had a miscarriage before Cley, making him even dearer to her. Besides, Ranma saw the older woman as a friend, and if it helped her become accustomed to the idea of her son being away by venting at him, he was fine with that. Moreover, he didn't want his friends to see him as a lord first, just Ranma, and it was as a man taking her son away rather than her Lord Paramount that Ranma stood in front of Jonelle.

Soon Jonelle ran out of things to throw. Ranma breathed a sigh of relief as the last plate slammed into the wall behind him holding up his hands placatingly. "My lady please, I'm not going to let him fight in a battle or anything like that, I'm just taking him along as my ward. He'll help take care of the horses of the rest of the wolfsworn, help us take care of our tents, sometimes bring us food from the campfires, that kind of thing. You know regular young squire stuff, no pitched battles."

At least I hope so. Ranma thought but did not say aloud. There was always a chance that Cley would be forced to fight at some point in the future, but he would try to keep that from happening. But he wanted Cley along. House Cerwyn was the closest geographically to House Stark and they didn't have a representative among the wolfsworn at this point. They were the only powerful noble house that didn't since Hathan counted as coming from House Manderly.

Jonelle glared at him. Normally she had a soft spot for Ranma and Jon too. They were both good boys, and she could all too easily remember the days when Ranma began to stop by as his father's voice, always bringing such brightness and cheer to the castle. Now however, he had come not to bring cheer, but to take her little boy away.

"Promise me!" she said abruptly moving over to stand within inches of Ranma, glaring into his face. "Promise me on your honor as a Stark that my son won't be thrown into any battle, that you will try your damndest to make sure that, that he comes home without even a scratch on him."

Ranma opened and closed his mouth for a moment then asked plaintively "Do scratches from training count?" He quailed under her glare. One thing that had not changed from his old life to this one, Ranma did very poorly in the face of feminine fury. Still, he was getting better, at least he wasn't trying to run for the hills or insult Jonelle to start a completely different argument.

Across from him Jonelle began to tear up, and then she abruptly flung her arms around Ranma. Hesitantly Ranma put his arms around her shoulders as she sobbed into his chest. "Please, Ranma, he's my only boy, my son. I don't, I don't want him to, to come back like all too many boys do from war, scarred inside and out! Please, promise me he'll be safe!"

Without even a second's hesitation Ranma answered, his voice unwontedly formal. "I Promise on my honor as a Stark that I will do my best to keep your son safe, my lady."

"Good." Jonelle then smiled grimly, wiping away her remaining tears as she pulled back from the hug. "Now, if you could be so good as to send in my father, I wish to speak with him."

Ranma winced again, but didn't say anything, simply smirking a little after giving the older woman one last hug.

Leaving the room he spotted Jon, Lord Cerwyn and the rest of what he was mentally calling his command staff. Greatjon in particular had a wide grin on his face as did Rickard though his smile was smaller and he tried his best to hide it behind a hand. "I notice my lords that none of you were volunteering to explain events to the lady." He said glaring at them all though in particular Lord Cerwyn.

Jon and the other wolfsworn at least looked somewhat guilty at that, but the others simply laughed. Cerwyn's laughter stopped abruptly however when Ranma went on. "Oh and Medger, your daughter wants to speak to you." With that he walked off with the others Greatjon's laughter now booming out unrestrained, following him, leaving Medger to his uncertain fate.

He found Daenerys already ensconced in their room, still wincing as she walked. He shook his head. "I am sorry about that, I guess we did go a little overboard."

"A little?" Daenerys asked tartly, before calming down. "I'm sorry Ranma. I really would like to..." she blushed. "To continue from last night, but my lower body is telling me that would be a very bad idea, especially with days of riding to look forward to."

"That's fine, I rule my body, not the other way around." Ranma said with a shrug, falling into the bed next to her. He pulled Daenerys to him. "Instead we can just cuddle Dae."

"Dae?" Daenerys sat up looking down at him through narrowed eyes, reminding Ranma a little too much of Jonelle at that moment. "What is that?"

"Er, a pet name? Um, some couples make them up for one another." Ranma replied, slightly nervously. "Er, would you prefer Narys?"

"No, just no. When we're alone, Dae is fine." Daenerys smiled as she said that, leaning down to kiss Ranma lightly on the lips. "More than fine actually, I like it, it just surprised me, no one's ever given me a pet name before. Now, you were saying something about cuddling?"

Ranma smiled, gathering Daenerys into his arms once more. "Glad you like it, Dae." At the foot of their bed Fenris and the two draklings laid back down, certain now this was some odd bit of the human mating ritual nonsense.

The next day the army moved out, with Cley now riding a horse his grandfather had chosen out of the castle stable for him in the center of the wolfsworn. Cley was an eleven year old boy, stout and strong of limb, and eager to see the world and get to know Ranma better, who he had always looked up to. He was sad to leave his family behind, but what could you do? Roger and Eddy immediately began to quiz him about their route, while the rest of the wolfsworn talked about the coming campaign with Rickard and Greatjon.

The day wore on, with nothing untoward happening until after they had stopped for rest and a quick meal. The army was traveling as quickly as possible, so the stops happened four times a day but were short, just enough to drink some water and water the horses before moving on. The midday stop was longer, while the officers made certain the men were fed a light but filling meal before starting the march once more.

At the back of the column there was a rather short swordsman in House Stark colors whose fellows had noticed that he kept to himself. They would even be hard pressed to say if he had joined them in either the camp of castle Cerwyn's barracks the night before. At the edge of their marching formation he looked up as a direwolf suddenly slunk out of the scrubland around them. While around them the men gaped in astonishment he grinned, removing his helmet to reveal that he was not in fact a 'he' at all but a most specific 'she'. More than one man who had reached for his weapon gaped as Arya Stark pulled herself onto Nymeria's back, and the two of them, with Arya waving farewell at the men moved up to the front of the column.

At the front of the army Ranma was finishing up a discussion detailing the continued order of the march and assigning everyone the command positions. Jon was quartermaster, along with Daryn. The two of them had the best head for numbers of the group for now, though that might change when more maesters joined them later on.

He had split the heavy Cavalry into two wings, putting Greatjon and Rickard in command of each, with Hathar and Roger as their seconds. Ranma took personal command of what he was starting to call the First Grenadiers, the pike levees raised from house Cerwyn and Stark, while Edd and Dacey were given command of the regular infantry forces. The scouts were led by Brynden, easily the best for the job, with two mountain clansmen as seconds.

This was more for relaying orders in battle than anything else, considering that the men of each house already had their own command structure that would see to the day-to-day needs of their man. Or so Ranma told Rickard and Greatjon. But both of them were wise enough to know that as the war continued, the lines between house affiliations would begin to blur, and Ranma was showing remarkable forethought in already putting a command structure in place to take advantage of that.

"With Jon along with the logistics position being second-in-command of your 'Grenadiers' odd name for the pike, but I understand a good name can put spine in the men, that only leaves the archers unaccounted for." Rickard said looking down at where Ranma was marching along.

He very carefully did not let his eyes stray to where Daenerys was riding beside Ranma, or the two direwolves that were carrying the two draklings as they loped along easily. While she had impressed him with her political knowledge and her forethought a time or two in the war council and she certainly seem to be able to think fast on her feet, her ability to lead men in battle was barely tested at this point.

Daenerys didn't know that, and was about to step up to volunteer to command the archers herself, when Ranma looked over to where Domerich was playing on his instrument again. "I want Domerich to take that job, for now anyway. We'll see who House Locke sent down with their men, but for now Domerich can command them." It wasn't perfect, and that hole in the command structure would need to be filled at some point, but Ranma had someone already in mind for that. Arya wasn't nearly as good a shot as Theon, but she'd do, especially if she was simply relaying his commands.

On Ranma's other side Daenerys frowned, and was about to interject when they all began to hear shouts and exclamations from the army marching behind them. It seemed to start near the back and spread forward and the command group turned. Seeing Arya racing up to them on Nymeria, Ranma laughed. "Couldn't wait any longer little sister?"

The rest of the wolfsworn laughed too, Dacey and Roger going so far as to reach out to the young girl and slap her on the shoulders when she pulled up beside them. "Oh you know me, always pushing!" Arya laughed shaking out her hair. She didn't have long hair, she much preferred it short, but having it under a helmet all day yesterday and this morning had bothered the heck out of her. She also couldn't take it off at night, lest she give the game away when the army had stopped the evening before at castle Cerwyn.

"What is she doing here?" Rickard said aghast. "Lady," he began looking at Arya. "This was ill-done. Your parents will be worried sick, you need to return immediately! A battlefield is no place for women, and we have too many of them already."

Daenerys's eyes were not the only one to narrow at that, but it was Daenerys who spoke up, patting Myrcella's arms where they were wrapped around her waist, the two of them once more sharing a horse. "If you are speaking of the princess here or my handmaiden, you will sing a different tune after our first battle my Lord. Their ability to aid the injured has already been proven. As for myself, of course I'm along. Who else would be able to control my little ones, or speak for me to those houses that still might retain some loyalty to mine?"

Rickard scowled. While he was willing to go along with things, much like the rest of the northern lords, their loyalty was first to House Stark and then in a very distant second to Ranma's new wife. That was how they thought about Daenerys, irrespective of her dragons. Yes, those dragons represented a massive force in the future, but right now they didn't represent anything but targets. Even though they could fly and breathe fire already, Rickard had seen the two at practice, they weren't powerful enough to get him to respect Daenerys as a force to be reckoned with. He had some respect for her mind, but that was all. Nor was he as quick to overlook what her father had done to spark Robert's Rebellion as Lord Stark or the smallfolk were.

To Rickard's side however Greatjon kept his mind on the problem at hand. He scoffed. "Bah, let her stay. I assume she's been training with the rest of the wolfsworn. You've really taken that name and run with it haven't ya Ranma?"

"Of Course." Ranma said laughing louder. We might not have chosen it, but it makes for a great name for my band of friends. And, if you haven't heard uncle Arya's already been blooded in battle."

Rickard frowned not having heard that while Greatjon looked over at Jon who nodded. "She was with us when we dealt with that raiding force of former Bolton supporters who tried a sneak attack on Winterfell months back."

Looking over at Arya, Greatjon then glanced at her sword noticing the odd shape of it as well as how thin it seemed. "Bah!" he scoffed again, shaking his head almost as if he was deriding the idea of the woman warrior entirely, though his eyes were shrewd as he watched Arya for a reaction. "That little toy of hers doesn't look like it could hurt a fly!"

Arya's eyes narrowed dangerously and with a swift move her sword was already in her hand the tip pointed towards Greatjon as Nymeria maneuvered around Fenris and Ranma to be in front of his horse making it stop its trot and back away warily. "My Fang's already tasted blood in defense of my family and my home, Lord Umber! Would you like a demonstration?"

After a second spent staring into Arya's eyes Greatjon bellowed in laughter, and slapping his thigh. "You Starks! Not an ounce of give in any of you."

"This is not a laughing matter!" Rickard said glaring at his fellow lord.

"Put it like this, uncle." Arya said turning back to him, using the honorific all the Stark children had taken to use with their distant kinsman. "You can try to send me home, in which case I'll simply run away again to rejoin you later. This way at least I'm already with the army, and my brother and the others can keep an eye on me."

"In that case, why don't you get down from Nymeria and march." Ranma said phrasing it as a question but his tone making an order. "Its good training." Ranma used the word 'march' because while they were going at a brisk pace, they certainly weren't running along, the infantry could have never sustained that, but the march was going as quickly as he could push the men without utterly exhausting them.

Arya scowled, but complied.

"Besides." Daenerys said coming back into the conversation. "There is actually precedent for girls her age to go to war. During the Dance of the Dragons there was a dragon rider her age that went to war. Arya reminds me of her in other ways too, Nettles her name was."

"I don't know that one." Arya said turning away from Rickard to look up at Daenerys.

"She was a Waters, a bastard from Dragonstone, who befriended and rode a wild dragon to war. She did remarkably well, and history says that she was Prince Daemon Targaryen lover during the end of the civil war, despite him being twice her age. The bards like to sing the two of them went into exile after he was sorely wounded in the Dance over Harrenhal."

"EWWW!" Arya blanched. "Don't compare me to her if she did that!"

That caused another round of laughter, and even Rickard snorted. "Fine, but if she gets hurt Ranma, you get to explain it to your mother. If you thought Jonelle was dangerous..."

Ranma blanched, but nodded willingly.

With Arya added to their party, the march continued. That evening she openly joined the rest of the wolfsworn in practice as the Army encamped all around them, with Jon leading the practices and Ranma organizing the army. Cley too joined them, with Roger taking over his instruction for now in a pattern that they would continue to follow until they reached the moat.

OOOOOO

That evening, Arya joined the other girls in their one, albeit rather large, tent. She stared around at them all, utterly exhausted from the day's march and exercising on top of it. But there was something that needed to be said here. "Alright, I know we're all girls, but I don't talk about girly things like dress or boys or anything like that. I definitely don't want to hear anything like that conversation you and Alayaya had on the first day out Daenerys."

Merry flushed slightly at the memory of that conversation while Alayaya laughed, but Daenerys merely cocked her head in question. "How did you overhear us?"

"I didn't, but the army saw you two talking, and that plus my brother's response to it spread quickly." Arya replied her eyes narrowing.

"You might not want to talk about boys now, Lady Stark, but you will eventually, trust me." Alayaya laughed. "At that point you should be so lucky as to have a lover as..."

"LALALA!" Arya shouted, her fingers in her ear. "I'm not listening!" That caused even Merry to laugh aloud, but after Alayaya stopped teasing Arya, the night passed much better, with Arya slowly becoming friends with the trio.

OOOOOO

By that point Arya's disappearance had been discovered back in Winterfell. Eddard had to sit on his wife hard to stop her from taking the horse and going after the army herself to drag Arya back. Catelyn was still unhappy that Ranma and Daenerys had been married so quickly, her son had become so willful while away, returning to his wild youthful ways. But she would be damned by the Stranger before she allowed Arya out of her sight!

However Eddard would have none of it and physically restrained his wife from heading out to the stables. "We need to let her go my love." he said, even as he fought Catelyn, his leg and shoulder making this a much more even contest than it would have been otherwise. "Arya is a warrior born, much like her older brothers. You can't force her to be home something she isn't. She is our child, not a doll we can direct against her will."

"I know that!" Catelyn barked at him, unhappiness written on her face even as she began to calm down from her initial response. The words had also struck her, as she remembered a conversation she had with Myrcella, how Cersei had loved her children but never truly saw them as their own people. It would be a cold day in the Stranger's hell before Catelyn allowed herself to be anything like that woman!

Yet even so, there were some aspects of being a noblewoman that Arya could not avoid so long as she was part of the family. "But she is still my daughter, and still part of this family. She has obligations she will need to fill in the future, and letting her run around like this will only make that more painful."

Eddard winced, deciding not to bring up the fact that he would never force either of his daughters into a marriage against her will. Arya was his sister come to life again, and Eddard refused to try to stifle her. Maybe if we hadn't stifled Lyanna, she wouldn't have run away. Or at least not arranged the marriage to Robert, which looking back on it I can see was the final straw.

"Yes, but surely you heard about Ranma's plans?"

At Catelyn's raised eyebrow Eddard laughed, knowing that this wasn't actually Ranma's reasoning, but it would do for now to stave off further argument. "He plans to take Cley of house Cerwyn as his ward on the march. And Cley is almost of an age with Arya..."

Catelyn suddenly laughed. "Oh that is devious, very devious my love. Did you and Ranma think that up between you?"

"I might have had something to do with it." Eddard said, smiling slightly now that the dangerous moment had passed and leading his wife back into his study. They had been there when the servants confirmed they couldn't find Arya anywhere and that her blade was missing as well as Nymeria. "That would be an excellent marriage wouldn't it?"

"You are so very devious," Catelyn said laughing now. She was still extremely worried for her daughter's safety off course. But now that the initial rush of rage at Arya's willfulness and her fear for her daughter had subsided plus the odd flash of thought comparing herself to Cersei, Catelyn knew that with her brothers beside her Arya would be almost as safe as if she was back here in Winterfell. And it was true that putting them in proximity might make something spark between her and Cley. After all they did like one another already as friends and friends sometimes did make that their spouses. "Very devious indeed."

Despite Catelyn's thoughts, however devious or cunning Eddard might have been it was proven fact that he had nothing on the experienced schemers in King's Landing...

OOOOOO

It was with a great amount of difficulty that Cersei resisted the desire to rub her forehead with frustration. "No Littlefinger, I refuse to send you to the Vale." She said, looking angrily down the table at the man. "For one thing, you probably wouldn't even be able to reach it. It's anyone's guess on how the Riverlands houses will jump given Hoster's little maneuver there."

Unconsciously echoing her father's thoughts, Cersei thought that had been a very shrewd move. It ensured that her father would either have to deal with each house, forcing them to bend a knee one after another, or deal with open rebellion in the form of small-scale attacks here and there. Since the Westerlands army was a veteran force and her father an excellent general against untried youngsters and for the most part weary oldsters that was easily the best way that the Riverlands houses could hurt her father's army.

Petyr scowled internally, while externally he kept the same passive expression he always did on his face. In the wake of the battle of King's Landing, the one that the smallfolk were calling the Battle of Two Truths, Petyr had lost practically all of his personal forces. Mercenaries were not known for their loyalty, or for their guts when their own was in danger. The losses they had sustained in street to street fighting against the better prepared, better trained and far more physically fit Northerners had gutted his numbers, and the rest had taken their pay and left the city as quickly as possible. It would take some time to rebuild those numbers, if he could do it at all.

The only exception was the men of House Kettleblack. A knightly house from the Crownlands, they at least had some honor, but more importantly were in debt to him so much they couldn't have pulled back even if they had wanted to. That about 20 men all told under Ser Osmund, the head of that house, and his two brothers. That wasn't enough men to matter, barely enough to see to Petyr's personal safety unless he made a nuisance of himself.

So despite his position as Master of Coin Petyr was beginning to feel very nervous when it came to his personal power base. That Cersei was wary of him was no surprise, that she had been doing such a good job of trying to control him was. But so was the fact that Jaime was equally suspicious of him, and watched him almost constantly. The man's spies were ludicrously easy to lose, but his suspicion was not good for Petyr's long term prospects.

"Surely your highness, you could see your way to sending a ship? The Vale might not have that much in the way of an offensive force, but it could field some twelve thousand men or so, enough to make a difference if added to your father's forces when the North inevitably comes south."

Cersei actually smiled slightly, which puzzled Petyr, but the smile had nothing to do with what he had said. No, her smile was caused by the memory of Ranma's vow to protect her daughter. It was surprisingly liberating to know that young man, with all of his astonishing abilities, would guard her daughter with his life regardless of whether or not he would face her family across the battlefield.

A second later the smile was gone and she shook her head. "A ship is out of the question. We've had to decommission and take apart most of the royally owned ships already for their wood trebuchets. And even if we had a ship to send, are you so certain that you would be able to get past Dragonstone?"

Stannis' propaganda had reached King's Landing several weeks ago, and Cersei's initial reaction had not been pretty. She had ranted and raved for hours about the lies being spread, despite the fact that Petyr, Pycelle and Jaime all knew that they were not in fact lies. More to the point, the fact that Stannis was prepared to interdict any traffic coming in and out of Blackwater Bay was a given.

Petyr conceded that, but still persisted. If he could get to the Vale, he could convince Lysa to turn over most of the power of the Lord Paramount's seat to him, and with the Vale as a power base he would become both useful to the Lannisters, and independent of them somewhat. "I understand your reluctance your Majesty, and I am most heartened by your worry over my personal safety. However, I still think it would be an excellent idea to at least send an envoy. If not me, then who do you have that knows anything about the Vale lands?"

There was also Petyr's fervent wish to not be in the King's Landing when Lord Lannister arrived. Whatever else might be said about him, Tywin Lannister was an incredibly effective ruler, and had proven this both as Lord of the Westerlands and as King's Hand before he and Aerys began to fall out. That Lord Lannister would have no truck with Petyr's little games, or that he might see right through all of the tricks Petyr used to hide how he had 'helped' the debt of the nation along, was a severe worry to the man.

"No one, I'll admit" Cersei replied honestly. "However as I said, sending an envoy at this time is impossible." Then she decided to throw the man a bone. "When the first reinforcements from the Westerlands arrive with Lord Serret, then we will have the men necessary to send with you on an overland trip to the Vale so long as the houses in the Riverlands along the route to the Bloody Gate have not thrown in their lot with the Baratheons or the Starks. At that time we will come back to this discussion."

Knowing that was as far as he could get without some kind of lever to force Cersei to see his point of view Petyr bowed his head. With that done, Cersei turned to Pycelle and her brother. "How goes preparing the defenses of the city?"

His little, arrogant smirk as usual on his face Jaime shrugged. That expression would normally have set Cersei's pulse to racing but only made her even more tired at the moment. "The Stokeworth and Rosby men are fully integrated into our defenses. We finished work on the various barracks for them near the walls yesterday. It's good strategic sense to have the most battle ready forces closer to the outer walls, though Lord Stokeworth took umbrage at it. He didn't like the fact that they are billeted here in the castle while their men were all out by the outer walls. The man Rosby sent with his forces, Ser Adrian Waters, didn't have a problem with it."

"I don't care if they understand or are happy about it." Cersei said bluntly. "They can take it as a sign of distrust, but until the Westerlands forces arrive, we will keep them at arms-length."

Jaime nodded. "The goal cloaks are up to strength, my training with them has proved beneficial I think. Not so much in their battle preparation is in their organization, but they're prepared to defend the walls at a moment's notice. The walls themselves are ready, as is the port area, where I think the first assault will land. Frankly I have no idea why it's taken so long for Stannis to attack as it is. If he had any idea of how badly mauled we were after the Starks attempted coup he would've been here already. That he hasn't has been a godsend to us."

He was about to hand over the conversation over to Pycelle to talk about the defenses more, but the Master of Whispers interrupted, speaking in that soft feminine tone he used. "It has come to my ears that Stannis struck down in the Stormlands, using the fact his brother retreated to the Reach instead of Storm's End and to rally support. I know House Buckler has gone over to his side, and possibly Errol. Certainly their banners were seen with his army as they marched out of Bronzegate. Unfortunately the little bird that passed this on to me has no head for numbers so I cannot help you there. But they were marching further south rather than up the Kingsroad to assault us from that direction. What that means I do not know, I am not a soldier."

Jaime frowned, as both he and his sister tried to visualize a map of the Stormlands. "Any news of actual battles?" Jaime asked after a moment.

"Some, and some more talk about the red witch as well. Most of it is speculation and second hand information, but my little bird had a client who apparently liked to talk after he got his money's worth." he smirked slyly. "The man talked about having seen the red witch burned Brienne of Tarth. Not at the stake but with some kind of conjured fire. She summoned it up when the Maid of Tarth refused to bend the knee to Stannis."

Jaime winced remembering all too easily the former mad king's fascination with fire and more importantly killing people with it. "I wouldn't think Stannis would have any truck with such as that, but I guess I was wrong about his character. Ambition trumps all."

"Regardless," he went on shaking his head from bad memories. "We will need to be ready for a far larger force in that case. Dragonstone alone would not have enough men to take the city now that we've refilled the Gold Cloak ranks, and brought more troops in ourselves. That'd be true even if Stannis could bring one or two of the other Narrow Sea houses under his control."

Pycelle now spoke up. "We've already built three trebuchets, all of them situated near the port area." Though he wouldn't mention aloud, those three had been built from a design Tyrion had shown him once. They were massive with a range far beyond anything a siege army could build in less than a few months, and no ship would ever be able to match its range. "The alchemists have also built up a reserve of wildfire despite much of their hoarded stores having been sent up to the Wall. We are in the process of moving some of it to positions near the walls at strategic points. Of course we need to be very careful doing so, but it will certainly be a surprise for any attackers."

The Grand-maester was actually surprised and a little worried about how quickly the alchemists had been able to make good their losses and then some. Even as little as a year ago it would take a master alchemist weeks to create a single gallon of the stuff, but now it took mere days. There was talk of some of the steps going much more efficiently and thus quickly than normal, but no one had come up with an explanation just yet.

Cersei nodded. "How goes the ongoing negotiations with the Faith?"

"They are finally behind us now, and their men throughout the city have begun to pass on rumors of the red witch and Stannis being no friend to the smallfolk, as we asked." Pycelle scowled, not liking how much that had cost them, which Cersei wholeheartedly agreed with.

The High Septon's aid had been bought by Cersei promising to pay off the debt the Crown had accrued to the Faith in her name as a Lannister. A debt she hadn't even known was there! The thought of that almost made her glare at the Littlefinger again, but she refrained. For now the weasel was still useful, easily the best of them with numbers and keeping an ear to the ground within the city, much like Varys was outside it.

"Unfortunately, both the Faith and our own rumormongers are having difficulty." Petyr said, speaking up now and exchanging a glance with Varys. "There are rumors going around the city that have nothing to do with Stannis' propaganda."

"How is his propaganda being seen by the smallfolk, and what rumors are you speaking of?" Cersei said cocking her head to one side. This was the first she had heard about any new rumors since judging by the way he said it Petyr meant rumors beyond what had previously known about from after the battle against Starks.

"Strangely enough despite their hatred for your family the accusations from Stannis have not been believed." Petyr said, not flinching as all three of the Lannister's present glared at him, even Joffrey now paying attention to his words.

And he was astonished about that, since those accusations were in fact the truth. "The smallfolk remember Robert and his growing approval for Tommen as well as the Princess and her friendship with the Starks and see that as reason to disbelieve it." At least in their case, he thought to himself. However he was not going to be the one to tell Cersei that protection had not spread to Joffrey, the only one still present in the city and the one wearing the crown.

In point of fact he doubted that the smallfolk would ever be fully on the side of the royal family ever again after this. The whole city was... not in open rebellion, none of the smallfolk had the spine for that, but a sullen acceptance of their rule rather than an enthusiastic one. There was nothing to be done however, and so long as the smallfolk actively didn't try to open the gates for their enemies or riot that was enough.

While his mother was very happy about this bit of news, Joffrey scowled angrily. Even now you still take the attention that should rightfully be mine from me Tommen! I should have killed you sooner!

Petyr went on. "And as for the rumors, there are rumors of prisoners taken in the battle against House Stark being tortured. It's been noted by many that there are far fewer of those prisoners than there once were, and one of the guards of the prison has spread rumors that they were transferred here to the Red Keep to be tortured."

Cersei frowned. She had known about Joffrey's attempt to break Sansa's spirit right after her father had escaped and while she would not have approved of it if asked her opinion, she understood the why of it. This however was something new.

Before Cersei could respond however Joffrey spoke up. "I know of that." he said startling his mother. Looking at her he shrugged. "Several of the men who took the Tower decided to take out their displeasure at how badly that battle turned out on a few of the prisoners. I tried to stop it." He said, his face set in a mournful look. "Torturing those people served no purpose, if they were rabble-rousers trying to get the other prisoners to act out I could've seen the point but as it was..." he shrugged.

Cersei frowned but took his words at face value as always. "I trust you had been discipline them?" As busy as she was with the small counsel and everything she had to deal with, Cersei hadn't spent any time at all with the Lannister armymen, and knew only a bare handful outside the new men added to the Kingsguard.

But Jaime was looking a little askance at his son. He didn't honestly know how to take what Joffrey had said. Something told him it wasn't the full truth but what the full truth was, he didn't know. Jaime was slowly coming to understand that he didn't understand his son all that well.

Next to Jaime Petyr too looked at the young king. Joffrey's quickly becoming an issue. While Petyr could bend Joffrey's ear easily enough, and had continued to befriend him, that didn't blind Petyr to the fact that the boy was a psychopath. He enjoyed hurting people, and had gathered several other men of similar disposition to him. Luckily his agents had kept that from becoming common knowledge among the smallfolk. Thanks to the gossipers among the prison guards the fact those prisoners were disappearing was well known, but it hadn't happened been connected to Joffrey just yet. He didn't want to find out what would happen if the smallfolk realized they had a monster as bad as Aerys on the throne again.

"Of that may be sure mother." Joffrey said nodding his head. "However, now that our reinforcements have arrived and the Gold Cloaks have been brought up to strength, could we not march to take the field against Renly at least?"

Jaime scoffed at the very idea. "The gold cloaks aren't an offensive army. I wouldn't trust them beyond the city's walls with hunting bandits, let alone fighting a battle. No, they'll be of use on the wall, but that's all. We'll have to leave offensive operations to your grandfather."

"Agreed." Cersei said before changing the subject. "Varys, do you have anything else to report?"

"There is a representative of the Iron Bank here to speak to you, your Majesty, he is in the foyer even now. I am waiting for some agents of mine to run down some of the sailors from the ship that Ranma took to Pentos, it has apparently made port in Duskendale. I think we need to know how that mission turned out."

"It would certainly make our propagandismore effective if we could instill some truth in it..." Petyr murmured.

The others, in particular Jaime and Pycelle, winced at the very idea of the Targaryens returning to Westeros, especially if Ranma Stark had brought them back. That would be very bad indeed, but thankfully they hadn't heard any rumors of that just yet.

"Very well, show in the Iron Bank representative. Perhaps we can make some kind of deal with them about a payment plan in return for more liquid capital now." Cersei growled finally giving in to her desire to rub at her eyes for a moment before forcibly shaking herself.

The Iron Bank representative was a tall, spare man with a bald head obviously shaved that way rather than from age, and a calm deliberate manner even when simply walking into the throne room. He was dressed in simple yet well-made clothing, and a heavy Iron and gold torque hung from his neck down his chest.

"Your Majesty, your grace, thank you for seeing me on such short notice," The man said, his voice calm, almost soothing yet stern sounding at the same time. "I am a representative of the Iron Bank, and I have come to speak to of the outstanding loans that the Iron Throne has accrued from us. To wit, almost one and a quarter million gold dragons. The former Hand had worked out an excellent system for the repayment of that loan, and we were pleased with his progress."

That was putting it mildly. That debt that the Iron Throne had accrued from the Iron Bank had been up to almost three million golden dragons but in his time in the capital Lord Stark had done wonders to work with their bankers to funnel small bits of monies their way to start paying it off, and had pointed out several places where their own paperwork had been falsified, the monies given supposedly to the crown not even showing up in the Iron Throne's books, and thus could not lawfully be part of the debt.

The man didn't let his gaze slide to Petyr, who some in the Iron Bank felt was the orchestrator of that. The only reason the man had not already been assassinated, messing with bank paperwork at either end was a killing offense no hyperbole there, was the fact they couldn't actually pin it on him. They weren't about to move on Petyr without that proof since doing so if he was not the culprit might make the real one disappear. "With Lord Stark gone, the setup he had put in place to repay us has disappeared, so we wish to come to an understanding with you about a payment plan."

Joffrey growled angrily standing up as if to threaten the man physically though he didn't have the height or body for that to come off well. He seems more petulant than angry really. "Who are you to demand anything of the Iron Throne?! Some little piddling foreign bank, come here to demand terms of us!? We're at war in case you haven't noticed, this is no time for penny-pinching! Come back to us when we have crushed these usurpers that are causing so much chaos in our realm, and you might find us in a better humor!"

"Wars take time, as well as money. If we do not have any kind of agreement with you about a payment plan, we can no longer forward you more money to pay for your ongoing expenses." The man said calmly, staring first at Joffrey than Cersei. "We are a business, our own bottom lines come first after all."

The young king was about to explode again but Cersei held up a hand. "Calmly my son, while you are right that this is a time of war, we do need liquid capital." She looked with scant favor at the man. "At present, I will only promise to pay a third of that gold over time. Most of that debt was accrued by the previous king, and as such it is to House Baratheon the majority of the debt should be addressed. As Storms End and the rest of House Baratheon have risen in treason against the house's real heir, we cannot be held accountable for repayment of the debt the former lord accumulated at this time. Nor I will not agree to any long-term payment plans, as doing so would tie up the money coming in from our own resources. That is the best you are going to get."

The man's eyes narrowed, showing how unhappy he was with that decision. "That is not enough. We have a reputation to uphold as well as our bottom line to see to. We will require that money to be paid in full or steps may be taken to reclaim payment via... other methods."

"Was that a threat!" Joffrey asked incredulously. "I should have your head cut chopped off for that!"

To one side Ser Blount moved forward one hand on his hilt as if willing to do just that right there and then, but he was blocked from a nod by Cersei moving Ser Swann in his way. The two men glared at one another, but it was Blount who backed down.

Cersei turned back to the Iron Bank representative, who had not given his name. That was deliberate she knew, he was simply a voice for the bank, not one of their movers or shakers. "A third." she said calmly. "To be paid over the next two years from the gold reserves of the Rock, after I get in touch with my uncle. That is the best you are going to get."

The man shrugged. "I will take your words to my superiors but remember your highness", he went on, looking between the now nearly frothing mad Joffrey and the calm as ice queen. "The Iron Bank always gets its due." With that he walked out, leaving Cersei with one more problem and a smiling Varys who was wondering if he could somehow turn this to his own advantage and that of his patron.

OOOOOO

Several days later, the news of the battle of the ford of the Kneeling Man reached King's Landing, and none of the small council were smiling now. "I hadn't thought that much of the Riverlands would declare against us." Cersei mused thoughtfully, though her eyes were flashing with rage. She would rage later when she was alone or with just Jaime, right now she needed to keep control. Eddard Stark had shown her how controlled rage was much better than the shouting and screaming kind, if not nearly as emotionally satisfying.

While her father might have won the battle, and now controlled fully a third of the Riverlands, his march north had been halted, and that meant that it was up to the Freys to stop Ranna and the North. That was an impossibility, she was certain of it even if Old Walder had a spine equal to his ambition. This meant that soon they would have a third enemy to contend with.

After a moment spent grinding her teeth to keep from roaring out her rage and anger at this newest affront to her and her son's positions, Cersei turned to her brother. "How long before the North is in play?"

"Four, maybe three months." Jaime guessed. "Longer, possibly. Remember the North is nearly as large as the Vale, the Riverlands, and the Crownlands combined but with nowhere near the numbers. It'll take the Starks time to gather a strong enough force to send South, plus they've already sent men up to the wall, so I doubt it could be that large a force." Despite those words his normal arrogant smirk was in abeyance. If Ranna was as good at leading men as he was at fighting himself, that army would be very dangerous.

Joffrey slammed his hand down on the table, ignoring the pain the pain this caused in his hand to yell. "The North is a problem for later! The Riverlands are a problem for now! It's obvious that old bastard in Riverrun has fully followed his son's treason! As such his son should pay for it. We should kill him now, then send his head to his father!"

"That would serve no purpose." said Varys said coolly. "Worse, such a move would be certain to change the opinion of at least a few of the Houses who have joined forces with your grandfather, or have remained neutral."

"But the only good thing for a hostage is if they believe we will kill him if they act up, this is obviously them acting up."

"No I'm afraid it isn't." Pycelle said shaking his head. "Hoster's idea of simply informing his lords to act as their own conscience dictates has cleared him of wrongdoing in this case." He tapped the message thoughtfully, thinking hard. Ever since Tommen's death he had been taking his position much more seriously, and was much more likely to speak up if he had something to share. "Besides, the Houses facing Lord Tywin on the Green Fork aren't taking the field against us. They're simply taking the field against allowing anyone to march across their land. That kind of neutrality we can deal with. Killing Edmure would no doubt turn them against us. No, it's best to hold onto him."

"Grandmaster Pycelle's right I'm afraid my son." Cersei said, sounding actually regretful about that. "I would like nothing better than to show our anger at this betrayal, but it is best that we keep Edmure alive for now. It shows mercy on our part and also keeps Riverrun and the Tully forces from acting, no small thing."

Angered at being blocked from slating his inner sadist on what he saw as a worthy target Joffrey stood up abruptly and marched out of the room. Seeing this Cersei sighed faintly, her own initial rush of anger having disappeared as she tried to think of what this could mean in the long term before deciding she couldn't figure that out, and turned to other matters.

Jaime frowned looked after his erstwhile son, then motioned one of the men he had recruited in the Kingsguard, Ser Torrey Buckwell, third son of that Crownlands noble house. He was a decent swordsman and a man who took his oaths seriously, so had been perfect for the Kingsguard, though his skills weren't quite up to Balon Swann's level. Jaime whispered into the man's ear and Torrey nodded, then moved briskly after the two men assigned to guard Joffrey, both of whom had followed the king out of the room.

His sister hadn't noticed this little bit of interplay, having turned to Varys. "Besides the news of the Riverlands, which we cannot affect or change from this far removed, do you have anything else to report Varys?"

"I do indeed Your Highness." Varys said smiling faintly. "News has reached me from my little birds in Duskenale. The ship that Ranna Stark took to Pentos made port there, and its sailors are being very free with the news of what occurred. Apparently he brought back Daenerys Targaryen. She came willingly, the alternative apparently being sold by her brother, as we had suspected, to the Dothraki. She was not apparently a willing participant in that."

Cersei scoffed, motioning to get on with it. As if any woman would wish to be sold off like that. Normal marriages between Noble Houses were one thing, but at least most lords were civilized. She hated to think what the Dothraki were like, thinking them the equal of the Late, unlamented Gregor Clegane in the manner they treated women.

Obedying her command, Varys had to stop himself from smiling at the rock he was about to drop. Varys was still trying to wrap his own mind around the return of the dragons, but it was certain that they would help in the long run to muddy the waters here even more. He had already sent notes to a few of his factors in the free cities to search out fossilized eggs if they could find them. After all, if one Targaryen could awaken them, certainly another could. "But that is not all. "

"But here is the most, astonishing part, something I would not have believed except every sailor my little birds plied with their various wiles have said the same thing. The Targaryen girl apparently brought along two dragons eggs, which hatched within moments of her arrival aboard the ship. Two dragons, living, breathing dragons, are apparently hers to command. The sailors were all sharing tales of how she began to train them, commanding them with gestures and words as if they were merely dogs!"

He watched, allowing his own face to show shock at what he was saying while inside he laughed aloud at the look of fear on the face of everyone around the council table. "Needless to say." Varys continued. "I think we need to consider what this means long-term."

OOOOOO

Jaime excused himself quickly from the meeting after that. His sister had shown a remarkable amount of self-control when the bad news of their father's setback was shared, but this latest information had broken that control. Even as he walked down the corridor his ears were still ringing from her screeching, wild and above all impotent, fury. Cersei was magnificent most of the time, but when she lost it fully, even Jaime didn't want to be around her.

Of course there's not much any of us can do about this particular problem. Jaime thought, his lips twisted in something between a snarl and his normal smirk at the thought. I'm good with a sword, but I can't fly, so my ability to deal with dragons is somewhat limited.

Beneath that flippant thought however was a lot of fear. He could all too easily remember the mad king, and the thoughts of what another mad Targaryen could do with a real dragon terrified him, though he would never let that show. I bet we could figure out a way for scorpions to range on them if we tried, need to talk to Pycelle about that later, after my sweet sister works off her temper. She's been keeping it bottled up lately, all the crap we've had to deal with has forced her to, so that might take a while.

He looked up, broke out of his thoughts when a familiar voice called his name from further down the hallway he was walking down. "Ser Jaime?"

Coming down the hallway toward him was Tyrek Lannister. He had initially been one of the king's squires, though had been nearly forgotten since he didn't actually enjoy hunting, but Lancel had. Tyrek had missed the battle against the Starks because he had been down with one of the nastiest stomach maladies Jaime had ever seen. Even now he looked pale and wan, though that might have been his still having not gotten over Lancel's death. The two young men hadn't been close, but Lancel was possibly the first family member Tyrek had lost. Jaime was grimly certain however he wouldn't be the last. Since then Tyrek had been used as a general gofer for the queen and the Kingsguard, which was probably what he was doing now.

Jaime cocked an eyebrow at Tyrek and he went on. "Milord, Ser Torrey asked me to fetch you, he says to come to the Traitor's Walk."

Jaime's eyes narrowed and he nodded, walking briskly off. He found Torrey there, looking a little bemused. "Torrey, what happened, where's the boy-king?"

"He came here right after leaving the king's council but I think you were wrong about his temper getting the better of him, at least in severity. He shouted at Edmure Tully for a bit, had Blount and the others smack him every time he tried to open his mouth. The king said stuff about how his grandfather was going to wipe Edmure's father and the Tully's holdings out, how he was a traitor and all that. Then he ordered him to be moved from the top floor down to the bottom floor, but that's all." Torrey smiled now, looking very relieved he wouldn't have to try to stand up to the king, since given his oaths he would have had to obey Joffrey's orders over his commanders. "That's all, then he, Blount and the others gathered some hounds and armsmen then went out on a hunt."

At the remarkably blasé account Jaime breathed a sigh of relief. Maybe the boy really wasn't involved in the prisoners' deaths then. If just smacking Edmure around like that was enough for Joffrey to get over his anger, maybe I was jumping at shadows.

OOOOOO

He wasn't, but after his mother's words Joffrey knew he couldn't take his full displeasure out on Edmure. So Joffrey had gone hunting, letting his anger out on a fox his dogs ran to ground. Later that night however, he, Boros Blount and Alfred Edgerton, a knight from a Crownlands House of similar disposition, slipped into the prison. Heading down to the lowest level, they found Edmure asleep.

Before Edmure could rouse from the light of their torches, he found his head being covered by a burlap sack. Edmure woke up with a gasp, trying to jerk away from the hands he felt on him, but being chained to the wall limited his ability to fight back, and months of being in prison, even in the better quarters reserved for lords, had sapped his strength. "Damn you, you bastards! If I could see I AHH!"

The four hands on him pushed Edmure flat on his back and then Edmure felt the chains around his legs pulled taut. The chains on his hands were also pulled taut and Edmure found himself spread out like that. A blow landed on his back, causing him to grunt in pain. Another blow slammed into his forehead, causing him to nearly black out. Moments later, he wished he had, as the lashes began to fall, and he screamed.

Near the entrance to the prison cell Joffrey smiled. Mother said I shouldn't kill you, and all the others agreed with it, so I suppose that's correct, but that doesn't mean I can't hurt you for your fathers treason. For now merely a whipping with a cat o' nine tails, be grateful it's only lashes rather than skinning. But if my grandfather keeps running into more problems, well, a prisoner doesn't need the fingers on his sword hand does he? That thought made Joffrey smile even wider, while all around them, the other prisoners woke up to the sounds of torture, and shivered where they lay.

OOOOOO

Despite being much closer to King's Landing than Highgarden, Bitterbridge was still far away from the Riverlands, where war had already begun. For all that however, there was still martial glory to be had. Just ask Loras, who had just unseated his third opponent of the day. After pushing up his faceplate, Loras shook out his shield arm wincing theatrically. "A good try," he said jovially looking down at his opponent across the tilt where the man was groaning as he got to his feet. "If you'd struck a little more center of mass you might've beaten me there my friend!"

The other young man, Emmon Cuy, a nephew of House Cuy's current lord, laughed wheezily and waved him off. With that Loras turned his horse around to head back the way he came, dismounting with ease. He stood there for a time watching the next few matches, including his lover, Renly's. Renly seemed off his form slightly today, putting more strength into his lance thrusts than he should, but he still won his match easily enough.

When Renly joined him at the end of the tilt, Loras looked up at him, one eyebrow raised sardonically. "You seem a little out of sorts my friend, what's wrong?"

"You know damn well what's wrong." Renly said in a low tone, not bothering to dismount. Instead he earthed his lance next to him then pulled off his helmet before looking down at Loras. "Don't tell me you haven't heard the rumors?"

"I have, but you can't let them get to you, especially when it might cost you your next match." Loras replied earnestly.

"Why do you think I entered this tournament in the first place?" Renly replied growling a little. "I had hoped that coming to Bitterbridge plus taking part in this tourney would allow me to fight the rumors, but it hasn't worked."

Loras grimaced, but nodded. News had reached them from House Fell that House Buckler and a few others had declared for Stannis. There was also news of a battle against House Tarth that had completely smashed the force that House had been willing to send to war for Renly. That wasn't good, to say the least.

House Buckler had yet to take offensive action against House Fell, but Fell was no longer willing to send more than a token of its strength to war, and the other Stormlands lords were worried as well. He had received ravens from all the lords who had already gathered at Fawnton, and he had bit the arrowhead and sent orders back to them to send two thousand infantry to bolster Felwood, but ordered the others to remain where they were, preparing to march to the Rose Road to meet the army gathering here at Bitterbridge for the march up to King's Landing.

None of them had been happy about it, yet his promise to cede Bronzegate to the house that performed best in the battles to come had been a large enough carrot. But his power over them was badly eroded by this episode and certain attacks on his personal reputation.

The Queen's version of what had happened in King's Landing had spread like rumors often do, helped along by her ravens. Cersei's version painted the Starks as power-hungry in their attempt to take the throne from the queen, who was holding it as regent for young Joffrey, when their chosen heir, Tommen had died, killed by a third-party. It was hinted that they were doing so as part of a long term scheme cooked up with Targaryen supporters.

That of course didn't matter to Renly, but what that bitch of a lioness's version said about Renly himself did. It painted him as fleeing with his tail between his legs the moment combat was in the offing. It stated she had evidence that Renly had been in on it with the Starks, but the moment it seemed as if it would come to an actual battle in the streets of King's Landing he ran like a whipped cur.

It called into question his basic courage, and that was something no noblemen could stand. Especially not in the Reach, where honor and chivalry and the knightly virtues were seen as close to sacred as oaths sworn in the presence of the Seven. Not for nothing was the Reach known as the home of chivalry.

His friends here knew it wasn't true, and his close allies here and in the Stormlands were willing to ignore it, but those he hadn't befriended and the regular knights were beginning to mutter about his simply waiting here for his full army to gather rather than use the forces already at hand. Some of them obviously felt it might be a sign of his cowardice, but what to do about that was something Renly couldn't figure out.

The two young men's conversation was interrupted as Loras heard his name called for the next bout. Renly watched as his friend won the tilt easily, smashing a knight from House Merryweather out of his saddle with the first pass. Soon after that it was Renly's turn. He too won his match though it took him three passes to defeat his opponent, Ser Horas Redwyne.

The other young man stomped angrily off, muttering under his breath "Hmmpf, even a coward can have some skill in the joust I suppose. It isn't as if his life was on the line after all." That made Renly stiffen, and he gritted his teeth angrily while he wheeled his horse back to the starting point.

So it continued throughout the day, but Horas' words proved to be shared by many. He could see the glances, could see the sneers in all those but his closest friends and allies. It was spreading like a plague through his army.

Endure it, he thought to himself. Endure it while the Reach builds you the largest army in Westeros. With that, I can smash anyone else who tries to stand in my way to the Iron Throne. At that point this will have been forgotten, and all they will remember it is the fact that I won!

He smiled as Loras bowed to him, the winner of the tourney. Renly had reached the semi-finals and then lost to Ser Robar Royce. The second son of that Noble House of the Vale, Robar had travelled to Bitterbridge to pledge his sword to Renly's cause and hopefully win some glory for himself. But Loras had beaten the man in the finals.

"In honor of your victory Ser Loras," Renly intoned. "I name you as captain of my Rainbow Guard! May you serve me with just as much courage and dedication as you have shown here today!"

Loras bowed then took his place at Renly's side while Renly called for all the other young men who had distinguished themselves in the tourney one after another, putting together the rest of his Rainbow Guard. Renly's version of the Kingsguard, they would be his elite force to place against that force, and possibly the wolfsworn he had heard Ranma and others of the Northerners speak of before the events of King's Landing. Each man in it was also assigned a color, to match the rainbow motif, plus connect them directly to the Faith, which held the rainbow as a sacred sign. This was an obvious attempt to gain favor among the pious, but Renly knew it would work anyway, among the smallfolk at least.

That evening, after a drunken feast was held in Loras' honor the two men were walking the grounds of Bitterbridge, discussing ideas on what to do to combat the rumors, when a messenger found them from Lord Caswell. "Your grace, milord" The young man said, gasping a little. Milord Caswell asks you to join him in his study, there is a messenger here with news from the Gold Road."

Renly's eyes narrowed thoughtfully, and he nodded, thanking the man politely. The two of them hurried off, and found their friends as well as Mace and several lords already waiting for them, all that were in Bitterbridge and sober after the party, though only just in a few cases. Randyll was there as well. The only one fully sober, he was pacing back and forth his face a storm cloud.

"What has happened?" Renly asked as he entered, looking at his future father-in-law.

Mace might once have cut a martial figure, with wide shoulders and strong arms in his youth, but he had since turned to fat. His curly brown hair and triangle shaped beard held flecks of gray, showing the man was prematurely aging, helped no doubt by the ale he consumed at every opportunity he could away from his nattering mother. Of late he had soundly rejected his mother's advice, remaining close to Renly where she had said they should distance themselves, and look for other methods of securing the position. In Mace's thinking there was nothing ventured, nothing gained. Certainly backing Renly no longer seemed the certain course, but what did that matter? The reward at the end would still be worth it.

He looked at the messenger, a sharp eyed old man with a scar going down one side of his face and threw his eye on that side. Nonetheless he was wearing decent leather armor, and had a very good bow strapped to his back. "Tell them what you told us."

"Sir, I serve some Lord Shermer as a thief taker. I'm also supposed to look out for any unusual movements along the Gold Road and report. Well sir, there's of force of Westerlands men coming down the Gold Road hell for leather heading straight towards King's Landing as fast as they can go."

"Do you have any idea of the numbers?" Randyll asked quickly. It was obvious he had been merely waiting for Renly to arrive before questioning the messenger as closely as he could.

"Around 6000 or so my Lord." he said shrugging his shoulders. "There is a place along the Gold Road ah like, it's my personal favorite place to hide when I know a thief is tryin' ta get away that way." He smirked a little. "They never suspect it, since the tree looks darn near unclimbable, and the bottom's covered with poison vine. Anyway," he went on more seriously "I'm good at counting, and I'd say at least 6000."

"Their disposition?" Randyll barked.

At the man's blank look Randyll scowled but Renly spoke up before he could. "What my lord Tarly means is could you tell us what kind of men made up this force?"

That I can't rightly say." The man said with a shrug. "I only saw about a score o' men with bows, and the whole force were on horseback. But most of them didn't look none like knights or really trained cavalry. One or two of them looked about as comfortable in a saddle as a sack a wheat'd. But they had a lot of horses, two for every man."

"Most likely infantry placed in the saddle then," Randyll mused. "It's an old but good trick that lets you move your infantry as fast as a cavalry unit. Could you estimate how many men, as you put it looked like sacks of wheat in the saddle?"

The man shook his head. "Nay, milord, that I couldn't, not real like. I couldn't make out their expressions or anything like that for the most parts anyway, but I would say..." he paused thoughtfully. "I would say maybe a 1000 of 'em was real cavalry. Their armor was better ya see, and a few had heavier lookin' plate. Plus they all had lances."

Renly frowned tapping his thigh thoughtfully. 6000 more men on the walls of King's Landing would be a problem, but not an insurmountable one. Plus 6000 more mouths to feed would simply hasten the fall of the city anyway, since Renly knew that the more they felt the sting of starvations, the more the smallfolk would make problems for the royals and their backers.

He was about to say that aloud when Loras leaned in. "This is your chance!" Loras whispered.

Renly turned to him and Loras went on. "We ride out here with the army already gathered here to block that force from getting to King's Landing. With you at our ahead and if we fight well that can banish the coward label you've been laboring under." Loras too had been lambasted in the Queen's version of events in King's Landing, but few in the Reach truly believed that of the Knight of Roses.

Still, that didn't mean that his advice was wrong, and Renly nodded. We've already gathered a force of 18,000 cavalry and 14,000 mixed infantry here. But I'll need to command the force we send on my own, not with Randyll or anyone else there to take away from the glory. It needs to be seen as my victory and mine alone. "I think," Renly said instead. "That we have an opportunity here."

OOOOOO

Lord Rupert Serret was a wily old man of Tywin's generation who while on the short side was nearly as broad across the shoulders and was known to use a massive bladed axe as his personal weapon. He wasn't as well-versed in warfare as Tywin, but was no slouch either having fought in the Ninepenny King's war. And unlike most noblemen, he was also more of an infantry commander, since he had led a force of infantry in that war and knew well their strengths and weaknesses. He also knew the value of good intelligence, and had a large force of scouts probing ahead and to the sides of his force at all times while he marched his forces as quickly as possible down the Gold Road.

They were nearly to the first crossing of Blackwater Rush when his scouts reported sighting the massive army of the Reach closing in on them from the front right flank. "And you say the army you spotted is entirely made up of cavalry? And not like our own, infantry simply thrust into the saddle?"

"Positive my Lord." one of the scouts said a young man missing an ear. But there was nothing wrong with his eyes or his mind. "All of them heavy horse, with a smattering of light out in front as scouts, a bare dozen I think spread out all along their front. They're not movin' quick, their horses will be well rested by the time they catch up with us."

"How many days until we reached the bridge across the Blackwater?" Rupert asked another scout, an older man who doubled as his scout commander.

"I'd say about two days or so my Lord, but they'll find us by tomorrow."

"I don't think we can stop them from catching us." Lord Serret mused scratching at the stubble on his face for moment. "No, we'll have to give them something else to chase instead."

OOOOOO

According to the scouts estimates Renly and his men were barely an hour away now from catching sight of the Westerlands force. Renly was feeling all the usual feelings of a young man before his first battle: fear, nervousness, a desire to get it over with and apprehension that he wouldn't do as well as he hoped.

He mastered that all however with a confident air as he rode at the center of his cavalry, having taken ten thousand of the heavy cavalry already gathered at Bitterbridge with him. With that many knights they would be able to smash the Westerlands force even if they tried to stop and fort up somewhere, which would be impossible on the Gold Road in any event. So long as they caught them before the Blackwater crossing the Lannisters would simply be hammered under.

The idea that an infantry unit could stand up against cavalry never even entered his mind, and though Renly knew enemy would have spotted them coming and made their own plans, he knew any plans would fail when matched against his heavier force.

The front of the Army began to ride up a small grassy knoll which would allow them to look down onto the gold road to see their enemies on the march. Suddenly the clamor of battle arose and bugles sounded the alarm from the front of the column.

"What's happening?!" Renly barked, standing up in his stirrups to get a better view. "My spyglass!" When the object was handed to him by his banner carrier he focused on the front of his army. There he saw hundreds of light cavalry dueling with his own, with his heavy cavalry already moving in to assist.

"It's a holding tactic." He said barking it out. "Split the army into three, the ones already engaged will hold that cavalry there, the rest of us will split in two and go around them to attack the main force." That was easier to do than say however. Everyone in the army tried to rush forward at once, eager to get in on the kill of this small force. Then more cavalry came up, snarling the entirety of his frontline.

"Stranger damn it!" Renly growled, pulling his face guard down and readying his lance. "We'll have to push them out of the way then. Rainbow Guard with me!"

With Loras at his side Renly barreled forward, the rest of his cavalry making way for them automatically then forming up behind him. The Rainbow Guard hit the ensnared light and heavy cavalry like a hammer, bowling over some of the light cavalry, actually knocking their lighter horses to the ground, while their lances, skewered horse and rider indiscriminately.

Renly himself skewered one man, and nearly froze as he saw the blood flowing from the wound before his training took over and he let go of his lance. Grabbing out his broadsword Renly whirled around, barely blocking a blow from east from an enemy's lighter sword, before his return stroke smashed the man out of his saddle. He killed one more man, taking a blow to his shield in turned which set his arm to ringing when suddenly there was a noise of bugles in the air.

Another force, this time of a hundred a hundred heavy cavalry slammed into the flank of his army, leading hundreds of unsaddled horses into his formation, disorganizing a his army further. They were soon enveloped however by the rest of his cavalry, having gone too deep into his formation to get away.

The light cavalry on the other hand hadn't tried to penetrate his force so much as shave a bit of the front and were now breaking off. "After them!" Renly shouted, forgetting for a moment that there was anything else but the retreating light cavalry in this battle. Disorganized and slightly rattled by the wild horses still running amok in their own formation, none of the other commanders with him, all young men like himself eager to prove themselves, realized it either.

By the time Renly regained his senses, all of his army had started to chase off after the light cavalry. They eventually rode them to ground, but it took the rest of the day to that then reform the army.

Looking up at the sky from cleaning his sword Renly saw that it was nearly night, and shook his head angrily. "They bought themselves another day!" he said looking around at his Rainbow Guard and the other commanders. "One day more, but that won't save them in the end. We'll run them to ground first thing tomorrow morning!"

That won him a cheer from all the men around him.

It didn't quite work out that way however. The infantry kept marching on through the night, putting more distance between them and the larger Reach force. The Reach cavalry still caught up to them, but just as the last of the infantry crossed the bridge over the Blackwater.

Once the last infantrymen were across, torches were thrown down along the bridge, along with dozens of ale-skins and even several gathered bushels of hay from the nearby farmland. The bridge was huge, old and its base was made of stone rather than wood, but the wood that made on it was dry, and the fire caught easily.

With that act Lord Serret was free to continue down to King's Landing now unmolested. He had lost his entire cavalry force, having sent them to harry the larger Reach force and then break away. Those had been their orders anyway, though Rupert knew when giving them that it wouldn't work out that way, indeed he had counted on it. Thankfully for the rest of his men he was right. Those two thousand men had died, but the four thousand and two hundred infantry with him were saved.

Technically it was a win, Renly thought as he stared across the bridge at the retreating infantry lines, what could be seen through smoke of the fire on the bridge anyway. Below in the river hundreds of men had formed a chain and were using their helmets to throw water up onto the fire. Even if they put it out however, Renly wasn't about to trust the integrity of the bridge after that conflagration.

"I had really hoped we could ride the entire force to ground. Those light cavalry were but a decoy apparently."

His friends all around him nodded but Loras shrugged. "So we'll follow them across when the fires put out. They can't honestly expect this to stop our pursuit can they? And once we catch up we'll ride over them just as easily as we did their light cavalry."

"You assume the bridge will be able to hold our weight." Renly said pessimistically. "I remember this bridge; the causeway was destroyed a few years ago by a lightning strike and the crown billed for its repair since it is part of the royal road network. I don't think that the fire will have done any less damage. No, we won a battle, now it's time for us to win the war."

Loras and the rest of the Rainbow Guard looked at him and Renly smiled. "Send a message to Bitterbridge and Fawnton. Tell them to march to meet us at the Kingsroad. We'll march from here along Blackwater Rush to meet them. We'll besiege King's Landing."

At some of the quizzical expressions he laughed. "We don't have enough men to take it until the second echelon from the Reach arrives from Highgarden, but we do have enough men to besiege it which might be just as good. I bet my cold fish of a brother is already blockading the port, we can use that to our advantage. We'll block delivery even of the foodstuffs from the Crownlands while we wait for the main force, then attack the city once we see it's weak, and force my brother to come to the bargaining table at the same time. Even if the Lannister force already in the Riverlands turns down to us, that small a force won't matter in the open field against our knights, and we will win the war within a year!"

That caused all the men around him to cheer, and soon enough the army was on the move once more, while a trio of ravens winged their way toward their target castles.

OOOOOO

About a week into the march from castle Cerwyn the army had made camp for the night. After spending two hours practicing with Arya and the other wolfsworn, Ranma entered his tent, shaking his head slightly. While their meditation and ki manipulation exercises were proceeding apace, none of them would ever be as fast as Jon or Ranma. In fact even Ranma wasn't as fast in this life as he had been in his fast life.

Oh, he still was able to use a move he could call the Amiguriken in his head, but sustaining it? No, that took far too much ki, much like most of the actual ki attacks Ranma had learned. He could armor his body and speed it up, but not both for very long. And if he tried to use the Amiguriken without armoring his hands and arms against it, the very air began to feel as if he was hitting concrete, and his skin began to blister like he had thrust his hands into a fire.

Still, Ranma persisted training them, and now Daenerys and Merry at least a little, who at Ranma's insistence had joined them. Though she showed no aptitude for the physical side of things, Myrcella had taken to the meditation like a duck to water unlike Daenerys, who had major troubles with that aspect. Seeking the void just did not work for Daenerys at all, forcing Ranma to change the meditation method he was teaching her.

But Ranma was determined to get her up to snuff eventually, if only because building up ki would directly impact how long Daenerys could expect to live. Ranma in no way wanted to outlive his wife or friends, so was determined they would all learn as much as possible about using and building up their ki.

He reached down, touching a small bundle that Sansa had given Dacey to pass on to him. She had forgotten it among her own gear for a time, but finally remembered it that evening. He opened it looking inside and pulling out the contents, a banner that Sansa had made for them to signify his union with Daenerys. Once laid out on the ground of his tent he could see the design on it, and smiled. Attached to the edge of it was a small note, which he pulled off and read.

Daenerys came into his tent several moments later in search of Ranma to tell him the evening meal was ready. She stopped and stared at the banner, shaking her head. "Is that what Sansa gave Dacey to pass on to you? I am constantly astonished by your sister's ability with needle and thread, to create that in the time we were in Winterfell, that's amazing."

"Yeah, she's always been good at that, but what she wrote to me was surprising, and reminded me of something I had started to forget." Ranma replied, still staring down thoughtfully at the message in his hand.

"oh, what's that?"

"She wrote to me asking that we show mercy on the queen when we reach King's Landing. I liked that, that my sister shows such confidence in us." Ranma chuckled quietly still not looking up. "But she asks for mercy for Cersei because in the time after Tommen died, the two of them had become close. She writes 'even with all that happened Ranma, I can't forget how kind she was, how she mourned for Tommen. While that does not change any of her actions before or since, I ask you to show mercy for my sake.' It reminded me that not all the Lannisters should be lumped in with Joffrey or even Tywin."

"They're Lannister!" Daenerys growled, sounding very much like her little ones at that moment. "They're all child killing, raping bastards! You agreed with me before that they need to be wiped out, don't tell me that just because the chief traitress had cozened up to Sansa you're going to let her live?"

Now Ranma looked at Daenerys, his eyes blue ice to her fiery violet ones. "They aren't all like that. Tywin might have ordered the killing, and he certainly doesn't care about the rest, but even Tywin isn't himself a rapist. Nor did I ever say Cersei would not pay for her crimes, though I haven't decided on the type of punishment just yet."

"That doesn't matter, he was still the one who ordered it, and it was his family that profited the most! And if the queen hadn't committed treason neither of us would be here! They must be removed from power when we win, or else somewhere down the line the Lannisters will rise up again in response to our victory, they are that vindictive and hateful."

"True on all accounts, and I am not going back on what I said, the Lannister's will be removed from all positions of authority, their lands sized and redistributed. But I won't allow my hate to govern my actions, I won't paint the entire family with a single brush that's not honorable, or just! After all, there are people out there who will put you and Viserys in the same category because of the actions of your father. Would you paint Merry in the same light as the man who employed the Mountain?"

Daenerys' violet eyes widened in rage at her family being compared to the Lannisters, but the last sentence made her anger drain away from her. She closed her eyes for several moments and when she spoke, it was almost in a whisper. "I've spent my whole life being taught to hate the Starks, the Baratheons and Lannisters all equally, to look down on even the Tyrells for not being there to defend their liege lords at our time of need. Everything was so easy, so straightforward then, my family was in the right, and everyone else was in the wrong, we were the Royal family, whatever my father might have done he was the king. Taking back our throne and punishing them for their betrayal was justice."

"But, but it isn't that simple, it never was, just my perception. First Domic told me to my face what the old king had done, and worse I read and found out more on my own, forever changing how I viewed my own father, and my family as a whole. Helped admittedly, by seeing Viserys falling into the same madness."

Her lips quirked in wry bitterness at the thought, but she went on regardless, wanting to get this all out now, much like pulling out a bad tooth. "And then I learned more about why your family rebelled, I could no longer blame your family for their actions at that point. And then, then at my lowest point, when all hope seemed lost, I met you. The starks changed from first enemy then to neutral party, then, in you valued allies and now family."

Ranma reached out, touching her cheek tenderly, smiling now. "And then you met Merry."

Daenerys leaned into his touch slightly, sighing now. "Merry, yes. I was so prepared to hate her, and she looks so Lannister! But there were so many parallels between her current circumstances and mine, and we bonded over murderous brothers and she was good with my little ones and so young and innocent in many ways, I could not look at her and see the ravaging, raping monster that all Lannisters were supposed to be." They were even connected by their feelings for Ranma, though she wasn't going to say it.

"But it is so hard to let go of my hate." She said, her voice even softer. "Yet you're right, we can't afford to let mindless hate color our actions. I broke away from Viserys not just because of his plans for me, which wouldn't have worked as he thought in any event, but because knew he would be a disaster of the first order on the throne. I, I cannot fully remove my feelings from my thoughts of the Lannisters, but I will not let them rule me."

Ranma smiled, pulling Daenerys into a hug. "It's ok Dae, if you ever start to go down that road I promise I'll be here to pull you back. So long as ya promise to do the same for me?"

He did not ask that to make Daenerys feel better. No, Ranma knew he had dark places in his soul, and a rage that could burn as cold as the winter winds. He knew he would lose it if he ever came upon a village after an invading army came through. The stories of rapine Eddard had once shared with him about Robert's Rebellion had filled Ranma's heart with fury, and once he loosed it, Ranma knew he would have trouble reining it in.

"I promise, my love." Daenerys said, leaning in. Their first real argument having ended, the two kissed for a time until Cley came with food of the two of them from the evening's fires.

OOOOOO

Margaery had remained behind in Highgarden when Renly rode out. This was because she and her grandmother had maneuvered Renly to declare that no marriage between the two of them would happen until he sat on the Iron Throne. It had been an incredibly astute move, though Mace had been furious about it. He seemed to think that the moment Renly and Margaery were wed that their future as part of the royal family of Westeros was secure. Margaery had never thought that way, and Olenna, who had at one point let herself be seduced by that thought, was now back in control of her faculties.

She, her grandmother and Willas were now meeting with Garlan, the second eldest of the Tyrell siblings. He was a belted and well respected knight, though not as well known as Loras since Garlan did not seek glory like his younger brother, eschewing the tourney for his own training. Already married, he spent most of his time at Cider Hall with his wife. At this moment they were discussing the latest news to reach them from all sources.

Olenna threw down a raven message from Lord Tarly who had sent it back upon receiving a message from Renly. "So, the idiot 'king' won himself a victory of sorts. It might be enough to combat the rumors about his personal cowardice for now I suppose." she drawled skeptically.

"For my part the news from the other side of the passes are more worrisome." Garlan said shaking his head. He had squired under Lord Randyll when he was younger, and considered himself at least half a march-man because of that. "I would've thought the Prince of Dorne would have been more cautious, but evidently his brother has a bigger influence on him than that." The news that Prince Doran had put Oberyn into prison had not reached the Reach, and the Marcher lords had a long memory. "Still, with half their forces at home the Dornish Marche Lords are well prepared for any invasion from that direction."

"Bah, that's merely saber rattling, nothing more." Olenna said shaking her head. "That army down there will march back and forth, up and down the passes but never come close to actually attacking. They know the Marcher Lords would slaughter their troops if they took the offensive."

"I agree if my friend Oberyn isn't in charge. If he is, all bets are off." Willas said. He smiled, amused as even Margaery looked uncomfortable at his mention of his friendship with Oberyn. Not only were Martell and Tyrell old enemies, but Oberyn had been the one to cripple Willas in a tourney years ago. Their friendship had been surprising, but deep for all of that.

After a moment he went on, his smile fading. "For my part I am more worried about news from Goldengrove and the western border. I think I should take a force out there to track and destroy these mercenaries that are causing so much carnage. House Rowan already sent their lord and most of their forces to Bitterbridge, they lack the manpower to run these reavers to ground by themselves."

Margaery and Olenna both looked shocked at that. Willas shrugged. "Who else? Besides, I may be the oldest but I am also the least tried, according to popular rumor, at combat. That needs to change. Just because my leg is lame doesn't mean I can't lead, and that wound did nothing to my sword arm. Besides which, Garlan was already selected to lead the men here up to meet the rest of the army for Renly's grand scheme." His amusement was rather withering at those last few words.

"No." said Olenna firmly. "I'll not send you out like that. I have another task for you."

In one wrinkled old hand she held up another missive, this one from another of her spies in the Crownlands. He was an itinerant tinker, who always traveled all over the place searching for business. This made him one of her better informers if a little intermittent in when he could send off messages. "One of the informers of our house in the Crownlands has passed on the fact that the Targaryens have returned!"

She looked over at Margaery, who like the two men had sat up abruptly. "Most specifically the Stormborn girl. The agent talked to a few sailors from the ship that brought her and the Stark boy back, they all said they were quite close. And that she brought two young dragons with her!"

Garlan was the first to respond, slumping forward and placing his face in his hands. "It just goes from bad to worse! How fast do dragons grow anyway?"

Rubbing his own face wearily, Willas shook his head. "I've actually studied dragons a time or two, purely for interest they are fascinating animals you understand. It will be around two years before they are capable of carrying a rider for any appreciable length of time. But every month that goes past they will be able to fly a little further alone. Unfortunately I have no idea how long it would take for them to start breathing fire, though I don't think they would be able to until at least their first year, to breathe any appreciable size of flame at any rate. But I agree with my brother, this is... bad."

"Could we..." Garlan asked looking at his grandmother. "Could we arrange for an... 'accident' to occur to Renly? With him gone we could say we had been led astray by wrong counsel? Our House was after all known to be loyal to the Targaryens during the War of the Usurper."

"No." Willas said shaking his head. "The Starks believe in honor, if we throw over Renly now, what will that say of us? That we can't go the distance, much as we did it in the last war? Oh, father makes a big act about how he was the only general the Targaryen had that won battles against Robert Baratheon, but what did that do, simply take him out of position to be of any use whatsoever when the Starks, Tullys, Lannisters and Baratheons came calling on King's Landing."

"No, if Renly dies of natural causes or in battle that is one thing, but if he dies mysteriously..." Willas shook his head. "Margaery's right, we should never have pulled her out of King's Landing, now we must make a good enough showing to show how we could hurt them if they don't make peace with us."

Olenna frowned at that, but knew that Willas had a point. Besides, she thought to herself, poisons don't have to be used on people alone after all. Olenna personally held no loyalty to House Targaryen. She only had loyalty to her own family and keeping them safe and powerful.

Margaery shook her head, having recovered from her own shock. In truth, she couldn't blame Ranma or this Stormborn girl for getting close as it were, no matter how much that pained her to admit. She had been pulled out of King's Landing, and while their friendship was strong, neither of them had allowed any attraction to grow between them, Ranma because of his desire to keep Margaery at arm's length, and Margaery because of her parents orders to also play for the brat who now sat on the throne.

"Send me." she said aloud. "Ranma will listen to me, even if he and the Targaryen girl have become close." she did notice how she spat out those words, "he'll still listen to me at least politically. And despite Loras not backing his father, he won't have much of a problem with me or our family. Not yet anyway, so we can safely ally with the North and the Targaryens now, regardless of what Willas says."

"Mace will never go for it, not yet." Olenna said shaking her head. She was frankly becoming very unhappy about her family being close to the target of so many people's ambitions, but they couldn't get out of it! Not with Mace and his ego in the way, as well as their current agreement with Renly. That didn't even consider Loras and his relationship with the Baratheon boy.

"No." Olenna went on firmly. "I'm not sending you to the Starks Margaery that would serve no purpose at all even if you could reach them from here. Unless it slipped your mind, the Riverlands are a war zone right now. Plus Stannis has declared his intention to become king, which means you couldn't go by sea either, unless you think you should go around Dorne and the Westerlands?"

Margaery scowled, conceding the point. The conversation continued from there, but none of them really had any good idea of what to do from here on other than to continue to keep their options open.

As her grandchildren left, Olenna pulled out two more raven messages, placing them on the table in front of her. If the dragon girl has already descended into her family's fire-madness, steps must be taken. And even if she hasn't she might blame the Reach for not being there to defend her father and seek to take vengeance because of it.

She paused at that thought, then shook her head. No, I helped get my family into this cleft point by jumping in without enough information once already. I need to wait until we hear more about the Stormborn girl before taking any precipitous action.

Beyond the girl's character and intentions towards my family there are two questions we need to answer before even trying to plan out a course of action. First, how will the rest of Westeros react to the dragons return, specifically the other noble families of the Reach? And second, if the Targaryen girl returned with two dragons and the Stark boy's aid, what happened to her older brother? As oldest, he would be the one to be seen as the legitimate heir of that family. Until we know those answers as Willas said our best bet in many ways is to continue to sail the present course. Besides, it isn't as if we have welded ourselves to Renly irrevocably, nor are we lacking in alternatives.

Rubbing at her nose wearily she set the two missives aside for now. Groaning a little she lifted herself out of her chair and made her way to her bed for the evening. As she left, the firelight caught the fire, allowing the sigils on both to be seen. On one was a fire edged heart with a stag's head over a crown, the sigil of House Baratheon of Dragonstone. On the other was the lion sigil of House Lannister.

OOOOOO

Later that evening, Margaery laid in bed staring up the ceiling. I hate being on the sidelines like this! In King's Landing at least I could affect some things, and it didn't take a disaster to make Ranma listen to me like it did my grandmother! By the Mother, my father still isn't willing to listen to me!

For just a moment the thought of Ranma flowed through her head, his blue eyes, happy smile and joking manner, and his serious air when training Tommen, and his fury when he tore the Mountain that Rode to pieces. Then the image changed to Ranma standing beside a platinum haired violet eyed young woman of indeterminate features. She scowled shaking her head to banish the image. She couldn't banish the thoughts however, nor the fear that it would be a while before she could once again act to truly influence matters.

The next day Willas left Highgarden over his grandmother's objections. He led a force of a thousand light cavalry, five hundred archers, six hundred infantry and two hundred heavy cavalry taken from the Tyrell forces gathered here in Highgarden. After bidding his family farewell, Willas turned then rode to the head of the column, his face grim. His objective was to hunt down the mercenaries wreaking havoc over the western edge of the Reach. And maybe, just maybe, he thought to himself, a bit more than that if the opportunity presented itself.

OOOOOO

It took the northern army two and a half weeks to cover the distance between Castle Cerwyn and Moat Cailin. It was an amazing time for an army of their size covering that distance, and it had only been made possible because of the way they set the pace plus the fact that their supplies all came with them, keeping their need to stop to forage for food to a minimum. To aid in this the wolfsworn went forward every day to prepare the campsite for the evening and hunt up some meat to add to the stores. This kept the army's morale up and physically moving at a brisk clip despite spending so much time every evening exercising and, in the case of the pikemen, drilling in formation.

The wolfsworn too had been training. Ranma was happy to see that all of them had shown at least a little bit of being able to use ki, though Daenerys and Myrcella were lagging far behind of course. The only ones who could not strengthen their blades with ki for at least a few moments were Dacey, Roger and Smalljon, whose chosen weapons were much larger than the others, which probably explained it. Despite that, Ranma was pleased with their progress.

As they arrived Jon and Ranma were at the head of the column. Jon smirked, seeing several dozen carts full of goods waiting for them. "I see Lady Dustin has gotten over her funk, at least enough to keep that 'lady' in front of her name." he quipped.

"So far, though you, Domic and your factors should go over it. Make certain that everything we ordered is there." Ranma had been rather irritated with the woman not showing up for the war council and had jumped at Daenerys' suggestion there. Honestly Ranma had been looking for an excuse to remove her and place a more favored House in charge of Barrowton. A town like that was a major resource to any house, and Dustin was wasting it at this point, simply happy to live on with her anger and angst alone. Still he wouldn't remove her until she gave him good cause.

"Look who else is here?" Ranma said pointing to the side. Meera stood there, her trident sticking in the ground next to her and her bow on her back. Ranma ran up to her, as did Jon and they took turns pulling her into a hug laughing as she tried to beat at their shoulders to let her go. "Hey little Meera," Ranma said laughing as he set her down. "How are you, and where's your father? I'd expected him to be here. Not that I'm unhappy to see you, or the work done on the Moat though."

Indeed that was an understatement. Moat Cailin would never again be the massive fortress it had once been, before the land shifted and the Neck came in, but the tower and wall that had been repaired removed its one glaring weakness, that it was open to assault from behind and from the Fever River. Now the largest of the towers stood repaired, with a ballista on top and room for at least a hundred archers on the roof alone. Any one tower of the Moat would be a difficult proposition for an invading army to destroy or bypass. All three of them combined would be impossible, especially with the Crannogmen on the side of the defenders.

"My father's out with our scouts." She replied pushing Jon away breaking their familial hug her grin at the Stark boys' antics disappearing. "You see..." From there Meera went on to explain what the Freys had been up to and their houses.

Through it all Ranma frowned while the rest of the army arrived behind them. Daenerys and the rest of the command group arrived soon after, peeling off to join them save for Domic and a few other lieutenants who took charge of getting the army situated for the night. Travel through the Neck would be tough since Ranma wanted to move quickly enough so that the men wouldn't come down with any of the local diseases, at least not any of the worse ones. But that would mean sending them forward in small lots so they didn't get bogged up in any one area. It'd taken the Kings party two weeks to cross the neck. Ranma intended to do it in a third of the time.

Arya interrupted proceedings by pulling Meera into a hug of her own as soon as she saw her. "Finally, another tomboy! Save me from the girly talk!" She glared at Daenerys who was laughing at her. In truth the conversations most nights between the girls hadn't truly been all that 'girly' most of the time, but the few times it was had obviously been enough for Arya.

She turned to look at Ranma, not realizing her hold on Meera. "She's coming with us." Arya stated firmly. "I'll share a tent with her from now on, I refuse to listen to one more discussion about heraldry, what different cloth costs or anything about Daenerys and my brother's relationship!"

Daenerys flushed slightly at that while Meera looked a little interested before wiping the look of her face when Arya turned to look at her. Ranma however simply shrugged. "I'd been planning to ask you to join us anyway Meera. Great-uncle Brynden could use a second in command of the scouts, and you're one of the best I know of for that.

"You mean it?" Meera asked, her eyes shining. While she would never think to offend her home, Meera had long wanted to see other lands, and going south with the army would let her do that. Plus, she might eventually join the wolfsworn itself.

To one side of the conversation Rickard scowled at the idea of another young woman joining them, but he knew better by now than to object. Arya thumping him twice when he joined the wolfsworn in their exercise had a lot to do with that, as did the fact Daenerys almost did the same despite having only been trained with Ranma intermittently since they meet.

"Yep, I'll need to clear it with your father first of course. For now though, keep going with the news about this blocking force in our way."

After listening to what was going on, Daenerys frowned. "They're just sitting there, just to make a point? If the Freys are really that powerful, should we try to make a deal with them? They control a very strategic position that we could use, one we must deny to our enemies."

"No." Ranma said shaking his head firmly. "The Freys have never proven to be trustworthy or even good allies. Late Lord Frey is what the old man is known as further south, because he never joins any war except at the very end when it's time to divvy up the spoils. He did it for the War of the Usurper, he did it for the Ironborn Rebellion, and even for the Ninepenny Kings War. That's especially damning since the Ironborn attacked Seagard and the Cape of Eagles, which given its position House Frey should have been quick to reinforce. They never did."

"All that means is that his strength has never been diluted before." Daenerys argued back. "Besides, this force is sitting right in our path. They've had weeks to build up that defensive position, they could plead our army badly if we decide to fight them."

"I think we should send a small force forward to talk to these Freys and see what they might want in exchange for their help. Depending on who is in charge we might learn more about the house's intentions." Domic said diplomatically, coming up behind them both "Agreed." Ranma said nodding his head. "Myself Jon and the rest of the wolfsworn. Daenerys, you'll stay here. I don't want news of your dragons to get out just yet if we can help it."

Daenerys frowned, not having much faith in Ranma's diplomatic skills, but she nodded. It wasn't as if she could leave her draklings here after all. Oh, Myrcella and Jon were decent enough with them. Cley too had proven helpful, the draklings apparently willing to let young children near them where they would not adults. How much of that had to do with their natural temperament or Fenris' lying nearby his golden eyes piercing both of them Daenerys didn't know. Jon on the other hand seemed to connect with them almost as well as Bran.

But none of them could really control her little ones. At least not without Jon warging with them, which was unproven at this point. Nor would Daenerys allow that except under dire circumstances. It wasn't proven just yet if an animal could bond with more than one human after all, and Daenerys didn't want to let anyone else bond with her children. Befriend yes, bond no. That was selfish of her, and a weakness, but Daenerys couldn't help it.

OOOOOO

The next morning Ranma and the wolfsworn raced ahead of the army. Each of the wolfsworn on horseback taking three each with them so that they could keep up with the wolves as they entered that ground devouring lope of theirs with Jon, Ranma and even Arya racing along with them. Admittedly Arya had to rest once a day on Nymeria's back, but it was still an impressive feat. They crossed the neck in four days, an amazing time but one that had most of their horses lathered.

Ranma took one look at the horses and looked at Roger, Dacey, Daryn and Smalljon. "You lot stay here, hide yourselves back at that last campsite. Jon, Arya and I will go on."

"Are you sure you should take Arya?" Roger asked dubiously.

"Are you sure you can stop me?" Arya asked looking up at him challengingly. Despite having grown another inch since this march began Arya was still the shortest one there by a considerable margin. Unless you counted Daenerys or Myrcella, then she was still shorter than the former, but a little taller than the latter.

"Thought not." Ranma laughed, ruffling his sister's short, choppy cut hair for a moment before pulling himself up onto Fenris back. The wolf shifted a little irritably, and Ranma moved forward slightly which caused him to calm down. "Let's go make an impression."

The three Starks road forward on their direwolves, and Ranma was pleased to see that they were indeed making the correct impression on the Freys behind their barricades. He was also pleased to see that said barricades were not nearly as well constructed as they should have been given the amount of time that the Frey men had been here. Which shows that House Frey really is trying to play both sides here, he thought to himself. Stupid, very stupid, since I doubt Tywin Lannister is any more forgiving of betrayal than I am, at least when someone is betraying him at any rate.

After a moment while the Frey men ran around and shouted, the three of them continued on, with Jon carrying a flag of peace while Arya held up the Stark banner, a gray direwolf on the black background. Just out of bow range they stopped, waiting. After a moment four men rode out, though their horses were visibly nervous around the huge predators. It'd taken nearly the entire march for the horses of the northern army to get used to them, so that was fair at least. Two of them rode forward under the banner of House Haigh, a knightly House that was known to be sworn to House Frey, and the one whose men Meera had told them had been the ones causing trouble.

The other two were both Freys, wearing their colors. The one in the lead was of medium height and looked wiry, with dark black eyes and a thin, arrogant smile on his face. The other was a fat man, older than the first, who looked as if he had... well Ranma thought he looked like he was OD'ing on something or just plain stupid. That man and one of the Haigh men stopped several horse-lengths back, while the other two kept coming.

The conversation got to that off to a bad start as soon as the men stopped their horses within speaking distance. "I am Black Walder of House Frey and I speak for my house and its allies." Black Walder turned to Arya, leering at her suggestively. "And is this supposed to be your offering for safe passage? I hope she cleans up better than she looks right now."

Arya proved Ranma proud with her response. Instead of doing anything she simply smiled back, her eyes like chips of stone so cold that the man actually flinched away for a moment. "You looked much more intelligent with your mouth closed, I think you'd look even better with your head separated from the rest of you."

"Enough." Ranma said smiling internally. "We came out here to actually talk, not exchange insults. "Why do you block our path? For that matter, I see..." he paused ostentatiously to count the men in the small defensive formation in front of them. "Something like, what, a thousand five hundred men here? Why aren't these men down south where they could be of use against the Lannister army?"

"But Lord Tully did not send any such message to us, all we heard was that Ser Edmure might be wanted for treason. The same as your father I believe." Black Walder went on ignoring how all three Starks eyes had turned dangerous at that. "Nonetheless, due to the number of different stories coming out of King's Landing, my great-grandfather Lord Walder Frey has decided to take a neutral stance in regards to this conflict at this time. My great-grandfather wishes to speak to you in person, to hear your insights on what really occurred to spark this conflict." Despite the words the man obviously didn't care about the truth of what had happened, his tone and rote words said as much, though his eyes were calculating as they watched Ranma.

"In other words." Jon murmured. "Your lord wants to see if we can match or exceed whatever the Lannister's promised you?"

"Exactly." Black Walder smirked. "If you can offer us something more real or tangible than the promises of the Lannisters, my family will join you. That'll add another four thousand men give or take to your army."

Ranma cocked his head staring at the other man, then asked bluntly. "And if I had proof that it was the Lannisters who committed treason first? And that your Lord Paramount's heir is being held as a hostage against his father's good conduct? Would that matter?"

"It might have mattered to my grandfather Stevron." Black Walder said with a shrug. "He had a bit of an accident a few weeks ago though, and that didn't leave many Tully supporters among us." The fact that Black Walder had helped create that accident wasn't about to be something he would share. Despite being the firstborn son, Stevron Frey had been sort of a disappointment to Old Walder, never showing the proper amount of ruthlessness that Old Walder prized so much and his children. His male ones anyway.

"I see. Would you recognize Lord Tully's handwriting by any chance?" Ranma asked almost lightly but his eyes were sharp as they gazed at the other man. One hand however tapped his thigh, a finger point past the Frey delegation. Jon saw this, and used the same signal to pass the silent message on to Arya on his other side.

"Not at all, and anything that the Old Fish wrote wouldn't change my mind anyway."

"Thought not. Well here are some thoughts for you, Black Walder. My grandfather has appointed me his voice, his deputy until Edmure is returned to him." Ranma said sternly. "As such I command you to move out of the way immediately. You may join my forces or not, I care not and need your men not. But you are standing in my way of protecting the Riverlands from the Lannister's, of going to my grandfather aid and seeking justice for the Lannister's treason. Remain here, and you will be treated as just another enemy."

Black Walder fingered his sword, smirking insolently at Ranma. "If that's your final word on it, that's fine. You go ahead and bring up your army boy, will see how many of you can die here."

"Against your rabble, be serious." Jon said scoffing and spitting and one side.

"The Freys haven't even fought in any of the last few wars." Arya piped up staring past Black Walder at the line of defenders. "You sure your men even know which way to point their spears?"

"You." Black Walder said his anger rising to the fore with its usual ease. "I'll save you for last girl. My men and I will have some fun with you."

"Your guts will look very pretty on the ground, I'll be sure to put them there personally." Arya said, her eyes glittering.

"We're done here." Ranma said turning away. At a mental command to Fenris he leaped forward, followed by his pack mates away from the former position. It was well they had, because as soon as Ranma had said that Walder had raised his hand in the air, and a dozen archers had fired at where the three Starks had been, having moved up during the talks using what little cover there was. There hadn't been enough however, and Ranma had seen them in time to signal his siblings.

Jon quickly ducked under one of the arrows that flew past where his head had been, while Ranma plucked another arrow out of the air right before it would strike Nymeria in the side. "Run!" Ranma barked. At this distance only Ranma would survive to get in close range with those archers, and that was unacceptable. Better to retreat for now.

More arrows flew after them as the rest of the Frey archers moved up to join their fellows, but the three wolves were already moving faster than the archers could track, dodging this way and that randomly. Soon they were out of bow range heading into the Neck up the Kingsroad once more. About twenty minutes later they came upon their friends, all of them resting on the ground of the small campsite, their horses tied up for the day and still looking knackered. Daryn saw them first and smiled grimly. "I take it diplomacy failed?"

"If we wanted diplomacy to work we should've brought a diplomat." Ranma said shrugging his shoulders. "And so should they."

"They sent Black Walder of all people!" Jon said shrugging his shoulders. "Great uncle Brynden said he was one of the worst of the lot. He hinted at the fact that the only one Brynden and Domeric said was anything, Stevron, was killed recently in an, an inter-family power grab I'd guess. If that's the case, the Freys have lost the one voice that had any sense of honor among them."

"Black Walder, really?" asked Roger. He and Hathan exchanged glances then shook their heads in unison. "That man's a rapist and a murderer, he's only gotten away with it because he is Frey. There been tales of him taking liberties with smallfolk girls and women for years, as well as his own female family members. I heard about one such episode when I went down to Fairmarket for a tourney once."

Hathan nodded agreement, having heard the same thing from a tourney held by House Darry several years back. "The tales say he slept with one of Old Walder's wives, and either coerced or raped one of his nieces, the man who shared that tale with me wasn't sure which."

"He's mine." Arya and Dacey said at the same time. Dacey looked at Arya and Arya shrugged. "He insulted me to my face, he's mine." Dacey shrugged her shoulders so long as one of them was going to get that bastard she didn't care.

"That means we'll have to take out the Twins too." Daryn said, working his shoulders under his plate armor. "That's not good. And I hate to say it, but their defensive position is pretty good. The only way to get an army out of the Neck is by the Kingsroad, and with their position they'll cost us sore to break through."

"You're making the same mistake they did." Ranma said shaking his head and getting off Fenris at last. "Just because no appreciable force can go through the marshes doesn't mean no force can, and just because the crannogmen built that dock by the Kingsroad doesn't mean that's the only place where marsh boats can go ashore. Trust me Daryn, we'll get past them."

"Your words are wise Lord Stark, and before I forget, congratulations on both your elevation and achieving it while your father is still around to enjoy his semi-retirement." A voice said from the swamp beyond the hardened rock and ground of the campsite's edge. All the Wolfsworn turned, most of their hands flashing towards weapons as over a dozen crannogmen paddled their small boats out of the marshes behind the small camp area.

Ranma however smiled going over towards the edge and catching the ropes tossed his way by the crannogmen, then began to pull their tiny boats up alongside the Kingsroad. "Lord Reed, just the man I was looking for..."

OOOOOO

While Howland stayed there with his hunters to make certain that the small Frey force remained where they were, Ranma and the others raced back through the Neck, Ranma laughing quietly at how Lord Reed and he had been thinking along the same lines. By the time they got back to Moat Cailin dozens of tiny marsh craft were there, each of them with a single steersman.

When they arrived, Daenerys and the rest of the command staff were waiting, and she looked at Ranma quizzically. "I take it didn't go well? The arrow that Arya is playing with sort of gives me the clue."

Ranma shook his head. "You might say that." Once they were all gathered he gave the gist of the conversation, and was unsurprised by Greatjon and Rickard both taking umbrage at the attitude of the Frey man.

"Surely his entire family can't be like that can they?" Daenerys asked, looking a little sick at the past exploits of Black Walder.

"They weren't." Domic said promptly, as well as Brynden. Brynden waved his hand at Domic who he had discovered had actually been to the Twins several times before heading further south, much more recently than Brynden. Domic nodded at the older man then went on. "Stevron was a good man and took his oaths seriously. He acted as Old Walder's eyes and ears in the world abroad, though that was changing when I was last in the Riverlands, and he was taking over as the castellan of the Twins. But if he is dead due to interfamily politics, that removes the only voice of honorable opposition in House Frey that had any weight to it. Not good. Old Walder has made that place a cesspit, where every family member is out for their own gain and that of the family above any other consideration."

"So you're saying there's no chance of us trying to gain their support?" Daenerys asked looking a little crestfallen. "We could certainly use the aid, and having both the supply depot and the Twins on the other side of the Neck would be a great boon to our supply lines."

Greatjon scowled, but Rickard was the one who spoke up. "Even if we tried to make a deal with the Freys, and I don't think we should, we can't trust them to keep it. As the bard said, the Freys are always out for one thing, their own largess. They don't care about anything else, that's why the old bastard has had so many wives and killed all of them in childbirth. He's used his children like tools, or spider-webs rather, spreading his influence over the Riverlands and beyond. I've heard tell he even married one of his sons to a Lannister, which means they have already chosen their side in this conflict."

He looked at Ranma. "That's why myself and Lord Hornwood joined with your farther to argue your lady mother down on the idea of you marrying one of his daughters. Yes it would've helped in the short term, but in the long term..." Rickard shrugged. "It would be like having a viper in your bed, docile at present but ready to strike when it can. You can't trust someone like that, not someone who's willing to turn over to a new side the moment there's anything to gain by it."

"In any event, we'd have to match whatever the Lannisters promised him, and I'm not about to even try to do that." Ranma said, nodding his head in agreement.

"But that means we'll have to take out the Twins won't we?" Myrcella asked from where she stood by Daenerys, waiting to ask about medicine ingredients, having talked to Meera about them earlier. All eyes turned to her and she shrugged looking a little uncomfortable and embarrassed at the attention. "I, I mean, I've heard stories about the Twins, and it's supposed to be a very tough castle. How are you going to do it without losing a lot of men?"

Ranma smirked a little. "By playing to what Old Walder thinks is strength, but is in reality a weakness." Everyone looked at him quizzically but Ranma would say no more on that subject.

Later that night after Ranma had detailed given out his orders in preparation for the coming battle, he and Daenerys shared a room in one of the towers. The two of them, Myrcella, Jon and Arya had taken dinner together, and the others had all retired by this point.

Daenerys decided to try once again to broach the subject of the Freys. "Are you sure there is no way we could get them on our side? They would be such a massive resource for us going forward. I hate to see that going to waste, and I hate to think of what it might cost us to take the Twins."

"If it's just the taking of the Twins don't worry. I have a plan to at least minimize our losses as much is possible. Besides you saw how Rickard and Greatjon reacted." He said turning back to Daenerys after having divested himself of his jerkin.

The sight of his muscled chest caused Daenerys to shiver a little, looking forward to what was about to happen after they finished talking. They hadn't had much time alone on the march, neither of them having the privacy to indulge. One thing that had impressed Daenerys was that Ranma refused to live any better than his soldiers. While he had a slightly larger tent, he shared it with Jon and Cley, much like she shared her own, even larger tent with Myrcella, Alayaya, Arya and Dacey.

She tamped down her excitement with difficulty, concentrating on his words for now. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that the Freys have a certain reputation. Old Walder's been in command of that House for too long, he stamped it with his own image, and everyone who has dealt with them knows it. I have no doubt that if we allied with the Freys we would gain more than just that House, we could then call on the Houses it has connections to, but we would also alienate other Houses, including my own lords. You can't deal with a man of dishonor and assume that others won't come to think the same of you."

"I see." Daenerys said thoughtfully. "I hadn't considered that. I had heard so much of their power, and my brother and I and the magister had talked long and hard about how to get them on our side, I guess I'm just having trouble letting that go."

Ranma grinned, taking her into his arms. "You might know which houses are dangerous, or could be loyal to you are ambitious or whatever, the weaknesses in each realm, but that's all. I know people, and I know how the Freys are seen." Indeed, that had been the lesson that Ser Desmond Grell had taught him in King's Landing, and one that Ranma had taken to heart.

"Now, I think that's enough talking." he went on, picking her up and tossing her onto the bed where she landed with a laugh.

Daenerys then reached out, pulling Ranma down to join her and those were indeed the last words spoken for the rest of the night.

OOOOOO

By lunchtime the next day Edd, Meera, Smalljon and Domic had disappeared, taking the archers with them. They would soon be followed by nearly four hundred irregular infantry, mostly from the mountain clans. The operation had begun last night, with the small hunting coracles that Lord Reed and his people had supplied spiriting the men away into the marshes.

Able to move only four men at a pinch Reed had taken every boat his house and the minor houses beholden to him could supply. Even so they would still need to make two trips to bring over the full force assigned to this part of the battle. That force however would be split in small groups and staying well away from the area where the Freys were patrolling. That was something Howland and his men had noticed, the Freys were not patrolling nearly as aggressively as they should. Now they were going to pay for it. By the time the mend with Edd and Daryn were all across, Ranma, the rest of the wolfsworn and the heavy cavalry would be in position.

Once the Freys were smashed out of the way, Ranma would send Fenris back through down the Kingsroad to Daenerys, who along with Rickard would lead the rest of the Army through the Neck at a fast clip. They would keep on going during the night, only stopping for short hour-long rest to keep up their strength until they were out of the Neck.

This way they would be able to break out of the Neck within four or five days. Their speed would also be helped along by Lord Reeds' people. Once the gathered coracles dropped off the archers and infantry they would come back and start to drop off food and other supplies allowing the Army to move without needing to bring along their own baggage for this part of the trip, and would even carry most of the armor and weapons for the infantry.

The heavy cavalry took two remounts each, having stripped the light cavalry of their horses for this. They switched horses at every rest, but kept going during the night, exhausting themselves but crossing the entirety of the Neck within five days, a feat unheard of. Near the end of the Neck they rested along the same area of the Kingsroad where the wolfsworn had rested before, getting ready for the battle to come. Thanks to their speed only a few men had fallen ill, and all of them simply had stomach viruses from the bogs rather than any major illnesses. That was good, and this move had put the entirety of the northern heavy cavalry force, a thousand plus heavily armored armsmen and minor lords, within striking distance of the Frey line.

It was deep night when they were ready. Ranma took the Stark and peace flag banner, letting them rest on his shoulders easily where he sat astride Fenris. He looked over at the wolfsworn with him and at Greatjon, who rode at his side. "Ready?"

"Ready to gut the dishonorable bastards." Greatjon snarled, patting the hilt of his heavy greatsword where it hung from his saddle. It was half again the size of his son's, which was a little longer than even Dacey's. That made him slower than either of them, but he had more than enough strength to wield such a weapon at least in the normal manner. "But are you sure that the Karstark and Hornwood boys will be in position?"

"I trust all the wolfsworn to perform their duty to their utmost, as I do every man of the North." Ranma said firmly looking over at Jon and Arya who also looked eager to get on with it. Both of them stiffened in pride, and he could see his words had an effect. Even Greatjon sat up straighter in his saddle.

Ranma smiled back at them all, his face showing his pride in them all. "Who is with me?" It was only the fact they had to keep quiet that kept Greatjon and many of the others from shouting out at that.

Seeing that, Ranma sent a mental command to Fenris who turned and began to lope out of the Neck. Soon he was within sight of the Frey barricades, lit up by dozens of torches along their line. Earthing both of the banners to either side of Fenris Ranma then took out a torch and lit it, holding it above his head.

The light drew the attention of the men on watch, and they shouted into the camp. It took what seemed forever but which was probably only half an hour before the men in the camp had roused themselves, moving to their positions along the earthworks they had thrown up, which hadn't been added to overmuch since Ranma had last been here. That was astonishing, but given their inability to bring in wood, he supposed it was the best they were going to do.

Once he was certain he had the defenders attention completely on him, Ranma cupped his free hand around his mouth and shouted in a loud clear voice. "This is your final warning. Disband, bend the knee to your Lord Paramount's lawful representative, or prepare for battle."

His response was jeers and catcalls, and more than a few arrows. Only one actually was on target, and Ranma negligently smacked out of the air whenever they came near him. He could distantly hear a voice shouting "See! I told you, no one believed me but I told you all, I saw the Stark boy catch an arrow the last time!"

Ranma laughed lightly while below him Fenris too snapped at an arrow that was coming towards him tossing it aside with a contemptuous noise deep in his throat. "So be it, your bones will feed the earth when we are done with you!" Ranma shouted, feeling a little foolish at how formal he had to be for this.

With that he turned, disappearing back into the neck. As soon as he joined Jon and Arya, he nodded at them. All three of them leaned forward, whispering into their direwolf's ears.

Greatjon and the rest of the heavy cavalry knew this was a signal, and every man there gripped the reins tighter. The three wolves sat there, their riders momentarily getting off their backs as the wolves howled. A normal wolf's howl was loud, and could be heard for miles around. A direwolf's howl could be heard for a dozen miles more, and three Stark 'pets' singing a duet was possibly the most terrifying thing many a man there had ever heard.

OOOOOO

Edd shivered where he stood with a band of thirty archers and ten mountain clansmen. The clansmen had led them so close to the Frey camp undetected it was astonishing given the lack of trees or other natural camouflage. "Okay, that is a little more of a visceral sound than I expected."

One of the archers spat to one side. "Don't know what visceral means, but if'n it means terrifyin' you're right milord."

"Yeah." Edd said. "That'll do. That was the signal, let's get started."

All around the Frey line groups of similar disposition were making their way towards them, using the darkness to come closer and closer to the well-lit Freys line. Several of the mountain clan scouts further proved their worth by silently killing the guards on watch elsewhere around the Frey camp that should've been alerted to their approach. Now, with the rest of the Frey force up and on their feet waiting for an attack from the front, Edd, Daryn and their men began to assault them from behind and to their left flank.

This would force them to retreat right if they could retreat at all, away from the Twins. There would no doubt be a few who got away in the night, during the confusion of battle there could be no other outcome. But if the majority of men couldn't go that way, that was enough for Ranma.

Aimed thanks to the Freys torches, arrows flew, falling among the Frye men with deadly force. More than a dozen men went down, then a hundred as other small groups took up the barrage from elsewhere. Smalljon's bellow was almost as loud as his father as it came from directly behind the Freys defensive line. "The Giants Fury!"

Edd responded shouting his own family's words. "The sun of winter! The sun of winter!"

The effect on the enemy battle line was pandemonium. Black Walder wasn't a very innovative thinker except in areas where it allowed him to get into a woman's panties. The torches he had ordered lit the moment Ranma and his torch came into sight had robbed most of his men of their night vision, and now they couldn't see a damn thing while their attackers sent arrow after arrow into them with impunity.

Here and there men of both House Frey and House Haigh took command of the men near them and turned, ordering them to charge in the direction of the attacks.

Black Walder did the same, cursing inventively. "That Stark bastard's suckered us, he wanted us to concentrate our attention on the Neck, when he'd already gotten a few of his troops across. Dammit, how many of them can there be do you think?" he asked the nearest man, his father Ryman. He was ostensibly in charge here, but Old Walder had bluntly told his least intelligent son to let Black Walder handle everything.

What insight Walder thought his father could have given him at that point the man didn't know, and would never find out. Ryman would never answer that or any other question ever again, an arrow taking him in the neck at that moment.

It was about to get worse for Walder and his men. Back at the entrance to the neck all three of the direwolves had stood up, ears cocked and Ranma smirked. Soon even the humans could hear the sound of battle, and he pulled himself up onto Fenris' back once more. "I believe it's time for us to join the party, Greatjon."

Greatjon and the others laughed, and soon the heavy Cavalry cantered out of the neck, then formed into columns. Each column was headed by a wolfsworn or Greatjon and each of them had been assigned a very specific point along the defensive circle that was the earthworks of the Freys. Ranma was straight ahead, with Arya and Jon on either side their wolves howling as they raced ahead of the cavalry. Despite weeks of getting used to the direwolves none of the horses wanted to be any closer than they had to beat to the direwolves on the hunt, which was just fine by the three of them.

The other columns spread out, each of them hitting another point along the use circle of the Freys. What little heavy or light cavalry the Freys had begun to put together to chase down the archers shattered like glass when the direwolves and the cavalry behind them hit their line from their back.

Men were unhorsed by their rearing animals, frightened out of their wits by the howls of the wolves, the smell of blood all around them. Other men were simply hacked out of their saddles. Each column then spread, every fifteenth man carried a torch allowing everyone around them to see as the Freys, having left their earthworks to start chasing down Edd and Smalljon's men found themselves encircled and outnumbered.

Arya didn't care for any of that, she had a very specific target in mind. She made for the House Frey banner that she could see moving away from the battle trying to escape. That their line of retreat brought them closer to Smalljon's men didn't seem to register, but she didn't care about that either. She wanted Black Walder, and howled with joy, sounding almost as much of a wild animal as Nymeria when she saw him.

Walder had just noticed the banner man following him still holding the banner and he the man down yelling. "You fucking fool, you've doomed us!"

A second later Arya was on them. Fang sliced one man's neck open as she vaulted from Nymeria's back. Landing she rolled to dodge another blow, her small buckler slamming out into the outside of the knee of the man who had tried to take her head. He went down screaming clutching his leg, but not for long. Arya's sword came around punching into the side of his plate armor, before she pulled it out to engage Black Walder.

What Black Walder lacked in many areas too numerous to mention he made up for in skill with the sword and sheer viciousness. The two of them exchanged a few blows before he kicked out, trying to catch Arya in the knee, then an elbow that should've taken her in it her head. Instead Arya had blocked the kick with her buckler, then ducked backwards to dodge the elbow blow to her face, pushing it aside with her shield arm and then bringing her sword up in a underhand blow to cut into his arm, sending it flying away in a welter of blood.

Walder screamed, falling back for a moment, using all his willpower to remain upright. "You bitch!" His sword came around faster than Arya had expected given his injury and she barely got her sword back in time to block it. Even so she was thrown back a few feet by the force of the blow.

He attacked her maddened at the loss of his arm forcing Arya ever backward. Then Walder overextended slightly, and Arya guided his blade downwards as she leapt up, kicking out with both feet, her boots slamming into Walder's face with pile driving force. His nose, jaw and many of his teeth shattered under that blow, and he flew backwards with a squeal of agony.

Impacting the ground Walder groaned, his sword lost as he had flown backwards from Arya's mule kick and the pain of his arm now overcoming is rage-fueled adrenaline. He looked up blearily to see Arya standing above him, Fang poised to stab down into his chest. "I told you I'd kill you 'Black' Walder, maybe in the next lifetime you'll learn how to speak to a warrior like me." With that she thrust downward, smashing into and through the man's good plate armor straight into his heart.

After the body had stopped kicking Arya tried to pull it out, only to realize it was stuck. She looked up as a man wielding a mace came at her, only to be hacked nearly in two by a giant greatsword as a cavalryman came up on her side. "There's a trick ta stabbing someone through plate armor lass." Greatjon said, almost conversationally as he hewed down another man, sending the man's head and arm flying with the massive overhand blow. "Best stick to necks and faces until you get the hang of it."

"I'll keep that in mind, my Lord." Arya said demurely, pulling Fang out finally and taking up position alongside Greatjon. Greatjon guffawed, and the battle continued.

Forty minutes later it was all over, and the only surviving Frey men were those that had surrendered. A few might've escaped in the night, but not many. The way out of the Neck was clear.

OOOOOO

After sending Jon and Ghost back up the Neck to start the rest of the men marching, Ranma consolidated his position. The archers had barely lost a dozen men during the night attack, though their mountain clan protectors had lost forty-two against the Freys. The cavalry had barely lost three, with two having severe injuries that they would live through, but which would force them to be sent back to the Moat and a single death from a particularly unlucky cavalryman who had run into a group of ten spearmen who had retained their position. Jon had slaughtered all ten of them after wheeling back through.

While Ranma was doing this, he also sent messengers towards where he had expected the supply depot to be. The men he sent however reported that the port was actually about twenty leagues further down. It was a far better position for the workers, but further away from the Kingsroad, and the land there was just as inhospitable as the Neck minus the threat of disease, but in a far different way. Ranma understood why Wendel had done that, and respected the man's decision. He wanted commanders who would act on their own accord if they knew something he didn't, and this was a prime example.

On his orders the Manderly pikemen remained at the supply depot with the House Locke archers, but Wendel, his heavy cavalry, the Locke maester and the supplies joined Ranma where he was. They arrived a half day before the rest of the Army began to come out of the Neck.

Now while Wendel and Jon Dmeric saw to the rearmament of the army Ranma and the rest of the commanders turned their attention to more important matters. After sharing a brief but very heartfelt hug with Daenerys, Ranma began. "We need to know where Lord Lannister is, and we need to know the current news. We've been out of the loop for too long, and I'm not happy about marchin' into the unknown."

"We also need to finish the Twins off." Rickard said. "Even if they hadn't decided to turn against us before this, they have no choice now. And the Twins is too good a position to leave in our rear if we stay on this side of the Green Fork."

"True." Ranma said with a nod. "But we still need information on what's on this side of the Green Fork as well. Brynden, Dmeric, that's up to you."

If it pleases you my Lord, I can be of some help there as well." Alayaya spoke up from where she had been serving them all drinks. Water, not ale or wine. Ranma refused to drink either unless all of his men could do the same, and even then he wouldn't drink much. When all the lords looked at the Summer Island girl, she curtsied quickly. "I was one of Brynden's informers in the city, and served in that capacity for the former Hand as well. I know how to ferret out information even in an unknown environment. If there is even a small village nearby, I can get us some news."

Ranma shared a glance of Brynden who nodded slowly as if reluctant, but then seemed to change his mind, shaking his head. "I think Alayaya, that your talents would be useful in a village of any size, but the nearest village is..." He paused, thinking. "About a week's ride from here. It's a good idea, but I think we should leave off on it until we get down to where more villages and towns are around."

Understanding his point Alayaya curtsied once more. Brynden turned back to Ranma who nodded. "That's why I want you out there uncle, I want you to see if you can find one of the local lords, or at least someone who answers to them, a factor or something, to get us some of the news of what's been going on since we began our march."

"It might take some time." Brynden cautioned. "We have the initiative now, we can't wait here for that information."

Jon had joined them by this point and he broke in now. "It'll take us two days, maybe longer to reorganize and rearm the army, and get the baggage train settled down again. Our method of splitting up and sending the arms through by boats saved us a lot of time on the march through the neck, but will need to take the time now to redistribute it. Worse, the men are exhausted from the forced march, a few days rest would do them all good, let alone the draft and cavalry animals."

"We can wait here five days, that's it." Ranma decided. "I want scouts out in every direction, and the light cavalry is to take over hunting down survivors from the Frey force we smashed here. The heavy cavalry had been doing that job up to this point, but the light is much better suited for it."

"The two nearest houses to hear our House Haigh and Erenford, they're both rolled into the House spray, though from what Wendel tells us Erenford's military strength has also been smashed. We still might run into trouble though." Brynden cautioned.

"Then I expect you to handle it uncle." Ranma said smirking.

If only my two little ones could fly further, Daenerys's thought to herself, that way I could have helped in scouting ahead of the army. She'd recently begun to actually be able to see through their eyes for short periods of time even in flight rather than simply guide their movements. It was an astonishingly amazing experience, but they still couldn't fly very far, a bare five miles. Good enough to do close in scouting, but not distant.

Brynden nodded then immediately made his way towards the nearest batch of scouts, all of them mountain men. He led them off, leaving the camp that very hour.

"While that's going on, Domeric," Ranma said turning to the Bard. "Out of all of us you're the only one who's been to the Twins. What can you tell me about them? I want to know everything you can tell me."

OOOOOO

Ranma was going over some numbers with Jon and Wendel for the next supply run when Merry burst into his tent, looking as angry as he had ever seen her save when Joffrey came up in conversation. "Oooohhhh that, that man! ARGH!"

The three men who were speaking looked at one another than back at the young princess. "Um, you're going to need to be a little more specific there, Merry. What's wrong?"

"The maester of House Locke, Martyn, is an arrogant conceited asshole!" Merry replied, stamping around and waving her hands in the air. "ugh, I know my language is foul Ranma, but ugh!"

Ranma pulled her down into a one-armed hug, rubbing her hair affectionately. "Calm down and tell us

Merry fought back her blush at the hug. Her love for Ranma had yet to fade despite him now being married, and moments like this fueled her fantasies, not of winning his heart away from Daenerys, but of possibly... joining them. It was a thought that should never have occurred to a high born noble lady, even one whose true father wasn't known, but it had to Myrcella, and she hoped to someday talk to Daenerys about that idea.

She had other things on her mind right now however. "Maester Martyn, he's very particular about being called maester, ugh, is an excellent healer. He knows a lot about herbs, medicines and how best to actually put someone together. His organization however is awful, and his opinion of me is 'a little girl who should be playing with dollies' rather than, as I was at the time, redoing the stitching on one of the injured men's wounds. His bedside manner is also atrocious, he acts as if the injured only become so to irritate him."

Though the fact the man she was working on had threatened to thump him had been gratifying. Indeed even after one battle Myrcella had become a hit with the soldiers, saving two men from gangrene and more than a few from fevers. If she had been closer she could have done even more directly after the battle.

Ranma decided not to point out that Myrcella was indeed still a young girl. Not little so much, but very young. That would not be a good move on his part just then however, so he simply nodded. "Is he unwilling to work with you at all or is it just he doesn't want you near him while he's working? Is he willing to continue your instruction?"

"No, he doesn't want me to even touch the healing supplies, and no!" Merry replied tartly. "He might be willing to let me handle the logistics aspect, but even that's a stretch, and I was serious when I said his organizing skills were awful. He somehow messed up the supplies he brought with him from House Locke, and somehow misplaced a full cartload of ingredients from Lord Reed!"

Realizing this was a real problem that had to be handled, Ranma stood up, letting his arm fall from around Merry's shoulders much to her hidden disappointment. "Let's go see this Martyn fellow."

After speaking to the maester himself, Ranma concluded that Merry was correct, and that if Arya or even the more mildly tempered Dacey heard some of his comments about women healers or warriors they would cut off his head. For now however they needed him. Good as she was Merry couldn't be called a full healer, and maester Martyn was the only one who was willing to come with the army.

Ranma sat them both down and explained that Merry would be in charge of organizing the medical area and handling the medicine and transportation of that and the wounded. Martyn would not be asked to train Merry further and would handle the healing, but if he refused to allow her to help after a battle, Ranma would break his legs.

"After all, you don't need working legs to be a good healer, now do you?" Ranma said, smirking a little at the older man's suddenly pale face. With that, the crisis was halted in its tracks for now, but it was yet another thing Ranma would need to think about in the future.

OOOOOO

It actually did take four days for the scouts to return with news, and it was mixed to say the least. "We were able to get past House Erenford's land easily enough." Brynden said, gratefully sipping on the water that Alayaya and handed to him the moment he joined the rest of the command group in their tent. He had been in the saddle since early last night, and he was getting no younger. "After that we were able to talk to a few farmers and get some news from them. Apparently there's been a major battle down south on a ford of the Red Fork. Lord Lannister tried to force his way across and succeeded in smashing the defending houses, but they cost him enough men he was forced to halt his advance north. He's consolidating his position down there. It's odd, at first there were a lot of refugees fleeing before his army, but that seems to have slowed now."

"Where is Tywin's army now?" Ranma asked, looking down at a map of Westeros spread out on a field table. It wasn't a very detailed map, there wasn't a single map for the continent that was, but it would do until he found one that detailed the Riverlands.

"Still on the other side of the Red Fork, sitting right at the ford they tried to use. They've reinforced there, and are apparently waiting for a second army out of the Westerlands. There were also refugees from beyond his line, so it's possible he might have split his army, sending groups out against the Houses on that side of the fork that haven't bent the knee to the kinslayer." That was the epithet used by the army to talk about Joffrey, and there could be no more vile appellation in the Northern lexicon. The fact the Freys seemed to be practicing it these days had spread among the men, and all of them were incensed by it.

"I can't believe that." Rickard scoffed. "Why in the world would they stop if they'd smashed the defenders out of the way! Fairmarket couldn't have been reinforced before they arrived, and no offense to the local knightly houses, but they couldn't have raised enough men to stop Lord Lannister from taking that town. If he had, he could already be marching up to the Twins on the other side of the Green Fork!"

"There have been other battles down by Fairmarket and in Hags Mire, though the farmers we talked to didn't know anything about the why of those let alone the outcome." Brynden said with a shrug. "The farmers were remarkably open about it with Meera and I, our cover worked to perfection." He and Meera had posed as a father and daughter searching for medicine for a sick mother, and the farmers had all been very helpful, insisting that going further south was a bad idea and explaining why when asked.

It amused Brynden somewhat that he hadn't been recognized as himself, despite now being in the Riverlands where he had spent a lot of his life going from place to place. "But the Lords on this side of the Green Fork apparently banded together and moved down to the Ruby Ford, where the Green and Blue Forks meet before entering the Trident. They put up some serious earthworks there, even some siege weapons."

One of his senior men spoke up, a mountain man named Oscar Lebray. "Da farmer I talked ta said the houses might've made a deal with the gold shitters. So long as dey stay on their side of the river, da head gold shitter won't attack 'em, and dey don't need to decide right now ta bend the knee ta his kin-slayin' grandson. Don't know if 'at'll extend to not helping someone else attack them."

Ranma looked down at his map thoughtfully, tugging at his ponytail. "What can you tell me about the houses on this side of the Fort, uncle, Domic?"

"Not much." Brynden said honestly. "I know several of their heirs were friends with my nephew Edmure, he talked about them often enough in King's Landing. But whether that will mean they'll side with us against the Lannisters I don't know. It will probably depend upon whether or not they have begun to threaten Edmure's life in return for forcing the Riverlands to capitulate. Up to this point all of the Riverlands Houses have been acting singly, defending their lands from what they see as a usurper whose allies are despoiling them. The moment they help us though, they too will be labeled traitors rather than simply angered neutral parties. I don't think any of the current lords of those Houses have the stomach for another war. I know Wayn won't, it's lord is nearly as old as my brother, and his son untried. Nor will Ryger I don't think. They might have patched up their relationship with my house better than most that supported the Targaryens during Robert's Rebellion, but they were still hammered badly in terms of men and riches. But their heir is supposed to be very intelligent, and skilled in many areas, I don't know enough about him."

At that Brynden shot an apologetic glance at Daenerys, who rolled her eyes. "I know precisely how mad my father became later in life, and there is no way to justify his actions, not in the eyes of the law, men or gods, nor were his actions the only infamous ones my family ever did. I won't say I don't have hard feelings about certain events during the War of the Usurper, but I certainly understand the reasoning behind it, and know that a Lord Paramount would be obligated to... to put his own realm in order I suppose. Please continue..." she smirked. "Great-Uncle."

Brynden laughed and even Rickard smiled slightly, pleased that Daenerys didn't seem to be blind to the problems her family had caused. "Well, in any event, the only House that might have the stomach for another war is House Roote. They were awarded quite a bit of House Darry's lands, so might be powerful enough but I don't think they'd have the stomach for offensive action. According to the men we talked to they pulled back out of Harroway town, bringing with them all the town's residents who were willing to leave rather than face the Lannisters there."

Still tugging at his pony tail, Ranma frowned, calculating distances in his mind and trying to imagine, or remember really, what the land had been like around the Trident. While Ranma was doing that Daenerys questioned Brynden further. "You say the farmers said that the Lannisters were consolidating their positions on the other side, and that there were a lot of refugees. Was there any talk about any of the noble houses still holding out?"

"Blackwood." said Brynden and all three of the men he had brought with him to the council. They all looked at one another then the three mountain men nodded at Brynden. "Lord Blackwood pulled back to his keep the moment the battle at the Ford was lost apparently, and had already gathered in his people. They're holding out still, and could continue to do so for a long time."

"How long ago was that battle?" Rickard asked.

"About a month ago, though that isn't solid." Brynden cautioned.

"They control the Kneeling Man's ford then from there down to Darry along with Lord Haraway's town, which means they control the Red Fork portion of the Trident." Ranma mused aloud "but how good is their control of that land?" Ranma leaned back, closing his eyes as he went through some scenarios in his head. After a moment he opened them and nodded decisively. "Alright, here's what we're going to do. First we're going to split the army."

Before anyone could speak he went on. "The larger portion, the heavy infantry, half of the light, half of the archers and two thirds of the heavy cavalry will move down the Kingsroad. We'll also split the scouting forces, a third to go with the larger force, the rest to come with me. Greatjon, you'll be in charge of that along with Brynden. Smash Erenford and Haigh then continue on." He said looking at his friends. "Brynden, you'll be in charge of speaking to the locals, and I expect you and Greatjon to lead the army equally."

Ranma looked at both older men sternly. "I don't want you to start attacking the Lannisters, I want you to reinforce that defensive position and talk to the local lords. Find out where they stand, get as much information about what's been going on down south as you can, and send a messenger to find me when you do find out what the local lords are willing to do. I'll be taking the rest of the army to capture the Twins."

"If you're talking about a siege that'll last months, if not years!" Rickard protested. He was unhappy that he hadn't been given the command of the other Army until Ranma stated his own objectives, which made him even more unhappy but for a different reason entirely.

"Not if we have someone inside." Ranma said smirking. "I don't doubt that Old Walder is arrogant enough to let in a small delegation there to talk about peace terms. I mean to give him one more chance to bend the knee and mean it, or else."

"But that will mean you and however goes with you trapped inside!" Daenerys said leaping to the logical conclusion as to who would be going on such a mission.

"That will set the wolves among the sheep lady." said Jon smirking evilly, now understanding why Ranma hadn't assigned any of the wolfsworn to the army moving down the Kingsroad. "My brother proved as a young boy what he could do in enclosed spaces against normal armsmen and all of us have been trained in that kind of thing."

Ranma nodded grimly. "The wolfsworn will fight our way out of the hall and opened the gates, all of the gates, for the rest of the army. We'll still lose men, that's unavoidable, but this way we'll be able to avoid the horrendous casualties of a full blown assault or spending too much time on the Twins."

"Remember, the moment the Lannister's second echelon reaches him Tywin is going to start north again, and with that large an army even if Fairmarket has been heavily reinforced they won't be able to stop him. I doubt even the earthworks you mentioned could do that. We need to get down there and be in a position where we can react to his moves quickly or better dictate our own and that means taking out the Freys fast and dirty."

There were some objections, Daenerys in particular was very vocal about it being too risky. But Ranma simply kept on referring everyone to what it happened when Bolton head overreached, and eventually that won the day.

OOOOOOO

It took the now much smaller northern force barely two and a half days to march to the Twins, which they timed deliberately to coincide with the dawn. Once they were in sight of their target, Ranma stopped, mentally comparing the castle to what Domic had described, and found he had nailed it from one end to the other.

The Twins consisted of two seemingly identical stone castles, one standing on one side of the Green Fork and the other on the other side, with heavy barbicans between them connected by a massive stone bridge. They had high walls, about ten stories tall and were each surrounded by a deep moat carved out of the side of the Green Fork. The bridge supports rose from the mighty river far below. In the bridge's center was a tower almost as tall as the two castle's main keeps, called the Water Tower according to Domic. The only crossing point of the Green Fork until the Trident, the Twin's was a major trading junction, and it had made a lot of money for the Freys, as their family motto attested to.

The army settled in nearby just out of bow-range, not even close enough to have it be called a real siege, while Ranma and the wolfsworn rode forward. Jon was once more carrying a white flag, but it seemed as if their complete destruction of the Frey force they had put out into the field had worked. They were hailed from the wall, but the portcullis was opened for them quickly, and they were met with several people who took their horses away.

A man with a thin, almost rat-like goatee, a weak chin and a pointed nose bowed to them all while the servants led away the horses. "My lords, I am Aenys Frey. Please, permit me to show you to where my lord father is waiting to receive you." He looked askance at the trio of massive direwolves, who were making deep rumbling noises at one another. "Your... beasts will of course be cared for here."

"They will come with us." Ranma said flatly, getting off Fenris' back. "It takes them a while to trust someone enough to be near them."

Aenys frowned, almost sneering before apparently thinking better of it. "In that case my lord, I must ask they be sent back to your army. I cannot allow wild beasts, no matter how well trained, into the presence of my lord father."

Before Ranma could say anything, Jon spoke up. "Well, I've already sent mine back. Besides Ser Aenys is right, the wolves are too wild to be let into a diplomatic function."

Looking around, Ranma very carefully hid a smirk. Ghost was in fact still there, standing silently between Dacey and Roger, but he doubted if even the two of them noticed the beast was there. Ghost lived up to his name, slipping somehow under people's conscious notice, not like Ranma's own Silent Thief technique, but somehow similar. If anything, Ghost's was a little better, since it also muted sound as well.

Outwardly he frowned. "Very well, that's a point Jon. Arya, we'll send them to Rickard." Ranma wasn't about to mention his wife here, none of them could figure out how the Freys would react to that bit of news, and were not willing to tempt it.

Moments later, Fenris and Nymeria were streaking back to the army, and Ranma turned to Aenys. "There, now, show us to Lord Frey. We have much to talk about."

Ranma looked around, frowning slightly. For some reason this place felt odd. The armymen strutted around the place like they owned it, while the servants scurried everywhere, eyes darting this way and that. As they entered the keep, Ranma kept looking around, his frown deepening. "What is it?" Jon murmured out of the corner of his mouth as the two of them led the wolfsworn down the corridor.

"I don't know." Ranma said honestly, "it's just a feeling I guess."

"This place does, well..." Dacey paused thinking of the correct word. "It feels mean if that makes any sense."

"That's part of it, I suppose. And the fact they don't seem to like to have a lot of light in here, but I haven't seen a single made or out woman at all." Hathan said, looking around. Indeed, the central keep had no murder holes on the first floor, and very few torches to make up for it. Once the door of the keep closed behind them, with an ominously final sort of thump if Ranma was any judge, the darkness of the hall was very apparent.

"If we were besieging the place and had come to talk peace that would've been normal." Edd replied, keeping his voice low. "So either they've heard about... recent events and are just trying to spring a trap, or it's normal for the maids to do their best to be invisible."

"Perhaps Black Walder wasn't the only one who took liberties with them." Arya growled, one hand touching Fang's hilt, her eyes glinting dangerously.

"Easy little sister." Ranma's voice barely carried to her let alone anyone who might be trying to listen in as they continued down the corridor after Aenys. "I've a feeling we'll be getting some answers on that score soon enough."

The group ascended a flight of stairs, noticing all the while how dark and forbidding the keep seemed to be at present. With every step Ranma became more certain that this darkness was simply the way the castle was kept normally rather than for their benefit. Even at places where there were murder holes letting in light the light didn't lighten the atmosphere.

Several moments more of walking down another corridor found them in front of two large oaken doors. Aenys pushed them open, bowing the northerners in. It seems to be the dining hall of the castle which doubled as the lord's receiving hall, much like the one in Winterfell. On either side wall were large tapestries, which covered both walls from one end of the room to the other. Most of the tables had been removed except for one which had been pushed into the center of the hall directly in front of the large black oaken chair in which old Walder sat. On the tables was a small plate of bread and dipping sauce, with two bottle of wine.

Walder looked ancient and brittle as he sat on a chair that was much larger than his shrunken frame. He was also bald and toothless and his skin looked as white as parchment and just as fragile. He wore expensive looking silks and there was a small circlet of gold on his forehead. It was almost but not quite like a crown, which told you a lot about the man by itself, let alone everything else that Ranma had learned about his family.

On either side of the man were armed and armored knights, their greatswords grounded in front of them, but their helmets off. There seemed to only be Old Walder, his two guards and Aenys in the room, but Ranma wasn't about to believe that. Nonetheless he led the wolfsworn through the hall, marching along the long dining tables length until they all stood to one side of it right in front of Old Walder. "Lord Frey." he said nodding his head slightly.

"So the Young Wolf has come south with the rest of his northern friends and an army behind them to save his grandfather's realm from the war that his own father began. How sweet, house silly and naïve. I note it is a much smaller army than I would have thought even the North could muster." The old man said condescendingly, his voice thin but sharp. "Did you somehow lose the rest of it? And where exactly is my great-grandson, oh and his father I suppose, fat fool that he is. But where are my manners, please eat, drink, we have much to talk about."

Ghost had taken one sniff of the food by the table and shook his head, before gliding around the table, unnoticed somehow by any there. Jon turned, as if looking at an image on the tapestry, subtly shaking his head at the others, who obeyed, none of them reaching for the food on the table.

"The rest of my army is none of your concern, nor will I break bread with you just yet." Ranma reposted coldly. "What is, is that I speak with my grandfather's voice. I am his deputy, to act as I see fit to get his heir, my uncle back and protect his kingdom. Your son Black Walder said you wanted to speak to us, here I am. Now will you bend the knee, and join with us, or not?" Even as he asked that his eyes were scanning the hall, the rest of the wolfsworn ready for action despite their easy nature. "As to Black Walder, where is your other son Stevron? As I understood it, he was an honorable man."

"Honor!" The old man spat as if it was a curse. "The only honor that matters boy, is the duty to family, that and the ambition needed to grasp every advantage you can to make your family more powerful. Stevron never understood that, believing too much in honor and oaths rather than blood and power! He never understood that an oath of fealty was never worth anything unless the one given it could enforce his words, and it has been some time since Hoster could do that."

"So you say you want me to bend the knee, you give me hard words and demands, calling on my honor! Well, the Lannisters have offered me the Lord Paramount seat of all the Riverlands. Can you offer anything even remotely like that? Of course that is a mere promise for the future, not a solid gain. I understand you're unmarried so far. I have many a beautiful daughter, and the marriage would be something far more solid than a promise from the Lannisters."

"I'm already married." Ranma said smiling grimly, delighting in the slightly widened eyes of all four Frey men. "And even if I wasn't I would not marry a Frey. You're grasping too much Old Walder, too ambitious and too unscrupulous. I would never help your family along in its ambitions, or pair my own with yours. I say again, will you bend the knee to your lawful Lord Paramount's orders and follow me?"

"I think not." The old man said setting his cup of wine down sharply, banging it on the armrest of his chair twice. To both sides of the hallway the tapestries came down, revealing small alcoves there with archers pointing their bows at the wolfsworn. No, I think that the Lannisters will truly make good their promise if I can hand them your head, boy. Did you honestly think I wouldn't know what had happened between your army and my grandson's? How arrogant of you, and to think you could come here and make demands on my honor? Hah!"

Actually Old Walder had never intended to parley fairly with the men who had smashed his field force and killed his son and grandson. Oh, if the North had offered something substantial he would have overlooked it, Black Walder and his father were not his favorites among his brood, for different reasons admittedly, and the men with them weren't family so mattered nothing to him. He had even baited the trap further, making it seem as if he hadn't heard from a few survivors of the battle what had occurred by not moving himself to the castle on the other side of the Green Fork.

Ranma raised an eyebrow his hands not anywhere near Ice where it was strapped on his back, one hand simply resting at the edge of the long table, as if he entirely at ease. "We came here under token of parley." he said simply. "Breaking that is almost as bad as breaking guest right, you would be denounced by any right thinking soul for this."

"Again just words boy, I told you the only honor that matters is that to the family. Everything else is but a tool. You offered me nothing but hard edged commands, you thought honor would be enough!" Old Walder spat the word again. "Whereas the Lannisters offered me a seat of power and gold for your head. No choice there for 'any right thinking soul'."

"I suppose from your perspective that might be right, but you know what, there's something about me you seem to have forgotten. Now!" he shouted suddenly, lifting up the giant oaken table with one hand before hurling it at the archers on the far side of the table. Ghost, who had been already waiting by the nearer wall, leaped on the archers on that side of the room. Jon, Dacey and Arya charged after him, dodging arrows or blocking with their shields, moving faster than any man there could believe, cutting the men down. Eddy and Hathon sprinted over to the men who had been smashed to the ground by the table, finishing them off quickly.

The two guards had already pulled up their greatswords to the guard position when the tapestries fell, but it didn't really help them. Roger and Smalljon barreled forward into them. Roger's axe came up in a wicked arc, blocking his opponent's blade and smashing it up and away from his body, opening the man up for Roger's next blow, which crunched into his side, cutting through his armor and side with equal ease.

Smalljon locked blades with his opponent, pushing back at the other man's two handed grip with his own, slightly shorter blade held in one hand. Then he reached forward, grabbing the other man's neck right above his gorget and ripping it out with fingers of iron. The man collapsed, dropping his blade as both hands went to his neck, vainly trying to stop his life's blood from escaping.

One hand negligently holding Aenys still where the man had tried to bolt for the door, Ranma kept his eyes locked on Old Walder's throughout the carnage. When it was over for the moment, he leaned forward. "You seem to think I'm an idiot old man. I knew I couldn't trust you, by the old gods even though I wanted to give you one last chance, I knew you wouldn't go for it, in fact I counted on it. All you did trying to set this ambush rather than fight my army on your walls is let the wolf into the sheep's pen. I tore apart the Mountain that Rode old fool, and I'll do the same to the Twins."

"You'll never get out of here alive! I have over a thousand men here!" Old Walder blustered, but his eyes showed how terrified he was right now. "Even if you use me as a hostage, there are enough children and grandchildren of mine who would like to see me dead that won't work!"

Ranma shrugged. "That's nice, but I never wanted you as a hostage. As for the number of men you have, well I didn't have anything better to do today. You should have listened to that blasted wolves of winter song old man, this won't be the first castle I've fought my way out of."

At that point Jon and Ghost moved over to join Ranma. Jon whispered into Ranma's ear a moment, causing him to nod. "Is that the only entrance into this room?" he asked Old Walder.

The old man didn't answer, and Ranma reached forward, grabbing Walder's, palsied arm and placing his thumb over the veins on his inner arm. "I'm going to ask you again, is that the only door into this room?"

Outside the alarm had already begun to spread, apparently the guards outside the door had enough sense to spread the word rather than just charge in. The rest of the wolfsworn moved over to take position by the doorway, waiting grimly.

The old man didn't say anything, but his pulse gave him away. "Search for some kind of hidden passage!" Ranma shouted to the others.

It was Arya and Ghost who found the hidden door, much like it had been Ghost that gave Jon the idea there might be one in the first place. Arya followed Ghost who seemed to be trying to figure out where the slight breath of air was coming from, pulling at the sconces of the torches as she went, figuring those were the most obvious place to put a secret lever.

Turned out she was right, and the two of them had gotten to the far right-hand corner when the sconce pulled forward out of the wall. The wall directly to its left began to move slightly, opening just wide enough for a man to enter. "Found it." she said shaking her head.

Ranma frowned, thinking then shrugged and was about to issue orders but at that moment the door to the dining hall burst open. Dozen or armsmen charged through only to be met by the wolfsworn. The first to meet them was Edd. His spear with its heavy, leaf shaped head took the first man in the gut before he pulled it out quickly twirling it around like a staff, blocking two swords and then smashing one man off his feet with the end before turning quickly and chopping another man's leg off with the side of his spearhead just below the knee.

To his side Daryn danced forward, dueling with five men at once with his longsword. His shield flicked out smashing into one trooper's shield throwing him into one of his fellows disrupting that man's footing just enough for Daryn's sword to take him in the throat. He pulled back quickly, ducked under another blow from a man wielding a flail of all things, running him through. He then smashed the side of his shield into another man's face cutting it open before the man could bring his own sword to bear.

Dacey, Smalljon and Roger went about their work with brisk efficiency, protecting their friend's back and killing ten men in the next few moments with an ease that was frightening. Ranma, his siblings and Ghost didn't even have time to join their friends at the door that first group of men were down, or running away in terror.

Ranma smirked looking back at Old Walder, who looked almost ready to pass himself in fear after seeing that display. "Smalljon, grab this old sack of shit. I don't want him to die, not yet, he needs to stand trial for breaking his oath to my grandfather, as well as anything else we decide to stick on, including breaking right of parley." Ignoring Smalljon's only half humorous mutter of 'why do I have to be the one to carry people, get someone else to do it' Ranma addressed the rest of his friends. "Follow me. We make for the Gates, we open the portcullis and the rest of the army should be ready to move again."

With that Ranma led the rest of them out into the corridor, Hathan beside him. At every turn of the corridor, at every doorway in the corridor they faced opposition small and large. Most of this came in the form of armsmen, but one or two servants also attacked them, though why was in question.

They all fell regardless. It was simple butchery for the most part. Imagine Special Forces taking on a group of high school bullies and it would be close. Like Arya had said, the Frey men had never been a part of an actual war before, or even skirmishes with bandits. They were well equipped, but most of the knights and armsmen hadn't even been to tourneys. The wolfsworn went through them like a hot knife through butter.

The only serious threat came when one of the Freys organized a defense at the far end of the first floor corridor consisting of several dozen archers behind a shield wall of four knights. The archers were already aiming at them as the wolfsworn bulled their way down the last staircase, several more defenders retreating in front of them.

While Hathan and Roger cleared out the last of the group they had been fighting Ranma bounded over their heads, clanking off the corridor's roof, landing on the other side. He was immediately taken under fire, but he smacked the arrows away, his hand toughened by his armor strengthening technique for a moment as he bounded forward. The men frantically tried to fire again, getting off one or two shots each. Most of those shots went wide, the men not taking the time to actually aim before Ranma was on them.

Ice sliced through one shield into the knight's body as Ranma landed, his weight crashing down on one of the archers. Ice then skewered another archer, splashing his fellows with his blood as Ranma kicked out, sending two men to the floor. The archers try to run for it, but couldn't get away from him and he cut them all down, along with the knights who had been supposed to protect them. This seemed to buy them some time, since no further attack appeared yet.

Eddy joined him, resting on his spear for a moment. "You now we'll have to open the other keep as well right? If not, the ones in there can hold out against us, and that Water Tower on the bridge is also going to cause issues."

"I know." Ranma said grimly. "That was what made the Twins such a fantastic defensive position, almost as good as Riverrun. It was two castles in one, with each castle being on a different side of a massive river that didn't have any nearby ways across. You could only get at one after taking the other then moving across the bridge where you would be under fire for the majority of your assault.

He looked over at the others, smiling as he saw Smalljon carrying Old Walder along under one arm like a sack of potatoes, old man's finery now splashed with the blood of the men he had thought could protect him. Taking a quick glance around, Ranma nodded. All of the wolfsworn were dinged up a little, cuts and bruises here and there, but nothing serious, not yet. And his endurance training was definitely paying off for them all, since none of them, even Arya, looked winded just yet.

Nodding he came to a decision. "Arya, Roger, Jon, take the gate and open it for the rest of the army. Smalljon you know what you need to do."

"I know and I'm not happy about it." Smalljon growled. "At least this one out will make a good shield against arrows as I run away though." He said shaking Old Walder in his grip.

"You're dead, you're all dead! Do you hear me!" Old Walder yelled. "You'll never get out of the Twins alive!"

Arya laughed coldly. "You haven't yet come up with anything that can stop us old fool, I wonder how many of your sons are going to die because of your lack of honor before the end of the day."

That was harsh but true Ranma reflected while Jon led his group off. Normally Ranma would have felt sympathy for a father who would be forced to outlive his son, but it had been obvious by the way he talked about as Stevron's death that he didn't really care about them as individuals, merely as pawns to enhance his house's power. "The rest of us." he said aloud turning to his own now much smaller team. "Are going to take out that tower, and open the other keep. We race straight across, don't stop, if we stop they'll simply pepper us full of arrows."

"What about the tower?" Dacey asked. "Are we going to leave that in our rear? I have to tell you, you may be able to dodge arrows, but the rest of us can't."

"I have plans for that. Wait for me to cross, then follow me." Ranma said smirking a little and flexing his fingers. Thank you Ryoga, all those times you use that damned move on me allowed me to learn it. Now I'm going to put it to a hell of a lot better use than you ever did pig-boy.

For a time they followed the other group, not running into much more combat since Jon and his band had taken out most of the defenders in their way already. After clearing a group of twenty men formed up by the doorway the two groups finally split. Ranma's broke off as they got out into the courtyard of the castle, racing to one side where the bridge arced out of the courtyard, defended on this side by a gatehouse, though the gate on this side had yet to be closed. Hathan and Dacey paused a moment in the gatehouse to make certain it wouldn't be closed in the future, while Ranma raced out onto the bridge.

Immediately he came under fire both from the walls of the castle above him and the Water Tower in the center of the expanse. Running forward he soon was close enough for the men manning the walls of the second castle to fire on him as well. Both groups however seemed slightly undermanned in comparison to the fire from the castle on the eastern side of the Green Fork. Apparently Old Walder had anticipated some trouble from the rest of the army after taking Ranma out of the equation.

Ranma dodged or ignored the arrows coming his way, racing across the bridge. He passed by the tower's right side, touching it with a gentle finger and intoned under his breath "Bakusai Tenketsu!" Suddenly the exterior of the tower where he touched it exploded inwards, the stone shattering for several feet in either direction as if it had been smashed by a large trebuchet shot.

Shouts and cries of dismay echoed throughout the tower and the arrows from the tower stopped, but Ranma went on with his grim business, shaking slightly. Funneling his ki into the rock to shatter it had taken almost as much out of him as firing a Moko Takabashi did in this world. I wonder why I can armor weapons and myself in ki, but can't press it into stone or extend it far from my body here? Something to think about another day. Ranma moved on touching the tower's outer wall several more times destroying that entire side of the tower.

Without that structural support the other three sides of the tower could no longer sustain its weight, and it began to list badly. That worsened dramatically as Ranma went on, now only taking fire from the second castle, the Water Tower's wall blocking him from fire from the eastern side's castle. He grimly finished destroying another few segments of the tower's wall, then watched as it began to collapse, falling to one side and over the edge of the bridge. At the impact with the rest of the bridge the tower's top began to crumble, taking many of the men with it into the depths of the mighty Green Fork far below.

Ranma jumped up over the small amount of rubble left from the tower's base, hiding there for a moment as he rested, almost utterly exhausted for a moment before standing up again. This battle wasn't over just yet. He saw his friends racing toward him, now holding a large segment of the oaken door that had fronted the bridge's exit on that side of the Twins.

Arrows flew, but with Hathan and Dacey carrying the oak door, all four of them were able to get across the bridge safely, with only Roger taking an arrow to the side. His plate armor however defeated it, the range not low enough for the less powerful bow used here in the Riverlands to punch through.

Ranma joined them, taking cover behind the door and moving with them across the second half of the bridge. When they arrived at the portcullis on the other side, he raised Ice, its Valyrian steel gleaming with blue gold fire. "RAAH!" With a tinging sound the metal of the portcullis was sundered, and Hathan and Eddy reached forward, pushing it aside, while Ranma raced on, cutting through the interior door with as much ease.

It fell inwards, and Ranma led the rest of the wolfsworn in roaring. "Winter is coming, traitors!"

OOOOOO

Daenerys and Rickard were waiting with the rest of the Army. Ostensibly Daenerys was in charge, but she had learned over the past few weeks that her position at this point relied heavily on Ranma most particularly where it came to commanding the troops. It was not something that she particularly liked, but she was willing to put up with it for now. It did after all come with quite a few advantages... Despite the seriousness of the moment that thought nearly caused her to smile, but she didn't allow it just yet.

She heard a deep, basso rumble to her left. Looking to that side she saw Fenris and Nymeria stand up from where they had been lying to either side of her little ones. She took a moment just then to muse on the odd way the dragons and direwolves got on so well. Fenris she could understand, he had been around them since they hatched, and seemed to enjoy the big brother position just as much as Ranma did. Ghost, Summer and Nymeria though, their reactions were harder to explain. She discounted Shaggydog, since that one was decidedly unfriendly to anyone not of Stark or pack blood.

It was actually very simple, though it was based off how animals naturally thought in the wild merged with how the direwolves and draklings had been changed by their bonds to her and the Starks. In the wild, normal wolves and bears could coexist on the same hunting ground, not really competing for food or dens. Of course, direwolves did compete with bears all of the direwolves thought bears were delicious eating, and it would never do for another animal to think it was king of the forests. That was the reason why they were all willing to at least be neutral to the dragons. Dragons in the wild would not care about territory, and would not naturally feed on wolves unless there was no easier game.

This was combined with the fact that Daenerys was mate of the pack alpha Ranma and therefore pack herself. And since she, Ranma and Fenris all treated the draklings as pack, they were pack. Very odd pack-mates who preferred to fly rather than run, but that was okay. At least neither of them had the temper Shaggydog had somehow developed, and were well aware of pack hierarchy.

Daenerys laid a gentle hand on Fenris' neck. "What is it, Fenris?" The direwolf turned to her growling low under his throat and looking back at the Twins. Nymeria almost knocked Daenerys over, as she moved around the rousing draklings, rumbling slightly in her throat before turning back to look at the Twins. Daenerys rubbed her neck gently, while looking speculatively at the Twins, before looked at Rickard. "I think Lord Karstark you should start getting the men ready. Judging by Fenris and Nymeria reaction, what little chance of diplomacy winning out has failed."

Rickard scowled slightly at the Targaryen girl giving him an order directly like that, but couldn't fault her tone or words. And the direwolves did seem to be agitated... their connection to the Starks wasn't something Rickard looked too deeply into, but he knew it was there. So instead he simply nodded brusquely before moving off to do that very thing.

A tense hour followed then the noise of battle began to sound out into the morning air. The sound of shouting and alarms could barely be heard from here, but it was evident that Ranma and the rest of the wolfsworn were doing their bit. Daenerys stared at the castle, her eyes searching, then smiled grimly when the portcullis of the castle opened. She turned to Fenris, only to find him and Nymeria gone. She looked back at the castle and saw the two of them streaking along the ground faster than any natural wolf could move, with Fenris in the lead, his fur glowing slightly in the sun.

A moment later Smalljon raced out, some kind of bundle on his back. Rickard looked at Daenerys but she held up a hand, telling him to wait. Instead she turned to where her two draklings sat on the ground nearby hidden from sight by the same tent that obscured most of her own position. With a mental command she sent Sunfyre into the air, and he flew over the retreating a Smalljon.

Shouts of shock and fear went up from the walls of the Twins as they saw the dragon in the air, and more than a few archers tried to fire on it. But at the height he was flying Sunfyre could see their arrows coming and dodged them easily. He was also within range to hear what the old man-thing on the large bearded man-thing was shouting. Daenerys, riding his mind heard them too, and it was all she could do to stifle another giggle as Old Walder Frey kept on shouting. "Don't fire, don't fire!"

"Smalljon is coming back to us with a prisoner, I think we can take it as a given that you should begin your attack Lord Karstark." Daenerys said formally, while her other hand motioned to Rhaegon to join his brother in the air. Controlling both of them was somewhat difficult, but she had gotten used to it over the past few months.

The dragons flew in, staying well outside accurate bow range, flying easily away from the few scorpion bolts that came from the towers towards them, then breathed out there fire down at the defenders. The fire was more like a ball than a sheet of flame however. In point of fact they couldn't fly close enough to get any of the defenders without coming into effective bow range, but that was all right. They were mere distractions at the moment.

The real attack thundered forward on the hooves of the northern light cavalry, led by heavy cavalry men of house Manderly and Karstark and followed quickly by the rest of the Army that Ranma had led to Twins shouting the "North, the North, the King in the North!"

OOOOOO

Ranma and his group had barreled forward into the western castle, facing somewhat tougher opposition here since the men were fully prepared. But there weren't many of them, so while it slowed the wolfsworn down somewhat, they were still making good progress.

Hathan, Daryn and Dacey guarded Ranma and Eddy's back as the two of them lead the assault, breaking through every defense they faced. Edd's eyes were wild, almost bloodshot as he charged on roaring incoherently. Edd had several new bruises, even an arrow in the meat of his side but he just kept moving, his spear flickering out with speed and power. Looking at him Ranma decided that the ice giant's club had knocked something loose in his friend. Where before he fought similarly to Daryn, with finesse and a slight bit of flair, now he fought like a berserker.

Soon they had cleared the entire barbican, then broke out onto the walls. The archers on them quickly retreated back into the towers behind them, and the way was clear. Across the bridge they could see the rest of the army had stormed into the castle on that side. The light cavalry continued on the moment they saw the portcullis to the bridge open on this side. After them came the infantry and archers, who fought their way up onto the walls and from there into the interior of the keeps.

"I want no wholesale butchery!" Ranma shouted continuously as he moved to join the men assaulting the second keep, whose door was still closed.

The men who heard him nodded in acknowledgement, but kept their shields up. They were still taking arrows from the keep after all. This fire soon faded when another force of archers had taken a position on the walls. They slowly began to overwhelm the defenders fire from that equal vantage point.

Ranma took up position at the head of the assault, still shouting orders. "No rape! No butchery! If anyone kills a servant save in self-defense or molests a servant or Frey girl, I will gut that man and string up their entrails up for the entire army to see! Understood?"

They'll shouted back at that the understood, and Ranma turned, raising a fist and slamming it down onto the keep's door shattering it with a single blow before reaching back over his shoulder to pull Ice out of its sheath once more. Around him his friends pushed their way into the fore, and followed him in, joining him in the shout: "Winter is coming!"

With the courtyard under their control, the attackers now were clearing out the keeps on both side of the river. Jon and Rickard led the assault on one side, with Daenerys staying back in the camp with her dragons, now unneeded as decoys, and a few others.

On the fifth floor of the western keep Ranma rested for a moment against a wall, now really feeling the effects of using the Bakusai Tenketsu. In that moment of silence he could tell the battle was starting to die down. However he soon was called up to the front by Dacey's voice. "Um, Ranma, we have a bit of a situation here!"

Ranma groaned, but pushed off the wall and moved to join her. He found her standing in front of a door, motioning most of the other men with them at that point on. Some of them went reluctantly, a few men even looking as if they were about to attack Dacey, but Ranma's appearance made them turn away. Seeing that odd reaction Ranma had an idea of what they had found but asked anyway.

"I can hear children and women's voices in here." Dacey confirmed, her eyes locked on a few of the men who were moving past them. "What should we do?"

"Let's find out if this is the entirety of the children and women in the castle first." Ranma boldly broke open the door and moved inside then his hand flashed out to knee level to grab a sword aimed at his knee by a young boy of about twelve or so. He pulled it out of the boy's startled grip easily, holding it by the blade between thumb and forefinger. "Oh no, it's a midget with a sword, or no sword now. So, what're you going to do now kid?"

The boy got over his shock quickly. He tried to kick Ranma's leg, only to hop around in agony after his toes met Ranma's calf. "Yeah, you're not the first person to make that mistake."

Ranma watched him hop around a moment, looking around the room. There were about fifteen kids of various ages, most of them boys, with six young girls all seemingly younger than eleven or so. All of them were looking fearful when he entered, but seeing him not strike out at the boy with the sword they were beginning to calm down.

He went down on one knee in front of the boy, looking at him, smiling slightly. "So, what's your name midget, or should I just call ya 'Hoppy'?"

The youngster glared at him, but answered readily. "I'm Luke Frey, and I won't let you hurt any of my younger sisters or brothers!"

"Good attitude there Luke, but I think you need some instruction on how to use a sword first. Tell you what, why don't I leave Dacey here, she'll help you guard your siblings okay?"

"She?" Luke asked, turning to stare up at Dacey, who smirked down at him. "But, but women can't be warriors, they aren't strong enough."

Dacey smiled tapping the tabard she was wearing. "I'm from House Mormont lad. The women of my house have all been trained as warriors for generations."

Some of the boys and girls now crept closer, apparently made courageous by hearing a woman's voice despite Dacey's armored body and the blood splattered on her. Indeed, both she and Ranma were covered in gore but the children didn't seem to realize what they were seeing.

One of the girls, a pretty nine year old girl who wore a dress that looked more in keeping with a much older girl of Alayaya's former profession came forward. "Please sir, um... ma'am? Um, could you tell us what's going on?"

Ranma tugged at his ponytail for a moment, thinking how to explain this, then spoke. "Well, my name is Ranma Stark, my grandfather is Lord Hoster Tully, do any of you know who that is?" The older children all nodded, and Ranma nodded back. "My grandfather is in trouble, some bad golden haired people, the Lannisters are attacking the Riverlands, but he's so old he can't lead his men against them, so he sent for me."

To his surprise Luke spoke up then, his eyes and face much more serious than they had been when he had been looking at Dacey. "I heard something about that, great uncle Stev and Oly were arguing with some of our other uncles and grandfathers about it..." His face clouded over. "After that, I went to see if Oly would continue to train me, but I was told he was gone, and not to ask more."

Ranma nodded seriously, reaching forward to ruffle Luke's hair, and decided to tell them flat out, in terms they would understand, but he wasn't going to lie to them or try to come up with a fairy tale to tell them. "Well I came here to talk to your family and get its help when I march further south, but... your family should have been loyal to my grandfather, but Old Walder and most of the rest of your family were poisoned by their own ambition, because the Lannisters promised them a lot of gold and other things for their support. Black Walder..."

He stopped as the girl flinched, as did a few others of similar age. Right then if he could he would have resurrected Black just to kill him again with a rusty knife. "He admitted that Stevron was killed for saying House Frey shouldn't back the Lannisters. There might have been others similarly removed as well, and I'd guess this Oly would have been one of them. He and his men tried to attack me and my men, but we beat them back, and Black Walder is dead, along with his father."

Not a single child in that room looked anything but relieved at that, and Ranma found himself once again contemplating necromancy and various methods of slow, painful death. "Because of that and other crimes, when your great grandfather tried to capture me and my friends after letting us in under flag of parley, I was forced to attack them."

The boy closed his eyes tightly, fighting back tears for a moment, while a few of the other children began to cry quietly. Ranma rubbed Luke's head again, then gently handed the boy back his blade, a short sword of excellent quality, whose edge was equally good.

The boy looked down at the sword in his hand in shock then at Ranma, who still was down on one knee in front of him. After a moment he asked. "Please, sir, what's going to happen to us?"

"I won't lie to you Luke, I came here fully intention to punish your family if Old Walder didn't agree to follow me, and that was only made more certain when we were attacked under flag of parley. The Twins are going to be destroyed, and your family name erased." He went on hurriedly as Luke and the girl looked horrified. "But that doesn't mean anything will happen to you or the rest of the kids. In fact, you all might have the chance to earn your own names in time."

That won Ranma some odd looks, but he went on, his voice deliberately upbeat. "After all, you can't be held accountable for the old guy's actions can you? And I bet some of you have thought about being, oh, a sailor or a blacksmith or a dressmaker?"

At that some of the younger kids to clamor, all of them shouting out what they had wished to be at one point or another. One girl even proudly stated that she wanted to be a painter, and boldly pushed her way forward to take Ranma's arm and lead him over to where she had some paint supplies. She had painted a pretty darn good tree, thought the Forest Folk in its branches were obviously her imagination at work.

After Ranma exclaimed over her talent, telling her she could surely get an apprenticeship with an artist somewhere, Ranma turned back to Luke. "That is for the future. For now though, can I trust you to keep your siblings safe, Luke?"

Luke nodded firmly. "Yes sir."

"Good, but I'll still leave Dacey here to help you. If any of you are hungry or anything tell Dacey, and she'll send a runner for some food for you." With that, and a final ruffle of Luke's hair, Ranma nodded to a faintly smirking Dacey and left the room.

As soon as he was out in the corridor, Ranma shook his head. "What a fucked up situation this is."

OOOOOO

The sun was high in the sky as smoke rose from the Twins. Ranma and Daenerys stood in the courtyard of the eastern castle with a few of his friends. Lord Rickard, Domic and Jon were absent, seeing to the counting and distribution of the treasury of the Twins. All told, the Freys looked to have kept on hand almost as much money as House Stark did as an emergency fund. Even with the fifteen percent that would be divided out to the men who took part in the battle, it was a huge amount to add to their ready funds.

Ranma's portion as commander would be enough to pay the wages of the troops for a year, or for the entirety of the little project he could envision down the road. That didn't even count the goods, worked items and tapestries, all of which added at least half again to the amount they had in actual coinage.

Right now however neither Ranma nor Daenerys were thinking that far in the future. They had enough problems to deal with right now. "How many?" Ranma asked incredulously staring at Edd.

Edd scowled angrily. "We found something like forty women of various ages, not including the servants. Well I say women, some of them are about twelve or so, and three of those are already pregnant! One of them claimed that she slept with Old Walder recently, and seemed proud of it! Two of them were servants daughters, and couldn't say no when one of the Freys came calling."

Arya turned abruptly. "Excuse me, I'm going to go killed that old sack of shit now, slowly."

Smalljon grabbed her shoulder while Ranma shook his head. "I like the sentiment little sister, but it needs to happen in the proper order. How many of the girls are of marriageable age, real marriageable age I mean?"

"Half or so." Eddie said after a moment's thought. There's several of them that are quite pretty, but a handful have already begun trying to opportune some of the men, it seems a learned move on their part. One or two of them haven't, and they're angry and rather arrogant shouting imprecations at the guards constantly saying we'll pay for this, that their family had friends in high places and in the rest of the Riverlands that will come to avenge this insult, that kind of shit. Roger and Daryn are down there now guarding them. While I trust most of our men, well..."

That was a good move, Ranma reflected. Roger was a married man and knew for certain that his wildling wife would cut off his balls and use them as a purse if he touched another girl, while Daryn had recently married his childhood sweetheart. Moreover, the army had received a raven from House Hornwood at the Moat while Ranma and his siblings had been heading forward to talk to the blockade force, saying that Alys was already pregnant. So they would be able to ignore any offers the Frey girls sent their way.

Ranma ran one hand through his hair, tugging at his ponytail in thought. "Any further trouble with the youngster?"

"No, though its disturbing only four of the women came forward to claim being mother of this or that child, and all of them looked younger than twenty." Eddy shook his head. "The women here, especially those married to Old Walder, die quickly, worn out by childbirth apparently."

"In your opinion," Ranma went on still tugging at his ponytail. "Are those young unmarried girls and married women going to be a problem? And by problem I mean try to rally support from the small folk around here?"

"I don't think we need to worry about the smallfolk my Lord." Alayaya said from where she had set out food for them all on a table brought out of the keep, her face set in grimmer lines than most there had seen it. "I talked to the servants, and... House Frey did not so much rule its servants as prey upon them. Oh there were one or two that didn't but they were a drop against a rain storm, and even that ended with Stevron's death. However, House Frey is connected to several other noble houses and House Charlton on the other side of the river is beholden to them, much like the Knightly Houses you've already dealt with. And the smallfolk elsewhere on their lands might see things differently for a time, until the ones who were employed here begin to spread their stories."

"Thank you Alayaya." Ranma said smiling at her. Even in a simple Castle like this, the former whore's ability to speak to servants in a manner as a friend was much better than Brynden's ability to discover information on his own.

Ranma had already decided that the two of them would split Master of Whispers duties in the future. Brynden would be head of the army's division of that, it being a bit of a specialty of his from his time in the Ninepenny Kings War, and would handle the rural areas and the Lords. Alayaya on the other hand would handle all the cities, villages and towns and the small folk therein. It would take time of course, a lot of it, for the two of them to build up networks equal to that of the current Master of Whispers but Ranma was confident that once piece came they would be able to do it.

"What about the children, how many boys and girls?" Daenerys asked thoughtfully.

"About eleven boys of various ages from three to twelve, and six girls ages four to eleven." Ranma replied from memory. At that moment Cley walked up, looking a little green around the edges. Ranma moved over to him, clasping the youngster to him with one arm. "You alright, Cley?"

"I'll all be fines milo-er, I mean Ranma." The boy stuttered, Ranma having been very clear that despite being his ward he wanted Cley to address him as Ranma rather than Sir or Lord. "I mean it's just, it's just all the bodies, the bits, the blood, and the smell!" His stories never mentioned the smell!

Just thinking about it seemed to cause Cley to go even greener, and Ranma rubbed his back. "I know Cley. Bards tales and all those who think that war is so glorious never really look at the battlefield after a battle. If they did, they'd know the only honor worth anything is surviving, and there's no glory to have."

The boy nodded against his stomach, and Daenerys looked around. "We need to figure out what to do, both with the prisoners and with House Frey as a whole. Talk to the servants again Alayaya. If any can point out specific armsmen or surviving Freys, as the ones to commit specific crimes, ask them to do so and we'll see justice done."

Ranma nodded. "For now, round all the prisoners up, and get them out of the Castle. I want everyone out. Put the armsmen under guard somewhere. Keep Old Walder and the surviving Freys away from their armsmen. Move the kids out of the eastern castle down the road a ways, I bet Dacey and you, Arya, can convince them it's a campout or something for now."

As Eddy and the others left, Ranma turned to Daenerys. "What do you think we should do about the womenfolk? I already know what I want to do about the kids. I hadn't really thought of them, but I refuse to just kill them out of hand! Whatever their father or grandfather or whatever fuck relation they are to Old Walder, the children at least are innocent."

Daenerys nodded, though inwardly she felt that was rather naïve. Children as young as nine could kill after all. But Ranma was also right in that they could not blame the children for the sins of the father brother whatever. "We've already had one talk along such lines. I would not condone such for the children in any event." she said nodding her head. "As for the women, I have an idea there as well, but first we need to speak to them as well as the servants. We need to deal out justice here, not blind reprisals."

Ranma nodded firm agreement of that, and shared his plans for the children and any armsmen found to not be guilty of personal crimes. Eventually the two of them hammered out the details of what they would do, almost merging their plan equally, with Ranma agreeing to Daenerys's proposal about the women, and Daenerys agreeing in turn about the children, while modifying his plans for the armsmen.

OOOOOO

By the next day, they had gathered enough evidence on the armsmen to split them into two camps. One were innocent of preying on the servants or smallfolk, but still had followed orders from the Freys willingly. This first group was a little over a hundred men. This was about half of the survivors, discounting the women and children.

Ranma and Daenerys stood on the ruins of the Water Tower with Fenris and the draklings on either side of them along with forty men armed and ready for trouble, with nearly two thirds of the archers with Ranma's army on the walls of both castles. The prisoners were led out onto the bridge, though many had to be pushed on when they caught sight of Daenerys. They had heard about the dragons in the sky during the battle, but to see a Targaryen and the dragons up close like this was astonishing.

It was a reaction the two of them had thought long about before deciding to cultivate. The dragons at this moment were not really a threat against a prepared, well-armed enemy, but how many people would realize that? While it was unlikely that the rumors of the dragons would win them any fights, it might make some lords much more uneasy about fighting them in the first place. Daenerys too hoped to connect the rumors of the dragons to her own actions and temperament in people's minds, further distancing herself with her mad father.

Having been coached on the need to be slightly dramatic at this point by Domic, Ranma let the silence build for a moment after the prisoners were led in front of him. Then he began in a loud, clear voice that carried easily across the entire bridge. "All of you followed your lord into dishonor. That you kept your oaths to him is no mark against you, but you still must be punished for following his unlawful orders. I was named by my grandfather, Lord Tully, as his voice in this current crisis. As such, House Frey should have taken the field with me once I informed them of the true traitors to the crown, that the child that sits on that throne now has not an ounce of Baratheon blood in him."

That caused a round of shock, not that the rumors, and more importantly Lord Stannis' propaganda hadn't reached them, but to hear it so boldly spoken was still a surprise. Some of the more cynical of the prisoners thought that saying such was a ploy, considering the Starks had jumped into bed with the Targaryens, but most took it at face value.

Alayaya and Domic had both informed Ranma of Stannis' declaration having heard about it from the farmers and then again here in the Twins from the servants, as well as a few other rumors about what was happening further south. The power of rumor was incredible, truly, but Ranma wondered what kind of evidence Stannis had about the incest part.

When Myrcella had heard about that part she had looked sick at the very idea, though they still couldn't say for sure that she wasn't a Baratheon. The Citadel hadn't been able to get back to them about that yet, and of course a raven couldn't find an army, so even if they sent word of it to Greywater Watch, it would take time to get to them.

Not that it mattered to Ranma, not really. He had made certain Merry knew that her parentage didn't matter at all to him. Daenerys said the same thing, though given her family's history it hadn't had the same impact as Ranma's declaration.

For now however Ranma had other things to concentrate on. "Instead of even hearing me out, House Frey's representative and Lord decided to try and play for whatever gain they could, and when I refused to play that game, they threw over their oaths to their lord Paramount in return for future promises of power from the Lannisters. For that House Frey is no more, and we could easily demand the heads of all of you and your fellows."

Daenerys spoke up then as the prisoners began to look at one another fearfully. "However, because those of you before us now have not been named by any of the servants here in the Twins as having preyed upon them as many of the Freys did, you get to live. But you don't get off scot-free."

Pointing towards the western side of the bridge Ranma brought the prisoners attention to a group of three hundred light cavalry led by Daryn Hornwood, along with a few other men who looked remarkably uncomfortable in the saddle. One of them was the smallfolk architect that Bran had recommended to Ranma. He didn't bear a weapon instead he carried a large satchel stuffed full of writing equipment and large sheaths of parchment, all of it covered with designs of what Ranma was thinking of calling the Royal Canal.

"You will serve the realm as workers for five years. You will be fed and clothed and treated honorably in that time while you work on whatever project myself or my representatives give to you. After those five years, you will each be given a hundred silver stags and let on your way. These men will lead you off now to head down to Seagard, where your first project will be organized. But first" he said sternly staring at them all. "You will each give your oath on your own names to only react in self-defense if someone attacks you, and to never bend the knee as armsmen once more to any lord."

He let the prisoners talk about it amongst themselves for a moment before beginning again. "Who will be first?" That process went on for some time but after it was done those men went off in rather high spirits. It wasn't often that armsmen survived the destruction of their Lord's house after all, and it was better than being forced to choose between death or the Night's watch.

The next group was simpler. This was the group of armsmen and Freys that had been accused of rape. Ranma's voice was even more stern and cold as he looked down at this group, nearly seventy armsmen and twelve men of Frey descent. "As armsmen and relatives, you could be excused for following your father or Lord into dishonor, but you all took a step further. Where some of your fellows went along with his orders but did not partake of his depravities, you all did. You each stand accused of rape, abuse of the servants that should've looked to you for protection, along with treason against your Lord Paramount siding with the Lannisters who even now are ravaging the Riverlands in return to seeing your father or your Lord raised to my grandfather's place."

Knowing the penalty for treason several of the prisoners tried to make a break for it at that point, trying to get up from where they had been forced to kneel, but none of them could get away. They were forced to remain there, each man held down by two of his.

At that moment Dacey and Alayaya led the maids and a few of the surviving Frey women, those who had not bought into their place in the Frey's world, who were raped or coerced by their own relations rather than play that game. This was Daenerys' addition to this portion of their day's bloody business, and Ranma, though a little worried about it, couldn't argue against it being a truer example of justice than most.

Each woman moved down the line of prisoners, staring at each man before selecting one man or another each. Many of the men cried out to the women, trying to get them to speak up, yelling at them to save them, but were answered with hard glares and hated looks.

Several women clustered around one of the Frey men, and a silent argument began on, Ranma supposed, who had precedence. Eventually one woman, an older, pregnant woman who looked about five months along won out, and was given a long, extremely sharp dagger. Like the other women, she took up position behind the man she had selected.

Now Daenerys spoke up. "Normally in the North, the man who passes the sentence wields the sword. But in this, we feel that it is true justice to have the victims carry out your sentence. For treason, rape, and abuse of those smallfolk who you should have protected instead, the sentence is death, to be carried out immediately by those you abused."

At her nod the men holding the prisoners pulled their heads back, baring their throats to the women. Ranma had thought that at this point a few of them might have hesitated, after all it was much easier to say you wanted someone dead then staring into his eyes and taking his life yourself. But only one, the youngest girl there, a servant girl barely Merry's age, even hesitated before plunging her blade into her rapist's throat like her fellow victims.

Ranma stared down at the carnage, shaking his head at the bloody business. Daenerys who had watched with pale face but stern eyes, squeezed his hand. "Just remember, more than one Lord would've included the children and the other armsmen in this, and wouldn't have cared about the rape and abuse. This way, the women gain some closure, and justice is served."

"I know, but it doesn't make me feel any better." Daenerys nodded wordless agreement, squeezing Ranma's hand harder.

The children were next, which was much easier. Thanks to Ranma's earlier actions, the boys and girls trusted him so when he told them what was going to happen to them they took it much better than would otherwise have been the case. The boys would serve in the army as gofers until they reached Seagard. Once there, if one of the lords or knights (mostly from the Manderly faction, which made up the larger portion of Ranma's present heavy cavalry) had decided to take them up to be their squires that would happen then. Any boys who weren't thus employed would be handed over to the maester at Seagard who would find them professions where they would take on their masters names for now until they reached sixteen, where they would then be able to choose a new name for themselves.

The Frey name was gone now, the House destroyed, its members scattered and the name itself taken from the survivors of their assault. Though there were still few Freys alive at Casterly Rock and in the Lannister armies, without their house to back them, they would be just another group of swordsmen. Or pensioners, and the Lannisters were not known to be kind to such. The boys and women taken captive here, those who were judged to not be trouble in the future, would be allowed to choose their own names. So long as they never called themselves Freys and never tried to become lords once more, that was enough.

The girls would be handed over to the septas, but would be able to leave that service at any time if they found a profession they enjoyed after finishing their educations to the satisfaction of the septas. The young girl whose painting Ranma had looked at was ecstatic about that bit. Truthfully the girl was so good already at painting that Ranma was going to leave money to pay for her education with Lord Mallister's household. He had no doubt that a few years from now she would become a famous artist.

The only exception to this was one the older pregnant servant woman and her child, a boy of three. They were allowed to go their way with two men of House Manderly guarding them. Her family had a farm within a day's travel, and she would be welcomed back there. Another exception was a young girl and her sister, one of the young girls. The two of them had been sent to serve the Freys in lieu of paying a loan back their family of farmers had accrued since their older brother had taken over the farm. They were sent further North with the severely wounded, those who would not be able to take the field again, and a few crannogmen scouts who had come along to report directly back to Lord Reed. They would be escorted to Greywater Watch, where they would enter Lady Reed's service.

Soon however the kids too were walked over the bridge to join the army's main encampment there.

The next bit Daenerys handled entirely, because Ranma crossed the bridge and began his work on the eastern portion of the Twins. The unmarried and married women who had tried to either by threats or coercion escape the army's custody that they would all be sent further north via the supply depot then up to White Harbor to join the Silent Sisters, which had a sept there. They would be sent with a band of twelve men of House Ryswell, walking wounded who needed the time to heal before rejoining the army later on.

Halfway through that pronouncement there was a tremendous rumble sounded from the inner keep of the western castle. All of the women turned to look as the keep, which could be seen over the outer wall from the bridge, began to crumble down. Cries of dismay and shock rang out from them, but were silenced when Daenerys continued. Those women were soon led off to join their guards on the western side of the Green Fork, finding to their shock that the outer wall too had been demolished, torn apart by something that sliced through the wall low down then let gravity do the rest.

Ranma had used the Kijin Raishin Dan after making certain no one could see him, or, you know, was in range of the blades. The vortal blades were far more deadly and just a bit easier to use than the Bakusai Tenketsu, but because they were so deadly and couldn't be aimed, they were a weapon of last resort for Ranma. Moreover, Ranma wanted to keep them a secret weapon, since he feared that Viserys and the drakling Daenerys was forced to leave behind would be trouble in the future. If the dragon kept to the sky, the vortal blades of the Loud Thief were the only techniques Ranma had that he could use against them in this dimension.

Still here they could be used to demolish the Twins entirely. No other family would be able to come in and take it over. The only things left would be the two barbicans on either side of the bridge. Those would be held by a force of archers and infantry left here who would be supplied by House Reed, their leader a Stark man from House Forrester.

Ranma wanted it that way for more reasons than simply setting an example or shattering the Frey's power. No, the Twins had been too distant from the rest of the Riverlands, made too powerful by their tolls. Its placement had allowed the Freys far too much leeway, and he didn't want any other house to think they could try the same thing again. The bridge and the barbicans would be run by his men for now, and the crown in time, with the taxes to use it going directly to the crown. This would be but the first of many such areas which would be called royal reserves in the future.

With that done Ranma walked across the bridge to give the western portion of the Twins the same treatment while Daenerys went on to the more innocent among the women. They would be sent to Barrowton, where they would be given twenty silver stags and housing until they found work. If they could not, they would be remanded to the septas there. This group would be watched just in case, hence their going to Barrowton, whatever she lacked in other areas, Lady Dustin would be able to keep a firm hand on them.

That left Old Walder, who Ranma would see to personally. The old man, who suffered from gout and other issues due to his old age, had spent a very uncomfortable night in the tent assigned to him. His day however was much worse. It began when he was dragged through the ruins of what had once been his castle. He gaped around at the castle which had been destroyed, crumbling down into itself after Ranma had sliced through its first story. Plus more than a bit of work up top of course, just to make the ruin even more total.

He paled even more seeing the Water Tower down, and the keep on the other side of the Green Fork also having collapsed. He almost looked like he was having a heart attack just then, but he seemingly recovered from that, instead simply gazing around his eyes dead. When he spoke his voice showed his will had broken. "What have you done, wh, what have you all done!"

"What I had to." Ranma said grimly. "The Twins made you strong, the Twins made you think you were untouchable, the Twins are no more. Your name is gone, your castle is gone. Nothing will be left of either of these castles or your house's power base because you decided that your personal ambition was worth more than your family's duty to your Lord Paramount, more than the truth of who the real traitors were, and apparently more than your own word of honor."

Old Walder seemed to shrink into himself even further, but Ranma was not finished. "Walder no name, you stand accused of treachery, of breaking the peace of the realm by joining the traitorous Lannisters, of breaking the sanctity of parley and of inciting kinslaying among your own family. Do you have anything to say before sentence is carried out?"

The old man stared around at everything that he had thought so strong so inviolate, the rubble that Ranma had made of the Twins. Eventually he found his voice once more. "My family has members and men already serving with the Lannister force. They will avenge me, and rebuild our house. Your declaration of annulment of our name will not last longer than your own breathing boy. Do your worst." Even though the words were challenging and even brave, his tone showed how uncertain he was of that, and how fearful he was of death finally claiming him.

Ranma nodded, and said simply. "So be it. As my grandfather's voice I found you guilty, and as the man who gave the sentence, I will wield the sword." He raised Ice and swung it, once.

Old Walder's head bounced away for a moment before Smalljon, with a look of distaste kicked it off the bridge and into the water of the Green Fork far below. The man's body followed it, joining the men who had been executed earlier that day and Ranma at last nodded grimly. "Now that this little sideshow's done, perhaps we can concentrate on Tywin?"

OOOOOOO

At the same time that Ranma and Daenerys were meting out justice, two fleets were coming in sight of the ports they were currently making for. One of them was coming into sight of Planky Town, and the other was sailing into the port of Duskenale. Worse, fleets of black painted longships were also nearing their disparate targets. The game of thrones was about to get two new players, and Stannis would be once more on the move soon.

End chapter

---

So, the Freys no longer have a power base, but there are still dozens of them out there, and while essentially powerless now, they might try to make trouble in the future. Now the riverlands campaign hits full swing, as the war becomes more deadly and convoluted.

For those of you worried about how Daenerys was starting to take center stage away from Ranma or become a Mary Sue, this chapter should have shown you she was still human, and will make mistakes in the future. One in particular will come back to bite them on the ass, HARD. Hope the bit with the Tyrell's talking about thier current course and thier options make sense, after all, if they turned coat too quickly, they would be seen like the Freys in many ways. I also found it odd that Willas, despite being the oldest, was the only Tyrell son to not be seen as a great knight. I hope to prove going forward that great knight doesn't equate to great commander, or vice versa.

Hope you all enjoyed this blood and violence, and as always please review.

*Chapter 12*: Chapter 12

I do not own Ranma 1/2 of ASOIAF. Obviously.

Thanks go to Anthony44 for once more being my sounding board/source of info for all things ASOIAF and for betaing the chapter.

Chapter 12 Blood In The Water, Arriving Flame

From where he stood at the front of the ship he had designated as his flagship for his triumphal return to Westeros, Viserys laughed quietly under his breath as he watched the small patrol boats of Planky Town scattering here and there. "It seems as if we have dropped a few stones into a pond here, my dear." He said looking over at where his queen was sitting underneath an awning on a bed of pillows.

Nodding, Arianne smirked a little. "I predict that reaction will not be the only ripple your arrival causes; my king." She always called him 'your grace' or 'my king' in public, it never hurt to butter Viserys up. It made him easier to control something she knew would be needed in the future. The edge she saw in him hadn't faded, indeed it had become more visible every time they talked about their plans going forward, but at least she had become very adroit at steering him using her various wiles. Arianne went on, looking at where Balerion was tethered by a heavy chain next to her husband. "Especially when news of your Balerion spreads."

Viserys nodded judiciously, but they both knew that it would be at least another year before Balerion was ready to be ridden. Though he did not know it, Viserys did not share the ability to meld mind to mind with his dragon that his sister possessed. That meant he could not allow Balerion to fly at any great distance or train him beyond a very limited amount. He allowed the quickly growing black dragon to fly occasionally tethered by a heavy rope to build up muscles but that was all he could allow, else the dragon slip his control before they were truly imprinted on one another. More, Balerion had yet to breathe fire.

"I think I'll let him fly around a bit on his tether when we start docking, that will allow the largest number of people to see him and start spreading the word. Shock and awe are potent weapons after all." Viserys smirked, before going on more seriously. "What should we expect from the officials here?" He had asked that question before, but it always helped to go over such things.

Behind their flagship the other ships that he, Arianne and Illyrio had commissioned were spread out across the ocean, all of them carrying the mercenaries they had put under with Ser Jorah acting as commander. They were without the Company of the Cat as yet since their factor had badly underestimated the time it would take them to get to Pentos from where they had been in the Disputed Lands. Instead, Viserys had to send half his ships to pick them up in Myr. The trip from there however would be far quicker than the trip from Pentos, so the Company was only about two weeks behind them.

"As their princess I'll be able to override any officious buffoon who tries to stop our troops disembarkation." Arianne said smiling thinly. "Planky Town answers directly to my family, and I have no doubt that all of the officials here will be sending word to my father the moment they realize I have returned."

Behind them Illyrio sat on his own bed of cushion, looking like a very oddly whiskered walrus as he waved his hand through the air trying to cool himself down. Pentos shared latitude with King's Landing and thus like that city was warm year-round. But here at the southernmost edge of Dorne it was hot, something Illyrio was not used to and which was melting the fat off him slowly. That had begun weeks ago however, so he was somewhat used to his body's complaints. "Will we wait here for Bloodbeard and his fellows?" Bloodbeard was the leader of the Company of the Cat.

"No." Viserys said chopping one hand through the air. "I want to confer with Prince Doran before I decide on a course of action, get the latest news and be prepared to give Bloodbeard his orders immediately as they disembark." He laughed harshly. "Even in comparison to the mercenaries with us at present the company of the Cat is not comprised of men you would wish to have linger in your town at any time, let alone after a sea voyage."

Arianne grimaced internally at the amusement in Viserys' voice at that but nodded. Such men were useful, but Viserys was right, she didn't want them on her family's land for any longer time than was necessary. I wonder what my father will think, she thought. Especially considering that this was in fact the match that he wished for me, he shouldn't have very many complaints on that score. But finally being forced to choose a side, and to act openly? That might give him a heart attack. For some reason Arianne could not find any sympathy in her for that response.

OOOOOO

Prince Doran looked at his chief factor from Planky Town and for once his face showed his emotions, which were a jumble of pure shock, dismay, and worry. "Could you say that again? I could've sworn you said that my daughter returned with a man under the Targaryen banner and a fleet at their back."

The other man, an elderly gentleman of age with Doran, licked dry lips but nodded. "That is indeed what I said my Lord, we spotted the Targaryen flag several hours out, and I went to the tallest watchtower with a spyglass to see everything I could before reporting to you. There were about twelve ships give or take. All of those I saw looked like transports, trade cogs not warships, and from what I could tell filled with rather disreputable looking mercenaries. A few of the ships were manned by troops who looked more disciplined, but those were the minority."

"Never mind that, man!" Doran barked sharply, bringing one aged hand down on his armrest. "Tell me more about what you saw on the flagship! Are you certain you saw the banner of House Targaryen?"

"Yes my Lord, it's quite distinct, a three-headed red dragon on a black background. And I recognized the Princess sitting under an awning next to a man who had silver hair." The factor licked his lips again and went on. "I waited until they were near to docking before coming here to see you my Lord, and as I waited, I saw something astonishing. The, the man, he, he brings a dragon! He let it fly around the ship on an extremely long rope before coaxing it back in with food. Everyone on the wharf saw it!"

News of Daenerys return and her two dragons had not yet reached Dorne, so this sighting came as a distinct surprise. In response Doran fell back into his chair almost in a faint, one hand clutching at his chest. His thoughts however were almost but not quite removed from the panic his body was going through. This is the best outcome I could've hoped for from Arianne's little jaunt, it matches my own long-term plans, and yet...

And yet now that it came to it, Doran was extremely reluctant to actually act, regardless of Viserys bringing a dragon with him. All of Westeros seemed to be falling into war, with only his own realm and that of the Vale untouched by it as yet. This however would plunge his people into that war, and Doran suddenly found himself having great difficulty reconciling that.

That was why Doran could not hide his dismay from his daughter's eyes when she and Viserys marched into the great Hall of Sunspear two days later. This was the same hall where Doran had greeted his brother's return with the Mountain's head, and the same where he had ordered his brother's arrest. Doran had avoided the place since, but for this he had to be formal.

Doran locked eyes with the Targaryen prince and shuddered a little seeing what was burning there. A need for blood and vengeance that he had seen in his younger brother's eyes more than once. This is a man who burns for vengeance as bitterly as any of my family, but will it be the rest of Westeros or my family who pays the higher price to achieve it?

Yes, Doran was very reluctant to finally start to act, and it was only his decades of experience that allowed him to keep his dismay from his face when his daughter curtsied floridly to his throne and declaimed loudly. "Father, may I present Viserys Targaryen, heir of House Targaryen, rightful King of Westeros, future rider of the dragon Balerion, and my husband." The way she said that last word showed that Arianne had discovered that her marriage had been a long term scheme of his, and that she wasn't happy he had kept that from her.

For a few moments Doran did not say or do anything, simply staring at his daughter and Viserys, his eyes and face not showing anything of his thoughts as usual. In reality, he was trying to get control of himself before he spoke. When he did speak the quavering his voice was easily mistaken for happiness. "You are welcome home daughter and you as well... Your Majesty. Your loyal subjects have missed you." So my side is chosen for me, and nothing I can do will ever allow me to regain my neutral position. So be it, this is what I worked for, and it seems I must see it through.

OOOOOO

How many days had it been since his own brother had imprisoned him here? Oberyne didn't know, and didn't care. The room was comfortable enough, and Doran's servants certainly fed him well enough, despite the fact that he had slain four of them when the guards had come to forcefully arrest him. That didn't matter either, all that mattered was that he was a prisoner, that he was being kept here rather than being allowed to seek out justice for his dead daughter.

Justice, vengeance or what have you, Oberyne thought his mind somewhat more lucid than it normally was these days, as he had tried to drink himself into a stupor practically every day since being imprisoned there. I care not which or what other people label it as. I will see that Lannister bitch dead and Robert too.

That thought jarred him a little as his memory replayed something a servant had passed on from his brother's spies, something about Robert already being dead? But even so his brat was still around, his family was still around, and the bitch queen was still alive. All of them would feel the sting of the Viper's fangs eventually.

Eventually my brother's guards will relax and I will slip my cage once more. Just one little crack, just one guard a few minutes late to his post or nodding off of a night, that's all I need. Oberynd was overlooking the fact that given his current semi-inebriated state he probably couldn't have made it out of the castle without a great deal of luck, nor would he have cared if someone else pointed out. Not after hearing how his daughter Tyene had been sentenced to death, and his on-again off-again lover Daemon slain in her defense. Will the Lannisters never stop heaping insults upon my family? All of them, every stinking golden haired lion or whore-son Baratheon will die by my hands!

Oberynd looked up abruptly as sounds approached in the corridor outside his gilded cage. It wasn't yet dinnertime, so either the servant coming to serve him food was coming very early or something interesting was happening. He languidly stood up, moving with that precise sort of movement of the very inebriated, his hands flexing with violent intent.

He stopped however as the captain of the guard moved through the door, his heavy axe in one hand as always. Areo Hotah was a powerfully built man who hailed from the Essos city of Norvos, and had been trained by the bearded priests in his war craft. The axe he held, which had a shaft six feet long, was his wife as well as his weapon, signifying his loyalty to the one he was sworn to. In Areo's case that was Doran, whose service he had entered when Doran's wife, who also hailed from Norvos, came to Dorne.

"Prince Oberynd," Areo said, gesturing to two servants behind him. "These two will help you get changed dressed and shaved, you are wanted to take part in a war council."

"A war council?" Oberynd said, his voice slurring very slightly. "For what reason, so that my brother might figure out a better way to rattle his sabers on this edge of the passes, so that he can puff our numbers up further rather than actually use them? Why would Doran need me for that?"

"There have been events occurring Prince Oberynd beyond Dorne's borders, some of which require your brother to renege his refusal to allow you your freedom." Areo replied, his bearded face showing none of his thoughts about either Oberynd's imprisonment, or the events he was speaking of.

Oberynd's eyes widened, and then widened further as the man moved to one side allowing his oldest daughter Obara to enter. Her eyes were slightly red rimmed, not from crying, none of his daughters would waste water on that, but from rage at the news she had heard mere hours ago. She had never really liked Tyene all that much, but they had been sisters, and that was that. "I'm sorry father!" she said shaking her head moving forward to help the servants getting ready for the war council. "If I had stayed behind...!"

"I might well be mourning both you and Tyene now, and the Princess would now be in Lannister hands, a tool they would use to keep us from acting. I presume your return means that you and she have something to do with my newfound freedom?" Oberynd said, each word coming out with less and less alcohol-induced slur. He now straightened up, showing nothing of his inebriation. It was still there, but he had long developed the ability to function even while rip-roaring drunk, a must-have ability for mercenaries Oberynd had learned while in Essos.

As his daughter made to protest he slashed his hand through the air. "Enough, we will talk later tonight. We will mourn together for Tyene, but for now, justice and vengeance means we must keep a level head and put aside grief."

OOOOOO

The princes of Dorne met with Viserys, the captain of the guard and several others, including Obara and Nymeria Sand, another daughter of Oberynd's, to discuss what should be done. At twenty-five years old with a slender build, dark green eyes, full lips and a beautiful face framed by straight black hair worn in a long braid, Nymeria had all the beauty her older sister Obara lacked. Despite her elegance and poise however, she was just as much a warrior as Obara, and always had daggers hidden about her person.

Arianne was there as well, though she had taken the intervening time to grieve for her friend Tyene who had been Arianne's favorite among the Sand Snakes. Her eyes were still red rimmed from crying, and she did not look nearly as composed or lushly sensual as normal as she sat next to her husband. Yet despite being so tear stained her eyes were sharp and hard. Arianne would go back to crying after the meeting, go back to blaming herself for not having brought Tyene along with her on the ship with Ranma, for wanting her to remain to watch the court, for getting Tyene killed more than anyone else could ever truly say. For now, they had plans to make, plans to bring their house to prominence in Westeros again, plans for justice and the ruin of their enemies.

Viserys took command of the meeting immediately as was his right as King, and there was a hard light in his eyes that matched those of his wife and Oberyn as he tapped the map laid out on the counsel table. He first went into their own preparations: the number of mercenaries he had gathered, how long it would take Balerion to be large enough to ride and thereby become an offensive force and the number of ships he had under his command. This included two war galleys, each of them armed with four scorpions on top of the seventeen transport ships, five of which weren't here yet since they were carrying the Company of the Cat from Myr.

Then he went on more reluctantly to mention the fact that his sister had absconded with two dragon eggs, and that she may be allied with the Starks. "But of course, she lacks the true fire of our family, she'll mollycoddle them, that'll make them useless for war, pampered pets if that. I don't doubt that they'll be fond of her, but Daenerys would sooner cut her own throat than use them in war, she's too soft to give the dragon the harsh training they require to be of any use. They'll be a symbol nothing more."

"I would urge reconciliation with her." Doran said promptly. "Regardless of how she treats them she has two dragons, one more than could be used. We could possibly find a dragonseed after the war is over to help train the third. Together the two of you could also prove a much more potent symbol than alone. Plus, if we make peace with her, she may bring in the Starks on our side."

"No!" Viserys barked, shaking his head, before going on in a more controlled voice. "She will never side with me. Daenerys has always been jealous that I was born older than her, but never so brave as to truly do what needs to be done. In the future we might be able to talk her into surrendering..." he went on reluctantly. "But before that she will do us damage by showing that our house is not united in our desire to take the Iron Throne."

"Could we send out assassins?" Arianne asked her father. "Either for Daenerys or against her dragons? As magnificent as they are, I would sooner have them dead than used against us."

Her husband looked as if he was about to explode at that last idea, but subsided slowly allowing Doran to answer. "No. For one thing, any assassin we send from here from our own... local resources would have to travel overland through all of Westeros into the war zone that is the Riverlands and then beyond to the North. That's a difficult trek even in peacetime. As it is now, there is no chance of it occurring. And paying for a true trained assassin, even a Sorrowful man rather than a Faceless, would cost as much as one of your smaller mercenary companies. Besides, dragons are almost impossible to kill by poison."

Despite that Doran wondered if it was possible, and thought about how the dragons had died out before. If I had a way to contact Sarella in Oldtown, I might have her look into that for me based on certain... rumors, but as it is...

"True." Viserys said thoughtfully. "For now, on to other matters. Thanks to the Usurper's death, all of Westeros is now ripping itself apart and I would like to hear what has gone on of late. We've been at sea for over a month now, what has happened since? What are the sides that have formed since the pretenders death?"

Doran spoke, his voice softer now. "Much has occurred. Rumors have come out of King's Landing about what truly happened to cause the break between House Stark and House Lannister." He briefly outlined those rumors, and then looked at his daughter. "You are the only one here who has actually been around the Baratheon boy in even somewhat close circumstances, what are your thoughts?"

Frowning thoughtfully Arianne took a moment to think before speaking. "I would say that there is not an ounce of Baratheon blood in him, that part at least is correct. But I saw no evidence of anything going on between the Kingslayer and Cersei, and I note that even Stannis isn't actually advertising the proof of that. I would say stay well away from that aspect in our own propaganda, a lie in such a thing could come back to bite us."

To her side Obara and Oberyn both nodded agreement. Oberyn expounded further. "I never saw any evidence to suggest he was the Kingslayer's son when I was there for the Tourney, though that doesn't mean much. He and his sister do look so alike there would be nothing physical to show that, but from what little I could see but the brat didn't have any aptitude towards weapons-craft or to anything else Jaime is known to be fond of."

Doran nodded and went on describing what else had been occurring of late, finishing with how the Lannisters had been stalled in their northern march, which made all of his listeners smile and frown in turn. They smiled because they liked hearing about the Lannisters facing a setback, and frowned because if Tywin Lannister had finished his march up north, he would've been too far out of position to do anything about their own movements quickly.

He did not know that the northern army was already in the field in the Riverlands, and had no idea that the Freys had already fallen. Nor did he have any idea about the former Mountain's Men and others being sent into the western marches of the Reach. Nor did Doran, not having any sort of real naval power, know that the Ironborn were on the move.

"The fact that Renly is making his own play for the throne isn't surprising." Viserys said thoughtfully, exchanging glances with Jorah and Illyrio who had helped the traitor Domeric give Viserys a decent grasp of both Baratheon brothers. "He's always looked down on Stannis and the Usurper's favoring him didn't help. But how effective will he be in the field? And while the Reach will let him field a huge army, how loyal are they really? Their House and your own, Prince Doran, were the two Lord Paramounts that were loyal to my family to the end. Despite the fact that they were led by that incompetent, Mace Tyrell, imagine becoming so embroiled in besieging Storm's End that you forget that the real prize so King's Landing and the Iron Throne!" He shook his head, half in amusement and half in anger at that bungle. The man would pay for that down the line, but at present that connection might prove useful.

"The Houses of the Reach may march in lockstep for now." Oberyn said musingly. "However, there are many lords that would be unhappy with Mace personally if they receive a setback or two. If they do, then Renly and his power grab may collapse internally if they are shown that they have other options. The Florents for certain would be looking for any excuse to change sides if they lose men in the field. And House Hightower as well, they've never been very happy with Baratheon rule."

Viserys nodded sharply. "If you have enough ravens here my Lord, I will pen messages to every noble house you can think of that might show more loyalty to us than to Renly the Pretender. It could not hurt after all to show that there are better options around now."

"But..." he went on his eyes hardening and lighting with eagerness. "In the end Renly's claim or his brother's do not matter! We will conquer the whole of Westeros by fire and blood if need be to claim my rightful place and gain your family's revenge!" Doran was the only Martel at that table who did not shout aloud in vehement agreement, and more than one advisor also nodded as well, though tellingly this did not include Areo Hotah.

After a moment Oberyn looked down at the map on the table. "So now we should talk about specific plans."

"I'm thinking of a large feint: a threat that the other side will have to honor, but which will draw even more of their attention elsewhere while we strike someplace else entirely." Viserys said looking at over at Oberyn. He outlined what he wanted to do, and Oberyn winced a little at the idea of trying to time movements like that over such large distances. Still, each segment by itself was workable.

Eventually they came to an agreement. Oberyn would lead the mercenaries up the Greenblood then the Scourge before marching through the desert to Yronwood. There he would join the eight thousand men already gathered there doing the saber rattling he had been so dismissive of earlier that day. Oberyn would then march through the Boneway to fall on the Stormlands. They were not to be bogged down anywhere in sieges however, they were the diversion. The real blow would land elsewhere, commanded by Viserys and Jorah, with the men of the nearby Dornish houses and those who could send their men to Planky Town that hadn't already been committed, a force numbering around twelve to fourteen thousand.

Not really having much to contribute to talk about the war effort Arianne leaned back, letting the talk wash over her. Though she would later help pen Viserys' notes to the Reach Lords, right now Arianne was wondering two things in particular. One, where Ranna and Daenerys were, and two, who really had poisoned young Tommen kicking off the shit storm in King's Landing that began the war between lion, stag and wolf.

OOOOOO

At around the same time that the eldest Targaryen sibling was arriving in Planky Town, Stannis was arriving with his fleet in Duskenale. Nearly every ship of the fleet was behind him, waiting their turn to come in and to disgorge the soldiers on them. The first ten did so quickly, before pulling away to let the next ten take their place. The disembarkation would take nearly four full days, given the size of the docks and the number of ships. The city also couldn't house all of the troops, not without causing a lot of dislocation.

The first thousand plus infantry moved with Lord Errol in command took command of the wharf quickly, making certain the rest of the disembarkation went smoothly. Not that the locals seemed in any hurry to try. Indeed the smallfolk were all dashing inside to get away from what they thought might be invaders. Barring issues, Sebastian Errol would turn that duty over to the next group ashore which was led by a knight from Dragonstone, before heading out of the city with his men to set up a base camp for the army.

As this was going on, Stannis and a party of three hundred moved through the town towards House Rykker's Dun Fort. It was the sight of the Defiance of Duskendale, which many saw as the point where Aerys began to sink into madness. Why the fort was left standing after that is beyond me but if Rykker thinks to do aught but immediately bend the knee, I will rectify that mistake quickly.

Despite that thought Stannis knew Rykker wouldn't do anything so foolish. He was a cautious man, who would follow whoever seemed strong at the time. Since it was his army disembarking into Duskendale right now, that was Stannis. Of course that means he'll back someone else if they come close enough to threaten the city, but so long as he doesn't support them in the field I'll let that slide for now. Leaving thought of Renfred Rykker for now, Stannis turned his thoughts to what had been happening in the past month or so.

While he had been traveling from the Stormlands up to Dragonstone, battling the weather most of the way, Davos Seaworth had performed in an exemplary fashion. First Seaworth brought both houses he had been sent to parlay with, Bar Emmon and Massey, to Stannis's side. This added a little under three and a half thousand men into his army from Massey, which had not been weakened much in Robert's Rebellion, and another thousand, two hundred from Bar Emmon, which like much of the rest of the Crownlands, had been badly hammered in Robert's Rebellion. Davos then acted on his own to negotiate with Salladhor Saan, a Lysene based pirate lord.

At that point Stannis had arrived at Dragonstone. After praising him for the work he had already done, under Stannis set Davos the task of leading a small group of galleys down to burn out House Tarth's port on Estermont. He had rejoined Stannis' main force barely a half day away from Duskendale, that mission accomplished. House Tarth no longer had any ships or the ability to make them, and was thus out of the war without even factoring the losses they had taken or their heir's death.

With Saan's ships taking over the blockade around King's Landing, which had added even more of the navy's men to Stannis' army. That gave him a force of around eighteen thousand, though the former naval troops would need constant training to become used to fighting on land. They were all trained in combat, but in maneuvers and working in larger groups, those they needed work on, and his cavalry arm was sorely lacking in numbers. The men he had taken with him into the Stormlands however would make a good training cadre. I have an army now, but what has gone on since I left the Stormlands? That is the question.

He glanced at Melisandre, his eyes showing a hint of anger. Melisandre's ability to see what was occurring elsewhere had not been reliable of late. Rather than the actual events, her visions of late consisted of imagery she had to interpret. He knew that the Lannisters had marched into the Riverlands, that they had been turned aside and that the wolves were in the Riverlands already something that he probably wouldn't be able to confirm here, but if true would astonish him. Details eluded them.

You couldn't get much detail out of Melisandre declaring 'the lion has been stopped at a river after eating it's full of the fish'. What river, where, what crossing, even what enemies? Or 'a peacock has tricked a young foolish stag and is strutting now to the city.' The young stag was obviously Renly, he was certainly foolish enough, but the rest? The only thing that kept Stannis from blowing up at the woman after having become so used to relying on her visions was the fact that this was very obviously frustrating her as well.

Melisandre was indeed becoming more and more worried about her inability to correctly discern the images R'hllor was sending to her, which had begun almost from the moment they took to sea again in the Stormlands. Had she done something for her God to turn his favor from her? Or was it simply the fact that she had been on the ocean, where the power of R'hllor was weak? But it hadn't bothered her abilities before... On the other hand, could it be a sign of something more sinister, the growing power of the Great Other? That last worried Melisandre the most, since she knew that Stannis would be very hard to turn aside from what he saw as the primary concern: gaining his throne. But he was the Azor Ahai, if he did not stand against the Great Other in the Far North, nothing would.

OOOOOO

Renfred Rykker was an unctuous man, who knew perfectly well he didn't stand a chance against Stannis' army, Duskendale having no navy of its own nor a city watch large enough to matter. Stannis didn't even get an opportunity to try to overawe him, instead Renfred came to him. Bowing so low he almost fell out of his horse's saddle there in the streets of the city he said meekly. "My Lord, my city and my house are yours, of course. May I offer you what scant hospitality Dun Fort can?"

Despite his best effort Lord Rykker couldn't stop his eyes from skittering across to where the red witch rode next to Stannis, her red hair cascading down her back like a wave of fire. He wondered if this was the rumored Red Witch and if so, what her powers really consisted of.

"You may." Stannis said, bringing the attention of the man back to him. "And while you are doing so, tell me what has been happening of late. I've been out of touch at sea for too long."

Later that evening Stannis and his main advisors gathered. He had the local Lord fill them all in on the local news, the news from the Riverlands. He also relayed that Renly was on the march with the Reach army along with the rumor that there had possibly been a clash of some kind on the Gold Road. Most worrying however was the news that the second army out of Westerlands had reached Lord Lannister.

Lord Ralph Buckler summed up their position succinctly. "While coming to Duskendale to offload our army seemed a good idea my Lord, allowing us to come at King's Landing from a surprise direction, we seem to now be caught between two enemies. Not close ones to be sure, but powerful enough to make me nervous. Is there any way your brother and the Lord Lannister would be willing to work together against us?"

"A chance for certain, but nothing more." Stannis said waving that away. "Beyond the distances involved, there are other reasons why that would never happen. My brother wants the throne after all, and Lord Lannister will be just as firm in his desire to keep his own blood on it." I wonder what the old lion would do if he learned the true parentage of Joffrey or the other two?

He put that aside for now as Seaworth spoke. "Regardless, putting our men on land again was a good move. One of the cutters assigned to watch King's Landing met up with the fleet a few hours ago." He looked over at his Lord. "The captain's still down at the port if ya wish to question him in person your grace, but I already talked ta him before coming up here. The Lannisters've put together at least three trebuchets that'd cover the approach to the port. The captain talked about other works going on that tell me the city is prepared for an attack from the sea."

"That's good to know." said Lord Bolling, frowning thoughtfully. "But it doesn't change our situation here. I would vote to move fast and strike hard at one or the other enemy my lord, before their own spies can inform them we've landed here. I doubt we'd be able to surprise them given the distances involved, but we can't stay here."

Stannis shook his head. "That thought never occurred to me in the first place. We might be caught between enemies, but the distances involved allow us quite a lot of new room for maneuver, and one enemy in particular is untried and much more fragile than the other."

He smiled thinly, remembering the discussion with his wife when they stayed on Dragonstone. He didn't like Selyse much, and didn't really understand his daughter very well either, but Selyse had thought up an interesting scheme to deal with the Tyrells, one that could bear quite a bit of fruit down the line if he removed Renly in some fashion.

"We will march further south to assault the army from the Reach after they move to put King's Landing under siege. If we can march fast enough, we might be able to get there before their second echelon arrives, in which case we will be laboring under only a two or three to one disadvantage in numbers, while holding an advantage in experience and leadership that they cannot match." So long as my brother is in command rather than Randyll Tarly at least. Even there I wonder about his ability to role with the punches.

"The Lannisters might come after us, but you're right my Lord, the distances involved mean we'll see them coming long before they can reach us. Duskendale isn't defensible either alas." Lord Buckler said thoughtfully, hoping no one called him on his moment of panic. He really wasn't the best at reading distances on a map. Moreover he naturally thought in terms of forting up, a natural mode of thought for him given Bronzegate's defensive position and Duskendale's lack in that area had thrown him. Here however, a war of maneuver was a much better idea.

"I hope they do, that would remove Tywin from his supply lines in the Riverlands and from behind the earthworks he's apparently been throwing up. Now Rykker, what can you tell me about the Crownlands themselves, have any of the other Houses sworn for the bastard king? How many are taking a wait-and-see attitude?"

"A few Houses declared for the King almost immediately my Lord." Said Renfred bowing his head obsequiously again. "Rosby and Stokeworth were the first. House Brych followed quickly, as did Edgerton, Harte sent a thousand man I've been told, nearly their full strength! Manning, Thorne, and Staunton all lost their lords and in Manning and Staunton's case, their heirs as well in what the smallfolk are calling the Battle of Two Truths fighting against House Stark. According to rumor they were gutted along with the City Watch and the forces the Lannisters had on hand. With the Kingslayer in command the forces in the capital have since rebuilt and been reinforced, but those families might never recover and are certainly no longer a consideration."

Stannis grimaced. If he had known that he might have chanced a lightning raid with his fleet, as ill-prepared as it had been for a battle on land. Damnit, still for the Starks to do that much damage, they are a serious threat. Curse Melisandre and her urges, if I hadn't ordered their ship attacked Eddard would have declared for me! As it is, I'll no doubt be facing the Mountain-Breaker across the field.

Rykker didn't notice this and went on. "Manning, Langward, Wendwater, Rollingford, Cressey and Chelsted have all declared their neutrality. Chelsted is the only house there that has enough force to matter, but given what happened to their old lord, they won't want to get involved in a civil war."

Lord Chelsted had been a Hand of the king under Aerys, who tried to protest his plans to use wildfire to burn the city, and been burned in turn for it when he tried to resign, wanting no part in the plan. The house's troops had retreated rather than take part in any further battles after that, and the House had stood aloof from everything since. They were still a powerful house, but one that refused to take side, and no other lord could gainsay that, including Stannis.

"I respect Chelsted's position, their neutrality is enough for me." Stannis nodded. Actually Stannis didn't but he was worried about bringing a house with bad memories of fire into his army with Melisandre around. "As for the others, the Crownlands suffered during my brother's war and have not fully recovered their manpower. And House Chyttering, which you haven't mentioned, may side with me or Renly. For certain they will believe Joffrey a bastard, which may give us a thousand more men or so by the time the battle between us and Renly's force begins."

Davos looked worried. "My Lord, do you truly mean to fight your brother?"

"Renly has always been an arrogant, foolish boy." Stannis said coldly. "He's always wanted more than his own prowess and strength could ever win him, and Robert favoring him did not help matters. Now he is out there, trying to claim the throne that is rightfully mine, turning half the Stormlands against me, the Reach against me, and doing none of that before first even confronting me personally, the coward! Familial loyalty say that he should follow me, and yet he would ignore that as well as any of the laws of the land and succession to try and grasp a crown he has never shown the ability to control."

Stannis stood up abruptly, moving back and forth, every line of his body screaming anger before he turned abruptly to Davos, once more in control of his temper. "You ask if I will strike at my brother, my brother struck at me first by raising his own banner like this! Renly is in the wrong and that is an end of it Davos. If he surrenders, if Renly bows to me when we are face-to-face, I will welcome him back. But he will only get that one chance from me."

The Onion Knight looked into Stannis eyes for moment then nodded his head formally in submission.

Stannis knew his man needed a break after not one but two voyages with naught to do even on Dragonstone for the majority, therefore he needed to take time to let them rest, much as he loathed the delay. As such, Stannis moved his army out of the city to the camp Lord Errol had set up and then for the next four days rotated his men through the city, allowing them to take time with the fleshpots therein. At the same time the rest of the army was training and rearming. The smiths of the city worked around the clock to provide his army with chainmail and heavier shields, but in only four days couldn't make much headway in re-arming his former navy armsmen, who primarily wore leather armor. After four days however, his army was once more on the march out of Duskenale towards King's Landing.

OOOOOO

Twenty-five longships laid at anchor inside Blazewater Bay, far enough away from land to not be seen but deep enough in the bay to allow the ships to use it to protect themselves from the worst of the sea's weather. This far north that weather was capricious at best but you could not have told that from the young woman who stood with casual confidence on the topmost mast of one of the larger longships. Its name, etched out on the side, was Black Wind.

The young woman is lean, with little in the way of curves, her muscles tending towards being wiry rather than strong, built for speed. Her black hair is cut short, barely reaching her ears, and her skin, what of it can be seen under the heavy coats she wears, is wind-burned and her hands look strong, her fingers dexterous. Her hands are also calloused heavily, both from working on the ship and from wielding a sword. This young woman was Asha Greyjoy, daughter of Balon Greyjoy, self-declared king of the Iron Islands, and this was her ship.

Normally a woman in the Ironborn culture would never be allowed to even be a sailor let alone captain her own ship. Oh, the Ironborn gave lip service to the fact heir women could be warriors, but that was all it was, mere lip service with no truth behind it, indeed women in the Iron Islands were treated worse than anywhere on the mainland. But with the heir to the Seastone chair a captive of the Starks in the North that had allowed Asha some leeway. Leeway enough to prove herself, and she had. Asha had become captain of her own ship through blood, sweat and energy, crewing it with men she personally chose. Men who she could trust not to try to stab her in the back or bed her willingly or no, unlike most of the captains assigned to her but in this mission.

Seeing the longboats moving through the waves towards her ship, Asha scowled slightly then nodded at the watcher.

"Keep a sharp eye out, if you see anything unusual, anything at all either from those ships or beyond, shout out a signal."

The man nodded, not commenting. Every man aboard her ship knew that their captain's position in their society wasn't the best, but she had proven herself to them time and time again on raids against merchant vessels, mostly Essossi because their disappearance was much easier to explain away. She was good at picking their targets to get the most plunder and also keeping most of them alive while doing it. That made Asha a rare enough captain to gain her crew's loyalty regardless of her gender.

Without another word Asha clambered down to the deck easily. She arrived in time to welcome the first captains aboard, not even gritting her teeth at the way most looked at her like she was some kind of prize or an anachronism she was so used to it.

Women born into the Ironborn society from a mother of the same culture would become rock wives at best, salt wives at worse if taken in one of the internecine raids that occurred periodically between Houses. Even as a Greyjoy, Asha had to be constantly on watch for men who wanted to take advantage of her position. Women in the islands were at best second citizens, at worst thralls. Salt wives, wives taken in raids and kept as slaves in one manner or another were property, plain and simple. Even rock wives couldn't own anything, and were completely dependent on their husbands. If she ever married Asha would never able to sail again, a fate worse than death, and become simply the wife of a near claimant to the throne of the Iron Islands.

Worse, Asha had to be very careful of even taking lovers from among the Ironborn for fear of whoever she slept with trying to use it against her even if he didn't try to marry her. She had taken a few captives to bed, but their performance hadn't been as good as she could wish going by some of the stories the servant girls back in Pyke told. Among the Ironborn she had met, only the young man she had chosen as her first mate had proven trustworthy enough to let into her bed, and his performance there wasn't nearly as good as in battle. Frankly, Asha didn't really understand what people saw in the whole sex thing, it just didn't seem as interesting or as exciting as a good battle or sailing a ship through a heavy storm.

None of Asha's anger at her tenuous position showed on her face as she welcomed each of the fifteen other captains on this expedition aboard. This took some time, but eventually Asha sat at one end of the table in her ship's mess hall, with the captains arrayed down its sides in front of her. They were all drinking their fill from her ship's stock of strong mead and ale while Asha drank watered down wine. She took a moment to study them all as her first mate and lover, Qarl the Maid, laid out an extremely sketchy map of the Northlands on the table where they could all view it though it took a moment for the other captains to stop drinking long enough to notice.

Only two other captains were near her age. Ralf Kenning, the captain of the Storm's Pride, a newly christened longship, was one. She knew him decently well, and had been surprised when he accepted his new ship's captaincy over that of keeping command of his Iron Fleet longship. Apparently he wanted to be part of the raid on the north enough to give up command of an Iron Fleet ship, though he had also been placed in command of the other two ships from House Kenning assigned to this assault. Ralf was a stern, strict young man, with an excellent battle record but Asha felt not blessed with much intelligence. He had followed her uncle Victarion as Lord Captain of the Iron Fleet, so would be willing to listen to her, but might well go his own way regardless.

The second captain her age she didn't know half as well. Triston Farwynd was captain of the Seal Eyes and lord of House Farwynd, a small and not really well-thought House from Sealskin Point on Great Wyk, the largest island of the Iron Islands. Every branch of that family was queer, but it was Triston's looks that threw Asha. He had wide, staring eyes over a blue streaked beard, an intricate tattoo of a seal's snout covering half his face and he seemed to look straight through someone when talking to them. It was very unnerving after a time. He was the senior captain of the two ships Farwynd was able to crew, both of which had been sent to the North.

The others were older men of her father's generation, men like Balon who pined for the old days that they remembered so fondly. Days that will never be again if they ever were in the first place, when Ironborn were 'rulers of the sea' attacking wherever we wished whenever we wished. Fools, deadly, dangerous fools. Of course she kept those thoughts to herself, just like the rest of her thoughts. Asha was good at that.

The only two among them who would really listen to her were Dustan Drumm and Harren Botley, if for very different reasons. Dustan was a thoughtful, cautious sort, but also prideful, very aware of his dignity as lord of House Drumm. Botley would listen because his younger brother was enamored of Asha. He had been a decent looking youth, but Asha hadn't seen him for years, and had no wish to be tied to him. Still, Harren would at least listen to her.

After contemplating them all for another few moments, she stood up and shouted for attention. "Alright you jetsam now that you've all been properly watered," she waited for the jeers to subside before going on. "We need to start planning the northern portion of the Rise of the Kraken!"

Most of the men grinned eagerly both at the name Balon had given the opening moves of his second rebellion, and in simple eagerness to be raiding openly once more. Personally Asha thought that an idiotic name given to a plan that might be doomed from the start. She thought it senseless to spread their numbers so thinly but everyone else thought it a grand plan.

Kraken consisted of two stages. The first consisted of several dozen ships sent out on raids here and there, like a kraken's secondary feelers, attacking targets of opportunity along Ironman's Bay and the Cape of Eagles. These ships would be kept away from the main targets of the larger tentacles, lulling the other realms into a false sense of security if they ever even heard of it. Surprise was supposedly the nature of the game for Rise of the Kraken. Those four main targets were Lannisport, the Shield Islands and the Arbor of the Reach, and either Moat Cailin or Deepwood Motte of the North.

The Shield Islands would be attacked by her uncle Victarion. He was an excellent admiral, a decent tactician, able to instill discipline and the need to work together in his followers. But he in turn was the ultimate follower. He would never be a strategist, and would never go against the king whatever he was doing, but his plan for the Shield Islands would possibly work. The islands were to be taken and held becoming new fiefdoms for the Ironborn, as well as staging grounds for further raids.

Alyn Orkwood however was a different story, and his attack on Lannisport worried Asha a lot. It was too much like the one that had worked in the last war and while Asha didn't like the Lannisters, she knew that they wouldn't be caught in the same way twice. Every ship from Orkmont and nearly all of those from Blacktyde however had been committed to that.

Over the strenuous objections of Lord Baelor Blacktyde, but he hadn't made as much noise as Asha had suspected. House Blacktyde had been hammered hard in the rebellion, and could only field ten ships total, with mostly younger, less experienced crews, where before her father's first attempt at rebellion they had twenty-five ships. Still, whatever Balon had told Baelor, a youngish man who Asha had only met twice before, had shut him up.

The Arbor attack, which was the most distant and would take the most time to set up, would be led personally by Balon. She was actually glad to see the old man taking to sea once more but she was worried, very worried about the overall plan. Stretching themselves so thin was dangerous in the extreme, leaving them open for defeat in detail. Still, the Redwynes were too arrogant and not nearly aggressive enough, they might be just as ready for a fall as the Shield Islands. The timing would be tricky, with Balon having to arrive before word of the attack on the Shield Islands could reach the Arbor, but Asha hoped her father would be able to pull it off.

Asha herself had won the 'honor' to lead the attack on the North. But she hadn't been able to convince her father to let her pick and choose her own captains, which was going to cause issues here. "We'll need to feel out the defenses along the Stony Shore, the Rills and further north in the Bay of Ice before committing to an attack in any one place, but I doubt that'll take overlong, and it'll be worth it in the long run, letting us find the richest prizes."

One of the older captains, the Sparr, who was lord of House Sparr from Great Wyk, smiled widely. "I wonder if Bear Island is open for an attack. The bear bitches might not be very pretty, but I do like their fire. And it's been too long since they had to face the Ironborn on their own ground! Paying the Iron Price there would be glorious!"

Shaking her head, Asha smiled thinly. "Maybe, but Bear Island's too hard a nut to crack at the best of times, it would take too many of our ships to make any measurable gains there for little return outside of new thralls. Deepwood Motte is a better option, which is why I'll be leading that scouting mission myself."

That, and it'll let me fish for rumors about Theon. I've heard some about his friendship with Ranma Stark, and didn't that make Father howl, heh. But still, I'd like to know what my brother is up to, and if he's really become a greenlander. That would be good for me in some ways, yet oh so very bad in others.

"We should attack up the Fever now." said another old man brusquely. Tomas Sunderly was a scarred and hirsute bear of a man, who was notorious for not taking the time to plan ahead, instead relying on brute strength. House Sunderly had always been known for that, hence why their losses in Balon's last Rebellion had been so horrendous. Indeed his house had only been able to crew two longships and retain enough men at home to keep their thralls in line, a far cry from the twenty they had in the last war. "That should be our main target."

It should, but I don't like some of the rumors we've heard from merchants who deal with the crannogs." Asha grimaced.

Still, it isn't like my orders give me much leeway. 'And when you've determined that the Moat is open to attack from the Fever take it.' That was the wording, as if it was a certainty the Moat was simply open that way that further scouting wasn't needed. As if the need to scout ahead was added to this attack only because she was a worrying woman. Never mind the fact that Asha had been out leading raids the past ten years and had always succeeded in taking her target ship with minimal losses to her men.

"We'll hit that last," she said after a moment. "It might take all of our ship's crews to do it after all so first we'll scout out the rest of the North and hit where we can. The Moat's a strategic point, not a rich one, we need to hit other places to get any decent plunder."

"We'll lose the element of surprise then!" said another Captain. Aedric Stonehouse angrily smashed his fist down on the table, glaring at Asha. He had never made any bones about his disdain for a woman who thought herself fit to captain a longship, much like Sunderly. He was also head of five of the ships of this attack, and was speaking for those ships here as well. Asha knew whatever she said here he would ignore when it came to it, but she had to try.

So Asha kept her cool as she replied. "We haven't heard anything about the North mobilizing yet. It could be that all of their houses are still gathering their men, including Ryswell and Glover. Would any of you like to face the North up in arms on their own ground?" She asked looking around them her eyes hard. One or two of them, including Ralf she was happy to see, actually scowled at the thought, remembering how badly the northern forces had mauled their own on the islands during the invasion. But the others, Aedric and the Sparr chief among them, glared back at her angrily.

Aedric spoke up again. "If we have the element of surprise, we can overwhelm them before they gather their defenses! If we don't, then what's the point of us coming up here anyway?"

"I'm not going to rely on luck and prayer to see us through! I refuse to launch any attacks until we are certain that the attacks will work." she spat out, now losing her temper somewhat. "We do our people no good paying the Iron Price without getting anything in return! Besides, the North can't be strong everywhere. If they've strengthened their defenses along the shores and in Deepwood Motte that might mean that the moat is not as strong as rumors make it, and my father's orders are to take it to cut them off from the Riverlands."

"Rumor!" said The Sparr, scoffing and spitting to one side. "You're showing your gender girl, listening to the gossip of salt wives! I think we should attack now! Take the Moat now then send ships up further north to take Deepwood Motte when the puling northern pussies try to scramble to retake it! From there we could range further inland, plundering where we wish!"

"And lose our primary advantage, our ships mobility?" Asha asked, staring back at him coldly. "Our mobility and our ability to take to the oceans is our greatest weapon! If we leave the rivers and shores behind, that goes away, and the terrain itself becomes an advantage for our enemies. Remember the North is huge! Other than Deepwood Motte and Moat Cailin there is Barrowtown up the river, and Torrhen's Square if we can go up the rivers there. We have other targets that we can hit if we're careful about it and don't let ourselves get bogged down. But I won't let any of us go deeper inland, we'll stay near the waters."

"And show them we're cowards?!" Tomas shouted, as he and a few of the others stood up angrily. Others remained sitting, watching how this would go. "The Sparr's right, you're not showing nearly enough true Iron grit!" He stood up and made his way forward, one hand reaching for his sword. "I think one of us should take..."

That was all he got out before Asha was out of her seat her hand reaching for her own blade and swiftly pulling it out before the other man could do the same. There was a "Shlick!" sound of her blade meeting his throat, and Tomas fell back gasping as blood spurted from his neck.

Asha remained standing, deliberately twisting her wrist to splatter the blood on her sword out across a few of the other captains who had stood up, her eyes challenging. "Anyone else?" There was silence and she nodded, reaching forward to grab up her ale mug again, taking a deep draught.

That would cause trouble down the road she knew, but at the moment Sunderly was too weak to make waves alone, and she needed to make certain her position was secure. It wasn't of course, but her control over the fleet would last for a bit longer now, perhaps long enough to really get them some information.

Putting down her mug, Asha went on. "Then we will follow my plan for now, understood?"

OOOOOO

Normally when he woke up Ranma came awake relatively quickly. This time however his brain wasn't quite responding as well as normal, nor was his body responding. He opened his eyes sluggishly as he began to remember. He had used far too much ki destroying the Twins on top of what he had used in taking the castle in the first place. He had been soldiering on while dealing with the prisoners and Old Walder, but it all caught up to him quickly and he practically collapsed a bear hour later.

Not even lifting his head, Ranma looked blearily around, noticing he was in a tent. Finally Ranma's hearing came back online enough for him to notice he could hear humming somewhere just out of sight. He groggily rolled his head on the camp pillow, grunting a little with the effort. This seemed to attract the attention of whoever was humming since the humming stopped and he quickly felt a cool hand on his brow. Seconds later Daenerys leaned over him, her face concerned. "You're lucky Jon was able to tell me what was wrong with you Ranma, or I would be much angrier with you at this moment than I am. You could've figured out other ways of destroying the Twins you know."

"Water." Ranma croaked not answering Daenerys's accusation at the moment.

He watched as Myrcella got up from where she must've been sitting close by Daenerys, moving over to a small bronze pitcher set on the small folding table, a gift from Lord Karstark several years back. "This ki ability that you are able to teach us about is interesting. But I'm not quite sure I like the cost." Myrcella said, looking at her, her green eyes as concerned as Daenerys' purple ones.

Ranma waited until after he was given the glass, lifting it to his mouth with a shaky hand. Some of it ran down his shirt, but he got most of it into his mouth. He smiled however at the two girls. "Had to do it that way. You don't think that some Lannister scout is going to be able to get past whatever defenses are down by the Ruby Ford? By this time I've no doubt the Lannisters could've made a few small coracles or something to send scouts or even a single messenger forward over the Blue Fork, then they could make their way further north. They'll eventually be able to travel up to the Twins. I want them to see what happened to the Twins, the way I did it rather than the normal fire or siege damage. They'll have to wonder if we have some kind of secret weapon or something, and that kind of thing might force Tywin to change tactics."

"It might make him leery of fighting any kind of siege battle," Daenerys murmured. "It's a long shot, but one that might prove worth it I suppose. It also showed the army that your powers and abilities do have a personal cost. According to Domic and Alayaya many of the men were taking it for granted, that you could practically do anything or could simply go on all the time with those techniques of yours, even a few of your friends thought that." Edd, Smalljon and Hathan had all been astonished when Ranma collapsed, though Jon had quickly reassured them, filling them in on what had happened.

Myrcella frowned noncommittally while Daenerys continued. "It also shows that you're still human to those who might have been a little worried about it." That of course hadn't counted any of the wolfsworn among their number, but when news of the destruction of the Water Tower had spread throughout the Army there had been some mutterings that Ranma might not even be human, simply a creature conjured up by the old gods to be their champion. The knights of House Manderly in particular had become wary of that, their faith in the Seven making them concerned.

Those murmurs had since disappeared, and the men's belief in Ranma's humanity had returned fivefold. Not just because of his collapse, but because of the way he and Daenerys had dealt with the children they had 'captured' and the women and common armsmen as well. In fact morale in the army was incredibly high over the two nearly bloodless victories they had won so far.

"Where are we now?" Ranma asked. "I hope you didn't let the army stay near the Twins while I was out of it."

"No I didn't," Daenerys said her lips twisted slightly in a frown. She had to convince Rickard of that. With Jon and the other wolfsworn backing her it had been a simple enough task, just an irritating one since Lord Karstark wasn't willing to simply take her word for it. Not that Daenerys really thought she was up to the task of leading the army or anything, but everyone knew their short-term plans, and there shouldn't have been any question of moving on. "We've been making our way straight down to Seagard. The road isn't very good here, but it at least is better than moving through brush and woodland. According to Domic, we'll enter House Charlton lands soon, though what our welcome will be he doesn't know. He says they were Frey supporters, their lord might even have married a daughter of Old Walder. Hopefully they are intelligent enough to not fight a pointless battle, but I don't know."

Ranma nodded. They were heading to Seagard not just to meet up with Lord Mallister and receive any news he had, they also needed to pick up pack horses and food there. Ranma had sent much of the army's own store further south with the rest of the Army on the other side of the Green Fork. They had taken from the Twins as much as they needed to reach the city, leaving what remained to be used for the prisoners sent north and for the men they had left there to defend the barbicans on either side of the bridge.

Because of its design the Twins had never really needed to stock as many supplies as a normal castle would, considering it was almost impossible to siege since the bridge connected the two parts of the Twins across the powerful river. Any army truly besieging it would have to do so from both sides of the Green Fork, which the Twins of course would have ample warning off. Still, the supplies there would get the army to Seagard, especially with Meera and her hunters adding to the pot.

"After we reach Seagard, do you have any idea of our long-term plans?" Daenerys asked, abruptly changing the subject.

"We need to push the Lannisters out of the Riverlands and secure the border with the Westerlands. I'm not gonna try to plan anything further than that until we get some real up-to-date intelligence, which probably won't happen until we reach Fairmarket, but that's our goal for now. For a short term plan I'd like some food, how's that?" Ranma asked barely a millisecond before his stomach began to growl.

The two girls laughed and Myrcella stood up to go and get him some food from the fires, dropping a small hairbrush on the folding table. Ranma realized she must have been doing Daenerys' hair or vice versa, which would explain the humming. As the younger girl left Daenerys leaned over kissing Ranma lovingly on the lips for a moment before pulling back, one eyebrow cocked. "You worried me tremendously when you collapsed you know. Please don't make a habit of that."

"Try not to." Ranma said chuckling a little before Daenerys once more leaned forward kissing him on the lips.

OOOOOO

"Keep your shield up!" Arya said, her sword flicking out to tag Cley in the upper arm to show why. "Don't let it falter no matter how tired you are!" She dodged Cley's almost frantic return swing negligently, using her free arm to tap his inner arm, adding more momentum to it then bringing up her other arm and elbowing him in the chest with enough force to throw the slightly younger boy to the ground. "Don't over extend either, and never put so much strength into a blow you lose your balance. That's one mistake I made a lot of times at first: you don't have to put all your strength and every blow Cley, just enough to do the job." She said reaching down to help him stand up again.

Cley scowled a little, not liking how Arya was throwing him around. Didn't she know the girls were supposed to be weaker than boys? Of course he should've known better after seeing Dacey in action, but some things were harder to beat out of a boy his age than others.

He glared over at where Nymeria was lounging, her eyes seemingly laughing at him. "Your wolf's laughing at me again."

"She does that when she sees something funny." Arya said laughing as well. "More endurance lessons for you I think. Keep doing the exercises that Ranma showed for another week, then we'll try sparring again."

She shook her head as Cley went off, seeing Myrcella leave her brothers tent and joining her quickly. She and the other wolfsworn had played rock-parchment-bladeto see who would oversee Cley's training until her brother was up and about, and Arya had unfortunately lost. She wasn't a very good teacher frankly: she was much too hard on him, much too eager to go beyond overseeing his exercises to get to the actual sword fighting, which she had just seen he wasn't quite ready for.

Out of the corner of her eye Arya saw Daenerys leaving her brothers tent as well, and moved over to her quickly. "Is he awake?"

Daenerys nodded, looking over to where Nymeria was watching her little ones. Sunfyre and Rhaegon were wary of the Nymeria for some reason, but not trying to object to her presence. One of the direwolves was always around them when Daenerys was busy with something else and couldn't have them by her side for one reason or another. Fenris of course was their favorite, but he and Ghost were out with Jon and Meera scouting out the path of the army.

Turning back she addressed Arya's question in greater detail. "He's awake, though he'll probably fall asleep again after eating something. He's not going to be 100% he says for another few days."

Arya nodded taking that in stride and Daenerys asked the question she had been meaning to ever since the battle. "How are you feeling by the way?" Arya cocked her head on not understanding the question, and Daenerys elaborated. "I mean after the fight in the Twins. I don't mean to sound insulting, but you are the youngest of the wolfsworn, and you all did most of the fighting there. Yet for all of that it doesn't seem to bother you."

"It doesn't, not really." Arya said shrugging her shoulders. "What I prefer not to have to kill people, to fight like that, I suppose so. But they were threats to my family, and had proven themselves dishonorable so..." She shrugged. "It doesn't bother me much." Or at all really.

Daenerys frowned a little at that. She knew it had bothered Ranna after the battle, having likened it to fighting so many children, not a single man among the Freys had been able to put up a decent fight. Jon and a few of the others also had problems with it. But Arya was much more wolf-like than her older siblings and she didn't try to analyze it overmuch. They were enemies of the pack, therefore they had to die.

After a moment she spoke, choosing her words carefully. "I suppose they were. Just don't make the mistake of seeing enemies where there aren't any. Eventually we will be talking to families that have yet to choose a side or families that had no choice but to follow the Lannisters and we can't deal with them as we did the Frey. Don't be so quick to use your Fang in other words."

Arya shrugged again. "So long as I don't face them in actual battle I won't, I'll leave the decision-making of who to aim my Fang towards to others." She looked around, having spotted Meera of the corner of her eye returning with a few other hunters. She nodded farewell to Daenerys then hurried over to join her friend.

The next day the march continued. With Ranna still unable to run or ride Fennis, being in one of the few carts this portion of the northern army still had with them. He slept most of the day, waking up to eat before going back to sleep, rebuilding his ki reserves. He stayed that way for three days, even as the army moved west leaving the Green Fork behind as they followed a small dirt road toward Seagard.

This left it to Rickard and Jon to address the Charlton knight who was waiting for them a few hours travel inside that house's land. His lance was couched in his saddle holder to stand straight up with a white flag on the end of it in token of parley.

With Daenerys and the two dragons hiding at the back of the army for now Rickard and Jon made their way forward a ways from the army, though it kept moving behind them. As soon as they were close enough to hear the man bellowed his challenge, raising his visor to show a youngish face. "I am Ser Jeremy Charlton. I am here to speak for my uncle, Lord Charlton. Who are you to try to march and army over my house's land unannounced and unasked?"

"I am Jon Stark and this is Lord Karstark." Jon said motioning to the older man but beside him. "We speak for our Lord, Lord Stark, who is in command of this Army. We go south to aid the rest of the Riverlands against the invading Lannisters, doing our familial duty in helping Lord Tully, our grandfather." Well, the man wasn't Jon's actual grandfather, but he wasn't about to go into that kind of detail here.

"I note that you have come by way of the Twins, but I don't see any Frey banners with your men. Might I ask how this is come to be?"

"The Twins are no more." Rickard said grimly, though he was enjoying the look up the young knight's face at that news. "House Frey tried to raise its banners for the Lannisters rather than stick to their oath of fealty to their Lord Paramount. As such we, under orders from the voice of Lord Tully captured the Twins, destroyed the castle and the House. The Frey name is no more."

Of course there were Freys still out there, and they wouldn't be affected by that declaration until they were either beaten or taken captive, but without the Twins and the power of their family, there was nothing they could do about it, and what allies they had made would no longer be willing to put up with them if they acted anything like those from the Twins.

The younger man's eyes widened further, hearing the destruction of his House's patrons. The Charlton's were a minor House in all but name, and had long since given their fealty to the Freys, something that was well known in the Riverlands. To hear of their destruction stated so casually, and especially to see what looked like a rather small army having done it... "I take it the victory was not entirely one sided?" He asked, trying to fish for information.

"Actually it was almost entirely one sided, we took only a few fatalities taking the Twins." Jon replied. "The Frey was rather foolish. If you keep acting in a certain manner, people will start to assume that is the only way you will act correct?"

Jeremy nodded, wondering where the other young man was going with this.

"We used that against them. We went forward into the Twins under a flag of parley, and when Old Walder tried to take us captive despite that, we were ready for them." He was not going to say how they were ready however, or that it'd been only the wolfsworn who had taken part in that counter-ambush. That tale would of course spread once they reach Seagard and the prisoners and the rest of the army were able to rest, but for now it wasn't necessary.

"I see." Jeremy said, wondering how his uncle was going to react to this. "Will you call upon my House for our men? I have to tell you that most of up our forces is already committed to defend the smallfolk in the Cape of Eagles from raids by the Ironborn."

"Have those begun already?" Rickard asked sharply, moving his horse closer.

Jeremy flicked his eyes over to him and nodded grimly. "Yes, my lord. There've only been a few, but with the speed of their longships they have a significant advantage against any response force we try to send. They've burned out one hamlet I know of and some farmsteads as well as four fishing communities. They've also carried off at least twenty women from the last report. They'll get bolder if they aren't challenged soon of course, and when they do we might have a better opportunity to catch them."

"Has Lord Mallister also sent men into the Cape?" Jon asked.

"Some my lord, about seven or eight hundred light cavalry I believe. They've also sent in several cartloads worth of weapons to arm the smallfolk there from the smiths of Seagard. With his need to keep a defensive force at Seagard itself and having already sent men down to help defend Fairmarket against the Lannisters, that was probably all Lord Mallister could send." Jeremy thought himself well-informed about such matters having been to Seagard several times, and having rotated back up to patrolling the Frey/Charlton border due to a bad fall he had taken several weeks ago when his horse came up lame. Still, he didn't realize that Jason had also sent four hundred heavy cavalry into the Cape as well.

Jon frowned, but Rickard laid a hand on his shoulder. "Priorities lad, we can't be strong everywhere. I know it hurts, but it would take our entire army to try and patrol the cape effectively against the Ironborn, and the Lannisters are a much more potent threat."

After nodding reluctant agreement Jon turned back to Jeremy. "We won't require you to add more men to our army. Instead inform your Lord to simply keep protecting his charges." Of course Jon knew Ranma would be unwilling to have had a former Frey ally as part of his army in the first place, but at least House Charlton was doing something the house was obligated to do, defending the smallfolk of the cape.

The young knight nodded before moving off the road, standing his horse to one side as the army marched on. For just a moment Jeremy thought he caught a glimpse of some kind of lizard on one of the few carts he saw, and a flash of silver somewhere nearby. Shaking his head at what obviously was simply a trick of the light he turned away and began the day's long trek towards his house's keep, wondering how his uncle would react to the fall of their patron.

That reaction was to follow the winner. Lord Charlton was not in fact married to a Frey woman, and he was a canny enough fellow to realize who had a winning hand. With the Freys no longer having any power to speak of, the ones connected to his family became a liability. The two squires were informed of their change in status, and the women, one married to his castellan and the other to his third son were told as well. They didn't like the fact that their own House had no power any longer, and the squires were furious that their last name had been erased from the rolls of nobility, but all four were easily contained by the rest of the House.

OOOOOO

Lord Charlton was not the only one who could see the way the wind was blowing after the two battles the northern expedition had fought already. The majordomo of House Haigh could also see it as he looked at the army camping outside the holdfast of the house that he was pledged to defend. It seemed vast to his untrained eye, not that it needed to be since his lord had only left a dozen men to defend his holdfast.

"I see, my lord." he said nodding his head to Brynden Tully. Everyone knew his personal sigil, a black trout swimming above wavy lines of red and blue, even if he had never met the man personally. "Ser Haigh only left a single babe of barely a year here, and his wife died recently in childbirth." He did not mention that the woman had had three miscarriages before giving birth to the young boy, who was sickly and pale, unlikely to live for many years. Or that Ser Haigh had kept her pregnant as much as possible following Old Walder's example. "If he and his brothers and their men are indeed gone, there is no reason for myself and the other servants to put up any kind of resistance."

"That's good. You show much more intelligence than your previous Lord." Brynden said nodding. "We won't harm the boy, though he will be known as a Rivers from now on rather than Haigh. House Haigh is no more, and that banner up there should be taken down and burned."

Looking past Brynden at that large violent looking giant on an even larger warhorse the man gulped a little and nodded. "I'll just go see to that right now my Lord."

The moment the other the man left Greatjon laughed. "Was there something on my face?"

"Yes your great bushy beard and those bushy eyebrows. How do you see out of that shaggy carpet you call a face anyway?" Brynden said scoffing at the other man. "And don't tell me you haven't gone out of your way to cultivate that image of a Northern barbarian."

"It does help at times." Greatjon laughed. "When merchants come to deal with my family I always make a point to let them wait, then my servants spread rumors about how I tend to pull arms out of sockets and beat merchants to death with them if they become too argumentative."

Brynden laughed as well, shaking his head. House Erenford had fallen much the same way. With their head of house dead along with all of his men, there was no one at home who was willing to lay down their life for a knightly house with no members left. That man hadn't even been married, and his castellan had been almost desperate to not fight the victorious 'northern horde'.

After a moment Greatjon went on much more seriously. "How much longer before we're on to the lands of one of the major Riverlands houses we're supposed to treat with?"

"At the rate our army moves, two days to get off House Haigh's lands then we'll be on House Wayn's. It won't be long before old man Wayn knows we're there, but he won't be in any hurry to come out and meet us. Another four days, and two hamlets before we're near his keep if we keep following the Kingsroad."

"And what do you think his and the other's reactions will be?"

"I honestly don't know." Brynden shook his head, lips twisted in a rueful smirk. "I realize I'm supposed to handle the diplomatic talks here, but we just don't know how these houses see the Lannisters, or the rumors about what happened in King's Landing. I can make guesses based on the fact that some of their heirs were friends with my nephew, but how much of that will influence their father's reactions I don't know." He did have some idea, but wasn't about to get his hopes up.

Greatjon nodded, smirking a little as he saw that the banner over the former Haigh holdfast was already being pulled down. "That's fine I suppose, we'll just have to be ready for anything. I wonder how the rest of the army is doing though."

The next day as the majority of the northern army prepared to march they received a messenger who informed them of the successful attack on the twins, and further reiterating Ranma's orders. What neither man realized was that Ranma had sent them south knowing that they probably wouldn't be able to talk the houses there into joining them. Not until he and Daenerys joined them at any rate. No, what they were was a visible sign of the North's march, which he hoped would take the attention of any Tywin's spies.

OOOOOO

The Ironborn's scouting of the shorelines did not produce very good results, which won Asha some points with some of the more thoughtful captains, though it enraged others. The shore around the Rills and in particular the river mouths were patrolled heavily by light cavalry. Instead of rushing to battle those patrols retreated, no doubt to whistle up heavier forces through use of a series of watch fires that could be seen following the path of the rivers deeper inland. Instead of waiting there for those forces to arrive, the Ironborn pulled back moving further up the coast. Even the most iron-headed captain wasn't going to fight a battle like that with no plunder to gain from it.

They found that the Stony Shore was as much a disappointment but in a very different way, as was Sea Dragon Point. There several ships anchored, angered at not the results of scouting out the Rills. They landed their full complements near a tiny fishing village they saw perched on the rocky, almost barren ground of the shore. To their dismay however that hamlet was empty. Further scouting produced no people, and few goods for them to carry off.

That had angered Lord Stonehouse so much he and his family's ships remained there and marched inland with the intention of heading as they could in search of something to raid. Asha didn't learn about that until after it had occurred, having taken Black Wind to Deepwood Motte for a trading expedition. That was normal enough she hadn't aroused any suspicion: ships of course always needed fresh food and most particularly meats and potable water.

She traded silks and linens taken in her last raid before coming back to her ship, frowning heavily at how well defended the town was. It hadn't been reinforced, the wall around the town was still wooden and the keep in its center was still run down, but there was no lessening in the defender's numbers. So whatever muster had occurred in the North hadn't included House Glover.

Asha had also taken the time to ask very obliquely about the wolfsworn and Theon. The wolfsworn sounded fascinating, the idea of a fighting force that good was interesting, if true. Theon's place, as one of the wolfsworn but sort of to the side in some ways, was also interesting, as was the news he was acting as admiral of a fleet in the Bite and further north along that side of the North. The newest rumors were even more interesting, saying that Theon was leading a naval assault on the Three Sisters. She wanted some time to think about those, and what it might mean that Theon apparently was so trusted, and what that could mean in the long term for her as well.

When all the ships once more gathered off Sea Dragon Point, Ralf Kenning told her what had occurred. She ordered the fleet to head down to the Stonehouse's landing spot immediately, coming within sight of the place they had made landing the next day. Instead of finding their ships left there under guard, Asha and the others saw five burned-out husks, along with several heads stuck on the ends of spears sticking out of the rocky shore.

"The Northerners somehow realized that we were going to try to take advantage of the current unrest." Asha said shaking her head and staring at the sight, while a few other captains had joined her, pulling their ships alongside and coming across to stand with her.

"How'd they do that then?" Ralf muttered, scratching at his beard as he looked at Dustan and Harren, wondering if they knew, ignoring Asha almost automatically.

Both men grimaced, though it was Dustan Drumm who replied, rubbing at his craggy face, his eyes bloodshot with drink but still thoughtful. "Small attacks over time on our men as they marched deeper in land, no food to be found maybe. They pulled their smallfolk back all along their shores, fucking Northern pussies!"

Despite his words, his tone was actually respectful. "I hadn't expected it, but that kind of defense in depth is one we can't deal with. None of us're used to fightin' in forests which make up most of the North and we don't have enough stores to march overland, plus no experience livin' off it. And the fucking cold up here's another damn enemy we need to deal with!"

Protected as they were by the Flint Cliffs of Flint's Finger and the rest of the North, the Iron Islands had mostly mild weather year-round. Oh for certain they had their share of storms and more, but it was much colder up here than most were used to. They'd prepared for it, but not so well as to be able to march overland to take targets weeks inland, nor did they have any skills in living off the land.

"Are we just going to let this slide!" said the Sparr. He pointed angrily at the five burned-out ships. "Five good crews dead with nothing to show for it!? We need to march inland, find the people who did this and gut them for fish bait!"

Asha wanted to say that those crews had paid the ultimate Iron Price for a poor return, but she refrained. Instead she shook her head. "No, we won't win any battles trying to fight our enemy on their terms. Besides, all of this was a sideshow. And as I said, they can't be strong everywhere. If they've reinforced Deepwood Motte, and have men enough to wipe out five ships crews near here, it might mean our main objective is still doable."

That ended the grumbling for now, and the ships slowly began to turn away from the shore.

OOOOOO

In one of the houses of the small fishing village Lord Hornwood looked out a window cautiously, staring out to sea at the ships there, not even using the spyglass Eddard had given him for fear the sun would reflect on it and give away his position. Around him four armsmen waited nervously, not liking the fact that their Lord had come forward off their main army like this. Their horses also stamped their feet, uncomfortable in the small enclosed area but they had been tied down securely, and the sound of their stamping feet wouldn't carry to the ships out there.

Asha was incorrect in assuming that the crews of the five Stonehouse ships had already been wiped out. The heads out there weren't of anyone special, simply taken from the dead after a nighttime raid in order to make this little show for the rest of the Ironborn that much more potent. Those crews were still trying to make their way through Sea Dragon Point towards something, anything that they could target. They weren't having much luck of course, since Eddard Stark had decided to adopt a defense in depth against any Ironborn incursion, and ordered his people in the Stony Shore and Sea Dragon Point deeper inland.

When Lord Glover or Lord Hornwood came in person as his representatives along with men to enforce that rule, even the most recalcitrant smallfolk family had obeyed. The population of Torrhen's Square, Deepwood Motte, and the winter town around Winterfell had doubled because of this, but those people were at least safe for now. Then Eddard had placed Lord Hornwood in command of the defense of Sea Dragon Point, and asked Lord Cerwyn to place his remaining cavalry and archers, about seven hundred men, under Lord Ryswell's command to help defend the rivers in and out of the Rills. Hornwood had near to a thousand men from House Stark and his own, plus a hundred men from the mountain clans, and days' worth of scrubland, hills and forests to play with.

Every night the mountain clansmen under his command came out, and once or twice Eddard and his men had also joined in, either in daytime or nighttime raids on their camps or their line of advance. It couldn't be called a march after all, not nearly organized enough. The Ironborn had started their march in land with around seven hundred and fifty men all told. That number was down to a bare four hundred at this point, but their captains were still around and still determined to find something to attack. They wouldn't be able to. Even if they got past Halys, forces from Ryswell and Cerwyn were already prepared down where the Point met the mainland. The moment they came out of the rough terrain of Sea Dragon Point, the Ironborn invaders would be slaughtered in the open.

For now however Halys concentrated on watching the ships out there, wondering what the Ironborn commander would do about the loss of five ships. His musing were interrupted by a young but determined voice speaking up behind him. "My Lord, with respect I have to say again this was ill-advised. We should pull back immediately"

"And let them see us?" Halys said, amused as he turned to one of his guards, a young man named Lester. Lester was an inexperienced youngster from House Bole, one of the minor Houses that looked to Glover. He was eager to prove himself and had jumped at the chance to join Halys' forces, only belatedly realizing that far from being a mere honor, this might place him in a very dangerous position with no chance to shine in front of girls. As he had manifestly hoped for when informed they were not going to be staying in Deepwood Motte. "No we'll keep watch until they are out of sight before moving on."

Halys was still watching an hour later after the ships pulled up anchor and moved away from the shoreline. "A cautious commander among the Ironborn." he murmured. "Interesting. Does that mean that they are done trying to attack the North, or are they going for some other target?" He turned away, moving towards the horses. "Come, I want to send messages to House Glover and House Ryswell, oh and Reed as well, just in case. Then I think our current crop of... guests should be dealt with."

OOOOOO

The grumbling among the captains started up once more when she ordered the rest of the ships to wait at the mouth of the Fever river as she and Black Wind made their way upriver towards Moat Cailin. What she saw there made Asha shake her head in dismay. Around her, her crew was also muttering as they poled the longship forward in the dark, not even a single lamp visible as they nosed through the river towards their target. Even without light of their own they could make the tower that defended the moat from this direction.

That tower wasn't supposed to be there! It was supposed to be a ruin, not lit up so bright with what looked like at least 20 men on patrol up top, and what looked like a catapult of some kind up there as well. And there certainly wasn't supposed to be a wall defending the area around it, nor what looked like a dozen more men on those walls. Not according to her father, who never thought the North would repair the Moat, but it did match what the Sparr had called salt wives tales.

"The rumors were correct." she said, her voice like lead. "The moat's been repaired to defend it from this flank. Attacking that would be suicide."

"Are you sure about that captain?" said Qarl. Despite his name of The Maid, given to him because he couldn't grow even a hint of a beard, he was known as one of the fiercest warriors among the Ironborn. Yet even he quailed at the idea of attacking the prepared defense they saw further down the Fever. Still he had other things to worry about. "I'm not disagreeing with you, I'm just wondering how the other captains will react."

"I want every man among you to take a turn up top to look at that." She ordered looking around at the men around her, which was most of her crew. She had been prepared to order an attack immediately with only her own crew if she by saw an opening to do it, but this was beyond her worse nightmares. "That way every one of you can be a witness to why we won't be attacking this place. I'd rather have you all alive to be of use elsewhere rather than throw your lives way here for no gain." she said. Paying the Iron Price only matters if we actually get something for our iron.

Back with the rest of the fleet that news and her opinion of what it meant did indeed cause trouble. "We should still attack!" said the Sparr, slamming his hand on the tabletop. He made no move to rise or challenge Asha however, not yet, there was no need right now. If Asha kept on telling the others they shouldn't attack, then there would be no need to directly challenge her, and possibly anger her family. "We're reavers damn it, not puling landsmen who retreat when the going gets tough!"

"And faced with that defense, what would we do? No, I realize my father wanted us to attack the moat so that we can hold that against the North so we could attack the Riverlands without fear of the North coming to their aid, but the rumors should've suggested to him that that was a fool's errand. Now that we know the rumors were true, I'm not going to throw away anyone's lives there."

There were some sneers at that, her show of compassion for her men not being in keeping with the normal Ironborn way of command, but she went on quickly before anyone else spoke up. "No, we'll head further south instead, to a much richer prize."

"Seagard!" said one the captains eagerly.

Two others however shook their heads reflexively remembering the disaster of the battle there during the first rebellion before. "If the North was ready for us there's no doubt House Mallister is as well, we'd receive hard knocks and little treasure for our steel. And other captains have already been sent to the Cape of Eagles and Ironman's Bay. The pickings are slim enough there, we'll end up fighting one another to get anything good." Dunstan said, shaking his head. But his eyes were hard as he stared at Asha, wondering if she really was unworthy of this command if she was willing to ignore her father's orders to attack the North, and seeing an opportunity.

"There are other, better targets further south than Seagard anyway." Asha tapped her map, her finger on a castle on an island off the Westerlands coast that many of the older captains recognized. "Here. If the attack on Lannisport has gone in, they no doubt either be screaming for the ships assigned to Faircastle to retake it, or screaming for aid to stop Lord Orkwood's attack. That means Faircastle itself might be open to attack."

Some of the captains murmured excitement at that idea. After all, the Westerlands were a much richer land than the North, and there was a certain symbolism to raiding Faircastle. After all, it had been the sight of the battle that broke the Iron Fleet during Balon's first attempt at rebellion.

"I know that my opinion on the idiocy of attacking the North isn't popular, and I know that it flies in the face of my father's orders." Asha emphasized the word 'father', forcing the captains around her to remember that she wasn't just a woman she was the only child of the King of the Iron Islands that apparently was still loyal. "So instead of simply trying to order you all around like you were landlubbers, we should settle this the Ironborn way!"

Asha stood up, throwing back her stein of mead before turning the stein over in midair to slam it down top first on the table to show there wasn't a drop left. Then she reached down, pulling out a small throwing ax from beside the table before twirling it in her hand.

That caused the watchers to shout in delight. Even the captains laughed, wondering where she was going with this, even the Sparr and those like him were silent for now. She smiled grimly internally, though on the surface she allowed a devil-may-care grin appear on her face as she began to throw the small ax up in the air, catching it on the down turn. "Who else here has ideas of where we should strike?"

"Me!" said the Sparr slamming his hand down on the table. In response to Asha's challenge he too drained his mug, turning it around in midair before slamming it down as well. "Bear Island! Their women haven't felt the iron shafts of the islands for far too long! And they can't get reinforcements to it without passing through the ocean, our ocean! I'd take a single Ironborn ship against an entire fleet o' northern wolf-fuckers!" That won him a roar of approval, and six or seven other captains all shouted their agreement.

"I." said Ralf, though he didn't bother draining his stein of mead, having already done so. He pointed down at the map on the table instead, tapping the inland Lake. "There's a town here, Torrhen's Square. We take it, strip the town to the ground and then leave by the river. Strike fast, strike hard, then leave before they can mobilize against us before hitting somewhere else."

That too one some murmurs of approval, though not the roars that the Sparr's more 'eloquent' speech did. Still some of the more thoughtful captains, Dunstan Drumm among them, nodded agreement. The plunder would be better from a town than from Bear Island after all, if they could get past the watch fires at the mouth of the Rys.

Asha was startled to see that the other two captains from House Kenning however didn't. Those two had voiced approval of her plan. Now, while inter-house disagreements weren't exactly unusual among the Ironborn, in point of fact they were the norm, but House Kenning normally moved in lockstep. House Harlaw also moved like that, so it hadn't surprised her that the five ships that they had sent north with Asha were willing to follow her.

She had excellent relations with the Harlaws, and most particularly their Lord, Rodrick. Asha really liked that old man, even if he wasn't really seen as a true follower of the Old Way thanks to how much reading he did and the fact he had brought in a maester to take care of his collection after septons were no longer allowed in the Iron Islands. Rodrick, Asha remembered now, had spoken out against the resumption of war with Westeros. He had in fact said they should have looked to the Stepstones or even the Summer Islands instead, but Balon had overruled him, and Rodrick would follow House Greyjoy whatever happened. I know he sent most of his house's strength with Victarion, but he stayed behind with a decent portion of it. I might wish to stop in to talk to him before moving further south.

"Me." said it a third voice, also reaching for to tap the map, jarring Asha out of her thoughts. Hector Sunderly had taken over command of the Sunderly ships since his cousin's untimely death, and he glared hard at Asha. Not, as most mainland lords would expect, because she had killed his cousin. No, House loyalty mattered very little among most of the Ironborn. He glared at her because Asha was a woman, that was all. "Deepwood Motte might be well defended, but it's a smaller House than most Northern ones and it's a richer prize than the Square town. You said der defenses were still there, but if'n we 'it someat nearby, they'll send der armnsmen out ta deal with 'at. Then we can hop in our ships, and get back ta Deepwood Motte afore der defenders ken backtrack."

That was actually a much more intelligent suggestion from him than Asha was expecting, but that was alright. The main objective of this little discussion after all was to make certain that her fleet didn't fall into infighting. Anything else was secondary.

"All right," Asha said aloud, catching her axe by the shaft at the highest point of its flight. "That means we've got four people here who think they know what our fleet should do, so here's what I propose. We'll face one another in the finger dance, the first to lose a finger loses their right to say what the fleet should do! The last one standing gets her plans adopted!"

That won a roar of approval from everyone, as well as some good natured jeering at her assumption of victory. All Ironborn liked the finger dance, the bloodier the better, so long as it wasn't your blood. One captain however bellowed, "Not enough! Give 'em a twirl!"

Asha found herself grabbed from behind then quickly spun around in place as the Sparr and the others were forced to endure the same. Then they were pushed away from the table into a quickly opening area of the deck, as her crew bellowed encouragement. The noise of the commotion reaching them over the distance between them, a few other longships began to make their way over, and one or two of Asha's crew turned to shout out what was going on.

Finally released from the hands who had grabbed her, Asha stood in one place, feeling a little dizzy as she stopped spinning. She was still able to grip the mug of mead that was pushed into one hand, throwing it back easily. She lowered it, and exchanged a subtle wink with Qarl, you hadn't been the one to pass her the mug, but he did pass the mug to the person who in turn passed it to her. Un-Ironborn it might be, but Asha meant to win this, not lose her fingers.

Two other men, both Harlaw men from her crew, were seeing to the other participants giving them mugs as well, but those were not watered down. They weren't added to very much, just enough to give it a little more kick but not enough for anyone to notice the taste. If you're not cheating you're not trying, Asha thought to herself, having heard that line from some merchant or other. It was true in business it was true in life, and that was precisely what she wanted to do, keep on living.

She wobbled forward, her ax held loosely in one hand. "Alright you flotsam of the main!" She said tossing the ax into the air and catching it easily. "Who's ready to dance!?" A few of her crewmen pulled out instruments and began to play a very fast jig as the Sparr moved forward to take her his place across from her.

Their axes flashed as one through the air between them, and Asha caught the one tossed her easily, twirling in place and doing a little dance. The Sparr caught his, and tried to dance but he had never been really that good at dancing in the first place and the ale he had drunk since coming aboard ship hadn't helped matters. Particularly since he hadn't drunk them on a full stomach, he put some ale in it first.

Again and again the two of them exchanges their axes and again and again they danced. The song got faster and faster the throws faster and faster, and after every fourth throw they would have to stop to be twirled around by the crowd and forced to drink some more ale. Eventually of course this proved too much, and the Sparr missed his attempt to catch the axe thrown to him, losing the tip of one finger from the whirling ax head as it passed by. There was a roar of delight from most of the crowd but a few of his own crewmen, who had clambered aboard ship during this engagement, booed and hissed, as they began to help him away.

Asha raised her hand and victory, grinning happily. One down. She took her place in the crowd, watching as Ralf and Hector had their own dance, and it was Ralf who won this round.

By then several other dances were going on throughout the fleet on other ships and even one at the other end of the ship. The sight of blood, song and free-flowing ale had done its work, but Asha still had one person she had to beat. She shook herself, now feeling the effect of even the water-downed ale, and made to move forward.

But Ralf shook his head. "It's done!" he shouted aloud, holding his ax up in the air with one hand and a mug of ale and the other. "Asha's plan to hit Faircastle is good! But we came to the North to raid it, and I'm not going back south without some booty! You all now have two choices to choose from, go south to raid Faircastle with Asha, or stay here and raid Torrhen's Square with me! Think of it, and tomorrow this fleet will split, those with Asha will go with her, and those who want to stay here in the north and teach these northern pussies what the Iron Born can do will stay with me!"

Asha frowned at the way he had so easily taken control of the fleet, making it appear as if he was the leader. But she noticed how Dunstan Drumm was whispering in his ear, and realized that she hadn't been the only one to be planning ahead here. Still, she thought to herself as the crowd roared their approval, at least this way we won't be fighting one another.

So instead of pointlessly protesting Asha nodded her head and raised her own voice. "That's fine, if even half of this fleet can't get some plunder from some damn townies, then we're not real Ironborn. Make them pay the Iron Price here, and I'll go to Faircastle and we'll join the rest of our men there in showing the Westerlands pussies that it's the Ironborn who rule the sea!" That won some cheers of course, and the impromptu party went on from there.

The next day the fleet split. Of the twenty remaining ships, it astonished Asha that twelve ships agreed to go with her. It was a decent enough force, more than enough to take Faircastle if used correctly. The other eight ships, led by Ralf and including both Dunstan and the Sparr, removing all of the more dangerous remaining captains, decided to stay here in the North. That was well beyond what Asha had hoped for, and she led her now much reduced fleet back down south happily.

OOOOOO

The eight ships under Ralf made their way down towards Blazewater Bay, then from there up the Rys towards Torrhen's Square, moving at night at first to pass the mouth of the river, which was patrolled by the Northerners. This didn't let them slip by unnoticed and the warning fires flared in the night behind them. But they were going too fast all hands to oars forging upriver in a single line for that to really matter.

Ralf's longship was in the lead, with the Sparr's directly after, with the Thunderer third in line. It would be barely a day before they broke out of the River into the lake and from there a bare hour to make their way across the Lake to the town that was their target.

Despite what he himself thought, Ralf hadn't been the one to organize this attack. Yes, he had been the one to choose the target, but Ralf Kenning wasn't intelligent enough to have come up with the plan they were following, traversing the mouth of the Rys at night and going hell for leather up river. Dunstan knew he wasn't as well liked as Ralf, nor did he have as good a combat reputation, but he was intelligent, and more than willing to use Ralf as his front man. But Ralf alas didn't have enough charisma to really have rallied the support Dunstan had hoped for this, which is why they were only eight ships, not the fourteen that Dunstan had thought could be swayed away from the Greyjoy cunt's leadership.

Dunstan had lost a son and a brother to the Northerners when they invaded the Iron Islands, and had lost his rock wife to one of them as well. She hadn't died, she had been seduced away from him, and she left the islands with the man who had done it, a man who wore the banner of a moose on his tabard, Dunstan would never forget that. It was one thing to lose a battle, or even a war, it was another to have his own rock wife, the wife born from the Ironborn culture, to choose another man over him and break their vows.

Ever since then Dunstan had hoped and prayed to the Drowned God for a chance to avenge himself on the north. He didn't care if it was that man, in fact he didn't particularly see any way it could be, but he wanted the North as a whole to pay. He wanted to take a dozen salt wives from among their women and show them that the Ironborn were the true masters and not the Northern men. He had hidden that well under his thoughtful exterior however, but when the opportunity came, he took it.

Dunstan stood now on the prow of his longship, one hand caressing the hilt of his family's Valyrian blade, Red Rain. He was eager, almost willing the ships in front of him on so that he could take his vengeance, but that hadn't stopped him from looking around. The area around the Rys' course was a mix of slight hills and rocky terrain, with a few trees here and there. It allowed him to see a long ways on either side of the river, and that was why he saw the first threat first.

Well out of bow range but close enough for him to see was a force of heavy cavalry, simply sitting on their horses, their lances up. The watchers in the crows nests of all the ships spotted them, and Dunstan was about to shout to ask the Sparr what he thought the Northern shits were doing. After all if they were here then they wouldn't be in place to help the defenders at the town itself.

However before he could Ralf's voice echoed back to him from his longship in the lead. "There's a barge of some kind a little ways in from the mouth of the river into the lake! I'll split off and take that, while the rest of you go on to...."

That was as far as Ralf got before there was a resounding earsplitting crash, and his ship shuddered from bow to stern, slowing down dramatically, so much that the Sparr's ship rammed his in the back, followed by the others ramming into his, none of them able to stop their forward momentum enough to halt. Ralf nearly lost his footing at the first sudden change of speed, grabbing at the tiller and cursing luridly as his ship was rammed from behind. "By the Drowned God, what happened!"

"We hit something in the water!" Said the lookout forward, staring down into the water.

"We're taking on water!" Said a voice shouting from below and then suddenly fire arrows began to fall onto the first two ships in line.

OOOOOO

Rodrick, Lord of House Ryswell smiled thinly as he shifted his lance slightly. He and Eddard had exchanged several ravens over the past few weeks, debating the best way to defend the rivers that were the true weakness of the Rills, the section of the North that looked to his house as its defender. Eddard's boy Bran had come up with an extremely excellent idea that Rodrick had grasped with both hands. It was based on the fact that the Starks now had iron and steel running out of their ears, and that wooden ships were patently unable to stop a blow from a scorpion bolt slamming into them. So what would happen, Bran thought, if a ship moving as fast as it could up a river suddenly slammed bow on to a scorpion bolt hidden underneath the water?

Of course it wasn't really a scorpion bolt, it was simply a massive battering ram of iron, sharpened at one end. Sinking and placing it had been arduous work and they couldn't do anything to hide the thing, but it looked as if the Ironborn hadn't even seen it underneath the water. That massive spear had smashed directly into the hull the first ship, not only holing it, but halting the longship's forward momentum enough to have the other ship behind it crash into it, creating a logjam of sitting ducks. Where before each Ironborn ship had been moving forward slightly separate, now they were all tangled up together, unable to go forward, and snarled together too much to move back easily.

And it was about to get worse for them. Rodrick nodded at his signalman, who raised a large red banner into the air waving it in both hands in the air.

The barge that was drifting slightly on the current of the Lake about five hundred yards away from the entrance to the lake was a very crude affair. It had very heavy gunwales barely sanded down flooring, and a heavy but very shallow keel. But for all its crude nature it was an excellent firing platform for the four-hundred House Locke archers. They were the second half of House Locke's contribution to the northern war-making effort, just as the archers they had sent down to join Ranma was the first.

The northern longbow was so large that it could not be fired from horseback, or even by a running man for the most part, though a strong enough man could do that. However, it had a range and a power that was well beyond even the bows of the Riverlands, and certainly the smaller bows the Ironborn used. The barge was well out of the Ironborn's range, but the Ironborn were not out of their range. Worse, the first ship, nor even the second, could bring their single scorpions to bare on the barge.

And the archers were not firing normal arrows. No, as soon as that flag was waved, the top was removed from over a brazier, and the men aboard the barge lit their fire arrows from the coals inside it. As one they turned, and at their troop leaders command fired. Hundreds of fire arrows soared into the air forming a small comet storm that might have been beautiful seen from afar before they landed among the first few Ironborn ships.

Those ships had the command structure and the organization to combat fires aboard their ships, but they were snarled together. Each Ironborn ship was unable to back oars because of the one behind it and unable to go forward because Ralf's ship was in their way, unable to move. His ship was now sinking, rapidly blocking the entrance into the lake, blocking even the river's current from aiding their attempts to pull away.

Again and again arrows flew, slamming into ships hulls, sails, and everything else. The sheer amount of arrows and the flammable nature of everything aboard a ship fought against the organization of the Ironborn, which was disintegrating as every captain tried to save his ship alone, not working with any other fellows despite Dustan's best efforts. His voice couldn't carry over the shouts of his fellow Ironborn or the sound of the ships continuing to scrap together, plus the growing sound of fires burning away.

Moments into the battle the Sparr died, a fire arrow catching him in the shoulder where he had been in the rigging trying to help put out a fire on the sail. Screaming he let go of his grip, trying to pull out the burning arrow automatically, only to fall away from the rigging. He landed awkwardly on his neck on the deck below. Without him there, his men began to leap overboard, landing lightly in the water below at and then making their way to the riverbank.

With fires moving back from the first few to the others, leaping now with the aid of wind from sail to sail, Dunstan realized the longships were a lost cause and ordered his crew to leap overboard. Then he shouted to the ships behind him to do the same, gathering the men together.

Rodrick smiled grimly as he waved his shield arm in the air. The five hundred heavy cavalry around him trotting forward, moving at a sedate pace towards the Ironborn who were desperately trying to organize themselves on the side of the river. On the other side another force of archers, this group from House Stark along with another force of light cavalry began slashing attacks at the groups over there.

The troops on this side of the river were apparently led by a man who was wielding a red tinted blade bellowing orders and trying to organize the Ironborn who had made it onto the river bank. But they weren't organized enough, and not one of them had any kind of polearm. Ironborn didn't use those, not even spears save short stabbing spears. They used axes, maces, broadswords and longswords, weapons that could be used to deadly effect in the close combat of boarding actions. When facing cavalry on land they tended to rely heavily on the depth of their formations to slow the cavalry charge, then pinning the horsemen in place by using their own bodies. Here they didn't have nearly enough men, nor did they have the depth that was necessary.

Three hundred yards away from the rallying Ironborn, Rodrick held up a horn to his lips blowing twice before letting it fall. A second later his lance came down and he slammed his helmet's visor down. The horses all around them began to pick up speed, their own lances lowering as the men spread out into a line, a true, organized cavalry charge going against the type of target it was deadliest against.

Not an hour later, it was all over. With their backs against the river, shocked, disorganized and demoralized from their losses and their ships being on fire behind them, still dealing with the rain of arrows from the barge and not having the training to form any kind of shield wall, Rodrick's heavy cavalry had demolished them. He had lost a bare ten men, and every Ironborn aboard those ships had died in this action.

It would take weeks to remove the burned-out wreckage of the Ironborn ships from the Rys so it could be used for transferring goods again, and longer to remove the giant spear from the river, if it was still in position. This was doubtful given the impetus with which it was hit by that first ship, but the trap had worked, and so Lord Ryswell was very satisfied, despite the amount he had to pay the Starks to create and emplace the blasted thing.

Rodrick caught a glimpse of something on the ground, and quickly dismounted, moving through the rows of bodies that his cavalry had caused. He knelt down, pushing one body to the side to pull out the blade that he had seen from his horse. Lifting it up to the light, he smiled grimly. "A Valyrian blade!" he exclaimed waving in the air. "Well lads, if the Ironborn it can take plunder when they win, I think we can do the same to them that don't you?"

He was answered by a roar of approval, and he turned back cleaning the slightly red tinted blade thoughtfully on a piece of cloth from a corpse. He looked over at a few messengers who had rejoined him after the battle, youngsters from Torrhen's Square. "I'll have messengers for you boys to carry to House Stark, as well as back to the town. I think this bit of excitement is over. After that..."he said holding up the sword thoughtfully, remembering some things Ranma and Daenerys had said about their adventures. "I might need some men to carry this down to my son."

OOOOOO

The portion of the northern army under Ranma's command came within sight of Seagard nearly a week after the discussion with the Charlton knight. The city was a sight to see even from here. Tall, well maintained walls surrounded it on three sides, while from here you could see several tall towers built out of the rock to defend the city from the ocean, and a large castle built on an outcropping jutting into the ocean, with a low wall connecting it to the city. With the port on both sides of the outcrop, the castle would act like Seal Rock did for White Harbor.

By this point Ranma was up and about, and had once again taken his place at the front of the army so he was there when a small delegation riding out from the city under Lord Mallister's banner came out to meet them, the horns on the walls sounding out a joyful tune. Jason reached slightly down to clasp hands with the young man running next to his direwolf, smiling. "Seven hells but it's good to see you lad, though I'm surprised to see you at all from this direction! How did you pass the Twins? Haven't the Freys sided with the Lannisters?"

"By flattening them my Lord." Ranma said gripping the other man's forearm firmly. "Lord Frey went to the trickery and deceit card once too often, we were prepared and took advantage of that."

At Jason's shocked look Ranma went into detail, after which the older man nodded grimly. "I see, yes that makes sense I suppose, and your punishments all were well thought out and just. I have a page from House Frey in my household, but I can place him with the others you sent to the sept. He is a religious boy who's confided in the septon of my keep several times that he has issues with the way the rest of his family go about their business. My maester and the septons of Seagard will be happy to aid the children, and I have an empty barracks that I can use to house your workers. Though what you wish to put them to working on, I don't know."

"Thank you, Jason." Ranma said sincerely, struggling a little to call the older man by his first name. "That's a weight off my chest." The ex-Frey boys had tried, but most were simply too young to take as pages or servants. The boy who had attacked him, Luke, had found a patron however. Hathan had decided to take him as a squire. One other boy had been taken by a knight from House Manderly as his servant for now with the possible elevation to a page later on, but that was all.

"Do you have news from further south?" Ranma asked.

"Some, and none of it good." Jason said grimly. "The Lannisters have yet to make any further move deeper into the Riverlands, but I have no doubt they are consolidating their position on their side of the Red Fork. Refugees are still making their way out. Lord Tywin doesn't seem to be in any rush to ingratiate his forces with the local populace outside those on the lands of those Houses that have bent the knee. Do you know anything about the battle that happened down at the ford of the Kneeling Man?"

"I know the Lannisters won but lost enough men that they were forced to halt their northern march." Ranma said with a shrug. "Do you have any details to share?"

Jason laughed bitterly. "You might say that. My son's report about that was rather thorough, since he was able to speak to a few survivors. The news made for grim reading. Vyren went over to the Lannisters during the battle, opening the way across the ford for them. House Dedding's been wiped out, along with all of its men. House Vance of Atranta lost the force they had sent out to war, possibly more than two thirds of their manpower, along with three of Lord Vance's four sons. The fourth remained back in their castle with his father, a man of Hoster's age. With his house's strength smashed, I have no doubt Vance will be forced to bend the knee." After that brief summary Jason went on, going into detail as he turned his horse, moving with Ranma at the head of the army.

Ranma frowned throughout the telling, while around them the wolfsworn, Domic and Rickard came up to join the discussion. Daenerys too came up, her hair covered with a hood for the moment though she continued to share a horse with Myrcella. As Jason started to wind down Jon pulled out a map, holding it out to Ranma without a word. He looked at it and his frown deepened. "House Vyren's land is down here westward of the battlefield correct?"

"Yes, their forces and a few thousand or so of the Lannister's own control that area now. House Lolliston has pulled back to its keep. They refuse to bend the knee, but they're not an offensive force at this point. House Shawney might become such in the future, but not right now."

"And Blanetree joined the defenders at the Ruby Ford?" Jason nodded in response and Ranma went on. "Interesting, and the Lannisters haven't moved since? Do you know anything specific about what's going on over the Red Fork? And what about the Knightly Houses?"

"House Nayland declared for Renly for some reason." Jason said with a shrug indicating with that slight movement that he didn't understand what the young idiot was thinking. "House Grell and House Paige moved against them, but apparently there was quite a bit of 'internal dispute' in House Paige that had to be settled first." He detailed what happened there in even greater detail than the battle Patrek having talked to many of the house's survivors after his arrival in Fairmarket.

Ranma and the others all looked aghast at the idea of family killing family like that. Daenerys was also aghast at it, and spoke up for the first time in this discussion. "The Freys truly were a disease in the Riverlands. They should have been dealt with after they refused their Lord's call to war during the War of the Usurper."

Jason looked at the woman, with that figure she could only be a woman, holding the Princess who he recognized. He cocked an eyebrow having noticed the slight Essossi accent to her words. "Indeed miss, but by that point Lord Hoster was sick of war and he had the houses which actually sided with House Targaryen to reduce. It would have taken years to bring the Twins to heel conventionally and many lives, a price which Hoster was unwilling to pay. And how are you, your grace?" he asked looking at the princess. Ranma had informed him of how to treat the Princess and Jason was willing to go along with it. He honestly suspected she too would be a bastard, but was willing to treat her as the princess she'd been raised as until then.

"I am well my lord," Myrcella replied, bobbing her head to where she sat on the horse. "Though, a lot has changed since we saw one another during the Tourney of the Hand, the vast majority of it bad."

"That's good to hear and so very true." Jason sighed, before turning his attention back to the woman holding Myrcella in the saddle, her face hidden by a hood. "And may I ask are you who you are, miss?" He asked.

From where he was now walking once more, Ranma grimaced. This wasn't going to be pretty. But Ranma and Daenerys had talked about it and hiding her heritage for longer than they needed to wouldn't look good, especially not in this case. Daenerys slowly raised her to her hand to her hood, pulling it back revealing her face, violet eyes and silver hair as Ranma did the introductions. "Lord Jason Mallister, be known to Daenerys Targaryen, my wife and queen."

For a moment Jason's face showed open shock, before hardening as he turned burning eyes to Ranma. "What are you playing at boy?" he growled angrily reaching down to grasp Ranma by the front of his armor. Behind him the men from Seagard all shifted uneasily, the wolves moving towards them and around their horses, who shied away. "You know what her father did, you know what that cost my family! My brother Jeffory burnt to death with your grandfather and uncle! And now you bring her here?"

"I am in no way afflicted with my family's madness." Daenerys said calmly, moving her horse forward with Myrcella sliding off to one side so as to not be a part of this confrontation. "I am not my father, nor am I any of the other madmen my family has so often produced. Incest will do that to the best of families, or the worst."

Jason growled. It was only the fact that Daenerys was a woman that was keeping him from attacking her already, and then his eyes narrowed as he saw Sunfyre and Rhaegon following a third direwolf, coming up to join the others. "Yet you bring back dragons and none of your family has ever been slow in using them and their fire on anyone who opposed you! I can understand the force that they represent, I can even applaud the idea of allying with such a force intellectually. But I will not welcome you back, your father cost me my brother, that war cost my House many lives, and I can remember the stark horror of hearing how Jeffory died all too well!"

Inwardly Daenerys frowned a little, never having understood why the idea of dragonfire was so anathema to warriors who would use wildfire equipped catapults to kill their enemies or fire arrows on ships or tents or castles. The death meted out was still the same, possibly less agonizing from dragonfire which burned hotter and killed much more quickly because of it. She didn't say that aloud of course, instead bowing her head and moving her horse forward, closer to Jason's. "My family has much to pay for, for my father's reign and beyond. But at least I acknowledge the debt, and I'll go farther."

She moved even closer now, close enough for him to attack. "After hearing that your son had been sent to Fairmarket my husband and I had thought to have you remain here to defend Seagard against any Ironborn assault. But if you are so concerned about me and whether or not I am infected with the madness that gripped my father, become my advisor."

"What?" Jason said rearing back slightly but his eyes were now much more focused, the anger dissipating into surprise.

"Become my advisor." Daenerys said ignoring for the moment Ranma's look of amusement or Rickard's look of incredulity. "None of us have a very good handle on the houses or the power structure of the Riverlands, the intermarriages and alliances, well other than the most obvious and some of the weaknesses. The Blackwoods and Bracken's for example: their feud is well-known. But how does House Vyren's betrayal impact the other houses, will that make the houses on the other side of the Green Fork more or less likely to attack us, and how will my return be seen by the houses in the Riverlands, or even the smallfolk? You can give us this information, and you can watch me for signs of fire madness at the same time."

"I'll even go further. If you see even the first hint of such, I will not fight you or try to flee, and you may cut me down where you wish." Daenerys smiled, but there was no humor in it as her violet eyes met Jason's hawk-like gaze.

"Honestly I doubt you'll ever see such. My older brother seems to have got both our portions of that particular trait of our line. Is that all right Ranma?" She asked now making a point of asking her husband's opinion. Well after the fact, but it was the thought that counted.

Ranma nodded watching Jason closely though there was still a small, amused smile on his face. He knew that Daenerys would win the older man over in time, and she had just trapped him into service to the two of them for a while.

Jason raised one hand head kneading his face for moment. To put it mildly he was unhappy about the return of the dragons and the Targaryens, since from her talk it seemed Viserys would make an appearance somewhere down the line too, though not with the northerners. But now that he had calmed down, the woman didn't seem to be bossing around Ranma or the other northerners, and Ranma had impressed him not only with his physical abilities but his mind when they had met in King's Landing. If he was willing to go along with it then Eddard was as well. And if the man who had gone to war because of his own father and brother's deaths at Aerys' command was willing to move past that, then he would do the same.

Like Eddard, Jason had never allowed his hatred of the individuals to spread to the family they were a part of, but he had taken a hard look at the history of the Targaryens. He had decided that madness ran it, that the people who hadn't fallen to it in some form were simply aberrations rather than the norm. Still, if she is willing to let me get close to her, to let me watch her for that and I have no reason to refuse.

After rubbing at his face for a moment he nodded slowly, looking at the regal young woman perched in her saddle as if it was a throne, staring at him with those powerful, violet eyes. "I'll agree to that. The Ironborn haven't shown any inclination to attack Seagard itself, and my defenses are ready for such in any event." Those defenses consisted of towers armed with ship-sinking scorpions or other ballistae, several galleys on constant patrol, a city watch that could be bolstered up to two thousand from the townfolk of Seagard, as well as a thousand trained infantrymen from his house. The rest of his force he had sent into the Cape of Eagles.

"But I will be watching you your grace." Jason almost bit his lip as he said the last two words. They had simply slipped out, he hadn't meant to say them, but something about this girl, something about the way she sat there so poised and controlled, it was almost as if she was already crowned. He turned away deliberately looking at Ranma. "I would however first like to hear what exactly happened in King's Landing."

Ranma nodded, and filled him in on what had occurred to spark the battle of two truths. Here Myrcella made her presence known again, slipping into the saddle in front of Daenerys with the ease of weeks of practice. The news that her brother had admitted to having Tommen killed sparked outrage in Jason and his men, as it had every time she shared it.

The march continued as Jason joined the rest of the wolfsworn and Rickard at the front, discussing what their long-term goals and plans were. The minimum they wanted was the Lannisters pushed back, and at least Wayfarer's Rest built up to match the Golden Tooth, something that would take years. They wanted the Lannisters removed from power in King's Landing, how that could be accomplished was up in the air, but any way was good, and if they could, they wanted the Lannisters removed from power as Lord Paramount of the Westerlands. But if the war dragged on until the start of winter, Ranma and Daenerys would have to shift priorities.

"Will you ally with either of the Baratheon brothers?" Jason asked cocking his head.

He noticed with relief that Ranma didn't even glance at Daenerys as he shook his head. "No. Renly hasn't proven himself worth any kind of crown, and when this all began the coward and his friend Loras left my father to die in King's Landing." Jon and Arya both growled at that, a sound echoed by their direwolves even Ghost getting a taste of the anger that all three siblings felt.

"It was only luck and Ser Jory Cassel's sacrifice that allowed my father to survive. If Loras and Renly had stayed and fought with the fifty men, with Loras and Renly's friendships and some of the neutral houses we might've won the day and there wouldn't have been need for a war in the first place." Well, not with the Lannisters anyway. "As for Stannis, he seems to have made allies of a magical disposition that are not very honorable himself." Daenerys said from Ranma's other side.

Jason steeled himself and looked across at her, once again feeling a small flash of anger at her Targaryen features but her eyes were calm as she faced him. He made a small interrogative sound in his throat, and she took that as a cue to continue. She explained about the Shadow Warriors, and he looked askance at that before Ranma and Myrcella both spoke up in defense of her description, before going into how Stannis had wanted her captured well before any news of her being on that ship could've reached him through normal means.

Particularly damning was Ranma and Domic both telling how Stannis had been acting as king not even a day after his brother died. That of course indicated he had news of that event well before he could've received it through normal means, and showed a remarkable level of coldness to his brother's passing. Despite Jason knowing the relationship between the two had never been cordial, he couldn't overlook that.

After taking it all in Jason looked at Ranma again, his eyes sharp. "So you're going for the Iron Throne yourself My Lord?"

Ranma shook his head. "The Iron Throne is dead. It was a symbol of power and cruelty, sort of the Targaryens way of saying 'Neener, neener, look what we could do to you'." He said smirking at Daenerys who flushed but laughed lightly before smacking his shoulder. "No, there needs to be a new symbol, one of unity of purpose rather than brute force. What that is I don't know yet. I don't particularly want to rule the Seven Kingdoms of Westeros, but I certainly don't want any of the current batch of 'kings' ruling it either."

"And don't forget my brother." Daenerys said shaking her head. "I have no idea what his long-term plans were after we left, but he's still out there. And with his own dragon, she thought, once again feeling that pang of grief at having left the black colored egg behind. If only I had confided in Ranma right then! I know it would have made our escape from the city much tougher, but...

At the time fleeing had been the obvious thing to do, but in hindsight it was her lack of trust in Ranma and his own lack of information that allowed Viserys to continue to breath and with a dragon at his side. Yes, getting out of the city would have become far, far tougher if the magisters found out Ranma was there and could close the port against their escape, but it was a decision Daenerys would regret for the rest of her life.

"Oh, this just keeps getting better and better." Jason growled.

The army arrived at Seagard several hours later, and were quickly dispersed to the garrisons and as well as being put up in the keep. The previous Frey men who had now become workers would be housed at Seagard for now while they started on the project Ranma had envisioned the moment he heard about Bran's work on the White Knife.

Later that evening while waiting for Domic and Alayaya to return from canvassing the town for information, Ranma filled Jason in on that, which caused the older man to look at him in shock. "A canal, a canal connecting the Green Fork to the ocean here." Ranma said, tapping the map Jason kept in his office right next to where Seagard was marked. "It'll be tough, and my master engineer will certainly need more men than we captured at the Twins, but they can make a start on it."

As the name suggested, much of the commerce and trade of the Riverlands revolved around use of its rivers, and Jason was no stranger to thinking in those terms. Looking at the map and thinking about what the canal represented, he knew that this plus the supply depot that Ranma had already described would enrich his family tremendously. The money that the Twins brought in for the former House Frey would possibly be doubled, adding to the money he already received from controlling a seaport.

Ranma went on to describe some of the works already accomplished up in the North and a few planned in the future. Most notable was the work on the Last River, which would allow House Umber to ship the coal that they could produce elsewhere in the North. Until the River froze at any rate, but Ranma knew Bran was already looking into solutions for that.

"We'll build a fort and stopping point where the canal intersects the river, and that will be crown lands, held by the Royal House. That will allow us to tax the trade directly from that point, though it won't be much, a few copper stars with each load. The trade itself will be so much that it doesn't have to be large."

"An amazing idea, if you can actually build it. Merely clearing a road to the Green Fork plus building a few barges there will allow me to send supplies further down few if need be."

"True, and I have some items I'd like to purchase here in Seagard that you'd have to send up to us. In bulk, to say the least. About a dozen well-crafted crossbows, and, the other's a bit more... esoteric. It's a kind of spear, with a soft iron head. I understand your house controls a small iron mine..."

The two men were interrupted by a knock on the door. Daenerys smiled there with Myrcella and young Vanessa, the painter with them. The young ex-Frey girl was looking a little bashful poking her toe at the stone of the floor beneath her while Myrcella and Daenerys were both smiling happily. "I thought you would like to see this." Daenerys said holding out a small bit of parchment to Ranma.

Jason and Ranma both looked at it and saw what looked like a charcoal sketch of Arya and Cley training together. It was amazingly good for what looked like a rapid job, and Ranma turned to Vanessa praising her for it and rubbing the top of her head affectionately. Jason took the image from him, looking on with amusement while Ranma sent Vanessa off to bed. "This is indeed amazingly good, and you she had other finished paintings?"

"Only one finished one, it was an image of a tree with forest folk faces here and there in the branches, a really remarkable work. I'll be leaving enough money here to pay for her tuition in the arts, I think Vanessa has a bright future ahead of her."

"Oh, you don't have to do that, I'm more than willing to take up the task of being her patron." Jason said hurriedly, thinking of how his wife would like a portrait, or that they needed a few tapestries on the walls in portions of the castle if Vanessa was as good at that as painting.

"It's not a bother." Ranma said shrugging his shoulders. "It's not as if that's a large chunk of the money we were able to take from the Twins, not even a large portion of the money that I took as commander." That was only 5% of the total, a shocking departure from what was the norm but it was still a large amount. The rest had been split among the men (with a portion set aside for the rest of the army) or sent back further north to be used to fund projects there.

"I insist." Jason said looking down at the sketch once more.

Daenerys laughed. "If the two of you can't agree to it, why not split the difference? That way you'll both profit later on by having been Vanessa's patron."

Ranma and Jason thought about it, then nodded seeing it made sense. Moments after that, Domic and Alayaya returned from the city. After Ranma explained what the two had been up to Jason passed over small glasses of wine, then asked them what they had discovered.

"Well for one thing, the merchants here are much more worried about the Ironborn than about the lordlings fighting one another for that blasted torture device they call a Throne." Domic laughed darkly, shaking his head. "I found a tavern where the merchants and ship captains congregate, and they are all worried about what the Ironborn could do. They're scared of putting out to sea now, but some are close to the point where they are running out of money, or their cargo is reaching the point where they need to set sail or risk it becoming ruined in the hold."

He looked at Jason and Ranma seriously. "I would recommend that you either purchase as much of those goods as you can, the foodstuffs at least, or pay for them to head up to Deepwood Motte soon. If you can be seen as favoring the common merchants, that might come in handy later on, particularly when we need to rely on their ships to bring in supplies, as we will at some point, I have no doubt. The rest is material we might be able to use as well, though I'll leave that to your discretion."

"How about a convoy system?" Ranma asked. At their looks, Ranma chuckled internally, remembering reading how the Americans had been forced to deal with German subs during WW2 in the only class he had much time for at Furinkan. "The merchants decide where they are going now, some port or other though with the Westerlands and the Ironborn at war with the Riverlands, I have no idea where that would be. Then they pay you to send some of your war galleys out with the group, then come back here after."

"The Reach and Dorne are within range of the ships here," Jason replied, nodding his head. "We can take some of their goods as payment here in fact, and given how some of it is foodstuffs that will spoil soon, we can get an excellent price for it, and then take a further percentage of their profit when they reach their destination. I'll summon them all up here tomorrow morning, that is an excellent idea Ser bard. Anything else?"

"Not much. The sailors and other people in the taverns I played in were thankful the army arrived, and seem to have taken the information about Joffrey's bastard origin as truth, though not Stannis' outlandish accusations, which I will share later on once I run them down myself." Domic looked over at Myrcella, who looked at him her head on one side in query, but he did not mention what he had already heard about those accusations. The girl had been through enough without hearing that one of her possible uncles had accused her mother of incest, one of the highest crimes in the Faith of the Seven.

"Hatred for the Lannisters seems to be the watchword my lords." Alayaya cut in, also mindful of not relaying the rumors of Stannis' propaganda to Merry. "Everyone is enraged at Edmure's imprisonment, it seems he was rather well-liked by most of the smallfolk, outside of bards anyway. And the Lannisters are seen as the most dangerous house to the smallfolk, which given their history is understandable. They only have a few factors here, not actual agents but merchants that look to the Lannisters and pass on information."

At Jason's shock, she smiled impishly. "Men tend to forget that whores have ears my lord, it's one of the reasons why the Spider is so good at his job. I can speak to them all as an equal and get even more information out of them than he." She frowned. "Well, the adults anyway, I have never been able to talk to the child whores." She smiled then, standing from her chair to curtsy toward Jason. "A variety I was happy to see you don't allow in your city my lord."

"Hmhf, no need to thank me for that, lass." Jason scoffed, looking away for a moment somewhat embarrassed. "Just made good sense to me, and I doubt the Mother of the Father look upon such as that favorably. I take it you have dealt with them?"

"I took the liberty of passing their names on to your castellan my lord, yes. Other than that, there were a few known agents of the Spider, who I talked to, and convinced them not to share any further information." Alayaya smiled grimly. "Whores are loyal to themselves, one another and the mighty coin. I am a former sister of the trade, and was able to convince them that silence could earn them more coin much more safely than continued service to the Spider."

She looked at Ranma who smirked, nodding at her. He had given her some of his portion of the money taken from the Twins to do just that. He doubted that it would silence every way Varys could hear of their march, but he hoped to at least reach Fairmarket before that news could reach King's Landing, if not Tywin. "Is that all you two have to report?"

Both spy masters nodded, and after being thanked for their efforts, excused themselves. Soon after that everyone called it a night, and Ranma and Daenerys went off to their bed.

Myrcella had purposefully contrived to place her and Alayaya in the bedroom next-door, and it was with a sigh of relief that she learned that the noise's the two made could indeed come through stone. Once again she her hands traveled down her body, tingling with anticipation...

The army spent two days there, resting and recuperating and letting the men blow off some steam. The warehouses of the town were quite busy, but there was no outbreak of violence or examples of the men acting out badly in public. The sergeants had their orders from Ranma and the other Lords, and all of them were afraid to be the first that Ranma would make an example of.

On the third day the army marched out, towards the Green Fork in a straight line out from Seagard to follow it down south before turning to make their way over lands to Fairmarket. Days later the workers made that own trek, laying out lines for the later construction to come, as the chief engineer went over the land, deciding how best to create the first Royal Canal.

OOOOOO

Ranma's attempt to sucker all of Tywin's scouts and spies into following the main army on the other side of the Twins didn't work as he had expected, primarily because one of them wasn't a scout but a messenger sent secretly over the rivers towards the Twins. That messenger had been sent out at the same time as the raven to Old Walder ordering him to hold the North, but of course took far longer. First he had to get over the Blue Fork using a small coracle taken from House Vypren, then the Green Fork, which was not an easy trek.

Coming back down was much easier, but still it had been a long, nervous trek, the messenger not wishing any of the locals to see him either way until he was on Vypren land. By the time the messenger returned to the Kneeling Man's ford, nearly a month and a half had passed, and a lot had changed.

Where before the army's camp had taken up a bare two acres now it sprawled for more than ten, reflecting the size of the army here. Many of the tents previously used had been replaced by long wooden houses, there looked to be larger canvas tents here and there, a massive paddock holding meat animals next to another holding the horses, and, a must in any camp, organized areas for latrines well away from the cooking area or the water of the Red Fork.

Though that was nothing compared to the work done on the defenses on the ford itself. Two rows of ditches filled with stakes backed by a large rampart made of logs and rocks made up those defenses. Work was going on creating several catapults, and a large wooden tower sat well back from the defensive line. It would allow people standing on top of it to view any action at the ford itself while remaining well back out of danger.

The second muster of the Westerlands had indeed arrived, giving Tywin close to thirty-one thousand men excluding the forces surrounding Raventree Hall. Eighteen thousand men were stationed here alone, ready to become an offensive force once more, regardless of the defenses they had thrown up under Lord Selmon Stackspear. He had shown a remarkable ability in creating fieldworks and organizing the army's camp, and had been placed in charge of those areas by Tywin, who was already planning to reward the man for this. His work had kept the normal army issues with diseases down to a minimum.

Another seven thousand men were stationed in Stone Hedge as a reserve force. They would follow the first force when they went on the attack, leaving four thousand men to hold the lines here. Not enough to fully man them, but enough to hold until more men could be brought up from the rest of the army. That portion had been split into smaller packets of troops under various lords to invest Harrenhal, Darry and Harroway's Town. Enough men to hold each in turn against any army for long enough for aid to arrive.

The messenger gaped around him at the camp after giving the guards his password, but didn't have much time to take in the sights before he was ushered into his lord's presence. Tywin received the man back in his command tent, along with Daven and a few of his other lords.

All of them stared at the common born messenger after he finished speaking, but it was Tywin who spoke. "You say the Twins is 'just gone'? What do you mean by that? Where are the Freys?"

"As ter the Freys I don't know, but I spects they all be dead milord, they'd sorta have to be what with their castle bein' a ruin now. I don't know how, it didn't look nothin' like if it'd been done by fire or anything like that, 'twas almost, well some of the larger bits I saw from where I were hiding, they looked as if they'd been cut by something real sharp. Both sides of the Twins are gone, all save da guardhouses on either side of the bridge. The northern men t'were there on both sides housed in da guardhouses, so's I couldn't get close, sorry milord. I think they must've been left there to protect ta place. Then I's came back, being real careful not to be seen by anyone no how."

"I wonder how you did that, Young Wolf?" Tywin murmured to himself turning away already forgetting the man's presence as he peered into the distance, thinking hard.

His nephew jerked his head towards the doorway and the messenger/scout hurried out while Daven looked back at his uncle. "You seem to be taking this well, I have to say, uncle."

"The Freys could've become a problem in the future. Old Walder was never a man to let anyone else's family matter to his own. Even if one of his sons is married to Genna, I was never very happy with how avaricious the family was as a whole. Often you have to crush the snake before it can strike, and the Freys swiftly were becoming such."

"So your offer to make him Lord Paramount was just a feint of some kind?"

"It was to motivate him to actually do something for a change rather than sit on the fence until it became time to divvy up the spoils." Tywin said coldly. "It seems to have worked, though he certainly hasn't bought us as much time as I had hoped."

And that is without the sheer speed of the Northerners to already be where my other spies are reporting them! I had thought we would have at least another month before they even arrived at the Twins, to hear that they are already past the Twins and in House Wayn's lands, is astonishing. Worse, it forces me to remain here in the Riverlands, regardless of what my agents in Duskendale have told me of Stannis' arrival. I will have to hope that the two stags will gore one another, damn it. Still, Serret will hold the capital if it can be held at all.

He turned to his nephew looking at him thoughtfully. "We have several scouts already over the river looking at the force coming down on the eastern side of the green fork, correct?" The younger man nodded and he went on. "We'll wait here then for them to return, I want to know the composition of that force, that may let us guess how they will act. Though I doubt the Young Wolf is with them, I have no doubt he is elsewhere by now."

"And where would that be uncle?"

"Seagard." Tywin said definitively. "That family is both powerful and loyal to the Tullys, Lord Mallister can no doubt give Ranma some up-to-date information. What force he has I have no idea, but that too we may learn by looking at the force he sent down the Kingsroad. Now..." he murmured, looking down at his map, which had been updated and improved since this campaign began. "If I was the Young Wolf, where would I try to assault me? Regardless, push a thousand more men across the ford to Vypren, I want that castle held so strongly, and so obviously, no one will wish to siege it." And if the Young Wolf uses whatever new siege weapon he used on the Twins there, I will at least have witnesses to question after regardless of its efficiency.

"Kinsman, I think you might be overestimating the Stark whelp." Stafford Lannister said. He had led the second muster here, and ostensibly was in charge of the House Lannister infantry, but in reality he simply relayed Tywin's orders. "The Twins must have fallen to infighting, that's the only explanation for their fall, the Northerners just got lucky, and the pup's youth will get the better of him soon enough."

"That's true milord," Lord Plumm said, watching his liege carefully. A decent tactician and lord, he wasn't a good strategist and knew it, leaving the long term plans to other people. "As good a warrior as he undoubtedly is, he's untried as a general, and as Ser Stafford said, young to boot. He won't think like you. The young think in grand charges and heroism, not real terms. Our army here will be a temptation he can't deny."

"You are underestimating him badly." Tywin said glancing at both men with a cold glare that shut them both up, inwardly scoffing at Stafford's attempt to seem closer to him than Stafford really was. It was obvious the man had seen how Tywin favored Damon, and was wishful to ride his cloak in order to get closer to Tywin. But that only worked one a foolish lord, and Tywin was anything but foolish.

With that taken care of Tywin went back to his musings. Where would I attack? For certain I wouldn't attack a prepared position like this, regardless of whatever siege weapon I used in the Twins. I might look to use it again elsewhere, but I wouldn't fight where my enemy was strongest. But what would my long term goals be? That I cannot guess at, but he is a Stark. For certain he will try to relieve Raventree Hall. Or could he try to lead a smaller force directly around my army and down south, trying to pull me after him? Regardless, he'll have to cross the Red Fork somewhere, and I might still be able to force him to come to me, but I can also attempt to retake the initiative before that.

After a moment he spoke aloud. "I want scouts out all along the Red Fork, in particular I want at least two dozen of our best men placed near Riverrun to watch for anything unusual. Other than that, Lord Marbrand, tell your son his plan is approved. Then get the army ready to march at a moment's notice..."

OOOOOO

Victarion Greyjoy was a large man with a broad chest, heavy shoulders and lanky hair down to his shoulders which was flecked with gray. He wore plate armor in combat something unusual even among the Ironborn as well as a helm in the shape of an octopus, showing his faith in the Drowned God. As Lord Captain of the Iron Fleet he was an experienced and deadly naval tactician, though not a strategist by any means, nor one for deep thinking of any type.

And at the moment, his flagship the Iron Victory was the only longship from the Iron Fleet among his armada. To his mind the hundred and twenty ships that crowded around his flagship were a poor substitute. The Iron Fleet consisted of longships made larger by at least half again the length of a normal longship. This made them somewhat slower, but much more seaworthy, heavier and thus harder to sink with a larger crew and much more dangerous in a fight. Worse, it was a very rare longship outside the Iron Fleet that mounted any kind of scorpion, which every Iron Fleet ship had. Without those weapons they would have a hard time standing up against a Westeros galley.

Still, they were the tools he had been given for this assault. His king and brother had given command of this attack to him personally, and Victarion would carry it out. That was his purpose in life, to obey his king, that was all there was to it. His part of Rise of the Kraken was to take out the Shield Islands that had stood for so long protecting the rich and soft underbelly of the Reach.

It was a task worthy of Victarion's skills. The Shield Islands were a formidable naval power, normally around forty to fifty ships, all of them galleys. These were backed up by fortifications on the Islands themselves, but those can be circumvented so long as you weren't stupid enough to try to sail directly into their fire.

"Sir, the ten decoy ships are moving off."

Victarion turned to the man who spoke, his first mate, nodding grimly. "Good." In his mind he pictured what would be happening. The decoy group was made of ten longships, which had made a wide arc around the Shield Islands yet unlike the rest of Victarion's fleet close enough to still in sight from the nearest towers. Their course would take them towards the river Mander's mouth, which the Shield Islands were supposed to protect.

Those ten ships would draw out the Shield Islanders to defend the Mander. Where my ships will pounce on them, with the wind and wave against them, Victarion thought grimly. Encircle them on the open sea and wipe them out. The rest of his fleet had taken a much longer curve around the Islands to position themselves southwest of the islands. They would catch the ships from behind as they chased the decoys.

The sun was high in the sky when Victarion's ships began their own turning toward land, heading towards where the Mander began. If the decoy ships had been able to stay away from their pursuers that was where he would pin them in place.

Something that most landlubbers didn't realize was how long ship maneuvers take, and how tough it was to truly move ships through large bodies of water in a controlled manner. But Victarion was a past master at it, and he smiled grimly as the Iron Victory hove into sight of at the twenty war galleys in the distance. Already a few of those galleys had spotted his own ship, and a few of them were turning away from their course, moving back towards him. After a moment they must've spotted the rest of his fleet coming on behind, and began to try to evade rather than seek battle.

It was too late however, his own was fleet had spread out too much for them to evade, and both the wind and wave were against their attempts to move away from the land. They were caught, trapped, with no chance of opening the range once his ships closed. Another turn of the glass later they were within range of the scorpions, and both sides began to fire.

The fire was even for now despite the galleys each carrying four scorpions apiece, against his fleet, wherein all of twelve ships carried scorpions, one each save for Iron Victory, which carried two at the prow. But whereas his own ships had been training extensively since he had taken command of them, the galley's scorpion crews seemed to entirely green crews. Most of their shots missed because of this but their scorpion bolts were heavier than those of his ships' and one shot was actually able to hole a longship at the far right of his formation.

The bolt slammed into the longship right at the waterline, and it went under quickly after that, the crew going to join the Drowned god as all Ironborn who died in battle on the sea did. As Victarion watched the longships on either side of the unlucky ship swarmed forward, coming alongside raking the war galley with arrows, as another ship closed, ramming into it near the bow.

Soon the rest of the Shield island ships began to turn in a battle force rather than one or two ships alone, and he nodded grim approval. Someone over there had obviously taken command somehow. Could the Reach navy have come up with signal flags like his people had? It didn't matter Victarion decided. They were too outnumbered in any event, and couldn't keep the range open to take advantage of their galley's greater long range weapons.

Turning Victarion bellowed commands to his first mate, ordering him to let up on the sail for a moment. The man did so with alacrity, knowing this did not imply any lack of courage in his captain, rather he wanted a little more time to pick out their target.

Victarion turned back and studied the battle as it continued, the other, much smaller longships speeding ahead of Iron Victory towards the galleys who were now moving as a unit, trying to keep the range open, but as he had predicted the wind and the tides were against them, and they didn't have the banks of rowmen who could have fought against nature's pull.

It took him a few moments, but eventually Victarion was able to pick out the one ship that seemed to be at the center of their formation. It flew a banner showing a shield of blue and white flowing lines around a center shield of tan dotted with black dots. He recognized it as belonging to House Hewett, and thought maybe it might even be commanded by that House's lord. "That one." he decided aloud, pointing at it with his heavy battle axe. "Aim us for that one, and take us in."

His crew responded with a roar, and they once again went to full sail with two dozen rowers helping the ship along, in fits and starts, throwing off the aim of their opponents, their bolts landing before and to either side of the Iron Victory, sinking into the water. At the forefront the men manning the scorpions waited calmly, waited until the one on the starboard side was within killing range then fired, not at the target ship but at the nearest ship to its starboard side. Several bolts more came back at them from other war galleys along the Shield Islander's makeshift line, but none struck home. Unlike their own blow which took their target right at the water line as the unfortunate long ship had been at the outset of the battle.

That ship immediately began to list sinking at the bow, and Iron Victory came alongside. Ropes immediately went across, yanking the two ships together with a crunch of tortured wood while archers peppered the other ship's deck, breaking the small shield line they had set up to repel boarders between the heavy scorpions that lined its deck on either side.

Victarion roared, leaping over the gunwales up onto the slightly taller war galley, his axe, a heavy single bladed weapon in one hand and a large shield in his other. "We do not sow! Feed them to the Drowned God!"

His crew responded with another roar as they raced across after him, but he had already cut down two Reach armsmen, slamming into another with his shield so hard that the man actually left his feet for a moment. Unable to regain his footing on the heaving deck Victarion finished him with a downward stroke his axe. Two more men came at him, but by that point his own were across and the battle had become a melee across the entire length of the large warship.

With the command ship out of the action, the rest of the Shield Islands fleet wasn't fighting as a coordinated unit any longer but then again neither were the Ironborn. Unlike the Iron Fleet, which Victarion had trained extensively to act and respond as a unit, these ships had been pulled from every House and clan from both Wyks, some from Pyke and even a dozen from House Harlaw. But the outcome of the battle wasn't truly in doubt.

Lord Hewett stared around him, standing in the back of the ship staring out over the destruction of his House's naval strength as well as that of many ships of his allies among the Shield Islands. This wasn't all of the Shield Island's strength, but it was at least half, and judging by the number of ships now circling his own like so many sharks around whales, this was a full attack, not a raid as he had first thought.

Those were the last thoughts he had had time for as the melee finally reached him. He turned, raising his blade as a giant of a man wielding an axe with a horrifying sea creature helmet pushed towards him at the head of a dozen other reavers.

OOOOOO

The advantages of maneuverability numbers and the position of their fleet had proven decisive to secure an Ironborn victory. Of the twenty ships said Lord Hewett had led out against what he thought was a mere ten longship reading force sixteen had been sunk and fired outright, with four captured and their crews put to death, not one of them being worth ransoming.

Of the hundred plus ships under Victarion's command he had lost an even eighteen to his enemy's scorpions before his longships could close. The decoy vessels had also lost five ships, but all of them had been undermanned so their loss mattered less than the others. A further three ships from his main fleet had been damaged, and two of them had to be scuppered entirely due to fire damage and the loss of nearly their full crews. A group of four galleys had tied themselves together when those two ships crews had boarded one other numbers, wiping them out before more longships could come to their fellow's aid.

The fact that it had taken so long to do so was because those two ships belonged to House Goodbrother of Corpse Lake and the nearest ships all belonged to House Myre. The two houses had a long term, low-key feud, not unusual in the Iron Islands, but this one had been exacerbated a few years ago when the Goodbrother's raided a House Myre port, stealing away a dozen trained shipwrights and a lot of shipbuilding materials. Pinchface Myre and his Lord uncle had decided to let the chaos of battle take their vengeance for them.

This infuriated Victarion. Such petty rivalries had no place in wartime. Therefore he had personally executed the first mate of each of those ships, and flogged every captain save Lord Myre. They had all protested of course and tried to rally support from the other families from Harlaw, but when the Harlaws themselves wouldn't back them, that fell through. Then when Victarion offered to match any champion they choose from among their House's men, but if he won he would execute the captains instead, they had backed off, taking their punishment with ill grace but with no further issues.

Soon after that, his fleet was underway again turning back towards the ocean and away from the shore of the Reach, making for the Shield Islands themselves. His mission was to take those islands, not raid the coastline of the Reach, and Victarion would do so.

A day later his fleet came within sight of the Shield Islands at high noon. Victarion wanted it that way, he wanted the defenders of those islands to see his fleet coming, and know that their ships had lost. That would demoralize them, and make their conquest easier. Plus the watch fires warning the Reach of their presence were useless at this point, the Reach wasn't his objective, those Islands were.

What he got instead however was twenty more galleys coming out from within a port on the southernmost island of the Shield Islands, Southshield he thought it was called. He cursed angrily, having thought that the ships he had destroyed already had been the totality of the Shield Islands strength. After a moment spent counting however he nodded grimly. "They played it safer than I expected them to, but they still don't have enough ships over there to stop us."

"It'll just make the plunder all the sweeter my Lord." said his first mate. "We'll be taking many a salt wife and treasure after this!"

"Signal the fleet to spread out, I want Hurras Harlaw and his command to take the point nearest South Shield as we sail ahead." Hurras was an aggressive commander, and an excellent swordsman. Victarion had no doubt that he would take every advantage he could to try and get past the war galleys to start attacking the port. That might well split the defenders' attentions, or simply soften them up for the rest of the fleet after the defending war galleys were sent to the bottom of the Sunset Sea.

With Iron Victory in the lead his fleet sailed towards the galleys, and Victarion gritted his teeth angrily as they entered scorpion range. Those galleys began to riddle his ships with fire, not being as surprised, or inexperienced as the flotilla the Ironborn had already wiped out, and with open waters and the wind aiding them they were able to keep that range open for far longer. They even moved away from their home ports, to do so, drawing his fleet away in turn. This was not only because Victarion didn't want to let them try and circle his fleet and pin it between the islands and their fire, but because his captains were too aggressive to let them 'escape'.

Victarion lost at least three dozen ships to their fire before any of his ships could close, and they kept on backing away in groups! Every group of four ships worked together moving as one with a degree of coordination that was astonishing to watch, beyond anything even the Iron Fleet could do.

The fleet he was leading now was not the Iron Fleet. Ships got in one another's way, dozens of ships tried to attack the same group of war galleys, allowing others to fire at them with impunity. Worse, once the battle became more general the ships of each house looked to their own devices rather than to aid one another despite the example he had set after the last clash.

The fourteen ships around Iron Victory however stayed with him, and he nodded grimly as his ship made for a group of four galleys at the center of the galley armada. It was common practice to put the commander in the center after all. As they closed his scorpion gunners exchanged fire with the war galleys, but it was clear that he did not have an edge there in this battle.

He lost seven ships as he closed, but finally they were close enough, and he ordered all hands to oars. The ship he was targeting tried to evade, but with its fellows all around them, was unable to. The heavy iron ram of his flagship took it just abaft the prow of the ship.

Almost immediately forty or so men charged across throwing over their own boarding ramp, trying to keep the Ironborn on their own ship. Victarion cut down three of them as he led his crew to smash into them, throwing them back, then trying to break a small shield line that had formed.

He ducked down underneath one sword blow to hack at the man's leg right underneath the shield he was carrying. That man screamed as he collapsed while Victarion jumped over his body, hacking away to either side with his axe to enlarge the gap. His helmet rang as a sword blow landed, cutting off two of the kraken's tentacles with a "Whang!" sound.

The blow didn't stagger Victarion however, and he turned quickly bringing over his axe to hack at the man who had struck him. The man was young, wearing only boiled leather armor as most sailors of other realms did fearing the water that was their domain, a fact that always made him smirk in contempt. But he wielded his sword with proficiency, holding Victarion off for a few moments before he stumbled on the blood of the deck. This opened his body up for a blow from Victarion's axe which nearly carved him in two.

Elsewhere in the naval battle a group of four galleys had been able to keep their distance while the rest were now snarled up by the longships, several of them having three or more longships grappling with them at close range. Those four however were taking a deadly toll, sinking ship after ship as they ranged around the battle, taking a single ship under fire from all of their scorpions along one side or another. That ended when Harras, instead of moving around the contested area of the ocean to attack the port of Southshield had circled around behind those ships. They couldn't turn fast enough and the fifteen House Harlaw ships under his command closed to close range too quickly, raking them with arrows before throwing their lines across boarding to slaughter the remaining crew.

Victarion grimaced as a spear found his side, skittering across the plate armor there leaving a dent and a bruise he would be feeling for weeks. He took that spearman's life however with a broad stroke of his axe but had to quickly turn again to bring up his shield to block another sword thrust which almost cut into his shoulder.

He backed away, exchanging blows with a man who was wearing slightly better armor than the rest, his eyes hard over a blood streaked face. His nose was broken, possibly from a punch, his helmet missing and his graybeard flecked with blood.

Ser Talbert was the heir of House Serry of Southshield, and he had been the one to lead this fleet out to battle the Ironborn, having feared the worst had occurred to the other half of the Shield Island fleet when it hadn't returned quickly. That fear had been amply proven when the longships came within sight of Southshield, and he had led the fleet out determined to wreak a bloody vengeance on them. Talbert had underestimated the Ironborn numbers however, or how determined they would be to close the distance with his better armed war galleys. Now he knew that the battle might well be lost, but if he could slay their commander he might be able to rally the rest of his forces.

That wouldn't have actually worked. The Ironborn didn't have that much organization in the first place, and while Victarion was important as their Lord Captain and as a Greyjoy, none of the ship captains would have felt demoralized by his death save those closest allied to his family like Harlaw and those from Pyke itself.

The two men exchanged blow after blow, their shields slowly becoming useless, their armor dented, cuts and rips here and there leaking blood out on the deck below them. They kept on trying to hack at one another's bodies, trying to get in a killing blow but always their opponent moved just enough to avoid them. It was a classic example of strength and endurance against speed and skill.

Suddenly Talbert saw an opening, a pattern in how his enemy blocked. Immediately Talbert feinted, a slash-up towards his opponent's upper body and Victarion raised his axe to block, but Talbert's blade instead flashed down chopping into Victarion's left leg, nearly crippling him with that blow.

Before Talbert could pull his blade back, Victarion's hand came down grasping his own like a vice. His superior strength held the Serry heir there. Talbert looked up at his opponent, his eyes flashing with fury even as the realization of his death filled him.

Victarion took a brief moment and nodded his head at the other man in respect for his courage and skill. Then his axe came down, the blade of it burying in the other man's head with a sound like a melon being split. With a wrench he pulled his axe out again, looking around but the fight seemed to have gone out of the crew of the war galley. Dozens of men were now retreating onto the deck of another galley that had pulled up alongside this one to send its own men across to help against the borders.

His own men however took heart at his victory, and began to press them back even harder. "Feed them to the Drowned God!"

OOOOOO

In the end that battle cost Victarion's fleet nearly two-thirds of its remaining ships. He was down to a bare forty ships total but all of them were packed to the brim with Ironborn taken from other ships, and the way to the Shield Islands was open. As one of his crew tried to stitch his leg wound closed Victarion gave command of the assault on South Shields to captain Harras, whose daring action might well have saved the day though Victarion would never admit that. By the end of the day, Southshield had fallen, and the Ironborn fleet moved on to the other Shield Islands, opening the way to the Mander and the rich underbelly of the Reach.

OOOOOO

Elsewhere however, the Rise of the Kraken didn't go so well.

Alyn of House Orkwood had led 75 ships of his House, Blacktyde and Goodbrother against Lannisport. However, unlike the Shield Islands or the Reach in general the Lannisters had anticipated that the Ironborn would return to their raiding ways. The port was well supplied with catapults, scorpions and other anti-ship weapons, and Kevan Lannister as master of the Rock had ordered the port authorities to set several ships on patrol to warn of any incoming attack. They were out there even at night, with watchers on the port Towers set to watching the fires on them. If they went out, or if they suddenly grew an alarm would be raised immediately.

Despite this however, the actual attack almost did come as a surprise. Alyn led his ships in during a nighttime storm, taking out those ships at a time when the fires were already flickering from the wind and rain despite the canvas set up above them. This gained him some time, but the wind of the storm made his approach slower than it should've been, and this gave the defenders time to spot them in the darkness regardless. Warning fires were lit all around, and the alarm was raised.

Alyn however was an Ironborn captain of the old school, who believed that numbers, speed and shock value could overcome any opponent. Even with the port warned of his coming he still raced on, and most of the ships of his fleet followed him.

Nine House Blacktyde ships were the only exception. Lord Baelor Blacktyde had made no bones about not being in favor of going to war with the rest of Westeros before this began, only agreeing to have his house take part when Balon warned that not doing so would force Balon to inform the Drowned Men that he followed the Faith of the Seven.

The Faith was derided in the Iron Islands, and any such hint would have been enough for the members of his own House to remove him in a permanent fashion.

Now not wishing to face a prepared opponent Baelor took the opportunity presented to him to pull his ships back. Some of his House's ships did the same thing, having agreed with him about the idiocy of this war, but many did not, following their fellows into the port. If the attack had succeeded, he would have faced several hard questions, and would probably not have survived the questions given how the Ironborn viewed 'cowards' let alone ones with secrets such as Baelor's, but as it was, that would not be an issue.

The attackers came under fire immediately from catapults and scorpions from the towers built to either side of the port's entrance. Those ships turned and began to close with the towers, many of them being sunk before they got close enough for their archers to fire up at the towers as grapnels began to be thrown up as well. The catapults and other ballistae however continued to fire on the more distant ships, letting the other defenders handle the closer threat.

Those ships in the direct center of the natural bay's entrance were out of their range however, and they forged ahead heading for the docks. There they came under even more fire, the city watch having pulled up ballistae alongside the wharfs firing at the ships as they came.

There the city watch, much better led and armed than the city watch of King's Landing prepared to receive them. The Ironborn longships slammed into the wharf and the Ironborn jumped over the gunwales of their ships, landing on the port and charging forward to clash with the prepared defenders. Arrows flew from both sides, men went down screaming, and the fires that had been lit to light the battlefield gave everything a hellish appearance as the two sides clashed.

The defenders had numbers and the number of weapons and their own ground on their side, while the attackers had shock value and could bring more power to anyone point along the waterfront. Experience was equal, since one side had experience but the other had better training and organization. That first few moments the battle could have gone to the Ironborn as they slammed into the defender's battle line, the shock of real battle might have broken the defenders. But it didn't, the inexperienced city watch having been bolstered by armsmen from House Lannister.

Kevan Lannister had come to the port to go over the defenses himself, bringing with him half the garrison of the Rock, which had been upgraded to four thousand men since his brother had taken their initial muster into the Riverlands. He was going to leave two thousand of them here in the ports in any event to serve to back up the city watch further, and had immediately taken command of the city's defenses the moment the alarm was sounded. He split up his force, a thousand set up with the city watch in fifty man packets to bolster their line along the wharf front. This served to hold the line in the initial clash, and now training was doing the rest.

The remaining thousand served as his reserve in hundred man lots. He sent them in wherever the Ironborn threatened to break through the defenders into the city proper. After a half turn of the glass Kevan led some of the reserve himself in one such charge. He slew several, his sword work better than any of theirs before he had to duck under one blow from wickedly barbed broadsword that would have taken his head off.

Kevan was forced to jump forward into a roll as the man tried to bring his sword's pommel down on his head. The Ironborn warrior had at least a head of height on him, and several inches more in the shoulders, that blow would possibly have brained him regardless of his helmet. Realizing quickly his roll had brought him too far forward of his men, Kevan lashed out before he even stood up, his blade cutting a Ironborn's leg out from under him. Once upright, Kevan backed away quickly, his blade and shield working to keep his enemies at bay.

The Ironborn with the barbed broadsword charged at him with a roar, his blade flashing out in a lunge that would have gutted Kevan if it hit. Kevan desperately dodged to one side avoiding it, his shield taking the blow instead. The blade slammed into and through his shield getting stuck there for just a moment, the barbs on the blade now working against its owner. Kevan quickly capitalized, bringing up his longsword into the Ironborn's side, chopping through his chain mail.

A mace blow slammed into Kevan's back, sending him sprawling, but the blow didn't have enough force to break his back plate, only denting it severely. By this point his men had surged through the melee to his position, pushing the Ironborn away from him. One of them leaned down to help their commander to his feet as the others pushed forward, holding the line there until the defenders were able to reclaim it.

Kevan allowed the man who had helped him up to lead him slightly away from the battle, around the side of one of the warehouses that made up this side of the wharves. Once away from the main battle, Kevan pulled off his helm to wipe the sweat from his brow. 'Damn Ironborn fight like demons, the bastards.'

He took a glance around the side of the wharf, trying to make out as much of the battle, which wasn't much despite the fires burning in the towers and in places along the wharf. In one part of his mind Kevan knew those fires would no doubt get out of control soon regardless of the rain still coming down. But for now they were a necessary evil, letting his archers and catapult crews see their targets in the dark of night, the storm clouds having blocked the light of the moon.

After a moment spent squinting his eyes to see through the fires and shadows, Kevan grabbed a runner one of the young boys he had been using since the fight began to relay orders back and forth. "Head to the southwest tower, signal the fleet to come in and close off their retreat."

That had been his own addition to the defense of the city. Instead of leaving his family's small navy in the port he had ordered them out on maneuvers, and to dock outside the port itself in a small bay nearby. Barely big enough for them all, it was still able to hide them from anyone entering the port itself thanks to being hidden partially by high crags and its small entrance. They kept a single watchman on the highest crag to watch for signal fires, but he was the only one visible even during the day from the ocean or the north.

Now those ships would spell the death knell of this attack and if Kevan had his way every Ironborn reaver out there. Kevan had not forgotten the way the Ironborn had burned out Lannisport during their first rebellion sixteen years ago, and was more than willing to pay them back in like coin. And Kevan had found himself thinking remarkably bloodthirsty thoughts since the death of his son Lancel had gotten back to him.

The runner nodded and raced off through the fire lit gloom of the battlefield, while Kevan turned back to business.

The fight was slowly going against the defenders, with more and more Ironborn ships getting clear of the defensive towers near the entrance to the port, but then the ships of the Lannisters arrived closing in behind them, their scorpions firing at the Ironborn ships yet to reach the port. With them snarling up the sea of the port forcing the Ironborn to deal with them rather than land more troops, Kevan and the city watch were able to sweep the wharfs clear of Ironborn then take the ships that had landed.

Despite being mostly green, the number of weapons on the galleys proved to be a enough of a force multiplier that the Lannister fleet and defenders were able to win the day. In the end they took over a hundred captives, all of whom were put to death quickly, and not a single ship escaped. The military strength of the island of Orkmont was wiped out that day and House Goodbrother and House Blacktyde took further losses, losses they would need decades to recover from. This would have long reaching consequences not only for those islands, but the rest of the Iron Islands, though it would be several months before those reverberations were felt.

The only survivors were those House Blacktyde ships under Baelor. Having pulled back at the onset of the battle Baelor had gotten clear. Only two ships of the incoming galley's fleet saw them before they were too far away to be seen in the nighttime storm. Those two war galleys went after them, but were lost with all hands.

Back in Lannisport as dawn broke Kevan stood on the shoreline, staring out over the still burning wrecks of the Ironborn ships, more than a dozen merchant vessels, several of his family's own ships that had been hulled or sunk through various means, and the dozen or so Ironborn vessels that had been taken intact. That was a sign of the material cost, the cost in people was much worse.

The city watch had been decimated, and the crews of many of the merchant vessels had died trying to protect them, as had a little under half of his house's armsmen that he had arrived with. The city could make good those losses, but slowly. And the damage to the port itself, the clogging of the wharf front, would mean weeks of hard work to get it back in working order.

Kevan's face was set in grim lines as he continued staring out at the wreckage of the battle, not even turning his head to address the men around him. "Send for a horse and messenger, we'll have to send a message about this to my brother, and I may have a suggestion on how to respond..."

OOOOOO

Balon Greyjoy was a gaunt elderly man of Tywin's generation. He had a hard face set with dark black eyes and framed by long gray hair flecked with white that hang down past the small of his back, lips a thin, bitter line in his pock-marked face. Bitterness and resentment, coupled with a desire to turn back time to a period where the Old Way ruled all, dominated Balon and had for decades.

He had never truly accepted Westeros defeat of his rebellion, seeing it merely as a setback, not a true defeat and rather being contemptuous of Robert's having allowed him to live and never really grinding the islands under as Balon would have done in his place. He resented the North for taking his son and no doubt turning him into just another weak greenlander. He had never forgiven Stannis for the destruction of the first Iron Fleet, which had spelled the death knell of Balon's first rebellion. And he bitterly resented the Redwyne fleet for aiding the Shield Islands in repelling the Ironborn's first attempt to take them during his rebellion.

Most thought the tide had truly turned against the Ironborn's bid for freedom later on, after the Redwyne navy and the Royal navy defeated Victarion at the Battle of Fair Isle. But it was the loss of momentum from their defeat at the Shield Islands that truly began to turn the tide against them. Before that, the Ironborn had truly become the reavers of old, feared and fearless, sweeping all before them. After that, their aura of invincibility was gone.

Or So Balon thought, and it was that wrong that Balon was personally avenging now, while at the same time destroying the largest of his opponents on this side of Westeros. He stood alongside the steersman on the Great Kraken, his flagship, a tankard of ale in one hand and the moon in the sky above him shining down. Slightly larger than even the Iron Victory, her bow was ornamented with a great iron ram in the shape of a kraken. It also had two scorpions set on a diagonal of the prow on either side of the ship, and another right behind where Balon was standing now pointing back down the ship's course. All around The Great Kraken the ships of the Iron Fleet, which he had taken command of personally, moved through the nighttime waters like the incredibly dangerous predators they were, along with twenty other ships pulled from various minor houses to add to the weight of this attack in a very special way.

The Redwyne navy was in many ways the most dangerous of the Ironborn's opponents, which was one of two reasons Balon was leading this assault and doing so with the Iron Fleet. It would take more than two months for the Royal Navy to round the Straits of Dorne to assail them, if they could at all given what rumors said the feelings of Dorne were for the bastard girl's execution, which removed Stone face Stannis from consideration. The Lannister fleet, while having decent ships, didn't have the numbers to be an offensive force, nor the training.

The Redwyne navy was the third-largest fleet that operated in the seas around Westeros, even larger even than the fleet Balon was currently commanding, and was a veteran force with excellent leaders. In a straight up fight Balon knew that he might lose despite a single reaver of the Old Way being worth a dozen Westeros pussies. But he had no intention of fighting a straight up battle. That was why his fleet was moving so slowly right now.

They had come out of the Sunset Sea west of the Arbor, and now were sailing back and forth waiting an appropriate length of time for the first wave of the attack to go in. That attack was going to be accomplished through use of several captured merchant galleys that his house had taken command of once war had been declared. That had allowed them to keep word about their mustering from reaching the mainland, and had given him the ships needed for this attack. All of those ships were packed with hay, strong spirits and other flammables, and crewed by men his brother Aeron Damphair had chosen for this task.

Drowning was a central part of the Ironborn's worship of He Who Dwells Beneath the Waves. Newborn were regularly given to the ocean, dunked in salt water. Drowned Men, the priests of the Ironborn faith, were drowned in truth, then resurrected, really resuscitated, and there were men among the faithful who had gone through the same ritual but did not become priests. Normally when a man was resurrected he would continue his life as normal.

These men, men guilty of cowardice, had been ritually drowned, sanctified to the Drowned God, before being revived, and had been... changed in the doing. Where before they had been mortal, and had mortal fears and desires, now they lived only to carry out their orders and regain their honor before dying for the glory of the Drowned God.

Aeron and his fellow Drowned Men had never shown any sign of these powers before and it had come as a shock to Balon, but it had renewed his faith in the Drowned God and indeed the faith of all of those men who among his captains who saw them. Aeron had confided in his brother that the power of the god was growing to a level he had never heard of, and that this new ability to strip men of their base fears and survival instincts was a sign of that. Neither man understood that it was simply a sign of magic returning to the world, not something attributable only to their own religion. Instead they both saw it as a sign that it was time to rise up and show the world that the Old Way was alive and well, and that the Ironborn were a power again.

Turning his head, Balon looked over at his Aeron. He was kneeling in a circle with his fellow Drowned men, fifteen of them. Originally they had all been kneeling in a circle around a wide, flat bowl filled with saltwater, but now Aeron was the only one upright. Balon took a moment to look at the bowl, which despite being nearly flat looked extremely deep for some reason, like Balon could reach inside and not touch the bottom of it despite knowing that he should only have barely been able to get his knuckles wet.

The Drowned Men had been practicing something Aeron called 'Reading the waves'. From what Balon understood, the bowl was supposed to represent, or become or something like that, the ocean, and the Drowned Men sent their minds into it, feeling out what was happening in the ocean beyond the sight of normal men, an amazing gift from their god. It was exhausting however, the distance and time spent doing it draining the men as if their endurance was pouring out like in a battle, and could kill someone who looked too far or too long, something Balon found fitting. It was simply another way to pay the Iron Price, even if the plunder gained was information.

For now, Balon had more worldly things to think about than the power of his religion. "Well? Be the fire ships in position yet?"

"The ones we be feelin' from here by the time the fleet's in position, aye." The younger Greyjoy answered, coming out of his trance and looking around at his weaker brethren coolly, before pulling at his hair, which looked drenched despite his not having wet it with salt water since he sat down to this task. "You know we can't ride the waves far enough ta feel the ships going around the weak Seven-worshipping fools Island. Still, I be thinkin' its time ta go brother. Time for the kraken to rise and take its due, time for the Iron Price to be paid."

Balon looked up at the sky, judging their position by the stars above and nodded. He turned to his signal men, who raced to their places signaling the rest of the fleet to turn their courses once more towards the Arbor, the home of House Redwyne.

OOOOOO

Four fire-ships had been designated for each port along the large island's circumference. Their job was to get in close and then fire their ships, taking as many other ships with them as they could. Most of these attacks worked to the terrible cost of House Redwyne. Not a single defender realized what was going on until those ships docked. At which point the penitents, the name the Drowned Men had given to these men when they revealed their powers, went into action. They fired the ships, then went up onto the wharf and tossed lit bundles of strong spirits onto the nearest ships or at anything that looked remotely flammable.

Fire was one of the deadliest weapons of war at this point in history. That was one reason why wildfire was such a terrible weapon, why three dragons had allowed the Targaryen siblings to conquer Westeros so many centuries ago, what allowed Valyria to become the power it became. And ships and docks were even more susceptible to it than the rest of the city. Tar, pitch, dry ropes, dried and resin covered woods, all of them made up ships and were in abundance in any dock all over the world, and all were incredibly flammable.

Those fires quickly spread, so fast and so sudden that in many of the ports so attacked it took the people time to realize it had even been deliberate, let alone organize to fight the fires. Dozens of ships burned to the water line and hundreds of sailors and dock hands died or were burned so much as to be useless in every port along the western side of the Arbor. This cost the Redwyne Navy not only ships but coordination, as the ports didn't realize that all the other ports are being attacked in similar manner, the local lords and commanders trying desperately to get the fires under control rather than spend precious moments communicating with their fellows.

However Vinetown, the largest port of the Arbor was on the far side from the attackers. They had received warning overland from the first town to be attacked like that, Starfish Harbor. This and Paxter Redwyne's quick response allowed his navy to be alert to a similar attack. Naval cutters went out to every ship coming into the port regardless of what they looked like, and when one group of naval inspectors didn't return, their parent ships knew they had found the fire-ships attacking the city.

Stopping those ships before they could close with the wharfs still cost the fleet three ships, but their crews were saved and added to the fifty other ships of the Redwyne Navy housed in that port.

Paxter scowled looking at the burning wreckage of three of his family's ships, which had physically blocked the ships that carried such deadly cargo. He had just finished listening to a report from the men who had fought against those ships, and the men on them, and was simply incredulous at what he had learned. "Madness." he muttered, shaking his head. "Utter madness. What kind of maggot destroyed those man's brains for them to willingly sacrifice themselves like that? Even fanatics wouldn't want to die in fire like that or drown as some of them did."

"I don't know my. Lord" said the captain of the Arbor Queen, his flagship. The man was a second son from the green-apple Fossoways, and his normally warm expression was grim as he looked at the sight of the burning wrecks. "But if it was both here and Starfish Bay, so it wasn't isolated incident."

"No, it wasn't." Paxter replied, nodding at the other man. "Get the fleet under way Captain. I will want four converts to turn northwards and head for the other bay of the Arbor. If they haven't come under this kind of attack they are to be warned, and their ships gathered together. The rest of us will start southward and pick up ships along the way. This attack started near Starfish, and it's reasonable to expect that a follow-up attack will come from that same direction."

Paxter's prediction was proven correct as they rounded the island a day later. There in front of them a battle was going on, with a few remaining defenders of Starfish Bay defending against a numerically superior opponent. "Ironborn!" Paxter spat to one side, looking much more like a common born sailor just then than the Lord of one of the most powerful Houses of the Reach.

With him Paxter had ninety ships. Unlike the dedicated warships of the Shield Islands however, the Redwyne Navy also served in peacetime as a trading fleet, and so many of those ships were not built nearly as heavily, nor as heavily armed. But these were armed with scorpions in the main and their crews, if not true warriors, were all highly experienced sailors and skilled in using them .

Against them the Iron Fleet had 120 ships, not having lost any yet to the defenders of the port, nor having come under attack from any of the other ports just yet. The fire ships had gutted several of those ports outright, while in others they had simply disorganized and wounded the defenders, forcing them to remain home. So though he and Balon didn't know it, Paxter's fleet was the only formed defense of the large island at present.

Even if they had however, neither admiral would have changed their orders for this battle. Both fleets made for one another, with the 20 or so Ironborn ships that weren't of the Iron Fleet racing ahead, and the rest sticking to a disciplined mass coming straight at the Redwyne Navy. Balon didn't care about that, but the organization instilled in them by his brother stuck for now.

The Redwyne Navy's own lack of organization and discipline showed, with several of the converted merchant vessels falling back allowing their larger warship companions to forge ahead, breaking their line of battle a little. But Paxter was a canny man, and he ordered his fleet to keep the range open to allow his scorpions to pummel the enemy. In this manner they were able to send fifteen ships to the bottom before the rest of the Iron Fleet got within its own range and began to fire back, the bolts of both fleets 'Fwipping' through the air, most missing, but many hitting, doing horrendous damage to the ships they slammed into.

The quality of their respective ships was soon apparent. A warship was extremely hard to sink with any shot that didn't hit directly at the water line, and even there the Reach vessels were armed to take at least one shot and keep going. Merchant vessels, whalers and wine cogs however were not so well-armed. Paxter lost several ships in that first opening salvo, and that's attrition rate continued as the Iron Fleet closed, but more of their ships began to go down as well.

Paxter stood on the Arbor Queen's aft-castle gazing at the battle through a spyglass, his eyes narrowed. "Order the converted ships to fall back save the wine cogs. Warships are to keep the range close with the Iron Fleet, our fellows will bombard them from a distance, while the wine cogs attempt to do to them what their fire ships did to us."

The signals went out using various colored flags hung from the tallest mast of his flagship. The fleet slowly reformed along the lines he had set out, too late for some of the support vessels, another ten of which had gone down with all hands under the pummeling of the Iron Fleets scorpions and archers. Several small tangles of combat had occurred as well when ships of opposing sides crashed into one another, with the larger heavier longships able to take the punishment of being rammed by a warship or vice versa and still remain floating. The last few non-Iron Fleet ships sank at this point of the battle, leaving the sea to their heavier fellows.

A few wine cogs got close enough to a few Ironborn longships before their crews, the smallest needed to sail their cogs, lit their cargo on fire before abandoning ship. This cost the Ironborn seven, possibly nine ships before the opposing captains realized the small wine cogs represented a real threat, and began to target them especially at range, not allowing any more to close.

Paxter ordered his captain to keep the flagship to the rear of the ongoing battle, the better to keep control of the overall battle. This served his side well for the next few hours until a force of five Iron Fleet ships made their way around the main battle. Two of them rammed two of the nearby warships, opening the way for the other three to sail through to assault the Arbor Queen personally.

Despite all the maneuvers Captain Fossoway could do those ships brought them to battle. He sunk one of them though with several bolts from his scorpions slamming home into the enemy ship's sides before the others could close to bow range.

Paxter ducked for cover as arrows began to fall onto his ship's deck, cutting into his crew. They returned fire just as accurately, and the Queen had more men than even that the biggest Iron Fleet ship could. Against one attacker, his flagship would've won readily enough even if it was rammed by its enemy, but against two coming from both sides?

One ship was able to come close enough to throw across grapples, and men hurriedly went to work cutting the ropes away as the men on the other ship began to heave trying to pull the two ships together. However the other Ironborn ship, one that had a battering ram shaped like that of a kraken, slammed into his ship amidships from the other side, snarling the two ships together. "We do not sow!" That crew shouted, charging across the heaving deck of the front of their ship onto the deck of the Arbor Queen.

Two knights in full plate armor stood in front of Paxter, the older man having not wielded a sword himself in years. The Arbor Queen also had several other heavily armed knights and a hundred trained armsmen armed as well as the Ironborn were along with the crew that was armored in leather instead. They held the attackers at bay where they surged across the ship, the deck of the ship become slippery from the blood being spilled on it.

But this action took so much attention from the defenders that the second ship was now able to grapple with it on its other side, those men charging across in turn. And in this kind of battle, sharp up close and on an uncertain surface, the Ironborn had few equals, especially when numbers were on their side.

Paxter gripped his sword as he saw the battle of the deck slowly turning against his men, the weight of numbers and the greater experience of the attackers in this kind of battle telling. The overall battle was still in doubt, but this portion of it... Paxter shook his head holding his sword tightly in one hand, wincing a little at the weight of it. Still, Paxter would not go down without a fight, and he would be damned if he let the reaving bastards take him captive.

His knight protectors charged forward's as the Ironborn closed, cutting down several with their heavy broadswords but being pressed aside and backwards by the weight of the numbers attacking them. Paxter himself moved forward, waiting for an opportunity and took it when he saw one of the Ironborn turn aside to battle one of his knights. His sword took the man in the side, piercing his chain mail into his guts to send his body crashing to the deck to join the numerous other bodies there.

"We do not sow, we pay the Iron Price and reap our vengeance! The sea itself is rising, and we its children will take our rightful places." Said a dark, cold voice in heavily accented Westerosi. Balon Greyjoy burst through the melee to face Paxter. Unlike the other old man he held his sword easily, and wore chain mail with just as much ease. He was winded from the battle, but that was all. "You are the first, you won't be the last."

"For the Reach and the Seven!" Paxter said grimly, bringing up his blade and attacking. Balon batted his sword to one side, and with contemptuous ease ran the other old man through his unarmored chest, his sword completely passing through the other man's body and out his back.

OOOOOO

Despite no longer having Paxter's commands keeping them organized, the rest of the Redwyne Navy fought valiantly. Not even the secondary ships retreated from the battle, and they wreaked a bloody toll on the Iron Fleet. By the end of the day only 32 Iron Fleet ships remained. Still, they won the day which was all Balon cared about. The Arbor was open for the taking.

Unknown to Balon however, many of the Arbor ships had retreated entirely from the island, under command of Ser Desmond Redwyne. Not having any idea of the strength of the force attacking the island, and not being contacted or seeing any sign of the fleet his Lord grand Uncle had led around the island's southernmost edge, he ordered every ship from every harbor along the western shoreline of the island to remove itself from the island, heading towards Oldtown for reinforcements before coming back.

But right now, he only had six true war galleys, coupled with two dozen converted ships, and only his warships had full crews. Moreover, more than sixty ships of the Redwyne fleet were elsewhere when the attacks began, going about their business as a trade fleet or other jobs. Many of those were working the ocean near the Reach at other ports, and would hear about what had occurred. Eventually the Redwyne navy would gather itself. Then they would be back, with vengeance in their eyes and ships full of soldiers to reclaim the Arbor if need be and smash the Iron Fleet if they could.

OOOOOO

To combat the Westerlands raiders causing so much chaos and death along the western border, Willas had first traveled upriver on barges to Goldengrove. He picked up a further thousand men from the Houses whose lands he was moving through, mostly light infantry and a few archers, but House Graceford had given him a force of four hundred heavy cavalry under Ser Thomas Graceford, Lord Graceford's eldest son. Being a very religious house whose faith was mostly towards the Mother, Graceford rarely took part in wars, but were more than willing to take the field against bandits and other groups who preyed on smallfolk. They also offered something even more valuable, enough horses to put a mount under every one of his men.

Once on the river, Willas sent messengers out for scouts that knew the area, local constables or any farmers that wished to fight back to meet him at Goldengrove, as well as every horse they could find to put a horse under his infantry forces, since that would allow him to move them faster that way over small distances. This was easier said than done however, the raiders had been extremely thorough in burning every farmhouse they could find and killing every person they could find, or worse in the case of the womenfolk.

The once fertile area of the Goldengrove had had something like three hundred farmsteads ranging from small to large in the last tax census of the area which Willas knew since he had helped conduct the last survey. If there were more than twenty farmsteads left unburned, and more than two-hundred men and women out there alive he would be astonished. Luckily several families had been able to retreat to the safety of Goldengrove, but still the destruction had been horrible to pass through for the little time it took them to reach Goldengrove from the river.

It had filled him and his men with a fierce desire to find the reavers and Willas set about that task with alacrity. He split his now mounted infantry and archers up into small groups of two hundred plus fifty heavy cavalry, each of which were assigned over a hundred light cavalry along with local scouts to find the Westerlands bastards before calling in the other forces.

Because of his strict orders to the scouting groups not to engage the raiders directly, they were able to find and report the reavers position to the larger units. In this manner his men surprised several dozen smaller groups of reavers calling in the slightly larger groups of mounted infantry to hammer them under. Willas' men attacked swiftly, always during the day and his ability to bring more power to a point like this allowed him to wipe out several thousand of them over the next few weeks. After that, thanks to survivors of those fights somehow linking up with them, the remaining reavers began to gather together once more in ever larger groups. Willas responded by doing the same.

After the first week Willas moved his personal command further south and east of Goldengrove. His force of four hundred mixed archers/infantry and two-hundred heavy cavalry found and destroyed any force that his scouts found heading deeper into the Reach. This, combined with the work the rest of his force was doing finally convinced the reavers to join up into one body, never realizing that he had only been fighting them with about half of the force available to him. The levees and light infantry forces he had gathered up had yet to be used but now they would be to finish this campaign.

The mercenaries had decided to retreat to Ivy Hall, the seat of the minor Noble House Kidwell, which they had taken while it's lord and most of his men was away to war with Lord Rowan. The hall was a simple two-story building with a low, ivy covered stone wall set around it in the center of an apple grove of rather impressive size, at least five acres across, with about a hundred yards of space cleared between the wall and the apple grove.

The true owners of the hall were dead. Lord Kidwell's lady had been killed no doubt after being used by the mercenaries like so many women had been in this area. Willas had already penned a note to the man informing him of what happened in his absence. It was not the first such letter, and Willas took very cold comfort in the fact he only had to write such letters to those of noble birth. The toll among the smallfolk was so much worse, and so uglier at times. Willas was getting very tired indeed of seeing the aftereffects of the reavers work.

Thanks to the fact that every battle against them had so far been during the day, Willas decided to go in against the reavers at night this time. He had two reasons for this, one because of psychological reasons, he had basically been setting them up for this after all. The second reason was because Willas was a very, very paranoid man. He preferred the word 'careful' of course, but his commanders called him paranoid behind his back. Willas was fine with that, because he couldn't get rid of the feeling that the next shoe had yet to drop here, and was wishful to survive such when it did.

Willas left several dozen scouts scattered all around the small keep in every direction, and each one of them had special fire arrows. The bundles the tips of those arrows had been wrapped in had been treated in chemicals back in Highgarden that would make the fire of the arrows a bright red, a perfect symbol of danger at any time let alone at night. That was surprisingly expensive to prepare, costing as much as a full suit of armor for a knight from the maester who had created them for him, but he felt they would be worth the expense if the worst occurred.

This kind of forethought and organization also marked the way he organized the actual assault. "You all know what to do." he said simply looking at his troop leaders. "First light infantry and archers. We want to see if you can dare the reavers to come out and face you. If you can, pull back in a controlled manner. Then we'll hit them from both sides with two wings of heavy horse."

"And with us my Lord." said the loan infantryman in the command circle. Unlike the light infantry that comprised the majority of Willas' forces, he wore heavy chain rather than the studded leather of the light infantry or archers. He was an older man of Mace's age, but that was all he had in common with Lord Tyrell. Where Mace had gone to seed rather badly, Toulev Smithson was built like a rock, heavily muscled with little fat on him with close cropped hair of solid silver. He had fought in the war of the Usurper and worked as an armsmen for the Redwyne Navy after that, so was an extremely experienced man.

Though he was of smallfolk stock, Willas had made him the commander of his heavy infantry, over the objections of several of his knights. They hadn't objected because they wanted the command of course, their contempt for infantry was rather strong, though the men Willas had chosen for his command was much better at not showing it than most. They objected because part of that was Willas stating that as leader of the heavy infantry Toulev would be able to give them orders if Willas was busy elsewhere. Willas however had waved off those concerns, and the man had proven himself over the last few weeks, leading one of the smaller mercenary hunting groups with ease.

"Indeed, we'll keep back most of the archers at first, and bring them up with the heavy infantry. If we can catch even a portion of that force out in the open and wipe it out in this manner, taking the holdfast away from them will be that much simpler. We haven't yet seen that many archers among them, but be wary nonetheless."

More than one knight rolled his eyes at Willas' rather old-womanly concern. But he hadn't led them wrong yet and the knights and minor lord's sons here had also gotten some valuable leadership experience over the past few weeks, so knew better than to argue.

An hour later the assault began, with the few archers Willas sent forward with his light infantry beginning to fire at the watchers that they could see up on top of the hall. The apple grove and the darkness of the night had allowed his men to move up under cover to take the defenders by surprise. Cries abounded through the night, as the mercenaries moved out of their temporary dwelling to clash with his light infantry first along the low wall then further into the open area around it.

Watching this from further back in the grove Willas smiled grimly, as each group of sixty men followed their troop leaders, fighting as groups, rather than individuals who just happen to be standing next to one another. They covered one another's backs, forming small shield walls here and there against the mercenaries. Who, Willas noticed, had more men than he would have thought at this point.

Or perhaps all of the men here came out to attack my troops en-masse? That would make sense given the lack of discipline they've shown so far. The Mountain was never a very organized beast after all. That bit of information had been gleaned from several prisoners over the past few weeks, adding to the grim delight the men took avenging the area on the monsters-in-men's-clothing. Regardless, it's time to end this. "Message for Ser Thomas and Ser Grendel. Tell them to attack."

Five minutes later the heavy cavalry burst out of the apple grove to slam into the Westerlander reavers in the open around the hall, and Willas frowned a little. The light really wasn't good despite the fires the mercenaries had kept around, giving them some light to see by but also destroying their night vision. However, it looked as if his cavalry units hadn't been able to stay as organized as he would've liked. Still, after charging through woodland I suppose that is to be expected.

They still did a number on the mercenaries, who obviously hadn't expected to face heavy cavalry in the middle of a nighttime battle like this. He saw hundreds of men go down in that initial charge, and more follow immediately after. "Excellent!" he shouted, slapping his hands together, then nodded over to Toulev. "I believe it's time for us to get it stuck in as well Toulev."

The older man grinned at him. "Aye milord!" He waved his hand in the air, shouting aloud over the din of battle that was happening a bare two hundred feet ahead of them through the woods of the apple grove. "All right you louts! Forward! For the Reach!"

The heavy infantry answered that call with a will, rising out of where they had hidden themselves lying down in the shadows of the trees. Willas moved with them, his lame leg slowing him down slightly but not mattering near as much as if he had to rely on it to grip a horse and battle. They reached the front quickly, slamming into the mercenaries moving around the small lines of light infantry. More archers moved up with them now raking the top of the holdfast with enough arrows to keep the defenders own archers down while also being able to fire at many of the reavers at the back of the melee.

Willas raised his blade, blocking what looked like a mace in the dark though they head was a strange design. He didn't have time to concentrate on that however, quickly pushing the mace aside and bringing up his shield into the other man's forearm, breaking the bone there. The Westerlander screamed, but that ended abruptly when Willas brought his longsword back around to slice the man's throat open. The next moment he dodged under a sword thrust from a greatsword, then lunged upright quickly, wincing as his lame leg was forced to take too much of his weight for a moment. His own sword point slid into the eye-slits of the visor of the man he was facing.

The next moment Toulev was beside him with three other men, and they battled their way forward, linking up with two knights who had been unhorsed in the darkness. Both men nodded thankfully to Willas, pointedly ignoring the smallfolk infantry around him something that caused Willas to frown. Nonetheless, the battle was going well.

Moments later however Willas was disabused by that notion. At that moment he chanced to look up into the sky and saw from the northeast that several of the scouts had fired off their warning arrows into the nighttime sky. Cursing Willas wondered if possibly it was a false alarm of some kind. We're winning Warrior-dammit! However Willas' common sense came to the fore, and he realized he could ill afford to ignore such a warning.

Reaching down to his waist Willas pulled out the horn that he had kept for just such an emergency. Looking around he blew it five times in quick succession first two short blasts then along one then two short blasts again. Shouts of surprise and astonishment answered that call, and he frowned as he didn't see the cavalymen pulling back as they should. He blew it again in the same signal this time louder and finally the knights that made up the heavy cavalry began to respond, pulling back into the apple grove breaking contact with the mercenaries.

The infantry too began to fall back, but they had a much harder time of it. The former Mountains men didn't want to let them go. Willas cursed in the thick of it for a moment before Toulev and another man killed two of his attackers, buying Willas sometime to pull back, his lame leg once again hampering him. "Best get out of here my Lord." Toulev said grimly, moving with Willas as more men covered their retreat from the front line. "Especially if we have more company incoming. These bastards don't seem to want to let us go though."

"I can see that." Willas said, bringing up his shield to block an errant arrow shot from somewhere in front of them. "You have a messenger somewhere?"

A young squire ran up to them, the younger man's short sword dripping with blood. "My Lord?"

"Gather all the archers you can, one heavy volley straight at the enemy from point-blank range. That'll buy us time to pull away." Within seconds the archers had coalesced once more behind the infantry line, and the squire shouted aloud, his voice barely carrying over the clamor of battle. "Ready my Lord!"

"Infantry down!" Willas bellowed at the top of his lungs.

Toulev and the troop leaders took up the call. Quickly every infantryman along the line, mostly heavy infantry by this point the light infantry having fallen back with the cavalry, crouched down while raising their shields. More than a few died at that moment, overcome by the enemies they had been clashing with, but most had been astonished at the sudden move to hunker down. Then bowstrings twanged behind them, and that first line of enemies fell like wheat before a scythe along with many behind them.

A second later Toulev grabbed Willas and began to pull him away, while the rest of the infantry and archers fell back through the apple grove. They soon reached the area where they had left their horses. At that moment they learned it truly had been a good idea to pull back when they did.

From the northeast came the shouts and clamor of battle, along with unfamiliar war cries as more enemies appeared on that edge of the apple grove coming towards them through the trees, catching small groups of infantry and a few knights that hadn't pulled back in the fight direction. From the sound of it there were more attackers than there should have been if they were just the Clegane men they had been hammering for the past few weeks. This wasn't a simple trap then, Willas thought grimly. This was something that the old lion must've set up, the Clegane rabble as bait and to test the waters, and this other group to destroy any unwary force sent against them.

Willas motioned over to the heavy cavalry leaders who had gathered there, disorganized in the middle of the apple grove but still a viable force. "Split into groups of five gentleman." he said, quickly thinking of a scenario to get them out of this trap. "You won't be able to form for a charge in this grove, but you'll still be able to hopefully hold off any attacker that tries to encircle us with your heavier armor and reach. That is your only task, do not, I repeat do not get bogged down I need every one of you alive understood?"

Both knights nodded grimly, their young faces set sternly, though a moment ago they had been looking almost panicky. Willas' calm commands however had reassured them that they would be able to get out of this, and that reassurance carried over to their men. Within moments the heavy cavalry were on their way through the grove, their heavier armor and the armor moreover on their horses able to stand them in good stead against the weapons of their opponents despite the ground not favoring the momentum-based tactics that they were best suited for.

Willas gestured over to the light cavalry commander, another younger man but this one was from House Hightower, and had served under that House's lords for years. He was not blessed with great intelligence but he was steady, and that was what Willas needed right now. "I have another job for you."

After a few moments the man shook his head in amusement at the scheme that Willas it come up with. Nonetheless he bowed obedience then ran off, taking with him every spare horse, including the ones that Willas had used to move his infantry around so quickly, leading them off through the woods. Willas meanwhile took command of reforming his infantry and archers, the time his heavy infantry bought them allowing him the time to do it.

Throughout the rest of that night they fought their way through the grove, almost encircled a dozen times but yet breaking out thanks to the heavy cavalry and Willas' steady command. The archers were almost entirely up out of arrows however, and they had lost countless men in this sudden reversal, the night and the nature of the battle not allowing Willas to get an accurate count. They were never able to completely break contact, which of course was part of their enemy's plan, but that plan was derailed as they broke out into the surrounding farmland.

The Reach forces broke out, quickly filtering through a line of heavy cavalry that looked over a thousand strong along with the light cavalry, still nearly a thousand strong themselves. The attackers skidded to a halt seeing that, and quickly retreated back into the grove knowing they had the advantage there.

If they had looked closer they would've noticed that the men on those horses didn't seem at home there nor did their armor seem to be as heavy as one would expect. But with the sunlight coming up and casting their shadows into bass relief and after the fierce nighttime battle that they had just fought, it was to be forgiven that the Westerlanders couldn't tell that the men up there were smallfolk and scouts. Willas had had his light cavalry round them up and stick them on horses with some of the levees that had gathered at Goldengrove. Barely trained they had been good camp servants but now served a different purpose.

Willas stumped along, wincing with every step now from his leg but bellowing orders to reform his lines, his heavy cavalry breaking out after his light and heavy infantry, while his archers raced ahead, now without a single arrow to their names. Before the enemy could realize that they had been had, his men had reformed, and though exhausted at least seemed ready to receive them.

Those enemies haven't yet seen through the trick when Willas ordered his men to slowly start to pull back and retreat. By the time they realized that he was going to keep on going, his force was well on their way, and only what horse forces they had could've kept up. Instead they refused battle, pulling back to lick their own wounds.

Willas kept his men going until the horses began to tire then called a halt. He slid from the saddle groaning in pain from his lame leg as well as numerous other injuries he had taken through the night. However he was surprised to note that morale seemed to be high. At least judging by the laughter and chuckles he heard from all around him at the trick having worked.

He leaned against his horse's side, absentmindedly pulling out a carrot from his saddle for the noble creature. The stallion had been one of his, bred for endurance as well as strength, and he had succeeded rather remarkably well in its case. It was also incredibly loyal, and it nuzzled at his shoulder huffing wearily before it lipped at the carrot.

"Make sure the men have time to get some food in them," he said opening his eyes again to look at Toulev, who had remained with him throughout the blood-drenched night. "Make sure the horses eat moderately and that both horse and man at least drink some water from their supplies, no matter if they say they aren't hungry."

"I'll do that thing milord." Without another word Toulev moved off.

A moment later Ser Graceford moved wearily through the resting army, almost collapsing out of the saddle as he dismounted with none of his usual grace. The other young man removed his helmet, wiping at his sweat streaked face shaking his head. "Grendel's dead. They pulled him off his horse in that damn apple grove." The man almost sounded in shock at how the night had gone, but he was rallying quickly. "What do we do now?"

Willas rubbed at his own face wearily but answered quickly enough. "We send out scouts to determine how large this second force out of the Westerlands is, while the rest of us continue to pull back towards the river. I'll send word ahead to Goldengrove and across as far southwest as Old Oak. We need reinforcements, and Oakheart is the only family I know that hasn't already sent its men to Highgarden or Bitterbridge."

"I'd heard that Oakheart refused to participate in a war against House Lannister in memory of Ser Arys Oakheart." Thomas said, alluding to the former Kingsguard.

"They did, but they can't sit this out any longer, else their own lands might be in danger soon. Stranger take it, depending on the size of the Westerlands force, this could be the start of a small-scale invasion. We can't let the Westerlanders get deeper into the Reach."

"No Ser we can't." Thomas said firmly nodding his head in emphasis. "By the grace of the Mother, we will prevail!"

Willas nodded back, pushing himself away from his horse and going to do a survey of the men, his face set grimly. Whatever their losses, and he wasn't naïve enough to think they were anything but horrible especially among his knights, this wasn't the end of things not by a long shot. Indeed, if these men came from the families he suspected, then the opportunity he thought might be there in the long term could possibly still be realized. After all, the Westerlands are much more open on their southern front than anywhere else, aren't they?

OOOOOO

While battles and war continued elsewhere, Ranma's army had finished their trek along the western side of the Green Fork to the nearest point where they would have to start trekking overland and away from the River towards Fairmarket. Knowing this, Ranma had allowed the army to rest for a full day off to rest the men to build up morale. All the troops were allowed to simply laze about and to whatever they wished save for a dozen men who knew some carpentry, and an old troop leader who had served once in the Manderly navy. He set these men to building a small, rather primitive river barge that could carry a few men across the River to send a messenger to Brynden and Groaton, working with them along with Roger, who also knew some carpentry having learned it as a hobby.

The rest of the wolfsworn busied themselves in various ways. Edd and Cley went over the boy's bow-work. Arya and Meera went out together on a hunt just the two of them and Nymeria. Hathan began to teach his new squire Luke the rudiments of horse-care. Smalljon slept most of the day away 'because I can'. Dacey, Domic and Lord Mallister entered into a card game with some of the smallfolk troop leaders that became bloodier than the battles so far and more costly to the losers pay than the time spent in Seagard.

Myrcella, Alayaya and Daenerys had decided to take a day for themselves a bit away from the army. Surrounded by the army all the time had been rather irritating at times, not that the men were crude toward them for the most part. After a few of them had been soundly thrashed by Ed and Smalljon, that had stopped even in Alayaya's case. Still, the opportunity to take a real bath was one they weren't going to miss, and it was nice to get away from the menfolk for a time

The Green Fork was a powerful, wide, deep, and very fast river for most of its length, only slowing down near the Ruby Ford, hence why the Twins had been such a powerful and very profitable position. Even in those places where you could wade out into the water, you couldn't go very deep without being in danger of getting swept away. Here however there was a small culvert, a tiny curve in the river bed filled with water, where the current wasn't nearly as strong, but which was deep enough to dive into.

With Fenris and Ghost on patrol around them, along with the draklings lying nearby, who Daenerys had rather loudly ordered to bite anyone that came near them before coming out here. Jason, despite his dislike for Daenerys, had offered to add a few ladies to her retinue. She had refused, citing the fact they only had a single tent for the ladies, nor was she about to ask for special privileges on the march, such as having dedicated servants like that.

Her austerity won her some points, and Daenerys had kept on doing so throughout the march, slowly winning the old man over. Jason was still visibly leery about her dragons, and worried for the future when she could ride them and thus become a true power to be reckoned with rather than having most of her power and all of her personal welfare relying on her marriage to Ranma. Still, Daenerys considered that an appreciable amount of progress.

She smiled a little looking over to where Alayaya lay with her feet in the water and the rest of her body laid out on the soft grass of the side of the pool. Alayaya had shown a remarkable ability to dive when they first arrived, well above what Myrcella or Daenerys were willing to try, but it had tired her out. Now she lay there, having pulled off the short shift she had been swimming in, her dark skin glistening as she allowed nature to dry her off, her rather large, perfectly formed breasts on display in such a way that would have inflamed any man who saw it.

"What are you thinking of?" Myrcella asked, nudging and Daenerys with her shoulder from where the two of them sat a little further away from Alayaya. Between them Rhaegon lay, the two women having taken turns trying to remove the remains of his last molting from between his wings where they lay along his back. Sunfyre was slightly further away, gnawing on a fish he had somehow caught with an incredibly smooth head-dive into the water. By his side another fish lay, which Daenerys had mentally ordered him to save for his brother.

Daenerys smile widened as she turned her head to look over at the younger girl. Since they had first met Myrcella had moved from being an object of sympathy but still a hated Lannister to a dear friend and finally to a younger sister over the course of this march. "Oh just how life is strange sometimes. Here we are, marching down to continue a war that is already been bloody and bitter, yet we can have this little moment of peace and quiet, it's just rather odd to me."

"Ranma says to enjoy the quiet times when they come, because the noisy ones never give you the chance!" Myrcella laughed. "I suppose he's right about that too." Her smile disappeared as she frowned. "I know I miss the quiet times, before Tommen was murdered and I had to walk on tenterhooks most of the time while I was at home, and without... without Ranma around to protect me."

Daenerys looked at her, wrapping one arm around the younger girl shoulders in a gentle hug, somewhat squeezing Rhaegon's body between them. The dragon huffed irritably, but didn't try to move away. "He does have that effect. Despite not having taken the vows and coming from a religion that denigrates them Ranma really is the epitome of a knight isn't he?"

"Ser Oakheart was my knight." Myrcella said, her voice catching when she said the man's name. "Ranma was something else. I knew that Ser Oakheart couldn't protect me from everything, he was bound up by other things, and his duty was always first to the Throne. But somehow I knew Ranma could or at least would try to defend me from anything or anyone regardless of who they were or what they wanted."

She paused, looking up the Daenerys, gathering herself, for a moment, before blurting out, "I, I really love him you know! It's not just a crush, and I realize I'm still young, at least he thinks I'm young, but my feelings are real!" As Daenerys made to speak she went on quickly. This was costing her a lot of courage to say, so she wanted to get it all out in one go. "I know somehow that I'm not a Baratheon, I'll be a Waters, and that means I won't be anyone important. I'll be able to...become whatever I must to, to join the two of you! If you're willing to share him."

Daenerys frowned in automatic anger at the very idea, but after a moment she slowly lost the expression. She really had come to care for Myrcella, and she didn't want to hurt the girl. But neither was she prepared to say that she was exactly happy with what Merry had just proposed. "Your right, you're young yet." She said instead, after having carefully leached all anger from her voice leaving only slightly brittle sounding compassion. That took a lot out of Daenerys, but she wasn't going to wreck their friendship for a problem that may never occur in the future.

"Moreover, Ranma sees you as a little sister, a little girl at the moment. That won't change anytime soon. You can still grow up, and still fall in love with someone else nor, despite what you think, is your status that cut and dried. You may be declared a Lannister if you are not a Baratheon, and it will be a while yet before we're in a position where we can receive any messages that the Citadel might've sent on that subject in any event."

"And if it doesn't happen? And if my status as a Waters is confirmed?" Myrcella asked, taking courage in the older girl's calm response to her outburst. "Will you allow me to join you two, if I can convince Ranma I'm not the little girl he thinks I am?"

Daenerys looked at the other girl, and saw no jealousy there, only anxiety, anxiousness. No desire to take her place or push her to one side or even compete with her at all simply a desire to join her in Ranma, deep need and love for her husband shown in those green eyes. She sighed, then spoke, not knowing why she was saying what she was at the time, though in later life she would look back on this moment and thank her instincts. "Then we will revisit this discussion at that time."

Myrcella nodded, moving away slightly and turning back to the dragons deliberately changing the subject to the draklings rate of growth, something that Daenerys grasped with relief.

OOOOOO

Lord Serret sighed in relief as the huge Lion Gate closed behind the last man of his command. Safe at last, well for now anyway. He turned to Jaime, smirking at the younger man, who grinned back. "So while we're riding up to the Red Keep, why don't you fill me in on the defenses you've put in place already young Jaime, and I can tell you what adventures me and mine had along the way."

In the Red Keep Cersei was ecstatic to see Lord Serret's arrival, though of course didn't allow that to show on her face. After Joffrey formally bestowed the position of Hand on him, he called for a council immediately, going over the defense of the city and what news Varys was able to tell them from elsewhere. His report on Stannis' was particularly troubling, though Serret was not pleased to see that Joffrey didn't seem to understand that.

"We have over ten thousand men here now!" Joffrey complained, his tone a petulant whine, so unlike his mother's cultured controlled tone, or even his father's bluster it made Serret's teeth grind. "I don't understand why we can't just take the field against the Reach or Stannis! Surely they aren't as dangerous as all that."

Cersei smiled lightly at her son, but Lord Serret answered first. "There is confidence and there is being blind to reality. The forces we have here consist at least a quarter of barely trained city watchmen. My own forces are exhausted from the march, and the Crownlands forces aren't the best trained I imagine. No, the city is our strong point, we can break them on the walls."

His word choice seemed to settle down Joffrey, and the new Hand went on, talking about his own experiences against Renly, and what that said about his command ability. From there they moved on to the food issue slowly beginning to be noticed in the city, and what to do about it, then on into more strategic issues. Throughout this discussion, Lord Serret was watching those of the small council closely, and being watched in turn. A den of vipers this is, but it's not my job to defang the serpents, at least for now. After we've broken the Reach army and Stannis, maybe then I can think about the small council and what to do with them, but for now, we have more pressing concerns.

At that thought Serret's eyes slid over to Joffrey, sitting with his mother to one side and Petyr Baelish to the other. He wondered if Joffrey and his apparent trust in Petyr was one problem they would have to solve, or something more pressing, but had no way of knowing. For now, he had to concentrate on exterior problems, not interior ones.

OOOOOO

For the next few days Ranma wasn't certain why Daenerys was looking so introspective sometimes, or why Merry kept on shooting him such odd, hopeful glances. He thought at first that she had wanted to try riding Fenris, and though she had enjoyed it, and the fact that he once again regaled her with some stories from his past life, that didn't seem to be it. With more serious matters coming up to concentrate on Ranma decided to place that issue, whatever it was, into the 'inexplicable female things' folder in his mind. It was a rather large folder, but it served him well.

An easy four days march brought the small Northern expedition within sight of Fairmarket. And sound too, which made all of them start because the sound of battle carried clearly to them here through the brush, scrub and woods that surrounded them.

Ranma looked around him and began to wrap out orders. "Uncle, Hathan, Roger, form up the heavy cavalry in case we need a charge. Jason, gather up the archers, be ready to follow and exploit any openings. It sounds like there's fighting in the town, so be careful of being surrounded. Daryn, Edd, Smalljon, gather up the infantry and follow behind. Jon, Arya, with me." With that, Ranma raced ahead, Fenris following after him like a bolt from a bow, followed swiftly by Jon, Arya and their direwolves.

The six of them swiftly reached the northeastern side of the bridge across the Blue Fork to Fairmarket, barreling past several hundred villagers desperately trying to flee the town.

Inside the town there was madness. From where Ranma stood just inside the town he could see straight through the village down its one paved road. Ranma could see that the walls were still standing, but there were hundreds of soldiers in Westerlands colors, red and gold, everywhere. There were also a lot of men in patchwork and threadbare armor with the image of a black goat on their shoulders. These men were laughing as they chased after the smallfolk here and there.

They were fighting men House Mallister colors. In some place the defenders seemed to be holding them back but they had already gained a total hold, and looking straight ahead Ranma could see that the main through gate was still open. The defenders knew that as long as that portcullis was open, the army outside could send forces in, so were trying to push forward to recapture it, but the attackers were trying equally hard to hold onto it, a shield wall of Lannister men forming and moving outward to clear more room.

The press through the gate however was being held up by a man in a homespun cloak, who was dueling with three swordsmen at once. He had evidently been the first to reach the portcullis, or perhaps he had been there when the attackers had forced it open somehow. In any event he was giving a good account of himself having apparently already slain four men, their bodies strewn on the dirt road around him.

"Take and hold!" Ranma shouted, pointing ahead of them with Ice, then racing on. Jon and Arya nodded grimly, and the six of them, three humans and three direwolves barreled forward, baying their warcries. "Winter is coming!" The wolves howled, and at that sound every defender and attacker looked up, only to see Ranma, Jon and Arya slamming into the attackers like an unstoppable storm of steel and fang.

Ranma slew two men before they could even get their shields up, then leaped over the Westerlands line to land behind them, Ice sweeping out at waist level to cut open four others spilling their innards out into the courtyard, their leather armor not having even slowed the Valyrian blade down even without its edge being enhanced by ki. With the way clear he now stood in the center of the portcullis laughing grimly, his blue eyes dark with fury. "Come on, who wants to step up next!?"

He nodded cordially to the man who had been fighting in the gate, noticing in that kinetic time dilation effect he always entered in battle that he wore plate armor under that cloak of his. He also wielded a battered and dirtied sword, but it looked to be of excellent quality. Even in the midst of battle he kept his head covered by his hood, though that did nothing to stop the long white beard that hung down to his chest from sticking out. "Is this the only gate old man?"

The man shook his head silently and added in a gruff tone. "Two more elsewhere, one leading into the stable yard of the Paige keep. That one is probably already in our hands, I haven't heard much fighting from over there."

"You hear that Jon!" Ranma roared. "I've got this, you take Arya and take that other gate! "

Jon nodded, making his way around the melee that had developed between the attackers who had already made their way inside from this gate and the defenders trying to crush them under with numbers. Arya followed after, while but two wolves followed after.

Fenris stood with his master, with teeth bared in a snarl and a continuous growl that set the bowels to loosen among the Lannister men, many of whom were already falling back. "Winter is coming!" Ranma yowled, chopping at any that dared to come close, while behind him the remaining Mallister men finished slaying the attackers on the side of the gate. Of course there were about four-hundred or so still within the town, but the main gate was once again in the defenders hands.

OOOOOO

By this time the rest of the army had reached the bridge, and the infantry now streamed across. As they did Smalljon and the others worked with their troop leaders, breaking them into groups of fifty archers and 25 swordsmen before sending them deeper into the village. Jason let the wolfsworn to that task, moving forward with one such group. They swiftly came upon a group of twenty Lannister men who that had taken time out of the battle to start looting houses. Two of them even carried tied up women over their shoulders, though they had hurriedly threw them down upon spotting the approaching northerners

One of them was about to take the woman he held as a hostage, but the arrows of the northerners took him in the face throat and chest. The other men fell similarly under a hail of arrows, even the heavy plate armor he wore standing no chance of stopping the powerful northern longbows at such short range. At a distance of over a hundred yards or so he might've been able to survive an arrow to the chest plate but under forty feet no chance.

The looters were then taken by surprise by a force of defenders coming out of the space between a few houses further down, charging into them as Jason led the Northerners forward. He found himself facing his son Patrek over a body of a fallen Westerlander. "Patrek! In the name of the Seven what happened here!"

"Father!" Patrek said, pushing up his visor on his helm. Despite not being on a horse, Patrek wore the full plate of heavy cavalry man, and he was sweating heavily from moving around in it. But Jason had taught him how to fight well enough on foot that it wasn't that big of problem. His legs would be feeling it tomorrow, but that was all. When he pushed up his visor any onlooker could see that the two of them were definitely related. The same hawk eyes under heavy brows, the same thin features and aquiline nose.

Patrek reached over, pulling his father into a loose hug for a moment before kneeling down to rip a portion of a Lannister tabard off to clean his blade. "We've been getting refugees from the other side of the Red Fork for weeks in a steady trickle. The Lannister's disguised themselves as refugees then waited until they had a sufficient force in the village before they took the gates to open them for the rest of their army. I don't think there's a large force out there, but they took us completely by surprise."

He grimaced angrily. "Most of our men were within the Paige's keep, and we held that gate as well as the gate into the rest of the village from the keep, so we haven't taken that many losses. The smallfolk and the town itself took the brunt of this assault. We might have to go house to house to clear them out."

"If we must, we must" Jason said philosophically, though his eyes were burning with anger at what the smallfolk had been forced to endure over the last hour or so.

At that moment, Daenerys rode up at the head of another group of eighty northerners. With her two dragons circling in the air over the town and thanks to her warging with them she had a bird's eye view of the battle and had been using that to organize the northerner's counterattack. "There is a force of about a hundred men making its way back towards the one gate that the attackers still control, and another group is forming a few streets over. That group seems to be the more dangerous. I've already sent Daryn with a force to reinforce Jon and Arya, they're making their way to that gate. Should we call up the heavy cavalry to smash the nearby gathering, Lord Mallister?"

Patek gaped at the young woman who could only be from house Targaryen, then up into the sky where two flying creatures flew. It actually took him a moment to realize what those creatures were in actuality, and he looked at her with wide eyes. "Father, what's going on? What are, why are you with..."

"That is a tale for another time my son, for now we have a battle to win." Jason said, cutting his son off. He looked up at Daenerys and shook his head. "No, heavy cavalry would be a liability in the small streets of most of the town. Leave them on the main road through town, if Ranna loses the gate they might be needed to close it, or better we could use them to pursue the remaining Westerlanders outside the walls."

Daenerys nodded, turning her force away as her two dragons slowly circled around, the town before diving down, their target, the bridge, well out of sight. "As I said," Jason chuckled dryly, turning back to his son. "A very long story."

OOOOOO

Jon carved his way through four men, his twin sword style taking them by surprise until he came up to one Westerlander who was a better swordsman than most. His sword and shield worked as a single unit, blocking Jon's initial blows, and he reposted quickly, using his longer sword to good effect. "And who are you to use such a style, I've never seen anything quite like that." The man said in an almost conversational tone of voice, despite the battle going on around them, his features obscured by the helmet he wore, along with very good infantry style plate armor.

Behind Jon, Arya moved out from behind guarding his back, taking another man in the gut with Fang before wheeling away, her buckler slamming into the visor of another man crumpling the metal so much he couldn't see. She kicked him between the legs, then her sword took him high in the neck as he buckled forward before she moved on to her next opponent.

With a sharp series of thrusts and cuts from Fang, Arya threw two men back through the small gate that must've been used by farmers at some point, while her Nymeria moved up from out of nowhere with Ghost, finishing off the six attackers that were about to turn on her. More men however were gathering on the other side of the gate and on this side, and the three were hard pressed.

Jon however didn't have much attention to notice this as he dueled with the man in front of him. Several moments passed silently between them, neither man having breath or time to exchange badinage. At last, Jon spoke while at the same time smacking the man's blade aside as it tried to seek his throat. "Isn't it polite to give your own name first?" Jon then jumped up as the man brought his sword back in a blow to cut at his knees.

His own sword flashed out and the man barely raised his shield to block it from slicing into his chest but he was still thrown off-balance for a second, and he backed away on light feet, circling warily. "Addam Marbrand at your service." The man said. Then he twirled around, dodging another blow from Jon to bring up his sword in a whirling arc that should've caught Jon when he was off-balance from his own thrust.

However Jon's other blade came up, blocking the below from reaching him, allowing him to twist and bring his other sword arm up and around underhand, smashing into Addam's side with punishing force. However Jon was just off-balance enough that he couldn't get his full strength behind it, so instead of shearing through the plate mail and into the man it simply made a tremendous dent, and through Addam to the side.

With that bit of space, Jon bowed slightly, his tone dry and ironic. "Jon Stark, at your service and your family's." With that he moved forward, his twin swords moving in a dance of steel forcing Addam back. This allowed Jon to take a moment to view the action around them, his eyes widening at what he saw.

Arya was having a much tougher time of it. Ghost had once more faded into the background, coming out to rip and tear at the Westerlanders from behind. He didn't realize that this put more pressure on Arya and Nymeria at a time when they were trying to be a cork in a bottle, stopping the men already inside the town from retaking the gate, and stopping men outside from coming in.

Both of them were already bleeding from several wounds. Nymeria was limping, one of her paws cut badly, and one eye closed from blood from a cut over one eye. But she was still moving easily, evidenced by her nearly ripping one man in two while at the same time dodging a sword blow from another armmen.

Even as Jon watched Arya's helm was ripped away, her eye-slit having caught on a mace's spike even as she dodged the majority of the blow. Another spike left a gash along her cheek that would no doubt leave a scar as the helm was ripped away. It didn't matter to Arya though. Her return blow gored the man through his chest, and she snarled as she left her feet, her leg kicking out against another man so hard that he flew backwards into three others.

It was only the training that Ranma had given him since coming back that was allowing Arya to fight this many people at once. But the gate and the need to remain guarding it forced her to stay in one place, unable to use the full 'Ranma Air Style', and that was costing her a lot.

Worse, Jon could see at least two dozen more Westerlanders coming out from deeper within the town towards them. But just then a familiar voice roared out from the other side of the incoming Lannister men. "Righteous in Wrath! Hornwood for the Wolves!"

Arya laughed aloud, Fang a blur of steel in her hands as she dueled with two men, her buckler having been dropped moments ago. "Daryn I could damn well kiss you!"

"I think Alys would probably object pack-sister!" Daryn replied, charging into and through the men retreating to the gate, his company following him shouting their own battle cries. As he slid into place alongside Arya he smirked. "But I'll tell your brother you've finally begun to notice boys, he and your lady mother will be most pleased."

"Forget I said anything, seriously." Arya growled, dodging a blow from a flail, grabbing the man's arm and doing a perfect over the shoulder throw before stabbing him through the gorget with Fang. She pulled her sword out, flicking the blood at Daryn. "Or else."

Daryn merely laughed, driving back three men before whirling away to slay a fourth, then back before any of the three could react. "Message received Arya, they do say females are the more dangerous of the species after all." Their banter signaled the turn of the battle, as more northern men surrounded and pushed back the attackers.

Across their crossed blades Jon could see Addam gritting his teeth at this turn of events, and he grinned, pushing him away then moving forward, no longer conserving his speed or strength to be used later. His blades were a whirl as he attacked, his short swords cutting here there, everywhere.

Addam, knowing he was overmatched, tried to reverse his fortune by a sudden lunge forward. But Jon dodged just slightly, allowing the blade to pass to one side of his body by a bare inch, before clamping down on it with one arm. He held the other man's sword arm there for a brief second while he brought his other sword across to slam the flat of his blade into the other man's helmeted head with punishing force. Addam collapsed boneless to the ground.

Above the battle Jon could hear the thrum of several dozen bows sounding off in quick succession, not against the men on this side of the wall, but on the outer side of the wall around the town. Arya laughed again, moving back from the gate as Daryn and a few men took her place. "Go get'em Meera!"

OOOOOO

Instead of staying with the heavy cavalry, Rickard had grabbed every archer that hadn't already been assigned to unit clearing out the town and raced ahead to House Paige's keep. There he met a force of heavy infantry moving out into the town, but ignored them, passing them behind with a bare nod at the men in the lead, his banner and the war cries of his men telling the Mallister force he was friendly.

It was only as he was leading the archers up onto the keep's outer wall, which connected to the palisade around the village, that Rickard noticed Meera was with him. Before he could stop her, the young Reed girl raced on with a dozen archers following after. They came to a stop along the top of the palisade right above the gate where Jon and Arya were battling the Westerlanders. From there, Meera directed her archers to take the men still trying to press into the gate under fire.

That force broke under their fire, retreating frantically. Most of those men however were ridden down by the hoarded northern heavy cavalry, who barreled out of the main gate held by Ranma. After that, the initial battle was over, though the cleanup would take weeks.

Myrcella had set up tents during the battle on the clear portion of the bridge and main road through Fairmarket. As soon as the main battle was over she, the maester healer, Alayaya and the others Ranma had seconded to the 'hospital group', the name Ranma had given their efforts, went to work. Daenerys surprisingly joined them moments later. She guided wounded smallfolk to the tents, then took over organizing the search efforts for others for a time. It was a sign of caring that few lords would give to smallfolk caught up in the wars of their betters, and it won many a wondering glance from the people they were helping.

Leaving Roger and Hathan to lead the cavalry pursuit, Ranma moved back to help the searchers with the rest of the wolfsworn save Arya, who joined Meera on the wall. Dacey took another route to aid the town, organizing a bucket chain from the river and wells to put out the numerous fires the raiders had. Their prodigious strength allowed them to move burnt or simply collapsed pieces of thatch and wood to find trapped smallfolk, though more often than not they found bodies. The Westerlanders, either the regular armsmen or the ones with the black goat mark on their shoulders, had not been kind to the smallfolk.

Heaving up a piece of wood that had fallen in from a house's ceiling, Ranma began to hear noise coming from deeper within the ruin. He moved forward, tossing aside the pieces ceiling and other wreckage until he cleared the top of a hidden door in the floor. Pulling it up he leaned over the hole, grabbing the point of a spear that was thrust up at him. "Um, hello ma'am, would you like some help out of there?"

The woman who had just tried to kill him stared at Ranma's almost blasé tone, trying to wrench the spear out of his grip, which despite being on the iron tip of the spear was too strong for her to budge it. Behind her, two little heads stuck out from behind her ragged dress, not ragged through age but misuse and several rips here and there.

Ranma spoke softly, trying not to scare the family, who must have hidden down in their cellar the moment they heard the battle. "Do any of your children or you need to see a healer, ma'am? I'm Ranma and I'm with the House Mallister troops, we're here to help."

One of the two heads peeking out around the woman bobbed up and down before speaking in a voice Ranma recognized as that of a very young girl. "Yes Ser, my father and my mother're hurt. My father's fallen asleep, but he was thumped real hard over the head."

The woman let go of the spear reluctantly. Ranma pulled it out of the cellar, tossing it aside and leaping down into the cellar. He looked around, noticing the two people on the floor, and noticing one wasn't even twitching. He exchanged a grim glance with the woman, who shrugged her shoulders. As the woman helped the two kids up the staircase Ranma moved over to the injured duo, breathing a sigh of relief when he felt a pulse on the man's throat.

Giving the man a once over Ranma saw it looked as if he had been clobbered upside the head with something heavy, but it hadn't broken his skull or cut the skin. The woman was actually worse off, having a bad cut in her side deep and still bleeding. Ranma did what he could with her cut and to make her decent. Her dress had been halfway torn off which told Ranma a lot about what her husband had saved her from at the cost of a concussion at the very least. "From common people comes great courage..." He murmured then moved back to the entrance into the cellar, the woman in his arms while Smalljon leaped down after him, quickly moving to life up the man.

Ranma dropped the wounded off in the hospital area, then went in search of Daenerys and Merry. He found them by seeing Fenris sitting upright like a sentry in front of a large tent. Daenerys was helping a young septa who Ranma supposed was from the town set a man's broken arm on one side of the tent while Merry was working feverishly on stitching up a very ugly cut on a Mallister armsmen's leg. On the other side of her Alayaya was bandaging a head-wound on a Umber man.

Daenerys finished her work first, turning to see Ranma in the doorway. "How is it going?" He asked softly, his arms twitching as if he wanted to pull her into a hug, but didn't want to interrupt her work.

"It's going." Daenerys said grimly. "Merry's been a miracle worker, without her organization efforts this would be a lot worse. And despite his horrible level of empathy, Martyn, the maester of House Locke, is indeed an incredible healer. We have only lost four men so far, and I doubt more than a dozen of the injured will have to remain here when we move on."

"And the smallfolk?" Ranma asked, his voice still soft.

"Much worse, at least a hundred maybe as many four hundred dead, and dozens wounded." His wife replied grimly, shaking her head. "The mercenaries, I recognize that patch as belonging to the Brave Companions. They have an evil reputation, and they lived up to it here. We're doing what we can but..." Daenerys shrugged her shoulders, then nodded over to Merry before going on in a whisper. "Send for Dacey or someone to watch her, if we don't I have no doubt she'll keep going until she collapses."

At Ranma's smirk, Daenerys shook her head. "I know when I need to stop, it's precisely the time when my little ones inform they're hungry again. I've got them out well past the shanty town's edge with Ghost right now." She pushed his shoulders slightly. "Go on, do what you can do, we've got this under control as much as possible."

Ranma nodded, moving out of the tent to rejoin the search efforts. Neither of them noticed the old man who had tried to hold the main gate loitering around outside the tent. If someone could have looked under the old man's hood, they would have seen eyes widening in shock, before a faint smile appeared over the long beard.

OOOOOO

Even after having it all explained to him Patrek still couldn't keep his eyes from tracking to where Daenerys sat next to Ranma on one side later that evening in the dining hall of House Paige. The two of them were holding hands almost absentmindedly as they listened to him talk about had been happening. "Ser Paige and Ser Grell sent most of their combined force into Hag's Mire to bring House Nayland to heel, while we stayed here with a few men from House Paige. Their senior knight is Ser Damon Paige, but he's still recovering from wounds taken in, well internal issues caused by a difference of opinion with his sons-in-laws, both of whom were Freys, and isn't mobile enough to do anything but maintain order in their keep."

Patrek looked at the expressions around the table, breathing a sigh of relief when he realized his father must've already shared that horrible tale. "He's laid up even now, nearly ruptured something trying to join the battle earlier and their houses healer, a very young septa, forced some herbal concoction down his throat that knocked him out. At any rate, we've been somewhat reinforced from House Shawney, they sent a few dozen back, but they did so because most of those troops were injured in some fashion. From what we know their castle still stands, both Lord Shawney and the new Lord Lolliston are as determined as ever to not side with the bastard who sits on the throne, no matter how much money the Lannisters try to wave in his face. But Lord Shawney is a proven combat leader, Serec Lolliston is not."

"When was the last time you heard from them?" Ranma asked, his eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

"Six days ago."

Domeric groaned a little. "They might've faced the same sort of attack, unless their castles are closed entirely and ready for a siege."

"That, that could be." Patrek said, tugging at his short, neat goatee for a moment worriedly. "Serec I know was wishful to keep his castle open as long as possible to take in as many of his House's smallfolk as they could. I'll send scouts out tomorrow first thing, though we won't hear back from him for six days at a minimum, that's as long as it takes to get a runner to House Lolliston's castle and back."

House Lolliston's castle was on an almost straight line between Fairmarket and the Kneeling Man's Ford, and was slightly closer to the ford than the town. House Shawney's was closer but to the east of Fairmarket, out of the way from an advancing army's point of view from the ford, so it might not have been subject to the kind of assault they faced here. More to the point, Shawney had closed his House down the moment he and his men reached his castle from the battle at the Ford.

With a shrug of his shoulders Patrek went on. "A messenger arrived yesterday from the knightly houses who said that they had finished with House Nayland, and they were on their way back. But we've also received word that the second echelon of the Lannisters arrived a few weeks ago. I have no idea what the old lion is doing with those men, he hasn't made any move to cross the ford that we know of. He might not wish to be bogged down in sieges against Lolliston and Shawney or here though I doubt we would put up much of a defense against a full army. You might not have noticed, but most of the palisade here's wooden. A single good fire would have them in and among us, and unlike today I doubt we'd have the numbers advantage then."

"The man I took prisoner, I think he was the leader of this attack." Jon said from where he sat, sipping quietly on wine (some of which had been distributed to the men) and eating some bread having worked up quite an appetite. "His name was Adam Marbrand, and I remember hearing something about him though I can't remember what." Actually Marbrand was the only prisoner taken. None of the northerners or Mallister men were feeling very merciful after seeing what had been done to the smallfolk of the town.

"You took him prisoner!?" Patrek said astonished. "Adam Marbrand is supposedly one of the better blades in Westeros, rumor has it he's almost as good as the Kingslayer."

"But not quite up to the wolfsworn standard." Ranma said smirking a little while the rest of the wolfsworn chuckled grimly. But Ranma went on more seriously, asking. "Do we have any news from Riverrun, how is my grandfather?"

Arya looked up at that from where she had been lounging on the ground of the sitting room with her head on Nymeria's side. She and Ranma exchanged a glance, both hoping to meet their grandfather before he passed away.

"Lord Tully is still alive as far as we know." Patrek said his hands held up in an 'I don't know' gesture. "The Lannisters have made no attempt to besiege Riverrun, which is smart of them since that would've forced them to use at least half of their total army. Instead that old lion has most of his men ready to defend the fork across the river, either at the Kneeling Man's Ford, or down at the Trident." He gestured to the map on the low table set between most of the people taking part in the discussion, pointing at both spots.

"Does House Blackwood still hold out?" Daenerys asked.

"They do, your um, milady." Patrek said, wondering how to address her. Plus he had often been told about what had happened to his uncle and so many others under the old mad King. She's truly gorgeous though. Ranma's a lucky man, if she doesn't develop any of her family's fire madness that is.

"That's good to hear." Ranma said nodding his head. "I'll need to look at the map some more, this is the most detailed map of the Riverlands I've seen, but I think I'll have a plan ready for us tomorrow. We should keep the army here for at least two days though, to help the locals repair their houses and everything, but after that I want us to move out quickly. I've no doubt that the Lannisters already have an idea of what happened with the Twins, and they'll certainly hear about what happened here, but I want us to retain the initiative."

Speed over all, quickness over all. While I don't go for the whole utter ruthlessness part of Genghis Khan's philosophy, he got those parts right at least. And when we do strike, I mean to be as thorough as need be. Ranma thought grimly. Strike hard, strike fast, cause chaos and opportunity will follow, heh the anything goes school of warfare you old gold fucker.

"Speaking of this past battle," Ranma went on clicking the fingers of his free hand. "That old man who tried to hold the main gate before I arrived, do you have any idea who he is?"

"Not a one. He was just one of the refugees, came in with the last batch, pulled out his sword and began to attack the Westerlanders from behind the moment the Lannisters made their move from what my surviving men who were there said. He could be a traitor to them for all I know, someone who hates the Lannisters for his own reasons?" Patrek shrugged ignorance again.

"Why don't you send for him, I'm certain there is a story behind his skills and his being here at this point in time." Dacey said. "Old men with beards like that and skills like that should be rather rare shouldn't they?"

Edd got up from where he had been sitting, comically making as if he was groaning in agony like an old man for a moment before leaving. It actually didn't take long to find the elderly gentlemen in question. He was loitering down in the courtyard helping take care of some of the horses. But it was pretty obvious to Edd that he had also been watching the entrance to the keep for some reason. Edd explained that Ranma and Daenerys wanted to talk to him, and the man nodded, following after the spear wielding Karstark wolfsworn.

The moment he walked into the room being used as a meeting hall however Fenris cocked his head from where he was laying down by the two draklings behind the small sofa Daenerys and Ranma were sitting on. He got up, leaning over the sofa's back to stare at the man before turning his head to look at his master. Ranma gasped shaking his head with a laugh. "Ser Barristan? What are you doing here?"

Everyone's eyes wide as they all stared at the old man, who simply shook his head in resignation. "Should've known this wouldn't work for long. What gave me away, lad?" Ser Barristan Selmy said, reaching up with one hand to pull back his hood, revealing his craggy but familiar features, hidden by a large beard at the moment but still recognizable to those who had met him before.

Ranma couldn't say Fenris of course so he made up a story on the spot which at least sounded believable. "The way you stand and that voice of yours earlier. You made a good try of trying to disguise it, but I know that voice, I didn't have time to think about it during the battle but it was obvious now."

"So you are Ser Barristan Selmy?" Daenerys said cocking her head to one side and looking at the old man. "I thought you had hair on top of your head rather than completely situated on your chin."

Dacey and Arya both laughed, while the men simply chuckled and Barristan shook his head ruefully. "It's a new affectation your Grace, I did after all have to disguise myself after I was removed from the Kingsguard."

"What?" Ranma gasped, shaking his head. "Why! I don't have much truck with the Kings you've served, but you at least served them loyally, no man alive could doubt your oath."

"Joffrey." Myrcella said shaking her head. She had been falling asleep leaning against the arm of the sofa by Daenerys where she sat on the floor, utterly exhausted from her work in the hospital. She had roused however when Ranma shouted his surprise at seeing Barristan. "Hello Ser Selmy, I'm sorry that my despicable brother treated you so badly, but I'm glad to see you."

Barristan smiled, bowing from the waist towards the Princess. "And I am glad beyond all knowing to see you still alive, lass. Whatever your true heritage you were still one of my charges in the not distant past. I was sorry to hear of Ser Oakheart's passing, but at least his sacrifice allowed you to reach a place where you could find safety."

Myrcella nodded looking away again at the memory of her protector, while Barristan turned back to Ranma and Daenerys. "Yes, I was dismissed in favor of the Kingslayer, setting aside all precedent and law, in favor of that murderous bastard. I was tempted to carve my way towards Joffrey and cut his throat, but I left instead. After that, I wondered which King was worthy of my blade and found both the Stag brothers wanting for one reason or another."

"Renly is a grasping little ass, whose only good point is that he's likable and has a sense of humor. He's done nothing else, he's not even as loyal to family as I would like to see. I've heard some of the comments he's made about Stannis's only daughter, and I wouldn't say such things about the meanest smallfolk lass. And Stannis is cold, and apparently has taken up with a foul foreign religion from some rumors that have gotten out from Dragonstone. Then I started to hear about your return with Ranma, so I decided to make my way north."

"I'd hoped to observe you my lady and see if you had any of your father's madness in you before coming forward with my true identity however."

"You're not the only one who wanted to observe me Ser Selmy." Daenerys said wickedly, smirking over at Jason who coughed into his fist for a moment looking away while Patrek chuckled lightly at his discomfiture.

"I can believe it given what the Mad King did to your brother Lord Mallister." Barristan said nodding his head to the other man. "Nonetheless, I have served one mad King, one King who was a worthless drunk and for a few days one who was a pulling whelp of a boy who might be worse than both combined. I think..." Barristan said looking at Daenerys closely, the way she and Ranma were so close, and how she had worked so hard in the 'hospital' earlier that day. "I think... I think I would like to see what serving a Queen is like. If you will have me."

"Not just a queen Ser Selmy." Daenerys said her voice now serious. "Ranma and I are equals in rank and power. True equals, something we hope to put into law and custom after we win this war."

Ranma nodded his head at that. "Nor will there be a Kingsguard as you understand the term, a group of the best blades or whatever you wish to call it from the entire kingdom. "The Wolfsworn, the River Blades, others like that and the Royal Regiments, yes." But no more Praetorian Guard BS.

The wolfsworn all chuckled all around him, even Arya laughing quietly as she stared at the old man one hand rested on Nymeria's head.

At the word 'regiments' Sir Barristan cocked his head wondering what it meant, but shrugged his shoulders. "In that case, I will serve you both, what oaths would you have me take?"

"So you would become the first of our Garden Guards?" Ranma asked, smirking a little.

"Oh that's just horrible!" Arya groaned shaking her head, as everyone else, even Jason and Patrek, did the same. "We'll need to think of a new name for the swords we get from the Reach brother."

"I'm not good with making up names so sue me." Rama said growling a little, causing Fenris and Nymeria to both huff in laughter.

He turned back to Sir Barristan, who was grinning through his beard, but he could tell that the older man didn't like that name either. "Fine, we'll consider changing the name later, but the oaths we ask you to take won't change. Kneel Ser Barristan."

The old man did so quickly. Ranma rose from his chair, picking up the sword from where it had been leaning against the side of the sofa he was sitting in. Raising it, he placed the flat of the blade on one of Selmy's shoulders, while Daenerys stood up, her hands joining his on the hilt. "Do you, Sir Barristan, swear to uphold the law and the customs of the land? To always be true to the crown, so long as it remains true to defending the people it is charged to protect?"

Barristan blinked at that, nor was he the only one. Normally oaths to join the Kingsguard were all about obedience to the crown and defending said crown. This was something new, and the emphasis on being true to the crown so long as it was true to the people was very strange. Yet at the same time, also very gratifying, showing Barristan he had chosen wisely here. "I do." He replied firmly, no hesitation in his voice.

"Will you defend the innocent and the weak against those who would oppress them? Will you both offer and keep our council, fight by our side in these troubled times and beyond, in the pursuit of fairness and the rule of law?" Daenerys asked. She and Ranma had spent many hours over the course of the march thinking about these oaths, and while at first she hadn't been happy about many of them, she agreed they needed to be said.

"I will." Barristan replied for the second time, his eyes staring into Daenerys own.

"Will you show mercy to those who deserve it, generosity to those who need it, and bring justice down upon those who break the Crown's peace?" Ranma asked.

"I will."

"Will you defend the realm against the forces of darkness and other dangers, both foreign and domestic?" Daenerys asked.

Barristan actually blinked a little at that then realized that the two were talking about the Red Witch rumor placed at Stannis' right hand. Or so he thought, anyway. Regardless, he had no qualms about giving his word to fight such as that. "I so swear to do."

"then rise Ser Barristan Selmy, and join us at our side from now until you or we take our last breaths." Both royals chorused. There was a moment of profound stillness, the Riverlanders looking on in awe and the wolfsworn merely grinning, along with Rickard though his smirk was much tarter than theirs. He was always amused by the panoply the southerners needed to add to their vows to one another.

Slowly Barristan rose from where he was kneeling more certain he had made the right decision to serve these two than he had ever been about anything before, while Ranma and Daenerys both sat down once more, their faces solemn. But then Ranma smirked, clapping his hands together. There was a strange sort of promise to that sound, as if it started something or rather signaled the start of something. "And now, tell me what you can about what went on in King's Landing after I rescued Sansa, and as much as you can about Tywin Lannister..."

Just then there was a knock on the door, causing everyone's eyes to look in that direction. A second later an armsman in House Paige colors poked his head in, his voice somewhat hesitant. "Milords, there is a septon out here. He says he wants to talk to the, um, the 'Northerner heathen' and the 'Dragon Queen'."

End chapter

Whelp, the Ironborn are on the playing field now, though their first strikes didn't go nearly as well as they hoped. And, in case it looks as if the North is getting off too lightly, remember that there are other enemies out there than the Ironborn.

There will be a lot more about what is going on in King's Landing in the next chapter, as the siege begins and certain events come to light. That, Stannis and the conflict about to begin between Ranma and Tywin directly will be the main sections of that chapter. After that, a chapter centered on the Wall and events at sea.

Oh, and I know the oaths are sort of meh, but I can't come up with better ones.

Hope you all liked this one, and the unfolding war.

*Chapter 13*: Chapter 13

I don't own Ranma 1/2 or Martin. I believe in actual endings and don't believe that assholes/bastards should prosper.

Here is chapter 13, and kudos to everyone who knows where the name of the chapter came from. It works given what Ranma and his army do here. I would like to thank Antony444 for his work as a beta and ASolaF info. However we seem to be dealing with some format issue, so there might be a few missing spaces here and there. We tried to catch them all, but...

Oh, does anyone know any Tenchi Muyo War on Geminar fanfiction? Preferably some that have a main character whose balls have actually dropped and isn't mentally retarded? Despite having the WORST REDHEADED FEMALE LEAD EVER, of all time, the combat and robots are cool, and a few of the side female characters are fun. Aura in particular, dark elf FTW!

want to give a shout out to MilandaAnza and Rakaan for pointing out mistakes when they read through this chapter!

And now comes the Violence!

---

Wild Wolf 13 Deadly With A Blade Is...

For a moment Ranma and the other simply looked at the man then Ranma laughed causing the rest of the wolfsworn to chuckle though Rickard looked a little angry at that as did Daenerys. Seeing this Ranma reached over and took Daenerys' hand. "It's not exactly the most diplomatic way of addressing, but you have to admit he's got a point."

"I am well aware of my family's rocky relationship with the Faith, Ranma." Daenerys replied tartly. "While I believe that people should be free to follow what religion they believe in, I cannot say I'm happy with the fact that in the Faith of the Seven's eyes I am apparently an abomination. So I do not see why we should let a mere septon in to talk to us, especially one who seemingly lacks tact."

In the Faith of the Seven, incest was one of the worst crimes possible. But unlike in the faith of the Old Gods, the Faith of the Seven also loathed the results of incest, calling them abominations. This had made the Faith's relationship with House Targaryen very rocky indeed, considering that incest was not only allowed but almost insisted upon among them especially in the early years, begun when Aegon the Conqueror married not one sister but both of them.

The Faith Militant Uprising, a series of wars spread out over most of Westeros and seven years, was spurred by this and several other factors. They began when Aenys, the son of Aegon the Conqueror, wed his son and heir to his sister. This was just one of many slights Aenys rather foolishly paid to the Faith in his rule. Others were backing the Greyjoy desire to remove the Faith from the Iron Islands, and instead of denouncing his brother Maegor as a heathen when he took a second wife, simply removing him as Hand and banishing him.

Nonetheless, the marriage of his son and daughter was the rather giant oak plank that broke the mule's back. Maegor, Aenys' younger half-brother, put down many of those uprisings in a brutal manner earning the name the Cruel, but the rebellions didn't end until Aenys' son Jaehaerys took the crown and offered an amnesty for anyone who had been part of the rebellion in return for the disbanding of the Faith's militant orders.

Yet even after that, the Targaryens, fearing the diluting of their blood would take away whatever it was that allowed them to control their dragons, continued the policy of intermarriages, which of course the Faith detested, but were no longer strong enough to do anything about. Daenerys, as a daughter of King Aerys and his sister Rhaella, fell under that same stigma.

So Daenerys had every right to be leery of a septon of the Faith. And considering the rumors we've heard, Ranma thought his eyes flicking over to Myrcella, she isn't the only one.

However Myrcella was looking at Daenerys shaking her head. "This is one of those things you don't understand because you come from Essos, Daenerys." She said reaching over and taking Daenerys's other hand. "The faith of the Seven is very important here in Westeros. Well," she flushed a little. "Not so much for the nobles and maybe not in some of the cities like King's Landing, but I know it is important for most of the smallfolk, most of the Knightly Houses, and especially in the Reach."

Patrek Mallister smiled nodding his agreement. "The princess is right, Your Highness, in the big cities the Faith might be seen as corrupt, but out in the fields and villages, it's a very important part of the smallfolk's lives. Births, deaths, marriages, education, healing, even matters of law, or sin rather, all of that is seen to by the septons and septas." His father nodded, as did Hathan, the only Northerner there who followed what the Northerners called the New Gods.

Daenerys shrugged, not really understanding it but when Ranma nodded agreement with the others she at least willing to listen to it. "Very well, I suppose we can see what he wants to say, though if Damon Paege is well enough to take part, could we ask him to join us? He might be able to tell us who this is."

It turned out that Damon was indeed well enough to take part, though not to actually move. Smalljon, with quite a bit of grumbling went with Dacey to get him bringing Damon and a sofa back just for him. However he didn't know who the septon was.

"We have a septa here in the keep, she's quite a pretty girl if a little too quick to feed me concoctions, still very easy on the eyes. But Fairmarket's septon passed away several years ago, and we never received a replacement. There is a wandering septon who stops in occasionally. If it's him, he's a good, firm believer in the Faith, not like the septons in the city are supposed to be like, though his feet are rather scary looking, like, like the feet of a tree almost." Damon said rambling slightly, a sign of the latest concoction that the 'pretty young septa' had given him.

A moment later the septon entered. He was a small thin, grey-haired man. He wore simple woolen robes, which looked rough to the touch, and no shoes on his feet. Like Damon had said they looked so rugged and tough they more closely resembled gnarled roots than normal feet. His eyes were hard, yet they and his mouth, which at the moment was set in a thin line, had smile lines around them interspersed with the grimmer lines and those made simply by his face being too often in the sun.

"Septon Sparrow!" said Damon, smiling brightly, almost pushing himself up off his sofa but Edd reached over and gently pushed him back down.

"Hello, young Damon." said the septon, his mouth curving upwards in a thin smile for a moment. "Do not move on my account my boy, you have obviously taken enough hurts of late. In that vein" the man said, now turning those deep, appraising eyes on Myrcella. "The Mother, the Maiden and the Crone bless you for your work in healing the smallfolk after this battle, my child."

Myrcella blushed scarlet, stammering that she hadn't done anything much to deserve a blessing like that, but Ranma and Daenerys both shook their heads. "You and maester Martyn saved a lot of lives Myrcella. If it wasn't for your organization and for his healing skills, there would be hundreds more dead among the smallfolk especially."

"Indeed, in this you have certainly risen above your abominable origins."

At that Myrcella's blushing stopped with the suddenness of a guillotine and she stared coldly at the septon while nearby Domic wincing. "You speak of the rumors from my uncle Stannis? I will note septon 'Sparrow', that he has not shared any evidence, he has merely shared blandishments!"

"Yet you cannot say that you or either of your siblings have anything of the Baratheon in looks, can you?" The septon said, ignoring for now Ranma's growling anger and Daenerys's violet eyes becoming harder as he almost seemed to interrogate the younger girl.

"That does not equate to any of us being of incestuous origins. And even if my older sibling is not the king's son, that does not mean I or my younger brother are not!"

"So you had already heard about those accusations?" asked Domic, looking at her askance. "Here I thought I was trying so hard to save your feelings."

"I shared with her that rumor after we broke the Twins, I felt she had a right to know." Ranma said shaking his head. And I wanted her to scream and shout and get her initial response over with just me and Dae around before someone else brought it up, though I never thought a septon would be the one to do so.

Now he spoke up before the rather abrasive old man could go on. "Stannis hasn't shared any proof about the incest accusation. As Merry said we do know that Joffrey isn't Robert son, but I won't tolerate any such accusation against Tommy. He was a nice, humble young boy who should have lived a long and fruitful life."

"As for Myrcella herself, we have asked the maesters who study lineages to send us proof by raven to Seagard about whether the daughters of previous unions between House Baratheon and House Lannister also followed the trend of taking after their father. We have not received any proof yet, so until we do, Myrcella is a trueborn princess of House Baratheon. And you will treat her as such, am I clear?"

There was something very dangerous in Ranma's eyes just then, and almost against his will septon Sparrow found himself nodding. After a moment however, he realized that really he didn't have anything to lose in leaving that subject. Nor was Myrcella really the only issue with hand that he needed to delve into. "I will apologize then, I did not know that you were already looking into the matter, nor did I realize Stannis has yet to share any proof of his accusation of incest." He said calmly, though the words came out as if being drawn out of him, but they seemed sincere enough and Ranma nodded.

He looked at the older man appraisingly, scratching at his chin for a moment while absently noting that he needed to shave again. Everyone else could grow a beard, Ranma hated the damn things, they were itchy and uncomfortable in the extreme, which was possibly a holdout from his first lifetime. "I have had neutral and bad experiences with septons before. The High Septon is as corrupt as they come, and I doubt he believes in anything more than money. Yet on the other hand while I didn't particularly like the woman, Septa Mordane at least believed and followed the tenants of her Faith. At the moment I'm wondering where you fall on that scale. Are you an agent of the High Septon or are you equally corrupt but with your own agenda, one that puts you in Renly or Stannis' camp? Since the incest accusation can only help them, your questioning of Merry wasn't the best first impression either way."

"I am a septon of the Faith," said the Sparrow simply. "At present I am the only septon in this town or anywhere within walking distance and as such I have concerns, questions I need answers to share with both Fairmarket's flock and the rest of the Faithful."

"Septon Sparrow isn't tied to any lord or faction." Said Damon looking at the older man respectfully, his voice somewhat more firm and controlled than it had been. "He travels around, not just the Riverlands but everywhere I've heard. He goes to towns and villages that don't have their own septs and performs ceremonies, weddings and the like."

"I am a servant of the Faith." Said the older man humbly, bowing his head.

Ranma could tell from his attitude and tone that he really believed that, he wasn't trying to put on an air of false modesty, he honestly believed that. After moment of searching the man's face Ranma nodded. "If you wish to sit, sit septon, then ask your questions. So long as you do not share with anyone else my wife's presence or that of her little ones, we will answer them as best we may."

Daenerys nodded agreement, leaning back from where she had been leaning forward her hand still clasped with Ranma's. "Anything we can say to put the smallfolk's minds at ease on our intentions in the future is all to the good, though I will reiterate my husband's statement that your seeming interrogation of Princess Baratheon was ill-done."

The septon nodded, but remained standing. "The North is dominated by a heathen religion even if those who follow the old gods do not differ much from their sense of honor from those of the truth Faith, yet there are distinct differences there. The Targaryen family on the other hand has varied in its relationship with the Faith wildly since its arrival in Westeros. Worse, that family has almost always continued its abominable acts of incest! While you're actions here in Fairmarket have won you much respect, I must know what your intentions are towards the Faith. Will you replace the Faith of the Seven with that of the old gods, or something from Essos?"

"I'm not going to go around converting people by the sword if that's what you're asking." Ranma said, actually laughing at the very idea. "The old Gods religion isn't like that, we don't convert others to our faith, if you believe then that is enough. The old gods want willing believers, not those converted at sword point." Rickard and all the other Northerners nodded firmly.

On the other hand, I'm not even certain if the 'The Seven' really exist, Ranma mused. He wondered if the Faith of the Seven, the organization of the Faith, had replaced the actual faith of the Seven in people's minds so much that the actual god no longer had any power. If the majority of people were like those in King's Landing, simply acting as if they believed only when it suited them, performing the ceremonies and what-all but not really believing like a Northerner did in the old gods, then that might be case. Then there was the fact he hadn't yet seen any evidence of the Seven having power, as he had the old gods. He wasn't about to bring up that idea however.

For her part Daenerys smiled thinly, her words almost echoing Ranma's thoughts. "While I am nominally a follower of the Seven I was raised most of my life in Essos where to put it mildly religion is far more varied than here. I can think of at least fifteen or so religions off hand whose temples I've personally seen. I honestly don't think most people over there worship anything really save for the almighty coin, certainly no one I met was very religious regardless of the religion they followed. I would be willing to learn more about the Faith, I haven't been around a septon since I was... two? at the most. On the other hand, I have seen the strength and power of the old gods, I know they exist, and magic as well. I cannot say the same of the Seven as yet, and I know the Faith doesn't allow for magic to exist."

That shocked septon Sparrow. "Whatever you saw were merely parlor tricks or heathen witchcraft young lady." He said sternly, forgetting Daenerys rank for a moment. "The old gods are dead and gone, and magic no longer exist in this world, the Faith has seen to that."

"Say that to the men who died under the Shadow Warriors blades when they attacked our ship from Kings Landing under Stannis' orders!" Ranma growled. "Say that to the undead wights I've seen, say that to the spirit of the woods when you stand in front of a living heart tree! You would sing a different tune then." Around him the rest of the northerners all nodded firm agreement.

Again something in Ranma's eyes caused the oldman to pause and he backed away from that topic. "I see. As I have not seen such proof, I cannot say I would agree with you, but it is obvious that you do believe it, and so I will say no more about it. Your word that you will not make the faith of the Old Gods the religion of the realm removes one worry, though we do have other concerns since neither of you were raised in the Faith, regardless of your being anointed by the seven holy oils at birth Your highness." He said looking at Daenerys.

"And those concerns are?" Daenerys asked.

"Certain laws of the land were based off of the Faith's beliefs, will you change them? This is in fact a major sticking point, because word has reached my ears of a rumor that King Joffrey has changed the law to allow for the royal house to have multiple wives. And then in your own case of course there is the well-known incest of the Targaryen line that must be addressed."

The first part of what he said caught Myrcella's attention, and Daenerys responded quickly. Before Myrcella could even so much as twitch Daenerys' elbow smacked into the side of her head slightly, while the platinum haired woman turned slightly toward her, mouthing 'No'.

Myrcella sighed and shrugged philosophically, as if to say that she really didn't care about the whole marriage thing just the joining bit. But at Daenerys's stern glare she pouted. Exhaustion was making her much more honest than she would normally be about so many people.

Thankfully everyone else was staring at the septon in shock. "What?" Ranma exclaimed, "Why, that's so, so..."

"Blasphemous?" said septon Sparrow helpfully.

"I was going to say idiotic really." Ranma said shaking his head. "Of all the things he should be doing, he concerns himself about that?"

Myrcella yawned, shaking her head as everyone turned to look at her. "I'm sorry I've had a very long day." She said, apologizing before looking over at Ranma. "But I think you're overlooking something. My brother isn't the one in charge in Kings Landing, he's an incompetent you should know that."

"I do, but still, what, you think this was your mother's attempts to distract him or something?"

"No she dotes on him, but that idea would never have occurred to her, though if it was indeed made into law without her knowledge she will run with it." Myrcella replied bluntly. "This was probably Joffrey all the way, but could also become a political move. This way his hand in marriage can be used as a tool multiple times. But I bet he isn't thinking that way, or not really. Joffrey has never been one to give up anything that he really wanted, and this will allow him to both appease mother and get what he really wants: Sansa."

All the Riverlanders and even Septon Sparrow, for all his self-control, quailed as a growl went around the room. "Never!" snarled Ranma his hand crushing the side of the sofa unconsciously in his free hand. "That little shit will never touch my sister, no matter what else happens!"

Around him his two siblings and the rest of the wolfsworn all nodded while the three massive direwolves, picking up on their bonded's moods growled deep in their throats, causing the septon to shudder slightly, wondering how the Starks controlled the massive beasts but deciding not to address it right now. "So you will not do something of that nature?" he asked.

"No!" said Ranma shaking his head emphatically, the word coming out through clenched teeth.

"As for the incest that is so much on your mind septon I can promise you that that will not occur as well." Daenerys said smoothly taking over from Ranma as he looked ready to tear into someone at the very idea that Joffrey still had designs on Sansa. "To put it bluntly, I think that was a mistake all along, and one that I will not continue. I would even be willing to put that into law to appease the Faith if needed, as well as a promise to put into law the idea of freedom of religion, while also repealing that bit of idiocy."

Septon Sparrow stared into the Targaryen girl's purple eyes then slowly nodded. "I will hold you to that as will the Faithful Your Highness." Despite his almost challenging tone however septon Sparrow was cautiously pleased with how this interview had gone. Yes, he wasn't coming away with what he had hoped to come away with, he had failed to talk either of the would-be royals into converting, but placing freedom of belief in the laws of the land was an excellent idea, along with outlawing incest even in the royal family.

"Do you have any other questions or horses to drop on us?" Ranma asked sarcastically crossing his arms and staring at the older man.

"Not a present, though I will ask you what your intentions toward the lands of your enemies are, and more importantly those who work them. Far too often the smallfolk pay for the wars of their nobles."

"Not in this war, not on our side of things at any rate." Ranma said shaking his head, then went on to explain his policy of what they would do with prisoners.

Any smallfolk levy captured would have to work a year on various royal projects before being allowed to return home with room and board paid for throughout that year by the crown, or could go to the Wall and join the Night's Watch. Armsmen, Knights sworn to Houses that fought against Ranma and Daenerys would be forced to work on such projects for five years. Before being offered that choice any enemy that was captured or surrendered would have to first be cleared of further wrongdoing against the men and women of the Riverlands, such as rape, theft or murder of a noncombatant.

Those lords that followed House Lannister unwillingly or under coercion could be allowed to return to their lands after the war was over after paying reparations but they would never be allowed to have more than fifty armsmen to their name after the war. The Westerlands lords would face paying similar restitutions only somewhat less so since they were following their oaths to their Lord Paramount and couldn't be blamed for that.

Any lord from the Riverlands like Lord Bracken or Vypren who joined the Lannisters willingly would have their houses removed from the nobility, their lands seized and themselves executed along with any heir that followed them willingly. Their womenfolk would be dealt with on a case by case basis.

On the other hand Ranma's forces weren't going to go out of their way to capture lords as most armies did for their ransom. Indeed though he wasn't going to mention it now of course, Ranma was going to instigate in-battle assassination of lords in the near future. Since they were often officers as well, the chaos this would generate would make any battle much easier.

The Lannisters however, their fate would be decided after the war. Ranma chanced to look at Myrcella as he said that, though the younger girl did not catch it, having fallen asleep against the side of the sofa. Ranma turned his attention back to Septon Sparrow, smiling faintly. "Does that satisfy you?"

"And the actions of your own Army? What are the fates of those among your own men who prey upon the smallfolk?"

"Castration or death." Ranma said bluntly. "They know that too, I gave a speech about that soon after we started marching from Winterfell. No one's pushed me on it yet, thankfully."

Septon Sparrow actually smiled, his austere face seeming much kinder for a moment. "I could wish most knights felt that way, and most nobles too. I thank you my Lord, my Lady, you have answered all of my questions. With that I will take my leave."

The two royals nodded, dismissing the fellow and was about to turn to the others to say that they should break up for the night when the guard at the door who had just ushered the septon out poked his head back in. "Um, my lords, there's a man here who claims to be an Iron Bank representative. He, um, he wants to talk to you."

Ranma groaned leaning his head back. It had been a long day, and he really would like some sleep. He wasn't exhausted physically, but mentally and emotionally certainly. Towns and villages were not places for battle, and it would be a long time before he stopped remembering some of the sights he had seen today.

"I don't think most of us have anything to say to any Braavosi, let alone one from the Iron Bank." Said Arya, getting up swiftly. She had disliked the talk about the Faith, since she felt the Seven were rather ridiculous, but not nearly as irritating as money matters. She, Nymeria and the rest of the wolfsworn hurried out, not one of them very interested in such matters like that.

Motioning Dacey to wait for a moment, Daenerys gently shook Myrcella awake. The Mormont woman did so, then helped Myrcella to her feet and escorted her out of the room. Ser Barristan stayed, having remained silent throughout the discussion with the septon, moving over to lean against the wall along with Rickard and Lord Mallister.

Seconds later the guard showed in another man. He was an older man, small, and thin looking, with a bald head, and a calm deliberate manner even when simply walking into the room. He was dressed in simple yet well-made clothing, and a heavy Iron and gold torque hung from his neck down his chest. Though stamped from the same cloth he was not the Iron Bank representative that had spoken to Cersei and Joffrey weeks back. In this war-torn time the Iron Bank had seen fit to send several different representatives, along with their bodyguards, to search out the various claimants to the Iron Throne and sound them out on the payment of the debt the Iron Throne had accrued.

"Lord Stark." The man began with a faint nod of the head. "I am a representative of the Iron Bank of Braavos, I am here to ask what you will do in regards the massive debt the Iron Throne has accrued to us in the past few years if you win the throne. Lord Stark, your father, did a magnificent job in trying to offset that debt and set up a payment plan for the debt. We wish to know if you will continue his work if you win the throne and honor that lawful debt."

He smiled thinly. "Needless to say if you did agree to that, certain... aid at present can be yours." He was authorized to make that somewhat open-ended offer because Stark honor was well known to be as firm as granite, and because of the work Eddard had done as Hand before the start of open hostilities.

"No." Ranma said bluntly. "Why should we? It wasn't us who went into debt to you in the first place. We have no connection to either the queen or the former king who did so."

"But it was not the king or the queen who is in debt, it is the throne itself." The iron Bank representative riposted. "If you claim the Iron Throne, then the debt of the Iron Throne is yours."

Daenerys shook her head. "I am afraid Ser, that the Iron Throne is done. It was a magnificent symbol in its time of my family's strength and power, the unification of Westeros into one nation, but it has failed since. The throne is done, and any debt it holds as well. We are starting afresh, building on the old but not a part of it. As such, to talk of us owing money accrued by the Iron Throne is laughable."

"Such an action will set a bad precedent." said the Iron Bank representative, now in a much colder tone of voice. "The Iron Bank is due that money, and we will be paid it, one way or the other."

Ranma laughed. "Really? Would your bank really wish to stick its nose in the mire that is Westeros right now? You'd lose a lot more than you'd gain doing so. And you would be called on it after too. So is the Iron Bank willing to lose Westeros as a place where clients can be found entirely?"

Beside him Daenerys remained silent staring at the other man, wondering what the Iron Bank would do. She knew the Iron Bank was actually much more powerful than any simple bank could be. In many ways it was more powerful than the city it was based in, and it had tendrils everywhere. But I'm not going to bend over backwards to please them either, there is no lawful way the debt Robert Baratheon built up could ever be applied to Ranma or I.

"The Iron Bank will have its due, and will take any action it needs to do so." The man replied grimly. He knew that the bank needed to make certain that people couldn't think they could renege on their debts like that, even if doing so cost more than the debt itself. And he knew that the bank had some connections elsewhere, connections that could give them a force that would be able to survive here in Westeros.

"That's nice." Ranma shrugged. "Then I suggest you talk to the other would-be kings, you won't get any help from us."

"That was a little more blunt than I would have been, Ranma." Daenerys said later that evening as she and Ranma cuddled in bed. She arched her back luxuriating as Ranma ran his hands down her naked back. Neither of them was in the mood to make love after the bloody day's events, but that hadn't stopped them from cuddling for a time. "Yet it seemed to get the message across at least."

"You know the Iron Bank better than I do, Dae." Ranma replied, leaning his head back looking down into her violet eyes. "Are they really going to do anything? Or was that all a bluff?"

Daenerys shook her head, her hair moving almost sensually against Ranma's bare chest. "They'll do something but I don't know what. I think that will depend upon if any of the other 'kings' agree to pay them off in time, which I just can't see unless one of them faces major military defeats and feels the Iron Bank can help them recover. If none of them do agree to pay that debt of theirs, I have no idea at that point."

"That was my thought as well. So, do they have a standing army or anything? And if they find a backer here, what forces could they send?"

"I am uncertain if they have a standing army, though they could certainly purchase enough mercenaries to make one, possibly a sizable one given time. Though most mercenaries would not be up to the standards of most of the Westeros armies, and they wouldn't be very disciplined either, unless they pay for the Golden Company itself. They wouldn't have any trouble transporting an army however, since the Iron Bank owns or has stocks in hundreds of ships. Still, any such move as that is at least half a year down the line."

"Assassins might be more of a threat however. Especially if they are turned down, I could see the Iron Bank buying the services of the Faceless Men to simply wipe out every claimant to the Iron Throne then move in with a puppet who would organize a payment plan."

Ranma frowned thinking about what he knew about the Faceless Men. They were assassins that could apparently go anywhere and slip past the best guards, experts with poison, knife and bow. There were even tales of them changing their appearances well beyond simple disguises too, the better to sneak in and out to claim their target for their Many-Faced-God. And given what all else seems to be happening in the world, I bet those tales have some truth to them these days, he thought grimly.

After a moment he nodded grimly. "They aren't the only ones who might go that route. I'm going to assign Ser Barristan to you permanently, I think he'll do a great job at leading your guards from now on. I certainly don't need a bodyguard, not with Fenris to sniff out any poisons. But from now on, you eat either with me and the direwolves or your dragons present to sniff out anything in your meals if you think your dragons can do that. And I think you should choose a few of the Northerners to guard your dragons when you aren't around them."

"Dragons are nearly un-killable with poisons, still best not to tempt fate and I think they will be able to sniff out dangers, I'm not certain. You realize though that in a couple of months they'll reach an age where they will attack anyone around them not of Targaryen blood?"

"At that point I'll assign Fenris, Nymeria or Ghost to be with them at all times when you can't be." Ranma said with a nod. "Though I haven't noticed that tendency in them yet."

"That's because I've been very careful to not allow any adults near them except those they have been introduced to and seemingly accept." Daenerys replied, her brow furrowed. "They like children for some reason, I get the impression it's simply because they don't smell as much as adults do and can be wheedled into giving them scratches. Well, Sunfyre seems to get along well enough with children Rhaegon on the other hand is much pickier. He is the one I'm most worried about lashing out if he's startled or finds himself around strangers."

"Something to keep in mind." Ranma said with a nod.

"What are our plans going forward?" Daenerys asked.

"I'd like to go see my grandfather, but we can't take the time for that now. We need to bring the army back together, but also need to keep attacking. We've got the momentum now, but the Lannisters have too much defense in depth for us to keep it for long enough to finish them off, unless... Well, I have a plan, or at least the outline of one. All talk to Jon and the others about it in the morning. But we also need to bring the Riverlands houses east of the Green Fork to our side, which means sending you to talk to them. How long do you think it might take you to convince them to stop sitting on the defense and join us?"

Daenerys frowned, almost thinking for a moment that Ranma was simply sending her away but she realized after a moment he had a point. Some of those houses after all had proven more loyal to her house than to their Lord Paramount, so sending her to talk to them would be an excellent step in the right direction. "All right, I can understand that need. I think it should take me... well once I get there two weeks at most to bring them all to our side? But you're not going to tell me anything else just yet?"

"Not yet." Ranma said with a sigh. "I need to go over the map first make certain most of its doable, and then..." he shrugged. "The tactics are workable, it's the overall strategy that's the question." He smirked then. "I'll give you a pair of hints though: First, there's an old saying, 'all war is deception'. And the next clue is, 'strategic offense, tactical defense.'"

Daenerys looked at him, her mind almost visibly clicking along behind her violet eyes. Eventually she nodded. "You're going to seemingly give Tywin what he wants, then take it away? Or perhaps dangle bait in front of him then when he tries to grab it hammer him with something he doesn't see coming, to turn one of his strategic assets against him?"

Ranma smiled, hugging her, one hand gently cupping her bare rump. "Yep, that's pretty much it. Lord Lannister thinks his defensive position is unassailable and that his numbers give him a tremendous advantage. We'll see if we can't turn them into weaknesses."

OOOOOO

A disaster, Margaery thought to herself as she marched into Highgarden's meeting hall, that is what we're dealing with here. The raven-carried message that said Willas had been forced to retreat over the Golden River was one thing. He even sounded somewhat upbeat about it, though Margaery doubted he really was. Still Willas was obviously doing the best he could. But the disaster that had befallen the Shield Islands and the Arbor, that was something else entirely.

It had given her grandmother a heart attack, and it was only because of septa Nysterica being there that she was still alive at all. Her son-in-law Paxter's death and the worry about what about what might be happening on the Arbor to the rest of the Redwyne family, especially her daughter Mina, had broken through Olenna's normally solid as oak self-control. Even now Nysterica and Alerie, Margaery's mother, were seeing to her, leaving Margaery to act as the sole Tyrell in Highgarden, for now at least.

Margaery however was more worried about the Mander and what the Ironborn could do if they began to raid up it. The Shield Islands had so long been the staunch shield they were supposed to be for the Mander that much of the defenses along it had been allowed to fade or fall apart. Ignoring the two men across the meeting hall's table for a moment, she stared down at the map. Only after staring at it for several moments did Margaery look over at the two most senior commanders left in High Garden. "We face a crisis Sers, and I would like to hear some options on how best to mitigate it."

"Reinforce the city defenses as much as we can my lady." The older of the two said, with a shrug. Igon Vyrwel was captain of the guard of the castle of Highgarden, and though not very experienced in warfare, knew the defenses of the castle and its capabilities like the back of his hand.

"I am afraid Ser Igon's right. We don't have enough man power on hand to do more than that, your majesty. Indeed, if we are attacked we might have to pull back from the outer wall entirely and defend only the inner one." Despite her not having married Renly her great-uncle Garth, who served as the seneschal of the castle, was always punctilious about using that royal address for her, no doubt something her father had insisted on.

"But we cannot sit on the defensive either, Sers! The Mander would allow an Ironborn raiding fleet to sail right up to us and besiege the castle." As a castle and a city, Highgarden was susceptible to sieges of that nature just like most other cities. The city resided between the outer and inner walls, with the inner walls defending the castle of House Tyrell. "What is worse Sers, is that sitting on the defensive here will allow the Ironborn to raid along the Mander south of here with impunity!"

After a moment's thought, Igon shrugged. "We could fortify castle Oldflowers, it's right on the river much like Highgarden. And as a Noble House they should have retained at least two hundred or more men at their castle. But that would leave Highgarden undefended."

Margaery took a moment to find that castle on the map then frowned. "So House Oldflowers is the best position? Are you sure? There are numerous villages and settlements further out along the river before that..."

"But no other defensible position, my lady." Igon said sorrowfully. "None of the towns and villages along the river before that have any kind of keep or even a holdfast. Even House Graves' keep is in a worse position, because they didn't leave any men behind. Lord Graves took his entire complement of armsmen, knights and even his two sons to war with Lord Tyrell. Apparently he is hoping to win glory for his house, enough to offset their troubles."

"Can Oldflowers be bypassed by ships on the river?" Margaery asked intently.

Igon and Garth looked at one another, both of them trying to remember what they could of House Oldflowers' seat. Neither could however, until Igon remembered that the master-at-arms of the keep, Ser Vortimer Crane, had been there in his youth. They sent for him, and when asked the question, Vortimer replied after only a moment's thought, his accent, a legacy of a youth spent at sea, very evident. "Yes milords, milady, Oldflowers ships c'd move past it, but if'n the castle's ballista and catapults'er still good the ships'd take a right pounding."

"But my lady, all this is supposition." Garth said after dismissing the man. "We can't send enough forces to Oldflowers to hold the castle in strength when we barely retain enough men here to defend even the inner wall."

"Too many men away at war." Said Margaery almost to herself then shook her head. "We sent too much our strength out too quickly to back Renly oh-so pretty Baratheon! Father damn him and damn us for being fools!"

Garth actually gulped a little at the vitriol in Margaery's voice, letting loose one of the gassy excretions that had earned him the name Garth the Gross from Margaery when she was younger. "I-in your father's defense my lady, no one could have anticipated an attack like this from the Iron Islands, at least not one that was so successful. The Shield Islands coming under attack yes, but the Arbor itself?! Our fleet outnumbered the Iron Fleet two to one!"

News of the battle for the Arbor's disastrous start had come with the first raven from Oldtown sent by Ser Desmond Redwyne, who was acting as admiral of the fleet for now. It was heartening news that so many ships have been able to retreat even if most of them weren't true war galleys. With them they would be able to lift enough men to retake the Arbor from the Ironborn, but that would take more men than Oldtown had on hand.

And it would take time, Margaery thought to herself, shaking her head. Will they concentrate on strengthening their position on the island, or reave deeper into the Mander from the Shield Islands? The Ironborn have always been too grasping, too eager to raid and plunder rather than hold to what they have already taken. I think...

"With the men still here we can protect Highgarden, but if we do that, we won't be able to stop them raiding anywhere they want along the Mander and I'm not certain we could defend the city from them anyway. We don't have enough trained men to man the walls against a full on assault, and I refuse to pull back to the inner wall and let the smallfolk who look to us to protect them defenseless!"

"Great-uncle, I want a proclamation calling for archers among the smallfolk of the city and elsewhere on our House's lands to go out within the hour. I want to start seeing archers coming forward today. They are to be paid as armsmen for the duration of this emergency, and anyone who comes forward is to be told that, and given the first week's wages at once."

House Tyrell's coffers would easily pay that, in fact they could pay for over 100,000 such wages without making too large a dent in their treasury, though Margaery doubted she would get more than two-thousand or so archers, but any of them who could prove that they could pull a bow in battle would be worth it. "I also want the city watch to start training to a higher degree. If push comes to shove, I want them to be able to take their own places along the wall."

"But that will be a final defense." Margaery went on. "All the armsmen and archers we have presently here in the castle are to move out by sun up tomorrow to reinforce castle Oldflowers."

"I respectfully disagree with that decision your majesty." Garth said, shaking his head almost patronizingly. "As Vortimer said, Oldflowers can be bypassed. If we send our forces there, they'll simply move on from it."

"Not if I go with them and if it is known and spread about that I did. In fact we'll bring along House Tyrell's flag and place it there in plain sight." Margaery said firmly. "I would think that the only daughter of Lord Tyrell would be a prize the Ironborn could never turn away from."

Both men looked at each other then fell over one another in their attempts to convince Margaery not to put herself in danger like that, but Margaery was resolute and rode over their concerns swiftly. "With my grandmother incapacitated I speak for my family here. Are you saying I don't?" She asked one eyebrow arching in a way that Ranma would have shivered to see, reminding him far too much of Nabiki at that moment.

Her two advisors however reacted just as much. Garth let loose a series of excretions, while the captain of the guard looked down, cowed.

"Besides, it won't be for long, only until Garlan can return with enough men to make both Oldflowers and Highgarden secure." Margaery thought for a moment, going through the knights who she knew that were still in residence in the house.

Thankfully Horas the Halfwit was not among them, nor was his brother, who in her opinion was a little worse than him. One in particular came to mind, a man that her brothers all respected for his steadfast loyalty and perseverance. "Send for Ser Willam Wythers, and assign him five other men. I have a mission for him."

With that she dismissed the two older men despite their continued protests, her frosty and haughty demeanor cowing them both despite her being a young woman possibly with the help of Olenna's vicious tongue lashing looming over their minds. After they left Margaery turned her attention to penning a letter for her brother.

It was simple enough: 'Garlan, a catastrophe has occurred. The Arbor and Shield Islands have all been taken by the Ironborn in a surprise attack. They somehow used crew fire-ships to destroy much of the fleet in their docks, we do not know how the Shield Islands were overcome. Enough ships survived so we might be able to win them back, but we need more men both along the Mander and in Oldtown with the fleet. I trust you to do the right thing. Your sister, Margaery.'

She could have mentioned that her grandmother was incapacitated by the news, but it was unnecessary. Garlan would know what to do. Margaery put that note to the side, then began to pen another message, which was certainly not to her brother. This one was much longer, filling up the piece of parchment from top to bottom in small lettering, but it would hopefully help both her and her family in the long run.

By the time she was done Ser Willam had been found, and both he and his men were ready to go. Willam came up to the meeting hall, and bowed formally. He was a little below middle-aged, of average size though his shoulders were wide, with light brown eyes and brown hair. "Milady, you have a mission for me?"

"Ser Willam." Margaery said looking up at him with a faint smile. "All three of my brothers agree that you are a good, dependable man, one of few things that all three agree on I can tell you. I have a mission for you, should you choose to volunteer for it."

"My lady does me too much credit." Willam said bowing his head slightly, not obsequiously, simply modestly.

"I hope not, because I'm going to put that dependability to the test. She said holding up one missive. "This is for my brother Garlan. We'll be sending a raven ahead, and that might reach him if he's got to Bitterbridge already, but if not, you might be able to find him faster than the raven can. I hope you do, because that will mean that his march back won't take as long."

William bowed. "I will find your brother milady, have no fear."

"That I don't have a fear about, it should be a relatively easy task. The next one however, is the one which I ask you to volunteer for. I want you to find Ranma Stark for me and deliver him this."

Margaery passed over the next message as William looked at her in shock. "Milady, the Starks have raised their banners...."

"Against the Lannister regime, not against House Tyrell. As far as I know he has no issues with our House, and if we can keep such from happening, we might be able to convince him to ally with us further down the line. I know for a fact he doesn't want to take the throne for himself, which will leave an opening there my father will accept."

Actually Margaery didn't know anything of the sort, Ranma might be willing to take the throne simply because he didn't trust any of the other claimants with it, and frankly at this point she couldn't blame him. Damn father and his eagerness, we should never have sent so much of our strength to war! Garlan at least and the second echelon should've remained here in Highgarden at least. The first echelon should've been more than enough force but no, father was so convinced of the bigger hammer idea just like Renly! Men!

Willam nodded thoughtfully, taking in her words, not knowing the vitriol of her thoughts. "I see, that makes sense Your Highness, but surely he's still up in the North."

"No he isn't." Margaery replied shaking her head. Olenna had received a message from one of their factors in Seagard telling them that the Northern army had been there, as well as the rumors of what had happened to the Twins. "He'll be somewhere in the Riverlands by this point."

"Are you sure you're grace? I don't doubt that the Stark boy is an exceptional warrior, but to move an army that quickly?" Willam wasn't scared of dying, but he knew the Riverlands was a war zone right now, and the Crownlands might well be heading in that same direction.

"Oh yes, Ranma is far more capable than most would give him credit for, and that extends to his ability to get the most out of his men. Just look for a victorious army celebrating a victory somewhere in the Riverlands. Trust me, that'll be him." Margaery said dryly.

Later that day Margaery was accosted by her mother as she continued to put Highgarden on a wartime footing. Alerie Tyrell was a tall, dignified woman with hair that had gone prematurely silver, the only sign of age anywhere on her face or body. Most of the time she ran the household and remained in the background, having no interest in war, politics or anything but the running of the castle and her family.

It was that second concern that made her come to see her daughter now. "I have heard a disturbing rumor Margaery, that you are going to travel with the armsmen we're sending to castle Oldflowers? Tell me this is just a rumor."

"I'm afraid it isn't mother." Margaery said, looking up from writing out the missive that would be carried into Tyrell lands. They were already getting archers from the city's smallfolk, a very good sign. "I need to go, to show the Ironborn a prize that they can't possibly ignore."

"But you'll be in danger!" Alerie said, almost losing her composure at the very idea of her daughter being that close to the raping, murderous Ironborn. "Please, just send your personal banner and a servant dressed as you. Will that not do the same thing?"

"It might then again it might not depending on if rumors spread to the Ironborn. Moreover the morale of our own men is a factor to consider. If I send a double it will appear as if this is all a forlorn hope, that I do not trust them enough to keep me safe." Margaery shrugged, then turned from her desk to take her mother's hand. "I understand your concern mother, and I don't like to distress you like this, but to be blunt these are distressing times. If I can do my part in keeping Highgarden safe, I need to do so."

Alerie looked at her daughter, or rather the young woman that had been her daughter, and sighed. "As headstrong as your father, I could wish you got more of my personality! Still, if you are set on this I will only wish you luck." She smirked suddenly. "And I will make certain not to mention your absence to mother, I doubt she could handle the strain at present."

Margaery sighed with relief at that, causing her mother to laugh, but there was an edge of seriousness in that. Olenna wasn't in the best of health now, she would pull through, but it remained in question what shape her body or mind would be in.

The next day she rode out on a horse at the head of the remaining armsmen of her family, marching proudly with her personal banner over her head. And in her bodice, Margaery had a small hold out dagger that Ranma had given her and taught her to use. One never knew, after all.

OOOOOO

The next day, Domic and Alayaya made themselves at home, routing out anyone who was sending out information as to what had happened in the town to anyone elsewhere. They didn't find many, only a single small scale merchant who was sending information to the Reach of all places, but was more than willing, with the damage to the town laying all around him, to leave off such. This, along with the fact the Lannister's acts against the smallfolk had cut them off from the local rumor mill, might allow Ranma to plan a bit of a surprise down the line for Tywin.

He had hoped that would be the case, hence why he and Daenerys hadn't used the banner Sansa had created yet, or the dragons except in cases where the enemy could be beaten in such a way as to keep news from spreading. The problem with armies at this level of technology was they were out of the information loop, only able to send easily not receive, unless they had partisans among the locals who had that ability.

Bracken and the other local lords Tywin had coerced or forced did not have that ability. While rumor might reach Tywin eventually about the dragons returning, he was a man who wouldn't believe such until his agents could back it up. This might allow Ranma and Daenerys an opportunity to use her dragons decisively on many different levels despite their still not being the strongest or most agile flyers.

While the two spymasters were at work Ranma and Myrcella went to see the prisoner that Jon had taken, Ser Addam Marbrand. Ranma hoped to use the man to plant some long term seeds as it were.

As the only noble prisoner (only prisoner really) they had taken, the Marbrand heir had a room all to himself in the keep though it didn't have any windows and the guards were specifically ordered not to talk in his entered first, one eyebrow quirked in amusement at the man who was lying back on his cot staring at the ceiling. "Addam Marbrand?"

The man looked up at him smirking. "That would be me, and you would be?"

"Ranma Stark. Ranma answered cocking his head slightly at the other man. "You met my brother Jon, he's the one that knocked you out if you've somehow forgotten. Head wounds are tricky like that."

"Oh I've had head wounds before, this was more of a love tap than many really. Jon was much quicker than I'd expected though." The man replied blithely, reminding Ranma strongly of Jaime for a moment despite not looking at all like the golden-haired Lannister. Though having much the same build as the Kingslayer, Addam had dark, shoulder-length copper colored hair and dark brown eyes.

Now those eyes hardened. "It is a mistake I will not make again."

"Hah, if you're looking for a rematch I suppose Jon would oblige you, though I doubt you'd fare any better against him a second time." Ranma said chuckling at the other man's bravado. "On a more serious note, I regret to inform you that I don't believe in playing that old ransom game."

"So what you're here to talk to me before sending me to the gallows?" Addam asked.

"In the North we don't use gallows." Ranma replied coldly, losing his jocular tone as he fingered Ice's hilt where it rode in its sheathe on his back. "The man who passes the sentence wields the sword."

"Ranma." said Myrcella from behind him pushing forward lightly to get him of the doorway. "Enough of that." After Ranma moved to one side and Myrcella moved in, looking at the Westerlands knight with her head cocked to one side. "I don't know if you remember me Ser Addam, but I believe we met once when I traveled with my mother and siblings to the Rock when I was... five or six I think? You and my uncle put on a show of swordsmanship for us all." She blushed faintly. "I'm sorry to say that's the only reason I remember you."

"You were quite young your highness," said the man, swiftly getting to his feet before bowing floridly. "It is good to see that these northern dogs have treated you appropriate to your station."

"I am not a prisoner Ser." Myrcella said, her own voice becoming cold for a moment before warming as she looked over at Ranma. "I am a guest of honor, and an ally of Ranma Stark." She then turned back to Addam, frowning as she took in his bandaged chest and the blood clotting his hair on one side. "Did someone actually look at that, or did they just toss some bandages on you before putting you in here?"

"Um, just bandaged me your highness, but I am not badly hurt, thank you for your concern, nothing cracked just some nasty bruises." Addam replied, then looked mystified as Merry rolled her eyes and turned to shouts some orders out the door.

Ranma laughed lightly. "Our Merry has become quite the healer since we left King's Landing. I'd just go with it if I were you."

While they waited for the supplies Merry had bellowed for, she turned back. "A lot has changed since then yes." She went on to describe to Addam what had occurred in King's Landing, which she, Daenerys and Ranma had all agreed she should share with the man if he was going to be used as a messenger to her grandfather. Ranma didn't really think anything would come of it quickly, but he was willing to muddy the waters.

"So I really had no choice but to come with the Northerners, and since Ranma returned, he has put me under his personal protection. And frankly with all I suspect I would be killed if I ever return to King's Landing." Myrcella finished, then turned back to the doorway, taking the medical supplies, some new bandages, and a small bottle of firemilk with a smile for the guard before turning back. "Now, tilt your head for me please."

Somewhat bemused Addam obeyed, wondering where this officious little thing had come from since all the rumors about her had said Myrcella had a gentle, shy disposition. He winced occasionally at her touch and the touch of the spirits she was using to disinfect his head wound, but not much.

"A princess needs no northern dogs protection or wouldn't if said northern dog knew who his master was." Addam said after a moment, looking over at Ranma and almost visibly deciding to ignore the princess's ministrations.

Ranma laughed. "If you're trying to get a rise out of me for some reason Ser Addam, you better try harder. Besides, what do you think would happen to you if you did anyway? I routinely beat Jon in our spars easily." Well not easily really, but routinely certainly.

"Can't fault a man for trying." Addam muttered, having thought he might have been able to make a break for the door if Ranma would try to move forward to attack him, or at least taint the northern whelp in the princess' eyes. It was obvious the girl liked him too much for their disparate positions. Still he didn't really want try to fight Ranma one on one anyway. The tale of Ranma literally ripping apart Gregor Clegane had spread to the Westerlands well before this. "Why are you here then, if not to gloat?"

"I said I wouldn't be asking for a ransom for you and I meant it. But that doesn't mean I'm not going to use you as a messenger. First though, can you tell me if anything new has been discovered about Tommy's death?"

Addam blinked at the sudden change of topic, then blinked again at the nickname of the dead prince. "No, certainly nothing about it had reached the Army before I led the assault force here. But, I, why, I mean, he's been dead for months now, and his murderer too." He flinched then as he looked over at where Merry had just pulled back from him, having bandaged the side of his head to her satisfaction. "My apologies your highness, of course it would be playing on your mind still, but I had thought that a cut and dried matter of the poisoner being found red-handed."

"Too red-handed," said Ranma and Myrcella as one. Ranma laughed lightly then, before motioning for Merry to talk. "I was always leery of that story, it seems too false to me. I talked to Tyene a few times, and she always struck me as rather intelligent and subtle of mind."

"For my part," Ranma interjected, "I thought that Tyene was too bright to let herself be caught with the poison still on her like that. If she even had a reason to attack Tommy. She was around Tommy dozens of times before that, why would she kill him?"

Addam scowled, looking at them both. "I don't know anything about what happened in King's Landing Stark, why are you asking me this?"

"I told you you're going to be used as a messenger. I want Lord Lannister to realize that there might be another player in this game, one that is willing to pit us all against one another. I tell you now, on my honor as a Stark that if Tommen was still alive, neither my father or I would ever have moved against the Queen. We both felt Tommy was beginning to show true Baratheon qualities, unlike Joffrey who has never shown anything of the sort. In that alone we agree with the propaganda the two Baratheon brothers are putting out, Joffrey is no Baratheon, though we have no idea why Stannis thinks he is a child of incest."

Addam glared at that slander, but said nothing and after a moment Ranma went on. "Tommen on the other hand, while not having any of the physical features of his father, was beginning to act a lot like him. And before his death, my father and Robert wished to name Tommen the heir, indeed they had decided on that a bare five days before Tommen was poisoned."

For a moment Addam was silent staring at Ranma. "The timing was that close? You swear that on your honor as a Stark?"

"Yes. Interesting coincidence isn't it?" Ranma said sarcastically.

"But if not the Martells, then who would want to pit the Lannisters and Starks against one another? The Tyrells?"

"Doubtful, maybe they could have schemed against Sansa and Joffrey's upcoming marriage, but they couldn't gain anything from Tommen's death. No, it was someone else within the court, someone who is willing to play that kind of underhanded game and had the resources to do it well."

"So either it really was the Martells and they were willing to sacrifice the Sand Snake, or the eunuch or the master of coin?"

"Someone who didn't want the Lions and the direwolves aligning that's all I know." Ranma replied with a shrug. "At the moment, we're still playing their game. I'm not going to stop, I won't say that I will, Joffrey isn't legitimate, nor worthy of the throne even if he was, but this war would never have broken out if Tommen was still alive."

"How can you stay with a man who..."

Merry shook her head before Addam could go on. "My brother is not a Baratheon, I've seen the proof of that. Besides, would you want a boy who doesn't know the difference between shooting water at a cat and ripping it's stomach apart to look at its babies on the throne?"

Addam gulped a little at the coldness in Myrcella's tone, startling from one of her lineage though her emerald eyes glared so much it reminded him starkly of her mother for a moment. "I, I see. I'll certainly pass your words on to Lord Lannister. What else do you want me to do to earn my freedom?"

"I want your word on your family's name that you will not raise your blade against the forces of House Stark, Tully or our allies for the remainder of this war."

"Just your forces?" Addam said with a smirk, recovering some of his attitude then laughed aloud as Ranma smirked back at him.

"It's a good offer my lord, especially since the Ironborn are on the move to judge from their predations into the Cape of Eagles. I have no doubt that a blade of your skill will be better used elsewhere." Ranma said with a laugh. "We'll let you go tomorrow morning, but remember what I said. I want Lord Lannister to think really hard about who benefited the most from Tommen's death, in the long and the short term."

With that, Ranma led Merry out of the room, leaving Addam to his thoughts. Once they were well away from the prisoner's room, Ranma put his arm around Merry's shoulders gently. "Sorry to bring up bad memories Merry, and sorry we couldn't come out and say that Joffrey was the one behind Tommy's death. But no one would believe it, not without the evidence staring 'em in the face."

Merry nodding nuzzling slightly into Ranma's side for a moment before the two of them were joined by Daenerys, who put her own arm around the younger girl from the other side. "I take it your bit of acting went over well?"

"I think so." Merry replied, smiling up at the only slightly taller Daenerys. "I hope it works, but..." Merry hoped that this bit of information might add up with all the other occurrences that Tywin had already heard from King's Landing and possibly convince her grandfather to back off from armed conflict with the Starks. After all, there were so many enemies elsewhere.

Ranma on the other hand knew there had already been too much blood spilled, not just in King's Landing but here in the Riverlands for that to happen. No, he wanted to just add a little more worry to Tywin, to make him spend just a bit more time worrying on what could be happening elsewhere. That kind of thing could add up over time. "We planted a seed at least. Now we just need to make certain he is sent on his way without hearing of you or your little ones, Daenerys."

The next day, while Ranma's men continued to aid in the rebuilding of the town and the reinforcement of its defenses, eight Stark men took Addam Marbrand out of his room. With Daenerys out with her little ones on the other side of the Blue Fork, they quickly left the keep and headed south for half a day. There they cut Addam loose and sent him on his way with three horses taken from the force that had attacked the town. He went on his way none the wiser about the Targaryen girl or her dragons but with his mind a-boil about other matters.

Later that same day, while Merry and her new bodyguard had returned to her work in the hospital, Ranma and Daenerys led a war council. Ser Grell and Ser Paege had arrived, racing ahead of their men by a good half a day, a move that might have had disastrous consequences if the Lannisters in the area hadn't been routed so badly. Still they were here now, and listened as Ranma described the bare bones of his plan to his senior commanders.

Newly arrived just in time for this conference, Desmond Grell stroked his beard thoughtfully. "Ambitious my lord, possibly too much, besides, what you're describing is pinpricks, not killing blows. Tywin's army might not be able to move as fast without supplies, but they'll still be able to live off the land. Worse, every successive attack will take more of your own strength away from the main battles."

"We don't need every part of the plan to work perfectly. Besides, I think Tywin is arrogant enough to set tactics over strategy, much like you Ser Desmond. Those pinpricks as you call them will cut his army off at the knees." Ranma replied.

Desmond scoffed, but seeing none of the others agreed with him didn't speak up again, admitting to himself he didn't really understand logistics either. Still it seemed farfetched to him.

"I like some of it nephew, but that bit about the second attack group splitting off, that might be too... well too good to be believed. Tywin's a cagy man, he might see through that, and besides, I don't know how much damage they'd be able to do on the other side of the Red Fork, not with the amount of men Tywin has and the smallfolk either serving him or having already fled." Rickard warned.

Jon was silent as was Daenerys both of them going over House Paege's map of the Riverlands.

But Jason Mallister shook his head and when he spoke his tone was impressed. "In politics, Tywin is cagy, as a general that is something very different. He didn't take part in Robert's Rebellion until the very end, his campaign against the Ironborn on Great Wyk didn't show any particular skill simply a high level of brutality, and the battles against the Houses he tore down when they challenged him in the Westerlands were simple affairs. Logistics and long term strategy didn't matter much if at all in them."

"You're talking a grand strategy, and moreover attacking him in such a way that none have done in the past. Like Desmond, we are all too used to thinking in terms of armies assaulting one another openly, of battles for position and head on clashes. This is an oblique approach, one I doubt he will see coming because, well it is so Un-Stark-like, forgive me for saying so."

"It's a crooked way, I'll give you that," Ser Paige murmured, his eyes on Ranma, something a little like bemusement in them, as if he wasn't certain what he was seeing. Rickard was looking at him too, lips quirked in a very odd grimace. "But are you certain you can pull off even enough to give us a slight advantage in the field?"

"With this strategy my lords we have four arrows in our quiver." Daenerys murmured, not looking up from. "If one works we will gain a strategic advantage and at least split Tywin's attention then with each successful arrow going home, the damage becomes worse. It's a magnificent strategy, and I think it will work at least enough for us to gut Tywin's forces."

"What forces were you thinking for my role in this grand strategy yours, brother?" Jon asked.

"House Grell's men and seven hundred 'll make most of those numbers up with men from mountain clans along with two hundred archers. No horse though, the way you're going they would slow you down." Ranma replied.

His brother nodded, smiling grimly. That would give him a thousand men give or take, local guides plus excellent irregular infantry, the type that wouldn't be good for a shield wall, but in the woods..."I was going to ask for the clansmen in any case. They'll be perfect for this."

Jon's orders were to head down the Tumblestone, a river that ran down from the mountains of the Pendric Hills to meet up with the Red Fork at Riverrun. It was wild, utterly unnavigable by boat thanks to constant rocks, shoals, and a very fast current, which was one reason why there were no villages or farms along it, that and the fact most of it ran through heavy hills and dales. But that kind of terrain would pose no problem to Northerners, particularly mountain clansmen like the Wulls and the Burleys.

His objective was to follow it west then cross it and take Wayfarer's Rest, shutting down the logistics train from the Westerlands to Tywin's army. "Close the River Road any way you can." Ranma reiterated. "I don't care how much supplies they're getting from the traitorous Brackens or anyone else, that will hurt them. And if the rest of the campaign goes off as it should, then it will loom even larger in the stomachs of Tywin's troops..."

After that the meeting went on to more particulars, but after the battles he had won so far, none of Ranma's Northern fellows were willing to argue overmuch. The Riverlanders would have, but Jason actually agreed with Ranma that his strategy would work, which took the bite out of the other's argument. That very night Jon and his forces set out, marching through the night with House Grell's newly arrived men guiding them, heading west towards the Hag's Mire. After that they would cut straight south to make for the Whispering Woods.

The next day, with Ranma unwilling to wait for House Paege's scouts to get back to them, the rest of the army set out at midday moving quickly toward Shawney castle, ready for anything. They were accompanied by a force of woodsmen and carpenters, who would be useful to create barges that would carry a force of men further down the river to the Ruby Ford to link up with the defenders there as well as, by this point, the Northern army.

OOOOOO

A few days after Ranma's force left Fairmarket, another commander was thinking about barges as well. Garlan cradled the message from his sister in one hand, thinking hard as he gazed at the map in his other hand. "We have another week's worth of marching before we reach Bitterbridge... I want two men to take four horses, ride ahead of the army, tell whoever Caswell left in charge to start constructing as many barges as he can. We'll use them to barge down the Mander back to Highgarden, further if we can safely though I know not how deep in the Mander the Ironborn will be willing to raid so quickly after taking the Shield Islands."

Around him some of the other lords and knights nodded grimly. The Florent boy, Alekyne looked scared but given his lack of experience even in tourneys Garlan wasn't surprised by that. Garlan himself wasn't very experienced, and he knew it, but, at least he'd squired under one of the best generals in the Reach, which made up for it. The others, especially the Redwyne twins, looked worried, angry and determined.

Not all of them seemed to understand the danger though. "My lord, we are due to join the assault on King's Landing!" Said Steffon Verner, a Noble House whose seat was east of Highgarden. Steffon was Mace's age, and was eager to join the battle with his friend.

"We took too much of our strength off the defenses." Gunthor Hightower replied, his dark eyes narrowed in thought. He was another young man of Garlan's age who was known more for being bookish than any martial air but, as Willas had been quick to point out to Garlan, that wasn't necessarily a bad thing. "We need to reclaim the Arbor and the Shield Islands quickly, who knows how much damage the Ironborn can do to both the towns and the people there if we don't? And their ships can go deeper into the Mander than any war galley. Highgarden itself might be in danger if we don't turn back."

"Yes my lord, but we can't take the full army, your father's orders were explicit." Lord Martyn Mullendore said. Ostensibly sworn to House Hightower, they were a minor Noble House who had chaffed under that oath many a time. Here and now however Martyn, another man of Mace's age, and his son Mark were both eager to prove their House's worth on the field of battle. That was why their House had fielded a little over four thousand men, half of whom were heavy cavalry.

And of course, cavalry is useless on ship-to-ship actions. Garlan mused, a thought very few Reach knights would have been able to understand, let alone acknowledge. I find it interesting though that he and lord Cuy both put forth nearly their entire strength, while Lord Hightower sent a bare two-thousand, five hundred or so, mixed infantry and cavalry. On the other hand, his infantry are all trained well above the rest of the 'infantry' the other houses provided...

Out loud Garlan said, "You are right of course my lords, so we will split our army once we reach Bitterbridge." Over the next hour, while the army continued to march the lords began to hammer out how the army would split as well as who would command the force continuing to King's Landing.

Garlan decided to put Lord Arthur Ambrose in command of that force. Arthur had seniority and he was a thoughtful, intelligent man who had served with Lord Randyll Tarly in the vanguard of the Reach forces during the Robert's Rebellion in the only battle which the Reach really won in that war. The composition of the two forces went easily save for Cuy, Mullendore, and surprisingly Florent insistence that they and their forces keep going.

Florent was surprising because Garlan thought Lord Florent would have given his son orders to avoid any battle that might pit them against Stannis, given his niece's marriage to Stannis. Mullendore and Cuy too should have turned back with the Hightower contingent, as their Houses were sworn to Hightower. But since Gunthor didn't say anything, Garlan decided to not make an issue of it in Mullendore's case, unlike Lord Cuy whose keep, Sunhouse, could be in danger from an attack from the ocean. However he wasn't able to convince the man of that danger.

He had at least 'convinced' Mullendore and Cuy to send their infantry back with him. Actually both of them were happy to foist their infantry off on Garlan, since neither saw the levies that made up their infantry force worth anything at all. Garlan might have thought the same if not for Lord Tarly's teaching, and while he wasn't very good at using them, he knew they would be of use in any ship battle.

In the end, Hightower, Blackbar, Costayne, Bulwer, and the levies from Cuy and Mullendore would join his own House's men in turning back. This would give him over 13,000 men in order to protect the Reach from the Ironborn and take back the Arbor and Shield Islands, a tall order possibly, but doable. The rest of the army, made up of the vast majority of the second echelon's heavy cavalry with only a smattering of infantry and a somewhat decent archer contingent, amounted to a little over 19,000.

"If we could, we should take the Mander as far as House Oldflowers, then march across to Brightwater Keep then take the Honeywine down to Oldtown. It will save us at least two months of marching." Gunthor Hightower murmured.

"Agreed, but I doubt we'll be able to get that far before we run into opposition on the Mander." Garlan replied grimly, then at last put his map back in his satchel before looking over to Ser Willam, who had kept up with the rest of the commanders as they rode along. "You have my thanks for delivering this so quickly Willam. Are you to ride back with us, or did my sister order you to ride on to inform father of what has occurred?"

"I have other tasks my lord yes," Willam said, mindful of lady Margaery's orders to not share his mission with Garlan. "But I will ride with you if I may to Bitterbridge."

Garlan nodded, turning away from Willam already as his mind grappled with the problems that would face him.

OOOOOO

Frowning thoughtfully Tywin put the message from his brother down on the small field table. "Interesting." he murmured. At a wave of his hand his nephew Daven reached out and picked it up. Reading it quickly Daven stood back, not saying anything allowing his uncle to gather his thoughts first, one of the many little things that Tywin approved of in the young man.

The older Lannister stared off into the distance, his fingers tapping on the hilt of gem and jewel encrusted sword at his side in a very slow staccato rhythm as he thought. If the Ironborn have attacked Lannisport, where else have they attacked? Where was Westeros weak before this war began? The Cape of Eagles, portions of the North, possibly Fair Isle, where else?

"My pack." He ordered without looking around. His servant hurried to obey, retrieving a large satchel pack. It was not like one a normal soldier would use, this one was made to hold scrolls and parchment and keep it watertight. "Find me the reports from our spies about the readiness of the Shield Islands, Greenstone, Tarth, and the Arbor."

A moment later he frowned thoughtfully several small pieces of parchment, each covered with small tight script spread out on the table in front of them. Greenstone and Tarth would be excellent targets, but it would take time to get to them and such an assault would not matter to me in the slightest save for it taking more of the Ironborn's strength away from their islands. The Arbor is a question, and the Shield Islands are prepared, the houses that hold them have always taken their duty seriously. Would Balon be willing to avoid them by goin further out to sea, could he overlook the challenge they represent?

After a moment Tywin decided that Balon hadn't become anymore intelligent or thoughtful, believing in his people's martial strength despite being taught otherwise. Especially since he'd decided an attack on Lannisport would be a good idea after the last war. He should've known that we would've been prepared for that. So he might well have attacked the Shield Islands rather than a softer target. Could he have taken them? Doubtful, but possible if he had enough strength on hand...

Now, if I was Balon, I would have concentrated my strength on the North, that would have suited me both because it is not nearly as defensible as elsewhere, and because it would fit Balon's personality. The Northmen were the spearhead when Robert took the castle of Pyke, as well as in charge of taking Harlaw.

He smiled thinly at that thought, amused that this latest disaster could be laid at the foot of Eddard's softness. During Balon's rebellion the lords present for the invasion of the Iron Islands had each been assigned an island to assault. Eddard had been assigned Harlaw, the Reach forces Blacktyde and Saltcliffe, the Stormlands Pyke and Orkmont, which slowed them down enough on Pyke for Eddard's forces to join the assault on the castle of the same name. Eddard had used a soft hand, letting his enemies surrender when he could, and trying to mitigate the damage to the island or its populace while being very thorough in the destruction of their ships and ship building capacity.

Tywin had been assigned the attack on Great Wyk and had brutalized the families there, nearly wiping out several before the others had been ordered to surrender due to events on Pyke. And he would've continued it afterwards if not for the King's order to leave off. Fools, they should have known the Ironborn only respect power and brutality. If you don't have your boot on their neck, they will always lash out, the Ironborn are no better than beasts really.

Still they did cause a lot of damage in Lannisport, and that must be answered. Moreover, if they've gone to war then their main strength will be elsewhere. There is an opportunity here, or... perhaps more than one.

"My Lord?"

Tywin looked up at the interruption, his cold emerald eyes locked on the unfortunate messenger who gulped but went on gamely. "My Lord, Lord Moreland has asked me to inform you that Ser Addam Marbrand has arrived, alone. He begs leave to speak to you."

For a moment Tywin continued to glare at the man, then nodded his head coolly. "Send for him."

A moment later Addam Marbrand was led into his tent, looking much the worse for wear those his injuries looked as if they were healing well. Tywin stared at him for a moment, while the younger man fidgeted under his gaze. Addam could all too easily remember the times when he was younger, and he and Jaime got into trouble and were stared at just like that.

"You look as if you had a bit of an adventure." Tywin said finally his voice cold yet somehow biting amused. "Did your assault on Fairmarket fail so miserably then?"

Addam licked suddenly dry lips but answered him. "Well my lord, it was going well but luck was against us. A force of Northerners arrived during the battle and turned the tide. I would assume that some of the stragglers are still trying to make their way back here though I don't know how many."

In fact that number was precisely zero. Roger and Hathon had been very thorough in their chase. Those few they hadn't found had gone to ground, and were no longer interested in fighting for anyone other than themselves.

"I see. Well, it was always a chance proposition at best given your force strength and the fact the Mallister force had arrived already. I had report from Lord Estren who was leading the infiltration of House Shawney's castle that he didn't even try seeing its defenses. But on the other hand, you can see Lolliston fell easily enough."

Considering the army was camped around the open and gutted keep of House Lolliston, that was rather a redundant statement. Normally Tywin would have punished the man, Lord Regenard Estren, severely for not following orders but he had given the man leeway in those orders to pull back if he felt the assault couldn't work.

"And you were released to us as a messenger." Tywin stated, his voice certain. From the fact his wounds had been seen to despite the younger man's general dishevelment that was the only conclusion he could reach. "What is Ranma Stark's message to me?"

"Your granddaughter the Princess Myrcella spoke to me personally. She is being well-treated, and seems to think that the Starks are her allies. They are treating her as a princess, and have stated that they do not believe Stannis's lies about..." Addam trailed off as his lord's eyes became noticeably colder. When those chips of emerald latched onto you like that, you could almost see your life flashing before your eyes, but it wasn't nearly as pleasant.

He went on hurriedly, relating the story that Myrcella had told him about events in King's Landing which had led to her willingly going with the Starks. The fact that Ranma had put Myrcella under his protection and the rather astonishing fact that she seemed to have continued her studies in healing, which Tywin hadn't even heard of because she personally saw to Addam's wounds. "Rather efficiently too my Lord, I've gone to better healers but more often far worse ones in the past."

"That is interesting, but it cannot be all you were left out to tell me. And no doubt you were personally forced to give your oath about something?"

"I have vowed not to raise my hand or blade against the Starks or their allies for the duration of this war. That is all my Lord, I am free to wield my blade against any other enemies of the Crown, just not them."

Tywin raised an eyebrow at that, rather amused though it didn't show on his face of course. Amusement never showed on Tywin's face, nor did he ever laugh, and he mistrusted those who did so in his presence. The Cape of Eagles has been attacked then, and Stark is wishful to leave me a weapon good enough to be used against the Ironborn. Addam may not be my most capable commander but he's decent enough and my army's best blade, which will matter rather more in a sea action than any skill in leading men on land. "I see, and what else?"

The younger man went on to describe Ranma's thoughts on Tommen's death, the reason behind it, and his oath that on his name that if Tommen had lived the Starks would not have rebelled against the crown as they had. And he reiterated that both Ranma and Myrcella stated unequivocally that the poisoner had hundreds of moments where she could've done something to Tommen before his death.

Unlike with the Shield Islands and the rest of the Ironborn's possible targets Tywin did not need to get out his notes from his spies in Kings Landing or the messages his daughter and grandmaster had sent him, he could remember them offhand. Of course they wouldn't have, they had influence over Tommen, if he lived he would have been easy for the Starks to influence, as I noted long before this. One part of his mind said. And whatever else, the poisoner must have suspected that Ranma at the very least would suspect her, so waited until he was out of the city. Nothing simpler.

Yes, but would I care which grandson was sitting on the throne so long as it was one of my blood? Another part of his mind said. Besides, by all the reports from the Pycelle and Cersei, before his death Tommen was showing a marked degree of intelligence and growth whereas Joffrey by all neutral accounts of the boy has only shown a certain base cunning. Which would have made the better king? And I already didn't believe that the Sand Snake was really behind it, if only because I know Doran would never be a party to it. The Dornish play the game of thrones subtly and with great ability, Tommen's death would have been far too blunt for them. That part of his mind went on.

"Who does Ranma believed to have truly been behind Tommen's murder then?" he asked aloud.

"He hinted at it either being the Master of Whisperers or Coin. The princess said that Baelish seemed to've been growing close to Joffrey before Tommen's death, though she didn't know how close he was."

Tywin slowly began to tap the hilt of his sword once more, not looking at Addam now rather staring off into the distance as he thought. Ranma's opinion matched his own when he heard of his grandson's murder, yet hearing it now brought that back to his mind and made him think about the long term ramifications of either of those men attempting to manipulate the crown through Joffrey.

He shook himself of those thoughts as well as numerous 'might have been 's' with difficulty. There is nothing I can do about anything in King's Landing from this far removed. He had to deal with the here and now. And here and now, Ranma Stark is my enemy and possibly the most dangerous one.

"Tell me... he said looking back at Addam. "How close are the young Stark and my granddaughter?"

"Very friendly, she seemed to trust him implicitly, and vice versa. The princess could've passed a message on to me at any point during that conversation when she was looking at my wounds, but she didn't."

"So if I sent a few men to try and sneak in and get her out of their camp you are afraid that would not work?"

"I believe that the princess would not willingly go, no. She is very frightened about King's Landing and returning there. She bluntly said that she would probably be killed if she returned."

The idea that Myrcella would think her mother and the crown couldn't protect her startled Tywin somewhat. But another part of his mind said it's already been proven that it can't, hasn't it?

"Very well," he said aloud, shaking those thoughts out of his head once more. Once this war was over he would have more than enough time to plumb the depths of the cesspool that was King's Landing, and burn all the shit in it away. "While interesting and informative, indeed it clears up several minor mysteries it does not help us right now. Do you intend to keep your word to Stark?"

Addam stiffened slightly. "Ser, I am a knight, and I gave my word of honor."

Tywin refrained from rolling his eyes with difficulty. Seven save me from honorable fools. Tywin thought that the given word was something that should only be given out sparingly, and even then if it had to be broken or manipulated to gain an advantage, that was simply part of the game. Addam unfortunately was one of those knights that took his vows seriously. Still, that doesn't mean he can't be of use. "Very well, leave me and see to yourself. I will be sending you orders in a few hours."

The man bowed and left and Tywin turned to look at his nephew. "What do you think of all that?"

This was a test, Daven realized. He wasn't an idiot, nor was he blind. He knew that his lord uncle had seemingly begun to favor him since this campaign began, and Daven had made certain to step up his game in return. But this was the first time Daven had been asked about his opinion on something even slightly political. So he took the time to think his answer through before speaking.

"I think it's another reason to watch Petyr and the eunuch closely, but that's nothing new. What is new is that one of them might have been willing to act in such a manner. Surely both of them must know that regardless of their scapegoat they will be viewed with suspicion irrespective of any proof. If they were really part of this, the gain must've been large enough for the danger to seem worth it."

"And you don't think open warfare between the Starks, the Baratheons, the Tyrell's and us is enough?" Tywin asked rhetorically.

If he didn't know how his uncle would react Daven would have replied that it would depend on whether or not the Queen could have been convinced to set aside her oldest in favor of her youngest as heir in return for evidence of her infidelity not coming out. If that had occurred, Stannis might well have faced the united front of the Starks and Lannisters, and so would, to use a smallfolk phrase Daven had heard recently 'be up shit creek without a paddle'.

That topic however would not be helpful at this time. Instead he said. "Neither of them are military men, or have any kind of power base where they could reasonably assume they'd get anything out of a war between us and the Starks regardless of which side wins. So they must be playing for something else. Some other goal that will allow them to wield more power from the small council."

Tywin nodded thoughtfully, having considered and discarded that idea already. The Master of Whisperers is not one to take chances, it's extremely doubtful that the man would've been involved with Tommen's death in any way. Petyr however is a possibility, especially if he could gain larger influence over the crown. I wish I had better communication with King's Landing, but with the army on the move I have too few ravens to waste on a message that would tell Pycelle and Serret nothing they don't already know, and it's doubtful any messenger I sent would ever arrive.

"Enough," he said aloud shaking his head. "We have enough to concentrate on here and now with the Northerners. We'll keep all this in mind for later when we move down to King's Landing to battle the Baratheon brothers, but we can't let ourselves become distracted."

"Yes my Lord," Daven said though he said it in such a way that Tywin cocked an eyebrow at him. The younger man shrugged. "I'm just worried about King's Landing my Lord, it's a decent defensible position especially if Lord Serret reached it. But even so with the numbers the Reach can bring to bear, and it's lack of internal supplies..." He shrugged uncomfortably. "It just seems as if we would be better served to head down there ourselves even if the Starks come after us later."

"If the Starks hadn't split their forces as they have I would be inclined to agree with you." Tywin replied honestly, something he would not have done in front of any non-family member in hearing range. "But they did, judging from the reports of the few spies we have on the eastern side of the Green Fork that have been able to send messages to us. Judging from the notes of one spy from House Wayn, the talks there aren't going well which means that more than a half of the Stark's army will have to backtrack all the way up to the Twins in order to get across the green fork in any substantial number."

For most of its course the Green Fork was too wild for any kind of barge to get across, only stabilizing somewhat near the Ruby Ford judging from the note from his spy in old Wayn's house it was doubtful that the defenders there would allow any army across even well away from their own lines, fearing that it would break the treaty they had clandestinely agreed to with Tywin.

"That defense is one I don't want to take on, but if the young pup is with another portion of his army coming out of Fairmarket as Ser Addam just confirmed, that might allow us to defeat them in detail. Why else did you think I let our own defenses behind? No, Stark made a strategic blunder there thinking he could reform his army later on while devoting time to first destroy the Freys and then meet with Lord Mallister. Send out our scouts, good trustworthy men. We need to know where his army is, I have no doubt he's already moved on from Fairmarket but where is the question. We need to bring him to battle and crush him then we can leave a holding force at Harrenhal and the position back at the ford and move down into the Crownlands."

Daven nodded as Tywin continued, outlining further orders.

Two hours later the Army was once more on the move, leaving behind the current forward position that they had established in the ruins of House Lolliston. It had been taken by subterfuge, bands of men dressed as smallfolk ostensibly fleeing from the path of the Lannister army infiltrating the keep and then attacking the defenders from the inside while the swiftest moving portions of the Lannister army arrived to attack the outside.

Not all of the army was going in the same direction. Half of House Marbrand's forces, along with a thousand more pulled from other houses marched back down to the defensive position on the other side of the Red Fork then onwards, heading back to the Westerlands, picking up a further thousand from the holding force left at the defense across the Kneeling Man's ford, which had initially been composed of the forces stationed in Stone Hedge before the main Westerlands army set off.

In total this gave Ser Addam around four thousand and five hundred men. They would march back to Lannisport, there to be placed under the command of Kevan Lannister for whatever task he wanted to put them to. Tywin had already sent a raven back with some suggestions, but as man on the spot Kevan would have final say, something Tywin would never have allowed to anyone but his brother.

This left nineteen thousand men directly under Tywin, who had recalled his portion of the forces besieging Raventree Hall weeks back, replacing them with further Riverlands forces. He knew that was a side show, if the Starks lost the Blackwoods would surrender and it kept Jonos Bracken and the other Riverlands lords busy. He didn't want anyone with his army who might feel they had divided loyalties or could gain their House something by switching sides as Lord Vypren had done in the crown's favor.

Lord Vypren and his men stayed with Tywin however. While Tywin had sent a thousand men up to reinforce castle Vypren, he had retained the lord because he and his scouts were excellent local guides. That force was under Ser Lymond Vikary, the head of a knightly house sworn to House Lannister.

The massive army moved northeast, heading for what Tywin felt was the most logical place for Ranma to head to, Castle Shawney.

OOOOOO

There was fire, fire taking the Red Keep. Stannis, grim, cold, haughty Stannis was standing there with a blade of flame in his hand and contempt in his eyes. Her son Joffrey, her darling boy, his body falling into a shadow that was so deep nothing inside could be seen. Myrcella's body, used and abused, being tossed onto the flames. Then the fires came for her...

Cersei shuddered awake as someone knocked on her door, gasping in relief as the images faded from her mind. "Who is it?" she barked out, using anger to cover her quaking voice.

One of the keep's maids on the other side of the door replied, her voice stuttering in fear. "Y-your highness, the small council is due to meet in half an hour. Y-you asked to be told?"

"Yes, well done. Send for my handmaidens to help me dress."

A moment later two young women entered, both Westerlander ladies who had served her for years. They moved to help her out of bed then quickly dressed her, working efficiently and expertly while Cersei simply stared off into the distance, her mind slowly coming out of her post-sleep stupor. Cersei had not been sleeping well lately to say the least.

Almost every night she had dreams like that, of fire and shadow, of rising floods, of simple elemental forces coming to claim her and her family, or of Stannis and Renly and the dragons killing them. Sometimes the dreams were intermixed with more positive images, of Myrcella standing with a wolf made of gold and blue flame and silver dragon against the shadow, or of her and Joffrey standing over the two Baratheon brother's bodies. But most of the time they were far nastier than that.

She knew what was behind these of course. Varys had confirmed that Stannis burned his enemies at the stake at times, and that he had given himself over to the worship of the R'hllor. His victories down in the Stormlands had even reached the news of the smallfolk, as was the news his army was marching out from Duskendale. He was moving slowly but he was coming with fire and shadow.

Even her brother was taking those rumors seriously now. In consultation with Varys who had travelled in Essos, and the grand maester, he had scoured the city for any Valyrian steel he could find, coming up with four knives and a single sword, which had been stored in the High Septon's own treasure vault. Jaime bought it off the Fat Man for a king's ransom, but it was worth it if they worked on the Shadow creatures as they were supposed to. Yet even Jaime knew that was scant comfort.

So it was no wonder that Cersei wasn't sleeping well. She had even attempted to cozen Joffrey, keeping him close. Her brave lion however didn't have any of her fears about the future, and complained about it being confining, but put up with it for her sake.

Despite that Cersei refused to relinquish all control to Lord Serret, and wanted to always be present when decisions were made even if these days she didn't really have much input into them. The time for politicking and the game of influence had subsided. Now it was the organization of the city and preparation for war that dominated the small council, areas where Cersei's knowledge was sorely lacking.

OOOOOO

Cersei was not the only one who was being summoned to the small council. Petyr too was being summoned, and he wearily got out of bed. Normally the small council would have met in the afternoons, but Rupert was one of those deplorable people who enjoyed getting up in the mornings and demanded that everyone around them get up as well.

Yet that was not the biggest change that had occurred since Lord Serret had arrived in the city. Lord Serret was now firmly in control of the small council and the city, his men and the backing of Cersei and Jaime as the King's Hand allowed him to run roughshod over every other faction in the court and the various smaller powers throughout the city. Petyr was pleased with some of that, since it had cut the knees out from under quite a few of the merchants and thus allowed him to expand his holdings in turn. However, his power on the small council had slipped badly.

Rupert was very blunt in stating that he did not trust Petyr or Varys and had stated their positions were not secure, indeed he seemed to nearly be waiting for an excuse to remove either of them. He also had them watched all the time. Of course Petyr could slip such watchers easily enough and he had no doubt that Varys could do the same but even so it had curtailed his activities.

And of course I still can't get out of the city! He thought to himself as he grabbed up a cup of mulled wine that one of his servants had prepared for him then splashed his face with warm water from the washing basin to further wake himself up. I need to get out of the city and head to the Vale!

The last message from Petyr's agents there had said that the Vale was slowly slipping into anarchy. With only Lysa at its head House Aryn wasn't strong enough to command the other noble houses of the Vale any longer, and word of the fall of the Three Sisters had reached both his ears here and the Vale proper, causing much consternation and anger. Despite only being nominally under the command of the Vale at the best of times it was still technically part of the Vale lands, and the Houses there resented the Northerners annexation of them, and their own inability to field a navy that could do something about it.

If I was there I could use that, Petyr thought angrily, pounding one hand on the porcelain washing basin as he stared at his reflection, absently noting the new wrinkles under his eyes. There's only so much I can do from here, even if my factors there are among my most loyal and capable. Lysa herself should've been a perfect pawn, but without him personally being there to give her orders, that wasn't possible. Instead she had descended into a paranoid sort of madness that saw enemies around every corner.

But Serret refused to even consider sending him, and the news that had reached them yesterday was an example of the reason why. It was also probably why the small counsel was being summoned, though what Petyr could offer to such a discussion he didn't know.

Enough, Petyr thought looking at himself still in the frame of the mirror. "Enough," he said aloud. "That plan is no longer viable, and I have to let it go at least for now. I need to regain some power in the city, and I need to make certain that I keep it."

I also need to begin to think of moving against Serret. It's obvious that he is merely waiting for an opportune moment to remove me, and he won't use the law or anything else, he'll simply order me killed. He's pragmatic like that. That thought was almost grudgingly respectful. Rupert Serret was not a politician, and refused to play that game or to care about who had what information or knew who had skeletons in their closet or anything of that nature. If he had to clean out the corruption of the city, he would start by mounting Varys and Petyr's heads over the Golden Gate.

But the only way I can offset his influence is by influencing Joffrey further. Petyr shuddered a little. Like most people who have no morals of their own, there were some things that still repulsed him. There should be pleasure in an enemy dying, but there should not be pleasure in the torture of random people. But that might be the only card I can play now! My power as master of the coin isn't enough now and my paid-for Houses aren't powerful enough to give me security from Serret, not if he can call on the crown... With a sigh, he pushed himself away from the wash basin.

The small counsel gathered in the queen's meeting hall, finding Lord Serret already sitting at the head of the table. He rose as Cersei entered with them, bowing his head to her. "Your Highness," he murmured. She nodded her head slightly to him, then sat down in the seat alongside his.

When they all sat Rupert began without preamble. "Jaime and I sent out scouts on two days journey for a man over the Blackwater, and a few of them reported back late last night. There is an army marching slowly towards the city. It's flying the Baratheon and Tyrell banners, so we can assume that we will be facing a siege within a week and a half. How are we set for food?"

Jaime smiled thinly from where he sat next to his sister wishing, not for the first time that they dared take some time just for themselves. But with his position in the city defense and commander of the Kingsguard and her own duties, plus her desire to have Joffrey near her as much as she could, they simply didn't have the time, not even for a quick one. "We're better than we were thanks to you sending out men to the nearest castles and demanding food from them the moment you arrived."

That wasn't the only addition to the defense that had occurred since Serret's arrival. More Crownlands forces had arrived to reinforce the city, all of them carrying their own supplies. Byrch, Buckwell, Cressey, Edgerton and Harte had all sent men, amounting to a little over three thousand, five hundred. This had given Lord Serret enough men to send them out into the countryside in search of foodstuffs and scouts to watch for the approach of Renly's army.

"We're still not in a very good position though, the city is simply a massive sieve for food. The pirate fleet's blockading of the port has only made worse a problem that began months ago when food stopped coming in from the Reach. The nearby Crownlands are barely able to feed a quarter of the city's population, and until we put one in place there was no centralized system of distribution. We lost control of at least half the foodstuffs coming into the city while we were still organizing the food depots." Petyr spoke up.

"The ration system is not making us many friends, true." said Varys nodding his head in agreement. "The smallfolk resent us both coming and going as it were. They resent the need for the ration system that they blame on the nobles, and they resent us for the ration system itself."

That had been one of Lord Serret's major changes since he had taken command of the small counsel. The Goldcloaks had moved through the city, taking command of the grain stores and the rest of the foodstuffs that had been built up in the city here and there. All of the foodstuffs thus found had been gathered in a few nodal points, those points under control of a few of the Noble Houses that had rallied to the crown's defense. The smallfolk were then forced to come to them for food, or fend for themselves. Needless to say, the lowest echelon, and indeed much of the middle class, did choose to fend for themselves, making the ubiquitous 'bowls of brown' the primary food for parts of the city and not just Fleabottom.

The depots were all commanded by Lord Edgerton, who had become one of the crown's staunchest supporters, bringing nearly a thousand men to defend the city. He had even become a friend of Joffrey's since his arrival because of shared interests, though only Petyr had an idea of what those were. Serret was aware that Joffrey seemed to be building his own faction among the men in King's Landing, but felt that, since those willing to follow him outnumbered them four to one, that it was simply good practice for him.

Edgerton and his house were doing a decent enough job keeping the smallfolk somewhat fed for now while also making certain the armymen and Goldcloaks got enough to keep their strength up. That would change once the city was truly under siege, but it was good to have the template in place already.

So the defenders would have enough food for a time, which was all Rupert cared about. "Take care of the defense of the city, then when the war is over throw enough gold at the city-folk and they'll love you again." He had said when he created the food depot plan.

Rupert and Jaime took command of the meeting then, passing between them suggestions and orders for the army and the disposition of the defenders, including Varys and Cersei only when they began to talk about the numbers the enemy might be fielding, if any of the merchants in the city had ties to the Tyrells or the other families from the Reach or Stormlands, and if any of them had connections to the much reduced court.

Serret ordered every gate but the Gate of the Gods shut, with stones and rubble piled in front of them. That still left the houses on the outside of the walls as defensive cover, but Cersei spoke up then, telling Rupert about how the Pyromancers had been hard at work well before the 'Stark's attempted treason', making a certain substance. Some of it had been sent North to the Wall, but more of it was still stored inside the city, available for use.

All the while Petyr watched, worried and at last... decided.

OOOOOO

With Cersei busy that afternoon helping Lord Serret write up the proclamations for the city to further organize it for the coming siege, Joffrey was for once able to have a midday meal without his mother there.

Petyr heard of this, and his decision having been made, acted on it with alacrity. "I note your highness that the queen is not with you this afternoon?" Petyr said, sitting across from Joffrey and pulling a plate of dried meat towards him.

"Now she isn't thankfully. I realize that she is worried about me, and she should be of course with coming troubles but I am a man grown." Joffrey said slightly pouting though there was something dark rather than childish about it. "And of course I'm not allowed to head out of the Red Keep at all, let alone out of the city. There's only so much I can do to occupy my time here in the Red Keep."

Not that Joffrey hadn't found some ways of enjoying himself even so. There were now several prisoners who would not leave the dungeons with all the body parts they went into them with, and he had butchered several dogs as well, imagining them to be those damned direwolves of the Starks. He had actually enjoyed that though surprisingly not as much as watching the heart tree in the godswood cut down on his orders, knowing how Ranma and the other northern heathens viewed the monstrous trees. It had actually one him some small praise from the High Septon and a few of the devout, though certain other acts had worked against that.

"I can understand that, especially with Lord Serret handling the duties of the small counsel so ably giving you even more time to your own devices. No doubt you are becoming bored?" Petyr asked blandly, looking around.

"Quite yes, I have taken to exercising as much as I can, yet that too is rather dull." Joffrey asked, now with his eyes locked on Petyr's face, sudden supposition flickering in them. "Do you know of any amusement that can be had?"

Petyr leaned forward slightly, smiling as he noticed that the only servants in sight were those answering to him, and that Joffrey's Kingsguard were the only ones within hearing. "Well it would depend on your ability to keep silent. I would not wish to get in trouble with the Queen Regent for putting you in danger."

"That will not be an issue." Joffrey replied, nodding his head slightly over to where his chosen guards were standing by the doorway. "So long as the entertainment is worth my time of course."

"I'm certain we can find something that will peak your interest." Petyr said, while the inside of his stomach began to crawl as Joffrey's eyes lit up with eagerness.

That very evening Joffrey slipped out of his chambers with his two Kingsguards behind him, making their way quickly to Petyr's rooms where they were met by Petyr himself and a few of his own men. "Come this way your highness, and I will show you a bit of a secret."

Petyr lead Joffrey and the others to the nearest passageway murmuring how he had found all the passages of the red keep, and how a few of them could even take one outside the red keep. "Of course, most of them can only be opened on the inside, or else they would be a deadly weakness in it a siege of the keep but they can be used to get you out into the city where any kind of pleasure you wish can be found, if you know where to look and how to hide..."

OOOOOO

Ranma's army was able to move far faster than the Westerlands forces, which was why that by the time Tywin's army was on the move Ranma and his army had already arrived at castle Shawney. They were spotted hours out, and outriders had gone forward to mark their passage so when the gate opened they were greeted by cheers from both the smallfolk and the armsmen around them.

Lord Shawney came out of his keep to greet Ranma and the others personally as they dismounted in the center of his castle. Not the entire army of course, the castle wasn't big enough to house that many men, even after Ranma had sent Jon and his forces off back at Fairmarket. Ranma, the wolfsworn and the other lords however could be housed in relative comfort. Daenerys joined them after making sure that the dragons were still hiding in the carts assigned to them, with Fenris and Nymeria watching them alongside Merry.

Silas Shawney was a swarthy man of average height and build yet seemed to have a nervous sort of energy to him, his hands and fingers constantly twitching. The stamp of Essos however was easy to see in his tan and a small tattoo on his bared upper arm showing the flag of the Windblown which he must've served with at some point. His grip was strong and his eyes calm when he nodded to Ranma. "Glad to see you my Lord, for many reasons." He looked over taking in the wolfsworn with a glance, nodding cordially to them all.

"It is good to meet you Lord Shawney, though I wish it could be under better circumstances." Ranma replied shaking the man's hand firmly. "Do you have any new information about the Lannisters and their movements?"

"I'm afraid not" Silas replied shrugging. "I pulled nearly all of my men into my castle after we retreated here, and I'd ordered my smallfolk to be ready for a similar move before I left for the ford in the first place. Still, come inside and you can tell me what our future plans are."

Daenerys joined the group as they were walking up the staircase to the dining hall and Lord Shawney looked at her quizzically before, when the door closed behind them, she pulled back her hood revealing her hair and eyes.

Silas' eyes widened and he bowed formally. "You must be Daenerys Stormborn. I heard about you while I was in Essos several years ago. The tales said you were growing into an amazing beauty, I am amazed that rumor was understating things for once." He glanced at Ranma and then across at Jason Mallister who he knew had suffered losses under the Mad King. "Though your presence here is astonishing to say the least."

Ranma chuckled, slapping the man on his shoulder. "You don't know the half of it." Then, with Hathan and Ser Barristan on guard outside the door, Ranma outlined what had been occurring, as well as his in Daenerys's position.

After he finished Shawney looked at him contemplatively. "I can't say I'm enthused about the return of the Targaryen dynasty my lords, but I won't jump to conclusions about you personally either Your Highness." he said almost unconsciously using the royal address. "However, my oaths are to lord Tully and I will Seven as my witness keep to them. You are his representative, and if something happens to Edmure you'd be Lord Tully's heir in any event so I will follow you."

"However, I can't give you that many men." He grimaced angrily. "My men and I were hammered hard in our retreat from the ford, and I'd like to retain a strong force here to defend my family and our smallfolk. May the Father strike down Vypren for his betrayal!"

"We'll be crushing that toad soon enough my Lord, in fact if we can swing it that'll be where we'll strike next." Ranma said grimly. "I don't really need that many men of yours. A hundred or more who know the lay of the land and are fit enough to travel quickly will be enough."

"Those I can give you and I'll go lead them personally. My castellan is one of my former subordinates from my time in Essos, he can keep the castle in my stead."

"Then, tell me what you know about Tywin's forces." Ranma said looking down at the map. "We'll see if it matches what we already know. Then tell me where the nearest place where we can put a barge in the Blue Fork."

It turned out that the Blue Fork actually dipped slightly nearby coming much closer to House Shawney's seat than Ranma had thought it did going by the map. Thus it was decided that the Army would split again there. Daenerys would take seven hundred men from the North and a thousand men from House Mallister as protection led by Lord Mallister and Smalljon plus the carpenters to the Blue Fork where they would create enough rafts to get the men down the river. She would then go across at the Ruby Ford, linking up with the rest of the army under Brynden and Greatjon, then begin discussion with the Houses there.

Jason would ostensibly be in charge of the mission, or at least would be the visible person giving out orders, while Daenerys would remain with her dragons keeping them under cover. The two of them had been flown to exhaustion every day on the march from Fairmarket so would hopefully be willing to remain undercover once they were within sight of the defensive bulwarks that the Riverlanders had thrown up on the Ruby Ford.

Who else was going with her however engendered some discussion.

"What do you mean you're not coming with us?" Daenerys asked slowly, looking at Myrcella in shock. "I need you along to watch over Rhaegon and Sunfyre when I can't for one reason or another, you and Fenris are the only people they'll listen to, and Fenris can't be spared."

"Nor can I, remember my main job isn't to help you with your little ones, I'm in charge of the healers, which will be needed with the rest of the army." Merry replied stoutly, staring back at the older girl, violet and emerald meeting.

"You're assumed job Merry, maester Martyn..." Daenerys paused, remembering her run-ins with the irascible healer, then shrugged. "Alright, he needs someone along to organize things and to make certain he doesn't insult his patients too badly, but that doesn't necessarily mean you."

"But no one else is as good at organizing and can also help him with the actual patients. The men he and I have chosen over the past few weeks can perform their tasks well, but that's not saying much alas."

Daenerys looked at her for a moment, frowning as she took in the set of Merry's shoulders, and the hard light in her eyes. It was clear that she wasn't going to budge on this. Daenerys leaned in slightly, despite the two of them being alone at present, Alayaya was off talking to the castellan for a moment. "This isn't because you don't want to leave Ranma, is it? Because if it is..."

"No!" Merry nearly shouted flushing red, then blushed even further while Daenerys continued to look at her and she went on somewhat self-deprecatingly, but firmly. "I mean, no, I believe that I can do more to help people by staying with the army. Not everything I do revolves around Ranma, I truly do love healing people, and you shouldn't need any help in that regard."

"I see. I could order you, you know I am the presumptive queen in these parts." Daenerys went on staring at the younger girl, wondering why that had even occurred to her, considering that she had known for months how seriously Myrcella took both her duties as a healer and her continued learning in that profession. A flash of jealousy perhaps?

"You could, but you won't." Myrcella replied, reaching forward and hugging the older girl, or was Daenerys now a young woman? When did that change over actually occur Merry idly wondered. Putting that thought aside for now she went on. "You're not like that, you know how much my duties mean to me and besides, you know I'll be safe enough. You, um, you also should know I won't do anything, well anything until you're okay with it."

Daenerys' arms went around Myrcella as well, and she sighed, kissing the other girl on her forehead, deciding to be honest with the other girl. "I know that in my heart, my head says different. My head is telling me to send you back to Winterfell, to keep you away from my husband. But my heart knows that's both not necessary and would be bad for the army's morale given your work."

She smirked suddenly, pulling back just slightly from their embrace. "Not to mention I'd miss your help with my little ones, and that both Ranma and I would miss your company. I trust you Merry, never fear." There was something in her eyes however that said 'don't make me regret this, or else you'll regret it quite quickly.'

Myrcella nodded, both hearing her words and seeing the message in those eyes, not taking offense. If anything, she loved Daenerys even more for her trust, and respected her more for the hidden warning. Rather reluctantly the two girls moved away from one another, then began to repack Merry's bag for her as Alayaya entered the room behind him.

Later that night Daenerys basked in her husband's embrace after their first bout of lovemaking of the night, there would, she was certain, be more. She loved this, absolutely loved this, feeling his chest move under her, his arms around her. Daenerys had seen those hands shatter stone, tear apart men in armor with an ease that should have been terrifying. Yet despite his massive strength Ranma was possibly the gentlest man she had ever even heard of, let alone met. Look at how he treated the ex-Frey children, or Sansa, or Merry, or Daenerys. And at moments like this, Ranma allowed his inner tenderness out with her and his possessiveness too.

She felt a low rumble make its way through her own body as she felt Ranma's hand trace down her back to grip her rear for a moment. That rumble turned into a moan as he began to knead her pliant rear then she laughed as a sudden thought struck her. Ranma's hand stopped its loving ministrations and his other hand gently raised her chin, turning her face up to him, his deep blue eyes laughing at her. "Sorry, did I find a ticklish part or something?"

"No, just a random thought. Besides, even if you had, you don't think I'd actually admit to that, do you?" Daenerys asked, her own violet eyes dancing, and her mouth twitching from a smile to a smirk.

Ranma cocked his head quizzically, and his wife, and by the old gods that felt good even thinking it in his head, laughed again. "Care to share Dae?"

"Oh, I was just thinking being queen and king would probably cut into moments like this, and then I thought that would have been a wonderful reason not to make a grab for the crown, just stay in the North with you like you would have if Tommen hadn't died and the war hadn't begun in King's Landing. Then I imagined my brother's face at the very idea of me using such an excuse and... well it was just funny." Daenerys shrugged. "You can't expect humor to make sense all the time can you?"

Ranma laughed then nuzzled into her hair, moving down the side of Daenerys' face then into her neck, breathing deeply. "Ya know what I think, I think I'm doing something wrong if you're thinking of your brother right now."

With that he began to nip and lick at the side of her neck, and Daenerys could feel herself responding. She moaned her hands tracing their way down his abs to his rising arousal, then lifted one of her legs over Ranma's body, moaning even louder as she felt his length slowly slide into her once more.

Later as Daenerys lay there nearly exhausted she shook her head, slightly irritated for once at Ranma's sheer endurance. Not once since they had married had she felt that she had actually tired him out in bed. It was immensely pleasurable to try, but embarrassing to fail at, striking at her pride as a woman.

Right now however even as Daenerys waved Ranma's hands away from her sensitive breasts pushing him lightly away with one weary thigh, she had something else on her mind. She reached above her, touching his face gently. "You will come back won't you?" For just a moment the queen in the making was utterly gone, taking with her the woman Daenerys was becoming.

All that was left was a young girl, who was, for the first time since they had married, watching her husband go marching off without her. This was vastly different from the time he had left her behind with the army at Moat Cailin as he faced the Freys, this time he would be away for longer, and was facing a much more dangerous opponent, one, moreover, that was one of the boogymen from her childhood. Admittedly, the Starks themselves had been another one, but the point remained.

Ranma smiled at his wife gently, tracing her face with one gentle finger. "I promise Dae. I'll come back, I promise. We both have our roles to play love, but trust me, whatever else happens, I'll come back to you."

Daenerys nodded, leaning up to kiss him gently on the lips before realizing, as their tongues caressed one another in her mouth that perhaps she wasn't totally exhausted just yet.

The next day Daenerys had to be roused by Merry letting her dragons into the bed she and Ranma had shared. Their morning breath woke her up faster than anything else could have. She groaned, pushing Sunfyre's snout away from her face for a moment, growling as she saw Merry behind them, smirking at her. What threats she uttered Daenerys didn't know, but they were enough to chase Merry off, then she came back with a loaf of fresh bread and some mulled wine and Ranma, who kissed Daenerys one last time, murmuring 'I love you Dae', against her lips, before moving off resolutely to prepare to leave.

Hours later Daenerys was still out of yet somewhat, yet despite this she kept on looking back at the castle and the army marching out heading in a different direction from her own force. Under her, her horse moved on with the rest of the column with no input from her.

"He'll be all right my lady." said Smalljon quietly from where he rode next to her on his horse.

"Was I being that obvious?" Daenerys asked wistfully, yawning fitfully every other word, though her wits thankfully had returned to normal. "I know I am not the only woman to watch her man march off to war, but still, I can't help myself."

"No fear there, I doubt anyone'd begrudge yer worries." Smalljon laughingly replied. Indeed, the obvious love between Ranma and Daenerys was a major morale boost to the army. "Ya shouldn't worry though, the gold humper's army ain't near big enough to kill Ranma. And it's always better ta concentrate on what you can do, rather than worry about what you can't control."

"Philosophy Smalljon? I didn't think you had that in you." Daenerys quipped, looking at him quizzically.

Smalljon laughed. "Oh, I have hidden depths!"

"I don't doubt that, I just thought they were empty." Daenerys replied wickedly and Smalljon guffawed. Nearby Jason rolled his eyes but smiled nonetheless, realizing that Smalljon had done that just to break the Queen from her maudlin thoughts. Alayaya joined in quickly, and between the two of them they were able to keep Daenerys' mind off of the danger Ranma and the rest of the army were marching towards.

OOOOOO

Ranma's army force-marched all day that first day, resting at night and then starting out late the next day before picking up the pace again. They had to keep moving, that was part of Ranma's plan: attract Tywin's attention on him, keep moving, don't get bogged down and brought to a decisive battle. Just like in his last life where he fought Ryoga, Herb or anyone stronger than him, taunt and move.

Of course, that doesn't mean we're not going to be striking back. Ranma thought to himself as he raced alongside Fenris at the head of the army, with Arya and Nymeria on his other side.

When Lord Shawney and the local guides said they were coming into Vypren land, the army rested for an entire day before marching on quickly, covering the remaining distance by marching through the day and night. This put them within striking distance of the castle, though most of the army was too exhausted to take advantage of it. However Ranma and the wolfsworn were not. While the rest of the army rested far enough away from the castle that the defenders didn't realize they were in danger, Ranma and the wolfsworn moved forward.

Fenris stalked through the night, his senses at their highest level. He was one with the surrounding land, even if this wasn't the forest of the North where he had been weaned, much more open, much more shrubby and small trees rather than the giants that ruled the northern climes. He paused suddenly, one ear pricking up at an odd silence in the cacophony of the forest at night.

Somewhere nearby there was no birdsong, and there hadn't been for quite some time. He moved lightly, circling the area of silent until he stopped sniffing the air slightly. Human, hiding under leaves from a tree, the one humans called oak, hadn't bathed recently. That last was most distinct, and Fenris' nose wrinkled at the smell.

He stalked forward, his movements easy and controlled, not a single sound or whisper of leaves betraying him. The man he was stalking was a veteran thief taker who Lord Vypren had placed in charge of scouting out around his castle after being told he wouldn't be in charge of its defense. The scouts scattered around the castle were supposed to give warning before going to ground. They would then wait until the army surrounded the castle and began to siege it before going to work on doing whatever they could to hamper the invading army.

That was the plan anyway. For this man in particular that plan stopped mattering when he heard a faint rustle in the grass behind him. He turned in his small hide under a covering of oak leaves, expecting to see some small animal or other. His eyes barely had time to widen before he died when Fenris ripped out his throat. The giant direwolf wrinkled its muzzle irritated at the taste. Humans always tasted foul for some reason unless they had bathed recently. Still, stalking like this was fun, even if the outcome was simply killing an enemy rather than feeding his stomach.

Elsewhere Ranma opened his eyes, having ridden Fenris' mind as it stalked through the woods. He stood up, nodding his head to the other wolfsworn around him save for Arya, who he placed on his back since she was too busy with Nymeria to really concentrate on her own body at present. With one raised hand he pointed with two fingers forward, and with Meera in the lead they made their way through the woods.

Eventually they stopped however, and Fenris appeared out of the woodlands around them, while Arya woke up on Ranma's back. She quickly pushed herself away then pointed to one side of the woodlands they were moving through silently, gesturing with five fingers twice to indicate that there were ten enemy scouts in one place, then gestured to her mouth before holding up four fingers, then moved her fingers back and forth, their movement barely visible in the starlight. Then she held up six fingers and motioned as if she was laying her head on her hand like it was a pillow.

Ranma nodded, then pointed at her and then away towards the sound indicating she and Meera should take the lead. Both of them grinned, and with Nymeria in the lead, moved off through the woods moving quietly. Ranma followed quickly with the rest bar Roger and Hathon who had never learned how to move quietly being cavalymen. The two of them waited several moments before following as quietly as they could move.

They soon came upon the small, very well hidden camp, which looked to be a meeting place for the scouts so that they could get some sleep while their fellows guarded them. There were indeed ten scouts there, six of them asleep curled up by a small fire pit. Four were on guard walking around the perimeter.

While Daryn created a distraction causing one guard to turn in that direction Dacey crept up on him, an arm swiftly going around his throat from behind. With one hand over his mouth and nose and the other arm clamped around his throat she locked her hold in, hanging on beat at her arm futilely, but that faded quickly. Arya and Nymeria took out another guard between them, while Meera took out the one Daryn had distracted, a small skinning knife stabbing into the side of his throat, as her hand went around his mouth and nose.

On the other side of the small camp Ranma had made his way up into the trees, moving from one branch to the other with as much ease and noise as a squirrel. Such a natural sound didn't register on the last guard, who kept on glaring out into the woodlands until he felt a hand grip him around the throat lifting him up into the air and into the trees for a moment. He tried to kick out, but Ranma block it from impacting both himself and the tree as his other arm went around the man's neck in a sleeper hold. A moment later the man was unconscious and Ranma gently dropped him back down to the ground.

I know I should kill him, but by the old gods, I've already got so much blood on my hands and I know that I'll multiply that by ten before this war is over. Killing a man like this, from ambush and when he had no chance against me whatever, no, I'm not willin' to do that. And I hope I never am. He was also unwilling to kill the sleepers. He and the others moved over and thumped them all over the head. Such a blow might cause brain damage, but they would still be alive after this night's business was done.

With that accomplished they tied the survivors to another and a tree then gagged them just in case before the two direwolves took off through the Woodlands again, searching for more scouts. They found a few, but they were all scattered around the castle and fell easily enough to the warging beasts while Meera led the rest of the Wolfsworn towards the castle proper.

It took another forty minutes of travel before they were near enough to see castle Vypren, which was more of a keep really, looking for the watchers they knew would be there. Lord Vypren's castle had a few farms abutting it on all sides, but they were empty, the families inside having moved into the protection of the keep. There were at least three dozen guards manning the wall over the keep's main gate and a further eight men patrolling the rest of the wall in two groups of four. There was also torchlight showing in the two towers on two corners of the keep's wall.

That's actually a good sign, Ranma thought. The watchers are using too many torches, they won't have much in the way of night vision thanks to that. With a gesture he sent Fenris and Nymeria forward to smell out the smallfolk houses between them and the wall. Then Meera led the wolfsworn in a full circuit of the castle, meeting up with the direwolves there, neither group having run into further trouble.

Fenris stalked forward, with Ranma riding his mind as closely as he could to stare up at the wall at the back of the keep, trying to see if there was any movement there that might have been hidden in the shadows the torches. Wolf eyes were of course much better than human eyes at night.

Finally Ranma nodded. Signaling 'wait here' to the others he raced forward, crossing the distance easily disappearing under the Umi-Sen-Ken for a moment. , Once close enough he leaped up grabbing onto the wall halfway up its three stories, then flipping himself further up to grab the edge of the wall. He waited there a moment hanging in midair by one hand as one of the patrolling groups moved around above him. But as he had suspected their torches had killed their ability to actually see out into the darkness, so unless the light hit Ranma directly their odds of actually seeing him were close to nil.

"I tell yas boyo, the Northerners aren't on their way." One voice said, slurred with drink despite being on guard. "They's couldn't even be arfway 'ere from Fairmarket if der army is as big as rumors tell it."

"Yeah, but all of those northern direwolves can run like the damn beasts they resemble." Another younger voice replied morosely, the voice of a constant worrier the sort who aged prematurely. "No telling where they'll show."

"Bah, They'll never want to face us here, we're too strong for them to take quick, and if they take too long, Lord Vypren and the royal army will be crawling right up their asses." A third voice stated dismissively. "Nah, they'll bypass us, count on it."

Tonight is not your lucky night boys. Ranma thought as he hung there, amused. Soon the guards on marching along the parapet moved on, and Ranma slowly, carefully and above all quietly began to pull himself up by his one hand. He waited a moment his other hand having come up and grabbed a hand hold, until the guards were well away along the wall, then flipped himself up and over the wall landing as lightly as he could before leaping down into the castle's courtyard.

His landing however caused a light hiss from the ground in front of his feet, and Ranma froze, staring down at two luminous eyes staring up at him. Ranma raised both hands to his mouth, as he fought back the urge to shriek and jump away. Nonetheless he couldn't stop himself from backing away so abruptly he smacked into the bottom of the wall. Luckily neither the hiss nor the thump of Ranma's back carried very far, but that didn't help Ranma's current predicament. Damnit, a whole new life on a whole new world and I'm still scared of ca...ca... furry demons from hell! I hope Fenris eats you slowly you damned fiend!

The cat was a large fat tabby, his body scarred in places, obviously a cat that had lived it's nine lives to the limits. Right now it was staring at the strange human that had nearly landed on him as he lay there, sleeping off a nice juicy rat he'd found in the guardhouse. It was rather amusing to see a human skitter back from him like that, most of the time all he got from male humans were kicks unless females were around. After a moment however he sniffed haughtily and flounced away, looking for another place to continue his interrupted post-dinner nap.

Behind the tabby, Ranma breathed a sigh of relief still holding his hands over his mouth thankfully else the noise might have been loud enough to give him away then ducked into the corner of the wall between the wall and one of the corner towers. The deeper darkness there covered him while the next patrol passed by over him.

While he waited, Ranma took in the castle's courtyard at a glance. There were no tents anywhere, which meant the men, however many there were, could be kept inside the main keep or the barracks building set next to it along the back wall.

I'd guess at most a thousand or so then, that's a lot for just the wolfsworn, but if we can take the walls and the towers, then we can bring in the rest of the army to help easily enough. Luckily there aren't any signs of people on watch in the keep's upper floors. Also thankfully the keep itself wasn't any taller than the walls, indeed the guard towers on the wall were the tallest portion of the castle.

After they passed, he moved to a small door set into the outer wall of the castle. It was probably a servant's entrance, many older keeps and castles had were several barrows full of stone ready to be dumped down to block it but that had obviously been planned as a last minute defense.

Feeling at the hinges however Ranma noticed that they were badly rusted. He carefully lifted up the wooden bar over the door then began to grease the hinges as well as the lock before gently opening the door. There was a faint squeak and Ranma stopped quickly, looking around then up at the wall. He waited a few more moments for the next group of guards to move away then oiled the hinges again.

After that Ranma waited until the next groups of sentries were coming back along the wall facing away from the small door before opening it quickly. The wolfsworn had already covered the distance one at a time, hiding nearby in the abandoned houses or flattening themselves against the outer wall. With Arya in the lead they entered moving through the doorway while Ranma held it open.

Using the gestures they had developed over the march to communicate at times like this Ranma assigned each of them to a different tower at the four corners, then assigned Dacey and Fenris to wait here, before moving over to the keep's door. Then he gestured to his lips with his fingers, indicating they needed to keep the battle as quiet as possible.

They all nodded, and moved off quickly and silently, using the bushes and trees, which were probably laden with fruit of various kinds, as cover along with any other patch of shadow. Even with the guards patrolling the walls destroying their own night vision with the torches, a classic mistake, they couldn't take chances.

A moment later they were all in position, with Ranma waiting for the next group of guards to pass his current position, the wall across from his former one. A moment later the two of them heard a bit of commotion from the main gatehouse, which Ranma had assigned to Arya, Fenris and Nymeria.

The guards making their rounds above him had only a moment to register it before he had jumped up onto the parapet among them. There was no time now to knock them out, Ranma had to take them down quickly and silently, and that was what he did. His hands flashed out, crushing the throats the two men not holding torches and throwing the bodies of two men over the outer wall, then he turned hands flashing out again.

Two more bodies fell, and Ranma caught their bodies with his shoulders before turning swiftly with them over his shoulders to grab the torches before they could clatter on the parapet. Slowly he lowered the bodies to the parapet, then doused the torches one after another.

The other patrol had entered one of the towers, which had been a signal for the attack to begin. That tower had been assigned to Dacey and Roger. Hathan and Meera was assigned a second, Daryn and Edd a third. Ranma himself rushed on toward the fourth, moving as fast as he could.

The men inside hadn't noticed any of the noises outside, busy getting drunk and playing dice. Still there were ten of them, and again Ranma had to strike ruthlessly lest they have time to raise the alarm. A moment after he entered, Ranma was the only man alive in the guard room. Sighing sadly he shook his head, then resolutely turned away, racing along the parapet to the next guard tower.

Daryn and Roger looked up at him. The guards in this tower had been much more awake, but it hadn't saved them, with the two of them coming up the staircase placing Roger between them and one door to that wall and Daryn able to rush to the door Ranma had just come through. Both men nodded at him, and Ranma leaped down and then off again, arriving at the next tower just as that attack went in, while the two of them ran off to the last tower.

Hathan and Meera came up the stairs moments before Ranma arrived to slam into two men who had been about to rush out to spread the alarm. Ice gutted one man while a kick caved in the other man's face, flinging him back into the room.

Inside Meera stabbed the last of the four men who had been facing them, while Hathan's long sword took the head off of a man who had tried to rush past them out onto the opposite wall from Ranma's entrance. He need wearily at Ranma shaking his head. "They nearly got away for a moment."

Ranma nodded grimly then looked over at Meera, who was shaking a little. This wasn't her first battle, but it was the first one where she was up close and personal with her enemies. "You alright Meera?"

"I'll get there, I suppose. Just, Just different this way you know." The young crannogwoman said, gesturing with her bloody trident for a moment. "Don't worry about me Ranma, my father told me about this, I'll be alright."

Ranma nodded, gripping her shoulder for a moment before moving on. By this point the other tower had fallen as well. Ranma gathered the wolfsworn together, then sent Arya and Nymeria off to the rest of the army, where the remaining mountain clansmen and Karstark men were ready for the call. They were the best at moving silently, the rest of the army would be coming after them. And while waiting, Ranma amused himself by sending Fenris around to see if he could find that damn tabby...

An hour later Rickard and the three hundred men arrived, moving quietly throw the side gate which had been opened once more. They and the wolfsworn entered the barracks, but there luck failed them. A group of guards inside had just woken up possibly to take their turn on watch and shouts of alarm quickly abounded. Yet with the Wolfsworn and the northern army already inside the barracks, and fully armored, the battle was never in doubt.

The defenders held out through the rest of the night despite Ranma trying to call on them to surrender but by the next morning castle Vypren was in Northern hands. They had lost men certainly, over two hundred dead in the vicious fighting in the barracks and the keep itself, but the Riverlands and Lannister men on the other side had died in far greater numbers, only a hundred and fifty surviving to surrender.

Worse however was that Ranma had been forced to execute his first troopers. He and Dacey had battled their way up to the top of the keep where the lord's quarters were, only to find men in Hornwood colors there before them, holding down the lady of the House and a girl who had to be her daughter, a young boy unconscious on the floor. Ranma ripped them off the women then tossed them so hard against the wall they nearly died from that. However they lived to be brought before the army the next day.

Ranma stared out at his army, bunched in so much they couldn't move easily in the courtyard of the castle, his eyes hard as he addressed them. "You all have heard me speak of the penalty for rape or murder. These two men thought that I wasn't serious, or that they would not be caught. They were wrong. They now stand accused of attempted rape, witnessed by myself and Dacey Mormont."

The two men looked over at Daryn and their fellows beseechingly but Daryn stared back, his own eyes dark with fury and they subsided, knowing now that no one would speak up on their behalf. Behind them Ranma raised Ice. "The sentence is death, to be carried out immediately." Ranma swung Ice twice, and two heads fell to the grass of the courtyard to a murmured susurration among the men, though none spoke up.

After that Ranma set fifty men of House Karstark to guard the still shaken lady Vypren and her two children sending them back to Castle Shawney while another seventy from Hornwood took the prisoners in shackles back to lady and her children, both younger than Arya, were to be treated well. While their House would be destroyed for its treachery in backing the invaders, they personally hadn't done anything wrong. Something would have to be done with them in the future, but not yet.

"So do we invest the Castle and wait for Lord Tywin to arrive?" asked Lord Shawney, scratching at his beard thoughtfully, smiling slightly at how Ranma had enforced his discipline so ruthlessly. After an example like that he doubted many men would try anything further for a long time.

"No. Set fire to take out the supports, burn it to the ground." Ranma replied. "Then we'll move on. This was only the first battle of this campaign, we can't afford to be bogged down."

OOOOOO

Tywin had anticipated Ranma would move to Shawney castle but the speed of Stark's army was much faster than he had anticipated, though his move to attack castle Vypren had startled Tywin, who felt he'd try to move down to the Ruby Ford and across to meet up with the rest of his his scouts, which he had out in their hundreds, had reported that castle Vypren was on fire he had to almost sit on Lord Vypren, who wanted to push ahead with his men, a bare nine hundred, but thankfully they were well back in the army's ranks as they marched.

"I sent a thousand men to secure your castle, yet this is what I hear happens. Who did you leave in command?" Tywin asked Vypren coldly.

"I, I left Ser Orme in charge, my lord. He, he is a knight from the Reach, and I, I thought..." Vypren stuttered, his bravado leaving him. He had raced forward to speak to Tywin the moment the news of his castle's destruction reached him. He had been all aflame to demand that he and his men be let to go ahead of the army but Tywin's face and voice had the effect of being dunked in ice.

"Evidently your belief in his competence was misplaced." Or could Stark have used that weapon he used against the Freys again? No, I can't assume that alas. If he could get into the castle, Ranma's own skills would have let them win the day, possibly even against those numbers against an inept commander. Still, we're close, and if the fool boy is offering me the chance to defeat his army in detail, then who am I to turn him down? Yet, better safe than sorry. "I want the scouts pushed out further, find us the Northern army, but their orders are to report back to us here while keeping in sight of them if possible."

Tywin motioned to his senior commanders. "Plumm, Brax, Lefford, our objective is to find and pin the Northern army then bring our full force down on it. This will not be easy, since the Northerners can seemingly move much faster than ours, but it needs to be done. You will each take a thousand men ahead of the main army on a different angle. If the scouts find them you are to move to engage them while calling in the rest of the army. Take five hundred archers each, use them to try to pin the northerners down but don't try to fight them alone, unless you can entice them to attack you in a position that gives you some chance of turning their numbers against them. Other than that, I'll leave it up to you how you go about doing it."

Daven had pulled out a map of the Riverlands, which was a worse copy than the one Ranma had been using from House Paegge, but still accurate enough. "Stark has to know he can't take us on with the numbers he's got, so what is he trying to do?"

"Good question," Tywin said, nodding his head sharply at the younger man. "We'll keep that in mind, and keep track of where the Northern Army tries to march. We will also keep between them and the Red Fork, just in case they are trying to merely pull us out of our defensive position and then attack us from behind somehow. The rest of their forces however are immaterial for now, they won't be allowed to cross the Ruby Ford, not with the Riverlanders over there desperate to stay neutral, and if they march down the Kingsroad, they'll run into the blocking forces we have in Harroway, Darry and the rest."

His nephew nodded, knowing that even if the northerners could move around those defenses, no general in his right mind would willingly leave forces like that in their rear. Tywin nodded in turn and went on. "For now, let's see if we can net the Wild Wolf then spear him to death before going after other game."

OOOOOO

Barely a week after Petyr had taken another step in his friendship with Joffrey, the combined armies of the Reach and the Stormlands came within sight of the capital walls. Despite his mother's protests, Joffrey rode out to the wall to view the approaching army. With Rupert there to watch over him the queen was forced to concede that it would be good for morale to see the King in attendance. As Joffrey watched, the army spread out slowly across the Southwest on the other side of the Blackwater, not actually coming close to the city yet. "They're not crossing?"

"I ordered the nearest bridges destroyed two days ago, your highness." Rupert Serret said smiling thinly. "This way they'll only be able to attack one side of the city, unless they want to devote enough time to build their own bridges. There was no food crossing them after all, so why not?"

Joffrey nodded officiously, as if he had been the one to come up with the idea and Rupert simply carried it out. "How long do you think?" he asked. "And if that is the case, should we try to meet them on the riverbank?"

"If we had near parity in numbers possibly." Rupert said diplomatically rolling his eyes when he knew the youngster couldn't see them. Joffrey had not impressed him at all, and that comment was part and parcel of why. There was also something all about the boy, something subtle but there nonetheless. Something about the eyes and those rumors he'd heard about how the little bastard treated animals bothered the hell out of him.

Joffrey sighed. "So nothing's going to happen today?" He said, his tone somewhere near a whine and a question. "I'd hoped that they at least would come within range of our trebuchets."

"Thankfully no, we've probably bought ourselves another week or so, and I don't doubt that Renly knows we've built trebuchets, it isn't hard to realize where the outer range of them would be and stay out of it. Frankly Your Highness, I'm hoping that Lord Stannis arrives soon, and the two of them battle it out weakening one another before either think of attacking us here."

Joffrey smiled, liking the idea of getting to of his enemies to fight and kill one another. "An excellent idea." He enthused, then sighed again turning away. "But one that we can't do anything to bring about. I'm going to head back to the Keep."

Rupert's prediction was proven correct as it did indeed take the combined army five days to build a makeshift bridge that was strong enough for them to send troops across. Soon after that however, they had invested two-thirds of the city's landward area, well out of siege range for now, but building their camps and preparing for battle to come, while teams of carpenters and levy forces were sent south to the kingswood.

Soon after that, a messenger was spotted coming towards the outer walls, coming straight down the Gold road. Below the white banner of parley flew his own, a white dolphin on aquamarine. Cersei actually had to think for a moment to remember the house that was from: Lowther, a knightly house sworn to the Tyrells whose lands were northeast of Highgarden. "In other words, someone who wouldn't be worth anything to ransom, but someone with connections all the same," she explained to Lord Serret, who had never made a study of the Reach houses.

The Lion Gate was open for him, and he was escorted through the city up to the Red Keep. Ser Lowther, the head of that house, was a young man of Renly's age, though he didn't run in the same social circles. Renly had chosen him because the youth had impressed Renly on his eye for detail, and because he was unassuming, plus, as Cersei had guessed, not important enough for anyone to try and capture. Renly had impressed upon all his commanders how dishonorable Joffrey was, as well as Cersei, so even the Stormlands lords with him, all of whom felt they could have done the job much better 'than this nobody', didn't make waves.

Ser Lowther knew why he had been chosen but he didn't let it bother him. Instead he did what he did best, notice things. He noticed both the numbers of the defenders and the glaring looks from the smallfolk, and paid particular attention to the fact that he only saw a few inns and taverns open, and none of the food carts that usually lined many of the main roads of King's Landing.

After being searched thoroughly for hidden weapons Ser Lowther was allowed into the King and Queen Regent's presence. Of course Lord Serret was there as well, standing beside the large, gaudy, and above all, padded, chair that sat at the foot of the Iron Throne which Joffrey used as his throne.

No matter what he tried, the Iron Throne was simply uncomfortable to sit on regardless of the number of pillows you try to place on it. So he had commissioned this work of art. His throne was made of oak, with gold paint and glass gems studding it here and there, the padding a vibrant Lannister red. Of course it was merely a stopgap, Joffrey planned to replace the Iron Throne as soon as the war was over and commission a throne made with real gold and gems, but his mother had convinced him weeks before Serret arrived they could not afford the expense at the moment.

Cersei said next to him a small, much less ostentatious chair, as befitted her status as Queen Regent. Along one wall waited the rest of the small council, and the Kingsguard were stationed both at the door and on either side of the royals. Jaime had made certain that his appointees were mixed equally with Joffrey's just to make certain nothing would happen. He was concerned with how fanatic Joffrey's chosen appointees were to his orders and Joffrey wasn't the most diplomatic of kings after all.

Ser Lowther took the throne room in at a glance, then bowed formally holding out his missive at after standing upright again, deliberately facing Cersei rather than Joffrey. "Your Highness, I am here under token of parlay to share with you King Renly the First's..."

Joffrey scowled angrily. "King Renly! He is no King, I am my father's heir! Your Renly is simply an usurping rebel!"

"Indeed," said the Cersei motioning to one of the Kingsguard to step forward to take the terms from the messenger. Ser Balon did so, passing it over to her quickly. "Even if we were speaking of merely becoming the regent for my son, Renly would not have been considered, his rebellion has nothing backing it in law or custom, so your words, Ser, have no basis in fact."

More than one man there inwardly chuckled at that. After all while some might say Robert's Baratheon's kingship was based on the vaguest of connections to the Targaryen line, it was really about might making right: he won his rebellion and the crown. Renly was simply attempting the same.

Cersei opened up this roll of parchment and began to read while the messenger replied to her words. "We believe otherwise, we believe that the fact that King Robert, forever hallowed be his name, named Renly as Lord of the Stormlands means that he would have wished Renly to be his heir. And Joffrey is illegitimate, one only has to look at him to know that."

"I should have you flayed alive for that!" Joffrey shouted, bounding out of his chair. Rupert's hand however clamped down his shoulder pushing him down while Jaime glared at Ser Blount and Ser Buckwell who had made to move forward at their King's bellow. Both of them backed away, taking their hands off their hilts.

Joffrey shrugged off Rupert's hand but remained sitting, glaring angrily at the messenger. "That is slander! Lord Stannis has always hated the fact that Robert had children, and hated the fact that my father loathed him! The Starks too thought that none of us were legitimate, but it was a power-play, nothing more! I am the lawful heir to Robert Baratheon that is indisputable, as is the fact that any who follow Renly or Stannis have broken their oaths to House Baratheon!"

"Indeed," Cersei said, looking up from the parchment to stare hard at Ser Lowther. "The evidence of the Maesters in Oldtown do not match with the Maesters here and in that of House Baratheon lands themselves have found. There have been numerous occasions where Baratheon looks did not breed true. We have proofs here, and can send for more from Storm's End."

Those proofs were forgeries, all maester Pycelle's work and Varys, and of extremely good quality. The Baratheon looks not breeding true was still rare, they could do nothing with the vast majority of the names the Maesters in Oldtown provided as proof of Cersei's infidelity, but there were a few names of children in marriages to other houses, and one or two in past Baratheon and Lannister marriages where they had been able to... modify the history to serve their ends. Varys had even been able to get copies out to a agent of his, who would pass it on to another in Storm's End where it would be placed in the historical tomes there.

"Thus, let us face facts, Ser Lowther. Lord Renly is simply ambitious, he grasped that bit of calumny from Stannis and from the Starks to give him a reason to rebel. Everything else is simply excuses to cover his act of treason. As for your lord's offer of terms, I reject them utterly." These are not terms you give to an equal, these are terms you give to a supplicant! Full capitulation, opening the city's gates immediately and offering my son and myself up as hostage to my father's good conduct! To freely admit to that spurious bit of propaganda, never!"

Cersei's voice had become strident for a moment, but she controlled herself with difficulty before going on. "However I have a counter offer. Not for Renly Baratheon, his actions are inexcusable and nothing can change that. No, my offer is to the Reach and House Tyrell. The Reach has not done my family any true harm as yet, and there is no need to do so now since, according to rumor, the alliance between House Tyrell and House Baratheon has not yet been made permanent."

She held up a hand to one of her handmaidens who was standing obediently along the back wall. The woman moved forward, placing a roll of parchment in Cersei's hand which she in turn handed to Ser Lowther after motioning the Kingsguard to let him come close. "Because of that I offer my son's, the King's, hand in marriage to Lady Margaery."

"I believe that will give Mace exactly what he wants, his little girl on a throne, and moreover I can guarantee the marriage will actually produce an heir which will not occur if she is forced to marry Renly. His preferences are known to me and to most of the royal court. Or is there some other reason why he has not married the girl already? She was certainly a beautiful young lady the last time I saw her here in King's Landing, why any young man should jump at the chance, irrespective of what her hand brings in terms of alliance."

Actually, Cersei was slightly understating things. Margaery had been a magnificent young lady when she was here, and if not for Robert Cersei would have quickly changed the marriage contract to her rather than Sansa in a heartbeat. Moreover, she knew there was a brain in that pretty little head, so above and beyond the strength of the house that it would bring into alliance with the Lannisters the marriage itself would probably be a good one.

She was not about to mention the fact Joffrey had passed a law allowing for the royal house to practice polygamy however. That bit of idiocy had infuriated her when she first found out about it, but he had passed it so quickly, with Varys and Petyr's help for some reason weeks before Serret had arrived, and it had passed with nary a whimper from the Faith, that she hadn't made an issue of it.

Since then she had found out why that was: Joffrey had promised that the law would only remain on the books for one generation, and that he would, upon winning the war against the Starks, use it to gain a foothold in the North, from which he would begin to convert the north to the Faith, by the sword if need be. That, the rumors about Renly's preferences, and the rumors quickly becoming fact about Stannis and his own faith, had won him and the throne the support of the High Septon and the Most Devout, which would be of immense value in the long term.

"If Mace agrees to my terms, all he need do is to retreat from this battlefield. Go home to the Reach, we understand that his realm is having issues of its own right now after all, and we would like our new ally to see to his own... House." She smiled thinly as did Varys and Petyr from where they stood along the wall.

Ser Lowther looked at her in puzzlement, not understanding that. The news of Willas and his campaign along the western front had not reached the army, nor had the news of the destruction of the Shield islands and the Arbor. But they had reached Varys, and he had shared them with the small council. He had not shared the arrival of Viserys or anything from Dorne however.

After a moment the man realized that Cersei wasn't going to say anything more and he bowed stiffly. "If that is your final word I will take my leave."

Joffrey nodded, having lost much of his anger in the face of his mother's cool control of the moment. "You may go, I hope that the next time we see one another that you have learned to curb your tongue when it comes to certain rumors, and that you bring good news from House Tyrell."

Ser Lowther bowed again stiffly then retreated from the throne room. The moment the door closed behind him, Rupert turned to Cersei. "That was well done your Majesty, though I wish you had talked to me about it before this. It'll give Mace something to think about, and the Reach forces outnumber the Stormlands two to one or more. But did you really think they would be able to break off?"

"Of course not." Cersei said waving one hand in the air. "It would be nice if the two armies out there were to separate, but I doubt they will. No, I wanted to give him something to think about, both him and his people."

She looked over at Varys who took his cue. "His Majesty is correct, with the issues that the Reach are facing on their own ground, their second echelon will not arrive here at full strength, if at all. The western front is in danger of being overwhelmed by what should have amounted to only a probing attack, the Shield Islands are gone as is the Arbor, and many of the lord's out there must worry about their homesteads now especially those fools who took nearly all their forces to war."

"Moreover, Renly has not exactly covered himself with glory since his little rebellion began. And I was speaking the truth, while for most men the Lady Margaery would be a prize almost beyond any, it is patently not so to Renly. Worse, Mace, or at least his mother Olenna, will realize that if Renly cannot perform in bed, that this will not be the last war of succession the realm faces. If there is not a clear line of descent, there would be room for others to argue the point especially with the precedent that has already been set here." Cersei concluded.

And before this with Robert's Rebellion, Varys thought to himself snorting internally at the sophistry of Cersei. Still, it was all to the good from his perspective. The more the Westeros houses fought one another, the more they weakened themselves before his true patron could take the field. He would have preferred things to not have come to open warfare, stability was what he really craved. But House Baratheon had never offered that, not with their throwing off all precedent by taking the throne from House Targaryen while doing all they could to butcher that line, and that didn't even consider the fact that the dragons had returned. With them the Targaryen Dynasty would be secure once more, regardless of which dragon took the throne.

"She is a beautiful young lady." Joffrey mused his eyes lighting up. And thanks to that law I passed I can have my cake and eat it too. I wonder if I should keep Ranma alive just long enough for him to watch as I take his sister, or make his head a wedding present to her? Those images caused an atavistic thrill to go through him, and he felt himself respond. Controlling himself with difficulty he vowed to head out to the city that evening and find something to use up some of his energy.

"What are the odds that Lord Tyrell will go for it though?" Rupert said looking at Cersei. "I've only met Mace once that after Roberts Rebellion, so I don't have a very good idea of his personality."

"Bluff, arrogant, childish, rather stupid." Cersei said succinctly. "That is his attitude my Lord. However, his stupidity will work against us here. He'll think he holds all the cards, simply because his army is the largest, and he will assume that a bird in the hand as it were is better than two in the field. No, I'm rather afraid that this was simply something to give him thought, their army will need to suffer severe casualties before he thinks about truly backing away from his current alliance with Renly."

OOOOOO

Renly received Ser Lowther in his command tent, a large affair that was three times the size of any of the common type used by the rest of the army, and was silk rather than cotton or wool, a gift from one of the more southern Reach houses. He, the Rainbow Guard, and his advisers were all there when Ser Lowther returned, drinking and laughing amused at how the Lannisters hadn't even tried to contest their crossing the river, a sure sign that they didn't have the numbers to beat off a real assault of the city.

Only Randyll was silent at that. Seeing that even his fellow older lords believed that was the case, he knew it would serve no purpose for him to naysay it now. He was mindful of the Olenna's 'suggestions' as well: "let the young fool get blooded, let him see what the real world is like, then if he falters, step in and take control." She had even given him a message to give to Mace upon that occasion.

While he didn't know it that message simply said "shut up and let the true warriors take over!" Short, simple and to the point, which Olenna had always felt was the best way to get through with her son's thick head.

When he heard that his terms had been rejected Renly shrugged philosophically. "I thought that was a long shot, but I had to try. It certainly would've made bringing the rest of the Lannister force to heel much more easily."

Unnoticed Randyll shook his head. If it were up to him, he would never have marched on King's Landing this quickly, not with the full army they had at least. No, he would have immediately assaulted the southwestern front of the Westerlands. With most of their forces in the Riverlands they would be open to an attacking force, and that would neatly remove the long term power base of the Lannisters. Of course besieging Casterly Rock would have been difficult, but putting the rest of the Westerlands to the torch wouldn't have been hard, and might have forced the other Westerlands Noble Houses to overthrow Tywin if he seemed to be reluctant to turn around and face Randyll in the open field.

Now I can only hope that the wolves hold the Lannister army in place at least. Given the size of the two forces, Randyll had decided that the Starks couldn't really defeat the Westerlanders, not completely. But they could hold them in place which would be just as good for the Reach.

"I could have wished that Cersei would see reason but it isn't as if we weren't prepared for a siege. Start building the siege weapons, Lord Cafferren, you are in charge of that. Lord Tyrell, I believe we should also spread the army out all around the city just in case. After that, we'll launch a few probing attacks using our light cavalry and archers before our siege weapons are ready. That way we'll be able to see if the defense has any weaknesses we can exploit, a commander on one wall or the other that isn't as quick to react as he should be or something of that nature." Renly went on.

Even in that he shows his lack of experience, Randyll thought darkly. Probing attacks on walls like that very rarely worked if the defense had enough men, archer assaults could work if you could keep them up long enough, but we don't even have wooden palisades for our own archers yet, while the parapets would provide the defenders cover of course.

Loras spoke up. "Wait a moment my liege. Ser Lowther said something interesting, that the city is already showing signs of a food shortage. I think the defenders might be weaker than we thought. So instead of doing probing attacks, let's simply spread the army out, lull them into a false sense of security for a few days, make the defenders think that we'll wait until our siege weapons are ready before attacking. Then we send in a night assault. Or better yet, send it in right away, this very night on a segment of the wall that we haven't encircled yet!"

"An excellent idea!" Renly enthused. "If we can get through the outer wall of the city, then we can push them back into the Red Keep and besiege them there! And the Red Keep isn't nearly as tough a nut to crack as the rest of the city."

Mace nodded, looking proudly at his son, ignoring the official document Ser Lowther had passed to him outside the tent. "I agree, an excellent idea my boy! And, once we break the walls defenses, the smallfolk of the city will no doubt rise up. If they are already feeling the pinch against the Lannisters, cutting off the defenders on the wall."

The idea of relying on smallfolk made Randyll sneer internally, but it sounded as if it made sense. Of course that suppose that the defenders are idiots, and Rupert Serret isn't an idiot, nor is Jaime Kingslayer. Randyll looked around noticing everyone's enthusiastic expressions. I'm not going to win this argument, let's see if something can be done with it. "I agree the idea of launching a night attack is a good one my lords, but I think we should add a little more to Ser Loras' most excellent suggestion..."

Over the next few days Renly's army spread out around the northern edge of the city, still staying well out of siege weapon range while they built their own from wood taken from the Kingswood. The main concentration of the army faced the Lion Gate but they sent tendrils out covering all of the landward sides of the city. A second heavy concentration was built on the other side of the Blackwater as well, while scouts were sent down every road leading into the city. For the most part over the next few days there was no rush to battle, no skirmish. The besiegers simply enclosed the city while waiting for their siege weapons to be finished.

After a few days of lulling the defenders into a false sense of security, Renly ordered the sneak attack Loras had thought up. Lord Tarly however had added quite a bit to the plan, though Renly and the other Lords had not listened all of his suggestions.

Shanty towns had sprung up all around the city pressed up against its walls, most of whom were worse than even Fleabottom save the areas closest to the main gates. These shanty towns were empty of people yet they remained standing around most of the city. Though Renly and the others could see where work had begun to tear them down starting from the Gate of the Gods and moving out from there.

Now two catapults that had been built in the kingswood came forward, taking up a position at the outside of their own range in relation to the wall on the other side of the Blackwater. There they began to fire at the walls. At the same time streams of infantry made their way forward along the river's edge into the Fishmarket. This included thousands of the army's archers, who took up cover everywhere they could in the houses and former market stalls to fire at the defenders on the wall who had already begun to fire at them.

Behind the walls, the massive trebuchets were painstakingly turned on their axis as watchers on the wall began to shout out aiming information about the attacking catapults. The man on the trebuchet had practice fired them before, and all of them from the watchers to the men turning the huge things around knew their jobs.

While that battle was going on the southern side of the city, Loras was leading a small elite force of around two thousand men from the portion of the army nearest the Iron Gate. They moved as quietly as they could, entering the shanty town there. Here it was even grubbier and shabbier in comparison to any of the others, since the road out of this gate was the least used, and the area was also where a lot of the trash from the city tended to accumulate thanks to the tide of the bay.

They moved this quietly as possible, and didn't follow any kind of set order or path as they moved forward, barely keeping inside of one another. That was how Loras found himself at the back of the unit when he had started for the front. He felt himself wondering idly if the inhabitants of the town had fled entirely, or simply fled into the city. If they fled into the city, that simply means more mouths for them to feed, which is all to the good. If they fled entirely, well at least they'll be out from underfoot.

Looking ahead, Loras saw one of his men waving him down, then pointing up at the wall. There looked to be some dozen men still patrolling this portion of the wall, visible because of the light of braziers set here and there along it. Though the men themselves were not near enough to said fires for it to ruin their night vision, and at least a few were attending to the business of watching their front rather than turning to watch the battle occurring towards the harbor. Loras went to ground, lying in the dirt and mud next to a shed of some sort, thanking the Seven he had left his cloak behind.

A moment later the men on the wall turned their attention away, joining their fellows to stare across the city over to where the battle was going on the other side. Getting the all clear signal from one of the men in the lead, Loras stood up dusting himself off before moving around the small hut. Moving circuitously through the shanty town towards the walls, Loras followed his men each of whom were carrying rope ladders, all of them that the army had built in the last days.

Moving around what might have been a very low class stable, Loras came to another one though this one was much better built than most, having some actual stone here and there, plus all the wooden slats actually seemed nailed together. It even had a window. How extravagant. Loras thought to himself, laughing internally. Though why anyone in this pestilential place would want a window is beyond me.

He idly looked inside, cocking his head quizzically as he noticed what looked like a very large container of some kind set directly in the center of the one room that made up the building. It was very large, much larger than any family would need to keep water in, and a family living in a hut like this they wouldn't be able to afford that much wine. The incongruity of it struck him as odd, and he frowned thoughtfully.

Up on the wall Lord Harte was the one in charge of this section. He was angry because he had hoped that the Reach and Stormlanders would attack here so he could use the little surprise that the Queen had come up with to add to the defense. Of course he understood Serret's orders, that such a thing should only be used at the most opportune moment to destroy the most of the enemy it could. But still, a show of force at the very beginning might force the attackers to not try any other physical attack for fear of what might happen.

"There it is again." one of his men muttered, turning back from where he had been looking toward the sounds of battle occurring elsewhere to stare back over the portion of the wall he was in fact supposed to guarding.

"What are you talking about?" barked Lord Harte. "And if I catch any of you turning away from your posts again I'll have you flogged."

Around him his fellows hastily turned back to stare out into the night as alertly as they could appear, leaving the unfortunate armsmen to his fate. "Um, mi-milord I thought I heard something down below, but, but I can't make it out."

Lord Harte looked over the wall as well staring intently into the darkness of the shanty town far below. With the number of buildings down there clustered together so tightly and with no fires down there to see by the odds of spotting anyone moving were almost nil.

However as he leaned against the parapet he heard something as well. "Couldn't be more Stranger- damned squatters could it?"

"Most of them fled when the Queen began to remove the hovels around the God's Gate. Smallfolk might be stupid, but they can see what's happening as well as any."

"Then we might have some attackers moving down there hmmm...." He smiled wickedly. "You know what boys, I think we so need some more light down there." He turned to a nearby archer. "You, see if you can find one of the jugs down there, and light it up."

The man looked shocked for a moment. "Bu-but my lord, that's only supposed to be used on command of the Hand."

Harte growled at the man angrily. "Obey me man, or else I'll have you tossed of the wall."

The archer gulped, but nodded and took out an arrow, fitting it to his string.

Below Loras was still closer to the Blackwater Bay than he was to the city's walls. He was moving slower now, trying to puzzle out the mystery of that jug, and why he had seen two more like it in the last few houses he'd passed. They were worrying him, and he was just about to double back and open one of them up to see what was inside when he saw a fire arrow streak out from the top of the wall, just one. W-What?

Suddenly he heard screaming nearby, and there was a whoosh of flame. He raced around the corner of the building he had been using as cover from the wall, and stopped staring in horror. Wildfire! Those jugs were full of wildfire!

The fire arrow had hit a small jug that had been set in a dark alleyway between two huts, where light couldn't reach even when the sun was high overhead. After all, the Queen didn't want her little surprise to go off early. The wildfire spread quickly, racing up the walls on either side the heat of it igniting two larger jars set inside those two buildings.

Soon a conflagration began, spreading everywhere all around the small shantytown, engulfing hundreds of Loras men, including him. But Loras was still well away from where the fire began, and he was wearing full plate armor. It had made moving quietly through the night difficult, but now it protected him from the heat of the fire for a little bit as he turned, racing away and towards the water of the bay. He was almost there when a splash of wildfire impacted his armor from the back and side, covering his back plate, shoulder and a portion of his helmet with the noxious substance. He screamed as the heat from the flame quickly began to penetrate his armor, searing his skin. "GAHHHH!"

Coming to the shore he swiftly pulled off his helmet and dove in, trying desperately to put out the fire. "EYAHHHHH!" It was only when he fully dunked himself in Blackwater Bay that the flames at last went out, but the searing heat from the steam from the water caused him to scream again as it burned him further. Even so, he was able to retain enough sense to push himself out of the water and stumbling north along the shore away from the city.

Thankfully the conflagration had been seen by the rest of the Army, and dozens of men race forward on horseback getting as close as they could to the flames to shout the names of various comrades who had been part of Loras' forces. Several of them saw Loras and raced forward as soon as they saw he wasn't covered in wildfire, pulling him further away then up onto a horse before they tied him there. Then they raced off, taking him straight to a healer.

Having heard about the disaster Renly and Mace raced through the army from their command post near the Lion Gate. It took them several hours to find the tent where Loras had been placed, by which time the healers were working on him desperately, having recognized him the moment he was brought in. One of them turned to the tent flap as Renly and Mace barreled through, a few of the Rainbow Guard following in Renly's wake.

He moved over to them speaking quietly. "My lords, Ser Loras is unconscious at present, we gave him something to keep him comatose while we work. His life is in no danger but..."

"I want to see him." Mace replied, growling the words. "I want to see my son!"

Renly nodded agreement and the healer sighed. "It's not a pretty sight my lords, burn wounds never are especially when they're brand-new, and especially when they are caused by wildfire." The healer spat to one side muttering about how all alchemists should be slaughtered and sent to the Stranger who no doubt would know his own.

"I want to see my son." Mace reiterated.

The healer sighed again but moved to one side allowing them further into the tent. Loras laid on a cot at the far end, along with a few other survivors. There hadn't been many. Caught in the close confines of the shanty town while the wildfire raged all around them they had no place to go. Only the ones on the outskirts in particular the ones nearest the water had survived a bare fifty out of the original two thousand.

Mace choked off a sob as he saw his son. The skin of one side of his face looked badly scalded. Despite not actually having been touched by the flames the sheer heat had done its deadly work. His shoulder too looked raw, as if it was a slab of meat rather than something belonging on a living human.

For his part Renly looked at his lover in shock and horror, shaking his head. "Whatever you need to heal him you will have, healer." he said, looking over at Mace. "Will you wish to stay with him, Lord Tyrell?"

The older man nodded jerkily, and turned to order one of his men to go fetch him a chair. Renly reached over gripping the older man's shoulder, not looking down at his lover again, the sight was just too sickening.

He quickly left the tent followed by his Rainbow Guard. They moved back through the camp towards his tent, his mind almost blank, sickened by what he had just seen. Suddenly this whole affair seemed far more deadly and real than he had previously thought.

Back at his command tent Renly told the other lords gathered there what he had seen. "Needless to say we need to rethink our strategy here. If all of the small shanty towns in the fish market have such traps in them."

"Could the alchemists have made that much wildfire?" Asked Lord Appleton.

"Even a little is too much." Renly barked back, most of his normal easy-going manner having fled him. "We will wait, retain our siege lines and send out scouts to safely dispose of the wildfire jugs before we try another full on assault." He carefully did not look over at Randyll, who had suggested sending in scouts initially, along with the feint idea.

For his part, Randyll was philosophical about things. Yes, he was saddened to hear how Loras had been injured but the loss of 2000 men in an army their size wasn't exactly a high price to pay for Renly being forced to listen to him. It would've been worse of course, but the moment he heard the screams and saw the flickering flames Randyll had sent runners to the commanders of the feint, and ordered them to pull their men back out of Fishmarket. With the trick already played he had no doubt that Serret would have ordered that portion of the wildfire trap to be ignited as well, which would've cost the army much more dearly.

Indeed Serret and Cersei, who had come up with the plan in the first place, had been most angry that it had been sprung with so little return. Lord Harte had been stripped of command of the wall and Serret had Jaime beat him black and blue in a spar for his idiocy.

With none of the lords in any mood to socialize or drink, most of them left Renly's tent quickly after being given their new orders. Only Randyll remained and he moved over to where Renly was sitting slumped on a field chair. Renly looked up at him coldly, but when he spoke, his voice was calm. "So what would you suggest we do now, my Lord Tarly?"

OOOOOO

Ranma and his army had not been idle since putting castle Vypren to the torch. They had moved swiftly southwest, as if making for House Lolliston's keep, moving as quickly as the army could while not completely exhausting themselves. Thanks to the training the northern contingent had been put through this was decently quick for a force their size even with the Mallister contingent not having gone through the same training.

They were several days travel away by the time their scouts began to find themselves sometimes taking fire.

Well ahead of the rest of the army Meera was racing along the path of the army through the woodlands, with several of her scouts/hunters around her. Here it really was woodlands, scattered dense copses of trees and heavy bushes set on small hills filled with small streams interspersed with flat, open areas, many of which had been farms at one point. Though of course, the farmers had fled long since with numerous armies so close. Farmers tended to be uneducated but they were not stupid, and they could read much more than a change in weather on the wind.

It was interesting territory, very different from any Meera had been through before, but hunting and scouting were the same...At that moment an arrow buzzed by Meera's ear, and she flung herself forward, thanking the old gods for Ranma and Arya's training. She landed, splashing into a small rivulet before rolling while she shouted, "Ambush, 'ware left!"

Another arrow slammed into the ground an inch from her head in the muck of the rivulet, but this time she saw where it was coming from. Pulling out an arrow from her quiver at her thigh, Meera fired back with the recurve bow that she had been given made from the bones of the lizard lion Ranma had killed.

It had a very heavy pull, but she had trained for years on a normal one, and then months on this bow. Her arrow flew out slicing through foliage to bury itself in the chest of the second archer to fire on her just as dozens more arrows flew out from around the same area.

Her scouts weren't all armed with bows, and only one of them had a northern longbow. He ducked behind a tree, holding his bow diagonally for a moment then leaped out, firing back while around them men went down, dead or injured from the sudden arrow assault.

Meera gestured to one of the nearest scouts. "Head back to the army, tell them we've run into trouble!"

The man, a Karstark armsman, nodded, crouching low and crawling away through the foliage while Meera and the longbow man began to duel with their attackers, none of whom seemed to be in any rush to leave their position and close with them. Not five minutes later she heard a howl and grinned viciously.

As soon as the report got back to them Ranma and the wolfsworn had raced ahead of the army on a diagonal, intending to take the ambushers from the side quickly before they could escape. They ran into a lot more opposition than they had anticipated however, with over two hundred men hiding there ready to ambush the army.

They had also created small, simple bulwarks using downed trees and other things and despite being taken in their own flank, they responded with alacrity. Daryn was hit by an arrow, which went deep into the meat of his thigh, while Ranma was forced to block or smack aside over a dozen arrows. Roger and Hathan were even forced to break off their charge, being on horseback they were much larger targets than the others, and they couldn't close quickly enough thanks to the foliage.

Despite this, the other's went through the Westerlanders like a thresher through wheat. Ice hewed them apart, sending limbs, heads and bodies flying. Dacey's greatsword hewed a path to one side, while Arya leaped and bounded everywhere, using the trees above as springboards, showing she had truly become at home with the Aerial Style that Ranma had been teaching her. In fact thanks to that and her own shorter stature she was doing as much damage as any of the other two wolfsworn combined.

Nymeria and Fenris howled in from the other side of the Westerlander defensive position, ripping and tearing at the men, who now were trying to break off and run. They had left it too late however, and with the wolfsworn in among them they had to stay and fight, a losing proposition despite their numbers.

"Meera, you okay?" Ranma shouted over the din of battle, bringing ice around one handed to block a sword blow from someone wielding a longsword, riposting quickly, the tip of his blade catching the other man in his gorget while at the same time his fist lashed out, catching another man in the side of the head.

"I'm alright!" Meera replied, firing an arrow at an archer trying to aim further down the trail at Roger, one of many clumped in the middle of their position who was still trying to fight as best they could. Her arrow struck the man in the side, causing him to cry out.

Then he and the other men who hadn't yet put their bows down began to wish they had, because Ranma and Edd had broken through to them. They dropped their bows, scrambling at their sides for their holdout daggers, but too late.

Moments' later the battle was over and Ranma moved to help Daryn, who was leaning against a tree, grimacing at the arrow in his thigh. "Hold on Daryn, we'll get that out of you in a second.

"Don't, it's a broad head, not a bodkin, you'll do more damage if you yank it out too quickly." The Hornwood heir gasped. "Just wrap it up, we can take it out when we get back to the rest of the army."

"Fine, but you're going to be sitting on one of the baggage animals for a bit my friend." The army had ditched all of their wagons and were now relying on pack mules to lug around most of their supplies.

"Fine by me." Daryn responded, wincing as Ranma went to work bandaging him with a bit of torn cloth from one of the dead. "You think we're likely to run into more of these little ambushes?"

"Probably." Ranma grunted, pulling the makeshift tourniquet tight over his friend's wound. "If I was Tywin, I'd try anything to slow us down, pin us in place and then wipe us out before we can 'wise up' and try to head down to the Ruby Ford again."

At that point Meera and Arya joined them, with Meera apologizing profusely for not having spotted the ambush in time. "You did Meera," Ranma corrected her, reaching over to ruffle her hair. "Scout's are supposed to either spot or spring ambushes, it's just the first is, y'know, better than the other."

Hefting his friend easily onto his back, Ranma went on, ignoring Daryn's mortified expression of the smirks the rest of his friends and even the scouts were sporting at his predicament. "Let's get back to the army, then, we'll change our route a bit, head slightly further north."

This worked for a few days and the Army advanced without further incident. But soon blocking forces began once more to ambush their scouts along the southern side of the army and at the front. This time however, Meera, once more in the lead, spotted them. She reported back quickly, switching out with one of the Shawney men. "They're ahead of us again, at least four hundred men this time, and they've taken up a position along a ridgeline, I don't think we could get close to them without taking fire. We could bring up our own archers but..."

She went on to describe the blocking position this group had taken. The ridgeline was actually the remains of a large hill that had been worn away at some point in the past to barely anything. But the top if it was still tall enough to give a commanding view of the surrounding lands, most of which were flat rolling fields and small rivers, with only a few trees in this particular area. There were a dozen cottages, all empty of course, and the fields had been picked clean.

"Then we need to swing wide." Ranma decided, frowning for a moment then he smirked. "Let's swing south, we haven't done that yet, and I bet we'll surprise whoever Tywin put in command of these holding actions."

His order went out quickly, and the army once again changed its line of advance.

OOOOOO

The sudden move southwest did indeed surprise the Westerlanders for a few days, but then the Northerners and their Riverlands allies ran into even heavier blocking forces, forcing the army to fall back along their path before once more heading northwest. Their own scouts reported that the main Westerlander army had also kept between them and the Red Fork regardless of their own maneuvers.

This time they were at last able to come within sight of the House Lolliston's keep, but as they feared it was in enemy hands. Ranma scowled at it staring at it through a spyglass. "Damn, so much for that hope. Ah well, it was faint at best."

He looked over at the lead Shawney scout, a man who had previously served as a Lolliston armsmen before the battle at the ford where he had joined the more organized Shawney forces in their retreat. "You said there's a hill or something nearby?"

The man nodded. "It's a decent enough position, if'n ye've got the numbers fer it, though it don't have anythin' like cover."

"How much you want to bet that they've got a blocking force set up there?" Asked Roger sardonically.

"No bet," Ranma said shaking his head. "No bet on that anyway but... I bet they'll think we'll try the same thing we've been trying the past few days, trying to get around them, or try to take them in the flank. So instead, we're going to take them at the run."

Moments later as fire arrows flew out from the woods surrounding the old Lolliston Castle Ranma's army quickly moved on. The archers and 200 of the Mallister men were left with a few of the remounts so that they could catch up.

Within another hour of marching the Army was in sight of the blocking position the scout had warned them about. It was a natural ditch where some long gone stream had carved out the land enough to give the defenders some cover. The land around it was also somewhat more barren the normal in the area, and a few stones here and there seemed to indicate that it had been worked farmland at one point or another before the river dried up and with it the land around them.

With enough men this could be a very dangerous position, provided you understood the use of polearms anyway. No one besides Ranma and his men however truly did understand that, at least not to the level necessary to make a simple ditch a defensive bulwark against attackers. Yet there were over 200 men in that position, spread out along the empty streambed. Though only 50 or so were archers.

With the fire in the Lolliston castle visible in the distance the men here had been warned of the army's coming, but they were not prepared for the army to simply keep on coming the moment it hit the open area around the ditch. Normally the army would've fallen back, the archers would've been brought up and a long range duel between the two would've begun. Ranma wasn't doing that this time. Instead he ordered his men to charge with the cavalry in the fore, plus Fenris himself, Nymeria and Arya in the center of their formation.

The bows of the Westerlanders and the scattered Riverlanders who had joined them were not the longbows of the North. Tywin had understood he needed to break up the Vypren's remaining people to make certain that they didn't run off. He needed the local lord's knowledge of the land too much to let that happen, and so had spread his men out among all the smaller forces searching out the enemy. The Riverlanders bows were better than the Westerlanders, made of better wood and larger in the main, but they weren't as large as northern bows nor did they have the more powerful draw of the Northerners, lacking the slight recurve at the tips that made the Northerner's bows stronger even in proportion to their size. This meant the enemy's bows lacked the necessary penetrating power to fight full plate armored knights under fifty yards. Nor were the men as well trained as the Northerners.

With the heavy cavalry in the lead the men in the ditch couldn't get at the more lightly armored men behind them unless they shot arching style, which was unaimed, and easily blocked by simply having the infantry raise their shields. Then as the men in the ditch thrust up their weapons, makeshift spears for the most part, to receive them, the knights veered off to either side. The men in the ditch were still gaping at that when the infantry that had been charging behind the knights slammed into them and into the ditch. The archers got off one volley at close range that cost the northerners a good dozen men.

Ranma had left Ice behind on purpose, able to tell there wasn't enough space in the ditch for him to swing it, but his hands and feet were just as deadly. Arya was with him, holding a long dirk in either hand but she was also using her legs to good effect. The rest of the wolfsworn, and Patrek, who was armed at the moment with a short-hafted mace smashed their way into the ditch with relative ease at the head of the infantry. They lost only a few more men getting into the ditch due to simple surprise at the knights veering off as they did plus the fact the spearmen weren't bunched up enough to stop the infantry from getting underneath their weapons.

All of the men who had attacked the ditch were armed with shorter-hafted weapons rather than the pole arms and the regular longswords of their enemies. In the ditch, that proved a deadly advantage. Even Roger, who was much more at home with his long-hafted axe than any other weapon, had opted for a morningstar, which he used to smash aside two men in a single blow, before a kick from him shattered the leg of another man, opening him up for a pommel strike from Dacey, who was guarding his back in the melee of the ditch. That man's skull shattered under that blow, and Dacey's return blow opened the guts of another.

Those few men that tried to escape the ditch at either end of the former riverbed ran straight into the heavy cavalry that had circled around them. A few escaped jumping out of the ditch away from the attacking army before the heavy cavalry could fully encircle them, but they were very few and far between.

Ranma leaped out of the ditch, looking down at his blood-soaked hands shaking his head. It wasn't getting any easier for him. Still, would I really want it to be? Shaking his head clear of such thoughts he looked over at Roger and Hathan, who had swiftly joined him. "Reform the cavalry," he ordered, "Uncle, you and Patrek do the same for the infantry."

He turned looking over at where Meera was leading up the scouts out into the open area along with the archers and Mallister men who had been left behind to burn the castle. They had lost a few men, but as he had thought, there weren't many men left to guard the ruins of the castle. The fire had merely finished the work the Lannisters had already done. "Meera, get your men out in front, I want us at least twenty leagues from here before sundown." Around him the men groaned, but complied, their morale high from the relatively easy victory.

OOOOOO

The army did indeed march the twenty leagues Ranma wanted yet even so, they hadn't gone far enough to escape the scouts that Lord Plumm, who was in charge of this angle of the chase, had set out. Like the other lords in charge of pinning the northerners in place, he had broken up his archers and a portion of his armymen into smaller groups, sending them forward, while keeping half of his strength in a more central location well ahead of the main Lannister army.

Plumm's scouts were slightly better than most of the skirmishers Meera and her people had been dealing with. They were comprised mostly of former poachers and bandits that Lord Plumm had forced into his service with a simple choice of serving him or being sent to the Night's Watch well before this war began. Since the start of this campaign a few had attempted to run, but he had made the rest of them watch as he drew and quartered them when they were captured. That had enforced their loyalty, and they served him well now.

"They're heading straight west?" Philip Plumm asked sharply looking at one of his he felt anything for the death of over a third of his command in the two clashes that had occurred he gave no sign.

"Aye milord." The man said nodding his head not looking him in the eyes as he knelt in front of him.

"Where in the world are they going then? I thought they were trying to get back to Fairmarket but if they're heading straight west, that takes them away from the straight line back to Fairmarket from here."

The man didn't answer, knowing his Lord would not appreciate a lowly scout's thoughts on that matter. Inside however, he was wondering if the Stark-led army was simply leading them around for some reason. Over a week had passed since the fall of House Vypren's castle and the northerners had been very cagy about seeking battle, yet never tried to pull away entirely or return to Fairmarket.

Lord Plumm thought for a moment then he nodded decisively. Turning to one of his knights he ordered, "Get the men ready for a forced march. The Northerners have marched all day and fought a battle as well. If we can move fast we can catch them off-guard and exhausted."

The knight looked hesitant. "My Lord, Lord Lannister said we were not to try to fight a pitched battle merely slow them down enough for the main force to catch up."

"We're not fool, we're going to try a night attack. If we can attack them by night and destroy their supplies, we'll force them to either retreat straight back to Fairmarket, which means Lord Lannister might be able to get ahead of them with the rest of the army or simply besiege the town and wipe them out that way."

At the moment Lord Lannister was two days south and a little east of the former Lolliston Castle, and if he tried he might be able to get in front of the Northerners by simply marching for Fairmarket on a straight line.

Lord Plumm honestly didn't think they would be able to accomplish that, the Northerners were too Seven-damned fast on the march, and for all his youth the Stark boy had proven to be a wily tactician. Still, the Northerners had been having all of these small skirmishes almost entirely their own way, oh there had been one or two excellent ambushes that claimed a dozen or so of their men here and there, but on the whole it had been the Westerlanders that had been slowly bleeding lives.

They desperately needed to pin these Northerners down, then bring up the rest of their army and crush them as Lord Lannister had said. "If we need to take a chance to do it, I'm certain Lord Lannister will understand."

OOOOOO

That night the northern army camped out in one of the small copse of trees that dotted the Riverlands. Despite not being large enough to be called woodland, there were still more than large enough for the army to hide in.

Everyone was tired, including Meera and her scouts except for Ranma who was in his tent. He was ready for bed but he needed to go over his plans. Ranma didn't want to show it, even to his friends, but he was getting worried. While the idea of splitting up some of his force and trying to create little holding actions here and there to slow the Northerners down wasn't exactly revolutionary, Ranma had hoped that it would take a while for Tywin to think of it. In fact, he had hoped that Tywin would try to march to Fairmarket straightaway, which would allow him and his army to attack the Westerlanders supply line and then force the Lannisters to retreat to their fortification on the other side of the Kneeling Man ford.

Lord Tywin hadn't even tried that, and what was worse he was keeping his main force on the move yet always to the south of Ranma and his men enough to keep them from marching on the Red Fork. He knows I want to try and get around him, then try and cross the red Fork somehow Ranma thought, frowning as he looked at the map. Has he realized what I'm trying to do, or does he just 'know' that I don't want to face that fort he threw up on the other side of the Kneeling Man's ford?

Worse, we haven't been able to break off contact with the scouts that have been tailing us. I can't break off the next attack group if they'd be spotted right away! He reached down absently, rubbing Fenris on the muzzle while the giant direwolf rumbled in pleasure, uncaring of his human's worries.

Ranma continued to look down at the map, thinking hard as he went over the information that the scouts as well as Lord Shawney and the rest of the Riverlanders who knew this area had told him. At the speed we can go, we're within four days of the Red Fork from here if we head straight for it, but Tywin is within two or three days travel with his main force and he is within our line so could cut us off with a large enough force to hold us in place for the rest of his army, damn it! I need to do something, Jon's attack is important, but it can't do enough damage on its own without follow up attacks, not right away. At least the first phase is working, but even there, I can't afford to...

Just then Fenris sat up, his ears twitching and he growled his teeth bared. Ranma looked down at him, their minds instantly linking. At that moment he heard what Fenris had heard, the jingle of harness, and movement from the south. But Ranma had put his tent up at the southernmost edge of the camp...

When the implication of that hit him Ranma instantly grabbed up Ice and ran out of the tent shouting "To arms! To arms!"

Ice in one hand he turned just as a dozen riders rode out of the surrounding night making right towards him. Ranma didn't hesitate, Ice coming around in a smooth arc to smash through one man's lance cutting deep into his horse and leg before continuing on as Ranma turned in a full circle while jumping into the air. His next blow came in at head height, slicing a man's head clean off armor and all before his leg lashed out at a third rider slamming into the man's shield with enough force to shatter the shield and the arm that had been holding it flinging the man out of the saddle with a cry.

Behind him Fenris howled aloud, before ripping and tearing at another horseman and horse. All around them the horses heard that terrible howl and skittered away in terror, something that affected even the mounted attackers elsewhere. But further away in the camp the attack continued, overwhelming the men on watch quickly and getting into the camp itself.

On the outer edge of the camp the defenders however were slightly more rested than the rest of the army, having bunked out while their fellows had made the camp. They held just long enough for many of the rest to grab up weapons and shields. Most of them however were still unarmored, and a ferocious melee erupted all over the camp.

"The North and the Riverlands!" Ranma bellowed, charging towards the nearest clump of men. "The North and the Riverlands!" He didn't know how many attackers that there were, the firelight from the fires of the camp wasn't enough to tell, but he knew that this attack couldn't possibly be that large, or else his scouts would've warned him that such a force was nearby. That means this is just another kind of holding the attack... they'll go after our supplies!

Putting one man down, Ranma spotted Meera and Arya coming out of their shared tent, and shouted, "The supplies! Grab some men and guard the supplies!"

No normal ears could've heard that bellow through the clamor of battle and the screams of the wounded and dying, but Arya was linked with Nymeria who was guarding her back tearing savagely into any of the attackers that tried to circle her. Thanks to that she did hear, and she shouted back an acknowledgment grabbing Meera whose trident had stuck in one man's armored stomach. "Come on!" she shouted, pulling at her. "Leave it, we need to get to the supplies!"

Arya raced on through the clamor of battle, killing any man who came at her, but ignoring most of the clumps of combat around her to get to the supplies. She grabbed as many men as she could along the way, and by the time she reached where the supplies were stored in the center of the camp she had a good fifty men, most of whom were unarmored but armed. They took the main force of attackers who had pushed through the camp to the supply train in the rear, and Arya led the way howling like Nymeria. "King in the North! King in the North!"

Roger and a few of his men had been bumped down near the horses. Over a dozen of the attackers had attacked from up out of the dark nearest the horses intending to scare them off. When Fenris howled however, their own horses shied and tried to bolt despite the best efforts of their riders, and they were forced to spend precious seconds trying to get them under control.

This allowed Roger and the rest of the cavalymen to bolt upright and get back into the saddle. Roger himself bellowed "The Rills, the Rills for the King in the North!" as his ki-infused ax flew around, shattering one shield and slicing into a knight's chest before coming back around to parry a sword blow with so much strength that he nearly threw that man out of the saddle, allowing Roger time to get up into the saddle of the nearest horse.

Beside him Hathan and his squire were both in the saddle quickly, with the boy following his knight closely as Hathan slew three knights in quick succession, their horses still shying as the howls of the direwolves rebounded around in the fire lit night. Hathan's next ki-enhanced blow decapitated another man who was wearing what looked like better armor than most in the firelight, though Hathan had no time to notice as four more came at him, forcing him on the defense until another man was able to get into the saddle and relieve some of the pressure.

Arya's Fang flew left and right, slicing into two men before she leaped up on top of another man's horse pulling his head back and snapping his neck with a wicked wrench of her arm. Then she urged his horse into another man's horse, Fang flashing out to bury itself deep in the man's armored side right where his plate armor joined along his side. She wrenched it out with difficulty, then turned still on horseback and shouted orders, trying desperately to organize the defense of the supplies.

Patrek's voice soon joined her, and he led a force of Mallister men into the attackers from the other side, getting in front of them now and pushing them away from the bags of supplies. "Form shield wall!" he bellowed "Form shield wall, Seven-damn you!"

The sergeants took up his bellow, and soon enough there was a ring of shields around the supplies. With more and more men from the camp around them joining the battle that signaled the turn of the tide.

Nearby, Merry hid in her tent, shuddering a little as the sounds of battle reached her from outside but knowing better than to rush out just yet. In one hand she held a holdout dagger Alayaya had given her and which Ranma had trained her in somewhat during their voyage up to White Harbor. She gasped when the tent flap was flung open, and two men wearing unfamiliar colors rushed in, looking over their shoulders fearfully.

One of them looked at her, and Merry gulped. Since she had been in her sleeping bag (which was really just two small but heavy blankets stitched together) she was wearing her night shift, which was rather small on her these days, clinging to her like a second skin.

The man smirked at her evilly. "She mus' be some kind o' camp slut, still with the battle goin' agin us, she might make a good shield!"

While the other man turned to watch the entrance to the tent the first man reached for her, but Merry struck out with her dagger cutting into his hand. "Don't touch me!"

"YA bitch!" the man gasped, then gasped again as Merry's knife came back, slicing into his forearm, which began to bleed heavily. "Stupid whore!" He grabbed at her, but Merry retreated and a moment later the man collapsed to his knees, the blood running down from his forearm in an unending stream. "What the..."

Merry held up her blade watching as the man bled out from where she had cut one of his primary arteries. The other man however turned to her, his longsword raised. "You fuckin' cunt, ya killed me mate, I gonna gut ya like a fish fer that!"

He moved forward, smacking Merry's blade out of her hand. He pulled his blade back to stab her but then gasped as a sword point burst out from his armored chest. The blade receded then a hand grabbed his body by the shoulder and flung it out into the night. "Are you alright Merry!?"

Merry nodded, staring at him with relief. "Thanks to you, Ranma."

Taking her at her word Ranma nodded, though he couldn't stop himself from noticing how her nightshift clung to Merry, emphasizing her budding curves. He gulped a little flushing as he looked away. Damn, Merry isn't a little girl any longer is she? "Um, ya might want ta get dressed before ya come out, okay? I don't want a riot on my hands on top of everything else."

Merry gasped, covering herself with her hands though she also smiled a little smile at how Ranma had noticed she was growing up. I promised Daenerys that I wouldn't do anything but it's still nice to know I can affect his Stark self-control. "Of, of course!"

Nodding at that Ranma left the tent, sighing slightly with relief. He began to bellow orders again and soon began to instill some order in the chaos of the continued clamor of battle. The attackers didn't break off however, grimly staying and fighting to the last man.

Ranma didn't know this at the time and wouldn't learn it for a few months, but this was because Lord Plumm had died in the first few moments of the battle, along with three more of his knights thanks to Roger and Hathan. With him and most of his commanders dead there was no one left to order a retreat, and Lord Plumm had long since either elevated men who showed initiative or crushed such if the man wasn't the right sort, IE noble.

Thirty minutes after the battle had begun it ended, with Edd killing the last man standing as he tried to run off.

Ranma let the point of Ice fall, grounding it in the ground at his feet as he sighed sadly looking around the fire-lit camp, hearing the shouts of the sergeants calling their men to order, over the screams of the wounded and dying. Thank the old gods that the fires didn't get out of control and that the attackers didn't think of using it. He looked at Patrek and the others who were nearby. "Get a count of the wounded and dead." He ordered simply. "Let's get this camp organized again."

Behind him Merry came out fully dressed now, looking around at for her helpers and began to shout her own orders. "And someone find maester Martyn."

It turned out that Martyn was dead, killed in his tent by one of the men who had snuck in before the cavalry hit the outskirts of the camp. He and two of his chosen helpers were dead but the majority of the supplies were still intact. Merry quickly began to organize the wounded into the same system she had run back in Fairmarket, splitting the injured into groups of severity and working furiously to save those she could while one of her helpers made the passage of those they couldn't save as easy as possible.

The sun was peeking over the western sky before the camp was back to normal. Once again the commanders gathered together to go over what they learned. Meera reported first. "They snuck up on some of the guards on the southern edge, killed two of them, I found their bodies, their throats were slit from behind. They then snuck some of their men into the camp from that side. The rest of the guards didn't notice." she went on grimly shaking her head. "But there were only a few men inside the camp before you shouted your warning, Ranma."

"It was bad enough." Merry replied sharply, her eyes showing her tiredness as she leaned against Fenris. "We lost at least 690 dead, and another 29 won't make it through another day. I've made them as comfortable as I can, but another 203 are injured, 70 so severely I'd recommend that we send them back to Fairmarket, and twenty more are so injured that we can't move them."

"Do all you can Merry." Ranma said patting her on the head gently sighing sadly at the look of grief in her eyes from, well, being human really. She can't save everyone, but Merry doesn't seem to have realized that, has she? "How many of the sergeants did we lose?"

"Only two thankfully." Rickard replied to that question. "Both of them were on the southern side of the camp, and they and their men died there to the bastards who had snuck in before you shouted your warning."

"How many of the attackers escaped, do you think?" Asked Dacey.

"Not many." Roger replied shaking his head. "They stayed and fought for some reason even when the game was blown. Surprising, I didn't think that the Westerlanders were that fanatical."

Ranma shrugged unconcerned at that, pulling at his ponytail thoughtfully as an idea occurred to him. "Get me my map," he said thoughtfully. "This might work to our advantage."

Everyone looked at him in surprise, but Luke who was standing respectfully behind Hathan rushed off to do his bidding, and came back with his map quickly. "Show me where we are on this again?" Ranma asked.

Nursing a broken arm Lord Shawney pointed out where he thought they were, then called over one of his chief scouts to make certain. Eventually Ranma nodded. "That's what I thought, good. I think it's time to break off the second force. Given the size of the force that hit us I bet they used all their forces nearby on this. And after an attack like this, even though we beat it off there's no way that the Westerlanders will realize how badly they hurt us. Even if they do have scouts still watching us we might fool them if we also send off our most severely injured up to Fairmarket."

Merry smiled grateful that Ranma was taking her suggestion even if he was doing it for more pragmatic reasons than she had put it forth for.

"Daryn pick out your men from those who can swi..."

"No." Daryn said shaking his head.

"What?" Ranma asked looking up and him in shock.

"I'm good at this sort of role, but I'm also injured." Daryn said. "I should stay with you."

"True, if your injury gets wet you risk getting it infected." Merry said, nodding her head.

Ranma thought for a moment then nodded. "That's a point. I'll send you with the wounded to lead their guard then. Dacey in that case you're in charge. You've got the most experience in leading infantry, sorry Roger, Hathan, but that's true."

Both men nodded equably, though Dacey frowned. "I'm not certain I'm the best for this, I'd prefer to put Arya in charge. You two don't seem to realize it but you Starks have built up a tremendous well of trust among the armsmen, even the Riverlanders now especially after this last battle."

"No chance of that." Arya said waving her hands in the air wildly. "I'll be the first into battle, that's fine but I'm not about to lead other people. I don't have the experience, the age, or the temperament. You've got all three Dacey."

"Are you calling me old, girl?" Dacey glared at the younger one girl who smirked back at her.

"Enough." Ranma laughed amused at his sister's attitude. Still, eventually Arya would be leading other people. This attack had shown that she had the temperament to do it if she tried. It had been Arya gathering men and leading them to the supply area that had really saved the day and would allow Ranma to continue with his campaign. "In any event, pick out your men then lead them straight west, then find a place to hide out until we're well away. Daryn, you'll head north for Fairmarket with the injured, while the rest of us will head straight south for a day, then northeast drawing off any attention."

"We'll be down to a bare four thousand men total if we send off enough of a force with Dacey to do any good." Patrek, who had quietly become Ranma's aide-de-camp since Jon had left, warned. "I'm not arguing against it, I'm just telling you that we won't have enough men to perform any miracles."

"We don't need miracles, we just need Lord Tywin's attention firmly on us. That we can do." Ranma smiled, clapping the other young man on the shoulder.

Within an hour the army was once more organized and ready to march, with Merry frantically running every which way, trying to organize the injured, their stretchers and their caretakers. Taking care of the injured from this latest battle had nearly run through the army's medical supplies, but despite that Merry refused to go with them, sending off two of maester Martyn's more senior helpers to watch over them.

"With maester Martyn dead, you'll need someone here, and while I'm not fully trained, I'm the best we've still got!" She replied firmly to Ranma's subtle attempt to suggest she go with them.

At the look and the younger girl's eyes Ranma backed away his hands in the air placating her. "All right, all right Merry, I won't push."

Rickard and Patrek organized the supplies, giving Dacey enough to let them head off. She, the remaining wolfsworn and four hundred men broke off and headed west within the hour. The rest of the army with Ranma, Meera, Patrek, Silas and Rickard still leading them headed straight south, to once more prick the lion's tail.

Ranma didn't push the army very hard that first day heading straight south, and they stopped and put up camp almost within sight of castle Lolliston again. He let them rest for the rest of the day and into the night, before moving off again. Thankfully, Lord Plumm had indeed used all of his men in that night attack leaving only a few scouts, none of whom were inclined to try and get the army's attention. So it was easy enough movement for that day and the next, where they were in sight of the Red Fork.

At that point Ranma's scouts warned that they were beginning to run into more and more of their opposite numbers. One of them however, was able to break through and come back. "They've got a major camp up there my Lord," he reported staring over at Ranma and his own Lord, Shawney. "I saw a lot of banners, including the Lannister lion."

"Gooooo..." Ranma smirked. "In that case, I think it's time for us to go east again."

"Northeast, or just east?" Silas asked.

"We'll mix it up, but we want to move east regardless. We want to give Dacey and her crew at least four days to get over the Red Fork, let alone to actually get to where they can do some good. And we need to keep Tywin's attention completely on us, on what he is trying to do to us. So much so he isn't worried about his own defense."

Over the next five days the army backtracked slightly then marched east, but almost immediately they began to run into more blocking forces. For now however, Ranma and his army did not seek out battle, trying to wend their way through them. It got so bad however that their options were slowly disappearing. Meera's scouts, with strict orders to avoid action, had found that Tywin was closely following them, his army broken into smaller groups, each of which could move faster than the total could. The one Meera's scouts' reported was larger alone than Ranma's remaining men. And Ranma and his officers knew there were more out there, each one moving in a slightly different direction in an attempt to catch or at least take away some of Ranma's choices on where to lead his army.

Eventually Ranma had to make the decision to punch through one of the holding forces quickly rather than going around it. Meera found the one in the worst position, but even so, it cost his army over two hundred dead, and slowed them further with even more injured. Still they kept going with Tywin and the others on their heels.

Tywin thinks he's almost got us, that we cut it too fine when we turned away from the Red Fork. Ranma mused while loping along at the front of the army, Fenris beside him. Good, or rather it will be if we can keep from actually being caught. That however was going to be a tall order now that they were practically retracing their steps, heading further east towards the Ruby Ford. The line is set, now we just need to keep out of the lion's jaws long enough for the trap to spring.

OOOOOO

While Ranma and Tywin were conducting their gains, Daenerys and her force had reached the Ruby Ford after the carpenters built enough barges to get the small force down the river. It was slow and very irritating going in terms of river travel, yet it might be worth it in the long term considering this way allowed them to build the barges, which could be useful later, and to stay away from the Ruby Ford for long enough for Ranma and his force to drag every scout Tywin had after them.

Daenerys had also used this time to thoroughly exhaust both of her dragons so that they were willing to remain hidden in their carts for a few days after their arrival. Her own presence would come out quickly, but the dragons, they were a hidden card for now, or at least, both she and Ranma hoped they were. Since Tywin was with his army and away from anyone who could send him rumors, this was a possibility they both thought worth pursuing for a time.

Nonetheless, Rhaegon began to act out barely a few hours after they boarded the barges. By the end of the day Sunfyre had joined him. However Daenerys chanced upon a solution. While warging with them she sent the growing drakings the image of the two of them from her perspective hiding in the carts prepared for them, then superimposed it with one of the direwolves stalking a bear through a forest.

After that the two dragons had thankfully realized what was going on and settled down somewhat, another sign they were much more intelligent than any of the books Daenerys had read when she was younger. She idly wondered if it was a side effect of her connecting mind to mind with them, but she certainly wasn't complaining either way. Though Rhaegon still grumbled occasionally, he did so while hiding in his cart, and Sunfyre seemed content to laze about for a few days after having been worked so hard for a few days prior to that.

As they came close to the Ruby Ford they began to see both more signs of habitation and of the presence of an army. Several dozen riders began to follow the barges down the river, and one or two of them cheered seeing the banner of House Mallister. About a day after that they reached the actual Ruby Ford, an almost mile-long area where the Blue Fork met the Green Fork. Both rivers slowed down here and were not nearly as deep as normal for most of their length, the water of the Ford coming up to only knee height on most men.

The ford had been created by the Riverlords long ago, though the name 'the Ruby Ford' had only been given it after Robert's Rebellion where he fought Prince Rhaegar. Rumor (and pro-Baratheon propaganda) said Robert slew Rhaegar with a massive blow from his warhammer, which had shattered his armor, sending the rubies that had been inset into it into the water of the ford. Jason said that was accurate, having been there in that battle with the Riverlands forces arrayed behind Lord Tully. He then went on to say that the rumor refrained from mentioning how people from both sides stopped fighting to try to dive into the water to pick up the rubies.

That was rather beside the point at the moment however.

Smalljon was on the lead barge, with the banner of House Umber flying next to him alongside Jason Mallister and his banner. He looked on the defenses thrown up on the northern side of the Ford and smiled approvingly. Several lines of ditches and several bulwarks had been thrown up, combined with five raised platforms further back from the line and what looked like four catapults set up to hammer any force coming across the Ford. It was an impressive display.

"Very nice." Smalljon murmured. Then he shouted aloud as men from the defenses came out to greet them. Many of them wore House Umber colors, and the banner of house Umber, Greatjon's banner, and the Stark banner flew on a camp he could see in the distance behind the defensive lines. "My compliments to whoever designed this place!"

"That would be me!" Said a young man, coming forward. He was dressed as a worker, and would have disappeared into the crowd if not for his voice, which was one that had been trained for war. "Vincent Ryger at your service! You would be Smalljon correct? Lord Jason needs no introduction." By that point the men had reached the edge of the defensive area, and he was waving then forward to help pull the barges to the side of the Ford.

The barges clattered together, grounding on the Blue Fork section of the Ford, and the men began to haul themselves out while more men from the defensive lines came forward to help them.

"Well met Vincent." Said Jason, leaping over the side to land knee-deep in the water of the Ford. He moved forward clasping the younger man's arm warmly. "I should've known you would be the one to have designed the defenses here. Your father always did say that you preferred to think up construction projects rather than riding or hunting."

"Not so much anymore, alas." The younger man replied laughing and Smalljon took a moment to watch him. Vincent was dressed simply like any normal armymen would in camp. His hair was a light brown color, shaggy at present with a scar cutting across his chin which might be why he hadn't grown a beard. His shoulders were decently wide and his hand, when he held it out to Smalljon to shake looked calloused, though Smalljon couldn't tell if that was calluses from sword exercises, or from something else. Either way Smalljon approved of what he saw.

"How many men do you bring with you my Lords?" Vincent asked.

"A little over 1,700, the rest of my House's men are marching with Lord Stark at present, doing what they can to make life uncomfortable for the Lannisters."

"Something I could wish we would all be doing." Another young man who had come up said darkly. "I am pleased to say that I count myself among Ser Edmure's friends, and it pains me to sit on the defensive like this while he is kept captive by those treasonous bastards in King's Landing! I would rather have us go on the attack with you my Lords. You'll have to convince the other Houses however, which is a tall order my lords."

"My older brother Tristan, my lords." Vincent introduced him.

While this discussion was going on a cloaked and hooded figure, with a luxuriant beard, came up with another, much smaller hooded figure leading two horses each, causing Smalljon and Jason to nod at it, Jason chancing a glance at the servant for a moment before nodding. "Where are Lord Wayn and the others? I would have thought your father at least would be here."

"Our father has allowed Vincent and I to command our men here. Indeed if not for the other lords insisting he be here, I doubt he would have left the comforts of Willow Wood at all, but our seat is too far away from the ford to make a good command position. He and the other lords have commandeered an inn nearby, I'll escort you there now if you wish. Could you ask your men thought to follow my men, they will guide yours over to the camp the rest of the northern army has set up?"

Vincent nodded agreement. "We are still two separate, 'unallied' forces my lords, as much as my brother and I would prefer otherwise." He nearly snarled the words for a moment before calming down. "The other lords have been most particular about keeping most of your men away from the defensive line, though obviously that hasn't worked over much."

After the newcomers nodded agreement to that he went on. "As I said, it will be a tall order to convince any but my brother and I to act against House Lannister. Lord Wayn and Lord Roote parlayed the current nonaggression agreement we have with the murderous scum, and they control the majority of the men here. Our own House is weak as you well know lord Mallister, and of course our father is... ambivalent about backing Lord Brynden thanks to 'past wrongs'." Vincent and Tristan both looked like they wanted to spit for a moment there. "That despite our uncle's work to regain Lord Tully's trust in our house. I'll be astonished if you can get any further than Lord Brynden or Lord Umber has."

"We will see." Jason said smiling thinly. He was actually going to enjoy this Jason realized, on top of the effect of her actual presence watching other lords run into Daenerys and her powerful personality would be interesting. He didn't know when it had happened, but somewhere along this journey he had gone from being a skeptic even antagonistic towards her, and shifted into a supporter somehow. He was still very leery about the connection she had with her dragons and the dragons themselves, but no more than he was about Ranma and his family's connection to their direwolves.

Tristan and Vincent both looked on in confusion as the servants who had brought up their horses pulled themselves into the saddles of the two remaining beasts, never letting their hoods fall. Both young men's intrigue was further roused by seeing a flash of a hand that was far too dainty to belong to a man from the second figure. Watching Smalljon and the other servant take up unobtrusive positions on either side of her Vincent decided to wait and see what was going on here.

Tristan smiled at the intrigue and asked lightly. "Would you care to let us in on the secret my Lords?"

Smalljon laughed. "Trust us, you'll get the joke eventually and I think it will be all the better for waiting."

With that the five of them began to move through the defensive works while behind them the lead the rest of the men into on loading and moving their stuff to the northern camp. A few moments after they left the last bulwark behind they met up with Brynden and Greatjon who had come out from the northern camp.

"Smalljon!" Greatjon bellowed. "We've heard all about how the Freys fell, ha! I wish I could've seen it! What did that old windbag look like when he realized that the Twins had fallen?"

"I think he nearly had a heart attack frankly, he looked like a frog that had swallowed a boulder!" Smalljon replied. When Greatjon pulled his horse up alongside his son's the two large men reached across and pounded one another on the back with blows that would've broken a lesser man's bones.

"I agree with Greatjon." Brynden quipped, smirking slightly. "I wish I could've seen it too. Actually no, I don't wish that."

I wish I could be a fly on the wall when news of the Twins' destruction reaches those Freys that are already serving with the Lannisters or worse married to them! Their howls of agony would warm my heart."

With that he turned to the third person in the group from the Blue Fork, one eyebrow raised in amusement. He bowed his head slightly, then he ignored her for now joining with the others to inveigle Smalljon to tell them about the battle in the Twins.

Smalljon did so, keeping their attention firmly on him as well as all their watchers as they rode on. None of the Riverlanders noticed when two carts began to move in their wake, with several young squires racing alongside them. They soon came to the inn that had been commandeered as the home for the lawyers wildly held the Ruby forward. "Of course," Tristan said shaking his head in amusement, "none of them are happy to be here."

"That's true enough." Brynden replied shaking his head. "I had forgotten how set in his ways Old Wayn is, but then again he's as old as my brother, and almost as feeble. Both in mind and body..." He went on, speaking under his breath but still audible to those nearest him.

"Jason!" said a voice as they entered the inn's interior. Lord Ryger set up from where he had been sitting at a table, where he was going over some kind of paperwork. "I'd heard your banner was seen coming down the river, but I didn't think it would actually be you. Last we'd heard you had sent your son off to Fairmarket, while you stayed behind."

"Events forced me to march to war myself Donovan." Jason said smiling thinly at the other man. They were not exactly friendly, indeed they had only met a few times and Donovan had always been rather bitter about the punishment handed out by Lord Tully for his House's backing House Targaryen.

From a nearby table Lord Roote also stood up. He was a small fat man, who looked much more like a merchant or banker of some kind than a lord. This fit house Roote to a T, considering they had never been a powerful House until awarded Harroway, and after that they had become more merchant than lord.

Old Wayn did not get up from his chair by the fire, he simply looked at them coolly. "Jason." he said nodding. He was an elderly man who might have been tall in his youth, but who was now stooped with age. He had a long beard, and deep rheumy eyes, and unlike the other two he didn't wear armor or a sword, instead wearing good if faded linen doublet and hose.

"Elistares." Jason replied, nodding back just as coolly.

"While it's nice to see you" the older man went on, his tone giving his words the lie. "I have to say that if you're here to join young Brynden in trying to convince us to take the field against the Lannisters you won't have much luck. The agreement we've reached with Lord Tywin is that so long as he stays on his side of the Ruby Ford we won't take the field against him. The Lannisters are too strong, even with your Northern army with us to take in the open field. And besides, while there might be some question as to the Lannister boy's right to the crown, it's not as if the Starks have any claim on it either! I'm not willing to fight for them, but neither am I willing to fight against them, not without a lot more reason than I've already heard."

"So says a man who hasn't seen their predations on the Riverlands first hand." Ser Halmore Blanetree growled. He was a tall, spare man, with a series of scars running down one side of his face that looked recent, and a burning rage in his brown eyes.

"We've already had this argument Ser Halmore." Lord Roote said, waving one somewhat pudgy hand as if to wave away the knight's words. "And while we sympathize, we have to think of our own people first. And while there is some question about the boy-king's right to his throne, there is just as much question as to who began the battle against the Lannisters when they began their march. If you, the Vances and the other hotheads hadn't begun the war, the Riverlands could have remained neutral, and the king might even have returned your precious Lord Edmure."

"As much as I hate to admit it, Lord Roote is correct. We need to think of our own people, and until there is a clear case of who is in the right here, we will continue to follow Lord Tully's last command to us, that we follow our own consciences. I'm sorry, but there you are." Lord Ryger said, sounding as if he really meant it.

"My husband and I thought you might think that way my Lords." said a female voice. "That is why I am here."

Vincent and his brother exchanged a glance, wondering where this was going to go while their father leaned forward wondering as well.

"And who would you and your husband be, miss?" said old Wayn now looking at the hooded form that had spoken with surprise.

Daenerys raced her hands pushing back her hood to reveal her face and features. Beside her the other cloaked figure did the same, revealing an aged, lined face, one that more than one man had seen before. "I am Daenerys Stark-Targaryen, wife of Ranma Stark, King of the North and lord Tully's representative until this current crisis is dealt with." The words 'and Lord Tully's grandson' hovered in the air for a moment, unspoken, before she went on. "And I'm here to convince you to join your banners with ours for the sake of justice and your oaths to Lord Tully and his house."

Over the next several days Daenerys went to work on bringing the lords of the eastern Riverlands over to their cause. It was not, alas, as easy as she had hoped. It gave Daenerys her first real experience with the world of politics, that is, the need to juggle various people's demands/needs with what needed to be done. Worse, for three of the five lords here, her legitimate claim to the throne mattered not at all, nor did Ser Barristan's siding with her, which should have added more legitimacy to her and Ranma's cause. It appalled her that the lords, in particular Roote and Wayn, were so self-serving, so blind to the long term ramifications of doing nothing, though admittedly for very different reasons. Eventually however, she was able to charm, browbeat or otherwise convince the various lords to side with them.

Wayn was the hardest to convince. He was old and very tired of war. He had no direct heir of his body, his three sons all having died in the War of the Usurper. He was tired, and had no desire to see his men off to die in another war. Daenerys however convinced him to defend his House's land and not stop allied forces from crossing them. Further she guaranteed his brother and nephew would be allowed to return home from Riverrun, where they were currently serving, his brother as steward his nephew as a page, immediately after the Lannisters were driven out of the Riverlands.

For a very different reason Roote was also hard to convince. Given the fact that they didn't know if the houses near the Trident had been coerced or join the Westerlanders willingly, Daenerys refused to guarantee anything behind the return of Harroway, but even that had conditions. Since it was a town, Daenerys wanted to make certain Harroway had crown representation in the future. Eventually she convinced him that if Darry had followed Tywin willingly their lands would become House Roote's in return for concessions in the running of the town.

Lord Ryger and Ser Blanetree were the easiest though they had very different motives. Ryger saw Daenerys, her dragons and her marriage to Ranma as vindication of his father, the former Lord Ryger's, decision to follow the crown. Daenerys didn't think in that manner, but for some very complex reasons, and while very willing to repay House Ryger for its service couldn't truly give them much, which angered him.

On the other hand, Blanetree she could do something for, which neatly led to a solution to Ryger's angst. Their house had been on the other side of the Blue fork, right in the Trident on the side of the river away from Harroway. Their people had mostly escaped over the Ruby Ford, though Blanetree and his men had been mauled in the retreat from the battle at the Kneeling Man ford. While not having many men to add to the cause now, the loyalty of the house to their Lord Paramount had to be awarded, and Daenerys had promised them House Vypren's land and money enough to rebuild its seat, assuming that Ranma's attack on it had left enough of it standing.

While Daenerys was discovering the joys of politics on a small scale Domic and Alayaya went to work. With Brynden's aid by the end of four days the two of them had rooted through both the northern and Riverlands forces here, pulling out what information they could not just about the various house's readiness for war which helped Daenerys in her discussions, but other bits and pieces of information that would help in the long term.

But their main task was to ferret out anyone passing on information to anyone else. They found several spies from Lord Lannister, and Domic even caught two couriers well out from the Riverlands encampment. These were men who were good enough at sneaking about in the forests and woodlands to get away from the army and cross the ford before travelling down to where the Lannister Army wasn't camped on the other side of their fortifications. Their skill at sneaking however did not translate to skill with weapons' craft, and Domic killed them both when they tried to run away from him when he came upon their small hideaway.

Thanks to their efforts the dragons had been ensconced in the northern camp with no one save the northern army the wiser for several days, and the northerners weren't going to share anything with the Riverlanders. This was because the portion of the northern army here had come to resent the Riverlands nobles, rightly blaming them for stopping the army from crossing the Ruby Ford and going to their King's aid. And more than one armstrong had realized that the dragons were a powerful token, and should be played with the most amount of surprise to get the most out of it.

Now the dragons were watched by the majority of the youngest pages led by Cley, who Ranma had sent with them, when Daenerys could not be with them, which alas was most of the afternoons. Since none of the spies had access to the northern camp in the first place, they were relatively out of sight, though Danny started to hear some rumors about giant bats for some reason after she allowed the dragons out to fly at night.

Unfortunately even, Brynden, Alayaya and Domerick didn't know all the tricks and they missed a few spies. Most particularly, they missed the fact that Lord Wayn's steward, who was the most powerful person in that house given Lord Wayn's declining health and mental acuity, had been trying rather desperately to poison the old man against Daenerys. Ser Crenlock Shett was a rather large man, almost of a size with Smalljon in height though not in breadth, he looked as if he could have been used as a gigantic coat rack in fact, and his hair was completely gray.

He was used to having it all his own way, since he had been running Lord Wayn's keep and lands more and more in the past few years. Of course for most of that time he didn't have anything much to report to either of his two masters, Lord Lannister and Varys, but the stipend they both paid him and the money he was able to launder allowed him to keep his mistress in Gulltown very happy indeed.

Unfortunately, Crenlock's ability to control Wayn's actions was based upon there being both no crisis and having access to him while decisions were being made. Since Daenerys' first move had been to insist that only the Lords be present during their discussions, she had been able to dominate the discussions without Crenlock being able to interfere.

It was that desperation, and the knowledge that both of his couriers had been found that caused Crenlock to start poking his nose around, though not his own of course. He had six trusted men, men whose loyalty ostensibly was to Lord Wayn, but who were truly loyal to him. He had them listen to rumors and watching for anything unusual, while he began to think about ways to remove Daenerys.

Right now his hands were worrying at one another, and he was furtively glancing from side to side. He'd lost quite a few contacts the past few days, and he knew that most of his fellow spies had been found out thanks to the Summer Island whore and that damn northern bard working with Bryndan, whose intelligence Crenlock had long suspected was rather higher than he was happy with. But that was but a patch on the real reason he was nervous, because one of his men had gotten a young Northern page drunk, and found out that Daenerys had far more going for her than just her last name.

"Dragons, the bitch has two dragons, young yet but, gahhhh!" He said, his tone low but almost manic, and very much afraid, his eyes on the door to his office. It wasn't really an office, he'd simply commandeered the room that had belonged to the innkeeper's young daughter. It was a small threadbare place, worse even than Crenlock's room back in Castle Wayn let alone the magnificent apartment he kept in Gulltown. He hadn't been there in months, not since old Wayn had been forced to divest himself from Castle Wayn and come forward with his men. "We, we need to act, and I know of one way to turn those dragons on the fucking northerners..."

Unfortunately, the guard on Daenerys was too much for any subtle plan Crenlock came up with to work. Smalljon and Ser Barristan never left her side save when she was asleep in the room she shared with Alayaya, and Ser Barristan had retained the services of a crannogman as a food taster. The ladies room was also the furthest along the second-story passage of the inn, only reachable by walking past all the others, which included the room Smalljon and Barristan shared, whose door was always open. So he was forced to go with a brute force approach, one that was much more of an all or nothing proposition than he would've liked.

So Crenlock, knowing it was only a matter of time before he was found out, couched his bet. While two of the men who were loyal to him would carry out his assassination plan, the other four left early in the night with five very good horses, heading toward the Kingsroad then down toward the Trident and beyond that into the area of the Riverlands controlled by the Lannisters. There he met them on his own horse, having ostensibly been sent off by Wayn back to his family's keep to check on things.

This was a route that was too long to have been used up to this point to send spy messages along, but going in that direction allowed him to get away from the Army in a direction that the Northerners weren't watching as closely. The defenses in that direction of the earthworks wasn't nearly as built up either, since they would have a lot of warning of any Lannister incursion coming up the Kingsroad.

The men Crenlock left behind moved that very night. They moved around the inn to the back, where they stood directly underneath the window to the room that Daenerys and Alayaya had taken over. While one of the men stood there his fellow climbed onto his shoulders reaching up for the windowsill. With difficulty the assassin pulled himself up, and opened the window, which Crenlock had stealthily unlocked earlier that day.

Daenerys and Alayaya were not in there at that moment. Daenerys was downstairs talking to the other lords and having an evening meal, while Alayaya was out and about with Domic. This allowed both of the men to hide themselves in Daenerys' room, closing the window and pulling the blinds closed as well. One hid in a corner behind the door between the inner wall and a wardrobe, while the other man hid between one bed and the wall.

The two men waited there in the dark of the room for he didn't know how long, until eventually he heard a set of three footsteps and a female voice murmuring followed by a chuckle. The one nearest the door heard his target murmur "Good night Smalljon, Ser Barristan." Then watched as Barristan opened the door first, glancing inside. Both held still while the veteran's eye's scanned the shadows, not even daring to breath for a moment.

Then Barristan was pushed to one side, a female voice murmuring "Oh give over my lord, I doubt that there is a horde waiting in the shadows waiting to jump out at me."

"You never know my lady, assassins can find you at the most astonishing of times. And as queen your safety is not something I'm willing to take chances with."

"Carry on then Ser."

"Thank you milady, I will."

The assassins held their breaths even more as Barristan entered the room, glaring around him before turning toward the door, but didn't find the assassins, who were both wearing black and gray clothing that let them hide very well in the black of the room. Just as they both felt that Barristan was finished his inspection, the man moved with far more speed than his age would suggest. Jumping to one side, his sword came out of its sheath before thrusting into and through the chest of the man who had been hiding in the corner. "Assassin!"

At that cry and the scream of his companion, the other assassin bolted up from his own hiding place, rushing toward the doorway where Daenerys was standing holding a small candle for light. With his sword stuck in the first assassin Barristan couldn't turn to face the second man, but Smalljon quickly grabbed Daenerys, pulling her out of the way. Even so the second assassin had reacted so quickly, and the room was so small, that he had been able to get close enough for his long dagger to slice into Daenerys' arm despite the speed of Smalljon's response.

Stumbling from Smalljon's pull Daenerys winced as the pain of the slash to her arm hit her, clamping her hand down on it. However her mind was still working, and she growled "Alive Smalljon, I want him alive!"

Smalljon, who had just smashed the second assassin's knife out of his hand with blow from his gauntleted fist, snarled, but complied, lowering his sword while bringing his unarmed hand around again, catching the assassin on the chin. His blow lifted the shorter man off his feet, throwing him across the room to slam into the opposite wall. "You never said he had to be in one piece Daenerys."

By this point Barristan had finally wrenched his sword free of the dead man's chest, rushing over to his queen. "Are you alright milady?"

"A new scar for the collection perhaps, but it might be best to send for a healer as well as someone to take our prisoner to Brynden, I want him squeezed, and squeezed hard." Daenerys replied smiling at the man who, she was swiftly realizing, had just saved her life. "Thank my shield, and if I ever question you again about being too paranoid, feel free to ignore me."

"I will hold you to that milady," Barristan replied, smirking behind his beard as Smalljon laughed while shouts from below indicated the uproar had been noticed.

OOOOOO

Jon and the men he led didn't have any kind of baggage train because in the territory they were going even mules would have slowed them down. The Whispering Wood was not named that because the woods were easy to get through. After all, a lot of the Riverlands had scattered copses of trees and foliage. The Whispering Woods however was as dense and as unclaimed as almost any forest south of the Neck.

To Jon and the Northern mountain clansmen with him however, it was just like coming home. House Grell had long lived on the outskirts of the Whispering Woods, their armsmen were used to moving through its verdant foliage. So Jon led his force as quickly as possible, because they had quite a lot of territory to cover. Though Ranma hadn't really given him a date or anything in which to take their target, Jon felt that a month and a half was the maximum amount of time he should allow.

None of the men were armored as they moved, that would simply have worn them down, and would have made noise. The jingle of chain and the stamping of feet could cover a surprising distance even in a forest. So their armor and weapons were carried on every man's back, along with each man's food supplies. They added to this by stopping occasionally in the midafternoon to send out hunters, and because there are only 700 of them they were able to sustain themselves in the Woodlands.

Several days after they left House Grell territory smoke in the distance indicated they were coming close to Riverrun, and Jon led them even further to the west putting more distance between them and the city just in case. He doubted that the Lannisters had any scouts on this side of the Red Fork, but he didn't want anyone to see them, regardless of who they served. Rumor could carry to Lannister ears just as much as a scout's report after all.

Nearly a week after that Jon opened his eyes, coming out of his warg state with Ghost. He stretched grumbling slightly as he got out of his bed roll at the edge of his force's camp, having unknowingly rationalized that in the same way as his brother. So that is the Tumblestone, joy.

Jon had sent Ghost ahead of the rest of his command to see if he could find and follow the Tumblestone which they would have to cross eventually someplace well down the course of the river. Or rather up, considering they were heading towards its source. Now however he knew why there weren't any farmers near the Tumblestone as there were near the Red Fork or even the other rivers in places. The land around the Tumblestone was nasty, and even just a few days away from Riverrun the river itself was a deep frothy nightmare of massive stone boulders jutting out from a fast current. I hope it gets easier as we go along, or...

It didn't. As the curve of the river slowly turned westward it got deeper, and thankfully the rocks began to slowly disappear worn away by the current over time, but the current itself was still massively fast, too fast to attempt any type of crossing. Eventually Jon called a halt, and he, Ser Desmond, and the mountain clan leaders, Torag and Muldan of the Wull and Flint clans respectively, went forward to view the Tumblestone for themselves.

Here there was a slight curve in the Tumblestone. Here you could tell the river had receded somewhat from its highline, indeed the river only took up about half the gorge it had cut out of the land here. Yet the current still looked more than enough to overwhelm a man in chain mail, or even a normal man in leather.

"We'll never get men across that," grunted Desmond, sounding almost but not quite pleased. He had after all thought this idea was folly back in Fairmarket.

"Our men can't swim," said Muldan, spitting to one side, his mouth a sneer under his full beard. "Where we come fr'm, swimmin' can't be done." There were rivers and the occasional deep pool in the mountains, but they were freezing cold year-round, not quite cold enough to freeze, but more than cold enough to kill anyone who went into them for any length of time. A few mountain men could stay afloat, diving into those pools was often used as a challenge to prove one's courage, but there was a vast difference between that and facing this kind of current.

"We don't have to get everyone across, just one person to set up a rope line." Jon pointed across the river. On the other side there was a large boulder jutting out of the side of the river, with a tree growing at a diagonal next to it. "If we can get some ropes across to that we can make a makeshift rope bridge, one below, two above. Why do you think I've been carrying so much rope all this time?" The northern army actually had commandeered enough rope to supply a war galley when they were in Seagard, and about half of it had been split up among the men with Jon.

More than one man looked a little queasy at the very idea, but none of them were going to say anything that could be taken as cowardice in front of their fellows. "Who?" said Desmond, still looking skeptical.

Jon shrugged philosophically. "Me. I'm the strongest here, and I can swim." The other officers protested this, saying that as commander Jon shouldn't risk himself like that. But Jon refused to listen, knowing he had the best chance of getting across without being swept away by the current.

The rest of the Army came up while Jon tied a thick line of rope around his waist and then over his shoulders. The end of it was being held in the grips of several of the men, as well as Ghost holding the very end of it. The direwolf was watching his master worriedly, but did not argue or try to convince him not to go. Jon patted him one last time on the head then slowly climbed down the side of the gorge and into the water below.

Almost immediately Jon realized that he had underestimated its current, and he had to stand there for a moment, wrapping his arms around a boulder for a moment as he got used to the current. Slowly Jon moved forward deeper into the Tumblestone. Even as strong as he was Jon was almost carried away several times, and despite the best he could do by the time he got across Jon had moved down the riverbank about fifty feet from the target boulder. He was also exhausted, as if he had sparred with Ranma for an entire day.

The men who had been holding the end of the rope however had followed him along and they cheered as Jon, looking and feeling like a wet rat pulled himself up out of the water to lean gasping against the far side of the crevice. He waved at them wearily, then turned to climb upwards.

Moments later Jon was back at the boulder, tying it off. Two more ropes were flung over, and he grabbed from both tying them up to two different trees, then looping them around the boulder just in case. This way the three ropes made a very crude rope bridge, with one rope at the bottom of a triangle for a person's feet, and two on either side for their hands.

With that done Jon leaned against the boulder, wearily watching as Desmond began to organize the men. Over the next few hours the men came across slowly, with only ten on the rope at any time. Despite the ropes they still lost several men who lost their footing and were unable to hold themselves up on the ropes long enough for their fellows to grab them. At one point, one man falling had produced a chain effect, taking four more of his fellows into the water below. Burdened as they were with their packs none of them surfaced again.

Eventually however the entire force was acrossbar Ghost. Desmond looked over at Jon, who had just stood up, looking across the river at his bonded direwolf. "Are you going to go across and carry your pet over?" the knight asked dubiously. Desmond had yet to realize how deadly or intelligent the giant direwolves of the Starks all were.

"No, I'm not that strong, and he's not that small." Jon replied dryly, shuddering inwardly at the very idea for many reasons. "No, I think Ghost will have to get himself across." Leaning once more back against the boulder Jon stared across at Ghost their minds connecting through that strange doorway that was the warg ability.

After Jon got his thoughts across Ghost shook his head, as if pitying his human. A second later Ghost moved, biting through two of the ropes and letting them fall away. They were quickly pulled in by the men on the other side, since they could be of use later that done Ghost bit through the last of the ropes then grabbed the end of it with his mouth, rushing forwards and leaping out into the gorge and into the water.

Ghost was actually quite a bit stronger than Jon hence his confidence but much to Ghost's chagrin this did not equate to a greater ability at swimming. Jon had to help him, pulling him across the river with several other men. The power of the direwolf's jaws and the men pulling on the rope allowed him to get across despite having been carried away slightly.

Once his animal had joined him, looking very wet and very irritable Jon turned to his officers. "We'll continue up the Tumblestone on this side of the river for now, I want us to do at least two more leagues today, then we'll pause for the rest of the day."

Later, while the rest of the men were resting doing the things armsmen needed to during quite moments such as checking their equipment and other matters, Jon once more read Ghost's mind, and the direwolf moved off through the woods. A direwolf at full lope could cover more leagues in a few hours than a man on horseback could cover in a day and could certainly move through the woods far more easily. Even stopping to hunt at one point didn't slow him down. This way Jon used his bonded animal to find the trails they could follow as well as scout out the area for enemies.

Luckily there was still no one around. This area of Westeros had nothing whatsoever to draw people to it, no resources, no arable land, not even much game, it was very much like most of the North in that manner though obviously the weather was different.

Jon's force kept following the Tumblestone for another week, then split off when the area they were travelling too changed from hilly to mountainous. At that point the mixed force stopped moving during the day, and moved through the woods at night with the mountain clansmen in the lead following the trails that Ghost would find them the day before.

In this manner they soon came out of what Desmond and his men called the badlands and into more settled territory. The next day, with the rest of his command hidden among a group of trees and rocks Jon, Ghost and his officers went forward to allow Desmond to get the lay of the land and determine where they were in relation to Wayfarer's Rest.

After a moment Desmond nodded. "We're further up into the hills and mountains than Wayfarer's Rest is, we'll have to go northeast for a time I think."

"You think?" Jon asked.

Desmond shrugged. "I've only been to Wayfarer's Rest a few times, and I've never been here before. That is my best guess, but that's all it is."

"In that case, I'll go forward with Ghost." Jon held up a hand forestalling Ser Desmond's protests. "Can you name someone else who can move as quietly and as quickly as I can?"

Desmond and the mountain clan leaders growled, but knew they couldn't. It just seemed strange for their leader to be doing so much of the scouting but they couldn't argue with the fact that he was the best they had at it.

With that Ghost and Jon were off once more, but they were back that very day, and Jon was grinning viciously. "You were right Desmond, we're somewhat further up into the mountains than Wayfarer's Rest, but we're only within a few days of it! And better, this continues for another day." he said gesturing around them to the hilly woodlands dominated by trees and rocks. "After that we'll be in the open, but we'll be so close we can rush the keep from there."

Jon's words proved prophetic. Another few days' travel, with every man now moving as quietly and silently as possible through this hardscrabble territory brought them to the edge of the mountainous area on the western side of where Wayfarer's Rest sat at the front of the passage through the mountains the River Road followed into the Westerlands. They rested there throughout the rest of the day, with Jon, Ghost and several dozen others on watch just in case someone had spotted them.

No one had, though Jon didn't know if that was because of their cover or because of complacency on the part of the Lannister forces that had remained here. Regardless, Jon's raiding party rushed out of their cover that evening, falling upon the Lannisters patrol nearest them, slaying them quickly and almost silently before rushing on to their target, the way clear for now.

Ahead of them the keep's main gate wasn't even closed, but the defenses had been upgraded somewhat. Around the central holdfast a new stone wall was going up, though only the first few feet of it had been completed anywhere along its length, and there were large gaps in it too.

Jon vaulted this wall while shouts of alarm at last began to be heard from the top of the keep's wall, where several dozen men had been patrolling with torches. "The North!" he shouted, now that the time for subterfuge had passed. "The King in the North! Winter is Coming!"

The men guarding the entrance into the keep proper were still gaping as he fell upon them swords flashing. One man went down with a gurgle his throat slit, while the other backed away rapidly holding the stubble of a hand that had recently been holding a longsword. Ghost slammed full on into a third man, taking him down to the ground and then ripping his head off with a mighty jerk of his jaws.

That was when it began to go wrong. Tywin had left more men here than Jon or Ranma had thought he would and though they didn't outnumber Jon's forces, they were much closer in parity than he had expected, and after that initial shock wore off they responded quickly. Men boiled out from deeper with the keep, slamming into Jon and the outriders of his force trying to regain control of the of the keep's gate while more of Jon's men poured in behind him.

Jon was forced to duck under a flail then fell backwards to avoid a broadsword blow coming in from his other side. One sword caught his opponent's blade guiding it past him while his other short sword thrust out, punching through the other man's chain mail guarded chest. Then another blade nearly took him in the side, but Jon dodge that by the skin of his teeth, feeling it skitter across his breastplate for a moment.

For a moment it was all Jon could do to defend, holding the doorway as more of his men came up, taking out the men that had gotten past him before he could reach it as well as from several small camps set up on the other side of the keep. A vicious melee was happening all over what had obviously been planned to become a courtyard all around him, men dying on both sides in the torchlight.

Arrows also began to fall from above, answered quickly by the archers among Jon's men, who had taken position along the rubble of the planned outer wall. Other Westerlander armsmen tried to break off and rush them, but were stopped by a force under Desmond. The element of surprise was gone, and now it was down to just numbers, steel and fury.

Ghost came out of nowhere, biting into a man's leg and tearing it off in a welter of blood, the man's screaming in agony. Not lingering over that man Ghost moved forward, head-butting another man backwards into three of his fellows. This gave Jon time enough to move back a half-step setting himself for the next charge.

Ten men came at them in a rush, but Jon darted forward again, getting in among their blades before they could respond, his shorter swords serving him in good stead. Two men died, one with his throat cut neatly the other with his intestines bleeding out from an equally neat cut below his breastplate then Jon stepped back, dodging a cut from one side blocking another from the other and kicking out at a third.

One man went down under Ghost, his blade skittering across the ground before the direwolf leaped away, dodging a spear. He then lashing out with a forepaw shattering it to the man's visible shout of dismay. "Monster, a white-furred monsteGAHHH!" At that point he had no life left to scream as Ghost's forepaw came back, smashing his face to flinders despite his helmet, while he dodged a blow from his other side.

This man wore the full plate armor of a knight, but this availed him not at all. Ghost dodged a blow from his large broadsword, then his head darted to one side, striking almost as quickly as a snake, gripping the man's arm. With a wrench of tortured metal he twisted, ripping the man's arm out of its socket despite the plate armor covering his arm and shoulder. The man cried out in agony echoing the other man's death scream, even as Ghost turned to jump over a spear thrust, lunging forward over the spear to take the spear-wielder to the ground, his fangs seeking his throat. "AGGHH, m-monster! Monster!"

The two of them held there, killing over two dozen men in the next few moments, while all around him the men who had been camped outside the keep were slowly overwhelmed despite the archers on top of the keep helping them as best they could. Soon the fear that Ghost engendered in the men facing him began to tell, and the men trying to get out of the keep Instead they fell back no doubt intent on fortifying its interior.

Jon however wasn't about to let them have any respite. He shouted aloud one short sword held up above his head. "Rally to me, rally to me!"

All around him mountain clansmen gathered, their short hatchets and broadswords bloody, their eyes afire with eagerness. "In and at them, boys!" Jon growled. "Keep up the pressure!" All the men around him nodded grimly, and Jon and Ghost led the way howling, "Winter is Coming!"

OOOOOO

Hours later, Jon winced slightly as he stalked into the small prisoner's area to stare at the small number of prisoners among the Westerlands armymen they had taken. He kept his wince well-hidden of course, for what he had planned right now that would be a hindrance. Ghost padded beside him, and Jon could tell that the prisoner was staring at the direwolf in horror.

At Jon's 'suggestion' Ghost hadn't yet removed the blood that practically coated his muzzle from nose to neck as well as his paws. The blood stood out starkly against his white fur, making him look all the more terrifying. Not that Ghost cared about that, direwolves were surprisingly fastidious creatures. He desperately wanted to find some water to get his fur clean, or a few moments to lick the blood off in a pinch. Now Ghost began to growled low in his throat moving forward to sniff the man who was chained to the wall.

"Now Ghost, I said you can't eat him." Jon's said mildly then went on, looking at the prisoner staring into his wide terrified eyes. "Not yet anyway. Of course that might change if I don't get the answers I wish. So tell me... friend... why are there so many supplies here, and why were there so many of you armymen here? I would have thought that Lord Lannister would want every man he could get up with his army on the other side of the Red Fork by this time, I know my brother you see."

After only a second's frightened staring the man began to gabble. Jon held up a hand. "Calmly my friend, calmly. As long as you tell me the truth the answers don't actually matter, I just want the information. But don't try to lie. I don't like it when people lie to me and there are a dozen other prisoners I'm going to be questioning after you. And anyone of you who lies well..." Jon sighed sadly. "I haven't been able to feed Ghost well lately on the march, and he's given feeling a might hungry."

OOOOOO

The next day dawned bright and cheery despite the bloodshed and carnage that had occurred the night before. Jon sat on the parapet right over the keep's gateway, Ghost curled up next to him as Jon honed the edge of one of his short swords, thinking hard about what he had heard from the prisoners he had 'interrogated'. The news that even with House Blackwood having pulled their men back to Raventree Hall months back, there was still groups raiding the Lannister supply lines was excellent, as was the timing of his raid in one way, having taken Wayfarers Rest right before another convoy was due to go out.

It had explained both why there were so many supplies here, and the number of men the Lannisters had kept here.

The losses among his own troops had been severe, sixty of the archers dead, along with two hundred mountain men and seventy-seven men of House Grell, not even counting the hundreds of wounded. He had barely three hundred men fit to defend this place.

That bit about a few of the raiders wearing Stark colors was interesting. Jon wondered if they were survivors of the men that his father had sent out with the force under Lord Dondarrion and the Red Priest to destroy the bandits raiding along the Westerlands and Riverlands border. Still, my job isn't to hunt them down and see if they would like to join up with us, my job is to hold Wayfarer's Rest. That might be a tall order in the long run if Tywin responds too quickly to Ranma's strategy and sends enough men back to reclaim this place.

Still, we've got that group of Westerlands stoneworkers here, and I bet they'd be willing to work for us if we promised to pay them and, you know, not torture them. Jon smirked remembering the act he and Ghost had put on early that morning. Indeed they will probably be most eager to work for us. And I don't see any of them trying to bargain a price for their services.

A moment later, Jon's thoughts turned somber. If the worst occurs I want that outer wall at least partially completed everywhere along its length, and enough stones brought in to close the entrance to the keep entirely. We've got enough supplies to last out a siege, we just need to make sure that the defenses are up to that task as well. And, I want to start building some catapults too. That way even if Tywin simply retreats down the pass unwilling to get bogged down in a siege here we'll still be her able to hurt his army.

Jon stood up, staring to the north and east. He wondered what was going on out there, wondered if Ranma had bitten off too much than even he could chew and a dozen other things that could affect not only what occurred here, but the course of the war in general.

Ghost bumped his head against Jon side from where he was laid out next to him. Jon nodded understanding the message and turned resolutely towards the staircase down from the keep's crown. He had work to do.

OOOOOO

Stannis had not been pushing his army very hard from the moment they set out from Duskenale. For one thing, the troops he had taken off of the royal navy's war galleys needed training in land tactics and fighting in larger groups. Devoting half the day to that training of course slowed the army down. It time was well spent though, since even now only two weeks out from Duskenale their progress in their training was visible. They could now hold a decent shield wall at least in practice, and obeyed orders rather well.

He had also taken the time to begin building siege equipment near Duskenale. The further towards King's Landing you got, the less there was woods from this direction. He wouldn't have the ready source of timber that a force coming up from the south would have in the Kingswood. When this had first been ordered however, several of his lords had protested.

Stannis had replied stating, "I want us to move slowly, I want the Lannisters and Renly to soften one another up for us. We do not have the numbers necessary to take the combined Reach and Stormlands army my lords, but Renly is no general. I have no doubt that his losses will be high in any kind of siege battle, indeed I have no doubt he has already taken severe losses." Stannis's eyes did not flicker over to where Melisandre was standing, by this point he had trained himself to not let that happen.

Melisandre's visions had told him of a battle in front of the walls of the city, and of a Rose being badly burnt. He didn't know if that meant that the army had taken losses which included the men of House Tyrell in particular, or if it meant the Rose Knight Loras had been hurt in some fashion. Either way, it worked to Stannis' advantage to let his enemies continue to fight it out between them.

"And this way, we can reduce Stokeworth and Rosby, letting the troops gain valuable experience using our siege weapons and in siege warfare before moving on to the city. Remember my lords, it isn't who takes the city or even the throne, it is who can hold on to it." And that didn't even consider his wife's plans.

"I mean for us to be the ones to hold onto it. With the Navy supplying us, we would be in a good position to wait out any other army that tries to retake the city, and if the Queen can be made to confess your sins, both the Lannister and the Stark forces will have to pull back. Making peace with the Starks might be difficult at this point given certain recent events."

And here are Stannis couldn't stop himself from glaring over at Melisandre. "But when given the opportunity and so long as we can free Edmure from his captivity I have no doubt that they will be willing to retreat to the North in return for peace in the Riverlands and the Lannisters no longer having any claim on the throne." After that there no one questioned his orders further, and the army continued its slow way further south towards Rosby and then Stokeworth.

Rosby was the first to fall. Having sent most of their men to the capital, there were few left to protect the castle, and it fell in a single day. After putting together the siege engines from the parts made back in Duskendale his archers were able to sweep the walls for the precious few moments that it took to bring up a siege tower, and then his men were across. After that it was all over, though Stannis and his lords had a hard time controlling the men enough to take prisoners even so.

They succeeded in this of course, but not as many as Stannis had hoped. Worse, none of the prisoners were from House Rosby, which was a pity, as was the damage done to the hall when someone set a fire in the dining hall. This forced Stannis and the rest of the men to bunk out in their tents again.

That evening Melisandre walked into Stannis's tent. "Did you know we captured one of the fake priests of the demonic Seven?"

Stannis looked up from where he had been resting in his field chair, a canvas and wood affair that was very light and easy to move just like everything else in his tent. In that area he and Rannar were very alike, they refused to allow themselves creature comforts on campaign when their men could not. "Yes, what of it?"

He did not comment on Melisandre's calling a follower of the Seven a demon worshipper. To followers of R'hllor, all other gods were demons, and their followers either dupes or willing demon worshippers. Though Melisandre was the first follower of R'hllor Stannis had ever met that actually believed that.

"I wish to sacrifice him to R'hllor." Melisandre said bluntly. "The sacrifice of a demon worshiper like that would give my visions much more power and possibly clarity." Melisandre was becoming increasingly frustrated by the need to interpret her visions these days rather than simply watch as events unfolded. Symbolism was something that she used and understood of course, but interpreting her visions through the lens of such was a different story.

"Are you mad woman!?" Stannis bellowed, getting to his feet and towering over Melisandre despite her own formidable height for a woman. "Most of my army still believes in the Seven! They're willing to ignore you and your R'hllor worshiping fellows, but there's a reason why I've never pushed for them to convert as I have, just as I've stopped you from creating any more Shadow Warriors since that first time, it wasn't just a logistical decision."

Carrying those large wooden boxes that the Shadow Warriors had to stay in during the day would have taken up valuable space in their supply train. For something made out of shadow they had a significant weight to them, just as if they were the men whose soul had been sacrificed to make them.

"I understood that, and I understand that men are weak and will believe whatever faith they were born into despite the truth staring them into the eyes. I agreed then and agree now with the need to wait and slowly reveal the truth to them. But I must have a more powerful, more significant sacrifice to power my visions."

"You never needed a sacrifice to power your visions before." Stannis retorted.

"I know." Melisandre said calmly, moving further into the tent. She sat down on Stannis's chair staring up at him. "But something has... shifted. Reading the future is no longer like reading a tapestry, it is like... like reading a gigantic ball of yarn made up of thousands of different colors, while you are only interested in following a few threads. It's even worse trying to scry far away events. The chaos of the moment of now is affecting the distance from which R'hllor can send my vision. If you want precise information, I must begin to sacrifice people and use that power to further my ability to scry."

Stannis ground his teeth, looking away for a moment as he thought. The information Melisandre could provide him about distant lands was invaluable in shaping his long-term strategy, and could even be extremely useful on a short term level. They were why he was in no rush to claim King's Landing, he knew that the food shortage had begun even before the true siege, and had no wish to deal with fighting his way through a hungry populace which may or may not be on his side. They were also why he knew that he had no fear of being attacked from behind or the flank, that the lion and wolf were still snarling at one another up in the Riverlands.

But are they worth the loss of trust in me that will occur if her powers are rubbed into my army's face? There were enough rumors about Melisandre's powers already. The army as a whole seemed to be ambivalent towards them, and there was no septon amongst the men of course. The healers with his army were all maesters, and such men tended not to believe in any kind of faith. But the men did, especially the levies and the armsmen from the Stormlands. One or two of the Lords were also firm believers, and they were watching Melisandre like so many hawks.

"No," he said finally, the word coming out with reluctance, but certainty. "No, I cannot afford to create the internal enemies such a sacrifice would cause to spring up." He held up the hand as Melisandre began to speak. "I know that your visions could possibly weed out such, but I can't protect you from everyone in the army that might be willing to attack you after such a move, or attack me because of my backing you. Unless you can assure me that you can sacrifice him elsewhere and make certain that not even the rumor of it could get back to the Army, I cannot allow you to do that."

Outside the tent Ser Seaworth moved away from the tent's side, certain the discussion wouldn't go anywhere. When Stannis made a decision trying to change his mind was like trying to get water from a stone. Yet despite that, Davos was frowning heavily as he walked off, trying to figure out if he was happy that the Red Witch hadn't convinced Stannis to go through with her plan, or unhappy that the reasons she hadn't been able to were so prosaic rather than simply the fact they were disgusting.

Pragmatism and the need to keep morale up is all well and good, but I would've preferred him to simply say no, I will not be party to evil like that. Pragmatism can too easily swing the other way, and when that happens will Stannis still be the man I swore allegiance to? And when that happens, will my oath to him still hold?

Back inside the tent Melisandre scowled, but after a moment she spoke up hesitantly. "If I can think of a way to sacrifice him without it seeming so, would that suffice?"

"What do you mean?"

"The false priest in question is old and very feeble." Melisandre shrugged. "Such a man could have a heart attack and go at any time. I could hasten such, and still use the power of the demon worshiper's death to power my ability to see current events further away than I can on my own. Future events would take more power and a true sacrifice to the fire of R'hllor." she finished sternly. "We will need to do so at some point."

"That point is not now." Stannis replied firmly. "As for your suggestion, such a decision can wait until after we take Stokeworth and have turned toward King's Landing. At that point I'll need to know precisely what's been going on down at the city, which might require your visions. If so, you may have your sacrifice, but not before."

Melisandre scowled, but nodded her head. "It shall be as you say, Azor Ahai."

OOOOOO

Willas stood up from where he had been sitting in the hall of Old Oak, castle of house Oakheart as one of the servants entered. "My lady will see you in the solar my lord, please follow me." Willas nodded, trying to keep his weariness from his face and body language.

It was hard. His men had crossed the Golden River almost a week back and kept right on marching making for Old Oak as quickly as they could. To call it a retreat might be a little too harsh, but in his head at least Willas knew that was what it was. After the battle in the apple grove Willas no longer had enough men to take on the Westerlands forces in the area, and knew it.

His total losses amounted to half of his heavy cavalry, they had been lost in the ferocious melee among the apple trees, their heavier armor and weapons unable to defend against the numbers or mobility of their enemy. Their sacrifice however was all that had allowed his force to retreat in relatively good order, thus his heavy infantry hadn't suffered nearly as much, only losing about 100 men all told, though a further 70 had been so badly wounded they had died of their wounds later in the march. The levy force, the light infantry that had actually been part of the battle had lost half their number along with nearly all his local guides and several of his own scouts. He hadn't lost many archers or light cavalry but that was scant comfort.

On that same note was the fact that the Westerlands forces had pursued him across the Golden River. They were no longer attempting to head further into the Reach, seemingly intent on wiping out his small army. This didn't stop them however from ravaging the lands they marched through, and this side of the river was now feeling their depredations as well, though not to the extent of their initial victims. Smallfolk could tell the way the wind was blowing, and hundreds of families had already fled before they finished crossing the river.

Still despite my losses if this conversation goes the way I wish it, I might be able to reverse my fortunes. Willas thought to himself grimly. If it didn't, well he was prepared to remove Lady Oakheart and commandeer her men as the heir of the Lord Paramount of the Reach, regardless of his father's initial respect for her position.

Willas was led through Old Oak up to the solar on the fifth floor of the main keep. By the time he was ushered in, his maimed leg was performing its familiar refrain of pain so when the lady Oakheart ushered him into a seat Willas collapsed into it rather less gracefully than he had hoped.

Lady Oakheart sat there, and besides waving Willas into a seat didn't seem to register his presence. Instead she was reading slowly throughout a raven message, which looked quite a bit longer than most messages by ravens were. From where he was sitting Willas couldn't see any of the words, but whatever it was it was engrossing to the woman across from him. She had light brown hair like her son Arys, though it was touched with hints of grey here and there. She was small, almost delicate, yet pleasant to look upon with a comely face, and deep, intelligent eyes.

After a moment Lady Oakheart set the message down, then looked across at Willas, though her eyes were didn't seem to be registering him, simply staring through him at something else. After a moment she shook her head focusing on Willas at last. "This," she said tapping the message. "is a letter from Princess Myrcella, who apparently is traveling with the northern army. She sent it from Seagard. It's an apology of sorts and a thank you."

Myrcella had actually written that message while on the ship. She had wanted to send it off from Winterfell, but none of the ravens there trained to search out anything beyond the Neck but the Eyrie, Highgarden, Seagard, Riverrun and King's Landing.

In it Myrcella spoke about Ser Oakheart, thanking his mother for his service to her, detailing a few of the fun times they had, and her personal feelings about the man, who had acted at times as more than a knight, almost a father to her when her own was lacking in that regard. Then Myrcella described events in the city during the battle of Two Truths. Myrcella went into much greater detail than she had ever had before save with Ranma about how she had been forced to run away from the mob, how Oakheart had helped her over the fence and stayed behind, wounded sorely by that brick to the face to give Myrcella and her friend enough time to get away.

"She thanks me for my son's service, as well as telling me more about how he died in far more detail than the queen regent had. She then goes on to say that she is with the Starks by choice, and that she knows Joffrey is not legitimate."

That wasn't all Myrcella had said on that topic. She had stated 'I know no one will believe me, I know it will be my word against his, but he is a monster above and beyond his bastard origins. Even you would not believe me if I told you why in this letter, it would simply be his word against me, but he is a monster! A beast in human clothing! He has not changed in the years since he was a young boy who disemboweled a pregnant cat in order to pull out her unborn children and show them to our father as if it was something to be proud of. He was glad our brother died, I could see it in him!'

Lady Oakheart had met all three of the royal children in the past having gone to tourneys in King's Landing many a time to see her son in action and though Joffrey had never impressed her one way or the other Myrcella had always been a sweet, gentle, and observant child. She had no idea what Joffrey could've done to be called a monster, but with the accusation of incest being thrown around plus the last bit about him being glad Tommen was dead, Lady Oakheart was very much afraid she could guess.

And if that was the case, her family would never serve the Lannisters again, who were keeping that beast on the throne. Indeed, she was now more than willing to take the field against them, though she hoped to meet Myrcella in person and discover what act Joffrey had committed that had turned his sister so against him. "What would you wish of me and mine?"

An hour later Willas walked the interminable route back down, then out of the keep to where his commanders were waiting in the hall for him. "Well?" asked Ser Graceford. "Is the lady willing to pledge her men to our aid?"

"Her men will leave with us on the morning. 2000 all told, 400 heavy horse, 600 heavy infantry, 200 light horse, and the rest are scouts and archers."

Graceford whistled appreciatively while Toulev simply smiled grimly. "That more than makes up for our losses my Lord, though we might still be under strength in comparison to the Westerlands forces."

"I doubt it." Willas said disagreeing with a shake of his head. "I think they were hammered just as badly as we were in that apple grove, if not worse. Certainly the raiders they were using were. In all likelihood this will give us force parity. And Lady Oakheart shared with me that Lord Crane kept half of his force at home. We'll be able to get at least another six hundred men from him when we turn northwest."

Willas stared around at his troop leaders, his eyes hard, his face set in a grim line that none of his family had ever seen him wear back in Highgarden. "We're going to hunt those Father-damned fucker's down, then after we slaughter them to a man we're going to march up into the Westerlands and take the war to them on their own ground. I will allow for nothing less." Both men nodded grimly, agreement plain on their faces.

OOOOOO

While Ranma was leading the lion around by the nose, Dacey and the rest of the wolfsworn and their raiding force had marched straight west, moving further and further away from the main Northern forces and the scouts from the Lannister forces that quickly began to shadow it once more. Thanks to the chaos of that night battle, and the fact that there was another force heading straight north with the wounded and the Lannister losses in that fight, they got away clean.

Still, Dacey forced them to keep moving westward away from the rest of the Northerners and therefore away from any interest from the Lannisters for now before striking out south towards the Red Fork. It didn't matter after all where along the Red Fork they intersected the River. They weren't about to go for one of the Fords anyway, they were going to swim across.

When one of their scouts reported that the Red Fork was in sight, Arya and Nymeria moved forward with the scout to look at the River. They hid along the bank for a moment as Arya looked across into the distance. From here they could see the smoke of the castle of Riverrun in the distance to their southwest and Arya decided they were too far west. If the Lannisters had any scouts on the other side of the river they would be concentrating on Riverrun and besides, it would put them closer to the supply lines they were supposed to raid.

Keeping well back from the river edge they followed it east, becoming more and more nervous with every day because that was the same direction Ranma had traveled, and they had no idea where his army or the Lannister force was at present. Thankfully Ranma had led the Lannisters well eastwards of their original position which was even further east than Arya and her force's present position.

Soon after a few days careful travel they were well enough away from Riverrun to attempt to cross, and Dacey ordered the men to stop and build a large makeshift raft which would carry their armor and weapons across. Despite the fact the Red Fork was a slow, lazy river for most of its course, the bottom of it was deep and muddy. If a person put a foot wrong in even chain mail getting him unstuck would be strenuous, noisy and dangerous work.

The following night Arya, Nymeria, and Dacey moved forward. Arya had divested herself of her chain mail, her helmet and shield, leaving even Fang behind. She only brought along a very sharp stiletto that she stuck between her teeth as she reached the river bank, gently easing herself into the river. Beside her Nymeria whined, but Arya's glare over her shoulder silenced the direwolf who hesitantly moved forward into the water as well with nary a splash.

Dacey waited for a moment then moved forward himself, her own weapons left with Roger and the others. Not only as the leader of this expedition but as the only other wolfsworn who could swim, she had to go with Arya on this. When she entered the water she made a little more of a splash than Arya or Nymeria, but not much of one despite being so much larger than Arya, who hadn't grown much since they had left Winterfell.

The two Northerners and the direwolf made their way across the river as quickly as they could without splashing too much. The Red Fork was wider here than any portion of the Green or Blue Forks they had seen on the march, but it was also much slower, and therefore they could swim it. Even so, when Dacey had nearly stuck her foot into the deep silt of the bottom she had trouble extricating herself. And in the center it was well above even her head.

Eventually however they did make their way across, pulling themselves up onto the river bank. Arya wordlessly pointed in one direction while Nymeria moved straight ahead, ignoring her wet fur for ranged out for several hours, finding and killing five men who were watching the River, as well as a few more further away who were heading towards Riverrun along the River Road, which was a little too close for their comfort.

As the noises of birds and other animals waking up began, Arya and Nymeria met up again quickly joined by Dacey who nodded. "I think we're good."

"For now anyway, I am really not happy with how close the River Road is to this place, we need to get the men across and over the road as fast as possible, we can hopefully find someplace to go to ground nearby." Arya said. Dacey nodded agreement and they moved back to the river.

Back at the river Dacey stood out in full view from the other bank, waving one hand up above her head. As they watched Daryn, Roger and the others came out up from where they had been hiding moving towards the river. They had all removed their armor already and quickly carried up the makeshift raft.

Roger through across a rope, which Dacey and Arya grabbed, with Nymeria grabbing the end of it in her jaws. While the men made their way across in groups the three of them pulled over laden raft over, with Roger and Hathan on the other side to pull it back the other way. They did this several times before the first group of men were across and took over.

They took over the work on the raft and Arya stretched her arms above her head, shaking her head. "That was irritating. How many days do you think we have before we get to Bracken land?"

"We'll have to keep heading south for a few days even at our best speed to get well away from the River Road before heading west to enter Bracken land. Remember their land is southeast of Lannister fortifications at the Kneeling Man's Ford, we're northwest of that now, I think." They checked with the local guides, Shawney and Mallister men who had come with them for this because they could swim. All of them agreed that was likely.

Arya nodded, then moved over to where her equipment had been laid out. She pulled out Fang testing the edge while she smiled grimly. "Four days straight south, let's move, I hate how vulnerable we are here."

Dacey raised an eyebrow at the young girl, amused that despite her protests about not wanting to lead she was so forward about giving her opinion but nodded and began to organize their men. Within an hour the raiding force was marching off, exhausted from a hard day's work already, but needing to get away from the River Road as far as they could before resting.

The small raiding force continued to travel forward, hiding however they could during the day, mostly up in trees or down and among the fallen leaves, though at one point they had to hide their entire force on an abandoned farmstead to avoid Lannister patrol, which was much more difficult. Nonetheless, they were making excellent time and Arya was almost positive that no one had spotted them yet.

Soon enough they turned further west, and entered Bracken land, finding a former riverbed to hide in during the day. Here there were even fewer patrols than elsewhere, with most of the House's strength devoted to the siege of Raventree Hall. Still, those there wore the tabards of that family, which was enough to tell them they were at their destination, which didn't even consider the fact that for the first time since they had left Fairmarket they saw smallfolk around.

Everywhere else the smallfolk had fled ahead of the Lannister forces, here only a few families had done so, with the majority of them fleeing to Riverrun. Most however had enough faith in their lords to remain where they were, though several of them had paid for that. The Lannister army had not been kind even on the lands of their ostensible allies, the burning and pillaging was just not authorized there.

Even so the smallfolk here did not travel at night which allowed Nymeria, with Arya riding her mind, to scout all over the land in a single night, the speed of the direwolf only matched by its stealth. Nymeria was even able to get close to Stone Hedge itself, a large castle that was at least a quarter again the size of House Vypren's former seat.

Arya could see through Nymeria's eyes, and more importantly she was somewhat better than Ranma at interpreting the information Nymeria's nose took in. It was something that she had practiced with in Winterfell whenever she could, while Ranma had to concentrate on other things.

A direwolf's nose was even more sensitive than a regular wolf's which put every breed of hunting dog in Westeros to shame. Circling the castle, Nymeria could tell in a vague way how many people there were inside it, and the number shocked Arya. There were the scents of only a bare hundred and fifty men in there, and two dozen females or so. That astonished her so much that she nearly came out of her trance. Nymeria could tell that even over the smells of steel and leather that all the men stank of, like most armsmen did.

Arya kept Nymeria there, moving around Stone Hedge throughout the rest of the night then helped Nymeria find a den for the day before opening her own eyes to stare across the riverbed at Dacey. "I think we need to wait on hitting the supply lines for now." She blurted. "Nymeria found out something, something that might let us take out an even more vital target."

Over the next few days Nymeria and Arya scouted out all around, while the men stayed put, trying to not be noticed, and succeeding.

Meanwhile Arya watched through Nymeria's eyes as the men of House Bracken went out from Stone Hedge once to take what looked like a lot of foodstuffs from the local smallfolk, gathering it into the keep. The very next day a group of armsmen wearing the tabards of various Westerlands houses arrived with several carts. They left that same day, their carts now laden with far more supplies than the House Bracken men had gathered in. Two days later, while the men around her were getting restless, Arya and Nymeria watched as a large group of Lannister men arrived from the southwest, with several dozen laden carts.

"The stuff the House Bracken armsmen brought in must be just fresh bread and other things like that." Arya explained to Dacey and the others. "House Bracken must've already gathered as much foodstuffs as they could into the keep, and Stone Hedge has also become a major point along the supply line from the Westerlands. Ranma was right, the Lannister army can't live off the land very well, if at all! We need to take it, now!"

"Our orders were just to raid the supply lines, not try to take a castle on our own." Dacey protested. "Even a hundred men could hold that keep against us if they were prepared, and you said they were much more alert than the men Vypren's seat had guarding it."

That much was true. The Bracken armsmen were much more experienced, and they patrolled the walls day and night, and not with torches to take out their night vision either. The towers were also manned, and they did have lights inside, but the archers in them would be easily able to spot any attacking force coming out of the farmlands around the keep, which was the other issue: there was very little in the way of cover anywhere around Stone Hedge. The Bracken keep had been besieged several times, while Vypren never had. All in all it was a much tougher target despite the defenders lack of manpower.

"Yes, but I think the gains are worth the risk!" Arya argued back, practically growling as she stood across from the older woman, the rest of the wolfsworn moving backwards slightly to let the two women argue it out. "If we raid the supply lines, we'll only be able to do so much damage before they assign too many men to protect their supply convoys! If we take Stone Hedge and Jon's taken Wayfarer's Rest, they lose the two most important points along their supply line, and you know Ranma's going to be coming from the west, they'll either have to fort up and starve or retreat out of the Riverlands south."

Dacey scratched a small scar on her arm for a moment, thinking while staring hard at the younger girl. "That's all well and good, but do you have a plan that might let us do that without being mauled? It won't do any good if we take Stone Hedge without enough men to hold it."

"Yes, I do!" Arya replied, now actually moving closer to Dacey so they were almost standing chest to chest, or rather stomach to head given the disparity in their heights. "We use the same trick the Lannisters tried to use at Fairmarket, only modified a little. Also remember, there'll be hostages to be taken in there as well, if we can get into the castle itself, I bet the defenders will surrender." Arya went on describing her plan, and eventually Dacey nodded, realizing it actually was workable.

Later that night, Dacey, Arya and Nymeria moved out with a few of the local guides. They moved through the scrubland that marked this area of Bracken land they moved north, intending to cut off the road leading to Stone Hedge from the fortifications at the Kneeling Man forward. They had all spread out, which made it easier for them to move silently with Nymeria well ahead of the Arya and the others.

For now the two northern girls, or rather one woman and one girl were alone as they moved through the brush, silent and quiet is only the wolfsworn could be after months of being trained for times like this by Ranma. That thought made Dacey pause for a moment, wondering how long Ranma had been planning to have the wolfsworn act as... she didn't know the word for it really, special raiding force? The fact of the matter was that all of their training had put them on a pedestal well above any normal opponent they could face, though the real, long term implications of that hadn't truly sunk until this war. They had become a tactical and strategic resource, not just warriors several cuts above the norm.

However Dacey pushed that thought to the back of her mind, she had something else she needed to do right now. The two of them were now moving through the night closer together now thanks to having passed through a bit of brush and were now into a small copse of trees. And the other scouts were well out of hearing range, there would be no better time for it. "For someone who didn't want to be in charge Arya you pushed hard for this change in our plans."

"It makes sense," Arya shrugged, keeping her own voice low. "Stone Hedge doesn't have the manpower to face us in an open battle. If we can get inside we win. We win a lot more than we would if we were just raiding the supply lines."

"I know that, and I agreed with your reasoning or else we wouldn't be out here right now." Dacey said slowing her pace down and reaching out to touch Arya on the shoulder to slow her down in turn.

The Mormont woman's voice was a whisper in the dark of the thicket, but intense and stern for all of that. "But I was the one given this command, I am in charge. When we go into battle, I need all the men to look to me. I can't have them up pause even for a second wondering whose commands they should follow or who they should look to for orders. Don't challenge me like that again, not in front of the troops."

Arya's bared her teeth reflexively at the admonishment in Dacey's voice and she knocked the older woman's hand away from her shoulder growling. It was a very wolf-like sound, which made Dacey scowled. She had been afraid of this. Arya crouched, almost as if she was about to lunge at Dacey, Fang forgotten at her side.

However Dacey was much faster than most would assume looking at her, and while she wasn't up there in strength in terms of the wolfsworn, neither was Arya. Arya found herself lifted out of the air and slammed back against the tree behind her. "Control it." Dacey growled in her ear. "Don't let the wolf in that far! You're human girl, remember that."

Arya growled a little, but she slowly got control of herself. After a moment she nodded shakily, waving off Nymeria, who had appeared out of the trees growling deep in her cavernous throat at the site of her bonded human being manhandled by the bear woman. "Sorry." Arya grunted. "I've been warging with Nymeria too often lately. Jon and Ranma warned me something like this might happen, but I didn't believe them. Sorry."

"I don't need an apology, girl." Dacey said backing away and cuffing the younger girl in the back of the head. Arya grinned, having always enjoyed have Dacey simply treated her like a young boy rather than a young woman to tell the truth, regardless of her status as a Stark. "I said the plan was good, and it shows that you might be ready for command whatever your reflex reaction might have said. But if you want the command, you can't just challenge me like a wolf would challenge the alpha for the leadership of the pack. Humans don't do it like that understand?"

"I just needed to be reminded." Arya muttered, nodding her head. "And I'm not ready, I don't have the situational awareness you need to be able to give orders in battle, I didn't do that when the Lannisters attacked that night no matter what anyone thinks. I simply shouted at people and gathered them to me, after that I didn't try to organize them or anything."

"That sounds a heck of a lot like giving orders in battle to me." Dacey replied dryly. "If you think you can do a better job, we'll transfer the command to you, tell the men about it, and be human about it, not like a wolf. And you're cutting back regardless on your warging times with Nymeria."

Arya nodded, drooping a moment in weariness. Crisis averted Dacey moved off again through the copse of trees with Arya and Nymeria following behind.

At one point the trail they were following at a distance might have been barely used, but since the Lannister forces had begun to dig in on their side of the Red Fork that had of course changed. Now it was pitted and rutted with use, all of the nearby plants having been chopped away. There were very few places along its edge where an ambush could succeed now, but Dacey and the others persevered. They found a place eventually, where the drovers would stop about a day and a half is out from Stone Hedge.

There wasn't much cover there, but the northerners were good at this game. Certainly better than the Westerlanders, especially here in territory they knew they and their allies controlled. It wasn't like the bad area nearest the Mummer's Ford, where there was still cases of brigandry. So there were only twelve guards, and five drovers. Following them even during the day was child's play for Nymeria and Arya, even without Arya riding Nymeria's mind to it.

A little while after the next the convoy arrived at the watering hole, the Northerners and their Riverlands allies came out of the scrub brush all around, dropping down from one or two trees that were near the watering hole, or in Dacey's case bursting out from the small pool of water.

Dacey's claymore also came up out of the water, gutting a man who had just been about to drop a waterskin into the water. His body fell to the side, and Dacey absently kicked it away from the water so that it wouldn't pollute it before charging forward. Roger and Hathon came in from both sides, leading ten of the Northerners apiece to make certain that there wasn't any way the defenders could get away.

However instead of being armed with swords or anything within edge, all of them were armed with long clubs which made the battle a little more difficult than it would otherwise have been. But only a little. The man who had been marching alongside the wagons fell quickly, and then a few Northerners leaped up onto the wagons, knocking unconscious the drovers before pushing them off the carts.

Two men on horseback at the back of the small party tried to turn away, but Nymeria was there snarling. The sight of a monstrously huge wolf and the sound caused both horses to rear up in abject terror, throwing their unprepared riders off. One landed awkwardly on his neck, then fell limp, and the other one found itself facing Nymeria face-to-face as his horse ran off. A second later only both horses were hit by arrows from a few archers who hadn't participated in rest of the attack. Horses after all would return to the herd, and that could give the game away just as easily as anything else.

"And now we strip them or all you strip them," Arya said, growled, somewhere between irritated and embarrassed, looking away suddenly. "I don't think any of them have anything that would fit me."

It turned out that none of them had anything that would fit either Arya or Dacey. For all that she was a warrior and had been trained as such for most of her life Dacey still had feminine curves and a generous chest, far too much of one to even fit into either the guard's armor or wear the drovers clothing and look like anything but a woman. Arya of course didn't have any chest yet, something she was glad of. But she was also short, far too short for any of the clothing they had just taken to fit her.

So both women hid in one of the carts at the back of the convoy, Nymeria barely fitting between them, rumbling discontentedly at the tarpaulin over them. Arya tried to shush her bonded direwolf, succeeding for several moments at a time while the convoy wound its way down the road towards Stone Hedge.

Each of the convoy's carts had five men lying under the tarpaulins. The rest of the raiding force were waiting near Stone Hedge, hidden here and there in small groups three to ten men strong, ready to rush forward the moment the castle's gates were taken.

On the front cart Roger and Hathan were sitting together. Roger wore the uniform of one of the guards, whose colors, a blue rooster on a yellow background, was from one of the Westerlands Houses, a Knightly House if he was remembering it right. Though why any self-respecting knight would put a rooster on their banner is beyond me. Hathan on the other hand hadn't fit anything the guards had so he dressed up as one of the drovers instead.

"A thought occurred to me just now." Roger murmured, as they began to see Stone Hedge in the distance. Hathan grunted, which Roger took to mean he could keep speaking. "What if the guards in Stone Hedge know the guards on the convoy? We only watched one convoy after all, it could be the same guards every time, or it could be a set amount of guards all of whom the Bracken men might know."

"That is not a thought I want to hear at this moment." Hathan said, breaking his habitual silence, reaching across and thumping Roger on the shoulder. "You were all for this plan when Arya came up with it, you could have said something then."

"Yes, but it didn't occur to me then. Did you notice the bit of tension that started between Dacey and her, rather interesting I thought. The little wolf has grown up quite quickly."

Hathan grunted noncommittally. "She's still got a bit of growing to do."

"Yes, but the plan was good. The details, they are not pleasant to contemplate."

"You mean the part where it might be the two of us against over a dozen archers on a four-story tall wall?" Hathan murmured, the cart having trundled on during their discussion.

"Exactly that detail, yes." Several moments later, that moment happened, as they came close enough to hail the archers up on the wall. Roger did so, the only one of them who didn't have a distinct northern accent, hence why sitting in the front cart.

A few of the archers actually waved back, then both men held their breaths as the portcullis slowly began to open and the cart began to trundle into the gate area, which was barely a cart's length long. It was only a few seconds before the portcullis at the far end of the gateway began to open, but even so for both men they stretched on like years, the murder holes above them so potent with threat. Yet none appeared.

The inner portcullis and the gate there opened allowing the convoy through the gate area and out into the courtyard of the castle. As the last cart trundled under the portcullis a dozen servants began to hurry towards them from the stables, and even a few guardsmen were also moving towards them from the barracks area. There it began to go bad. One of the guards said "Here, you're not Lawrence, where's the regular lot?"

At that the men in the carts all boiled out, with Dacey and Arya being the first. "Winter is Coming, traitors!" Arya shouted.

Immediately the men on top of the wall turned and began to fire. Several of the Northerners went down to their bows, though a few others also pulled out their own longbows and fired back, taking out a few of the defenders, since the wall lacked any cover on its interior.

Nymeria bounded out of the cart, causing cries of dismay and fear, which were exacerbated a second later when she began to howl loudly. After which she joined Arya, rushing over towards the gatehouse.

That was the signal for the rest of the Northerners outside the castle to start rushing the gate. Seeing that, several of the archers on the wall turned and took them under fire, but the Northerners and their Riverlands allies rushed on.

Arya and Dacey slammed into the inner doorway leading into the gatehouse, taking the archers stationed there from behind. Fang slew the first man who turned, slicing his leather armor from side to shoulder in one swift movement before coming back to sliced through another man's arm as it was hastily raised in defense, Fang's edge glowing slightly blue. Dacey barreled in after her, her claymore out and piercing one man through the shoulder causing him to scream aloud while she turned to her next opponent.

Outside more of the Northerners had fallen to the bows of the Bracken men, but the first two groups from outside the castle had raced into the courtyard, their own archers firing back against those on the wall while Roger and Hathan led the charge forward over the bodies of the nearest guards, ignoring the screams of the servants as they scattered. Roger shouted, "I'll hold the door to the keep, you head for the barracks!"

Hathan didn't bother replying, simply veering off at the head of a dozen men. He winced as an arrow slammed into his shoulder and almost penetrated his ill-gotten leather armor, the only type that could fit under his disguise. He lamented his plate armor's loss for a moment then he had no more time to do so as the men in the barracks boiled out. However for the most part they hadn't been wearing their armor either.

Hathan dodged one man's blow who was wielding a heavy axe that almost looked as large as Roger's, before punching the man hard enough in the stomach to make the air whoosh of his lungs while he blocked another blow from someone else's sword with his own longsword held in his other hand. He tried to thrust forward to catch the other man, but he was too used to his own weapon and misjudged his lunge. The greatsword he wielded from horseback had to be left behind with the rest of the men after all it would have stood out in an infantryman's hand.

He felt his armor rip along one side, the leather parting as another man tried to open up his side, but Hathan had twisted away at the last moment. Hathan's arm came back, his own sword slashing the other man's leather armor and cutting deep into the area between his shoulder and neck. "The Mander, the Mander for the King of the North!"

Roger was having similar difficulties, only worse. There were five men who led the charge out from the keep. There were only six other men with them, but the five in the lead wore the plate armor of knights, and the men behind them also wore chest plates of the better sort of armsmen. Roger and his men met them in the open area right before the keeps doors, and the defenders held for a precious few moments as the doors slammed shut behind them.

"Old God's damn it!" Roger bellowed even as he blocked a blow from one man's greatsword changing its direction enough to come up inside the man's range and slamming his elbow into his gorget with enough force to crumple the plate there and crush the jugular beneath. That man fell and Roger let his own blade fall to the ground, grabbing up the man's greatsword, coming around with a blow that blocked another man's greatsword pushing him to one side.

Around him three Northerners were already down, for only one of the Bracken men, but more Northerners were racing forward while more and more of them entered the gate, which was now firmly in the Northerners hands. "Surrender!" Roger yelled, going chest to chest with one of the other knights and then throwing him backwards in a show of strength that no one but another wolfsworn could've matched. The man actually left the ground for 15 feet before slamming into another man carrying him into the now closed gates of the keep.

That gave the other Bracken men pause and Roger raised the greatsword pointing it at them. Behind him Arya and Nymeria came up, blood on Fang and her fangs. "Surrender! You will be well treated, you and your charges inside."

Even with the sight of the monstrous wolf baring down on them they didn't surrender and the battle in the courtyard continued, with another knight falling as Nymeria bore him to Earth, while Roger cut an armsmen almost in two with his borrowed blade. For some reason however he couldn't push his knife energy into the edge.

Above them in the keep a few archers began to fire down at the Northerners in the courtyard, their fellows having already been swept from the walls. The battle was particularly vicious in front of the barracks, and Hathan took a mace that cracked several of his ribs and a cut to his thigh that only a last-minute turn kept from taking his leg off entirely. His return blow however split the man from shoulder to crotch despite his plate armor, and by that point Nymeria and Arya were there, having left Roger and Dacey to guard the gate of the keep.

The northern and Riverlands archers raced up to the castles walls, half of them looking out while the other half began to fire into the keep from a much more equal position despite the fact that they were open to return fire. Several more died then, but they also silenced the defenders in the keep.

The last group of Northerners entered, a force of five that had been working on a small battering ram. Once they entered, Dacey and Arya ordered the portcullis closed. This castle was not like house Vypren's seat, there was only the one outer gate, and it was now firmly in the Northerner's hands.

Dacey turned from the entrance to the keep with Roger, moving over to see to Hathan. "You lead the attack inside." she ordered, looking at Arya. "Remember, we want prisoners and we don't want this to turn into a slaughter."

"A little late for that." Arya murmured, wiping Fang on a dead man's tunic, the man had not even had time to pull on his armor. "Still I understand what you meant."

She moved over to stand in the open in front of the keeps doorway, shouting aloud. "Open your doors and surrender, we don't want to slaughter here! You will be well treated if you surrender now, but we can't guarantee your safety if you keep fighting!"

For a moment she seemed to hear an argument going on, a man's voice and a woman's voice arguing shrilly, the woman's voice demanding that they surrender while the man said they could hold out. Hearing that, Arya shook her head and gestured at the men carrying the battering ram. "Knock it down."

She then looked over at the rest of the men who were waiting around the keep's gate. "After me." She growled, her teeth bared almost like Nymeria's, who was standing behind her, as tall now at the shoulders as a horse. "And if any of you even think of killing a servant, I will gut you and feed you to Nymeria."

With a true bonded's ability to get the timing just right Nymeria turned with her teeth bared in a snarl. The Riverlanders and Northerners all nodded, the thought of taking a little bit of revenge for their dead friends disappearing from their minds for a moment. It wasn't anything personal, they were just men. But even that the best of men, after they had just seen friends die, could commit acts that they wouldn't normally.

It only took five swings of the small battering ram to smash the gates of the keep open. Stone Hedge's defenses had been so good that an interior defense hadn't seemed a priority. Arya and Nymeria entered quickly, cutting down two men who had been trying desperately to stack some furniture in the way with a group of male servants who backed away hurriedly.

One of them even screamed so loudly Arya stopped for a moment. "Are you a man, or a little girl?"

The man actually had the courage to look insulted for a moment while the rest of the Northerners raced inside.

"Never mind." Arya grunted. "On your knees and your hands above your heads and stay that way." With more northern barbarians entering the servants surrendered quickly, showing much more sense than the remaining defenders.

There were only about fifteen or so of those remaining defenders, led by an old knight with white hair and a walrus mustache that reminded Arya, after she pulled Fang out of his stomach, of Lord Manderly. But the man obviously hadn't had even a quarter of that Lord's intelligence if he thought they could've held out. She glared over at a statuesque woman standing in front of three daughters of various ages ranging from older than Arya to one who was younger. The younger girl was watching her avidly, her eyes wide and staring.

Arya knew that look, she had seen it in the mirror often enough and she wondered if maybe she'd just found another girl who wanted to be a warrior rather than any of the roles her genders set for her. For now however she couldn't take the time to find out. "Lady Bracken?"

"I am she, and you are?" The lady almost contrived to sound contemptuous, but there was a bit of a tremble to her voice that told Arya how terrified she was.

"I am Arya Stark, granddaughter to your Lord Paramount and brother of his current representative." Arya replied bluntly, watching the woman pale slightly. "This castle is ours now. You and your daughters will be well treated, so long as you make no attempt to escape, both you and your servants."

"And what will happen in the future?" said one of the daughters, moving around her mother to face Arya squarely, more self-assured now that they weren't about to be raped.

"That will depend on what happens elsewhere." Arya said shrugging. We'll hold this castle until we're relieved, but you can bet your house will be punished for backing Lord Lannister."

"The crown." Lady Bracken said cool coldly. "We backed the crown and the crown's representatives. Lord Lannister is the current King's grandfather, and the evidence of Lord Edmure's treason was telling."

"And it gave your husband the chance to do what he always wanted, try to move against House Blackwood." Arya replied sarcastically. "Besides, evidence is always compelling if you only see one side of it! I'm not here to discuss politics with you, you're not intelligent enough and I don't care enough. You may retain your rooms, but there will be guards on the doors at all times, and the servants will only interact with you when guards are present. Do I make myself clear?"

All the women there nodded, cowed slightly by Arya's wild eyes, although the youngest was no longer staring at Arya. She was staring at the direwolf that had padded through the doorway behind the strange, short warrior woman. She pulled at her bigger sister's dress and pointed. "Can I have one of those?"

Arya laughed, shaking her head and rubbed at Nymeria's muzzle for a moment as she came up directly behind Arya. She winked at the youngest girl, then moved off leaving the family to themselves while she placed guards outside the room and then ordered another man to drag the body of that old knight away.

Thanks to Arya's bloodthirsty threat there hadn't been any kind of slaughter among the servants, though the defenders hadn't been so lucky, killed to a man. They only took 22 prisoners among the armsmen of the house mostly from the barracks, but only two servants had died, one when he tried to attack a Northerner from behind with a kitchen knife, and another from a heart attack when the Northerners had barreled into his room.

By the time the sun was starting to lower, the Northerners were ensconced in the castle, their injured were being seen to by their own men and the servants, and the walls were more defended than they had been before the attack. Stone Hedge had fallen and with it and Jon's assault though Lord Tywin didn't know it, his army's supply line.

OOOOOO

Loras sat outside of his tent, watching in the distance as catapults once again began to fire on the city. From where he was sitting he could see over a dozen of them, mostly of mid-size for the breed. They fired rocks the size of a man farther than an archer could shoot. They slammed with thunderous force into the outer walls of the city, but their thick stone withstood the punishment with ease.

The same could not be said for the catapults, a few of whom were hit by return fire as he watched, the defenders much larger pieces of rock, which were larger than the catapults boulders slamming into or around the catapults with devastating results. The trebuchets of the defenders were incredibly accurate for some reason, and much longer range than anything the army had been able to build thus far. They had their own trebuchets being made near the Kingswood, but they were weeks away from being completed.

While the men around the catapults went to work trying to repair what they could, Loras turned away in disgust, wincing as the move aggravated the wounds on his shoulder and neck. His wounds were nowhere near healed, but already Loras could tell that he would be scarred for life. Indeed when he looked in the mirror Loras could only remember how many jokes he had heard or taken part in talking about Sandor Clegane and his burned face. Not much fun on this side of joke, is it? Loras thought darkly.

The loss of his good looks was not the only thing bothering the Knight of Roses, more worrisome was the fact that since he had been injured he hadn't seen his lover Renly. He had seen his father often, practically every other day, but Renly had not stopped by. Despite being king, Loras knew that Renly could've made time to see him if he wanted to. No, Renly was deliberately avoiding him. That hurt, that hurt a lot! And what does it say about our love that when I'm injured like this he doesn't find the courage in himself to come and see me? Was our relationship that shallow?

Filled with dark thoughts Loras took one last look at the city in the distance then moved back into his tent determined to drink himself into a stupor.

OOOOOO

"The fire of the defensive catapults is amazing my lords," said Lord Risley, who had been put in charge of the siege equipment along with Lord Cafferren, who was in charge more of building them rather than using them. "We lose one or two of our own every time we use them despite trying our best to move them after each launch. No matter how hard we try, the trebuchet's can range on them anywhere around the city."

"We've battered portions of the wall, but we haven't done enough damage to cause a breach." Renly murmured. "We know that the siege is working. There is no way that the defenders can keep feeding themselves and the smallfolk, and eventually the smallfolk will turn on them but it galls me to have to sit here and wait like this. Do we have any further news about the second echelon, or where my brother is?"

"Your brother seems to have turned aside from a direct route to the city, your majesty" said the leader of their scouts, Lord Steadmon who was also in charge of gathering information from the smallfolk settlements that were well away from the besieging army. There weren't many smallfolk courageous enough to remain on their land so close to any army, but there were a few. It was that aspect of his job that allowed Lord Steadmon to keep a tab on where Stannis was in broad terms. "He's making for Castle Stokeworth my Lord, should be there within another week or so, he's going very slowly for some reason."

"Interesting," said Renly murmuring to himself, "I wonder why he's moving so slowly?" No one there, not even Randyll knew the answer to that one and Renly shrugged his shoulders. "The second echelon?"

"They should have reached the edge of the Kingswood by now and coming up the Kingsroad my liege, I estimate another one or maybe a week and a half before they arrive." Mace said, knowing his second son Garlan would be pushing them hard.

"Good. That will give us enough men to both keep the siege going and turn to engage Stannis if need be."

"You assume that he is going to fight us your Majesty?" Said one lord from the Reach.

"Yes I do for two reasons." Renly replied, smiling thinly. "Stannis is a prideful man, and very certain about his rights. He will not wish to bend the knee to me, whatever the size of our army, or the fact that all know he would make a horrible king. He believes himself our older brother's heir, and he will act upon it. Moreover, there are the rumors of his changing to fire worship to think about. Madness!" Renly shook his head. "Sheer madness! Could any right thinking follower of the Seven consider such a thing?"

There were firm headshakes all around. The Faith of the Seven had the most hold on the people of the Reach, even the lords there believed in some of its tenants if not all of them. What rumor said about the Red Witch horrified them.

"No, Stannis will fight. Oh, I'll try to parlay with him, but it's doubtful it'll get anywhere. Best to assume the worst after all, and plan accordingly."

OOOOOO

At the same time that Jaime was leading the defense of the city against this latest assault, the small council were meeting to discuss other problems. "The food situation is becoming grave your majesties." Petyr said, for once simply stating the truth without having any ulterior motive. "Your decision to cut rations even further to the smallfolk my Lord has had a hugely detrimental effect on morale in the city."

"It had to be done." Rupert replied his face like stone for a moment. "If they're not involved in the siege, they don't need to keep up their strength like those who are."

"The city is still receiving some food, but not much. The Lyseni pirates are after all pirates, and their various captains have set up a black market to make some money on the side, selling food to anyone who can meet their price." Varys said. "I have moved to take control of that and I've done my best to keep the prices down, but even so I know that some of the pirates continue to trade directly to the smallfolk who can pay for them. The smallfolk have begun to prey on one another even more than usual in order to get the money to pay for food, but that is like an animal eating its own tail. Eventually they will turn on us if we don't start allowing more food to pass on to them."

Rupert frowned rubbing at his face. The fact of the matter was you could not prepare a city for siege. It was simply impossible, unless the city had been built with that in mind. King's Landing certainly had not been, and this led to problems. The food was only one factor, the shanty towns built up outside the walls had been another, but that had been solved by this point. But that left the sheer numbers of smallfolk, the general clutter of the city and the fact the walls demanded nearly all of his men and the gold cloaks to defend them. The Red Keep had its own garrison, as did all of the food depots, but Rupert was beginning to fear he would have to move the food someplace else. Once that news spread, well...

The Queen and Joffrey both frowned too. Lord Serret had forced both of them to cut back on their own food, as well as the rest of the court here in the Red Keep and to say that had been an unpopular decision was putting it mildly. Still Cersei had understood the reasoning, and with her backing even Joffrey had been forced to accede to Rupert's demands. Of course they still ate far better than the common soldiers let alone the smallfolk, but at this point that wasn't saying much.

"If the Pirates are willing to sell foodstuffs to us, would they be willing to turn their coats entirely?" Cersei asked. "I know you said before that such would demand too high a price Varys, but at the moment we are in a cleft stick."

"It would depend upon what the so-called 'Prince of the Inland Sea' has been offered." Varys replied shrugging his shoulders. "As the sale of foodstuffs have been from single captains here and there, I haven't been able to discover whether or not the Saan is even aware of them. If he was, that could be a clue that he could be persuaded to change sides, but I don't think we have enough time to wait for that. I do know Saan is friendly with the Onion Knight, who is Stannis' right-hand man, so his breaking with Stannis is unlikely in any event."

"Nor is food the only thing that is harming the morale of the smallfolk my Lords." Varys went on. "While the Faith might have backed us initially, the Most Devout's ardor has since cooled dramatically. Lord Renly is proclaiming his own position as a defender of the faith, and promising to bring in enough food to feed the entire city if the gates are open for him. It's a shrewd move on his part, and it is slowly gaining momentum among the smallfolk, despite mine and Varys best efforts to combat it in various ways."

"Which doesn't even consider the atrocities of the one the smallfolk have taken to call by the Vile One." Around Varys the small council members all sat forward, this was something new.

At this Varys smiled thinly, but there was no humor in it. "For the past two weeks, possibly more, there have been murders committed in the city, far above the norm of everyday city life. Some of the victim's bodies have been mutilated in horrible ways, then left out on the roads for anyone to find. Whores have gone missing only to be found dead, used in a horrible manner then their bodies abused further before they too were left like so much trash. This is happening all across the city my lords, not just in Fleabottom, and it is effecting morale of every class of smallfolk.

To one side Petyr very carefully let no trace of his thoughts show on his face, merely looking attentive while inside he squirmed, cursing himself for getting into bed with the devil and Cersei and her brother for bringing said devil into the world. He had thought that he could redirect Joffrey's urges into whoring, he had been wrong. Oh, he took up that too, even saw it as a way to prove he was his father's son by showing how good he was at rutting, but afterward, he always 'played' with the whores he found, beyond simply giving them to his men. And he sometimes simply grabbed a random person off the street to torture for pleasure.

Thankfully he knows how to keep his identity secret, the clothing he wears and not actually talking while outside the Red Keep, plus having his guards always wear different sets of armor, none of which have anything that could identify them. And while it's disgusting, helping to feed Joffrey's appetites have allowed me to insinuate myself into his power base, which gives me some measure of protection against Serret, and that makes it all worth it. Petyr very carefully squashed the small voice in his head that another person would have called his conscience when it tried to argue against that sentiment, but he couldn't quite silence it entirely.

"I have not been able to find any clues as to his identity, but rumors make him some kind of noble with a group of ten men at most who follow his every commands, partaking in every dark deed. They are also able to move around the city freely, disappearing during the day to come out at night and prey upon the smallfolk. The rumors have even given him a name, the Vile One."

Joffrey's eyes narrowed, having hoped for some more powerful name. The Vile One was interesting, but he wanted to be known as the Cruel, or the Deadly. Those had some kind of power to them that the Vile One lacked. Still, no one can control rumor to that extent, he thought philosophically. The idea that his actions could have a negative effect on him or his family never occurred to Joffrey. The smallfolk were animals, animals he as king owned. They were there to be used in whatever manner he wished to use them.

"I want that stopped." Rupert growled. "We have too many problems already with keeping the smallfolk under control for that kind of villainy to be added to the ledger. I want this Vile One found, then I want him executed in public." He paused for a moment, thinking hard. "As for the food situation, I'll meet with Jaime and he and I will devise some way to defend the barracks along the walls, making the walls and the gates in particular able to defend themselves from internal attack. After that, we'll talk about moving all the foodstuffs we can to the wall and the Red Keep as quickly and circumspectly as we can, as well as the forces we have defending them. I doubt we'll get away with it, but the defenders need to keep their strength up, and as I said earlier, the smallfolk don't. We can win back their loyalty after we win the war."

"We should also ask the High Septon and the council of the Most Devout to move up to the Red Keep, it's certainly more defensible than the Grand Sept of Baelor." Petyr spoke up, understanding what Serret was planning for.

"Agreed." Serret answered grimly, shaking his head at the necessity of planning for a smallfolk rebellion. Most of those around the table were wondering how bloody it would become, though Joffrey was simply thinking morosely that he would have to cut back on his playtime.

Over the next four days, the defenders of the city got to work, destroying several hundred houses that were near the wall on the inside to create open fire areas, building up defensive walls around the trebuchets, and manning them, while secretly moving the food in the supply depots to the Red Keep and to the walls in small lots. All but the last were noticed by the smallfolk of the city, but that was enough, and small scale riots began to spring up throughout the city. They grew larger over time.

OOOOOO

Since the last clash Ranma and his forces had been heading westward towards the Ruby forward as fast as they could. Their speed however at this point was much less than it had been initially, they had a lot more wounded, and the army in its entirety was exhausted from the constant moves marches and battles. Their morale was still high however, and their trust in Ranma was absolute.

Despite the morale of his force still being high however, Ranma knew this was the make or break moment of his entire campaign, the gamble of all gambles. They had to keep ahead of their pursuers now, the army could not afford to be stopped or even turned aside, they were too low on food and energy. Luckily the chance he had taken by seemingly forting up a few days before paid off, having sucked in all the small forces that could get in front of his army.

Two days after that battle the army marched over the crest of a small hill and left behind a small copse of bushes and trees and suddenly Ranma knew that his gamble had paid off. Because at that moment, while marching at the back of the column, Ranma could hear the cheers begin. Suddenly the men weren't so weary anymore, like racers who had just spotted the finishing line they summoned up some last vestige of endurance.

Ranma looked at Rickard and Patrek, who were riding beside him. Rickard was nearly drooping in the saddle with weariness after the past few weeks but the older man laughed quietly shaking his head. "It would appear as if your wife did it Ranma," he murmured shaking his head. "I didn't think she would honestly."

"I had faith." Ranma said laughing and reaching up to slap the other man on his thigh before racing off. Soon enough he and Fenris were at the front of the column.

About twelve leagues ahead of them directly on this side of the Ruby Ford there was an army camp, with the grey wolf on white banner flying over it at the front, and several other banners alongside it including Umber, Tully, and all the houses from the eastern side of the Green Fork. Ranma laughed. In all honesty, he had thought that Danny would only be able to get a few of the houses from the eastern side of the Riverlands to agree to stand with them, he had not been impressed by what Brynden had told them of Roote or Ryger, let alone Wayn. But the only banner that wasn't there was House Wayn. That was amazing.

Ranma turned to his men, a wide grin on his face. "Alright you louts! Let's get a move on, I don't know about you, but I hear a damn good meal calling my name!"

The soldiers all around him laughed, and the troops marched forward with a will as they began to hear the shouts and cheers of their fellows and even the new Riverlands forces. Units of light cavalry began to ride toward them from the camp, circling the northern host where shouts and greetings were exchanged. Watching that Ranma fell back to the end of the column, ordering Lord Shawney and Rickard to take command and to keep the men moving while he fell further and further back to meet up with Meera.

"You're not going to come forward with us to meet your lady?" Rickard asked one eyebrow rising in surprise.

"We need to make certain that the Lannisters aren't doing anything surprising, who better than me to do it?"

"You need to learn delegation Ranma." Said Rickard seriously reaching down to grip his 'nephew's' shoulder. "Tell Meera to do it, she's proven her worth over the last few weeks, and you know I didn't want her with us. You cannot risk yourself like that any longer unless no one else can perform the job, and in this case Meera can. Besides, I think you and your lady should have some time together after so long apart."

Rickard didn't say that because he was a romantic. He didn't want to come out and say it, but he and he thought the other lords would very much like to see Daenerys pregnant already. Yes, he knew all the reasons why she had to be with the army, but in the end he felt that as a sign of stability you couldn't beat solidifying the line of succession.

"There are others that have been separated from their loved ones for far longer than us, uncle." Ranma said though the words came out weakly as he really did want to see Daenerys. He had missed her dearly of the last few weeks.

"But none as important as you and the queen, and again you cannot continue with this habit of risking yourself without truly good cause. Being in the forefront of the battle is one thing, leading the scouts from the front, or simply scouting around by yourself at night could also be excused considering your skills with that wolf of yours at times. But not now, not when everything is riding on the next battle, especially not since you've set the whole campaign up like that."

Ranma sighed but nodded, and waited with Rickard for Meera to catch up with them.

That was much easier than he had expected, because Meera was already coming up with the last of her scouts. She waved her bow at him, shaking her head when she saw Ranma waiting for her. "The Westerlands scouts fell back, I think a few of them got around us enough to spot the rest of the army."

Ranma nodded then when she joined them gave Meera her new orders.

Meera sighed but turned waving her hand again as she ordered the few scouts in site to fall back into the scrub with her. The last week or so had been hard on her men even in comparison to the rest of the campaign, and they had taken serious casualties. In total she only had fifteen or so trained scouts left, when she had started out with over a hundred, though thankfully half that number were missing not because they were dead but because they had been wounded and ordered to retreat to Fairmarket with Daryn.

Ranma walked at the head of his army into the combined Riverlands/Northern camp, exchanging greetings with Greatjon, who reached down out of the saddle to grasp the younger man's arm. "Damn lad, I can't believe you managed to do it, but you did!" Ranma grinned back at him then nodded greetings at the Riverlands lords and the two younger men who were probably their heirs, standing with Smalljon and Ser Barristan.

However his eyes were all for Daenerys, who was already hugging Myrcella, the two of them standing in front of a small tent. Daenerys turned to him, her violet eyes clinging to his face for a moment before she shook herself then deliberately stepped back into the tent. Merry, not noticing Daenerys look at Ranma followed her, still talking, one of her hands making a slashing motion as if describing something.

Ranma was almost in a daze as he followed her, waving his hand occasionally to acknowledge other greetings or cheers. These quickly turned into wolf whistles as the rest of the army noticed how out of it he was and where he was walking.

He entered the tent and found Daenerys and her two little ones there. Both of the dragons raised their heads, staring at him for a moment then lowering their heads once more. Neither of them had warmed to Ranma as they had to Fenris, to Sunfyre and Rhaegon Ranma was simply their mistress's mate, not their friend in his own right or anything of that nature.

But that lukewarm welcome was more than made up for when Daenerys practically leaped into his arms, her arms going around his neck and pulling his mouth down to hers. After that Ranma rather lost track of time, only coming back into himself when they pulled back from one another their foreheads resting lightly against one another. "Hello, my lady." Ranma said, his voice coming out deep and throaty, his blue eyes shining with love and other, baser emotions.

"Hello my husband." Daenerys said, a tremble in her own voice as she nuzzled into his neck, her lips slightly bruised from the force of their kiss. "I realize I should be asking you what you've been up to and where the wolfsworn are or how well you think this campaign is going, but for some reason..." she laughed, "I am really having trouble caring about all that right now."

Those words brought Ranma back to himself for a moment, though his arms for some reason were refusing all his brain's commands to let Daenerys go. "We should get out there, make some show at least of still being in charge of ourselves rather than our hormones."

At that point Myrcella spoke up from one side, her face flushed from the passion she had just witnessed, as well as her own desires which had nailed her feet to the floor despite her best efforts to turn and leave the two alone. "I doubt that the army will care if you two spend some time together in here, so long as you can, um..." she blushed even deeper. "K-keep the noise down?"

"That isn't going to happen." Daenerys said shaking her head moving away unwillingly from Ranma, shivering slightly as Ranma's hand's traced her sides for a moment before reluctantly flailing away. "It would set a bad example for the troops."

"Besides," Ranma put in, one hand tracing Daenerys's back for a moment before he too grudgingly moved away. "Daenerys tends to be loud in any case."

Daenerys mock-glared at him for a moment while Myrcella laughed, and Daenerys turned to her, glaring slightly. "As if Myrcella isn't already well aware of that, or is there some other reason why you always get a room next to ours?"

Merry flushed further, stuttering for a moment, while Daenerys laughed and Ranma merely looked bewildered. Daenerys reached out, pulling Merry into another hug then turned to Ranma, her arms still around the younger girl, who's company she had missed dearly. Turning to Ranma however, her voice and face became serious again. "How long do you think it will take the Lannisters to attack us?"

"Two or three days, maybe as many as four." Ranma said, shrugging his shoulders. "We'll have that time to rest the men who were with me, believe me they need it, and not just their bodies, their minds and gear have suffered as well. All of them performed above and beyond, and we'll need to make certain they know that. Even three days is going to be pushing it. It's not only my force that's been run ragged after all."

OOOOOO

Tywin was indeed gathering his forces together again, and had assembled his lords once more to give them their marching orders. "While I am displeased that our scouts have seen so many new banners, the army out for there simply does not have the size necessary to fight us on an even footing. At best they can only have 13,000 excluding the Riverlands forces who will no doubt surrender or turn their coats if we can smash the northerners and their true allies decisively."

For the northern host augmented by the forces of House Mallister that was actually a very accurate estimation. Given the various forces Ranma had split off since reaching Fairmarket and the losses his men had sustained, Ranma's army was a little over thirteen thousand. But as Tywin had said, the men Ranma had been leading personally up to this point had been run ragged, and would add little to his total strength.

"Moreover, the northern force we've been chasing are exhausted, they won't be ready for a pitched battle in three days or even a week. They will add nothing to the force already gathered. While we can field a force of 20,000 since we've continually made good our losses on this side of the Red Fork by pulling men up from our reserves down at the Kneeling Man's Ford." That had left the force at the Ford with a bare three thousand after the men at Stone Hedge had been moved there, but that would be more than enough to hold the ford given the defenses they had built there.

"That's true uncle." Daven said cautiously when no one else spoke up. "But they can still hurt us. Ranma has proven himself to be a wily tactician, and I'm leery of assuming that he is desperate at this point. This meeting between their two forces seems far too... lucky to be true chance. Also look at the place they've chosen to meet us, we can't flank them, which means we will have trouble bringing our numbers advantage to bear."

That was true. The area where the northerners had decided to fight was a small strip of land where the Red Fork and Blue Fork were only about half a mile apart before once more turning away from one another until they met at the Trident. Worse both rivers were deep here, so there was no chance of truly flanking the northerners. "Moreover, even in victory if Ranma hurts us too badly, we will become dangerously understrength to take on either of the Baratheon brothers."

"Not so much." Tywin disagreed though he nodded at it the younger man, respecting him slightly more for having spoken up. "Remember we still have all of the smaller guard forces in, Harroway, Harrenhal, Darry and the other castles near the Kingsroad, as well as the majority of our Riverlands allies besieging Raventree Hall. His lips twitched slightly at the younger man scowl as if he wasn't wishful to rely on such, though he understood the point. "With them we can make up any losses we might take among our army later on."

The other matter Tywin went on his voice and manner becoming much more serious is time. "This campaign is taking too long. If we give Ranma time enough to recuperate from the past few weeks, he may well cross back over the Ruby Ford and start another war of maneuver, constantly moving here there and everywhere trying to force us to break our army up again in an effort to pin him down. With the Baratheon brothers both moving on King's Landing we cannot afford to wait. We need to crush this Army quickly, and then begin our march southwards."

"While the northern army has had it almost all its own way, the portion we've been chasing have paid for it, and from what our scouts reported the other half is comprised mostly of levies that haven't thought any true pitched battle yet.

They are well armored true, and their weapons seem more uniform than I expect, but such men will break at the first sign of true blood."

Beside Tywin, Stafford spoke up as well. "Also consider that the eastern Riverlands houses made that initial deal with us because they didn't have the stomach for war. If they start to take losses, they may well retreat entirely. One sharp battle here, and the Northern/Riverlands alliance could crumble."

Tywin didn't like the man but he had a point. "Indeed, so that is what we will do. The second and third echelons are only a day and a half's distance if they force march to join us. I've already sent runners to them, we will gather our forces through the rest of the day and the night, then attack at dawn."

Tywin didn't know it, but even his thoughts had been influenced by the long, somewhat fruitless campaign so far, which his men had taken to call hunting the wolf. The northerners had never allowed the Westerlanders to pin them in place, and had won all of the small skirmishes, though they had obviously taken losses, particularly from Lord Plumm's night attack.

But the fruitless chase had ground on Tywin's nerves, particularly when he knew that Renly had reached King's Landing weeks back. His daughter and son were trapped in this hellhole, and here Tywin was, chasing after an enemy that would rather dance around and avoid battle than fight! No, Tywin felt it best to end this now, show the young Stark that there was a difference between small scale battles and real ones then move south as quickly as possible.

Actually, Tywin had underestimated the amount of time it would be necessary to allow for his army to come together completely. The two other echelons were still trickling in well into the evening of the next day, so he was forced to put off a battle for four days, giving the portion of the northern army precious time to recuperate from the past three weeks..

That wasn't good, but, Tywin reflected that the numbers and moreover the composition of the two forces were heavily in his favor. His scouts reported that the Eastern Riverlands houses only had added about three thousand to Ranma's army, the majority of which were infantry and archers, and only House Blantree's troops, of which there were a scant hundred, were veterans. Whereas Tywin's army was mostly comprised of veterans, and had a massive force of heavy cavalry with which to shatter the Northern line. Once that was done, his numbers would tell, and the Young Wolf would finally be brought to heel.

OOOOOO

Four days after the northern army reformed the sound of drums in the distance signaled that the Lannisters were preparing themselves for battle, and were quickly answered by the horns of the northern and Riverlands army. Ranma sat on Fenris' back on a small rise in the army camp, staring out through his spyglass at the Lannister forces that were preparing their lines.

He smiled grimly. You seem to think bigger is better Lord Tywin, something I'd thought seeing your past campaigns, but I'm about to prove to you once and for all that quality beats out quantity every time.

Without looking away from the view, he began to give out his orders for the coming battle. "I want the archers on either flank with the Riverlands forces to protect them. Smalljon, you and I will command the irregular infantry. We'll go forward to meet their initial charge, but I want every sergeant to know the signal for retreat, and when we do I want that retreat to be an organized one, not a rout."

Now he turned fixing, Smalljon with a glare. "Make certain they understand that. That will be the most dangerous part of this battle when we have to retreat through the pike."

Smalljon nodded grimly and Ranma turned to his friend's father. "Greatjon, you and lord Rickard are to take command of the heavy. Split them into two formations and station them behind the archers on either flank. Keep them back, I don't want them called in until after the Lannisters have been broken."

"You're making the assumption that they will break." said Ser Blantree dubiously. "I have to tell you that whatever you think you've seen, the Westerlanders do not lack for courage."

Ranma shook his head. "You haven't seen what a pike regiment on the attack can do, no one has really. Trust me, the Lannisters will break, or die. Patrek, I'd like you to be my signalman for this battle."

The heir to house Mallister paused, cocking an eyebrow as he seemed to read more into that question than the actual words. He was right: Ranma had been impressed by Patrek, who had stood by his side in several of the battle they had fought already in this campaign. While his skills were nowhere close to a wolfsworn, he was decent enough, and better young enough to keep learning.

Eventually Patrek nodded and Ranma turned to Lord Mallister. "Jason, you'll be in charge of the reserves, they'll be your man and those of mine that have already been in battle these past few weeks. I don't want them committed too soon to the battle, so keep them back at all if at all possible. Whatever you do, keep your force between the front and Merry's hospital center."

Jason nodded, not showing any of his own worry. He hadn't seen the pike regiment in action yet either, in fact even Ranma hadn't, but he knew they would work. You created a weapon for me Jon, he thought to himself. Now it's time to show Westeros what the word 'soldier' really means.

"When do you want the crossbowmen committed?" Daenerys asked, once again wearing a concealing hood as she stood behind Ser Barristan.

"Push them forward with the hikes," Ranma said after a moment's thought. "They know what they're supposed to do?"

She nodded. "Lord Mallister, Ser Barristan and I have had been training them with the crossbows ever since the weapons arrived." Those men had been chosen from among the best of the archers from the Riverlands, and while they hadn't exactly taken to their new weapons the striking power of the crossbow had seduced them.

Ranma nodded grimly. He did not give any commands to any of the Riverlands lords that his wife had brought to their banner. He'd gotten to know them over the past few days, and agreed with Daenerys on her impression of all of them. Ranma liked Ser Blanetree, a thorough going professional warrior, but he had the sort of anger in him that would make controlling him tough.

He also liked Vincent and Tristan. The first, he had potential the kind of potential that Ranma was eager to put to work on various projects. Tristan wasn't a deep thinker, but he was loyal, and more importantly loyal to the Tullys, specifically Edmure, which was enough for Ranma. Their father though, Ranma didn't like him very much, far too self-serving and a bit of an ass-kisser, much like Roote only somewhat better at hiding it. Old Wayn, well he was old and tired, Ranma couldn't hate him, but couldn't like him either.

Ranma looked off into the distance as he heard the bugles of the Lannisters bellowing once more. "Let's get to it gentlemen, ladies."

With that they all raced off to their positions, though Lord Roote and Lord Ryger took a moment to pull Silas to one side. "Why is the youngster so confident? Do you know? I've seen his Pike regiment's doing their pretty marching, but surely he doesn't think that's going to translate into a battle."

Silas Shawney however laughed at his concerns. "There is one thing I've learned from watching Ranma over the past few weeks, it's never to gamble against him. Trust me, he'll win this."

OOOOOO

About an hour later the battle began. Archers on both sides began to pepper one another and the front of the infantry lines, while the Lannisters began to advance. Despite their advantage in numbers the Westerlands archers had the worst of it from the get-go, not just because they were advancing with their army into their opponent's fire, but because their bows were of such poor size and power in comparison to the northern ones. While the Westerlands bows were actually better for skirmishes, because the size of the northern bows made using them in dense forests a little more difficult, the northern bows simply had far more power and range.

Against the light armor of the infantry and the archers this was proving deadly. At long range of course even northern bows couldn't penetrate plate, but only one in ten infantrymen had plate armor among the Westerlands forces. More than one archer among them noticed that the armor of the Northerners seems to be of much higher quality than was normal for any infantry force, though many had already reported this.

The Westerlands forces advanced, those who had them holding up shields to block the arrows coming at them marching on waiting until they were in charging distance to pick up the pace. Halfway towards the northern army, the northern army responded, the irregular infantry moving out forming its own line of battle.

Behind the irregular infantry the pike regiments began to form from the clumps and clusters that they had been kept in before this in order to not get even a hint of what they really were to the Lannisters. Even now the pikes were held dragging along the ground so that their true size could be discerned from a distance.

It worked too. Behind his army Tywin was once more set up on a small platform and he smiled grimly. The Stark brat doesn't trust his levy forces to hold instead he's using them as his secondary line there, but he's underestimated our own numbers I think. If we can win the initial clash with the better trained armsmen of that first line coming out to meet ours, we might be able to sweep the board quickly.

Moments later the two waves of infantry met, the Westerlands forces having the numbers, but not the training or the armor of their opponents. Ranma charged at the center of their forces with Patrek beside him. Fenris for once was not with his bonded human. He had stayed to help Daenerys keep her dragons under control when the sounds of battle reached him. Ice carved a bloody ruin while he roared. "Winter is coming!"

This shout was taken up all along the line, and for a moment the light infantry held their fellows. Then more Westerlanders came up, pushing through here and there and even encircling small clumps of Riverlands in northern infantry. The northern infantry began to give way grudgingly. At the center Ranma looked to his right as a bugle from the northern flank sounded, signaling that they were being in danger of being cut off on that side. He nodded at Patrek and said "signal slow retreat, then signal the light cavalry in on the northern flank."

Patrek nodded, his bloody sword falling to his side for a moment as he grabbed up the horn that had been riding at his hip, putting it to his lips and blowing out two long blasts then five more short one in quick succession. All around them the light infantry began to slowly give ground, but seeing Ranma still there, snarling at their enemies not a one of them broke.

With Smalljon holding the south side and Ranma holding the center the northern side was really the only flank that was in danger of breaking. Unfortunately Tywin could tell that just as well as Ranma. He ordered his men in on that side, almost breaking the infantry line there before the northern light cavalry smashing into them from their own flank. That part of the battle devolved into a general melee for a few seconds, but Lord Shawney, in charge of the light cavalry, understood the plan well enough to keep his force under control and pulled them back after the infantry line stabilized. He still lost hundreds of men however.

Even in the midst of his own battle at the front of the line Ranma could feel the sense the tide of battle, the balance of it. He and Patrek held the line for a moment, while around them the shield wall of both sides clashed, both sides taking losses as Ranma let his body move by itself for a moment while he concentrated on reading the flow of battle.

After another moment Ranma held up one hand and said "by the numbers Patrek!"

Ranma stepped forward slightly to one side guarding Patrek who fell back allowing wringing out his shield arm, wincing as the pain of a broken bone hit him. Even so he was still able to lift the horn to his lips. This time he blew one long blast followed by two short ones and another long blast.

Around them the light infantry forces of the Northerners, trained constantly drilled on the march down from the north and even more so when they were in camp on the other side of the Ruby Ford, responded with alacrity. Each group leader or sergeant as Ranma called them had been assigned a number. Now those with odd numbers fell back, much like when Daryn's force had been ambushed by the wildlings north of the Wall.

Yet at the same time the archers, who had been splitting fire along the entire front as well as against their fellows suddenly changed fire aiming only at the infantry along the front ranks. Men fell screaming as hundreds of arrows began to sluice down like rain into their ranks, the Northerners combined fire in one area of the battle proving disastrous to the Westerlanders.

Ranma grabbed Patrek shoulder and shouted in his ear in order to be heard over the continued clamor of battle and the screams of the wounded. "I think it's our turn my friend!" Patrek laughed, in the two of them fell back with the last groups.

On the other side of the battle Tywin grimaced angrily but then bellowed orders. "Their center is breaking, call up the heavy cavalry and get them in there! If we can break them, and their levy forces behind them, the Riverlanders on their flanks will break as well, and this battle will be ours!"

Orders went out to that effect, and the Westerlands infantry gratefully moved aside for their betters.

By this point Ranma and Patrek had reached the first line of pike, passing through their ranks like the rest of the light infantry. After they passed, the pikes closed ranks and Ranma stopped, handing Ice over to Patrek for a moment.

"Don't lose it." He said semi-seriously.

While Patrek raced on with Ice in its sheath under one arm Ranma reached down to pick up a pike and take his position with the rest. That sight won a round of cheers from many of the pikemen around him, who had of course been nervous. This was not only going to be their first battle for many of them, but all of them knew that Ranma's entire strategy was based off how well they would perform. That was quite a load on their shoulders, all of whom were smallfolk levies or had been before Jon molded them into the soldiers they were now: men who had been trained from the start to work together, to see themselves as parts of a unit, not individual warriors.

Ranma didn't have enough time to make a speech, nor did he have the inclination. He simply raised his Pike, holding it upright on his shoulder. All around him and all throughout the regiments the pikemen changed their grips to match his own, the flashes of steel radiating outwards for a moment. Ranma looked around and simply said. "Here they come boys, who will stand with me!?"

He was answered with a roar, and a moment later he bellowed "Pikes down!" That shout was taken up by all the troop leaders and sergeants, and the pike regiments of the North lowered their blades. "Prepare to receive!"

When the pike shafts came down, the Westerlands heavy cavalry was no longer faced with what they had thought was a weak line of barely trained levies armed with polearms, but a trained and prepared force who worked together and stood their ground with a level of discipline that had never truly been seen in the Westerlands or even in the eastern lands. The only comparison could be made to the Golden Company or the Unsullied, but even they didn't have the mix of weapons and armor of that the Houses Stark and Cerwyn had created.

A Pike regiment wasn't a simple line of pike, but a wall of steel made up of four rows of pikemen thrusting their pikes forward. Even if you got past the first row of Pike, you couldn't get past the second or the third or the fourth, you could get at the people wielding the Pike.

A pike had even longer range than a Lance wielded by a cavalry man, and now the Westerlands knights and mounted arms man learned this to their cost. Hundreds, possibly thousands died in that brief clash. Then it got worse.

"At the March!" Ranma bellowed, his pike out thrust, slamming into a knight with such force it penetrated his plate armor and threw him out of the saddle. His horse tried to bolt, but they were packed so tightly that the horses couldn't get away. Then all around him the pikemen began to follow Ranma's relayed orders and began to move forward, their pikes outstretched in front of them, hammering slicing and thrusting into the cavalry who were no longer trying to break their lines but were instead trying to get away.

However, the crossbow men had also gone to work at the same time. All of them had been ordered to follow the pikes as closely as possible and aim at any mounted man who was wearing better armor than most or was riding directly under a banner. Their rate of fire wasn't anywhere near what an equal number of archers could've done, but their quarrels hit with punishing force, penetrating even the best plate armor, which could've turned even the arrows of the northern longbows. The Westerlands lost over a dozen Knights, Heirs and more than a few Lords in that first few ferocious moments of combat. Heavy cavalry had always attracted such, and an in-battle assassination like this was an entirely new tactic.

Twenty minutes after they charged into the pikes the Westerlands cavalry broke. No, it didn't break, it shattered. One moment it had been charging forward certain of its power and victory, then their fortune had been completely reversed. The men were shocked, astonished at the brutal way their momentum had been halted, a fifth of the number had died in those first few moments. The horses were terrified by the smell of blood and the screams of the dying horses all around them, and dozens of their leaders were gone as well. They shattered, streaming away in ones and twos from the battle back through their own ranks of infantry

Behind them the Pike regiments marched on. Here and there the Westerlands cavalry messed up their own infantry's line, their horses out of control, or their riders so panicked they didn't realize they were now trampling over a few of their own men.

And then those lines of infantry were also faced with two pike regiments on the march. Even against infantry, the sheer number of pikes, the density of the regiment's front worked their deadly toll. Here and there men could get under the first line or even the second, but not the third or the fourth, and even in the few places that occurred, they ran into the men of House Mallister who Jason had ordered forward to guard the Pike regiments up close. And behind them were the archers, still firing at the Westerlanders, and Ranma's heavy cavalry, only about two-thousand, five hundred men, waiting to be unleashed while cheering on their fellows.

Tywin watched all this in shocked horror, and he suddenly realized, or thought he realized, what Ranma's goal had been all along. Stark wanted me to attack him here he thought his thoughts cold yet shocked at the same time. He didn't want to face me at the fortifications we threw up at the Kneeling Man's Ford, all that dancing around even his initial split of his army possibly was to entice me to come out and attack him. After all, the Young Wolf doesn't care what happens further south, he must've known I was feeling the pinch of time and would jump at the chance to defeat his forces in smaller lots. And he wanted to use those polearms against us. By the Seven, where did he get the idea for those?

Even as he watched the sides of the Pike regiment sprouted even more Pike thrusting out on a diagonal protecting its flanks while its front crunched into his army's middle. The archers of the North had also won their dual with his own, forcing his own archers to fall back in disarray though his troops ranks with hundreds dead in comparison to only dozens on the other side. And Tywin could see panic beginning even at the outskirts of the army.

"Sound retreat." Tywin said his voice like ice.

"My Lord, we still outnumber them." Said Stafford.

Tywin turned, slapping the other man hard on the face sending him sprawling to the ground of the platform he had been using to survey the battle. "Fool! Those polearms have ripped the heart out of our army! We have nothing that can get through to the men behind them, the only way we can battle them is by exhausting them, surely those weapons are too long for them to be very quick on the march. No, we'll pull back entirely, then dare them to come at us on the other side of the Kneeling Man forward.

"That's days away from here my lord, but you're right I don't think those pike units we very good in in the chase. We'll still have to deal with the northern cavalry though." Lord Brax said, ignoring where Stafford had been sent sprawling.

"If we don't start to pull back now, we won't have an army left regardless. Do as I command." Tywin said coldly.

The Westerlands reserve force was comprised of about 3000 infantry and another two hundred heavy cavalry which Tywin had husbanded up to this point. Now they served as a rallying point for the rest of the army, falling back in good order and setting an example for their fellows, though many of the Westerlanders weren't in a position to respond. Even so, breaking off the battle was tough, made even harder when the heavy and light cavalry of the Northern army was loosed to do it's deadly work.

Beyond the general flow of the battle Ranma couldn't tell that much detail from where he was in the front line so he had switched out with Smalljon only a few moments into the pike regiments' advance. His going hadn't caused any sort of consternation, his joking shout of "you boys have got this, but I need to kick the rest of the army in the ass!" had actually won him a few laughs from the embattled men around him.

Now he stood on his own raised platform, frowning angrily. "Send a runner to Greatjon and my uncle. I want the cavalry to go around the edges of the pike regiments but I want them to be controlled. Tywin is keeping too much control over there, we won't finish that army off today."

Daenerys stood at the back of the platform, looking over it with her own spyglass hitting even now. Below her hands were Sunfyre and Rhaegon, pressed down lightly with both of her hands while Fenris lay in front of them growling slightly aiding her in controlling them. The sound of battle in the blood smell had reached even back here was getting to both dragons, and their instincts were urging them into the air but their time had not yet come. "We've broken them though, that army knows it's been beaten, and beaten badly. Should we use my dragons now, do you think?"

Ranma shook his head. "No, I don't want your dragons to be used in the field, not against a foe that's already beaten. Remember that our own men might come to fear them if we seem too eager to use them. We'll keep with the original plan for their debut."

Daenerys nodded grimly, remembering that part and inwardly happy for another few weeks to keep training her little ones on dodging. After all, they were so young their scales didn't offer much protection, and their wings would be extremely vulnerable to enemy archers. Plus, they would have to come much closer to target men who could no doubt see them coming and dodge. Besides, Ranma's right, just think of how Lord Mallister would react.

For his part Ranma was wondering how the rest of his strategy was going. "Now it all depends on what Jon and Arya have been able to do, and what Tywin's reaction will be. If Tywin retreat from that position on the other side of the Kneeling Man's Ford, we can harry him out of the Riverlands. If he doesn't," he looked down at Daenerys grimly, "Your little ones will be used against him there."

It would have surprised anyone else, but Daenerys understood why that thought horrified Ranma. Ranma didn't want to slaughter his enemies, well not their men anyway, he would have no problem gutting Joffrey like a fish, or ripping Stannis' head off and tossing it into the ocean. But he saw no reason to extend that hatred toward the armsmen who were simply following their vows, or to the levy forces who'd had no choice but joining up. He wanted to break Tywin, he didn't want to slaughter his army to a man.

On a more pragmatic level there were two considerations. First, if Ranma could force that army to surrender, or even portions of it, he would immediately have a ready force of workmen for any projects he needed work on. In the back of Ranma's mind there was always the fact that he knew winter was coming, when food and transportation of said would be of paramount importance. He needed at least the two canal projects they were already working on to be finished before winter came, and he needed enough people to move out into the fields after this war and start farming again. This was especially true since autumn had been declared while he was baiting the lion.

Second, Ranma had learned back in Fairmarket that the Westerlanders had both suborned and reinforced several of the castles on the other side of the Red Fork and Trident. He did not want to get bogged down in the same kind of battles he'd been facing these past few weeks and he hoped that by letting Tywin go for now he would be forced to call in those small holding forces. Whether or not he would then seek battle again, or would still remain on the defense and force Ranma to use the dragons against him, or if the rest of Ranma's strategy took, Ranma didn't know yet.

Daenerys nodded grimly, and two of them went back to watching the rout continue.

OOOOOO

There was a dead body in a small alleyway in Fleabottom. This wasn't abnormal in the best of times in Fleabottom, and now was not the best of times. But what was abnormal, had anyone noticed it, was that this body didn't seem to have a mark on it, save for some blood around the mouth. It lay there in its own sick, and rats began to eat at it, unremarked by any. But soon, soon it would be important for thousands.

End chapter

---

I have some five thousand words of the next chapter done, but I feel that I wasn't doing the next few battles/events justice in my head. The strategy and flow of this chapter were very hard to work out, but I think I did it justice. Arya started to shine here, and she will do so even more in the next chapter.

Hope you enjoyed this chapter, and please leave a review, the soup and salad of the writer.

*Chapter 14*: Chapter 14

I don't own Ranma (would love to 'own' Kasumi though, heh) nor do I own the universe created by George 'Slowmo' Martin.

I know I said the next chapter of ATP would be updated this month, but my WW muse would not let me go, and I ran into some problems with the chapter, specifically, having too many people whose opinions on the last chapter's events I wanted to show, and very little knowledge on Kree warships. If someone who knows anything about the Kree could PM me I would be grateful. I would also like to ask anyone who knows anything about astrology to PM me as well.

Like to thank Antony444 for his work as a sounding board and a beta, though again we're still dealing with an odd 'space is missing' issue. Hope I caught them all, but with so many damn names the system doesn't recognize, it's tough to spot mistakes like that. Also think some commas disappeared somehow...

Now on with the violence!

Chapter 14 Old Problems, New Players a Lion Brought to Bay

---

"That was as unpleasant a journey as I had expected father." said Obara Sand. She was standing at the edge of the Bonewayay as the rock and dust of the road, if it could even be called that, wound its way out of the last bit of the mountains towards the ruins of Summerhall, once one of the castles of House Targaryen. In front of her the army continued to move its slow winding way out of the pass.

"It is not called the Boneway for no reason, my dear." Oberyng laughed as he stood his horse to one side, watching with his daughter as his army passed by. One or two of the mercenaries than made up that army looked up at him, and he smiled cheerfully at them, not incidentally hefting his spear in one hand. Those men that looked at him looked away quickly, blanching.

Once again Oberyng wondered if his niece and Viserys understood the nature of the army they had assembled. The dregs of an entire continent, all brought together and given weapons and in some cases even taught how to use them. The boy-king at least should know the real nature of most of the mercenary companies. Arianne I'll give the benefit of the doubt.

Of course, he thought, smirking as more men looked away from him, these people might worship the money they're being paid, but will only follow someone who can speak their own language. And I can speak that language, oh yes. Oberyng had been a mercenary in Essos himself when he was younger, and the lessons he'd learned during those years had stayed with him. By now every man in that column understood that he was not someone they wished to cross, not even the worst of them like the lieutenants of the Company of the Cat. Not after Bloodbeard, their former chief, had tried to remove Oberyng only to die himself.

Thankfully loyalty in the Company of the Cat went to whoever was the nastiest and the toughest. Oberyng had proven he was the toughest by cutting Bloodbeard down within two days of meeting him, and forcing the rest of the company to watch as he died on the sands of the Boneway well before they reached even Castle Wyl.

"Father," said Obara, bringing Oberyng's attention back to her. "Are we..." she paused, "Are we really going to..." she paused again, and Oberyng sighed.

He had hoped that all of his daughters would opt to go with the Princess, but Obara had decided to come with him. Hardened fighter she might be but she had never been on the march, and never took part in a war. "Yes," he said coldly, "we are. These are the Stormlands girl, the lands where The Usurper mustered much of his army, where the two Baratheon brothers have gotten their armies as well." He paused before going on. "Or at least a portion of them. Regardless, they will stand against our new liege Lord, and they stand between us and vengeance!"

At the word vengeance he saw his daughter stiffen her spine slightly and he nodded before leaning forward. "We might have sent out here as some kind of feint, but Viserys is a man with big ideas who has no idea about war. I'll admit that his first few targets will work, but they won't give him anything, oh possibly a stepping stone to more, but not important enough. We need to do some real damage, and that means moving quick and striking hard. We can't be bogged down, we can't let up, and we need to cut a swath that will be remembered for decades! If you don't have the stomach for it, tell me now. You can still be sent back to House Wyl."

"I'll do what needs to be done." Obara muttered.

Oberyn nodded. "Good." With that he turned away began to bark out orders for the army to keep going, it might be later in the day but he wanted to be well away from the pass leading into the Boneway before they made camp. Despite Summerhall having been a ruin for years, there were other threats nearby.

For one, Doran's spies had passed on the fact that House Dondarrion had decided not to take part in the current conflict, since its lord was missing in action. However, their traditional duty to protect pass might force whoever had been left in charge to make the attempt. Worse, they were still close enough to the small pass that led up to Blackhaven from the Boneway to make a sortie from that House deadly to their attempt to get out of the Boneway.

They would camp that night well away from the passage out of the Red Mountains and then they would move on. Oberyn had decided that his initial target would be the lands of House Wagstaff, which was the nearest house that wasn't part of the Dornish marches, then the lands around Grandview, of House Grandison. Wagstaff had a small holdfast, not a true castle, and had sent some of its strength to war in any event. They would fall easily, and their lands would give his army enough food and plunder to boost its morale after the hard march through the Boneway.

Oberyn wasn't going to siege Grandview though, that was too tough a nut to crack without taking severe losses. But the lands around it would be open, since they had sent a third of their armymen to join Renly's horde, and the smallfolk they captured there would be able to tell them a lot about the events in the Stormlands and Reach. With that information he could decide to turn towards the Reach or stay in the Stormlands. The second option would be his preference, but Oberyn was flexible enough to wait and see.

Keep moving, keep burning the land, keep my army happy, and make everyone else very unhappy. And also stay close enough to the ocean to get back to it quickly if need out and away from the Dornish Marches and stay away from the Reach side entirely. We know that they kept most of their men at home, a force I don't want to tangle with. Summer knights most of them they may be, but they'll be well led, and I can't say the same for my lot, besides myself, unless our prisoners tell us something has occurred elsewhere that makes the heart of the Reach vulnerable it will be best to keep to the Stormlands. At least my orders allow me to do that.

OOOOOO

Derik Derik Waters was a part of a gang, practically everyone in Flea Bottom was part of some kind of brotherhood or 'house'. It was simply the difference between survival and death, lone wolves didn't last long in Flea Bottom, or even the rest of the city. If you didn't have someone to watch your back, someone you could trust at least a little then you were dead. His gang was called the Bastard's Boys, since they were all bastards who didn't know who their father was, and in some cases their mother too. They were all ages starting from as young as nine to as old as thirty, with seniority denoting status among the gang.

Life in Flea Bottom was hard at the best of times, but since the siege began it had become even worse. Derik didn't really have the vocabulary or knowledge to understand why, food simply wasn't coming in. Nor was anything else. Iron for the smithies, wood for the almost constant construction projects going on everywhere in the city, leather for the leather makers, flour, wheat, charcoal, everything that made the economy of the city go came from outside.

King's Landing sat in the Crownlands like a giant lump of granite on a thin sheet of leather, distorting everything around it. Of course it also created things, but those things needed other things to be created from. So the economy of the city had simply ground to a halt slowly and of course being at the bottom rung Flea Bottom was always going to get the worst of it.

Derik didn't understand any of that, all he knew was he hadn't eaten anything beyond Bowls o' brown for a few weeks now. Worse the bowls were starting to look disturbing even to his Flea Bottom trained eyes. He had also been fired from his job down at the docks, and his woman hadn't been home in two days. When went to the brothel she worked at to see if she was still there for some reason, he'd been told that she had gone home on time two days back. He'd also been told she had a deep, racking cough as she was. A sick person had about as much chance of walking the streets of Flea Bottom as a fish did of flying.

So Derik Waters was angry, one of hundreds of thousands of people in the capital that were becoming angry and looking for targets take their anger out on. That was why he and thousands of others were here listening to a former merchant as he shouted exhortations against the royal family off of the Street of Flour

"This can all be laid on the feet of the Bastard King and his Bitch Mother," said the merchant, which elicited a roar from the crowd. "The Lannisters have always run roughshod over King's Landing! I'm not the only man here who can remember what they did during the Robert's Rebellion, and you all know what happened in the Battle of Two Truths!

The Lannisters shit gold, but all we see is the glitter on their blades, never the gold itself!"

That won another roar from the crowd as Derik and all the other men around him shouted and raged. Normally they would never have listened to a merchant, especially one who looked well-off. Now, if you looked close enough you could see that the siege had had an effect on him. His clothing was badly frayed in places and his body was far thinner than it had been judging by how loose it were on him.

"Robert might not 've been a good King, but at least he was someone we could relate to! At least he didn't shit all over us, at least he didn't burn us or butcher our children!"

That won an even louder roar and the crowd began to stir, every man there checking their makeshift weapons. Though makeshift wasn't really the proper word for some of the weapons, billhooks, meat cleaver's, all different kinds of hammers, awls, heavy saws. A lot of people in the city routinely used tools that could be used as weapons all too easily.

"Now Robert's brother is out there! Renly might be too pretty to be real, but at least he's an honest one, one who will speak up for the people! Now I say we open the door for him. Who's with me!?"

The crowd roared surging towards the nearest gate, with the merchant deep in it somewhere holding a very rusty yet still serviceable short sword. Derik found himself near the front of the mob but didn't have a problem with this. His blood was up, he had a cargo-man's hook in one hand and a rage to take on the world.

That emotion began to cool the moment the mob was within sight of the interior defenses that had been thrown up around the gates. Several buildings had been smashed to pieces to create a makeshift barricade shaped in a U around the gate facing outwards into the rest of the city. It was only two stories tall, and if the mob was armed with bows it wouldn't have been a very good position because there was only a smattering of cover on the top created by bits and pieces of rubble sticking out from the rest of the barricade. But they didn't.

"You are ordered to disperse!" Shouted a voice, somehow being heard over this sounds of the mob roaring forward. Derik wasn't the only one to see the dozens of bowmen on up there, who were quickly being joined by others as they climbed up the barricade's back.

Nor was Derik the only one in the crowd to begin to stop moving forward, having second thoughts. But there weren't enough of them to stop the press of bodies from behind, and however unwittingly that first group of rioters found themselves being pressed forward by their fellows.

"I said disperse, Stranger damn you!" Though no one in the mob knew it, the man shouting was Lord Harte. Having been stripped of his command on the wall, he had been given command of the interior defenses of the Old Gate. The bruises Jaime had given him at the Hand's behest for springing their most dangerous defensive trap too soon had healed for the most part. And he had taken to his new task with enthusiasm and creativity...

The crowd jeered, and a few men began to throw cobblestones up trying to hit the archers upon the barricade. They weren't close enough just yet though. One or two smaller stones hit among the archers, but that was all.

It seemed to be enough for the commander up there however who said "Fire!" Bows began to twang, and screams began in the mob as people hit by arrows. Yet that seems to only incense the mob further, and they rushed forward towards the barricades.

The archers fired as quickly as they could not even taking the time to aim, but the mob was simply too large for their arrows to stop. Somehow the gestalt mind of the mob seemed to realize this, and shouts and jeers began again as men all around realized that they would win through if they just kept pressing. They would lose dozens, but that didn't matter, it would always be someone else doing the dying.

That equation changed however when the mob reached the final block that would carry them up to the barricade. There Derik and a few others kicked over or smashed a few small jugs. Then they began to scream and that scream went on for the rest of their shortened lives.

Those small jugs contained wildfire. Wildfire ignited from even the gentlest tap especially if it had been left out in the sun for even a few moments as these had been. Before the mob had been spotted, they had been covered by small tarps, which kept the direct sunlight off them though they had done nothing to prevent the jugs from heating up even with the occasional rain shower. Those tarps had been removed before the mob was in sight, and now the wildfire raged.

It started slowly, the screaming in one portion of the mob rising higher and faster than the others, but it soon spread. There were dozens of those small jugs around, hidden in the nearest side streets towards the barricades all around each of the seven Gates. The wildfire spread so fast and so quickly that most of the mob couldn't even flee. The green fire was everywhere, consuming all in its path.

The Lannisters had once more brought fire to the city, decimating the first large-scale riot.

OOOOOOO

Tytos Blackwood frowned as he stood in one of the guard towers set to one side of Raventree Hall's main gate, watching as a little under half of the besieging army out there pulled out of their camp and began to march away. "What is going on now?"

"Those are Bracken colors there father." His eldest son Brynden muttered. "By the old gods, what could have happened to convince that traitor Jonos to pull his force back from attacking us?"

"Well it's not like the siege was going anywhere." Lucas, Tytos' next oldest son scoffed. "They've only made a few small attempts to storm our walls, simply digging in and trying to batter our main gate down with no success at all."

That was true, Tytos reflected. The attackers had only attempted to try and take the walls by storm twice, taking severe losses in their attacking forces each time. The fact the defenders actually had too many men to man their defenses made any assault like that difficult in the extreme.

"Their siege towers would be a problem if not for our catapult." Brynden reminded his young brother. "After we smashed the first two they seem reluctant to use them further, but that's no reason to get complacent."

"Brynden is right," Tytos said, speaking up for the first time and ending his son's argument. "We can't afford to get complacent. They are starting to tunnel out there, which means we might need to create counter-tunnels soon." That made both his sons nod grimly. Fighting in a tunnel like that would be deadly for both sides, and if the attackers could keep the tunnel open, their numbers would begin to tell.

Really thanks to the size of the castle's walls and his house's preparations prior to the beginning of the siege, that was really the only way the attackers could end the siege in their favor. They certainly didn't have as much food out there as he did in here, thanks to the aid of the smallfolk who were now protected by his castle's walls.

After a moment Tytos spoke up to lighten the mood. "As to what could cause Bracken to pull back like this, only an assault on his land or castle could pull him away from our throats. Somehow I think the wolves have come, and the lions and their allies are feeling the pinch."

OOOOOOO

"How did she get so big?" Bess Bracken asked, rubbing one hand down the side of the massive direwolf that so fascinated her.

Arya smiled at her, but did not stop in her work of grooming Nymeria. Here in the Riverlands all of the direwolves shed somewhat, though not nearly as much as Arya had expected them to. They know winter is coming just as much as we do, she thought before shaking her head. "They're direwolves, not regular wolves this is the size they're supposed to be, I think."

"But she's as large as a warhorse!" exclaimed Bess incredulously. "What would they eat in the wild?"

"Anything they want to." Arya laughed. "Ghost prefers moose, and Fenris has a liking for bear. My Nymeria seems to prefer deer meat accompanied by mushrooms for some reason. She'll eat mushrooms raw, though thankfully she seems to know instinctively which types not to eat."

"Really?" Bess laughed, taking a brush that Arya past to her. "I like chicken myself." Arya laughed and the two of them continued to work on the large direwolf's fur while she lay there grumbling happily at the attention.

Arya had decided to take a page out of her older brother's book: that the children of families that had broken their oaths or fought against them were not to be blamed for the acts of their parents. As such she had made certain that all of the Bracken ladies were treated well and had actually befriended Bess. The younger girl was simply fascinated by Nymeria, and had apparently been bugging her mother for over a year now to get her a hunting dog of her own. Her father wouldn't hear of it, considering hunting to be something only men could do.

The young girl had confided in Arya that she had long chafed at being forced to take lessons about etiquette, sewing and other things that were just uninteresting to her, and had tried her hand at many other things. She'd even gotten the castle's master-of-arms to train her a time or two until her parents found out and put a stop to it. Because of this and her general attitude Arya saw Bess as a kindred spirit and was doing all she could to encourage the girl, as was Dacey.

The two of them continued to talk while taking care of Nymeria, but soon enough it was almost dark out, and Arya escorted Bess back to her rooms in the top floor of the keep. She nodded at the two guards, both Mormont men, who made up a large portion of the northern portion of their men here. The Mormonts all knew how to swim, not well, but enough to get them across a river, something that couldn't be said of House Umber, Hornwood, or Karstark men.

Once inside the noble apartments, she saw Lady Bracken waiting for them. The older woman frowned at her daughter but Bess stared back not giving an inch. "I will speak to you later my girl." Lady Bracken finally said pointing imperiously toward Bess's bedroom. "To bed with you."

Bess growled a little, but nodded and moved off. The moment her daughter was out of earshot the older woman whirled back to face Arya who was still standing there, a faint smirk on her face. "It's bad enough you people took our castle and imprisoned us, now you're filling my daughter's foolish head with these idiotic ideas of yours!"

"How are they idiotic? I would've thought that you'd understand with Dacey and I here that a woman could become a warrior if she tried hard enough, or anything else she wished. The Mormont women have always been warriors as far back as anyone can remember. And winter is coming, you should be happy that your daughter wants to toughen herself up."

"I've heard the words of House Stark before, they didn't impress me then and they don't impress me now." Lady Bracken retorted with a sneer. "Just because you northern barbarians sometimes have to let your women learn the ways of war doesn't mean here in civilized lands that it's something we encourage. I demand you stop encouraging her!"

"My mother thought that same way, until I helped stop an attack that might have taken Winterfell by surprise." Arya said with a shrug. "If one of your older daughters had been strong enough to be a warrior, they might have also been smart enough to see through our disguises before we were inside Stone Hedge. And besides, do you really think you're in a position to make demands of me?"

Lady Bracken scowled but subsided when Nymeria moved up behind Arya, nuzzling into the short girl's hair from behind. Lady Bracken looked away for a moment then back at the young Stark girl. "What will happen to us anyway? You said you wouldn't allow us to be mistreated, and I have to say that you haven't yet, but what will happen to us if your side wins?"

"When my brother wins." Arya said smirking with a hint of teeth which caused the other woman to back away slightly. "When my brother wins, your House will be punished heavily. The precedent's already been set with the Freys. You'll probably be stripped of your Noble status, this castle and everything else. You personally might be sent into exile and your children taken by other houses, or into the Silent Sisters."

Arya was actually wondering if she could get away with taking Bess as a servant. Since she wasn't a knight she couldn't take a squire, but a page, maybe? She liked the younger girl, and encouraging another girl to rebel against what society saw as her role was fun as all get out.

"What if my husband surrenders, would that grant us leniency?" The older woman asked, aghast.

"Maybe, that's not my call. I doubt you'd be allowed to keep Stone Hedge even then, it's too good a castle. Whatever else you won't be in any position to continue this whole Blackwood/Bracken feud. You lot backed the wrong side, that's all there is to it."

"You know my husband will come for us? He'll have no choice but to try to retake the castle. Will you use us as hostages against that?" Actually Lady Bracken was more worried about such a ploy being useless than being used in the first place. The Lannisters were not the sort to care about hostages outside their own family.

"Maybe." Arya replied, shrugging. "It depends on whether or not he's in charge out there. If he is, we might and even if he sieges us we've got enough supplies in here to last us for years, and I doubt that any army trying to besiege us would even have weeks until my brother arrives to destroy them."

"Understand me." Arya went on, stepping forward into the older woman's personal space and staring up at her, her eyes hard. "I'm personally disgusted by the fact that your family sided with the Lannisters after they had imprisoned my uncle, wiped out House Vance of Wayfarer's Rest and a few other houses along their way here. If you had just declared neutrality, or simply acceded to their demands for food in return for them not pillaging your people I would've understood, but your husband didn't do that. Instead tried to settle your old gods-damned petty feud with House Blackwood! I doubt when my grandfather told his lords to act as their own conscience dictates that he had that in mind! Whatever happens to most of your family, I won't give a damn."

Lady Bracken backed away, her eyes wide and fearful for a moment and Arya growled a little at her before turning away abruptly. "But at least my brother and I won't paint your daughters with the same brush as their father and the rest of your house. We're not like the Lannisters, we're not going to wipe out your family, but we will make damn certain that your family is never in a position to ever threaten the peace of the realm again."

With that Arya walked off, leaving lady Bracken staring after her. Later that day Arya and Dacey met with Hathan and Roger. Hathan was still convalescing and would be for weeks yet. Despite their training with Ranma none of the Wolfsworn had the ability to use their ki to enhance their healing ability, not even Jon could do that, and Hathan had taken serious injuries in the battle holding the entrance to the barracks.

Sitting down, Arya took a moment to smirk at Roger, who scowled back at her. Bess wasn't the only Bracken girl attempting to get close with one of her captures. The oldest daughter, Barbara was constantly trying to flirt with Roger whenever she could when the girls were allowed out of their rooms for meals. Roger however knew precisely what his wildling wife would do to him if he cheated on her, and rebuffed her advances at every turn. This strangely enough simply made her more determined rather than make her decide to switch her attempts onto one of the others.

"Any word from Edd?" Roger asked, turning away from Arya purposefully.

Eddy was easily the best of the Wolfsworn in scouting around, not in hunting, just scouting. And he had been sent to watch the road past the point where they had ambushed the convoy during that ambush just in case, and hadn't rejoined them for the actual battle. That way, if things went wrong in the attack he and his men would've still been around to attack the Lannister supply lines. Luckily that hadn't been necessary.

"Not yet, though he should pull back some time tomorrow. I can't imagine it would take longer than five days for word of what happened here to get to the Lannister forces at the Kneeling Ford." Dacey responded before turning to Hathan. "Are you done your survey of the supplies?"

"Yes, and I have to tell you taking Stone Hedge was a magnificent idea Arya. Not only were they using the convoy system up to the Kneeling man's Ford, but they were using it from Wayfarer's Rest to her. Apparently there are still bandits out there that take any opportunity they can to attack their supply chain. In fact the convoy from here to Wayfarer's Rest has to be guarded by at least 400 men at a time and even then is sometimes attacked." Hathan replied.

"We've got enough supplies here for us to last us for more than decades with our numbers, which would be enough for a force the size of the Lannister main army for at least a few weeks. Without this place, and without Wayfarer's Rest..." Roger shrugged. "They'll have to live off the land, and an army that size simply can't do it. Ranma was right about that at least."

"I could wish we could let Edd and his men out there, they could continue to hit any hunting groups or whatever." Hathan mused. "But we'll probably need all the help we can get her."

Dacey nodded agreement, and the conversation turned to the defense of the castle. Each of them would be in command, initially at least, of a different guard shift, so that 200 men were on the walls at all times, though obviously in a pitched battle more could be called up. The rotation would keep their men fresh for the fight.

It was just as well they had rested their men when they could, because early the next day Edd and his men fell back to the keep. As the rest of his men trooped through the gates he yelled up at Dacey, who was standing on the wall. "They're about two hours behind us, you should start seeing them soon! I'd estimate that they sent at least 4 or 5000 men, nearly their entire force from the Kneeling Man's ford! And they've got both grapnels and some makeshift rope ladders. I'd bet anything they'll start to make a makeshift battering ram when they get here too."

Dacey nodded grimly then turned to one of her men. "Get the others up here, I want as many men on the wall as we can get."

A moment later Arya raced out of the keep, pulling on her suit of lizard-lion armor as she went. Growling angrily Nymeria followed her, but remained in the courtyard by one of the towers rather than follow Arya out onto the wall itself. There just wasn't enough room out there for her to move around, and Nymeria wasn't as good as Fenris was at using ki to strengthen her body's durability. "They're coming?"

Dacey nodded, not taking her eyes from the northern vista. "That's what Edd says."

Soon enough the attacking army came into view. Dacey wasn't very good at estimating numbers but the size of the army did seem to point to there being 4 or 5000 men out there. More than enough to wipe out her force in the open field with minimal effort, considering there was only about six hundred of them. Attacking us inside a castle however, that's a different bard's tale, she thought grimly.

Rather than surround the castle, the attackers kept marching straight up to it, with grapnels and rope ladders at the ready. Archers began to fire immediately as the attackers entered their range, causing the attackers vanguard to fall back and their own archers to come up. Soon an archer duel began at the front of the castle, slowly spreading out as the attackers did. At least a hundred men died in those first few moments, none of whom were among the men on the wall. The attackers didn't have any way to defend their men from high-angle fire while Stone Hedge was a large and well-built castle.

Even so a battering ram was brought forward, one of its ends still showing several dozen small branches covered with leaves. Dozens of men with large shields tried desperately to defend the men carrying it while they raced forward.

"Archers concentrate fire on the battering ram!" Dacey ordered. All around her the men along the wall and in the gatehouse turned their attention from the enemy's archers to firing on the men with the battering ram. Even with the numbers of men around them with shields, the attackers couldn't stand such a weight of fire. Soon enough the battering ram faltered under that fire, many of the men that had carried it going down. The attackers fell back in disarray, unwilling to face that level of fire, and the archers went back to sniping with their opposite numbers.

Elsewhere, men had raced forward with grapnels throwing them up here and there along the wall. The defenders cut these ropes quickly as they could, but they made themselves targets to the opposing archers and two men died doing so. Despite this however, all the ropes were cut quickly, and the attackers were forced to fall back. At the sound of a bugle the army retreated out of the range licking its wounds.

Arya frowned, absentmindedly checking Fang's edge after using it to cut one of the grapnels. "They must not have realized how many of us there were if they thought that would've worked."

"True, but the next time they'll come after us stronger and better prepared." Roger replied from the next to her.

"Who cares?" Arya said scoffing. "They can't take us by siege, they can only take us by assault and we've got more than enough men to make them pay ten to one every time they try. I don't think they'll be able to stomach that kind of exchange."

"That's rather cold of you, but true enough." Edd chuckled grimly, testing his spear's leaf-shaped head with a finger.

Two days later, the besieging army was reinforced further by the arrival of a force nearly as large as the first that had arrived, flying house Bracken colors. While the rest of his army set up camp all around him, the Lord of the castle came forward under flag of truce.

Edd, Roger, Dacey and Arya were all standing on the wall by the gate, watching as the traitor rode up. Edd looked at the others, nudging Arya's bow which was propped up next to the younger girl. "Hmmm?" He asked hopefully.

"I wish," Arya muttered. "I've got no patience for traitors. But he's flying a flag of truce. The old gods would not look on us favorably for breaking such."

Dacey and Roger both rolled their eyes at their friends' bloodthirstiness, waiting silently for Jonos to speak. Soon enough he did so, bellowing out, "I am Lord Jonos Bracken, lord of Stone Hedge. I demand to know if my family is still safe, and what I might do to secure their release."

As the leader of this assault, Dacey took it upon herself to answer. "I am Dacey Mormont of Bear Island. Your family is safe, and will remain such. We have no need or desire to use them as hostages at this time." In an aside she muttered, "Since I doubt you'd be allowed to honor any deal based off that."

The others all nodded, with Roger going so far as to reply. "Aye, the Westerlanders have never been shy about sacrificing hostages, especially those not their own. And the first force that arrived outnumbers Bracken's."

Dacey waved him to silence, speaking up to continue her reply. "As to terms to secure their release, that is impossible. You stand accused of treachery against your Lord Paramount and the Riverlands as a whole, aiding the invaders of this country for your own personal gain. Thus the only terms we are allowed to take from you and your family is unconditional surrender."

"Then I will take back my castle and family by force." Jonos bellowed belligerently, not responding to the insults, then wheeled his horse away.

He firmly believed he was on the right side even now, the evidence of Joffrey's bastardy was too thin in his opinion, and Edmure was well known as a hothead, so could have easily been led into some sort of treachery. And more practically, the Tully's power had been waning badly, else how could the Freys have gone so long with their power grabs unchallenged by their Lord Paramount? No, he had seen a chance and took it, there was nothing wrong with that.

"Love your idea of diplomacy Dacey," Edd remarked, smirking at the older woman. "Though I don't remember Ranma ever actually telling us we couldn't offer our own terms to the traitorous Riverlands houses."

"He didn't but I think I offered the terms he and Daenerys would have offered if they were here. Besides I was diplomatic. I didn't call him a son of a bitch, a gold-bugging harlot, or a Lannister whipping boy with rocks for brains." Dacey replied primly, causing the others to laugh, even as the besieging army began to prepare an attack.

OOOOOO

Stannis pulled himself up over the wall, while behind and in front of him his personal guard had gone, clearing the areas of the wall to allow him access. He pushed one man aside and roared out, "Ours is the fury!" while he brought the Lightbringer around. The sight of the flaming sword frightened his enemies, but a few of them were still brave enough to try and charge towards him along the wall. One died from an arrow to the side of the head from the ground outside the castle of House Stokeworth. Another was engaged briefly with one of his Flame Guard, but the third reached Stannis. The greatsword in Stannis' hands slashed into the short sword of the other man slamming it out of his hand and slicing him open from one side of his stomach to the other.

A kick to the dead body and Stannis was away, leading the assault towards where a corner tower would allow access to the courtyard below and the keep beyond. Behind him, more men came up the ropes, and there was a deep rumble as a siege tower slammed into the side of the wall of the castle. There was another roar as more men came across its wooden bridge, and Stannis smiled grimly.

He had given Ser Balman Birch, who had married into the Stokeworth family and who was the de-facto leader of house given the men they had sent to King's Landing, a chance to surrender, and two days to consider it. After that time passed his army had begun its attack. The castle had held out for four days, but that was only because Stannis wanted the castle to remain standing unlike Rosby, whose outer walls he had ordered pulled down. But Stokeworth was in the center of very decent, well carried for farm land, and he had ordered his men to tread lightly here, something he enforced in as draconian a manner as possible. While Stokeworth would never be able to feed even a tenth part of the capital's population, it would be able to feed his army and its own smallfolk easily enough for a few months.

A moment later he didn't have time to think about such things. There was a group of fifteen men inside the tower, and Stannis was all alone for a moment. Even the fear of his flaming sword wasn't enough to overcome the courage given by numbers and the men charged him. He ducked under one sword blade, while blocking a blow from a flail, before Stannis quickly brought his greatsword slamming into and through one man's arm into his chest piercing both before he pulled it out quickly to block an overhand blow from a mace.

"Clear the door my King!" shouted a voice behind him, and Stannis grunted, pushing hard against the haft of the mace then ducking aside from another blow from the mace before kicking out catching that man in the balls. Stannis grabbed the mace wielder by the head, pulling him up and using his body as a shield towards his friends as he pushed forward allowing another swordsman in behind him. The man in his grip gasped as one of his former comrades tried to shove his longsword through his body to get to Stannis, but it didn't work.

Stannis was able to move to one side of the doorway, still using the other man as a shield for a moment his own blade having fallen to the floor of the guard room as he simply protected himself while more of his men piled into the tower around him. Soon the last defender went down, and he tossed the body of his former shield aside before grabbing up the Lightbringer again. "Forward!"

A moment later Stannis was standing in the courtyard staring up at the keep. It's doors were closed, but that would not last long. Already the main gate was being opened, his men were pouring in. He nodded to Lord Buckler, who had proven himself one of the better men Stannis had in close combat. He didn't know enough about strategy or tactics to make a decent wartime Hand, but as a leader in this kind of battle, he would do well. The two men nodded at one another, then Stannis bellowed. "Bring up the battering ram!"

Two hours later the battle was over, and the prisoners, what there were of them were being dragged out. The men anyway, the women were facing something far worse. Realizing this when he didn't see any maids among the prisoners being brought out of the keep Ser Seaworth scowled. I'll hold my hand up to being a pirate, a scoundrel, even a murderer, but there are some things I won't allow if I can help it. With that thought foremost in his mind, Davos grabbed a few of his House's men and entered the keep determinedly.

He found the women, the maids and other servants of the castle here and there in the keep where they had tried to hide unsuccessfully. Now the soldiers were doing what victorious armies due to the women of their enemies. Davos and his men put a stop to such as the moved through the keep, but they began to run into opposition when they ascended to the second floor.

There in the keep's kitchen they found a man who had just grabbed a young servant girl, who couldn't be more than 15 and threw her to the ground. His fellows all around were already undoing their breaches as the girl screamed beneath the first man.

"Get off her." Davos said, growling the words. When the man didn't obey fast enough, Seaworth bleakly thrust his sword into the man's back and through his stomach. The girl almost screamed again as she was suddenly awash with blood, but her screaming stopped as Davos pulled her would-be rapists body off her and tossed it to the side. Behind Seaworth his men spread out, daring the other men in the room to do anything.

From another room on the far side of the kitchen, which might've been the storeroom or some such, several dozen other soldiers poured out. All of them had their blades out, and their eyes were ugly as they moved toward Davos and his men.

Behind them Davos could see five other maids, two of whom had already been stripped of their clothing while the others looked as if they had been beaten. He glared at the men, and was about to order them to put up their blades in Stannis' name when the would-be rapists stopped suddenly, suddenly looking very worried.

"Is there a problem here?" said a voice from behind Davos and he turned, his eyes widening slightly. In the doorway stood twenty of the Flame Guard their hands on their swords, their shoulders marked with the burning flame that denoted their station.

The soldiers who might've fought Seaworth and his men backed off fearfully. Not only were they now outnumbered, but it was commonly thought among the regular soldiery that the men of the Flame Guard were not right in the head. Fighting them was a losing proposition.

After a moment the leader of this group said simply, "Lord Stannis and the lady have ordered that the womenfolk not be molested. This will happen."

Davos moved to the doorway and looked on in astonishment as the Flame Guard entered the keep purposefully. All of them, and their numbers were now up to 400. But behind them came an even worse force. Melisandre herself strode into the keep glaring around. And if that doesn't do it nothing will he thought, being careful not to meet Melisandre's eyes, better safe than sorry after all. Strange, I wouldn't have thought Melisandre the sort of woman to care what happens to other women, but I suppose I could be wrong, about that at least.

Unknown to Seaworth, Melisandre had plans for those women. Plans which would in time be just as horrifying to the women as what would have happened to them otherwise.

That night Stannis and the rest of his lords and most favored lieutenants slept in the keep. The upper halls hadn't seen much in the way of fighting and were very livable. It was nice to have a bed rather than a cot after so long in the field.

At her Lord's behest Melisandre tried one more time to scry current events without a sacrifice. She was at it for several hours, refusing to come away with nothing, until finally she got a vision. The steel jaws of the wolf, ripping out a lion's guts. The blood from the wound sprayed everywhere, tiny drops of blood each becoming, as the vision changed, a richly armored knight. The next image was of a giant skull rising from a city which she recognized at King's Landing. Then suddenly the skull multiplied, spreading everywhere. Then that too changed, the skulls freezing as a giant hand of snow and ice suddenly appeared, and winter blanketed the land.

She gasped, breaking out of the vision and stumbling away from the fire shaking her head for a moment. The Great Other, his hand is growing stronger his arm longer as winter nears! The rest she didn't understand, but that last piece was easy enough. She hastily grabbed up a robe draping it over her body, her skin glistening with sweat and her breasts heaving for a moment as she composed herself, her hands and legs trembling for a moment. When she was certain she had control of herself Melisandre raced out of her room to find Stannis.

At that moment Stannis was the only one of his lords awake, standing in the castle's study pouring over his map. He wasn't actually thinking about the physical map so much. No, he was wondering about the Reach, and their army, as well as what Melisandre and his own spies had reported about the dangers pressing the Reach from every direction. How loyal were they? How loyal were the Stormlands lords with Renly, surely they had learned by this point that Renly was no Robert reborn? What would the combined army's morale and disposition be? All those things would matter when they clashed, as they inevitably would.

He looked up as Melisandre entered, out of breath even from the short distance from her room to his at the end of the hall. The vision had really taken it out of her. Stannis frowned, watching her legs and hands shaking with exhaustion. "What have you seen?" He asked, pushing a chair towards her before he turned to the series of bottles two one side of the room.

Melisandre sat down quickly, and he passed her a cup of good brandy quickly. She gulped down the entire glass then put it down and began to explain the series of images she had seen.

After a moment Stannis sat as well, his face almost ashen. "The first vision is simple enough to understand, the war between the wolves and the lions continues, and the young Stark has apparently won a major victory. But the rest..." He shook his head, his face carved from granite. "Plague, a worst enemy than any army."

"It is not just that!" Melisandre said sharply. "Those bodies, unless they are burned to ash, when winter comes... When the power of the Great Other comes they will come alive! With an army of that size, nothing will stand against it."

Stannis thought that was an exaggeration. Even if he believed in this Great Other, the Wall had withstood the White Walkers several times in ages past, and they had not been able to move around it before. Still, he wasn't about to say that aloud, understanding that that was one of Melisandre's main objectives in helping him gain the throne.

Worse, the problem of the plague was real enough. It was a wonder really that King's Landing hadn't had one before this. Moreover, that danger was something he could grasp. It also forced his hand in a way. I had hoped to let my army gain more training time, then send out overtures to various Stormlands and Reach lords that might be willing to turn their coats after seeing how incompetent my brother is in the field. But not now, I cannot trust Renly to be as ruthless as he needs to be to deal with a plague. I'll still send out various messages, especially to the Florents and others of the Reach, but they won't have nearly as long as I hoped to decide to switch sides...

After several moment's reflection Stannis spoke aloud again. "Tell me Melisandre, how would you make a city burn?"

OOOOOO

Hearing the call from the lookout indicating he had seen land in the southwest Asha smiled widely, looking forward to the end of this particular journey.

The trip down from the north had been very nervous. Just because the captains decided to follow her initially didn't mean all of them were happy about it later, and it'd taken several more instances of smooth talking to make them keep following her. Even so she had lost two ships when they got to the Cape of Eagles. They had split off to join their fellows attacking that beleaguered land.

Stupid of them she thought now, not for the first time. What prizes do they think to find in that area of fishermen, and farmers, there's nothing of import there! Nothing worth the Iron Price. Still, if I can get Rodrik on my side, this lot can go hang for all I care.

A few hours later she was marching her way up towards Ten Towers, the seat of one of the greatest houses of the Ironborn. She was immediately admitted into Ten Towers, the seat of House Harlaw, since the guards knew her well, she had been here many times before in her youth. The castle was named that because the lord who had commissioned its construction had been a man of mercurial moods, and every single tower that was scattered across the castle looked different.

Asha paused for just a moment before she entered the largest tower, a massive spire that served as the castle's keep, looking around at the other towers. She remembered playing tag and running around here in her youth, up and down steps and all around the towers. Asha often felt more at home here in Ten Towers than back in the castle of Pyke, though that wasn't saying much.

A few minutes later Asha was ushered into the Reader's, as he was known, study. He was of course reading when she was shown inside. This time however he wasn't reading one of the books which lined every inch of the large studies interior, instead he was reading a note of some kind. He looked up as Asha entered, setting aside the note with a small smile. "My watchers said that you returned with ten ships, well done! I thought that you'd only return with three or four at most."

"You knew I'd run into trouble." Asha said, making the question a statement as she looked at the older man.

Rodrik Harlaw was an older man of her father's generation, but that was about all he had in common with Balon Greyjoy. Where Balon simply looked as if he had a certain low cunning, as well as a lot of anger and arrogance, Rodrik looked like a scholar, which matched his voice. He could also make the usually harsh, dark tones of the language of the Iron Islands seem almost flowing. He was somewhat shorter than Balon, his hair was almost completely solid gray, and his beard was neatly trimmed.

For all that he looked like a scholar though Rodrik had and indeed was still a capable captain. His ship, the Sea Song, was well maintained and Asha had served on it under his command when she was younger. His hands, despite the fact that they were stained with ink, were large and strong, and there was a mace hanging from the back of his chair.

"Oh yes, it was obvious. I don't think your father set out to let you fail, but he certainly sent enough older captains, men who knew their own minds, along so he could be certain there would be some kind of assault on the North. Foolish, but if you'll forgive me Balon was never one for deep thinking. "

Rodrik took off the Myrish glass he needed to use to read with, setting it down with care then suddenly leaned forward. The affable old scholar disappeared, replaced by the intelligent and penetrating eyes of an Ironborn warrior who had lead his ship and family to becoming the most powerful House in the Islands despite Balon's Rebellion and everything else life through at them.

"This whole operation, the 'Rise of the Kraken', was an idiotic endeavor from the very beginning." he said bluntly. "If Balon was so determined to attack Westeros we should have attacked Seagard alone with our full forces. Then we might have taken the day, and we could have seen a time to come when the Ironborn might rule a portion of the Riverlands once again if we allied with one of the other powers, the Lannisters for preference. As it is we've not only woken the wolf and the fish but the lion as well, and I've no doubt pricked ourselves on the roses of the Reach."

At her raised eyebrow Rodrik shrugged. "I haven't heard anything from any of the other attacks, what does that tell you?"

Asha groaned slightly. A victory was shouted and lauded about, a loss... if you were the Ironborn there was nobody alive to tell about it. "How long would it take some survivors from Lannisport to get here? I've never been on that route before, I've always gone far out to sea to make certain I didn't see any of their naval galleys."

"If there were survivors of that attack, they'll be in sight of Harlaw within a few days, if they came directly here at any rate. I'd think that they'd be Blacktyde ships. Like myself Baelor was not happy about being forced to join the war. I think he'd take any chance he could to get away."

Rodrik stared at her, and Asha thought quickly. "How many ships can you give me?"

"I could pledge you another two dozen longships, eventually. It would take time to get most of them here of course, I had to hide them so that your father wouldn't find them. Up rivers, here in there all along my island. Why?" Rodrick's tone however showed he already had a shrewd idea.

"I need a victory, a big one, one with lots of reward for our iron price, with that I'll be able to command enough respect from the other captains, and we might be able to do something."

"Like what?" Rodrik pressed, shaking his head. "If Rise of the Kraken was the disaster we both think it is, what can we do? This is a trick question my dear. It only has one answer."

"You mean defend the islands? From who? With everything happening on the mainland, who is going to have enough attention to spare for us?" Asha asked skeptically.

"Everyone we attacked." Rodrik said bluntly. "We ourselves might not be important in the grand scheme of things, but little pinpricks can add up, and as my analogy should have told you, I'm afraid that our attacks succeeded just enough to rouse our enemies, but not enough to destroy their ability to strike back. Never do an enemy a small injury my dear, remember that. However, we need more information about the other attacks and we need you to get your victory before we could decide what to do next. By the way, what captains came with you?"

Asha described them, and watched as Rodrik's eyebrows went up. "Really, the Kennings split? Interesting. I think you might wish to take the time to speak to Lord Kenning about that, it strikes me as odd. For now however, I can promise you several ships in the next several days. Until they arrive, my House is yours. Now if you'll excuse me, I have some correspondence to finish before dinner."

"Heh, I'll let you to your reading old man." Asha laughed, turning away with much of her humor restored. Over the next few days as Rodrik began to gather his ships, Asha did partake in Ten Tower's hospitality. On the third day she decided to take Rodrik's advice however, and journeyed to Castle Kenning, House Kenning's seat.

It was inland, but a river led up to it from the ocean, allowing her to use Black Wind to get there rather than journey overland on horse, something Asha was thankful for not being a very good rider. In fact she'd rather eat a horse than ride on one.

Letting Qarl in command of the ship Asha jumped out onto the small wharf which allowed access to the small keep of House Kenning. The door was opened for her, and the castellan of the keep, an older man with a fearsome set of facial scars, only one eye and a peg leg, showed her into his lord's sitting room bidding her wait there for him.

The room was much more spartanly furnished than the Reader's, and not just because of the absence of books or book shelves. There were several soft, comfortable chairs, a single desk at one end of the room, a lit fireplace on one wall, and several sconces for lit torches. But what caught Asha's attention was the tapestry hung on the wall directly across from the fireplace. It showed the banner of the house, a hand coming out of some storm clouds, one finger pointed downward sending lightning bolts everywhere.

Asha had seen the banner before, not only in the past month but before that, and yet its significance had never actually penetrated. The sign was that of the Storm god, the evil god in the Old Way, the enemy of the Drowned God, and the enemy of all those who followed the Old Way. Why didn't I notice that before? Why in the Drowned God's name would anyone put that symbol on their houses' banners?

"Our symbol shocks you don't it?" Said an older male voice from the doorway to the sitting room.

Quickly Asha turned, almost unconsciously letting one hand fall to her cutlass's hilt almost drawing it before she stopped herself. The man in front of her was old, older than Rodrik's generation, older even than The Sparr, and almost as heavily scarred as his castellan. He was missing one arm, and his remaining hand was missing a finger, his face also bore several scars, and though he had both eyes still they were rheumy with age.

The man cackled for a second. "Hah, a pretty thing ain't it? Hah, the Old Way's all about da glory of payin' the Iron Price, of fightin' and plundering, but the damned Drowned Men don't e'er tell who really pays the Iron Price do they? Ironborn don't grow old, we just turn ta flotsam. I be Lord Kenning girl, and ye be Asha Greyjoy, daughter of the Fool King and niece of Aeron Wethair, the madman who eggs 'im on in his foolery."

"I didn't come here to listen to you attack the Drowned Men." Asha retorted, quickly getting her balance back. "I came to ask you why two of your ships decided to follow me rather than Ralf Kenning. He was an experienced and well-known captain of the Iron Fleet, and your House usually moves in step, just like the Harlaws."

Lord Kenning cackled again, moving to stand so his back was to the tapestry, forcing Asha to look at it if she wanted to keep talking to him. "Ralf be a good youngster suppose, but not fer deep thinkin' nor were he high in the family, despite bein' a Iron Fleet captain. Or because of it, if truth ye want. Ralf not be knowing what's the rest of us know, he don't believe in anythin' he can't be seein' with his own two eyes."

Asha kept one hand on her cutlass, something about this whole situation was putting her on edge, but she couldn't put her finger on it. "What doesn't he know?"

"That magic becomin' back into the world." Lord Kenning replied bluntly, leaning against the wall right under his House's banner. "The Drowned Men, they beclaimin' it be the Drowned God's will, favorin' your father's action. The Drowned God not be the only one showing his power. The tales say the Stark pup be the Old Gods' champion, there be dragons again, whispers of shadows movin'." His tone was disparaging as he spoke of the Drowned Men, almost contemptuous.

Asha frowned, not at the man's tone, like most Ironborn she didn't care one way or another about the Drowned Men. Most Ironborn only gave lip service to the Drowned God and its priests, but didn't truly believe in anything but the Iron Price. That was especially true since the last rebellion ended so badly. What made Asha frown was that Kenning was speaking of all this as if it was fact. "How do you know all this?"

"Longships go as far as Essos girl. That means word be getting back to us 'bout lots of things, slow but certain. Me son were in Qarth a month back, he hear of and even see some of their mages in action. Driving men mad wit' a glance, castin' illusions ta turn friend 'gainst friend, turning water into poison in the cup between one sip and the next. Before this, the Warlocks belosin' more power and influence every year, but now..." Lord Kenning shuddered, actually looking troubled for a moment. "Now they be on the rise, and the whole city be fearin' their power."

"What does this have to do with two of your longships following me instead of Ralf Kenning?" Asha asked, getting back to the main topic. The concept of magic returning was interesting, but she wasn't a magic user, and she wasn't about to go and ask for aid from the Drowned Men.

"History be written by the winners, as friends of the Reader ye know this." Kenning responded. Asha was struck by the fact he used Rodrik's nickname without any of the contempt habitually shown it, but the old man went on quickly. "That was true eons ago as it is now. Now, with magic on the rise and yer father's blunder, it might be we have the chance to reverse things, but only if we can husband our strength, pay the Iron Price fer as high a trade as we can."

Asha frowned at the words not understanding them, but then she stared, her face frozen in shock as she understood, glancing between the man and the banner hung above him. The banner that showed the hand of the Storm God. She backed away her eyes wide as she gripped her cutlass' hilt. "You, you don't, that, you... you worship the Storm God!?"

In the religion called the Old Way, the Drowned God was the center of belief, the creator of the Ironborn who made them to reave and rape their way across the ocean, who had created the idea of the Iron Price, of taking what you wanted through iron and blood rather than paying the gold. It was the Drowned God who, when a man drowned at sea or died during battle on the sea, welcomed him into his halls beneath the ocean.

On Ranma's old world three of the world's most prominent religions made space in their theology for a source of evil like the Anti-Christ, Shaitan or Satan depending on who was doing the speaking. The Storm God was that figure to the followers of the Drowned God. The creator of storms, the bringer of lightning and the fury that sent ships to the bottom outside of battle and honorable death, he who snuffed out the living fire that warmed the Grey King, the first king of the Ironborn.

It was only the fact that Asha wasn't a firm believer in the Drowned God in the first place that was keeping her from going for Kenning's throat right now.

Yet instead of taking umbrage at Asha's words Lord Kenning laughed. "Kakakaka, that's right girl, but think of what I said the winner rights the history! The followers of the Drowned God won, and they wrote the history, o'course they'd make their enemy as black as they could! Use that brain of yours!"

Asha frowned, her cutlass half off as she realized what the man was saying, before slamming it back into its sheathe. "That, that still doesn't... do you have any proof of that?"

"Hah, none you'd believe, not if yer as bright as the Reader has always said. And truth be told, yer like Ralf in that, ye don't really believe in magic, despite me words about that do ye?"

Lord Kenning watched as Asha, rather reluctantly shook her head then laughed again. "Kakakaka! The truth might come to ye eventually, if ye be worth it. The Storm God be as much a god of battle as the Drowned God, but he be givin' favor where it due rather than just revelin' in death and giving naught but what the believers already have within 'em."

Kenning had not heard of the powers the Drowned Men had used to aid Balon in taking the Arbor, but even if he had Kenning wouldn't have cared. After all those powers came from death, the death by drowning for the penitents, or the vitality of the Drowned Men, and as such would have proven his point: that the Drowned God did not care about his believers only that it was fed by death. Of course in this it was not alone amongst the spiritual powers in the world.

It took a moment, but Asha was able to control herself. "You're right, any proof of that you could show me I wouldn't believe, and really it doesn't matter to me what the fuck you believe, so long as it doesn't cause division among the fleet, and your ships follow my orders. You say you're conserving your strength, what does that mean to me?"

"Bah, we've been keepin' the secret for millennia, hidin' in plain sight and only sharin' the truth with few even of our own family, and none who marry into it neither. Kakakaka, most believe our banner be's a challenge, and that fittin' the As to what it means, our ships be followin' you so long as ye don't lead them into unwinnable battles. And specially if yer be fightin' to defend the isles. We be sending three more ships with ye when ye leave Harlaw."

"Fine." Asha barked, now wanting nothing more than to get away from this man and his insanity. She might not really believe in the Drowned God, but that didn't mean she was immune to being in the presence of a self-possessed Storm God worshiper. "Since defending the isles is one of my aims, that's fine. I'll see your ships when they arrive in the port."

With that she turned, hastening away. It occurred to her as she did that she could share the secret she's just been told with the rest of the Ironborn. Discovering a Storm God worshiper would probably win me a lot of points with the Drowned Men, and the Ironborn don't really need even that little a reason to turn on one another. After a moment though Asha rejected the idea. Not only would that weaken her fleet, but she had no respect for the Drowned Men in any event, since as a group they had backed her father's idiotic rebellion. No, best to ignore this frankly, it just doesn't matter now. By the time Black Wind had reached the ocean she almost believed that too.

Back in his castle, Lord Kenning sighed faintly, standing on the castle's parapet as a storm moved in, feeling the wind picking up. "A storm be comin', all ye can do is ride it as best ye can, Asha Greyjoy, if ye be worthy."

OOOOOO

Ranma had recalled the heavy and light cavalry, wary of Tywin trying to set up a trap for them in the hours after the initial battle, not liking the fact he'd been able to keep his reserve intact and under control. The old lion was a cagey animal, and Ranma did not want to allow him any kind of victory to rally his men with.

As it was, the battle had been almost entirely one-sided. Going by initial reports Ranma and his men had thus far suffered a little under a thousand men dead, with only two dozen or so from the pike regiments. Those losses were mostly in the light cavalry under Lord Shawney that had shorn up the left side of the battle, and among his irregular infantry before they had fallen back through the pikes. The archers had taken some casualties against their fellows but not nearly as many as they had caused thanks to their longer-range and better armor.

Indeed, the incredibly low death toll among the northerners was at least partly because of the far better armor that House Stark had provided all of the northern infantry with. Even most of the archers had what Ranma's old world called brigandine armor. The trained armsmen who made up the irregular infantry had good chain mail and excellent helmets, while the pikes had chest plates over chain mail and equally good helmets. It made them even slower than they were made by their weapons, but it had served them well in battle. In comparison, the levy forces of the Westerlands were lucky to have leather armor or cheap scale mail. The armsmen's armor varied widely in quality, with House Lannister's men-at-arms armor matching that of the North, but many of them did not have helmets.

Worse, very few Houses emphasized the need to work together in battle when training their armsmen. Every Northman in the army had been drilled to work with his fellows, to guard one another's backs and to form a very damn good shield wall. Not up to the level of group training the pikes wielded, but still well above the training of their fellows. Tywin should have realized that given the battle of Two Truths, but Ranma was happy to have given him another lesson in training overcoming numbers.

Another 400 or so had been reported so far as injured though that number would likely go up in the next few hours. Merry had already fallen back to the army's camp and was dealing with the worst of it.

Despite the massively one-sided victory Ranma stared bleakly out over the battlefield, seeing the windrows of dead bodies out there as the crows and other battlefield vultures flew out of the sky. Who was it in my old world who said that it was a good thing war was so terrible lest humanity become too fond of it? I think I understand that phrase better with every day this war lasts. Those crows out there are the only real winners here.

With a sigh he turned to House Wayn's field commander, a middle-aged knight named Ser Dormer. He had been rather sheepish and seemingly ashamed at the fact that his men had been forced to remain back at the base camp but he had come forward quickly as soon as the battle was won. "I want survivors," he said staring at the other man. "Anyone out there who has survived is to be taken into custody, any injured whose injury isn't life-threatening is to be transported to princess Myrcella's hospital. Otherwise, give them mercy."

"Mercy?" The older knight asked, looking confused.

"Yes mercy. If a man is dying from a gut wound, or has had his spine severed or lungs punctured, then yes, it is a mercy to kill them quickly." Ranma said bleakly.

As Dormer turned and raced off to his horse, Greatjon had pulled his own horse up beside Ranma in time to hear that and laughed harshly. "Don't know why you care so much about the soldiers of the enemy. Better to kill them all and have done with it."

"And after that none would ever surrender to us, or would ever give quarter to us in turn." Ranma said turning to him with a faint frown on his face. "You're not thinking Greatjon. Those men out there were simply following orders, or were simply forced into joining up. The armymen swore to follow their Lords, can we fault them for that? No, I want justice, not vengeance. We'll give them a chance, which is more than they gave the smallfolk of the Riverlands, before making them stand trial. They will serve Westeros more in paying for their crimes than dying today."

Back in Fairmarket, Daenerys had ordered the injured that were staying there after that battle to speak to the refugees who had flooded the town to learn all they could about the atrocities committed on the other side of the Red Fork. Ranma hadn't seen anything from them before they left, but he was gravely certain that when Daryn linked up with them again they would have enough reports to start figuring out which Lords and their men were most involved in the depredations on the smallfolk.

He explained that to Greatjon and then stared hard at the older man. "Do not mistake my penchant for mercy for weakness, Greatjon. Tywin and his family will pay dearly for their men's actions here in the Riverlands, for their treason to the throne and for starting this damn war."

Greatjon stared into the younger man's eyes than laughed, thumping Ranma on the shoulder hard enough to send most men to their knees. Ranma merely took it, as solid as a boulder. "You Starks, no give in any of you! Hah! I understand your point lad, it's just not the way anyone else has ever made war."

"Hah, then that already puts me one up on all of our enemies." Ranma laughed then went on seriously. "Could I ask you for a favor my friend? I'd like you to pick out one of your best men and assign him to following Myrcella around. I know I can't stop her from working on the enemy injured taken to her hospital, but I want to make certain she's safe. I've already assigned one of my family's men to it, but another guard wouldn't go amiss."

Greatjon nodded understanding this was a sign of the Young Wolf's trust in him. It had been obvious for months that both Daenerys and Ranma treasured Myrcella, regardless of her family or status. He turned to bellow orders to one of his commanders, who raced off in search of a man Greatjon had thought of immediately. By this time all the other lords and their troops commanders had arrived, and Ranma motioned to where Cley was waiting along with a few other pages with several jugs of wine and mugs.

When they had all been served Ranma raised his glass in congratulations. "Well done." He said simply, nodding at them each in turn though he did not nod at those lords that had not taken part in the battle, letting that simple difference serve as a warning to them in the future that trying to waffle in their loyalty would be noted and would not be tolerated. These lords were Lord Roote and Lord Ryger, who had kept all of their men back from the battle even after the outcome was no longer in doubt, just like Lord Wayn had ordered his men to do.

Both men looked suitably chastened, though Ryger also looked proud when Ranma did nod at his sons. Both younger men had fought with the irregular infantry alongside Smalljon, and according to him did fairly well.

"You all fought and led your men well today, however one of you has done that time and time again over the last few weeks. Patrek Mallister, come forward." Ranma went on, smiling faintly as he drew Ice from its sheathe, which Patrek had returned to him when Ranma had fallen back from the pike regiments.

Patrek did so, his arm in a sling. He winced occasionally, but looked game despite his wounds. "Your Grace?"

With a faint smile on her face Daenerys moved from where she had been controlling her dragons to stand with her husband, laying her hands on the hilt of Ice over his as she spoke. The two of them had talked about this in the days preceding the battle, and she wholeheartedly agreed with this. "Patrek Mallister, you have proven yourself an able warrior, a intelligent commander, a man of good heart and courage."

Ranma took over then, his eyes flashing with humor, even though his voice was still formal. "I ask you now in my name and the name of my wife Daenerys Targaryen, will you become the first of our River Blades?"

"Your majesties, I would be honored." Patrek said, going down on one knee, bowing his head.

Nearby Jason blinked and was about to object but Ranma turned to him, smirking slightly. "Don't worry Jason, he's still your heir, nothing in the oath's Patrek's going to take will offset that and when you call him home to take up his Lordship, or to marry, that's still up to you too. This is just a way for me to keep him close, and to train him as well."

In front of Ranma Patrek smiled staring at the ground of the tent. He'd seen what the Wolfsworn could do in battle and had learned that all of them had been trained by Ranma before this campaign. No, there was no downside to becoming the first of the River blades.

His father nodded, consoled and actually feeling proud now. To have his son be the first of the River Blades, the Riverlands equivalent of the Wolfsworn was a massive honor. The fact that it was also a shrewd political move was not lost on him either. It further tied his family to the new royal house like the creation of the Wolfsworn had, however indirectly, tied nearly the entirety of the North together.

Daenerys began the oaths this time, beginning them after she and Ranma laid the flat of Ice on the young Mallister shoulder. "Do you, Patrek Mallister, swear to uphold the law and customs of the land? To always be true to the crown, so long as it remains true to defending the people it is charged to protect?"

"I do." The young man replied, raising his head to stare into her violet eyes for a moment before looking over at Ranma.

"Will you defend the innocent and the weak against those who would oppress them? Will you both offer and keep our council, fight by our side in these troubled times and beyond, in the pursuit of fairness and the rule of law?" Ranma asked.

"I will." Patrek replied for the second time, his grey eyes now locked on Ranma's ocean blue ones.

"Will you show mercy to those who deserve it, generosity to those who need it, and bring justice down upon those who break the Crown's peace?" Daenerys asked.

"I will."

"Will you defend the realm against the forces of darkness and other dangers, both foreign and domestic?" Ranma said, once again taking up the string of oaths.

Patrek smiled grimly, shifting his wounded arm slightly then answered with the same words Ser Barristan had used to reply to that question. "I so swear to do."

"Then rise Patrek Mallister, River Blade!" Ranma and Daenerys intoned together, removing Ice from Patrek's uninjured shoulder.

With that everyone who understood the importance of this, congratulated Patrek who pushed himself to his feet and moved to one side of the tent taking up a small glass of wine from Cley. Daenerys and Ranma both noticed that Ryger however looked angry, while Shawney and Blanetree both looked wistful. We'll have to think of something for the older lords who don't have sons we can add to the River Blades in the future, Daenerys thought filing that away for now.

After a moment however Ranma turned back to more important matters. "The first stage of this campaign is over. Tywin's army is bleeding and lamed, and I doubt he even knows it yet."

"We should get after them now." Greatjon growled getting down to business. He understood Ranma's point about the treatment of their enemies, and in fact respected him more for it. If it got about that Ranma and Daenerys treated their enemies' men with such respect, or at least in such an evenhanded manner, it could only bolster his reputation. But he didn't understand why Ranma had called off the pursuit entirely.

The others agreed, especially Ser Blanetree, Brynden and most of the Riverlands lords and unit commanders. Yet those who stayed quiet is telling, Daenerys thought, amused. It seemed as if the Lords who had been with him during his game of lion baiting were all willing to follow his orders now without question.

"We could go after them now, and we might be able to catch them up, I'm not certain of that considering they actually number slightly less than us now, and will be going hell for leather. Portions of our army could certainly catch them up, but would those units have enough punch to finish them off?" Ranma said shaking his head. "Yet think about this my lords, what is the objective of this campaign? It isn't just to smash the Lannister's main army, or even kill Tywin. Indeed, killing Tywin in battle may well serve to make him a martyr, at least at this point."

"No, the main thrust of this campaign is to either force the Westerlanders out of the Riverlands entirely, or wipe out their army entirely. I've been told that he has several garrisons elsewhere on the south of the Red Fork, and a reserve force at the Kneeling Man's Ford. Those forces would still have to be dealt with, along with their allies."

"That may be, but certainly dealing with them would be much easier after the news of their main force being destroyed reaches them?" said Lord Roote, who knew one of those garrisons was in his town of Harroway.

"Not so, my Lord." Daenerys said shaking her head. "They would become desperate, and desperate men would lash out. The smallfolk on the other side of the Red Fork have suffered enough without the depredations that desperate men would foist upon them."

Ranma nodded towards her. "Exactly. We want Tywin to get back to the Kneeling Man's Ford, then have enough time to call in those men to rebuild his numbers before we attack him there. With the Wolfsworn attacking his supply lines and facing the threat of dragons attacking his camp, he might well surrender or even face a revolt among his men if we're lucky. If not, with the dragons we can burn his camp down around his ears before assaulting him over the Ford. Or he might be forced to retreat back to the Westerlands, which would allow us to try and pin him down at Wayfarer's Rest."

Many of the lords, particularly those who hadn't learned about Jon being sent off to take Wayfarer's Rest looked surprised at that before being filled in by their fellows. Most of their Riverlands lords still looked skeptical, but Shawney and Patrek did not, having seen what the wolfsworn could do.

"By the way, how bad is it on the other side of the Red Fork? I haven't seen any reports about that since we left Fairmarket, and those were mostly rumors." To one side Alayaya and Domic stood. They looked at one another while Lord Roote and the others looked concerned. "How bad is it?" Ranma asked again.

"In certain areas your highness it's very bad," answered Ser Blanetree bluntly. "Not as bad as it could have been, at least in some areas, those whose lords bent the knee, but very bad in others. They've ravaged the land in some areas, wiped out entire villages, settlements, farmsteads, even towns. Mummer's Ford is gone, though Lord Piper evacuated most of its inhabitants into Pinkmaiden and has kept them there since."

Ranma hummed thoughtfully. He'd heard that Piper had capitulated, but if they'd done that, there was obviously more to that story that hadn't crossed the Red Fork. That was good, the rest of what he was hearing that was very bad indeed especially with winter coming. That made it more imperative than ever that he force the Lannister forces or at least large portions of them to surrender rather than be destroyed. He'd need the manpower in the fields, let alone the other projects that could possibly spell the difference between life and death for thousands.

"Lord Blackwood probably did the same thing on his land, though I doubt the land itself will be in any condition to be worked for months. House Smallwood and its lands were ravaged, and the land around the River Road between Harroway and the Kneeling Man's Ford especially has faced extreme depredation." Lord Roote actually smiled a little as he shared this information, but the rest of his face began to try to run away from it when faced with the icy stare Ranma pierced him with.

Daenerys took his hand in hers for a moment, squeezing. Ranma squeezed back then looked around at the gathered lords and unit commanders. "We have a lot of decisions to make my lords, and we need this army ready to move soon regardless. Please see to the disposition of the army, then return here this evening. We'll have decided our next move then. For now, I'm going to go and see the wounded."

OOOOOO

Even before Ranma and his men arrived Daenerys had followed the policy Ranma had sent in creating camps for his army, which included necessities such as having a designated food preparation area well away from the latrines which were in turn away from the rest of the camp, and of course a hospital area. This was now controlled by Merry, and she had made certain it was ready for the influx of injured from the battle.

To aid her Merry had helpers, over fifty of them now, though only seven were trained. She also had another maesters healer, who had apparently been in the town Salt Pans before coming west to do what he could for the Riverlands army that had set up camp on the other side of the Ruby Ford. Only a few hours after the battle the two of them had saved dozens of lives.

But in the hours to come, as more Westerlanders were brought in, that number would pale to the number of lives that they couldn't save. The amount of people Merry and her helpers had to turn away after seeing their wounds numbered in the hundreds. Worse were the men who would be crippled for life, having lost limbs, hands or a combination of both. Pikes caused horrendous wounds, and the broadswords favored by many of the Northerners were even worse.

"Myrcella, how is it going, are you good for supplies?" Daenerys said, entering the tent that Myrcella was in currently from behind her.

Myrcella turned to look at her, nodding her head politely at the older girl. Woman dummy she thought to herself, still wondering when exactly that changeover happened. "For now, we are," Myrcella she replied before turning back to her work, finishing up the stitching on the side of a northern soldier's arm. "The number of injured we're taking in from the opposing army's survivors is going to put a major dent in them before the days done though."

The Targaryen queen frowned but nodded. Most other lords would've immediately told Myrcella to stop using valuable supplies on enemy soldiers, but Ranma and Daenerys had long talks about that in the past. Daenerys agreed with Ranma that the common-born soldiers should only be blamed for the acts they committed off the battlefield rather than on it. Besides, they'd need the manpower.

Myrcella went on, not following Daenerys's thoughts but her own. "Luckily the numbers of our own wounded is much lighter than we expected. I think we're only going to lose four of the wounded that we're currently treating, and our side's injured have already stopped coming in." Since it was barely afternoon and the battle had begun in the morning that was actually pretty damned good.

"You're not going to work yourself into collapse are you?" Daenerys asked.

"I'll try not to." Merry replied, not looking at her as she moved on to her next patient, one of the first Westerlander men to be brought in. He had taken an arrow to his shoulder and another to his thigh. Swiftly Myrcella went to work, cutting out the remains of the arrows that had been let in so as to not make the bleeding worsen then quickly stitched the wounds closed, making certain to use fire wine to clean the wound on his thigh thoroughly as well as on his shoulder after first was finished.

The man looked at Myrcella in shock as she patted his good shoulder before moving off to help one of her aides with a man who had taken a wound to his head. The armsmen she had left of course knew who the young girl had to be, he'd heard her name and the looks would've given it away in any case. But why in the world would Myrcella Baratheon be working as a healer? And how'd such a young girl become so good at it? He would not be the first prisoner to ask that question.

Ranma came into the tent at that point, nodding politely at the guards who were following Myrcella along. They both nodded back and Ranma took a moment to take in their appearances. Greatjon certainly found exactly the sort of soldier I wanted. He thought to himself, chuckling evilly inside at the idea of anyone running into either of these men.

The man Ranma had chosen to watch Myrcella as she went about her work was almost large enough to pass for one of the Umber men, though he wasn't as broad across the shoulders. He was an older man whose hair had streaks of gray in it and whose face looked as if it had been used as a punching bag in the distant past then cut up some more. His name was Grege Stenren, and he had served among the armsmen of Winterfell for longer than Ranma could remember.

He was also known to dote on his four children, two sets of twins two boys and two girls and was equally known for being wrapped around his wife's little finger. Appearances can be deceiving.

The man Greatjon had chosen was actually a little below normal height, but he moved lightly on his feet, almost like one of the Wolfsworn though not quite with that mix of unstoppable confidence and gracefulness that marked them. He also had about a dozen knives scattered around his person, and a wicked scar running from right above one eye down over his nose which finished right above his mouth. It changed what could have been a darkly handsome face into one to make grown men afraid. The fact that his eyes looked permanently slitted added to the effect.

His name was Eric Proudthenn. In times of peace he served House Umber as one of their chief thief-taker and one of the family's best scouts in times of war. He'd fought to put down the rebellion of one of the former minor house that had looked to House Bolton, which was where he got that scar from. In his case looks were not deceiving: he was every bit as dangerous, and some would say plain mean, as Grege was not. He did however have a soft spot for animals, particularly foxes for some reason.

Turning from his appraisal of the two guards Ranma put his arm around Merry's shoulder. "Do you have everything you need Merry?"

Myrcella smiled up at him wanly. "Can you make me have another few thousand hands? Or better yet, train me to sleep standing up and get a full hours rest in a few minutes? Otherwise yes, I've got all I can truly ask for."

"Sorry Merry," Ranma said laughing ruffling her hair affectionately. "I'm not a miracle worker, I can teach you some mental exercises I suppose that could help your tiredness, but they'd take weeks to master, and I'm not even going to comment on the thousands hands thing."

"Best not to bother with it then." Myrcella said moving quickly to another one of her helpers who had just brought in another Westerlander armsmen on a stretcher with the aid of a House Wayn armsmen. This prisoner actually wore the colors of her family. Currently he was looking at her in shock and then from her to Ranma in confusion. Hostages, even 'honored guests' should not be talked to like they were friends like that, and certainly shouldn't be working as a healer around so many men! But the northern dog didn't seem to understand that. And the Princess didn't look as if she cared about it either.

To say that man and the rest of the Westerlands armsmen in the tent, were confused was an understatement. This was made even worse by the fact that there were two guards on the tent door, and their job was not to guard the Princess like the two decidedly evil looking men who were following her around inside of the tent. No, they were expressly out there to protect the Westerlands armsmen from their enemies, in case some of them took it in into their heads to get some revenge.

Such kindness to enemy soldiers was unheard of in Westeros, and the less said about the fate of captured troops in Essos the better, where slavery was the bedrock of the economy. Yet these same men had seen their lords go down, their plate armor unable to stop crossbow quarrels at close range, and the Northerners had fought a ruthless, brutal battle. The disparity between that and the way they were currently being treated was shocking. To say nothing of the girl who looked like a Targaryen.

"Remember after you've healed them they'll have to be separated back into their original units Myrcella. I want to keep the different forces of the various families and houses separate. It'll make it easier to pass judgment on them later on."

Myrcella nodded, and Ranma tapped her shoulder one last time before turning to go. "I'm going to do around and talk to the wounded for a bit, then I have something else I need to do. Will you stay here Daenerys?"

Daenerys nodded, rolling up the sleeves of her simple cotton shirt and looking over at Myrcella. "I'll do what I can here for a bit."

Again that shocked the Westerlanders. Leaders caring about the wounded like that? Actually going around and talking to them? Or, even stranger, pitching in to help actually heal the wounded?

"What is up with these Northerners!" one of them finally blurted aloud. "Don't they know of what war is?"

Another Westerlander answered him. He was a younger man who didn't wear any armor, showing that he'd probably been a conscript, but one who looked as if he came from a slightly better off family than most. "Talk to me about the mountains of dead they left out there on the field, or about the number of lords I personally saw go down when those pikes began to advance. I think they know a new meaning of the word."

OOOOOO

Ranma did indeed go around talking to the wounded, thanking the men for their courage, loyalty and sacrifice, bolstering morale to an even higher degree after the momentous victory. He also mentally thanked the Riverlanders for providing the tents they were currently using for the hospital area. They were much large than the ones assigned to his men, made for six men instead of the three or four of the northern tents. That made them much better suited to protecting the wounded from the vagaries of weather, which was going to be needed, considering that the sky was darkening with storm clouds.

Looking up at the sky Ranma shrugged philosophically. They had gotten incredibly lucky up to this point in terms of weather, only being snowed on once in the North very briefly, and then rained on once more on the march to Seagard. Besides isn't rain becoming more frequent a sign of autumn? Think I read that somewhere.

Soon Ranma left the hospital area moving through the army camp and exchanging shouts and greetings with many a man as he did. The Northerners were to a man jubilant about their victory, even the men who hadn't taken part like the majority of those he had been leading in the weeks prior to it in Baiting the Lion (which in years to come would become the formal name for that aspect of the War of Reformation). After the days it took Tywin to gather his army most of those men had rested enough to take part, but Ranma had still held them back from the majority of the fighting letting the Riverlanders and the rest of the Army win their spurs.

He also noticed that the pikemen were marching about with their heads held high, not arrogant, but definitely more certain about themselves than they had been prior to that battle. Only the 600 pikes from House Manderly had been bloodied before this, and it had come as a shock to them all to see how well their training and their discipline withstood the punishment of battle.

Ranma also noticed that Patrek and the others had released some of the army's alcohol supply to the men and frowned at that, but when he stopped to talk to Rickard Karstark who was the first Lord he saw as he moved through the camp, discovered that they had only allowed each man a single tankard, though they could eat all they wanted. "Good!" said Ranma nodding his head firmly. "If we have to move out quickly, I want the army ready to do so, not drunk off their asses."

Rickard laughed, shaking his head as he looked at Ranma, proud to be related however distantly to the man had won some of the most one sided victories in Westeros' history. "No worries there. But you think will be moving on quickly?" Most of the lords were wondering why they hadn't already pursued the Westerlanders. Yes the reasons Ranma gave them earlier were good, and no one was going to underestimate Tywin or his ability to surprise them, but they should've still pursued them with more than a few units of light cavalry to harry his sides and back.

He wouldn't say that out loud though. Ranma had more than earned his respect in the weeks leading up to this battle, and watching the entire strategy unfold had been amazing. Still, it was odd they had immediately pursued Tywin.

"Don't you find it odd uncle," Ranma said as if not hearing his unspoken question, almost seeming to change the subject. "That you don't see Wendel or many of his knights here? Or for that matter, Meera?"

Rickard thought for a moment then frowned as he realized he hadn't seen the Manderly representative in the meeting earlier, or even before that. In fact, now that he came to think about it, he hadn't seen Wendel, some of House Manderly's knights or very many of the few remaining clansmen today.

"I sent him slightly up river in the barges with orders to attack the Lannister encampment during the battle, and should be back this evening if everything went well. I sent him to do whatever damage he could to the Westerlands camp before pulling back."

"I see, yet..." Rickard shrugged

Ranma nodded. "Yes, yet, it isn't quite enough. I'm waiting for word of what is going on elsewhere to get to me before I decide our course from now on. After that we'll decide what else to do."

The older man cocked his head quizzically wondering how Ranma already seemed to have spies elsewhere in the Riverlands, since he hadn't seen Alayaya or Domicer contacting any such. But after a moment Rickard shrugged and the two men went their separate ways.

Ranma was soon the outskirts of the camp, moving out and away from the battlefield. There were several captured soldiers whose wounds were not life-threatening had been forced to work on aiding the House Wayn men, who, now that the battlefield had been scoured for wounded, had been put to work on burning the thousands of dead. Their faces showed how humiliated they were by this work, but Ranma merely thought it fitting: if they weren't willing to actually join the battle, the least they could do was clean up afterwards.

Another five minutes brisk walk brought Ranma well away from even those men, where he was joined by Fenris coming out of the scrub around him. Just then it began to rain, and both human and animal sighed, or seemed to sigh in Fenris' case. Ranma patted the giant direwolf on his shoulder, shrugging his shoulders. "Come on, the sooner we do this the sooner we can both find a nice warm tent."

The two of them kept moving until they were well away from the army. Crossing over a small previously dry riverbed that was already beginning to fill up with water from the storm, they hid themselves in a small copse. There Ranma sat down leaning against an oak as he stared at Fenris, who sat on his haunches in front of them. After a moment Ranma closed his eyes, concentrating on their connection and Fenris began to howl.

This part of the campaign was something only Daenerys, Jon and Arya had been told about. Jon had realized that if the direwolves could take over local wolf packs and get them to obey them for short amounts of time, then howls could be used for long distance communication between direwolves. Wolves relayed a lot of information to one another, even between packs, so it made sense that direwolves, being more intelligent, could take this to another level.

The problem came in the human mind's ability to understand the information transmitted. Wolves didn't think in terms of patterns, numbers, travel times, those things that humans routinely thought of when they were passing on information. Wolves thought in terms of terrain, sights and most importantly, sounds and smells. The senses of a direwolf in particular the sense of smell and hearing were simply beyond anything a human could truly grasp.

However, certain information could be passed along such as if the pack was doing well, and where they were at that moment. And sound carried. A wolf could make itself heard for leagues around to other wolves, and then have that howl passed on through the local wolf packs faster than any human communication could go. Direwolves could be heard even further away.

Back in the camp, all of the horses began to look skittish for a moment, while many a man of the Riverlands prayed to the Seven at the sudden, terrifying howl from the woodlands. Sunfyre and Rhaegon both raised their heads from their daily meal, staring off in the distance before going back to more important things while their mistress, still busy helping Merry, smirked. The sound even carried to where Tywin was trying to gather the remnants of his armies supplies. He lost several more men after their horses bolted when a few local packs began to answer the supreme alpha's call.

A few hours later that howl reached Stone Hedge, and Nymeria answered it, howling out in a somewhat lighter timbre than her brother. Next to her Arya placed her arms around the direwolf's mighty neck, their mental connection wide open as Arya tried to send to her brother the news that they had taken Stone Hedge. All she was able to do was send, large man-thing, stone-thing, large, important and finally an image of a bush, specifically an example of a bracken bush, and then again stone-thing!

Back with Fenris Ranma blinked in shock, nearly falling out of their mind meld. Stone Hedge?! Dacey took Stone Hedge! That is... he paused and thought for a moment that's actually some of the best news I've heard ever! But it does mean I need to change my thinking for this campaign. After that he delved once more into the howl as it continued on its way, getting passed on by Nymeria to the local wolf packs around her and eventually down to Jon and Ghost.

Ghost couldn't even pass on that much information, all of the human ideas were very difficult to pass on through normal wolves and each pack in the relay made it that much harder. All Ranma got from him and Jon was a sense of being precisely where he was supposed to be, and a sense that they were fully capable of defending their current den but had not been challenged yet. That was enough for Ranma however, and he began to slowly pull out of his meld with Fenris while the giant direwolf passed on his own information.

This changes everything, Ranma thought to himself after he pulled out of Fenris' mind entirely. One hand began to scratch his direwolf's ears absentmindedly while his mind was engaged in thinking about how Dacey and Arya's news effected his plans going forward.

Initially Ranma's plan had been to follow Tywin on his heels, nipping at his army to keep him from trying to reform and retake the offensive, then let Tywin get to the Kneeling Man ford as if his own army couldn't quite catch up. Then he'd let the man call in the rest of his forces, give the Westerlanders enough time to bring them all together and then realize how bad their supply situation was. Then if necessary he'd send the dragons across to destroy every piece of siege weaponry and anything else they could in those massive fieldworks, forcing the army to surrender.

And if they didn't, storming across would be much easier if their camp was on fire, their siege weapons gone, and the army starving. Even a week at half rations could tremendously effect the ability of a soldier to fight a well-rested, well fed enemy, and by that point many of the Lannisters would have been dealing with worse than that for several weeks. This didn't even consider the lack of other supplies and their general morale.

But with Stone Hedge taken, their supply situation isn't going to be bad, it's going to be horrible and obvious quickly. The reserves that were kept back at the Kneeling Man's Ford were almost certainly going to start attacking Stone Hedge to get to those supplies soon enough. And with Wayfarer's Rest also taken, there would be no reprieve from the lack of supplies. Couple that with the depredations they've already afflicted on the smallfolk around that area, they can't live off the land at all! But Tywin will realize that immediately.

If he learns Wayfarer's Rest was taken Tywin's smart enough to know what would happen if we caught up to his army at the pass. They could still retreat to the east however. I can't let them get to Harrenhal, that castle could safely house Tywin's entire remaining army, and they could strip the lands leading to it plus Harroway of supplies. I'd be forced to leave at least two thirds of my own army to keep them there or try and burn them out, and the dragons' fire isn't hot enough yet to attack stone.

No, instead... instead I think I'm going to have to keep the momentum but shift my attention to attacking from another oblique approach.... With that thought Ranma pulled out a map of the Riverlands from one of his jerkin's pockets, holding it up to the dim light as he thought hard. After moment marking off distances, he smiled thinly. Then got up, looking at Fenris. "I think you've earned the right to go hunt my friend, I'll see you back at camp when you're done."

Fenris nudged his nose into Ranma's shoulder, then bounded off into the distance. He couldn't smell any bears around, this wasn't the territory for them, but he'd seen signs of one of those little wild-cat creatures, the ones with the tufts on their ears. Those made good eating, not as good as bear but nothing was, but as good as deer in Fenris' opinion. Behind him Ranma had still retained enough of their connection to get a sense of his bonded direwolf's plans for dinner, and he laughed shaking his head before heading back to his army's encampment.

That evening at Ranma's behest the commanders of the army joined him in his tent. It was only the lords however, not their unit commanders since Ranma's tent couldn't house all of the unit commanders and the lords. Given the fact it was pouring down rain now, that was not a small consideration.

After letting the lords have a few moments to dry themselves via a small brazier set in the center of the tent, Ranma began. "News has reached me of the success of Jon's assault. He has taken Wayfarer's Rest, and is waiting there, ready to defend the castle from any kind of reprisal. Moreover, Dacey and her assaults on the nearby supply lines have been even more successful than we expected."

As the Lords looked at him some wondered how he had gotten that information. Others were simply waiting for him to expound on that point. Smiling, Ranma did so. "Dacey Mormont has taken Stone Hedge."

A shock went through every man there. None of the Riverlands Lords had been looking forward to that particular fight, or worse the discussion of amnesty for House Bracken. Most of them had actually liked Lord Bracken before this war began, but his deciding to use the war to settle his differences with Blackwood had changed that. Yet this hadn't blinded them to the fact that Stone Hedge was one of the best castles in the Riverlands. Besieging it would take years or lots of lives since Bracken wasn't stupid enough to fall for any of the tricks Ranma had shown them thus far. Ranma and the Northerners hadn't been so concerned about it of course, for various reasons.

More importantly the news that Stone Hedge and the lands around it was a supply hub for the Lannisters had spread, and every lord there knew how important that was. Brynden in particular laughed. "Damn me, the lions really are in a bad way up for supplies aren't they?"

Ranma nodded. "However, let's put that aside for now. Has anyone here heard of from the town of Saltpans and what's going on there?"

All of the Riverlands lords looked at one another shaking their heads. "Nay my Lord, neither House Hawick or Cox have been heard of since the start of hostilities." Said Ser Shawney.

"To my mind that means they chose opposing sides, and have together decided to not take part in the war. I'd bet Ser Cox has chosen the Lannisters, he has a large brood and not enough land to give them all, money would appeal to him. House Hawick's last lord was close with Lord Tully, so the new one will no doubt have decided to work against the Lannisters or at least remain neutral." Lord Ryger said authoritatively.

That seemed to be his default tone, Ranma noted. He was one of those people who thought he was an expert at everything. Still, what he said made sense. "When we get to the Trident we'll need to send someone down there with a large enough force to face anything that could be there. I don't want us to be blindsided by another House joining the Lannisters and attacking our own supply lines from behind or retaking Harroway after we take it back ourselves."

Lord Roote stiffened at that and leaned forward while the other lords looked surprised. "You mean to march on Harroway rather than chase after Tywin?" said Greatjon doubtfully. "I won't call you a fool led but..."

Ranma laughed. "I think we can do both Greatjon! Uncle Brynden," he said, turning to the older man. "You'll be in command of that force. How many men do you think you'll need to make Tywin think that the entire army is chasing after him?"

Brynden thought for a moment then shrugged. "Light cavalry would be best for that kind of thing, with heavy cavalry following up along with a force of archers, and scouts of course. Two thousand two-hundred or so all told should be enough. Do you want us to start off immediately?"

"As soon as this meeting ends, you'll get the pick of the men you want. Harass them, make your numbers seem much larger than they but more importantly make certain that Tywin keeps on falling back to the ford. I want him in those magnificent defenses he's made and nowhere else, but not quickly." Ranma said, nodding. "Who would you like as your second?"

Brynden looked over at the other lords for a moment then said "Lord Shawney, would you lend your aide to this endeavor?"

Silas Shawney grinned. "Delighted to, my Lord Tully." he replied, bowing his head.

"What are the rest of us going to be doing then lad?" said Greatjon.

"We'll leave our injured here, along with a small force to aid House Wayn in guarding them just in case the prisoners become unruly. I'll take the rest of the army down the Kingsroad to Harroway and beyond with my queen and her dragons aiding us in a campaign that will be based just as much on terror as reality." Everyone save Daenerys looked shocked at that and Ranma smiled grimly. "The time for guile is past, now a show of force will serve us better, even if we don't intend to use them against the town in question."

"We should also think of sending a messenger into the Vale," Daenerys said. Everyone in the tent turned to her including Ranma, one of his eyebrows rising in surprise. Daenerys shrugged her shoulders. "You said it yourself Ranma, we don't want to be attacked from behind. While the Vale might not be able to field a large army, they can field a decently sized and trained one, which could have an effect much larger than their size."

"If I may my Lords." said Lord Ryger, speaking up once more. "Willow Wood is the closest keep to where the Vale Road intersects the Kingsroad, and I heard rumors long before the Lannisters came east about the mountain clans in the mountains of the Vale acting out now that the nation doesn't have any real leadership. It's quite possible that whatever our messenger does he could be intercepted by them before he reaches the Bloody Gate. However, if we take the Trident and Harroway, we can send a messenger by boat down to Gulltown."

"That's an excellent idea." said Jason, nodding his head. "Gulltown is held by House Grafton, which is one of the more powerful Vale houses, and House Royce is nearby, which is the house I'd send my message too. Not Lysa."

Ranma frowned. "I'd like to trust that my aunt would receive any message we send well enough, but..." he turned to Brynden again. "Great uncle, what do you think?"

"Unless she's recovered from her paranoia Lysa won't even see your messenger." Brynden replied after a moments contemplation, looking saddened at the thought of his niece's descent into paranoid madness. "I agree with Greatjon, House Royce is our best bet. Yohn is the most battle-hardened of the Vale lords, and among the most honorable. Moreover he was friendly with Eddard when they were younger."

"And a few of the others like House Elesham and Pryor my Lord," Daenerys said smiling thinly. "If the men of the Three Sisters were willing to try and raid commerce coming out of White Harbor, I have no doubt that those Houses also felt the depredations."

Ranma nodded thoughtfully. "We should lay out what we wish to say to them, lay out the reasoning behind this war from our perspective as well as the fact that Joffrey is illegitimate and the proof of that, emphasizing the reason we annexed the Three Sisters. We can't command them to join us, or even entreat them to do so. The first would seem to be high-handed especially after we've already assaulted the Vale's general dignity and the second would seem too needy. Besides, it would take weeks to work their troops into the army's organization, and I'd have to teach them all discipline as well as my rules about camp management and camp followers. So long as they stay neutral toward as I don't care what they do. After the war the Vale will need to be brought to order, anarchy like that in a neighbor is not good for anyone, but for now we can ignore it."

"What we cannot ignore is the coming of winter." Ranma went on, looking at Vincent. Save the Mallisters the other Riverlands lords all rolled their eyes, but Ranma simply smiled grimly. "Autumn has been declared my lords, if the weather was not enough to tell you. I am not simply paraphrasing my family's lines my lords, we need to prepare our lands for winter. To that end we've already begun projects to aid in transport, and we will continue to do so using the prisoners to do it. To that end Vincent, I'd like to employ that mind of yours elsewhere. My wife, Lord Mallister and Smalljon have all said how impressed they were with your work on the fortification at the Ruby Ford, I'd like to see if you are just as good at more peaceful projects. Specifically, I'd like you to look into the idea of creating the equivalent of the glass garden of Winterfell somewhere here in the Riverlands."

Ranma explained what those were, emphasizing the importance of having the equivalent of a farm that you could rely on even in the dead of winter. Vincent looked skeptical, but Ranma could tell his mind was already working on the issue, shown when Vincent murmured "Water would of course not be an issue here in the Riverlands, heating it would be, unless we put it somewhere like the Hag's Mire, which would have other issues. Someplace with a nearby source of coal or wood will be necessary..."

"Like Riverrun?" Brynden asked.

"Possibly," Vincent answered almost absentmindedly, reaching into one of his jerkin's many pockets and pulling out a piece of parchment and a small stick of charcoal. "Or possibly one of the towns along the Red Fork. It would be the easiest river to divert some of the water into a small pool, which could then be warmed. Or, no, perhaps a better idea would be to..." He was silent for a moment but then looked up at Ranma. "You realize this is going to take time and money?"

"Time is an issue, money is not." Ranma replied, smiling thinly. "By the end of this war the reparations from the Westerlands alone will pay for most of the royal projects I'm seeing in the future."

Vincent nodded, going back to his plans.

The rest of that evening was taken up with organizing the different forces preparing them to march and bringing up more supplies from beyond the Ruby Ford for the army. These supplies were mostly in the form of weapons and emergency repair items for kit, and some more food of course. This was hampered by the ongoing storm, which showed no sign of stopping anytime soon.

While the others went about their own duties Myrcella continued her work in the hospital and Smalljon organized the guard detail. It turned out that more prisoners had been rounded up directly after the battle by the light cavalry who had been harrying Lord Tywin's army than the wounded that could be saved. Pikes and greatswords really did cause horrific wounds. All told there were only about 1,200 prisoners, only a fifth of whom were injured in some manner, many seriously. How many men had to be given mercy by Lord Wayn's troops was an unknown.

The preparation for the army's march caused some grumbling since many of the men had been looking forward to looting the bodies of the dead. However Ranma had known that was a possibility, and had ordered the House Wayn men on burning detail to go through the bodies and collect everything putting it all in a single pile, which would be distributed evenly among the men. And with the returned Wendel and his knights all watching them, they actually obeyed that command.

"Not," he confided to Daenerys, "That there's anything really the men can spend it on just yet. But eventually we may be in Riverrun or another city, then they'll like to have that cash to spend as distasteful as the exercises may."

That plus the rain kept most of the men from grumbling and those that did grumble too loudly were ordered to join the burning detail, a thankless task given the weather. That work would continue even after the main army left. Daenerys might not have been able to talk Lord Wayn into allowing his men to be used in actual battles, but she and Ranma had shamed them into aiding in the aftermath.

The next day it continued to rain but that did not dissuade Ranma, and he and his army marched up back over the Ruby Ford and towards the Kingsroad within an hour of sunup. Above them Sunfyre and Rhaegon, once again let out to fly whenever they wished gleefully flew through the rain, enjoying the feel of it on their scales.

OOOOOO

That night Daenerys was woken up in the tent she shared with Merry and Alayaya by quiet sobbing. She blinked, raising her head to stare at Myrcella's cot, the two dragons sleeping soundly at their feet. Alayaya would normally have been on a third cot, but she and Domic were supposedly taking the tenor of the army after Ranma's plans going forward were announced. Daenerys had her doubts about that, she was honestly wondering if Alayaya had moved on from Smalljon to Domic, but wasn't going to inquire. At the moment she had something else to question. "Merry? Why are you crying, dear?"

"O-oh, I'm sorry I woke you up, Daenerys. It's, it's silly I know, after all the battles and the many times I've dealt with injured before, but after today...I, had a nightmare." Merry said, wiping her tears away from the back of her hand.

"Nightmares?"

"A-about not being able to help treat them. Sometimes in my dreams the men I've helped treat come back, their wounds reopened, and they, they accuse me of not being able to help."

Daenerys sighed faintly. Given her abilities with organizing and leading the army's healers it was often hard to remember that Myrcella Baratheon was barely thirteen. Moments like this brought that strongly to mind. Only a child would castigate herself for not being perfect, she thought, not realizing how hypocritical that was given certain thoughts she had about both the campaign thus far and especially the fact she'd been forced to leave the third dragon egg behind.

"I have nightmares too you know." She blurted out then wondered why she had admitted to that, something that only Ranma had known before.

"About your brother?" Merry asked shrewdly, sitting up in her cot to look over at Daenerys.

"How did I, yes. I fear what would happen to the realm and to me if he defeats us." Daenerys replied, shaking her head at how well Merry knew her.

Merry laughed wanly. "It will never happen if he attacks Westeros, Ranma and you are going to beat him like a drum, and you know it. I bet it's only when you're asleep that such thoughts can enter your brain."

"I could say the same to you." The older girl replied tartly. "No one else in the army could do a better job than you at commanding the healers Merry. No maester of septon schooled in healing can save everyone."

"Knowing that doesn't help." Merry said quietly.

Daenerys sighed. "No, I don't suppose it would." She sighed again, then lifted up her blanket. "Come here girl." Merry gaped at her, and Daenerys chuckled. "I've found that being held keeps the nightmares at bay."

Hesitantly Merry pushed herself out of her cot, and moved to join Daenerys in hers. The two girls put their arms around one another as Merry snuggled into Daenerys shoulder, and the older girl smiled faintly, before the two of them fell asleep.

OOOOOO

The Westerlands army had been able to break off thanks to a forced march fueled by fear and desperation. Portions of the northern army were still pursuing them closely however, and Tywin knew that he could not afford another open field battle. Those pikes were deadly, though Tywin knew it wasn't the weapons used that made such an impact. No, it was the organization, the training of the pikes that made them so deadly. That, and their armor, which was a better quality than most lords could afford for their cavalry, let alone infantry.

The shock of the pikes and their effect on his men's morale had been grim beyond anything he could have imagined. His army had gone into that battle fully expecting to win if not easily then at least decisively, and now they were on the retreat, smashed not by an army of superior numbers but by the tactics and training of their enemies which was somehow worse to the common armsmen.

A day after the battle Tywin had finally been able to ascertain the depth of their losses, which had been appalling. Up until this point in the campaign Lord Tywin had lost possibly two to three thousand men give or take, with the majority lost with Lord Plumm's night attack. In this single battle that loss had quadrupled, leaving him with a bare 10000 men. This gave the combined Northern and Riverlands forces numerical superiority for the first time.

Worse was the makeup of those losses. His supply of archers and heavy cavalry had been mauled even more than the numbers suggested, and the equivalent could not be said of the other side. And then there was the sauce on the steak, the spoiling attack on his army's camp that had occurred during the battle, and the losses among the Westerlands lords and heirs with the army.

The first shouldn't have been a surprise, Tywin had left behind two hundred good men to guard the camp, but they had not been up to stopping a force of heavy cavalry intent on burning every tent, cart and supply cache they could. In this, his losses actually aided him, because the food left would be able to feed his army for a time, before they were forced to slow down and forage, which would be disastrous if the northern army was still pursuing them. Luckily the spoiling raid hadn't cost his army any of their spare horses, so for now at least they would be able to move relatively quickly.

Even so organizing the men was incredibly hard because of the second surprise the Young Wolf had sprung on them, in battle assassination of enemy lords, heirs, and knights. It was an unprecedented move, since normally in war those men would have been valuable prisoners for the ransom they could bring. But Ranma Stark apparently didn't care about that.

Too many lords and heirs, who made up his commanders, and staring at his ragged army as it moved around him Tywin once more cursed the need of lords to be part of the charge rather than lead from behind as was sensible. Because of that and the Stark's pup's tactics, dozens of Houses no longer had their lords or heirs, and the future of four was actually in doubt.

House Algood, Dogget, Myatt, Drox were those with their future in doubt. Lord Drox had no heir or even close family member before this, he had been a young man eager to prove himself, but who had died in this battle. Algood and Dogget were notorious for not having many branches from the main line, and they had paid for that now. House Myatt on the other hand had simply been slaughtered, their lord, heir, several cousins and all their men had been at the front of the battle, eager to win their somewhat weak House glory. Now they were dead, but at least the former lord Myatt had two daughters still alive back in their keep, as well as their mother.

The others, their lands would be taken over by one of their neighbors something Tywin would need to deal with after this war was over. A little voice in the back of his head murmured, If you survive it... but Tywin ignored it to concentrate on the list of the dead.

House Bettley lost his lord, as had Estren, a man who had impressed Tywin since this war began with his common sense, a thing, despite its name, which was as uncommon as gold in his opinion. Lord Andros Brax, one of Tywin's most important bannermen, was also dead, as well as his second son. Tytos Brax had been left back in their keep to rule in his father's stead, which would mean they would recover soon. House Broom had lost its heir and third son. Lord Broom himself had survived the battle despite taking a crossbow bolt to the shoulder, yet he had retreated to his tent inconsolable from his son's deaths. Still, the family would recover in time.

House Crakehall had lost two cousins and the Strongboar, Lyle, the secondson of Lord Crakehall. Their men too, had nearly been wiped out to a man. Luckily those armsmen, sixty strong, were a bare pittance of that powerful house's total. Since Crakehall was the lynchpin for the southern borders of the Westerlands they had been allowed to keep most of their men at home when Tywin had been mustering the Westerlands hosts.

House Foote had lost its lord, and two cousins of the family but Tywin knew they had retained some men at home and their heir, though a boy, was rumored to be bright enough. Antario Jast had died along with his squire and most of his men, but his heir was at home. Lord Sarwyck, another young man had also died trying to be a warrior, Westerling, Turnberry and Yarwyk had all lost their heirs who had been sent with the army instead of their lords, most of the Knightly Houses had been gutted save for those knights who had been placed in charge of the various holding forces Tywin had station in the various castles on the other side of the Red Fork.

Daven however had not been in the front line of the battle, which was a blessing, though his father had as well of course. The two of them and the few remaining lords and heirs had helped Tywin organize the army despite their own shock at their losses. But now they had to get back to the Kneeling Man's Ford with an enemy army nipping at their heels. That wasn't going to be easy now that the Young Wolf had the taste of blood in his mouth, as evidenced by a cavalry man riding his horse towards Tywin even now from the back of the column.

OOOOOO

Castle Oldflowers is a smallish Castle, yet seems well made for all that. Margaery mused as she and her escort rode through the outer gate. She could already see the servants of the keep lined up the small courtyard to receive her, and she smiled, pleased that they were prepared as they should be.

Beside her Ser Igon Vyrwel, the captain of Highgarden's guard rode on his horse his carriage that of a much younger man. His demand to go with her had been a surprise, but a good one. While initially Margaery had dismissed him somewhat since he had never served in a war, he was well versed with the rules of setting up a camp and leading a march. He also knew how to defend castles and he was a welcome companion in his own right. The two of them had shared tales of her brothers and her father throughout the trip, having a good deal of fun.

About an hour after their arrival Margaery was being shown around, and smiled at what she saw on this side of the walls as well. The outer wall of the keep was about four stories tall, and the keep itself was another two stories taller than that. The keep itself was situated with its back side facing the Mander and the top of it was more than wide enough for six scorpions on rotating plates set along that wall, with enough room for hundreds of archers scattered in between. One outer wall continued northward of the keep for about 100 yards, before turning inland at a small tower to intersect the wall that came out from the keep heading away from the river at the gatehouse.

All in all Margaery was happy about the defenses here, though they had been undermanned before her arrival. "You certainly kept up the castle well in your lord's absence Ser Shermer. I trust you are able to accommodate my men?"

"Of course milady." Eliphas Shermer, the majordomo of the castle said nodding his head. He was a youngish man, about her brother Garlan's age but much more weedy than any of her siblings. But Eliphas wasn't castellan of this castle for no reason, he was an excellent organizer, and had a gift for numbers that was incredible. He had even been sent to the Citadel at one point, before his older brother died in a riding accident, leaving only one more brother between him and the lordship. This made his father recall Eliphas then send him to House Oldflowers to learn how to manage a castle.

Still, Eliphas' basic courage did seem to leave much to be desired, shown in his stutter as he went along as well as the way his hands worked against one another. "I, I understand that you think we might, we might be attacked here milady, but how reasonable is that? I've heard the rumors of what happened to the Shield Islands and the Arbor, but, but surely actually pacifying them would take all the Ironborn's manpower?"

"If they were a conventional military force, that might be so." Margaery replied, making no comment on how his obvious fear. "As it is, I do not know how likely it is we'll be attacked. I think it depends on what they find further down river, and unfortunately most of the Reach's manpower is away at present."

She couldn't keep a little growl out of her voice at that, but she went on smoothly. "And if they use the Mander to raid further inland as they surely will, this castle represents the best forward defense of Highgarden and the villages and towns further up river. Of course that means we'll have to sacrifice everything further down river, which I'm not happy about." She sighed sadly at that, shaking her head. She well knew what the smallfolk and the other lord's houses further down the river would face with the Ironborn, but she didn't have the force to do anything about it.

"I I see." Eliphas responded then rallied slightly as he changed the subject, holding out a raven messenger tube. "On another note my lady we have received a raven from Highgarden addressed to you."

Margaery took the message from him, noting that the seal had not been opened almost absentmindedly then read the message inside. It was from her grandmother who had apparently recovered her faculties and was angry at her for endangering herself and ended with an order for her to return. Return at once you fool girl, all of your brothers have gone into harm's way, I'll not allow you to do the same!

Regardless of whether or not Olenna's concern was based on her family feelings for Margaery or the possible loss of Margaery as a tool for the furtherance of her family's power, she was prepared to ignore that. Margaery knew she was right, with her here the Ironborn wouldn't even think of bypassing Oldflowers, which they might well have been able to if they were careful about it. No, she had to remain here a visible prize that could not be ignored.

With a sigh she looked at Eliphas once more. "Please, show me to your lord's office, I require some writing tools to send back a reply. And if you could have my guard captain shown to your keep's roof? It's time we raise our banners high." Soon after that Margaery's personal banner, a side view of a rose on a green field, flew from the top of Oldflowers.

OOOOOOO

Victarion was not one for strategy or thinking ahead and despite his lack of imagination he was an Ironborn down to his toes, he lived for leading others in reaving. With the Shield Islands under Ironborn control the Mander and the riches along it what are yours for the taking. Leaving Harras Harlaw in command of the Shield Islands, he led the rest of his much reduced fleet into the Mander and against the town of Dunland, seat of House Dunn.

Here and there ships broke off to attack the villages and towns built along the river, but Victarion was in search for a bigger prize. House Dunn had put up a fight, but after that he hadn't yet found any battle worth his iron.

He found it in the keep of House Graves, a noble family which much like most of the others in the Reach had sent most of its men to war already. Nor did it have the defense of Oldflowers, only a single ballista on the keep's roof and a two-story outer wall.

Victarion led Iron Victory close in, having taken archers from five other longships onto his own. They raked the wall while the other Ironborn ships ran themselves aground all around the castle. The Ironborn swiftly threw up grapple and were over the outer wall, slaying several defenders though most had already retreated into the keep after Victarion and his men had raked the outer walls with their arrows. The ballista on top however was still firing, and one of the Ironborn ships was hit, the bolt slamming into its single mast, shattering it and sending splinters of wood into the crew, killing dozens.

Victarion grounded his own ship and he and his men raced forward pulling themselves up the ropes on the outer wall with the ease of lifelong sailors, even Victarion with his injured leg. When they got into the inner courtyard of the small keep, they found the door still barred against them, though a small tree set in the courtyard nearby was being hacked down to be used as a makeshift battering ram. Arrows were still falling from above, and here and there Ironborn lay dead.

The battering ram went to work, but it was obvious that the men inside had already piled up enough furniture and other things to keep that door standing for a while. Seeing this Victarion shook his head and motioned to a few of his men. "Follow me."

He led back up onto the outer wall, then along it to the nearest point with the keep. From there Victarion ordered a few of them to see if they could hit the nearest window with one of the grabbed mills. It was an actual window, not an arrow slit and there was enough room there for men to pull themselves through the window. The defenders of the keep however were concentrated on the first and second stories, and were still laying down a hail of deadly fire.

It took a few tries, but eventually a grapnel caught on the window ledge and one of the Ironborn volunteered to climb over first. Making his way hand over hand along the rope he came to the window sill, and pulled himself up and into a small room that looks like a child's quarters. Absentmindedly grabbing up a mirror with a gold handle he waved his hand out of the window, motioning the others to follow.

Victarion was the last across, since he was wearing full plate mail he was the heaviest. Even so he was able to pull himself along and through the window though he had to take a few moments to rest afterward. After a few moments he pulled his heavy axe off of his back and motioned toward the door. "Forward for the Drowned God!"

The seven men with him roared in reply and burst out of the room, startling to servants who'd been carrying a heavy dresser towards the stairway leading downward. Both of them screamed, but died quickly before the Ironborn raced on.

Later that day Victarion and his men feasted in the main Hall of the castle. As Victarion bit into a haunch of meat prepared by one of the servants who had been allowed to live his first mate leaned in. "Captain, you know that woman I took, she had a son and was desperate to save the boy." He sneered slightly. "I don't see why, the boy I'll get on her will be tougher and stronger by far than the little whelp, but I suppose women are soft like that. She had something to say that I thought you might find interesting."

Victarion grunted indicating the man should continue. "She was apparently one of the gossip queens here, and an interesting rumor reached her ears this morning. Apparently the maid of House Tyrell has moved to the keep of House Oldflowers. They apparently don't have enough men left to defend Highgarden, and she thinks Oldflowers might be of good enough position to keep her safe."

"My map." Victarion said holding out his hand to one side. One of his men belched, then quickly got up from the table and ran to fetch it. A moment later Victarion was looking down at it frowning. "That makes no sense, if she was afraid for her life, she would either stay in Highgarden, or move as far away from the Mander as she could get. Oldflowers is right on the river!"

"Then she's daring us come after her!" said another Ironborn, a captain from house Botley. The man slammed his tankard of ale down on the table, glaring around him, causing the few surviving servants how had been serving them all to flinch away. "I say we head out to show her the folly of trying to dare the Ironborn!"

Victarion didn't say anything for a moment, thinking about what the maiden's true reasons could've been. It was true that Highgarden was a large city as well as a castle, and with their men away at war they might really not have had enough men to man the defenses. But the same could be said about Oldflowers, couldn't it? Still Botley's right, she's not trying to run away, I don't know what she's trying to do, but the maiden of House Rose is a prize we cannot overlook.

"Very well!" He said aloud, to cheers among his men. "Let's see what that old fool Tyrell does when we take his precious daughter and give her a taste of true Iron!"

OOOOOO

Lord Serret walked along the wall of King's Landing, nodding his head to men here and there, while keeping his head below the parapets with difficulty. My back's going to kill me tomorrow, but better that than an arrow to the head! All around him archers were busy, firing as quickly as they could. Down below there were enemy archers using the hovels, which had been cleared of wildfire and other traps by this point, as cover to fire back.

They were not making much headway though. In terms of skill the archers on both sides were probably equal, but the wall and the parapets was a far better defensive position. Even as he watched an archer firing out of what might have been a doorway at some point took an arrow to the shoulder, falling back into the hovel's interior with a cry. He reached over, slapping the archer who had just taken that shot on the back. "Well done lad!"

The man grinned and Rupert moved on. Two sections of the wall later, Serret was still moving in a sort of half crouch but the battle had become much more serious. Taking a glance over the parapet Serret took it in at a glance and bellowed toward the nearest tower. "More archers over here, now!"

Below was a force of archers larger than most sniping at the wall, trying to get local superiority. The reason for this was hundreds of men trying to smash some of the houses down. They looked like levy forces, only a few had even leather armor, and even then barely a jerkin in most cases.

Rupert turned as another forty men came up from the nearest tower. "Sorry to interrupt your naps lads, but it looks as if the bastards are trying to be clever. Show those men down there they should head back home!"

The men all chuckled, unlimbering their bows. With the new bows they quickly almost silenced the archers down there then took the levy forces under fire. Looking over the parapet Rupert saw at least two dozen men dead down there before the rest broke away, running off. More died when they tried to break away, but the majority were able to get out of bow range.

There was a cheer all around the Hand, and he cheered and thumped backs for a time. All the while however his mind was working, coming up with a grim thought. They were creating lanes for siege towers. Stranger take them, I thought it would take them longer to build those.

"Well lads, it looks as if you all have things under control. Just keep an eye out for other groups like that trying to pull the hovels down." He was answered with a roar, and he smiled for real this time. At least morale is high among the troops at least.

He quickly entered the nearest tower, then made his way down to the road, pausing a moment to stare at the interior defense that had been thrown up here. Two story tall mounds of rubble had been thrown up around the towers, where people could access the towers leading up to the wall. Those mounds were protected by other small bands of archers and men with halberds, intent on keeping any mob that appeared from attacking the tower, where food for this section of the wall was stored.

Elsewhere there were similar defenses around the trebuchets. Most of those had been thrown up in time to save the massive siege weapons, but one of them had been smashed and burnt. Ironically, more than half the mob that was part of that hadn't lived to celebrate. The Trebuchets all had small stores of wildfire near them.

The alchemists themselves had been moved to the Red Keep the moment the riots began along with as much of their paraphernalia as could be moved. Wildfire was far too important to the defense of the city to let the alchemists out in their guild which wasn't in an area that could be defended very well.

Serret nodded to the men waiting for him. "Back to the Red Keep, what streets are clear for now?"

"River Row milord, for now. There was a riot there a few hours ago, but the gold cloaks cleared it out well enough if we move fast we might be able to get through all the way up to the Keep." Said the knight in charge of the Hand's guard.

The current Hand of the King swung himself up into his horse, growling irritably. They hadn't yet gotten to the point where they would be forced to butcher their horses, but Serret could see that time coming, three or four weeks down the line. Still, I'll only order that started when every other avenue has been exhausted, the horses, much as a loathe the beasts, are a resource we might need to use in the future. And at least grass isn't hard to come by yet up at the Red Keep.

Around him the group of men began to move, riding their horses carefully up and down the mounds of rubble all around the tower. Five hundred strong the group then set off at a canter through the empty seeming streets. But they were only seemingly empty, everywhere eyes watched them, most surly, some frightened and far too many becoming angry with each passing day of few rations and no end to such in sight.

As they went the group passed near the Great Sept of Baelor. It was still open and the High Septon remained in place because they were using the Great Sept as a distribution point for the food. This made it seem as if the food was coming from the High Septon, which helped his popularity slightly and kept some of the citizenry from violence. For now we're able to distribute enough food to offset the bowls of brown and the rats on sticks, but it won't last more than a week more. We'll have to start slaughtering the food animals we've got up at the Red Keep for the defenders soon, let alone the smallfolk...

The food on the small council's table was a sign of that issue. Where before there would have been fresh fruit, bread, sweetmeats and wine, there was no wine, no sweat meats only preserved fruits, and a small amount of that. There was bread true enough, but it certainly wasn't a fresh loaf, and if there was more than a tenth part of yeast in there rather than... other things, Serret would be surprised.

There was however meat available every other day, so the food available to the royals in the Red Keep was still better than what the troops got, let alone the smallfolk. Serret rotated the troops on the wall back into the keep every other day so they could partake. And there could have been wine, but Cersei had ordered the entirety of the Keep's wine cellar turned over to the men on the wall, one of the reasons morale among them was so high. The fact she had done so as to remove temptation for herself was not known.

The men and the queen all served themselves, another change. Most of the palace's servants had been let go, simply because it would allow the Red Keep to save more food. The court as a whole had also shrunk dramatically, though that had begun before the siege.

A small jug of wine was passed around, and each of them took a small jot of wine, with Varys and Joffrey both looking irritated at the fare in front of them. The eunuch was a fat man who was rapidly losing weight and not liking it at all. Joffrey was a little shit, Rupert had decided, but he was keeping a handle on it and keeping out of the way, which was all Rupert could ask at present. "The siege is going about as well as we can expect now that Renly understands he just can't assault the walls without paying too high a price. That leaves the smallfolk as our main problem. Varys, Baelish?"

Petyr was the first to speak up. "Riots are happening here and there every day now. We're cracking down on them hard, and any smallfolk who resist are killed. The enlarged gold cloak forces are keeping a lid on things but barely." The ranks of the gold cloaks had grown dramatically when the rationing began, since Rupert and the queen had let it be known that the gold cloaks also counted as working in defense of the city and thus were due higher rations.

"But we're coming to the point where we'll have to cut back food to the troops even further or simply stop rations to the smallfolk entirely." Serret muttered. "Damn it, if there was just some way of breaking the blockade that would solve our problems..." I don't want to have to start butchering more of the hoarded food animals or the horses, not yet. We're not going to win this siege, Randyll Tully's in charge over there now and he's not going to make that kind of mistake. But we might be able to break out and away at some point, and those horses could be the difference between life and death.

"I think we need to sortie out!" Joffrey said, glaring over at the Hand. He was angry all the time these days. The food issue was angering him, the lack of wine thanks to his stupid mother's decision was angering him, but worst of all he hadn't been able to partake of his little diversions for five days now! His mother was keeping him even closer at night. Though she allowed him to go out with a suitably sized guard to the wall during the day, that wasn't enough, he wasn't a good enough shot to join in the defense of the city personally and he was getting more irritable every day that passed.

"They'll never expect it, and you said it yourself the other day, they haven't thrown up any defenses of their own. Sneak out into the hovels during the night then assault the center of their army. With my Stranger-damned uncle dead the army out there would capitulate."

"That is one of the most idiotic ideas I have ever heard." Serret said, his voice calm but his face thunderous. "We don't have the numbers to attempt anything like that, their army's camps are too far from the city's walls for surprise to be a factor. We'd be caught out in the open and wiped out. If you don't have anything intelligent to add to the discussion your Grace, please be silent. The rest of us need to deal with reality."

"That is the king you are talking to Lord Serret." Cersei said sternly, rising to her son's defense, though her own voice was showing the strain of the change in diet and everything else. Though actually, physically the lack of fatty foods seemed to have only enhanced Cersei's beauty, removing the fat that had begun to build up here and there save around her hips and chest. "We are all being sorely tested by the current circumstances, but we all need to keep cool heads. We cannot afford to turn on one another now."

Everyone nodded at that, even Varys. He knew that his own life was very much on the line now, the mob would not differentiate, and that was only if the lack of food didn't kill him first.

"I still think that my plan would have a chance of success, because it is so obvious it would fail they wouldn't expect it!" Joffrey stated sullenly.

Serret growled, but at Cersei's warning glare he subsided. He wasn't Tywin, he couldn't simply tell the queen to shut up and smack the little shit upside the head until he learned. He had to be more 'diplomatic' than that. "If we had enough troops who could move silently through the night and a place along the wall that wasn't observed, I might be willing to try something like that, but we don't. It's a skill most armsmen don't have, and I wouldn't trust any of the gold cloaks to try it either. Petyr, anything to report?"

Petyr shrugged, and reported the many business concerns that had shut down for fear of the mob, lack of material or dead owners. "Frankly, the entire city is slowing to a halt. A lot of the smallfolk and even the merchants used what monies they had to get food from the pirates, and even that is drying up now. I've closed down all of my brothels, but I can't even bring most of the girls up here. Ser Jaime has refused my suggestion that they would be good for morale."

Cersei glared at the man angrily. She hated whores, far too often Robert had broken their wedding vows with such, and you never knew where they had been. Moreover she didn't want her son to be around such, he was so desperate to be like his 'father' he might follow down that same road.

"If the whores want somewhat better food they can move to join the men in the garrisons along the outer wall." Rupert said shaking his head. "Not in the Red Keep."

"I agree." Cersei replied firmly. "On another topic, what do you know about my father and his army Varys? He's the best chance we have to see the end of this siege."

Varys sighed sadly, though the sadness was mostly feigned about his first bit of news. The second bit however that was serious enough to keep a smile off even the most madcap jester's face. "I have several reports about Lord Tywin your highness, none of them very good I'm afraid. Lord Tywin has recently suffered a loss, a monumental one."

Everyone there, even Pycelle who had not been sleeping well and had in fact been nodding in and out a moment ago, jolted at that. Varys carefully did not let a small smile of amusement show on his face. "He was apparently chasing after the Young Wolf for several weeks, and ran into a trap of some sort. His army is retreating in good order, but it is evident that Ranma has his number and the numbers now." Varys's lips twitched at his little bit of word play, though he was the only one who was of any mind to notice the humor. "It will be down to luck if he reaches the field defenses he threw up on the Kneeling Man's ford. I don't think there will be any aid from him any time soon."

There was a moment of silence then as the queen raised a weary hand to her eyes while Lord Serret grimaced. Joffrey however was practically vibrating in rage. Jaime simply sighed sadly. Before anyone could speak however Varys went on quickly. "There is something else my birds have reported, something much closer to home and much more important to us here and now. Three of my little birds inside the city live along the edge of Fleabottom. They report seeing several bodies with no visible sign of death save signs of blood around the mouth and eyes. Most of them were found lying in a puddle of their own sick, which also was colored red from their own blood."

That brought another moment of silence around the table, as everyone but Joffrey paled in fear. "Plague..." Pycelle murmured. The Grandmaster could all too easily recall his early years at the Citadel when a plague struck Oldtown. The measures taken had been utterly brutal, but they had worked. "We must contain it! Offer rewards for every hundred dead rats, they are carriers, double the number of cats in the Red Keep and make certain that they are not killed for the meat on them. Most importantly close off Fleabottom if we can, keep it from spreading!"

"How?" Jaime replied harshly, his hands on his sword blade trembling slightly. He was terrified of plague, of the idea of an enemy against which his skill would be useless. "Fleabottom isn't separated by the rest of the city by a wall or a gate, there are dozens, hundreds of different sized roads leading into and out of the slums."

"Then we need to create dead zones between different districts, not just Fleabottom and its neighbors but all of them." Pycelle stated firmly, his exhaustion in abeyance as one of his childhood nightmares came to life in front of him. "We need to keep people from moving from one area to another, that way we might be able to stop it from spreading."

"We don't have the manpower." Jaime protested a second before Serret could.

"We do if we use wildfire." Pycelle replied bluntly. "Get the Grand Master Pycromancer and his minions to create as much of it as we can, then burn out the dead zones, set up wildfire traps if we can and make certain the smallfolk know they are there. We'll have a panic on our hands, but we'll have one of those the moment people realize any kind of sickness is going around, let alone a full blown plague."

"Use of Wildfire in the city? Are you mad?" Petyr asked, aghast. Not at the idea itself or even the horrendous loss of life that would come from such, but the amount of businesses, some of which were his that would be destroyed.

"No, I am the only one here who has lived through a plague before! My lords, I beg you to listen to me! A plague will kill us just as quickly as that army out there would if it breached the wall, faster even, and with much less mercy." Pycelle pleaded. "Plague knows no class and bows to no king."

Everyone around the table seemed to understand then how serious this was, all save Joffrey, who was still vibrating with rage, having not even heard Varys' announcement, nor would he care if he had. Joffrey had something else on his mind.

Besides Joffrey everyone at the table turned to Lord Serret, who held his head in his hands for a moment, seeming to age slightly before their eyes. "Do it. Pycelle, you know how this works, take a map of the city and outline what needs to be done, then think up the minimum number of men you'll need to do it. Get with the Pyromancer if you think that best. Jaime and I will go over the defenses of the walls, to make certain the internal defenses are as strong as we can make it."

Jaime nodded firmly, and Serret turned to the others. "Your grace, I suggest you start to lock the Red Keep down even further, no one goes in or out save myself and my guards. Baelish, you help Pycelle, he's in charge, you just help him however he wishes, and no back talk!" Serret glared at Littlefinger, who simply nodded. Serret turned away, looking at the eunuch. "Varys, I have a special task for you..."

OOOOOO

That evening Petyr sent his bought swords the Kettleblacks brothers out into the city to find and bring back a hidden cache of gold. Of course he didn't tell them about the possible plague that might have begun. All they needed to know was that he was beginning to look for a means to escape the city quickly regardless of his position on the small council even with the enemy army out there and the blockade not allowing any ships out.

He wasn't the only one busy that night. Joffrey however was on a much more sinister mission. His mother had worked herself into a frenzy organizing the Red Keep to be even more cut off from the city around it than it had been before, cutting down on the number of servants even further. She and Lord Serret had even expelled most of the remaining court, ordering them to join the defenders of the wall. This had not been easy, but with Jaime and several of the Kingsguard enforcing her edict none had been able to argue. That evening Cersei was so exhausted she didn't even have the strength to check up on her son as she always did these days. This had allowed Joffrey to sneak off to the dungeons.

Edmure Tully had not been living an easy life even before being thrown into the deepest pits of the Red Keep's dungeon. Thankfully for him Varys had found out he had been tossed down there, though he hadn't known that Edmure had been tortured until his agents surreptitiously shifted him back to one of the upper level cells. This was information Varys had decided to sit on for a time, since he had not been able to discover who did it.

That was the only reason Edmure was still alive. But his once strong and supple frame had shrunk dramatically in the intervening weeks, with no real exercise and little food even before the rations to the prisoners had been cut dramatically. Indeed, Edmure was the only prisoner still in the prison. All the others had either been executed or forced into work gangs and worked till they died, not out of cruelty, but simply to save food. Even most of the guards had been removed, added to the gold cloaks trying to keep order in the city.

Edmure had been sleeping fitfully ever since that night he had been tortured, and he woke up quickly when he heard the clang of the dungeons doors in the distance. Even in his weakened, near delirious, state Edmure knew there was only one reason why anyone would be coming to the dungeons in the middle of the night. With a grimace he raised himself off of the cot he'd been sleeping on and moved towards the door, pressing himself to one side of it, just out of the way if someone slammed it open.

He waited there, breathing in and out as his hands clenched and unclenched. They were very careful about not letting Edmure have anything that could be used as a weapon, but Edmure was past caring. All Edmure wanted to do was go down swinging. Outside he saw a small glimmer of light along the floor, and he tensed himself. A moment later with a creaking groan the door slammed open, making him smirk as it smacked into the wall right next to him.

Ser Blount was the first one to enter the cell, a wide vicious smirk on his florid face. He stopped for a moment perplexed at not seeing anyone in the cell's bed or anywhere else, then turned at a small noise behind him before he was born to the floor by a raging half-starved madman screaming in rage and fury. "GRAHH!" Boros found himself on his back, and someone's hands clawing at his face. Those hands grabbed him by his hair and lifting his head up to slam his head back onto the ground with vicious force.

If he had been in peak condition it was possible that Edmure could have slammed the other man's head hard enough to knock him unconscious, or even crack his skull against the stone floor. As it was it simply hurt like hell and the man below Edmure roared, trying to scuffle at him punching at his chest with gauntleted fists. "Seven curse you, get off me!"

Behind Edmure could try again another man raced into the cell, and Edmure whirled, leaping for him as well. This move caught the other man by surprise, and he fell back into the doorway. He took three blows to the face and another to his chain mail armored chest before one of his gauntleted hands caught Edmure on the chin throwing him backwards. Then Edmure felt his legs grabbed. On the ground Blount had reached out, wrapping his arms around the prisoner's legs.

With a snarl Edmure went over backwards while a third knight quickly entered and aided his fellows in subduing the prisoner, which was much more difficult than it should have been, desperation lending Edmure strength. "GAH, the Father will judge you all for this!"

Behind them Joffrey had watched this all wide-eyed, astonished at the prisoner's berserk assault. However now that the world had righted himself he smirked, motioning behind him to another one of his guards, who was carrying various paraphernalia.

Despite his fury giving him strength Edmure eventually succumbed to his three attackers. Despite his best efforts he soon found himself chained to the wall with his arms stretched above him and his legs stretched out to either side. Even so Edmure still glared around at them, trying vainly to reach them with a headbutt or possibly his teeth it was impossible to tell. "Damn you all, give me a weapon, we'd see how smug you'd be then!"

His eyes hardened as Joffrey finally entered then his heart nearly froze at the sight of the various devices that the guard following Joffrey was carrying. The two men entered the cell and Joffrey personally closed the door locking it. He nodded down at the crack at the bottom of the door, and one of the men quickly grabbed the ragged blanket from the bed and stuffed it down into the crack.

"We wouldn't want anyone to hear your screams." Joffrey said almost conversationally. Two of the knights began to lay out the devices Joffrey had brought along on the bed, while Joffrey turned back to the prisoner. "You see, the point of having a hostage is that the hostage is supposed to be valuable enough to force his House or country to bend to your demands. In your case this hasn't happened, but even so many people think that you're still valuable. I don't any longer, I don't think you're being here serves any purpose, but it can serve as a warning."

At that point Joffrey at last lost control of his anger leaning forward and shrieking into Edmure's face. "Your Riverlanders have risen against me! Against me, the true king! They've helped that bastard Stark's army attack my grandfather when he was doing his duty in defending me from the traitorous Northerners! I am going to do to you what I am going to do to every one of your lords and their families for breaking their oath to me!"

After spitting that last line into Edmure's face Joffrey seemed to calm down. He stepped away from Edmure then his eyes lit up with eagerness and his lips turned up into the most evil smile that Edmure had ever seen, sending a shiver of fear down Edmure's spine.

"We'll start slowly, it's amazing what you can do the simple knife..." The bastard King said reaching down to his pile of toys and picking out a small knife whose edge looked razor-sharp. Nearby a brazier began to burn and several of the other tools were placed upon it. "But don't worry, we'll get to the more esoteric tools eventually. We have all night..."

By the time Joffrey and his fellow sadists were finished, Edmure's body could barely be called that of a human being any longer. His mind had broken only a bare turn of the glass into the torture, thankfully. That might have happened when his eyes had been burned out with the poker, or possibly before that when Joffrey had cut off bits of his skin before using a hot brand on the exposed same area. Whatever the case, it had happened long before Joffrey had begun work on his lower regions, the pain of which finally caused Edmure's heart to stop.

Joffrey didn't notice his prisoner had died for a time, and when he did he had worked off enough of his urges to not really care. Exhaling a long breath he set aside the last of the tool he had been using. He sighed happily then intoned "Thus will all traitors to the crown be dealt with."

Around Joffrey his men all nodded. All of the Kingsguard members Joffrey had personally appointed were chosen because Joffrey could sense in them the same interests he held. It had not been easy even with Blount to call upon, but it was worth it. They took almost as much sick pleasure in the torture as their King.

"I suppose with the Red Keep shut down as it is we can't dispose of the body as we normally would, but we can leave it here as it is. Send one of the others to order the servants to stop feeding the prisoner. The ones that usually have to bring him his food can take his ration instead. That should keep them from talking." Joffrey went on. His men all nodded then began to clean up.

This ploy didn't work. For one thing, while the servants were eager to take the prisoner's rations, though it amounted to little more than a 'bowl o' brown' it added to the meager amount they were allowed, they became suspicious about why. One of them actually worked up the courage to go and see Edmure and the sight of his corpse was so horrifying to the man that he lost his stomach, and tried to get out from the Red Keep entirely.

The servants however were being watched closely by the master of whispers, and Varys intercepted the man before he could get out of the Red Keep. Hurrying the man into his own personal chambers he said simply "you seem as if you have had a fright. Brandy is good for that, sit and have a drink."

It took only a half glass of brandy to get the man talking. Varys kept plying the man with drink however saying that he needed the alcohol to get the shock of what he had seen out of the system. After his fifth glass the man never noticed how Varys opened one of the rings on his finger and poured in a small drop of a black liquid into the cup before filling it up once more.

Watching dispassionately as the servant convulsed in his chair Varys frowned thoughtfully. So the Vile One is proven to be Joffrey Waters after all. I had wondered, but he was so clever about sneaking out of the Red Keep that I hadn't been able to find any proof before this.

The question for Varys wasn't 'should I hide this information?' He had no loyalty to the Lannister cause. No, the question was how to use this information to the best advantage, who to get the information to and how. He decided after a moment to get the news out to Hoster Tully that his son had been tortured personally by the King via a spy that's he knew Hoster knew about in Riverrun. That way it would seem as if he had personally decided to pass on that information, which could be useful in the future. After all, with Daenerys Targaryen married to Rann Stark, this might allow me to have a foot in every camp.

Closer to home, Varys decided to keep the news from becoming common knowledge in the city. That kind of thing could only turn the smallfolk further upon the royal house and everyone nearby. Varys reminded himself once again that the mob tended not to be very discerning in their targets.

Opening a secret passage in his rooms wall and lifting the body of the servant up with surprising strength Varys thought, I think I won't allow it out to Renly just yet. No, I'll wait for that until either the plague is dealt with, or I have been forced to make a run for it myself. That time is coming quickly, and I will need all the bargaining chips I can get to use with the invading army. On the other hand... I think, yes I think it is time for a Vile One at least to be found, and for Petyr Baelish to be removed...

OOOOOO

Lord Serret had ordered Varys to somehow get the word of the plague out to the besieging army hoping that would make Renly stop attacking allowing him to concentrate on trying to control the smallfolk and stop the plague from spreading. It worked, within four hours the knowledge that a plague had begun in the city had reached Renly's ears. In the dead of night Renly and his lords met in his tent, many of them still halfway drunk from that night's revelry.

The would-be king however was not drunk, not yet. He had been drinking of course, but one thing he shared with Robert was a large capacity for drink, which served him well now. "We can't do anything about a plague can we?" He asked, looking around at the few lords who were still capable of thought. He deliberately avoided looking at Loras, who had joined them for this meeting with his father for the first time since his injury. The sight of his former lover's face pained him, as did the accusing glare in those so-familiar eyes. "We don't have nearly enough healers, and when the news of the plague breaks there goes any chance of controlling the populace of the city."

"Indeed your Majesty." Randyll said, thankful the naïve young man wasn't that naïve. Plague was the bane of any city, any army, any nation. Plague could kill more men in a year than any war, ravage a country more thoroughly than the most ruthless army. "In fact we should change our army's layout to account for this. We need to stop people getting out of the city now, not just getting in."

"True..." Renly mused. "Tell me, how many men would you need to stay here and cordon off the city?"

"For preference all of them." Randyll replied bluntly. "Even when the second echelon arrives we will barely have enough men to invest the entire city. I'm sorry my lord, but we can't afford to be adventurous when doing so might allow the plague out of the city to infect the rest of the Crownlands and beyond. We'll need to build up our own defensive lines and prepare to turn back or kill anyone attempting to get out. The Lannisters might attempt a breakout as well, and we can't allow that to happen."

Renly nodded sadly. "True enough, but it sits ill with me to simply sit here and wait for the plague to do its work. Still, needs must. We can shift the catapults down over the Blackwater, then down to the other side of the Harbor to stop any ships from leaving. Forts or defensive ditches?"

"Forts my lord, nodal points to block every road out of the city, then lines interspersed between." Randyll replied crisply, and he and the other sober lords bent to the task of mapping out the new defensive points the army would have to throw up starting tomorrow. They would need to retreat somewhat from the city, but close enough to make certain no one was able to leave.

The forts, though small, would sit along each of the six roads leading into the city. With the bridge over the Kingsroad demolished they didn't have to worry about that, a few lines of archers and infantry plus the catapults would do there. Each fort would be led by a Lord of a Major house. Mace Tyrell took both the fort facing the King's Gate and the catapults and their defenses on the other side of the river. The other major Houses were each assigned an area throughout that night and work would begin on their construction the next day.

Eventually Randyll was satisfied and left off, allowing the other lords to retire, including Renly. Renly however was stopped by doing this by Loras. "We need to talk."

Renly frowned at his lovers, or should that be former lovers, attitude, but seeing the man wasn't about to give up, simply nodded. "Very well." Renly moved back from the flap of his tent to sit on his camp bed, a rather elaborate affair in comparison to most, but still, albeit technically, a camp bed.

As soon as Renly sat down Loras let him have it. "Why in the Seven's name haven't you come to see me? I've seen all of my friends, my father dozens of times, but not my lover?"

"I do have an army to lead you know." Renly replied, trying to calm Loras down.

"Most of which you leave to Lord Tarly while you and the other lords sit around and drink wine or practice jousting!" Loras replied tartly then went on, each word coming out louder. "The truth Renly! Am I so disgusting to you now that you can't even look at me? Was our relationship based purely on the physical?"

Keep your voice down Stranger curse it!" Renly hissed. "You know what your father will think if he hears about our love when I am due to marry your sister when I gain the throne." For just a moment Renly wondered about that, why had he made that vow anyway? He shook that off quickly however to deal with the here and now. "I was ashamed all right!?"

"What?" Loras asked, much calmer now that he was finally getting some answers.

"I was ashamed." Renly stated again, looking away for a moment. "I, even when I was in Storm's End during the siege with Stannis, I never saw battle or combat. I've never seen the, the real thing. I never realized before that, that people important to me could be injured or die in battle. Especially in a battle that I ordered, and especially you. And every time I look at you now, that guilt hits me like my brother's warhammer and I can't take it."

That sounded far more egotistical and naïve when Renly said it aloud, but it was true in a way. It wasn't the whole truth, but Renly hoped it would suffice. The rest of it was that Renly truly had thought at one point he was in love with Loras, he was so handsome and chivalrous even when he was younger. They had many happy times together over the years, yet the moment he saw Loras' disfigured face all he felt was revulsion. Renly was left wondering if he had ever been in love with Loras at all, or if it was merely lust. Yet he couldn't afford to break utterly with Loras, not when their 'friendship' was part of the ties he had to House Tyrell. After he married Margaery however, that would change.

"Oh, you stupid man!" Loras replied shaking his head. "I'm a knight, whenever I go into battle I face the chance of death or crippling injury, no matter who gives the commands. Besides, I was the one who came up with the original plan, not you. My injuries are my own to deal with, no shame or onus fall on you, my love."

Renly smiled wanly. "That's nice to hear, but it doesn't make it any easier for me. I'm, I'm handling it Loras, just give me time alright?"

Loras nodded then leaned in, sharing a kiss with Renly for the first time since his injuries. He didn't notice his lover flinching slightly before contact, and when he pulled away Loras was smiling widely. "Take all the time you need, I'll still be here, waiting." He said, before turning and leaving the tent, never noticing Renly's shiver of revulsion.

OOOOOO

Two days after putting in at Harlaw, Asha and her now larger group of ships set to see once more. "Well, I suppose it's good we got this gaggle of sharks moving in the same direction again." Asha sighed, huffing lightly. Inwardly however she was glad to be away from the island of Harlaw. Ten Towers was still a welcoming place, and she'd knife anyone who said that Rodrick Harlaw was not the best of hosts. But the conversation she'd had with Lord Kenning had disturbed her, disturbed her a lot. Not just because it challenged her belief in the Old Way and the Drowned God, but because it was all so terrifyingly easy to see that it could be the truth.

"Gaggle of sharks, captain, shouldn't ya call us a fleet or something like that? I'd think that ya'd be 'appier 'bout leading such a flotilla." Qarl, her first mate and on-again off-again lover spoke up from next to her while Asha herself controlled the tiller. "Especially since the new ships come from House Harlaw and the houses beholden to them."

"Calling us a fleet is too generous, I'd only use that word if we were as disciplined as my uncle's Iron Fleet. And just because the newcomers come from House Harlaw doesn't tell me anything about them as individuals." Asha retorted, taking a hand off the tiller to punch the barefaced young man in the shoulder.

After a moment she went on more seriously. "I'll only truly trust any captain when he proves himself to be better than the normal jetsam. Remember those ships were the first to answer Lord Harlaw's call, and while they'll follow me at his orders, their captains are eager for plunder and booty, eager to pick at the leavings from Rise of the Kraken, and will move against me if I don't lead them right."

"We still don't know that da other tentacles of the kraken failed, cap'n." Qarl said. Like most Ironborn he believed they were invincible at sea, and he sometimes disliked the pessimism Asha viewed her father's plan with.

Looking at him Asha could only groan inside, wondering why her fellow Ironborn were so stupid! She changed the subject, knowing she wouldn't change the Maid's mind. "You're right though, with the majority of our ships now coming from Harlaw I was able to pitch a plan to the other captains. They'll all follow me, for now." Her standing with that family was well known so she had at least a little bit of leeway before she had to start watching her back for knives again.

Four days sailing took them down towards the straits between Westeros and the large island called Fair Isle. It had been here where the Iron Fleet had been demolished in the first uprising, and more than one captain in her fleet felt both anticipation and fear. Fear that history would repeat itself, and anticipation at avenging themselves.

Not a day after they entered the straits, the first group of ships came within sight of the watchtowers set at the entrance to the large port of Faircastle. Asha and Black Wind was one of those first ships, this part of the operation was the trickiest, and she wanted to make certain that it worked so had to be here personally.

The wind was with them as they moved forward, in a sort of semi-line for now, heading straight towards the port and the small town and castle of Faircastle. Five longships against the four war galleys that a little under an hour later suddenly started to make their way out of the port. Asha nodded to Qarl. "Single the split, let's show these Greenlanders what real seamanship is!"

Qarl grinned and nodded. A moment later he raced up the rigging, where he quickly began to signal the other ships. The longships after a moment began to break off, two of them turning their course slightly, heading towards the watchtower that had spotted the Ironborn. The other three turned slightly to starboard, heading towards the castle of Faircastle which was on the southern edge of the port itself.

It looked as if the longships were trying to get to shore and disgorge their crews before the war galleys could reach them, or as if they hadn't even seen the war galleys. Either assumption would fit the normal Ironborn thinking, which worked for Asha. Come on, react like we're just the normal dumb fucking islanders you think we are...

Ahead of them the war galleys came on, then Asha smirked evilly as she watched them split in turn. One went after the two longships that were making for the watchtower, and the other three going after the more dangerous threat of Asha and the two ships with her.

Asha allowed Qarl to take over the steering wheel. The ship kept racing on a trajectory for the castle for now while the war galleys continued to try and cut their course. Asha turned with a Myrish glass that she had taken in one of her first raids to keep an eye on the watchtower. She could tell when the watchers spotted the rest of her fleet incoming. She even watched as someone lit a watch-fire, trying desperately to signal the war galleys, but none of them were watching the tower.

By now the war galleys were almost upon them, and had begun to fire at them with their scorpions. Asha smiled grimly however as that fire faltered for a moment, the captains of the war galleys finally seeing the signal in the watchtower. "Sail haul, all hands to oars! Hard about to port!" Up above her Qarl signaled the other two ships currently moving with Black Wind, and they too began to turn quickly, their sails pulling up and all hands to oars.

The war galleys behind them showed their lack of experience now, hesitating to close with the enemy in front of them before turning to confront the next as they should've done. One captain in fact tried to turn his ship entirely around, while another one kept barreling forward intent on the Black Wind and her fellows, as the third actually floundered indecisively in place, uncertain which direction they should go.

Twenty minutes later however they had run out of time to do so. Asha's ships had turned almost entirely around and were now rowing hard back the way they came, moving with the speed and efficiency that only well-trained Ironborn crews were capable of getting out of their oars. They were now past the area covered by the war galley's scorpions, all of which were on their prows facing forward and to the sides of it.

Arrows began to fly both ways, but Asha added yet another aspect to the battle, because half of her arrows were fire arrows not aimed at the crews of the of the war galley's, but the rigging. War galleys could move under oars, but they were heavy and slow, losing much of their maneuverability especially in comparison to longships.

Asha's crew first riddled the war galley that had kept on course even as that captain tried desperately to turn his ship around to once more bring his scorpions to bear. Its sails soon caught fire as did several areas on its deck, even one of its scorpions was hit by a few fire arrows. Asha had no doubt that most of those fires would be put out quickly, but by then it would be too late.

Black Wind raced on, almost taking a scorpion bolt along its prow from the ship that had been floundering, and several of her men died from the arrows of that ship's crew, showing that whatever their faults as seamen they still retained enough skill at war craft to be dangerous. Asha herself nearly took an arrow in the cheek as she dived for the nearest bit of cover, the war galley's larger sides enabling the crew of that ship to fire down onto Black Wind's deck. But her crew fired back and soon enough the rigging and canvas on that ship was ablaze as well.

The other two longships had concentrated on catching up to the ship that had turned to engage the rest of the fleet, closing with it just as the war galley took the first longship of that portion of the fleet under fire. Suddenly the war galley found itself being attacked from all sides, and then two longships pulled alongside throwing their grapnels across.

Asha nodded in grim satisfaction and turned to her steersman. "Bring us back around, I want us first on the walls of that castle." Her crew gave a wild cheer at that, ignoring their dead fellows around them for now.

The rest of the fleet soon barreled into the port, more ships peeling off to attack the war galleys that she had crippled, while several others raced to aid their fellows near the lighthouse against the last sail-worthy war galley. Asha however had done enough for the overall battle, and now could get in a bit of looting for herself.

She pulled out her cutlass and her small hatchet, tossing it up and down in one hand as she grinned at her crew. "I want the lord and lady of the castle alive at least for now, and I'll be helping myself to some of her jewels, but other than that..." she shrugged eloquently then bellowed. "Who's ready to pay the iron price!?"

The Black Wind's crew answered it's captain with a roar, and the ship grounded directly underneath the castles walls, archers from above having already begun to fire at them ineffectually. Most of the armsmen of the castle might have been on the war galleys, or perhaps their sudden charge had taken them by surprise. Whichever the case, the defense wasn't nearly as strong as it could have been.

Grapnels were thrown up, and the men started to pull themselves up as archers on both sides began to fire much more accurately, at least going down. Asha lost over two dozen of her men in those few moments, but then the defenders had to split their fire when four more longships came into range grounding themselves on the shore all around the castle.

Someone on one of the other crews had been particularly forward thinking and had brought along a small battering ram, which they had quite a bit of difficulty getting over the side of the ship and onto the small strip of shore. However after that, they were able to race along the edge of the Castle towards the castle's entrance, which was a simple if heavy wooden door, not a portcullis or gate.

Suddenly Asha heard a hissing sound in the distance and then several screams abruptly cut off. Realizing what happened Asha wince even as she grabbed the grapnel rope in front of her. A second later she began to haul herself up the wall, her hatchet clenched between her teeth and her cutlass once more in its sheath. It would seem someone forgot to order their archers to take out anyone near the cauldrons with boiling pitch. I'm glad I remembered those Drowned God- damned things.

Two more Ironborn ships grounded themselves on the rocks around the castle, their crews concentrating on taking the defenders under fire for a moment. Then, just as Asha put her hands up on the wall to haul herself over Asha heard the sounds of the battering ram begin its work.

Ignoring that Asha hauled herself up. She was then forced almost immediately to roll forward, nearly throwing herself off the parapet in her haste to get away from a sword stroke.

Her hatchet was out and in her hand a second later, hacking towards the man's leg. He went down with a scream clutching at his ruined calf, and she brought her hatchet back up to meet his chin, slicing into his face right through the small opening of his bucket helmet. Asha was then forced to roll onto the dead man's body, to get away from another sword blow. Impacting against an archer who had turned to engage her with his long dagger she brought her hatchet up again this time between his legs and he screamed the blow landed "GAaaaaahhh....!"

Behind Asha more men had pulled themselves up and were engaging the other defenders, getting the swordsman's attention. This allowed Asha enough time to regain her feet while she used the maimed archer to defend herself from another archer behind him who had turned trying to fire at her. She pushed the new eunuch in front of her into that man. Pulling out her cutlass at last Asha cut the second archers throat before knocking him off the parapet to land in the courtyard below as she raced on.

By this point over a dozen Ironborn had made their way up onto the top of the wall. Asha was soon joined by Qarl and a few more of her men, and with them at her back she forged her way towards the tower that would take them down to the courtyard and the keep below.

OOOOOO

The battle of Faircastle lasted for most of that day and well into the night. There was a holdfast in the center of the port that held out well. Yet after the war galleys were taken out it was never really in doubt, the longships allowing the Ironborn to concentrate their men wherever they wished along the docks of the city. The Ironborn crews that had been involved in taking the castle and the small holdfast had taken losses, some of them severe but what did that matter to them in comparison to the loot and plunder and above all salt wives they had taken in the castle and in the town.

What mattered more was the loss of three the longships. They had been lost in the battle against the one war galley that had gone after the two longships making for the watchtower. That war galley captain had proved to be much more capable than his fellows, and he was able to stay out of boarding range long enough for his archers and scorpions to take a deadly toll on the Ironborn.

Still, the loss of those three longships simply allowed the survivors of their crews to be used to patch up the losses in the other crews. Asha had lost 27 men dead and another 30 injured, so would need to winnow through the men off those lost ships to find replacements. Qarl had found the maester of the castle, and was currently standing over the man forcing him to help her injured, so at least a few of them would survive.

While the battle for the port continued Asha was standing in what had been the bedroom of the lord and lady of the Castle. The Lord was dead, he had fought decently enough for his old age in the entrance to the keep below. The lady of the castle however was still alive, and untouched, for now. Since she had been personally taken by Asha as part of her plunder, she would remain that way. That had earned Asha several odd looks from her crew, but they knew not to question her.

"I'm a bargaining piece I presume?" said the woman in question. She was a short and extremely buxom brunette. Slim in the waist she had hips and breasts that nearly any normal woman would have envied. Her face was not gorgeous but pleasant enough, and her eyes which were brown and somewhat deep, seemed actually intelligent, odd for a Greenlander woman.

"That depends on what family you're originally from." Asha said, looking at some of the jewelry the lady had. There weren't that many pieces to her collection, but one or two of them were very fine. One of them in particular grabbed Asha's attention, a bracelet with a torque of worked gold set with what looks like a very good quality sapphire. She reached forward, trying it on her wrist and turned to look at the other woman.

The Greenlander showed no outward sign of annoyance that Asha had stolen that from her which was good. She seemed to understand the realities of her new situation well enough. "I am Lady Daphne Crakehall once again since you killed my husband and he had yet to father a child on me. I don't suppose you have any idea if any of the captains on the war galleys survived? He was the heir of the house and it's only son in point of fact."

"Almost certainly dead." Asha said without a hint of concern. "Crakehall? Of the Castle of the same name?" When she was young the Reader had made certain Asha knew the names of the more powerful Greenlander houses. She thought she remembered that one was important to the Westerlands.

This was true, since Crakehall stood on the Ocean Road and defending its southern border with the Reach. "Indeed. Nor I am I the daughter of a branch family, I am Lord Roland Crakehall's daughter, his fourth born child."

Asha look at the woman, trying to see if there was any deceit in her expression or body language, but she couldn't see anything there. After a moment Asha realized that keeping her up here separated from the rest would allow her to question the maester of the Castle and make certain of her back story. "Good, I might need you in the future. Which means you'll be safe from what my men have in-store for your maids and other female servants."

At the woman's look of incredulity Asha shrugged. "I might be an Ironborn, but I'm still woman, and that kind of crap bothers me. Can't stop it though."

Over the next few days it became clear that the victory and more importantly the amount of plunder and salt wives they had taken had given Asha enough clout with the other captains that she could begin to truly organize them, and begin to prepare to defend the Straits. She didn't think that word of this attack would get out quickly, they had taken every ship in the harbor and there weren't that many there to begin with. Unless the war galleys they sank were supposed to switch out with their fellows in Lannisport or something, Asha could keep word of this attack from getting out, and use it Faircastle as a forward base to attack any fleet moving to invade the iron Islands.

Two days after the initial battle the Ironborn were still winnowing through the small town for anything of value or any females pretty enough to take back to the Iron Islands as salt wives, or simply use as whores for the moment. However, Asha had once again taken to sea with Black Wind as well as several of the Harlaw ships including the one who's captain had been the one to bring along the battering ram. That showed a level of forward-thinking Asha wanted to encourage. They had put out to sea, moving further down the Straits cautiously.

So it was that they spotted the incoming small fleet of nine longships moving along almost fearfully down the Straits. Asha turned to her signalman. "Signal the other ships to start slowly turning around to Faircastle, we'll go forward and meet these fellows. It doesn't seem to me," she said in a loud voice that carried all along the deck just to make certain that this was passed along, "That these boys look like they won anything."

They weren't. As Black Wind got closer she saw that all of them were flying the flag of House Blacktyde. They kept moving, though they slowed when Black Wind came within shouting distance of the lead ship. "Who's your captain?"

Eventually Black Wind had come close enough to the Baelor Blacktyde's own to shout across at him. To say Baelor was surprised that Faircastle had fallen was an understatement, but he was happy of the news, and his ships followed him into the port quickly enough, quickly crowding it from one end to the other.

That was dangerous, and after ordering his captains to rotate half of their crews onto the shore he ordered their ships back out to sea to find other places to anchor for the day. "A single fire ship could destroy our entire fleet if it struck with us all here," he said to the few unhappy captains who questioned him.

Such questions had stopped almost entirely after they saw the Lannister fleet close the final jaws of the trap behind them. Before that, more than one captain among his house had been ready to challenge Baelor for his act of cowardice in turning away from the battle, but seeing those war galleys moving in and watching them deal almost contemptuously with the longships that had entered the port had changed their minds. The ambush he had done on the two war galleys that had tried to follow them had also helped his standing.

Baelor Blacktyde was a young man of Asha's age, though the two of them hadn't met before this. He had been sent as hostage to the Reach after Balon's first uprising, since the Reach forces had been the ones to take Blacktyde and Orkmont. He was tall, black haired and bearded, though rather than being the wild untamed thing most Ironborn seems to favor his beard was a neat affair somewhat longer than a normal goatee, but still extremely well cared for. His black eyes were sharp and intelligent, and his face lively. When Baelor spoke he could make the normally grating Ironborn tongue seem much more lively, much like Rodrik.

It was obvious watching her serve them that Daphne Crakehall was quite taken with his looks, and Asha rolled her eyes when she was certain neither of them were watching. For his part however Baelor seemed to ignore the woman for now, concentrating on relaying what he knew of the battle in Lannisport.

"So after making certain that none of the other war galleys were trailing us, we decided to cut hard for the land and head to the Straits. I felt that doing so might allow us to take a few merchant vessels between Lannisport and Faircastle. It had too, we took two of them before sighting you and my crews are well up for plunder at present, but neither ship actually fought back, simply taking to their rowboats and making for shore. "

In the Straits shore was a risky proposition for larger ships but small rowboats could make shore if they were lucky enough to figure out where the shore was rather than a small inlet that was cut off from the rest of the Westerlands by impassable columns of rock that stuck out of the coast. At times a small pirate operation popped up occasionally among the rocks, but frankly the trade that crossed the Straits just wasn't enough for them to make the most out of it.

Baelor stared across the dining table at Asha, who was lounging in one of the better plush seats in the castle, while he did the same on a sofa. The two of them alone at present save the lady of the castle who was serving them. His captains were no doubt present telling Asha's captains their tale of woe which would cause issues, but it was pretty obvious that Asha had just as much control about her fleet as he did his. For the moment at least. "So what are your plans?"

"The Lannisters aren't seamen, they don't like putting out to sea much further than they can see the land. I think they'll come straight down the Straits and make for Banefort, pick up what more men they can there and then invade the Islands. With the fleets elsewhere, the Islands are open for invasion. I aim to do what I can to stop that from happening."

Baelor nodded, still staring at her thoughtfully though his eyes flickered to the lady of the house once when she passed behind Asha. She was a pretty lass. Still his attention was firmly on more important matters. "I'll join you for that, if we can beat their fleet off we might be able to sue for peace with the Westerlanders, whatever hell else is happening down south."

Both of them became a little grim at that, but would not dare speak the words aloud, after all they were practically strangers. But the thought passed between them that the Rise of the Kraken might have been an unmitigated disaster. After all even if Balon and Victarion won their battles, what would that matter if the Iron Islands themselves were conquered behind them?

OOOOOO

Ranma and his men were making excellent time heading toward the Trident and beyond when the sky finally cleared. With the rain pounding down it had taken them four and a half days to get the pikes onto the road, which was amazingly fast for any other army, very slow for them. Still, their rate of advance sped up after they reached the road.

Their first destination would be the town of Harroway. That city was one of only three smaller supply points that could supply Tywin's army, mostly tools and weapons, as an area it was actually more important than Stone Hedge or Wayfarer's Rest. Much like the other Westerlands-allied areas around Darry and Harrenhal, Harroway also supplied the army camped outside Raventree Hall. This meant that in terms of food at least, they would not be able to help feed Tywin's army.

For now though, the sun was high in the sky the day was beautiful, and for Ranma and Fenris at least the pace of the Army wasn't difficult at all. Ranma let himself be lulled into a moment of downtime between battles, holding Daenerys in front of him. Possibly sensing this the rest of the lords had moved back to lead their own men in the column rather than stay at the front, leaving the two would-be royals with Smalljon and their other friends.

Fenris loped along at the head of the army, and though he was somewhat happy at the moment he was a little irritated. While normally he wouldn't care about carrying his bonded or his mate, the two of them had been parted for several weeks, and Fenris knew that such as that could make mates anxious for one another's affections. Fenris just hoped the two of them weren't going to, what was the human term for sniffing and rubbing against one another, flirting? He just hoped they didn't do anything like that while riding on his back.

Ranma took in the scenery, noting that there were some smallfolk in the fields nearby and wondering what they grew here in this portion of the Riverlands. His mind however wasn't really on what he was seeing, no was really concentrating on the future. Time's getting on, we have at best another year before winter hits. By that point the lands need to be prepared.

In his arms Daenerys leaned her head back lightly against Ranma's shoulder. "What are you thinking about?"

"Transportation, manpower the need to get farmers out to their fields for at least one more harvest, and everything else that's involved with getting the North and the Riverlands ready for winter." Ranma replied, shrugging his shoulders. "Autumn's been declared, which means we have time for one more harvest before winter hits, and it'll be important to bring in as large a harvest as possible. I'm also thinking whether or not Vincent will have any luck in thinking of a way to create more glass gardens down in Riverrun or anywhere else, and how long it will take the Royal canal project to be finished, as well as the Umber canal."

Daenerys smirked impishly struck by a sudden desire to tease. She lifted her hips off of Fenris, pushing back with her rear slightly against Ranma's lap. "Reeeally?"

"Well not now." Ranma growled his arms around her tightening slightly. It had been nearly a month since the last time the two of them had been able to make love and their policy of not making love while in the field surrounded by their army had had truly begun to bite them hard.

A warning growl from below them caused Daenerys to move forward slightly, sighing regretfully. It was amazing to her how much she enjoyed that aspect of their relationship, and she was looking forward to getting to Harroway and having at least a single night together.

Thinking about that town she began to go over the plans they had made for after reaching that town. "Are you certain sending Lord Karstark down to the town of Saltfans is a good idea? I understand the need, I'm just wondering if he's the right one for the job. Wouldn't Smalljon be a better bet, or Lord Mallister?"

"I think Smalljon might be needed later on, he's the only other one with even a bit of training in how to lead the pike regiments. As for choosing Rickard, my kinsman might not be the most diplomatic soul, but he's better at it than Greatjon, and he proved his ability to command before this war even began. Jason's good, but I might need him to speak to some of the Riverlands lords on the other side of the Trident such as Lord Vance of Atranta, Lord Blackwood and even the Lannister allies, since we don't have a good idea about why some of them joined with them."

"I know Blackwood fought against the Westerlanders, but my father never told me much about the man, and I want someone with us who knows them. But you didn't suggest any of the other Riverlands lords, hmmm?" Ranma finished with a chuckle, squeezing Daenerys around her stomach, fighting with himself to keep his hands from wandering.

"I like Blantyre well enough, but he's got a lot of anger in him, best to keep him close." Daenerys replied firmly. "Ryger is too arrogant and Roote too much of an... what did Smalljon call him? An ass licker? Beyond the fact we'll need him in Harroway." And beyond the little trap I made in our agreement with him, if the townspeople aren't happy to see him... "But you don't sound worried about the rest of this campaign."

"Tywin is hampered by four things, morale, organization, supplies, and time." Ranma replied. "His morale is in the crapper right now, as is his organization because he just lost a major battle after technically winning for several weeks. Worse, he lost at least half of his men in that battle in a one-sided affair that every one of his soldiers knows was one-sided, and in which he was outsmarted from the get-go. Armsmen aren't stupid, they'll realize that just as well as any Lord could which brings me to the second portion of that issue. He doesn't have many lords left to keep discipline, and worse, he doesn't have anything like our system of sergeants in place."

"Supply we've already gone over that one. But that word doesn't just mean food. Arrows, lances for their cavalry, leather to fix their boots or armor, or pieces of metal to fix their armor, new weapons, which are always needed after a battle, all of that falls under the heading of supplies. And thanks to Wendel, Tywin's force won't have many tents, cooking supplies, or other camp necessities either. I've made certain that our army is well-stocked with everything of that nature but even we are beginning to feel the strain, and Tywin's army is going to be far worse off."

"And third, he knows that he needs to keep his army intact, he can't take another loss like he has already. He called up everything the Westerlands had, the Westerlands won't be able to supply another army for months maybe even a year, during which the winner of this war will be have been decided and winter may well have arrived even this far south. I played on that and his desperation to get down to King's Landing when I baited him."

"Are we going to follow them once they leave the Riverlands?"

"It depends on the direction and the status of our own army. If Tywin tries to escape by the River Road, they won't even get out of the Riverlands. We'll crush them between us and Wayfarer's Rest or smash them on the road when they run into us."

"You're putting a lot of faith in Jon," Daenerys said, not critically just commenting. "I thought that Wayfarer's Rest wasn't that good of the Castle."

"It won't have to be. If Tywin retreats from his fortifications at the Kneeling Man's Ford, we'll be right behind them. All Jon will have to do is slow them down and we can crush the Westerlanders right there."

"Beyond that, we'll need to reform the army, rest, and put the Riverlands in order as much as possible. Winter is coming Daenerys," he said seriously shaking his head. "Regardless of the other factions warring elsewhere we need to remember that, and look to our people."

Daenerys nodded, but decided she'd had enough of the serious talk for now. She took Ranma's hands, gently kneading them where they held her around the middle. "And will we have time enough for some farming of our own?" she said.

Ranma gulped. "Er, I, I thought we'd decided that we, we wouldn't have children until after we'd secured to the crown." Despite his self-control Ranma's hands began to knead Daenerys' stomach rising slightly higher to gently bump the bottom of her breasts. Daenerys was wearing a simple shirt and leggings combo as she had since leaving Winterfell, though this one had been a gift from Lord Seagard and was much more form fitting than the others she had, which showed.

"I know..." Daenerys said with a sigh leaning her head back against his shoulder for a moment then kissing his neck lightly for just a second, not speaking of one of her deepest fears, which was connected to childbirth, not now, it was too pleasant a day out. "And the equation still hasn't changed. You might need my dragons in the field, and I'm the only one that can command them. But practicing is rather fun though don't you think?"

Ranma growled back an acknowledgment, leaning forward slightly to nibble at Daenerys's neck forgetting that Smalljon, Merry and their other friends were to either side of him for a moment and even that Fenris was under him. That was brought strongly to mind however when Fenris leapt forward rather than loping along, almost bucking like a horse would to throw his two riders off. Ranma scrambled to grab onto Fenris for a while Daenerys did the same with a startled yelp, causing Smalljon and the others on either side to burst out in laughter.

Barely another day's march brought them to the Trident, across which they could see the town of Harroway. Originally the town had been situated directly on the river, but it had been burned since then in the War of Conquest and then again later on during the Dance of Dragons and the rivers had shifted slightly. Now it sat on the southern edge of the Trident, a squat, somewhat ugly little town, but still much cleaner seeming to Ranma than King's Landing.

Ranma hadn't stopped here on the way down to the capital, the King's party had pushed on to Darry instead. Ostensibly this was because Robert felt that the whores in Harroway were substandard and one could never tell if they had any diseases, but whether that was the real reason Ranma didn't know.

When the vanguard of the army was just out of bow range they halted, the command group moving off the road slightly to a small rise in the land. Once there, Ranma nodded over to Patrek. With his injured arm Patrek had become the standard bearer for the march rather than a front line swordsman. That hadn't stopped Ranma from starting his training though. "Raise the banner Patrek, let's tell them who we are!"

That statement roused a cheer from lords and common soldiers alike all around them, while Daenerys laughed aloud, her violet eyes glinting in eagerness. For his part Patrek smiled then unwound the banner standing upright next to him, allowing it to fly free. The banner was quickly caught in the breeze, and the shouts and cheers of the men around them expanded.

The banner that Sansa had designed back in Winterfell was a magnificent symbol of the unity of the Stark and Targaryen families, though it broke many of the conventions of heraldry. It was a large, five feet by three feet banner, denoting a tower shield. The shield was bisected with one side having the gray of House Stark for a background, while in the foreground was half a dragon's face, its maw gaping open. On the other side set on the black of House Targaryen was a wolf's muzzle. Its mouth was open as well and the two faces were set so they seemed to merge in the center of the shield.

At this signal Daenerys concentrated, calling upon Sunfyre and Rhaegon. The two of them had been resting in two of the very few carts following the army, but at her call quickly flew into the air and forward of the army. Even from out of bow range they could hear the screams begin from the townspeople and Westerlands garrison.

"That's it my lady," Ranma murmured from where he now stood next to Daenerys. "Scare them, they've already heard about you from that spy that got away, it won't take long to frighten them. Either they surrender or they run, I really doubt they have the stomach to stay and fight but if they do even then the dragons can take their attention away from our men moving forward. Lord Roote." He said, turning to that man. "This was your town, you lead the way in."

Roote jolted a little, staring over the Trident at his town, the single-story walls seemed almost to tower twenty stories in his mind, and the archers on top seemed to multiply as he stared. He gulped, backing his horse away slightly, but before anyone could call him on it. Daenerys spoke up, her voice the odd, stilted tone that showed how much she was concentrating on her dragons. "Wait. Something's happening."

Daenerys watched through Rhaegon's eyes she saw four armymen burst out of what looked like a well-to-do merchant's house. One of them was dragging a young girl behind him, while carrying what looked like a carpet over one shoulder, while another was hauling along a woman. There were a dozen other men waiting outside with bundles of what she assumed were stolen items on their horses already. There were also a number of dead smallfolk in the streets. The nearest townfolk still alive were a few houses down, staring at the group of armymen fearfully from around the walls of a house there.

As she watched a boy who couldn't be older than Rickon rushed out from the house along with a man wielding a frying pan. One of the armymen guffawed and smacked the man wielding the ironing pan to the ground with the flat of his blade, but the boy got in his way when he tried to thrust his sword into the down man's body, cutting the man's arm with what looks like some kind of knife. Enraged the man lifted his sword to strike the boy down.

Then he however had seen enough, and releasing her control of Rhaegon for a moment with a final order to simply fly around she forced her considerable control onto Sunfyre. "Dive, help the little-human against big-human, use claws!"

The dragons by this point were about the size of a pony, minus their wings of course. Their claws were also now very sharp, and powerful enough to take down a deer with ease. Their backs weren't strong enough to carry anyone, but they did have striking power.

At his mistress' mental command Sunfyre flew down his claws extended. He dodged a few arrows fire from here and there in the town, but most of the archers on the wall had already fled their posts, completely spooked by the two dragons flying just out of bow range. This was not helped by watching Sunfyre dive down as if it he was a hunting hawk avoiding their fire as he did.

The guardsmen about to cut the young boy down had a moment to wonder what was blocking the sun and to hear his fellows begin to cry out in fear before he died. Sunfyre's claws slammed into the back of his head taking it off his shoulders. His body went down in a welter of blood and brain matter as Sunfyre roared. The horses that the Westerlanders had hoped to use to escape the town bolted, dragging two of them along the road with them for a moment before they lost their grips on the stirrups while the other armymen ran off screaming.

By that point Sunfyre was already banking back up, and Daenerys was faced with her hardest mental challenge yet. Going up Sunfyre didn't have the speed that he had going down and the archers were better prepared. Luckily there still weren't many of them willing to try to shoot at the dragons rather than run away, and after a few harrying moments during which Daenerys nearly bit through her upper lip she had Sunfyre once more back in the air circling the town with Rhaegon.

At last Daenerys opened her eyes again, looking over at her husband. "The townspeople are rebelling and the garrison is attempting to loot the place in some areas of the town before getting away." She reported quickly. "It's getting ugly in there."

Ranma nodded, not questioning why she had risked Sunfyre that way. Later Daenerys would castigate herself for it, though Ranma would praise her when told the story. That moment, when rather than trying to protect her dragons Daenerys used them to save a nameless and unknown child showed Ranma once again that Daenerys was a woman after his own heart.

For now Ranma turned to the others, barking out orders quickly. "Wendel, pick out your best and most disciplined knights, I'll want two flying columns of a hundred and fifty each, the first moving after me as soon as possible. Smalljon, Patrek, Greatjon, you'll go with the second group to circle the town. Ser Blantyre, Jason, you'll stay here and keep the rest of the army back for now. Control Sers, we want to move into that town and restore order with the minimal loss of life either to the garrison or to the townfolk. Once we capture them, the guards can then stand trial, it'll be a good trial run for the prisoners we've already taken, but we need to restore order, anarchy helps no one."

At least not on this scale, he thought to himself rather amused. Ranma was already thinking about taking on Stannis, and against someone like that, chaos and the ability to ride it would help, just as much as having lieutenant he trusted to act on their own initiative had. After all, if I can't predict what Dacey of all people would do, how is someone else supposed to?

While the others all nodded understanding, Lord Roote looked caught between relief at not having to lead the charge and anger that Ranma wasn't putting him in charge of the attack group. Ranma noticed that, but didn't care, instead he raced off sprinting towards the town on the other side of the Trident. He moved so fast he was almost a blur crossing the distance within a minute of setting off while behind him Fenris stayed behind growling irritably. Ranma had also given him some very specific orders, which didn't make the direwolf happy, but he would do his part.

There were a few archers by the northward gate that had remained at their posts not because of courage but because the area around them had already fallen under the control of the townsfolk. They had even been forced to kick away the ladders leading up to the wall. The wall of the town wasn't well-built enough to actually have a staircase or towers.

Something that would have to change, Ranma mused. By then time that thought shot across his brain however Ranma was already leaping into the air. He cleared the outer wall easily, his sword flicking out left and right in midair to chop two of the archers on the wall into pieces before he continued on, landing easily on his feet on the other side of the gate.

Instead of forcing it open however, Ranma raced on, Ice now blazing with ki as he charged into a ferocious melee going on between a group of seven or eight guardsmen and two dozen townsfolk. None of the townspeople were armored or armed as well as that initial group that Daenerys had spotted, and several of them were already down, dead or wounded.

Ranma smashed into the battle like a bowling ball hitting the nine pins. He sent men through the air or stumbling to the ground with that first rush then threw Ice into the air, grabbing one armstrong by the arm pulling him into a kick that sent him flying into several of his fellows. Then Ranma weaved through the melee, working to separate the two sides with the minimal amount of force needed.

Grabbing one man right under the arm Ranma ducked under another blow, kicking out and sending two men, one townsman and one armstrong to either side of the street before twisting around his hold on the first man slamming a palm into the back of his head, knocking him out easily. Before the man collapsed Ranma used his head as a standing board, lashing out with kicks to all around him before leaping off, dodging blades and even a flail he leaped into a clump of combatants.

While the townspeople got the idea they should back off the Westerlanders tried to fight back or run, but failed at both. Soon enough they were all disarmed and hurting. The townspeople saw this and rushed to attack again but Ice fell out of the sky at that moment. Ranma grabbed it out of the air and brought it down point first with as much speed as the sword's Valyrian steel could handle. The point of Ice impacted the ground of the road shattering it and sending a shockwave through the air which slammed into the people all around and threw them back away from one another. Thanks to Ranma's earlier work in separating them, the two groups were now fully separated at two different sides of the street.

"Enough!" Ranma shouted, glaring around then pointed at the Westerlanders. "You lot, hands where I can see them." He turned to the townsfolk who were getting back to their feet. Many of them were not looking at him though, still glaring at the Westerlanders. "Tie them up. I don't know what they've done here, but they will stand trial for it after we take the town."

"Who are you to tell us to back down!? Those bastards have it coming!" shouted one man, but he quailed as Ranma's eyes pinned into the floor.

"I am Ranma Stark-Targaryen, grandson and speaker of the Lord Paramount of the Riverlands and Lord Paramount of the North. And I tell you now that they will stand trial, but this chaos will stop! Before I arrived these guards were winning against you lot! And do you think that these are the only ones who are trying to take advantage of the fighting here, or that all of those who do will be from the garrison?!"

Violence hovered in the air there was a moment, the townspeople could have turned on Ranma right then, but Ranma didn't seem to notice, simply barking out orders. "You five," he said pointing to the largest and strongest looking of the townspeople. "You're with me, we'll move towards the central holdfast and gather as many of your fellow townsfolk to organize this mess."

"You two," he said pointing to a few older men who had the look of men who had seen battle before this. "You're in charge of the prisoners. I want them alive remember, the rest of you spread out and tell your fellows that you all will have justice if they start to calm the fighting down."

Twenty yards behind where Ranma had ended that skirmish there was a sudden booming crash. Ranma smirked as Fenris, glowing blue-gold smashed straight through the flimsy gate of the town at the head of the flying column that he had ordered Wendel put together. Around him the townspeople began to scatter, but a barked order from Ranma stopped them, the smallfolk's ingrained training to follow orders holding them for moment.

In that moment Ranma once again took command, and his orders were now obeyed as Wendel and his men began to spread through the town.

Ranma looked at the five men he'd chosen and asked "Where d'you think is the center of the fighting is it the keep or elsewhere?"

"We've got the Northwest under control," One of them said. The Grand is over there, and he was organized and waiting for a chance! If we're 'aving any trouble, it's pro'bly by the fat bastard's keep, the garrison took it over as their barracks when he fled like a yellow belly!"

Ranma frowned, hearing that said aloud. Lord Roote's retreat from Harroway was one of the problems he had with the man. Not that he could have protected the place, after all the walls were a joke, most of the buildings he could see were wood, and he didn't have that many men, a bare 600 or so and not many of them decently trained or outfitted. However he could have ordered the town abandoned entirely, forcing the smallfolk out with him further north. Instead he'd simply ran, which both Ranma and Daenerys felt was, as Daenerys put it once 'damning evidence of the so-called care he gives the smallfolk who are supposed to look to him for protection.'

But something else the man said grabbed his attention. "The Grand, who's that?"

The men all around him clammed up, and Ranma laughed shaking his head. "All right, you don't have to tell me now but I hope he'll come forward after order's been restored. He sounds like someone I'd like to meet."

He turned to Wendel, who was still on his horse of course. "You know what to do Wendel. The knight nodded his head and Ranma reached up to clasp arms with him briefly before the two men raced it in different directions.

Riding around the town's walls the second of Wendel's cavalry column along with Fenris smashed in from the south, shattering that gate as well. Then they held it easily against the forty men from the garrison who had just reached it. Twenty-two of those men surrendered after Fenris ripped five of their fellows into pieces and Greatjon had cut two of them down with the ease of a man long accustomed to such excursions. The fear of the dragons, the coming of the direwolf from the south, the fact that both of the gates were now held by their enemies and the fact that every Northerner had taken up Ranma's shout of surrender as they moved through the town made the garrison quit fighting quickly.

Stopping the smallfolk from killing them all took a bit longer, but even then it wasn't as difficult as it could've been. The shock and awe of the dragons, as well as the direwolf and Ranma himself worked for them, and there were only about 2000 perhaps 3000 smallfolk in the town in any event. And even using clubs and staffs the men from the north were more than a match for the Westerlander garrison, most of whom were barely trained levy units, with a smattering of armsmen and archers pulled from minor noble houses. They didn't have the armor or the training of the knights of House Manderly.

Eventually the prisoners were gathered outside the Lord Roote's keep, where the rest of the army commanders joined Ranma, Wendell and the others. However, this almost unmade the work Ranma and his fellows had done pacifying the town.

"Traitor!" said one man from among the townfolk, pointing angrily at Lord Roote who along with a few of his men had come forward with the other Lords.

"Coward!" shouted another.

"Despoiler!" shouted another. That time it was a female voice, and Ranma noted that she looked as if she was some kind of maid. As he noted that, someone else threw a piece of rotten fruit which smacked into Lord Roote's chain mail. Another one caught him in the face, and he backed away from the townspeople looking around worriedly.

A few of Roote's men made to move forward, and the grumble from the watching crowd began again but stopped instantly as Ranma and Fenris were suddenly in the men's faces. "Back off if you want to live." Ranma said in a soft tone that still carried through the suddenly silent crowd.

"Why do I get the impression my Lord Roote, that you fled 'your' town in a different manner than you told us?" said Daenerys, riding up on her own horse with Ser Barristan on his following by her side. Myrcella wasn't with her, having commandeered several of the locals who had remained by the gate to show her to where those in need of medical attention were taken prior to and during the outbreak of violence. Naturally enough that was the sept of the town.

"You already knew that I had to retreat quickly from the town my lady." Lord Roote said, staring between her, Ranma and the townspeople, who now once more looked as if they were poised on a knife's edge of violence.

"Yes I knew that, and though it didn't speak highly of your courage, it did speak somewhat of your good sense. But you left your people behind, you insinuated to us that that was because you retreated precipitously? Is that not the case?"

"I don't know what that word means milady," shouted someone from in the crowd, "but he had enough time to loot his own way out!"

"Truly?" Daenerys said looking at the man before turning back to Lord Roote, though her words were still addressed to the man who had spoken. "And would you be willing to testify to that?"

The man looked bemused for a moment for another member of the crowd leaned in and whispered hurriedly into his ear. He then nodded and several dozen others also shouted they had seen the same thing.

"Hundreds of us could do that ladyship!" said another somewhat deeper voice. The crowd seemed to part for a moment, letting through an older man of Ser Barristan's age.

Looking at him, Ranma got the impression of solidness. He looked like a cross between a well-to-do merchant and drover, possibly a man who had made the jump between working in someone else's warehouse to owning his own. In one hand he held a billhook that was dark with blood.

He looked at Ranma not like a smallfolk normally would to a lord, but almost challengingly. "I'm the Grand, Grimaldi Anderson lordship. I was told you wanted to speak with me?"

"Tell me Ser," Ranma said moving forward to hold out his hand to the other man. "You say that Lord Roote pillaged the town before leaving, did he do that kind of thing often, simply taking whatever he wanted? And what were his taxes like?"

"Not often, but taxes have been heavier ever since the little fucker took over from his old man." The older man replied bluntly, not showing his surprise that a lord would offer to shake hands with him, but grasping the younger man's arm firmly, though the power of that grip told him Ranma wasn't someone to cross. "There've also been tales of a few maids who were suddenly sent home to their families out in the countryside."

"You have no proof of that." Lord Roote muttered, gathering his men around him as the crowd's muttering became louder and darker. It was evident that there was a lot of repressed feelings there, and after the last few months of being under Lannister rule plus the final outlet of violence none of these people were willing to go back to the status quo.

"More than a dozen people here just said they would testify that very thing." Daenerys said.

Lord Roote move towards her blustering angrily, not noticing that Ser Barristan had loosened his blade in his sheath and moved to one side while his own men had carefully raised their own hands away from their weapons. All of them had seen Ranma in action, and beyond that they could count. "We had an agreement!" said Lord Roote angrily.

"Yes a written agreement since you and Lord Wayn wanted the pacts I made with you in writing." Daenerys said. "You would retain control of Harroway and gain lands from House Darry, in return for your backing us in the future. Contingent upon there being no wrongdoing against the smallfolk on your part." She smiled faintly as Lord Roote blanched. "Did you think I put that in as only a bit of fluff to fill in the parchment? Rest assured that we will get to the bottom of these claims against you. For now, I believe it best that you remain in our care."

As Lord Roote was pulled protesting from the saddle Daenerys turned to Ranma. Leaning close she said "I will oversee the trials of the garrison. You should oversee Lord Roote, take Ser Grimaldi and some of the other local representatives with you." At his quizzical expression she explained, her eyes showing her sadness. "I need to show that I can wield the sword Ranma."

"And I need to show that I can handle politics and matters of law," Ranma said with a nod. "Makes sense especially if we want everyone to realize that this is an equal relationship. We both need to show that we are equally capable in as many fields of ruling is possible."

"Exactly." Daenerys nodded, leaning in to kiss his cheek lightly. "Have some of the men bring out a few chairs, I'll oversee the trials for the garrison and any other looters our men found outside, and you can deal with Lord Roote inside until the time comes for sentencing."

Just then the crowd screamed a bit, moving back hurriedly as Sunfyre and Rhaegon both landed by Daenerys. She looked at them, then smiled faintly, reaching out to gently stroke them under their chins. "Well done my little ones, she murmured, sending a feeling of approval and love down their link, getting back a feeling of intense hunger. That made her frown a little. "I think first though I need to let these two hunt, their exertions have made them tired. Unless there is a surplus of meat or fish in the town?"

Surprisingly a few of the smallfolk answered, having gotten over their fear thanks to seeing the Northmen not retreating from the dragons and the dragons not lashing out "We just got a from further downstream milady, said one man who looked like a fisherman. "Mostly crab and shellfish, if'n that please ye, milady."

Daenerys blinked, looking at her dragons. "They've not had shellfish or crab before, so we'll see." With a hand gesture she sent Sunfyre and Rhaegon into the air, sending them toward the town's small dock, situated on its northeast side. "I'll get them fed and come back quickly to start the trials."

Ranma nodded, yet asked, "But are you going to actually wield the sword?"

That caused Daenerys to pause. That was one aspect of the North that had astonished her, that the man who passed the sentence personally wielded the blade. She liked it too, it showed how serious they were about law and honor. "I will." She said firmly staring into Ranma's eyes. After a moment he nodded, and the two of them split off to begin organizing the trials.

It turned out that both dragons absolutely adored crabs and other shellfish. The crunchiness of the shells and the rubbery nature of the meat were very much to their liking. Wanting to get the two dragons some more exercise, Daenerys ordered the fishermen to let the crabs out into the water of the Trident. Sunfyre and Rhaegon gleefully splashed into the water after them, swimming here and there as they gobbled the crunchy treats up one after another.

This show actually attracted a following of smallfolk, including several dozen of the children from the town, who began to root for Sunfyre or Rhaegon as they chased the crabs down. Smiling Daenerys fielded questions about her little ones, having determined long before this that while the fear of them was a tool, it could also be a rallying point for her enemies, as it had in the past during the Dance of Dragons, when the dragons in the pit in King's Landing were attacked by a mob. She never wanted the dragons to be so hated again, even if they would eventually be used in battle.

Soon enough however the two dragons waddled out of the water, laying down to nap on the riverbank. Daenerys left them there with several of the pages and squires watching them, making certain the smallfolk stayed away. Daenerys and Ser Barristan moved back to the holdfast, ready to start an unpleasant duty.

OOOOOO

Renly Baratheon was very worried and very angry, but he didn't allow either of those emotions to appear on his face. The news that the Ironborn had assaulted the Arbor and the Shield Islands and actually won was astonishing and very worrying. The fact that the second echelon wasn't as large as he had hoped was also worrying. Gone was his plan to have so large an army that he could simply overawe his opponents. Gone too was the idea of leaving a portion of his army here to keep the blockade of the city going while he turned with the rest to face his brother. They just didn't have the manpower to both retain their cordon around King's Landing and face Stannis's army, not with the kind of force disparity that Renly wanted.

Around him the Stormlands and Reach Lords were muttering angrily, shaking their heads in dismay at the news that Lord Ambrose had shared with them. Their initial responses had been much louder, but Mace had bellowed them down saying that his son had done the right thing, and that he trusted Garlan to be able to handle the Ironborn assault.

That Randyll Tarly agreed with Mace helped quiet most of those murmurs. "Garlan has a good head on his shoulders, and as long as he listens to Lord Hightower on matters pertaining to sea warfare, he'll do well enough."

Renly spoke into the silence after Randyll had finished speaking nodding his head. "Indeed Lord Tyrell your son did right to turn back with such a force. I have no doubt that's Garlan will continue to do his utmost to retake the Arbor and the Shield Islands. After we are done with King's Landing and my brother has been brought to heel we will have to consider what to do about the Iron Islands. This is the second time they have rebelled." Renly put on a serious expression and stared around him as hard as he could. "I think we should make certain that there is not a third occurrence."

Nods of approval from all around him answered Renly's words, even Randyll agreed with that idea. Renly went on thoughtfully. "We might even be able to pay the Lyseni pirate fleet out there to aid us. That and the Royal Fleet would give us naval superiority whatever the Ironborn tried to do to defend their Isles.

"I still say we should pull out some more of our forces and send them back home." Said Lord Dunn, His lands were on the Mander, and he knew all too well what a good route for invasion the river could be for the Ironborn. In point of fact by the time Lord Dunn heard about the invasion his lands already been ravaged, and his keep destroyed. His wife had also been taken as a salt wife and transported back to the Shield Islands.

There was a murmur of approval for that, but Renly held up a hand quickly. "My lords, remember what we have heard from the city. There is a plague in there! We need to keep as much of our army here as possible to keep a lid on the city, we cannot allow any refugees out until the plague is dealt with internally." How such a thing could be accomplished Renly didn't know, nor did he particularly care. He simply wanted to keep the plague inside, and then ride in to claim his throne when it died down enough for it to be safe.

"And there is my brother to consider, we need to retain enough force here to face him as well as cordon off the city. Unless you all have a better method of keeping the population of the city contained, in which case do share it but until then we have to stay put." That this allowed Renly to retain control of the largest army in Westeros was simply a side benefit. 62,000 men should be enough to face any threat.

There was a moment more of grumbling, and Renly could tell that despite the obvious logic of what he had said many of them were still unhappy but there was nothing he could do about it. The plague was nailing his feet here despite the fortifications they had thrown up around the city. And Stannis was out there as well, marching towards the city now.

Still slowly for some reason, it would be at least another week with the rate Stannis was marching. That was astonishing given an army his size could only have taken for five days normally to get from Stokeworth to the capital but now it was moving so slowly it had been on the road from Stokeworth a little under a week and was still that far away.

"Let us turn to other matters my lords." Renly said again nodding his head at Lord Ambrose. "Thank you for your report, and thank you for continuing the march up here my Lord, that will not be forgotten."

As the man beamed more than one Reach Lord shared glances with one another, shaking their heads angrily though Mace was nodding his head ponderously. None of them had as much faith in Garlan as Randyll or Mace did. After all, while he was known to be a fine warrior in the tourney, he had never been challenged as a field commander much like far too many summer knights. And their holdings were in peril from the Ironborn.

More than one man there wondered if they should pull their men out of the Stormlands/Reach army and head back home. But peer pressure was an awful thing, and with the number of lords against that idea they were forced to remain. At least for now. But all of them were prepared to head home as soon as they could.

Renly was not aware of the cracks in his authority spreading like that, and he turned to the two lords in charge of scouting and gathering information from the smallfolk. Originally only Lord Staedmon had been in charge of that, but Lord Cockshaw had proven that he had a good touch with interacting with the smallfolk. That Cockshaw was also being passed messages from Varys was well known to Renly, but Renly considered it simply business as usual, a sign that the Master of Whispers wasn't a Lannister supporter merely someone who wished to retain his own position. "Any news?"

The two men looked at one another and Staedmon waved at his fellow lord to answer first. Cockshaw bowed formally to Renly then looked at him as well as his fellow lords. "News has reached the smallfolk around here of a major battle up in the Riverlands. The lion and the wolves have met, and the Lannisters are in full retreat after suffering a tremendous loss. No one knows any details, except that it was very one-sided, that Ranma Stark and his northerners only took a pittance in casualties while gutting the Lannister forces."

There were some exclamations of astonishment there, including one coming from Randyll. He hadn't really put much truck in the idea of the Stark youth as a general, his father yes, but Ranma? A good warrior, possibly an excellent one given his destruction of the Mountain That Rode, but being a general was a very different thing.

"There are no details of how this was accomplished?" Loras asked. He rarely put himself forward in these meetings any longer, ashamed of his looks even if he and Renly had healed the rift between them somewhat. But this was interesting enough to make him speak up.

"None." Cockshaw replied, shrugging. "Rumor is rarely good for detail, in fact I'd even take the 'one-sided' portion of that report with a grain of salt, but it's certain that the Lannisters lost and are in retreat."

"It might be time to send out an envoy to the Starks." said one Lord from the Reach thoughtfully. "We certainly have an enemy in common and possibly as many as three."

Cockshaw coughed apologetically. "There have also been many more rumors about the Starks having the aide of former Targaryen loyalists. Some rumors out of Duskenale say that Ranma Stark returned with the Stormborn, and she had two young dragons. Those rumors at least are solid..." He trailed off looking around at everyone's faces.

Renly's eyes widened and he too looked around knowing that this news had hit like a jug of wildfire among the lords here. The Reach and its lords had in the majority stayed loyal to the Targaryen Dynasty. They had been ineffectual in that loyalty yet could still be counted among the closet Targaryen loyalists. If there was any truth in the rumors that the dragons themselves had returned, then rather than simply being a symbol for someone else's ambition, the Targaryen girl became a power to be courted.

With that in mind Renly spoke up quickly, an idea forming in his mind. "If that is indeed the case, then we will make overtures to the Starks immediately. I'll send a messenger this very day as soon as we can discuss the wording my lords. However I do not believe that the Targaryen alone should sit on the throne. At least not in this generation. No, they should instead be wedded to the royal line, part of it but not sitting on the throne. Too often those Targaryen members that sit on that throne change over time, becoming mad."

His words had a noted effect among many of his listeners, and more than one Lord found himself nodding remembering not just the Mad King, but those Targaryen members from the Dance of Dragons, and of course Maegor the Cruel, who had ravaged the Reach in his war against the Faithful.

"How so?" said one Lord cocking his head quizzically.

"I note Lord Mace, and that only one of your three sons has married yet." Renly said smiling faintly. "I'm certain if given the choice between fighting for a throne now and guaranteeing her children sitting on the right side of that throne with the full might of the Reach, the Stormlands and apparently the Starks behind such a dynasty, this Stormborn girl will see reason."

Mace look at him then grinned widely as he finally understood what Renly was getting at.

Needless to say, the rumors that Ranma and Daenerys had married had not spread as far as the rumors of the dragons return. If it had, then Renly's idea would never have been taken seriously, especially considering that the Starks were already aiding the Targaryen queen.

Renly once more tried to change the subject, turning to Lord Staedmon. "Lord Mace and I will work on that later, for now, why don't you tell us what my brother is up too."

"He's still moving very slowly my Lord, and seems to be treading lightly on the smallfolk as he has since Stokeworth." Everyone there nodded. The farmland around Stokeworth was well known to be almost as good as that routinely found in the Reach so that made sense. "The weather isn't the cause of their moving so slowly, though I have no idea what is."

It had rained here near King's Landing twice in the last few weeks, light showers that amounted to nothing though they had not helped the general morale of the army. Health wasn't affected, since Lord Randyll had had a hand in each of the creation of the camps scattered around King's Landing. A few troopers were having health issues, but not many.

This was one area where Renly had listened to Lord Randyll from the very beginning, and he had requisitioned every maester and septon of every castle along their route from Highgarden up to King's Landing, as well as any other healers that could be found. Not all of them were as well suited to taking care of the health of the army as others, but the 'quantity approach' had worked so far.

"So we have another week to prepare for his arrival." Renly said with a firm nod. "Good, keep your scouts watching his army, I don't want to be surprised if they suddenly speed up or do a forced march to catch us by surprise. Also," he said turning to the Lord in charge of construction projects. "If you could prepare a pavilion well back of our camps, say right outside bow-range of the nearest encampment to my brother's route of march I think that would be a good idea. I've said before, I'll give him one chance to talk and that will need to happen on neutral ground."

After that the meeting wound down, and eventually ended without any further new information coming to their attention. Renly was true to his word, and sent off twenty men with a messenger up to Harroway. Ser Willam Wythers went with them, in fact he had insisted on being part of the party though no one knew why. Behind them that party left a group of lords who were now thinking very hard about the intelligence of continuing to back Renly Baratheon.

OOOOOO

At the same time that Renly and his army were finally hearing about the return of Daenerys Stormborn and her two dragons, a fleet was rounding Massey's Hook. Every ship flew the three headed red dragon on black of House Targaryen. Their target, Dragonstone. Viserys was a firm believer in symbolism, though his next target would be a much more useful goal.

OOOOOO

It turned out that there were in fact documented evidence of Lord Roote adding his own taxes to those the townsfolk were already paying, well above the level a Noble House of House Roote's minor standing should've been allowed. Lord Tully's factors should have spotted it years ago, but when talking to the locals who had come forward to give evidence against Lord Roote, he found out that those factors hadn't been seen in Harroway for over ten years. Ranma was forced to put that down to his grandfather's declining health, though there should have still been a formula for his men to follow.

Those and the charges of pillaging from the well-to-do houses before fleeing the city were proven in that first day of hearing, though doing so took a long time. Lord Roote tried to fight them, but the evidence against him was irrefutable on those charges. Unfortunately most of what he had stolen had been turned into liquid capital long before this, stored with a factor in Wickenden, the seat of House Waxley in the Vale. It would take months to get that money back, if it was possible at all. So Ranma made the decision to reimburse a fourth of what Roote had stolen out of his own coffers, which were still glutted thanks to the fall of House Frey and his share of the plunder from the various battlefields.

The charges that he had raped some of the maids and servants however, could not be proven. None of the girls who might have been raped were anywhere in the city, having fled to farms elsewhere, and no one in town knew their locations. Two cases of rape could be substantiated against a group of five of his men, and Ranma ordered them executed immediately, doing the deed himself right there in the holdfast's main hall. It served as a hard reminder for his troops, and showed the townsfolk that justice would be swift. Others, who aided their lord in the pillaging, were sentenced to two years of labor and sent back up to the Ruby Ford with a small guard.

But Lord Roote could not be executed for the crimes that could be proven. Instead Ranma stripped his House of its noble status, and exiled him to the Quiet Isle, a island at the mouth of the Trident devoted to a silent order of brothers of the Faith. Since Tomas Roote was the only member of his house, not having a son and not having married as yet, that was the end of his House. Those of his armymen absolved of wrongdoing would remain with the army for now.

Of course, this left a power vacuum in the city, which Ranma filled promptly. As the former lord was led off in chains still protesting 'We had a deal', Ranma turned to Ser Blanetree and the townsman named Grimaldi Anderson. As a witness himself he had been sequestered during the trial so he couldn't influence the other smallfolk witnesses, but even so, he had impressed Ranma with his forthright attitude and intelligence.

When he spoke, Ranma kept his voice formal, as he had throughout the trials duration. "Ser Blanetree, I am well aware that my wife promised you the former House Vypren lands after the war in repayment. Would you prefer to retain your original lands and gain a stake of fifty percent of Harroway?"

"You can't break up a town like it's some kind of, of cow!" Grimaldi said before he could stop himself. At this breach of the hearing's etiquette Ranma's eyes stared into the older man, causing him to shuffle his feet and move back slightly.

After a moment though, Ranma smiled. "I did not mean the town itself Grimaldi, I meant the proceeds from a new set of taxes, which we will work on after this trial is concluded. It will not be onerous for the next few years, to aid the town in rebuilding, and indeed, I hope growing in the future. Ser Blanetree?"

Ser Blanetree had used that moment to think, and he replied in the affirmative. "I would prefer to retain my original lands my lord, and I thank you for trusting me as one of your voices here." He had noticed that fifty percent bit, and knew Ranma was planning something there.

"Excellent." Ranma turned to Grimaldi, with a wide smirk on his face, and suddenly the former tradesman felt a shiver go down his spine. "Grimaldi Anderson, you have proven yourself to be an intelligent and insightful man, and your grasp of Harroway and its people is obvious. Moreover, those same people seemingly trust you, and look to you for leadership. I think that myself, and my grandfather and uncle when we secure his release, could use such a man here. Would you be willing to act as our local voice?"

Grimaldi gaped at him, knowing that eventually such a position might bring his family into the realms of the minor nobility. However he hadn't organized his minor rebellion against the Lannister garrison for personal power. "You realize if you give me that kind of power, I would look out for the welfare of the townsfolk and the town before serving your needs?" He asked bluntly, having realized during the trial that Ranma Stark preferred blunt speech.

As the other lords present stirred angrily, Ranma laughed aloud. "And that good ser is precisely why I'd give you the job."

"In that case, I accept the commission my lord." Grimaldi said.

"Excellent, and for your first job, you and Ser Blanetree are going to sit down and look at the taxes on the books here in Harroway." Ranma smiled grimly. "A thankless task, but one which needs to be done now."

OOOOOO

Elsewhere Myrcella had arrived at the sept, and quickly took over the smallfolk attempting to get themselves some medical attention. The sept was apparently run normally by one very overworked elderly septon who looked old enough to be a great grandfather at least, aided young brothers who didn't have any healing knowledge at all outside of a few droughts to deaden pain or how to put a poultice on. The town didn't even have a maester, Lord Roote hadn't had one for his keep which unfortunately meant that no one around here was very good at healing outside the smallest level.

However this group was helped by another septon when Myrcella arrived and she stared at him in shock. "Septon Sparrow? What are you doing here?"

"Doing what I can to care for my flock young princess." The old man said looking up at her through stern eyes. He gently touched a rosary hung around his neck which Myrcella hadn't seen him wear before but she didn't see any significance about it. "I have little in the way of healing knowledge, but I am guided by my faith and I have two strong hands. As such I will serve as I may."

"Good, then you might know where the local well is, we'll need several buckets worth of heated water." She nodded over to George who nodded back and moved towards the old septon. "Please go with George here to get some."

Father Sparrow looked a little disconcerted at being ordered about like that, but went off readily enough. Myrcella moved towards several women in one corner who looked as if they had been beaten in the past, already barking out orders to a few of her helpers who had followed her to get her specific salves and poultices.

Over the next few hours Septon Sparrow watched as Myrcella went through the backlog of injured and abused smallfolk. In comparison to the wounded after a battle it was almost pathetically easy for her, not any less distressing, but easy. No one here had lost limbs, or needed desperate, last minute stitching to save their lives. The young Baratheon princess served them all equally, man, woman, well-to-do and poor looking made it didn't matter to her, a sign of egalitarianism that most healers would never get away with.

Ranma showed up at one point after finally clearing up the issue with Lord Roote. After greeting Merry with his now habitual one-sided hugged Ranma asked her "What was it like before you got here? Were the local septons well-trained?"

"Not trained at all!" Myrcella said angrily. "There was no maester here, and most of the local healers ran off, and the ones that remained aren't the best. Oh there were a few locals who knew how to heal broken arms or legs and bruises and cuts, but ribs? Shoulders? Deep cuts or more serious wounds, or ailments beyond the common flu no! At least Lord Roote kept the city clean enough using the River, and it was never it as crowded as King's Landing is, thankfully."

"But worse is the fact the local midwife apparently ran off the moment the rumor of the Lannister's coming towards the town got here. One of the local drover's wife's tried to step into the role but they lost three women and their babies since the Lannister's took over the town. And five men who had head injuries at various points. Even I would've had trouble with most of those, though maester Cresson, the maester from House Wayn who decided to join the army, he could've handled them."

Ranma winced at that, shaking his head sadly at the loss of life especially in that manner. Myrcella went on, not commenting on his wince as she knew what that was about, squeezing his hand affectionately. It always astonished her after watching him in battle how gentle Ranma was outside of it. Then again when you're as strong as he is you can afford to be gentle I suppose. "Really I would've liked to see a Maester here, and a few students at least in a town this size. It's actually larger than Fairmarket was before the influx of refugees."

"But Fairmarket had the same issue, no dedicated healers. After this war Merry, we need to found some kind of up Healing Hall. A separate profession from Maesters and the Faith, that can both provide medical attention to people and can continue to expand medical understanding. The Citadel and the maesters are supposed to do that, but they really don't get it out to the people well enough, and when they do it's always first to the nobles, the smallfolk only get a trickle-down effect from that."

"That is a magnificent idea Ranma, especially with winter coming. Nutrition and disease in particularly fevers will be a major factor when winter comes."

Ranma squeeze Merry around the shoulders again chuckling quietly. "Took the words right out of my mouth Merry. You could be a Stark with the way you recognize the coming of winter. I could wish more of these southern lords understood that."

Myrcella blushed rosily, taking a moment to rest her head against Ranma shoulder before pushing him away. "Get on with you, I've still got some more work to do here. Oh, I might be taking on one or two more helpers when we leave."

"That's fine, have them read or read the written contract Patrek made up, then I'll have him release their first payment to them before we leave."

Septon Sparrow moved towards Ranma as he made his way back towards the doorway. "Your Majesty." he said bowing formally.

